In thus reasoning, I am, of course, not blind to the fact that a wide margin must be allowed for acts and operations which can never be totally suspended. These are usually, and, I think, very properly, called deeds of mercy or necessity. Simply that man may live, implies an infinite amount of labour which even the severest advocate of the Sunday cannot reasonably regard as sins. It is in the body social and body politic, as it is in the human body. When man rests or sleeps, his natural faculties do not cease to perform their vital functions: he breathes, his heart beats, the red currents of life flow and re-flow in a million channels, keeping vigorous and fresh the mysterious kingdom of the body, over which the soul, on her semi-somnolent throne, surveys, like a seer reposing at twilight, the shadows of things past, and the visions of things to come. So, when the body politic and social, or the whole nation, sleeps at night, or rests on Sunday, its natural powers still perform their essential functions; law is continuous, and, by night and day, claps towns, villages, and cities in its myriad-channeled network of impalpable vitality; from the ends of the earth, and through raging seas, the telegraph murmurs with a thousand wires, recounting the comedy or the tragedy of the daily life of nations; on the orbed brine, innumerable ships come and go with messages of peace or war; the white doves of the Post-office wing their way to countless doors with news of love, hate, success, failure, ruin, or salvation; railways ring with the wheels of impetuous speed, letting cities embrace in a day that were formerly weeks asunder; the Judge is ever on the bench; the Queen is ever on her throne;—and thus, while the nation rests or sleeps, its strong pulses cease not to beat; and its great spirit is ever awake, watching the departing shadow, and waiting the rising vision.

The Sunday is very differently estimated in different countries. In Britain, the opening of theatres, museums, picture-galleries, is set down as both immoral and illegal—that is, it is both a sin and a crime; in France and Italy it is regarded as neither sin nor crime. Not less sinful and illegal is it in the eyes of the British to have private or public balls on Sunday; in France, the Sunday ball is as common as the Sunday sermon is in this country, and is looked on as equally innocent. It is very probable that in a moral point of view, the manner in which the different nations of the world regard the Sunday will be greatly modified; but I think it is in the last degree improbable that Sunday, as a day of rest from labour, will ever be abolished by any people under the sun.

One of the most deadly sins of modern times is not a crime—we mean what is popularly known as the social sin of great cities. It is called peculiarly 'of cities;' although, if measured by illegitimacy, the vice is more prolific in certain country districts than it is in cities. But the extent of illegitimacy is philosophically no measure of the extent of the sin; because, where the sin exists as a system, it is nearly altogether unprolific. Paradoxical as it may seem, therefore, a high ratio of illegitimacy in the birth-rate of any particular district may prove a good condition of morals; for, unless there had been a favourable pre-existent condition of virtue, the living proofs of illegitimacy would have been forthcoming in a much lesser proportion.

But if the practice of this deadly social sin is not itself a crime, it is productive of perhaps a greater number of crimes than any other sin of which man is the victim, with the exception possibly of the sin of drunkenness. Both these great social sins—themselves the illegitimate offspring of wronged virtues—may be regarded as the two pleasantest angels which young and inexperienced men can encounter; pleasantest, and therefore deadliest; superficially lovely, but innately ugly, because defiant of Heaven and Heaven's eternal laws; drawing the unwary spirits after them into dens of unholiness and pits of woe and tears; begetting weakness and folly, and too frequently that fatallest of all impotence—the impotence which precludes practical repentance.

The reader will, of course, hardly require to be reminded that these sentences are only meant to be suggestive, not exhaustive.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. XI.

THE OSSIANIC CONTROVERSY.

ONE of the most admired passages in MacPherson's 'Ossian' is the 'Address to the Rising Sun' in 'Carthon.' It has been spoken of as affording convincing evidence of MacPherson's native taste and genius, though these are so frequently irregular and faulty in their expression. But the 'Address to the Rising Sun,' like the 'Address to the Setting Sun,' is a genuine piece of popular poetry, capable of being traced back to the beginning of the last century—consequently to a period considerably anterior to MacPherson's birth. It is found in several collections of Gaelic poetry—in MacCallum's, published in 1816; in Stewart's, published in 1804, three years before MacPherson's Gaelic appeared. It was given to the Highland Society, in 1801, by the Rev. Mr. MacDiarmid, who had got it about thirty years before from an old man in Glen-Lyon. This old man had leaped it in his youth from people in the same glen. Mr. MacDiarmid took it down as the man repeated it. 'I took it,' he says, 'and several other fragments, from the man's mouth.'

Captain A. Morrison, in his 'Answers to Queries transmitted to him from the Committee of the Highland Society, respecting Ossian's and other ancient Poems,' says, in answer to the second query, that he 'gave the Rev. Mr. Mackinnon, of Glendarua—before he went last time to America, in the year 1789—Ossian's "Address to the Sun," in the original, which being transmitted by Lord Bannatyne, as presented, he identifies.'

To the third query, he answers that he 'gave the "Address" among Mr. MacPherson's original papers, when he was transcribing fairly for him from the original papers (either collected by himself or transmitted by his Highland friends), as it stood in a poem of "Carthon," afterwards translated and published.'

Captain Morrison also asserts that MacPherson 'was no great poet; nor thoroughly conversant with Gaelic literature. So far from composing such poems as were translated, that he assisted him often in understanding some words, and suggested some improvements.' He says, further, that 'The "Address to the Sun," in the poem of "Carthon," wanted two lines in the original, which neither Mr. MacPherson nor anybody else could supply—nay, supply anything like them.' Captain Morrison's copy of the 'Address' differs from Mr. MacDiarmid's in six of the lines; MacCallum's copy contains two passages not in either of theirs, and ends with two lines more—probably the very two lines wanted in MacPherson's original, and which neither he nor anybody else could supply.

The following is a rhythmical translation of 'Address to the Sun,' line for line with the original—as given by Mr. MacDiarmid—in its metre, quite literal.

OSSIAN'S ADDRESS TO THE SUN.

O thou, who wanderest there on high,
Round as a chief's hard shield and bright,
Whence doth thy gloomless lustre hie,
O Sun! and whence thy light?
Thou comest with loveliest might,
And the stars their courses hide;
Husless the moon leaves the sky,
And shrouds in the western tide.
And thou goest forth alone!
Who darest to keep by thy side?
Falls the oak from the hill where it grew:
Falls the rock by age o'erthrown;
Ebbes ocean tide and it flows;
And fades the pale moon from the view:—
Yet still thy bright triumph glows!
In the joy of thy light thou goest on!

Even when blackens the noisy storm,
When thunders roar and lightnings fly,
Thou look'st through the wild troubled swarm,
With a smile of delight from the sky!
But to me thy light is vain:
Thy face shall I see no more
When thy golden bright locks without stain
The fair eastern cloud have dress'd;
Or thou tremblest over the main
At thy dusky western door!
Yet may it be both thou and I
For a time with strength are bless'd,
Till our years fade both from the sky,
And in one certain end take their rest.
Then rejoice, O Sun! and be glad,
Thou prince, in thy vigorous noon!
For age is unpleasant and sad,
Like the dim and faint light of the moon
When it looks through a cloud on the heath,
Where the gray mist lags round the stone,
Ere the blasts of the cold north breathe
On the traveller, wearied and lone.

MacCallum's version finishes with 'The light of the night will then rejoice when the Son of brightness has departed.' After 'The fair eastern cloud have dress'd,' the same version continues, 'Banishing night from every place except the eye of the bard that shall see thy light.' Two lines further down, 'At thy western door,' it goes on, 'But thus aged, feeble, and grey, thou shalt yet be alone; thy progress in the sky shall be slow, and thou shalt be blind, like me on the hill; dark as the changeful moon shall be thy wanderings in the heavens; thou shalt not hear the speaking voice of the morning, like the heroes that rise no more; the hunter shall survey the plain that shall not behold thy coming form; sad he will turn his tears pouring forth, "My favourite hound, the Sun has forsaken us."'

I give these passages as they were translated for MacCallum's publication by 'Ewen MacLachlan, Esq., Tutor of the Grammar-school, Old Aberdeen.' Mr. MacLachlan was a well-known Highland poet, and the translator of a considerable part of the 'Iliad' into Gaelic.

There is something, it appears to me, singularly vivid and impressive in the quotation last given. That part of the sun-lorn hunter is really beautiful—'My favourite hound, the Sun has forsaken us.' It is altogether a very strange fancy this of the final darkening of the day, and may be perhaps connected with some forgotten Highland superstition.

There seems to have been favourite bits of poetry floating about in the Highlands, not belonging to any particular poem, but ready to be used by the reciters in any place where they appeared to fit well. These formed an elaborate description of the dress, the appearance, the warlike equipage, or else some single great action of a celebrated hero; or, indeed, any incident in the old traditions, common perhaps to them all, which might strike the fancy of a young and sensitive mind, that would keep brooding over its favourite passage for years, until at last it finished and refined it into such lyric excellence that it thenceforth formed a noted piece of popular poetry, and one of the famed and welcome gems of recitation round a thousand firesides. The following very splendid description appears to be one of these. It is found in Kennedy's collection in one poem; in Dr. Smith's 'Old Lays' in another; and in MacPherson's Ossian in a third place. It is a piece of popular Highland poetry, but probably not very ancient; at least, to my mind, it seems plain that the author of it, though he has borrowed nothing from them directly, must yet have known the prophetic books of Scripture particularly well. I translate this truly grand passage with the closest fidelity:—

FINGAL GOING TO THE BATTLE.

With loud-sounding strides he rush'd westward,
In the clank of his armour bright;
And he look'd like the Spirit of Loda, that scatters
Dismay o'er the war-way and flight!
Like a thousand waves on a crag, that roll yelling
When the ugly storm's at its height,
So awful the clash of his mail and his weapons,
While his face wore the winter of fight!
His smooth poll'd claymore glitter'd aloft—
In his champion hand it was light;
And the snoring wind kept moving his locks,
Like spray in the whirlpool's might!
The hills on each side—they were shaken,
And the path seem'd to tremble with fright;
Gleam'd his eyes, and his great heart kept swelling.
Oh! cheerless the terrible sight!

It can be well ascertained that there were three kinds of Ossianic poetry current at one time in the Highlands—one of these so ancient, that bards who were not considered modern at the time of the Reformation made it their model. This kind is in substance common to Ireland and Scotland. It may therefore be considered at least as old as the time when the north of Ireland and the west of Scotland were peopled by the same race, and united closely together by constant intercourse.

Another class of Ossianic poetry is that which was composed in imitation of the above, by bards whose names are in many cases still remembered. Much of this poetry, as it belongs to Scotland at least, may be found in the Dean of Lismore's book, recently published; and also in Dr. Smith's 'Old Lays,' in MacCallum's and Kennedy's collections, and elsewhere.

There is a third class of Ossianic poetry, which, so far as it is known to be popular, belongs to the Western Highlands; where, it will be remembered, Morven, the renowned kingdom of Fingal, is situated. This differs from each of the preceding kinds, in point of artistic finish, at all events; if not also in point of refinement of feeling and delicacy of sentiment. MacPherson is said to have been the originator of this class of poetry; but it can be proved, in some of its most famous passages, to be older a good deal than MacPherson;—so that he at any rate did not originate it, nor do it best. Dr. John MacPherson, for instance, minister of Sleat, in a letter to Dr. Blair—dated Sleat, 27th Nov. 1763, and printed in Appendix No. 1 to the Highland Society's Report—says that he got from the people around him (he made no extensive search—not going beyond his own and the neighbouring parish) the following pieces of Ossian's poems, as published by Mr. MacPherson:—The description of Cuchullin's chariot, the episode relating to Faineasolia, the actions of Ossian at the Lake of Lego, Fingal's combat with the King of Lochlin, the battle of Lora, Darthula, the combat between Oscar and Ullin, and the lamentation of the spouse of Dargo. Dr. MacPherson gives the name and residences of his authorities in every instance. Two or three other gentlemen—writing about the same time, from different places in the Highlands—add considerably to this list.

Nearly all who write on the subject of Ossian's poems speak of the car of Cuchullin, which seems to have been one of the most popular bits of Gaelic poetry. One gentleman—Mr. Donald MacLeod, minister of Glenelg—says, on the 20th of March 1764, 'It was in my house that Mr. MacPherson got the description of Cuchullin's horses and car—in Book 1st, page 11—from Allan MacCaskie, schoolmaster, and Rory MacLeod, both of this glen.' He then remarks that MacPherson's rendering is decidedly inferior to the original, which is quite true. The translation is shorter, less lucid, less vigorous, less elaborate. It will be remembered that Wordsworth, with characteristic arrogance, speaks with contempt of MacPherson, 'when, with the steep of Morven before his eyes, he could talk so familiarly of his car-borne heroes.' This is a good example of the prejudices with which Ossian has been treated.

MacPherson was not the first Gaelic poet who spoke of car-borne heroes. They who knew Morven better than either he or Wordsworth, could talk, one to another, familiarly of at least one car-borne hero; for Fingal himself and his followers, so far as I recollect at present, fight on foot. As to the 'Steeps of Morven,' Wordsworth must have been very ignorant of what he was writing about, when he could say MacPherson had them before his eyes. MacPherson was born in Inverness-shire; educated first at home, then at Inverness, then at Aberdeen, and lastly at Edinburgh. It was in Edinburgh he translated, or, as Wordsworth would say, fabricated, the poems of Ossian. 'The Steeps of Morven' were very little before his eyes at any time. But, further, with regard to the origin of 'Ossian's Poems,' Dr. Smith of Campbelton, at the desire of the Highland Society, pieced together, from manuscript poems in their possession, eight hundred and ten lines of MacPherson's epic poem of 'Fingal,' that is about one-third of the whole poem. How many lines do we suppose MacPherson himself, with the immense mass of material at his command, could have thus pieced together, supposing this was his mode of proceeding in preparing his translations? Probably the most of the remaining two-thirds, or, it may be, every single sentence of his 'Fingal.' Dr. Smith's passages, extracted from ancient Gaelic poems, &c., and compared with parts of the epic poem of 'Fingal,' as published by Mr. MacPherson, may be found in Appendix No. 15 to the Highland Society's Report.

That there was a quantity of the same class of ornate and polished poetry as MacPherson's 'Ossian' current for a considerable period in the Highlands is clear, from the collection of precisely similar poetry made by Dr. Smith, about fifteen years after MacPherson. The substantial genuineness of Dr. Smith's collection has never been questioned. From the argument of the poem given by the reciter, the Committee of the Highland Society says—'Dr. Smith has candidly confessed that he has been sometimes obliged to fill up gaps which the want of memory in the reciter had occasioned in the poems; but he has very properly distinguished them, when they occur—which is not very often—from the poem itself.' The 'Sean Dana,' or old lays, collected by Dr. Smith, are not inferior in any respect to MacPherson's 'Ossian.' They breathe the same spirit, exhibit the same fineness of sensibility, and are coloured by a like mystic mountain-bred imagination. They speak of the same superstitions, and they look with that life-giving energy of deep and lonely-nurtured feeling—so characteristic of the Ossianic poems—on the aspects of external Nature. The following is an example—turned, in the same manner as the preceding, into verse—which the Committee of the Highland Society say 'They could not resist adding to those already given, from its exemplifying, in a remarkable manner, the natural appearances on which the melancholy superstition of the inhabitants of a mountainous country, in such a state of society and manners as the poems in question exhibit, might found their mythology—if it may be so called—of the ghosts of their ancestors and departed friends. It is contained in the opening of a poem called "Finan and Lorma," where the young people around him, looking up to the heavens, address the aged Ossian in the following natural and beautiful verses.' I give them in metre:—

White on the plains shines the Moon, O Bard!
And its shadow Come holds;
Like a ghost breathes the wind from the mountain,
With a spirit-voice in its folds.
There are two cloudy forms before us,
Where its host the dim night shows;
The sigh of the moor curls their tresses
As they tread over Alva of reas,
Dusky his dogs come with one,
And he bends his dark bow of yew;
There's a stream from the side of the sad-faced maid,
Dyes her robe with a blood-red hue.
Hold thou back, O thou wind! from the mountain!
Let their image a moment stay;
Nor sweep with thy skirts from our eyesight,
Nor scatter their beauty away.
O'er the glen of the rushes, the hill of the blinds,
With the vague wandering vapour they go;
O Bard of the times that have left us,
Aught of their life canst they show.

OSSIAN.

The years that have been they come back as ye speak,
To my soul in their music they glide;
Like the murmur of waves in the far inland cahn,
Is their soft and smooth step by my side, &c.

It now only remains to give two or three specimens of MacPherson's mode of translation, to see how his peculiar style frequently clouds the directness and corrupts the simplicity of his original. The following are two out of eight examples which the Committee of the Highland Society take from no more than twenty-seven lines of 'Carrickthura.' The Committee give the Gaelic first, then a literal translation of their own, and then MacPherson's, on which they afterwards make some remarks. The Gaelic is here omitted.

THE COMMITTEE.

On a top (or small height) was the circle of the form (or image) of Loda,
And the large stones of many virtues.

MACPHERSON.

On the top was the circle of Loda, the mossy stone of power.

On this the Committee remark,— 'Besides there being in Gaelic no epithet "mossy," the singular stone is contradictory to the description, in the preceding lines, of a circle which could only be composed of many stones.'

And again—

The flame rose from the gray oak:
The feast of the heroes was on the heath.

MacPherson translates these lines thus—

The flame of three oaks arose; the feast is spread around.

The Committee remark,— 'The epithet "gray," applied to the oak, is much more natural and picturesque than the number "three," adopted by MacPherson without any authority from the original; and the circumstance of the feast being spread on the heath, denotes the simplicity of the meal, which MacPherson, thinking it probably too mean to have only the ground for a table, has changed into the general term "around." "The feast is spread around." Along with these I give the following, chosen almost at random, a little farther on in the same poem. Indeed, almost every line of 'Carrickthura' might be used in the same way. After being discomfited by Fingal, MacPherson's translation says:— 'The spirit of Loda shrieked as rolled into himself he rose on the wind. Innistore shoot at the sound. The waves heard it on the deep. They stopped in their course with fear; the friends of Fingal started at once, and took their heavy spears—they missed the king—they rose in rage—all their arms resound.' Now, compare with this a literal rendering of the original, and see how much more simple and natural it is, and how much more continuous and distinct is its narration, towards the end of the quotation, than the quick and abrupt transitions of MacPherson. Observe, too, how he omits altogether the epic epithet of his hero, 'Cumal's son, the Victorious.'

Shriek'd the spectral form of Loda on the hill,
Gathering himself up in the wind;
Innistore heard the sound—

The path of the billows was check'd through fear—
Up rose the heroes of Cumal's son of the victories.
There was a spear in each hand aloft on the mountain side,
'Where is he?' and their wrath so gloomy
As each mail clash'd around its hero.

In the passage immediately preceding this, Mac-

* Not 'shoot at,' as MacPherson says.

Pherson says, 'He lifted high his shadowy spear; he bent forward his dreadful height. Fingal advancing, drew his sword; the blade of dark brown Luno. The gleaming path of the steel winds through the ghost,' &c.

The Gaelic says—

He lifted on high his dark spear;
He bent fiercely his lofty head;
Against him went Fingal with fury,
His clean blue sword in his hand.
Son of Luno of the dusky-dark hue,
Through the ghost pass'd the light of his hardness,
The brown spectre of death in the gloom.

And so on, almost without end. In short, when we consider that the finest parts of MacPherson are incontestably proved to have been, at some time or another, anterior to his appearance, popular poetry; when we remember that so many as eight hundred and ten lines of his 'Fingal,' or about one-third of the whole poem, could be put together out of the MSS. of the Highland Society alone; when we think of the immense mass of material for making up such a work which MacPherson, if so minded, possessed; when we know that Dr. Smith, of Campbellton, could easily get a volume of poetry amongst the Highlanders, exactly resembling MacPherson's 'Ossian;' and when, finally, we see that the Gaelic can be shown, by the most cursory examination, to be decidedly superior in force and distinctness and simplicity to the English; and, indeed, in many respects apparently the work of a differently constituted mind,—I think we may be disposed to throw prejudice aside, and to affirm that, whoever composed Ossian's poems, or however many might have been about their composition, MacPherson—whatever merit may belong to him as a translator, or whatever claim he may have to be considered their compiler in their present form—has no legitimate title to be called their author. They are substantially older than he—parts of them probably many centuries older, and parts of them, perhaps, not more than one or two generations. The case, as it rests at present regarding them, may be thus unhesitatingly stated:—MacPherson was not the first to polish the poems of Ossian, even admitting that he did so at all. His was neither the earliest nor the ablest nor the finest Highland mind that was kindled, since the end of the sixteenth century, into a glow of poetic fervour by the hero-lighted fire and hoary inspiration of the blind old man of Cona.

I now proceed to give a poem on the death of Oscar, one of the most popular and touching themes of the Gaelic muse. Oscar was the Achilles of the Fingalians, and Ossian was both his Homer and his father. No wonder, then, his death affords a favourite and pathetic subject both for the oldest ballads and their most modern imitations. The 'Lay of Oscar' is still repeated. There is a version of it in the third volume of Mr. Campbell's 'Popular Tales,' got within the last two or three years in the Hebrides. It is in all the collections. If we take MacCallum's and Mr. Campbell's versions to begin with, we are carried on very well to near the end of the story; then, by filling in a little from Allan MacRorie's and Fergus the poet's accounts, as they are found in the Dean of Lismore's book, we see our subject a good deal clearer; and, finally, we can end the sorrowful recital as we began. We thus get this old and manly popular song in the most complete state possible for us now-a-days.

THE DEATH OF OSCAR.

The feast was over; and the last day dawn'd
Which Oscar was to spend in Cairbar's hall;
The parting cup was quaff'd; the heroes stood
Arm'd and prepared to go, when Cairbar said,
With his great voice, 'Brown Oscar, come from Alba;
Let us exchange our spear-shafts ere we part!'

'Why so exchange,' said Oscar, speaking calmly,
'Thou red-hair'd Cairbar of the port of ships?
Why so exchange, and the feast hardly o'er?
Thou knowest, in the day of war and conflict,
My spear is always ready for thine aid.'

'Not much for me,' said Cairbar—the rude Cairbar;
'Not much for me, were cease and tribute paid me
By every warrior in your sea-beat isles;
Not much for me; whate'er I need to get
From thee, from thine, whene'er my wish I tell.'

'There's neither gold nor precious substance, Cairbar,
That might be ask'd for by a manly king,
Without dishonour to himself or us,
But thou or he should have whene'er 'twas ask'd;
But this exchange of shafts without the heads,
It were unjust to ask us such a thing.
Cairbar! thou hadst not dared have spoken thus,
Hadst thou not known that Fingal is not by.'

'Though Fingal and thy father both were here,
As good as the best day they wore a sword,
I'd ask of them whate'er I ask of thee;
And what I ask of them or thee, I'll have.'

'If Fingal and my father both were here,
As good as the best day they wore a sword,
By thine own might thou couldst not then retain
The breadth of thy two soles on land of Erin.'

'I make a vow,' quoth Cairbar, 'dear to drive
From side to side of Albin's sea-girl hills,
And spoil to carry from its plains to Erin.'

'I make a vow, a vow 'gainst that,' quoth Oscar;
'When thou hast come to Albin for thy sport,
I with this spear will drive thee back to Erin.'

Then Cairbar roar'd,—'I make a vow ere that,
A lasting vow, that I will plant my spear
Beneath thy breast in thy fair body, Oscar!'

'A vow! a vow!' cried Oscar, in his wrath;
'I make a vow that I will plant my spear,
Ere that shall happen, in thy forehead, Cairbar.'

Cold fear and rage by turns the warriors shook,
When these fierce words they heard between the chiefs,
When Cairbar's lowering brow they saw, and mark'd
How rose the wrath of Oscar. 'Twas then a bard,
With softest touch upon the harp, wail'd forth
The sounds that prelude a great hero's death.

Then Oscar seized with furious rage his arms,
And look'd around him where his followers stood;
Few were the chiefs of Alba that were there,
And Cairbar's host was great; but Oscar's friends
Were train'd to arms, and were full heroes all,
And so they gather'd undismay'd around him.

Then waged the strife. We heard the shouts afar,
And all the din of deadly, furious battle;
And up we rose, and hasten'd to the scene.
Each, as we reach'd it, join'd the wide-spread fight;

And thus the bitter struggle lasted long;
And thus did many of our heroes fall.
But who could stay his hand or still his heart?
And Oscar's friends, oppress'd; and Oscar's sword,
By numbers wearied, falling in its power.

We saw him struggling on the woeful field;
We saw him rushing, in the tides of war,
Like a hawk darting on a flight of birds.
Or like the quick spray-spattering cataract.
He strove, like a great strong branch with the wind,
Like an old green tree with the woodman's stroke.
His course was the roll of the furious surge
In winter's storm, on the roar of the shore.

And, one by one, as we came, we engaged;
But the long-lasting fight spread far and near,
Till the sunbeam of battle rose, at last,
Finn's standard, with the heroes by its side;
Then slowly backward bore the treacherous foe.
Foot after foot, until they fled away—
Scatter'd like sheep, and falling like brown leaves.
The wild pursuit roll'd by, and we were left
Alone—in silence—on the dreadful field!

I bent o'er Oscar, when the fight was done,
As he lay bleeding on the mournful plain.
He was my son; yet was I not alone
In mourning for my dearest on that day.
Callta bent over seven of his brave sons;
And every living man amongst the Feinn,
Amid the grievous slaughter found a friend,
And wept beside the dying or the dead.
Some of the wounded lay and languish'd low,
Unconscious how their life had drain'd away;
Some moan'd, some writhed with pain, and could not speak.

But some were calm and knew their friends, and gave Them a kind greeting from their couch of clay;
But many, many heroes there were dead.
Oh, 'twas a grief, an everlasting grief—
A woe to be forgotten never, never!
To look upon that field—the swords, the shields,
That there lay masterless; the broken spears,
The bloody garments, and the coats of mail,
Borne by brave chiefs unto their last of fields,
From Albin's hills, from homes of Innisgail.
We ne'er had met so dire a day before—
So bloody, so destructive, full of woe,
So joyless and so sad a victory.

Among a thousand warriors stretch'd and dead
I found my son, my darling, living yet;
Resting his head on his left arm he lay,
His broken shield beside him, and his sword
Grasp'd in his terrible and strong right hand.
His blood, his priceless blood, on every side
Flow'd through his harness, soak'd into the ground,
Unstanch'd and stanchless, from a mortal wound.

I dropp'd my spear upon the earth, and bent
Above him as he lay, and thought—O friend!
How lonely I should be for evermore!
It was a grievous thought. Oscar turn'd round,
And forth he stretch'd his hand one other time
To greet me—one long last time ere he died;
Kindly he look'd, and wish'd me to draw near.
I seized his hand and knelt upon the ground,
And gave a great and bitter cry of grief.
Then my dear son, whose life was ebbing fast,
Said, 'Joy dear father, that thou art escap'd!'
And I, I could not speak; but Callta said—
The noble Callta come to see my son—
'How dost thou feel thyself, dear friend?' he said.

'As thou wouldst have me—dying on the field.
Red Cairbar's venom'd spear hath pierc'd my side;
Mine on the forehead struck him,' Oscar said,

'A blow no leech can heal.' Then Calta probed
The wound red Cairbar's murderous shaft had made,
And gave a shriek, and fainting fell on earth,
When he found out how deadly was the hurt.

'Dear Oscar, we must part,' at length he cried;
'Thou and the Feline must part; thy fights are o'er.'
My son replied not, but he press'd my hand,
Then we upraised him softly on our spears,
And to a fair green knoll we bore him silently,
While from the slain they gather'd round and round.
No man his son, his friend, his brother mourn'd,
But all stood near us, and with heavy sighs
They watch'd the hero as he slowly died,
And no one spoke as hour by hour went by.

Thus now the evening, and the autumn sun
Shone bright and yellow on the fatal field,
When from afar Finn's standard we descried,
Returning from his triumph and pursuit.
Gladly we met it, and saluted Finn,
But no salute return'd he as he strode
In his dark grief to where his grandson lay.
When Oscar saw the King above him bend,
And look with anguish on his dying face,
He slowly spoke, and said 'I have my wish—
Thus dying in thy presence, noble Finn!
Unconquer'd and with honour, mourn'd by thee.'

Then Finn, the first of heroes, cried with grief,—
'Sad is my heart, good son of my good son!
I see thee die before me. Now I'm weak.
A heavy curse is on me to my grief;
It blow'd me from east and west, till here,
On this sad plain, it struck this fatal blow.
Farewell to fame and battle; and farewell
The victor's spoils, the triumphs and the joys
Which in this body I have ever had;
Farewell the feast; farewell the concourse sweet
By Cona's stream, in Selma's banner'd hall.'

When Oscar heard the great king's wailing cry,
He groan'd, and stretch'd his hands, and raised his head,
And looking round on all of us, he sigh'd,
And said, 'Farewell! I shall return no more.'
Then he sunk back; and so my hero died;
And Finn turn'd round, and strode a space away,
And sobb'd and wept. He never wept before
In sight of man—save when Bran died—till now.
And all the people gave three dismal shrieks,
And wail'd and wept until the night return'd.

Then Finn came back; and, standing near my side,
He bent again o'er Oscar, while he said:—
'The mournful howling of the dogs distress me—
The groaning of the heroes old and gray—
The people's wailing, and their blank despair.
O son! that I had fallen in thy stead,
In the dire battle with thy treacherous foes,
And thou hadst lived to be a chief and leader,
And bring the Fenians east and west with joy!
O Oscar! thou wilt never rise again!
O'er thee my old heart, like an elk, is leaping!'
Thou wilt return, thou wilt return no more!
Thus rightly said, "I shall return no more!"

'The Death of Oscar' was MacPherson's first open attempt at Gaelic translation. We have this on the authority of Home, the author of 'Douglas.' Some of the incidents above given remind one a little of Roncesvalles, and the death of Roland.

THOMAS PATTISON.

'Like an elk, is leaping,' or, 'like a blackbird, flutters.'
The former, however, is at once the most literal, and, I think, the most expressive. We speak ourselves of the heart 'bounding.'

RIFLES AND RIFLE PRACTICE.

Not many years ago, very few persons in this country were practically acquainted with the rifle. It was used, indeed, in the pursuit of large and noble game; but such sport was principally confined to the wealthy, and it was carried on more abroad than at home. Practising at a target, unless by a few experimentalists, was a very rare occurrence. The stories told of the skill of American hunters with the rifle were looked upon in England as feats only possible for wizards and jugglers, or perhaps as the inventions of a brilliant novelist. The Volunteer movement, however, has opened up a new field for the rifle; and, in the space of a very short time, all classes have become familiar with it. We are now able to compete at target practice against riflemen of any nation—ay! and, as at Wimbledon last year, literally to beat them off the field. The ancient bowmen of England have, indeed, renewed their youth in the dexterity with which their descendants now use a far more deadly weapon; and the same race of 'shopkeepers' who were wont to launch their yard-sticks into the body of a man 100 yards off, can now, with as much certainty, kill him at ten times that distance, with a ball fired from a Henry rifle. Rifle-shooting—thanks to the Volunteer movement—has now become a very popular amusement; and such is the noble spirit of emulation which it excites in the Anglo-Saxon race, that it seems destined, along with volunteering, to become a permanent institution of our country.

It is somewhat astonishing that although fire-arms have been in use since the fourteenth century; they have never, until the last few years, produced great results in point of precision. The improvement has been much slower than might have been anticipated during such a long period, and is only to be ascribed to the absence of science displayed in their manufacture, and the want of skill in their use. It might also have reasonably been expected, that when the principle of rifling or grooving the barrels of fire-arms was first thought of (in the early part of the sixteenth century), great results would follow; but nearly a hundred years elapsed after this before we have any record of a spiral turn being imparted to the grooves. The latter invention, the parent of the present system, was discovered by a German gun-maker, named Koster, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, who caused his rifling to describe a complete turn, or somewhat more than a turn, in the length of a gun-barrel; but although the principle of grooving was now so far perfect, science seemed blind to the part which the bullet was to take in obtaining perfect precision, and no further advance in this respect was made until long after. The bullets used with such weapons were round, and slightly larger than the bore, and were forced and fitted into the grooves in loading. The use of an elongated bullet might long ago have made us better acquainted with rifle-shooting, and would no doubt have forestalled many of the latest improvements; but such a projectile not being then known, the difficulty and the necessity of loading with balls larger than the diameter of the bore was found to be such an obstacle to the general adoption of the rifle for military and other purposes, that it was thrown aside, and the smooth-bore gun preferred. About the middle of last century, however, a countryman of our own, named Benjamin Robins—a man of great skill and genius, and a voluminous writer on the subject of projectiles—published theories, which, although little heeded at the time, have now been acknowledged as the immediate stepping-stones to all the late wonderful improvements in rifled fire-arms. It was he who first proved the advantages of using an elongated projectile, and the necessity of having the centre of gravity in the fore part of the bullet. He also proved that a spinning motion being imparted by the grooves to the bullet would help to keep its axis in the same direction during flight, and prevent any inequalities on its surface from causing irregularity of motion. These principles, so very similar to those which now form the basis of all scientific gunnery, after lying dormant for a length of time, were diligently taken up about twenty or thirty years ago, and, being experimented upon, produced results which made all the great nations of the world desirous to see their soldiers armed with a weapon which could kill their enemies at long distances, and be more decisive in all great battles. The French were the first who scientifically set to work in this direction, and to them we are chiefly indebted for the experiments which ended in the production of the once famed Minié rifle, and afterwards of our own Enfield.

Rifles, although used in some armies early in the present century, were not introduced into our own line regiments, in any great numbers, till 1851, when the Minié, or a similar weapon carrying the Minié ball, was first served out. The barrels of these rifles had four grooves, describing a complete turn in six feet six inches. They were very good serviceable weapons; and were sighted up to a thousand yards. The ball, however, was defective; and, there being room for improvement, our Government instituted a course of experiments, which resulted in the production of the Enfield—a rifle with which every household is now familiar. This weapon, although first brought out in 1853, was not universally adopted by our line regiments until some years afterwards. The Engineers have been armed for a short time with the Lancaster, or oval smooth-bore rifle, which is considered by some, superior to the Enfield. But for a strong, serviceable, military rifle—such as can be used by the general mass of our soldiers with effect on the field of battle—it is doubtful if, at the present day, a better weapon is to be had than the Enfield. It has its faults; but none of them (speaking in a military point of view) are very serious; and if the bore was slightly reduced, so as to lessen the windage with the present ammunition—or, what would be simpler, the diameter of the present bullet slightly enlarged—it is questionable whether the practice obtained by it would be much inferior to that of the Henry and other small-bore rifles. As it is, however, the Enfield cannot compete at the target with the Henry, Turner, Whitworth, &c., the superior accuracy of these rifles at extreme ranges being scarcely credible. It has also been thought that a greater twist of rifling, with two extra grooves to prevent the bullet from stripping, would improve it. This would assimilate it to the short sea-service rifle, which is used in the Navy, and in some districts by the sergeants of Volunteers, and which is generally believed to give more accurate shooting than the long Enfield. Our Government—however slow, as it generally is, to adopt anything new—seems to be bestowing great attention on the subject of fire-arms. It has, within the last few months, issued to the Army a small number of Westley Richard's breech-loaders, with the view of determining whether such superior rifles could advantageously be used by soldiers in general. Our own opinion, however, is, that only the best trained soldiers and most skilled marksmen will be able to do these rifles justice. Nevertheless, if it were possible, or advisable, to have two kinds of rifles in use, carrying different ammunition—the superior rifles being served out to picked men—the best results might be expected to follow. But, in the meantime, there are serious objections to the accomplishment of this. The drill for the two rifles, for instance, is totally different; and the ammunition at present in use, being suitable for Enfields, Lancasters, and Carbines indiscriminately, cannot be made to fit Westley Richard's or any other small-bore rifles.

The Whitworth was the earliest of this class of rifles, and no doubt greatly owed its superior excellence to the very careful and exact mechanical skill which its inventor bestowed on its construction. Not being a rifle-maker, but a very eminent machinist, he was led some years ago to direct his attention to rifled fire-arms, believing rightly that the greater accuracy displayed in finishing the interior of the barrel the better would the rifle shoot. His very ingenious instruments for determining accurately the most minute measurements, so much impressed him with the truth of this opinion, that he made certain proposals to Government for carrying on a set of experiments to elucidate the question, and it is said he obtained a grant of £12,000 to defray expenses connected with these experiments, and had also erected for him an enclosed rifle gallery, 500 yards in length, where he could, if required, regulate the sighting of all his rifles before issuing them. With such advantages, it is not surprising that Mr. Whitworth, although not a gun-maker by trade, succeeded by mechanical genius alone in constructing a weapon, the like of which, for careful workmanship and accurate shooting, was never before known. Many professional gun-makers, however, were not long behind him in producing, by their own resources, rifles, which in the opinion of well qualified judges, are even superior to the Whitworth; and among these is the rifle of Mr. Henry of Edinburgh. The Whitworth, being foremost in the field, however, had a decided start of its neighbours, and had likewise many facilities for its distribution among the Volunteers; for, at all past meetings of the National Rifle Association, large numbers of Whitworths have been given away as prizes; yet we are very much mistaken if the Henry rifle, since its introduction in 1861, has not held its own as the favourite weapon of most of the crack shots in the country. In the match which took place at Montrose, on New Year's-day, between eight picked shots from the cities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, five men on each side shot with Henry's, there being only one Whitworth among the sixteen. At Wimbledon Common, also, both this year and last, all the highest scores were made with the Henry—it being represented by 591 competitors against 582 armed with the Whitworth. To Mr. Henry belongs the merit of being the first to introduce practically an ingenious mechanical contrivance designated a wind-gauge, which, although in existence many years since, was never popularly known until he prominently brought it under public notice. This instrument, which is now fitted to all modern rifles, enables the marksman to allow for the effects of wind without moving his aim to the right or left of the bull's-eye, and is so useful that on a windy day no skilled rifleman would compete with a small bore rifle without one.

But to return to the Enfield and Volunteer rifle practice in general, it is astonishing to find such proficiency in rifle-shooting attained in the space of so few years. Men who never handled fire-arms before, and who, it may be, never set their eyes on them but with feelings of dread, have now become accomplished marksmen and efficient Volunteers. This is owing in great measure, no doubt, to careful training; but as there are not so many good marksmen in the Volunteer army as there might be, we propose to offer a few suggestions and hints for the benefit of those who have not much time to practise, and also for that large and numerous class who, although anxious and willing to learn, are slow and awkward in acquiring rifle drill.

Though the greatest care and attention—combined with active intelligence, good eye-sight, and steady nerve—are all required in the making of a good marksman; yet, severally, these qualifications assist in various degrees, and in different manners, in the attainment of proficiency in using the rifle. So, if they be seldom all found in the same individual, some of them certainly shall; and these, if properly cultivated, will in a great measure make up for the want of others. Considering, then, the elements which compose the Volunteer force, it may be fairly assumed that the above qualifications are well distributed throughout it, and should produce a greater number of good shots than there really are, and that most of the signal failures are more attributable to inefficient musketry instruction than other causes. We cast no slur upon the many gentlemen who voluntarily act as instructors; and who are, in general, the best men to be got. The evil lies in the system of classes—in taking into them all and sundry who can execute the manual and platoon exercises in a method or passable manner, and in carrying on forcing forward the raw recruit along with men immeasurably superior to him. It is often difficult for instructors to avoid this; but there can be no doubt that the consequences to some of the men are very detrimental. To all who fancy themselves imperfect from the above cause, and to others who really desire to improve, we would recommend, as the first and most important step, the careful study of 'The Musketry Instruction Book,' and the steadfastly carrying out of all its lessons.

Most important for beginners is position drill. No man will ever shoot well who holds his rifle carelessly; and the system taught in the book, designated Hythe system, is most admirably adapted for training the Volunteer to hold his rifle correctly. It is the most free and unconstrained position we know, notwithstanding all that has been said against it. There are some who desire to see the kneeling position done away with, because the fancy attitudes of sitting, or lying on one's face or back, secure a steadier aim. The fact is unquestionable; but we uphold the Hythe system, because the hands and limbs being remarkably free, the firer has more command over his rifle; and it is thus best adapted for all military movements. Besides, it has the great advantage of training a man to shoot well with very little expenditure of ammunition. Snapping caps at a miniature target or bull's-eye, painted on the wall, will also teach him how to acquire the habit of taking a good and perfect aim, and to press the trigger at the proper moment, without flinching. This being a transaction between brain, eye, and finger, requires a good deal of training; but it should be persevered in till it requires no effort on the part of the learner to establish an instantaneous connection between eye and finger; and if the arm happens to get shaky, as will often be the case, before the trigger is sufficiently pressed, the rifle should be at once brought down, a pause and new breath taken, and at it again. There is nothing worse than endeavouring to take or retain a long aim, and it generally ends in a bad shot.

There are many other things, however, that require to be attended to, and the more careful one is in noticing them the better practice he is sure to make; but position drill and snapping of caps are preliminary to all others. The loading of the rifle requires careful manipulation. Taking it for granted that all the charges of powder and bullets are of the same weight,* the powder should be carefully emptied into the barrel, so that not a particle is lost, the bullet then entered straight, and gently rammed home. Should any of the powder be spilt, or the bullet jammed down upon it in such a manner that some of the grains get bruised, the result will be more or less loss of range, from deficiency of propelling force—bruised powder not exerting so much strength as when the grains are whole; or, should the point of the bullet get indented from repeated or hard strokes of the ramrod, the result will be a zig-zag or inaccurate, undulating flight. The force and direction of the wind should also be carefully watched, and their effects nicely calculated; and as wind does not always blow with a steady uniform force, and is continually wavering a little in its line of direction, this is a somewhat difficult achievement, requiring much observation and repeated practice. Every one knows that an object passing through the air deflects with the wind; what the rifleman has to do, therefore, is to calculate for the strength of the wind, and consequent amount of deflection. With a strong side wind on an exposed range, it is sometimes necessary, when firing at a distance of 600 yards, with an Enfield rifle which has no wind-gauge, to aim as much as ten feet off the target in order to hit it; and when it is considered how difficult it is to steady one's aim upon vacancy, we can the more readily appreciate the immense advantages of the wind-gauge. The various shades of light—sunshine and cloud, clearness and haze—have much to do with the operation of taking a true aim. The state of the atmosphere in all its different phases—humid or dry, warm or cold—is also a very important element of observation; and however trifling all these matters may appear to the ordinary rifleman, the experienced marksman and professional prize-taker know well their effects, and how to reduce them to a minimum. It is to this knowledge, combined with great opportunities for practice, that the two Ross's, father and son, owe their great and well-earned fame. From constant practice with the best of weapons—for it should be known that rifles, even of similar description and make, sometimes differ very much in their shooting qualities, and cause many a good marksman to feel greatly puzzled as to the cause of his wide shooting—these veterans well know what the effects of the atmosphere are, and carefully calculate for them; while many a steady shot overlooks them, and suffers accordingly. This training of the will to act at once on the judgment is an important part of the education of a rifleman, and it sometimes requires no small amount of decision to be continually altering the elevation to counteract the effects of the weather.

* Government cartridges, although very carefully made up, sometimes vary a little in weight, and as they do not admit of being taken down and equalised, very accurate shooting cannot always be expected from them; but, for private rifles, powder and bullets should be nicely weighed, and the charges corked up in separate cases.

Many of the simplest and most perceptible causes which affect the flight of projectiles are now very generally known to rifleman; but there are a few which are either overlooked or unknown to many of them. On a very warm summer's day, for instance, the resistance of the air, dilated by the heat, will be less than usual, so that, ceteris paribus, lower elevation will be required. This is one of the cases in which decision and promptitude are indispensable; for, having been accustomed, on ordinary occasions, to use the sighting at a particular mark on the appliance for that purpose on the rifle, the firer naturally feels some reluctance to alter his aim or elevation, especially as the failure of a trial shot might tell sadly against him. When the air is dense, it follows, in the same way, that the elevation should be higher than when it is rare. It is therefore well to remember, when practising at strange targets and long ranges, that the density of the atmosphere is always greatest at the sea-level, and least on hill-tops—varying in intensity, of course, according to the state of the weather. Hence, very properly, some always consult the state of the barometer and thermometer before going out to shoot. The atmosphere is also very deceptive when it is clear and warm, and the ground damp, causing a mirage or steam to rise from the earth. In such circumstances, the target is lifted, as it were, in the rising vapours, and aim taken at an object higher than the reality. Care should therefore be observed to aim a little lower than usual. It has often been noticed that shooting is more regular, and the deviation of a rifle less, on a cold damp day than on a warm and dry one, which may be accounted for by the fouling inside the barrel remaining soft, and not interfering with the proper expansion of the bullet. In warm weather, it is more apt to cake and harden. The rapidity with which powder ignites, and the force it develops, is also more or less affected by these different states of the atmosphere.

As to the best powder for rifles, it is found that fine-grained powder explodes too quickly, and, kicking the bullet forward, as it were, diminishes its velocity and tends to make it strip—that is, to pass out of the barrel without taking the rotatory direction of the grooves. Fine powder also sticks more readily to the inside of the rifle when foul; and, unless there is very little windage (space between side of bullet and inside of barrel), the bullet in being rammed home cannot take it all before it, consequently so much of it is lost for the purpose of projecting the ball. The quantity of powder applicable to different kinds of rifles depends principally on the description of bullet used, the length of barrel, and the diameter of bore, and this can only be found by lengthened experiments. The greatest momentum of the projectile is always as it leaves the muzzle: it cannot be earlier nor later; the charge of powder ought therefore to be regulated, so as to be all consumed precisely at this period, for any excess in length of barrel beyond the point of total combustion will only check the impetus of the bullet, by causing too much friction. This shows the importance of a proper apportionment of the charge, which is seldom understood by riflemen, and which is sometimes not sufficiently appreciated even by gun-makers.

THE ART OF QUOTATION, WITH OTHER ODDS AND ENDS.

QUOTATION is to plagiarism what warfare is to highway robbery. The one is done by night, in the dark places of the earth, by a disreputable person with a mask over his handsome countenance; the other is enacted in open sunshine, to the music of the fife and the drum, under brilliant banners of silk, woven by the dainty fingers of golden-haired maidens. And the latter, besides being the more honourable performance, is also the easier of the two—requiring infinitely less ingenuity than the other. Bring your country loon into a battle-field, give him a sword or other weapon, bid him thrust it into the first man he meets; and he may do so with at least a chance of success. But place him in a crowded thoroughfare, bid him pick somebody's pocket, and in five minutes he is on his way to the police-office.

The subject may conveniently be divided into two branches—the making and the using of quotations. The former, being the more important, shall have preference, and may best be illustrated by an example. Some years ago, a friend of the writer's had to deliver a lecture on Professor Wilson; and, in the course of that lecture, read the following passage from the 'Noctes Ambrosianæ,' where the Shepherd addresses North:—

'When every noo and then you laid doon the volumn on your knees—mercy on us! a great big volumn, wi' clasps just like the Bible—and recceetd a screed that you had gotten by heart, I could hae thoct that you was Dante himsel', the great Florentine, for your voice keepit tollin' like a bell, as if some dark spirit within your breast was puin' the rope—some demon o' which you was possessed; till a' at ance it grew saft and sweet in the sound, as the far-off tinkling o' the siller bells on the bridle-reins o' the snaw-white palfrey o' the Queen o' the Fairies—as I hae heard them in the forest; but that was lang lang syne, for my ears, in comparison wi' what they were when I was a mere wean, are as if they were stuffed wi' cotton; then they could hear the grass growin' by moonlight, or a drap o' dew slipping awa into naething frae a primrose leaf.'

This was quite a legitimate quotation; but immediately thereafter he added—'And now we shall compare with this passage a somewhat similar passage from one of our most distinguished and best known poets:—

'And now, O music! arise and swell,
Like as of old, when the convent bell
Its strange wild harmony sweetly toll'd
Over the mountain and over the world—
Seeming to linger throughout the air,
Like the low sweet sound of an angel's prayer;
Lingering long till the starlight cold
Came over mountain, came over world;
Bathing the earth in a radiance keen,
While fairies, draped in their robes of green,
Lightly leapt in the magic sheen!'

The passage met with unequivocal admiration. Why? Because it was introduced as a quotation. But you may search all our best known poets, and all our least known poets, without finding these lines, for they were the speaker's own.

And just so is it with proverbs. If you can't hit upon one to suit your purpose, make one. If it be short enough and terse enough, it will certainly pass muster. Moreover, it is a sort of reply which admits of no argument; and may thus be of use on many delicate occasions. Say that a marriageable young woman is getting impatient of a protracted courtship. She gently whispers to John, on some starlit night, 'John, you know the old proverb, "Never venture, never win." John knows of no counter-statement; he has a happy moment invents a proverb:—"Mary," he says, "those who strive most, win least." And thus Mary is silenced—sorry that she ever had anything to do with such contradictory things as proverbs. If the manufactured proverb be in some provincial dialect, it carries all the more weight with it. Suppose John had said, "Mary, them who loup highest, fa' farthest." Mary should certainly have regarded him as a very wonder of erudition.

Nor is it necessary that this manufactured proverb, or smart saying, or quotation, should be remarkable either for its truth or for its originality. When the Saturday Review defined Muscular Christianity to be 'fearing God and cultivating your fore-arm,' they said something very smart and very untrue. And Martin Tupper's volume of philosophy is a blessed example to all proverb-mongers. Many men sneer at the Americans, because they adore Mr. Martin Tupper—because they have asked for thousand upon thousand of his 'Proverbial Philosophy.' But the impartial reader, on perusing that popular book, cannot fail to be struck with the power, the unexampled power, which its author possesses of clothing the wildest of nonsense in an epigrammatic dress. It looks amazingly profound. It may not be very wise or very original; but you are sure to think that it ought to be so.

Old women, especially in country villages, have a wonderful faculty for speaking in proverbs—that is, speaking, not in orthodox proverbs, but in proverbs coined to suit the occasion. A novel-writer might make his fortune by collecting the wisdom uttered by two of these old women in the course of a day. And for the most bitter reproof or sarcasm, nothing beats a home-made proverb in the mouths of the old beldames of a village. If a housewife is in the habit of gadding about her neighbours' kitchens, she will be told that 'It needs a warm nest to mak the eggs thrive.' If she appear at the kirk in a little unusual finery, she will hear that 'Rainy days come warst to peacocks.' Or if she complain somewhat loudly of an injury that has fallen quite as heavily on the other villagers, she will be informed that 'A hurtit dog yowls louder than a kilt ane.'

Dr. Isaac Watts have been born a Scotchman; in which case, those useful and entertaining sayings of his might have worn a more oracular dress. As they are, they seem somewhat bald. The assertion that

'Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do,' is plausible enough; only, that Satan might find some difficulty in devising work for a man who had both arms shot off. Little can be said against the exclamation,

'How doth the little busy bee
Improve each shining hour!'

except that it is evidently an adaptation from Virgil. While that other maxim,

'Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long,'

is more aptly rendered

'Man wants but little beer below,
But wants that little strong.'

Perhaps the making use of a quotation requires more ingenuity than the production of one. You have to keep clear of trite quotations, equivocal quotations, and meaningless quotations; and there are not a few to be met with of each class. The unhappy flower that was 'born to blush unseen,' despite the assertion that 'a thing of beauty is a joy for ever,' is rapidly falling into the sere and yellow leaf. Few people know that the saying, 'Very like a whale,' is to be found in 'Hamlet,' act iii, scene 2. A very happy quotation, also from Shakspeare, is made use of by the Edinburgh Photographic Society:—

'The glorious sun
Stays in his course, and plays the alchemist;'

which passage occurs in 'King John.'

A recent novel-writer, in speaking of an encounter between his villain and his heroine's dog, says,—'Mr. Rankin rose and crossed the room. So did Cæsar;' wherein he unconsciously adapts a sentence from Book I. chap. 15, of the Gallic wars—

'Idem facit Cæsar.'

That, of course, is a mere coincidence; for the time has gone by when it was considered a quite legitimate thing to plunder the ancients in most barefaced manner—boldly copying their arrangement, or unblushingly appropriating particular phrases and ideas. But in modern times there are often to be found fortuitous resemblances, which look singularly like plagiarisms, such as—

'And the great Lord of Luna
Fell at that deadly stroke,
As falls on Mount Alvernus
A thunder-smitten oak;
Far o'er the crashing forest
The giant arms lie spread;
And the pale anghra, muttering low,
Gase on the blasted head.'

'Ipse gravis graviterque ad terram pondere vasto,
Concidit, ut quondam cava concidit ant Erymantho,
Ant Ida in magna radicibus eruta pinus.'

Or this—

'A golden cup,
All rich and rough with stones of the gods.'
'Cymbiaque argento perfecta atque aspersa signis.'

While the origin of the slang term, 'to slope it'—meaning to disappear rapidly, to make off—may be traced by the curious to the phrase 'Fuga inclinavit,' in Livy, i. 27.

Rhymed quotations are generally the most popular:

'He who fights and runs away,
May live to fight another day.'

has outlived even the name of its author. Nothing nearer to it can be found than the following lines from Hudibras—

'In all the trade of war, no feat
Is nobler than a brave retreat;
For those that run away and fly,
Take place at least o' the enemy.'

In many of Shakspeare's earlier plays, a love of couplets is very apparent. Most paragraphs end with one—whether for the purpose of offering fair booty for the quotation extractor, or whether to give a pleasing finish to each passage, it were hard to say. At all events, the practice of making a ferocious monarch, with black beard and tin-foil helmet, call his soldiers to arms in a couple of decasyllabic lines, would hardly be pardoned on a modern battle-field.

But, indeed, Shakspeare stands so far removed from other men, that we seldom think of criticising him. It is so generally admitted that he is beyond improvement, even by the harpies of commentators who prey upon his dead body, that there is no safer author from whom a plagiarist may steal. One hardly ever thinks of judging Shakspeare's works as the production of a single human intellect; they seem to belong to the general wisdom of the world; and so it is, that, when our best modern writers give us a sermon upon one of Shakspeare's texts, we do not feel that they are plagiarising. In most instances, they do so unconsciously; and if you blame them for it, you may as well quarrel with a beam of sunlight falling through a cathedral window for not retaining its original colour. For example, everybody knows Romeo's exclamation—

'Oh that I were a glove upon that hand,
That I might touch that cheek!'

And everybody knows one of the most exquisite songs in the English language, which certainly has been unconsciously prompted by it:—

'It is the miller's daughter,
And she is grown so dear, so dear,
That I would be the jewel
That trembles at her ear;
For, hid in ringlets day and night,
I'd touch her neck so warm and bright.

And I would be the girdle
About her dainty dainty waist;
And her heart would beat against me
In sorrow and in rest;
And I should know if it beat right,
I'd clasp it round so close and tight.

And I would be the necklace,
And all day long to fall and rise
Upon her balmy bosom
With her laughter or her sighs;
And I would lie so light, so light,
I scarce should be unclasp'd at night.'

Passages such as these might be called parallelisms, not plagiarisms; and instances of them are numerous. Kingsley writes—

'For men must work, and women must weep,
And the sooner it's over the sooner to sleep.'

Shakspeare writes—

'For some must watch, while some must sleep,
Thus runs the world away.'

Tennyson's 'Round of Life,' and Shakspeare's 'Seven Ages' come into the same category. Few people would say that the 'Life Drama' was plagiarised from 'Sartor Resartus.' Nor is it; but the sorrows of Walter are little else than a version, in numbers, of the sorrows of Teufelsdröckh. I shall take the liberty to compare two passages—in which, I opine, Thomas Carlyle, our prose poet, does not suffer by the comparison. Here we have Mr. Smith's version of the love affair—

'And thereat she look'd upon me with a smile so full of grace,
All my blood was in a moment glowing in my ardent face:
"Dost thou love me?" then, I whisper'd—for a moment after this
I sat and trembled in great blackness: on my lips I felt a kiss—
Than a rose-leaf's touch 'twas lighter; on her face her hands
she press'd;
And a heaven of tears and blushes was deep buried on my breast.'

And then, after this beautiful consummation, worse luck happens, and a section of the poem ends with these two lines—

'I rush'd into the desert, where I stood with burning eyes,
Glaring on vast desolations, barren sands, and empty skies.'

Now, read Mr. Carlyle's parallel passage:—

"Farewell, then, madam," said he, not without sternness, for his stung pride helped him. She put her hand in his, she looked in his face, tears started to her eyes: in wild audacity he clasped her to his bosom; their lips were joined, their two souls, like two dewdrops, rushed into one for the first time and for the last. Thus was Teufelsdröckh made immortal by a kiss. And then? Why, then—thick curtains of night rushed over his soul as rose the immeasurable Crash of Doom: and through the ruins as of a shivered universe was he falling, falling, towards the Abyss.'

It remains only to notice heraldic mottoes, which bear a near relation to proverbs. They are chiefly French and Latin; and are either of a patriotic kind or of a highly didactic nature. The former are very ardent, the latter very edifying. The ancient knight and heroes who invented those mottoes may not have altogether come up to their own high standards of virtue; but it is gratifying to see that they at least knew what they ought to have been, if that was not quite what they were. I shall select three of those mottoes, one borne by an English viscount, another by an Irish viscount, and a third by an old Scotch baron, which seem to represent pretty fairly the characteristics of each people. 'Vincit amor patriam.' The love of my country overcomes,' says the patriotic Irishman. 'Virtute ac labore—By valour and toil says the industrious Scotchman. 'Tuebor—I will defend,' says the sturdy and tenacious Englishman.

In conclusion, I have looked carefully over the paper, in the hope of extracting therefrom some salutary moral as a proper pendant. I can find none. Not the remotest reference to any didactic lesson to be found, I believe, from beginning to end. Why then, let us make one, seeing that if we go about an essay in an orthodox manner it must end in a moral. And so I say, that it is nearly the same thing to borrow a man's coat as to borrow his wisdom; and even as no one should like to borrow a coat until I was sadly in need of one, so let us never borrow a man's words so long as we can find any of our own. They may not be quite so wise or quite so clever; but we shall have, at least, a right of property in them and be beholden to no one for them.

WILLIAM BLACK.

A SOLITARY WALK IN MUNICH.

SCREELY a solitary walk here is a pleasant thing, after one has been satiated by ten days of sight-seeing!—sight-seeing which forced me to repeat the noble lines of Sir William Jones, 'What constitutes a State?' and to make of them such a parody as—

'What constitutes a State?
The trumpery of gilding and of plate!
Pictures hung up in rows!
And, under those,
Statues so great!
These constitute a State!
With men, safe-minded men,
No sovereign needs to fear,
Who smoke, and drink their beer;
Yet, when they're bid, will fight
For their king's crown and right'

But I was not in so vile a humour as to have whispered to myself those rhymes, when first I saw the Bavarian capital, on the green 'Isar rolling rapidly.' Campbell's beautiful little poem, although Hohenzinden is twenty miles distant, came back to memory as soon as I beheld that river, and it filled my thoughts with many poetical and heroic images. Why did they all vanish away? Through utter weariness of marble, painting, gilding—weariness of upholstery! I had already had as much of that kind of thing in Paris, Versailles, and Potsdam, as was sufficiently fatiguing; however, a long breathing time had been permitted me, and I began my work with alacrity in the artists' city—or the artistic city. I was willing to see how King Ludwig—who, when he was far from anticipating that the year '48 would bring him a dismissal from his throne, seemed to have had the idea of being a German Louis le Grand;—I was willing to see how near nearly he approached the real Louis le Grand of France in this great matter of palace decoration. To show that I was not wearied without cause, I must briefly tell what I saw in the royal residence, adorned by the king who had to depart from it and make his abode in Rome.

We were taken first through a hall, painted in fresco, with designs emblematic of what is to be seen in the five great halls to which it is the entrance. They are dedicated to the famous ancient German epic of the Nibelungen Lied. On each wall of these halls, is what may be called a gigantic fresco of a striking scene—battle, murder, and sudden death being the principal features—from the poem. Above these, are compartments filled with other scenes on a smaller scale; and the ceiling is also painted with subjects referring to the same great legend—for such, in truth, the Nibelungen Lied is. The larger pictures are enclosed in massive borders of polished marble; the smaller in finely gilded mouldings. Then we were shown six similar halls; but the scenes on their walls are from the 'Odyssey.' These are all on the ground floor. Above them are the halls of Charlemagne, of Frederic Barbarossa, of Rudolph of Hapsburg, decorated also with great pictures representing scenes from the lives of those emperors.

We next saw the Court reception-rooms, to which the grand staircase leads. They are en suite, to the number of twelve, ending in the throne-room of polished marble, and carved work, and gilding. On each side of the throne there are eight marble columns; and between each pair of these stands an eight feet high bronze statue, trebly gilt; so that those fourteen figures look to be of as good gold as that image which Nebuchadnezzar the king once set up.

To descend to smaller matters, omitting splendid ball-rooms and so forth, I shall mention two rooms hung round with half-length female portraits; one room for the beauties whom King Ludwig had for his friends—in the centre of whom Lola Montes; the other for the ladies of the Royal family, among whom the queen, a Prussian princess, wife of the present King Max, and the Archduchess Sophia, mother of the present Emperor of Austria. Then there was a gallery to be seen of the whole royal race—stamm, as the Germans call it, of Bavaria, from before Charlemagne. Then the Schatz Kammer—treasure-room—with ancient and modern crowns, sword-belts, and scabbards, covered with diamonds, yards of diamond waistcoat-buttons on strings; with necklaces and bracelets innumerable of pearls and diamonds. Then a suite of rooms, fitted up two centuries ago in Imperial style—for one of the Electors of Bavaria was Emperor of Germany. In an old bed, heavy with gold embroidery, wrought by the hands of princesses for some old emperor, one emperor might have slept—one who had made himself at home in every German capital—Napoleon. When that grand antique imperial room was prepared for him, he ordered his little camp bed to be placed in it for his use. These old rooms, in their fading magnificence, form a contrast to the new ones, which has something soothing in its effect after their glare. They suggest, too, thoughts on the vanity of human grandeur, which is under the sway of so poor a thing as fashion—mere fashion. Old-fashioned! will be the condemnation of King Ludwig's fine things, in another century, by the admirers of finery. And by those who know that finery never was, and never can be, a prop to a State, what will his condemnation be?

But the artists—the artists—will they not make a declaration in his favour for all time to come? They may, if they so choose, but I scarcely think they will. There are rivalries which make artists egotistic, if not ungrateful. They are satisfied to allow their works to speak for themselves as much as possible—for their patrons, sometimes. I saw, in one of the galleries, a picture representing Ludwig, the bestower on Greece of his son Otho (the cost of which present Greece is at this moment counting up), representing him received on the shores of Attica, as the restorer of Grecian art—the Greeks, with palm branches in their hands, doing him homage. A very pretty sight! But I do not mean to speak of the pictures seen by me before I saw those in the Royal Palace; nor of the great picture-galleries, named Pinakotheca; nor of the sculpture gallery, Glyptotheca; nor of the royal cabinet of medals; nor of the Basilica and other magnificent churches, in which the fresco mania of the king predominates; nor of his arches of triumph, with chariots of victory; nor of his many other works of the artistic kind.

But here my walk has brought me to an obelisk, erected in honour of the 30,000 Bavarians who perished in the snows of Russia, led thither by Napoleon. No doubt, before the winter laid them there stiff and stark, they had fought well—for Bavarians could fight, as their conduct under the French marshals, Macdonald and Oudinot, showed. Afterwards, the Bavarian army, composed of brave men, who meant to be honest soldiers, found themselves one fine morning ranged against the French, on whose side they had been fighting the day before—found themselves on the side of Austria, who had for more than a century been plotting and contending to make Bavaria hers! It obtained the rank of a kingdom by Napoleon's decree in 1805; and when, in 1813, its king was assured that he would incur no danger of diminution of territory by leaving the losing side, he quickly abandoned Napoleon. We cannot but say that the treason was amply merited; yet we do not admire its author, and we regret the frightful despotism weighing on men, as soldiers, which makes them agents in such acts, without the exercise of any sentiment of their own in them. So I thought as I looked at the obelisk, and then I turned my steps in another direction.

The streets of Munich are broader and straighter than those of most old German towns; but are as ill paved as all of them. The houses are high, and generally of a good appearance; but the city has not that stamp of antiquity which distinguishes Prague, exciting immediate interest in it. The dark Catholicism there—once by blood and fire enforced, now become habitual—has something in its aspect painfully depressing to the stranger. Here, everything is different. Fat, contented Ignorance has never taken any heed of the true spiritual, and worships now with every kind of cheerful apparatus around it—such as fine churches of Byzantine architecture, gaudy with new frescoes, polished marbles, gilding, and lights; and, therefore, the Catholicism of Munich will not make common observers melancholy. There is, of course, here also a pillar with a figure of the Virgin on its summit. It stands in the centre of the great square; and basket-women, water-carriers, all sorts of persons, if they have to go across, stop for a moment, at the foot of the column, for their genuflexion and their prayer to the Madonna.

But I go on. That new red building is the Wittelsbach Palace, inhabited by King Ludwig since he found things settled enough to allow him to leave Rome and return hither. That small pretty villa was the abode of Lola, Countess of Mansfeld; it is now occupied by a rich brewer's widow. This is one of the picture-galleries painted even on the walls outside with frescoes! At the door is a carriage, from which alight two simply-dressed young ladies. They are two of the royal princesses, daughters of Duke Maximilian. He has given one princess to be Empress of Austria; and has still four others for royal houses liking descendants of Charlemagne; for from him the Wittelsbach race—now a royal race—claim descent.

Since it became royal, it has made rapid strides in diplomacy; has given many of its members in marriage to reigning, rising, and—as has sometimes unexpectedly turned out—to falling dynasties. The young princess whom I saw alight first from the carriage and enter the picture gallery was soon to be the bride of the King of Naples. In Irish phrase, I might add, 'The worse luck hers!' But Court gossip says that one of the Bavarian royal young ladies thinks that her luck has been worse still, she having been one of the sixteen princesses in Germany who each gave Louis Napoleon a basket. Giving a basket is the German term for refusing the offer of a gentleman's hand in marriage. Now, his uncle, Eugene Beauharnais, had been far from getting a basket from a Bavarian princess in former days; and might not he hope for as kind a fate in these times? It seems that one of the young princesses, a little enterprising and ambitious, was disposed to be favourable to him; but there was an important archduchess aunt to be consulted. She, when applied to, hinted at other imperial views for her niece, and spoke rather scornfully—this was in '53—of the shaky throne of France. The young lady supposed that the firmer one of Austria was meant for her; its master, however, chose for himself afterwards, and took her sister. Years have rolled on since '53—the one imperial throne seems as little shaky as the other, and the young princess thinks now rather hardly of her aunt; and that, had she kept her basket to herself, she might have been an empress as well as her sister. But enough of imperial and royal tittle-tattle; I shall take a carriage and drive to that monument of Munich, which ought to be its greatest, the Ruhmes-hall—Hall of Fame—and the Bavaria.

The gigantesst Bavaria, with her lion by her side, stands on a pedestal, at the top of a broad flight of steps leading to the level space before the hall. As if she were saying to her sons—'Come one! come all!' she holds aloft her hand, with a crown of laurel, beckoning them on. The lion appears to have some standing-room beside the folds of her flowing drapery, but the whole massive casting is fine, and much admired. Behind the great lady and her lion is the Hall of Fame—an elevated colonnade for the busts of her renowned men. Now, here I have to confess to too much ignorance concerning Bavarian heroes. Vainly I said—

'Wave, Munich! all thy banners wave,
And charge with all thy chivalry!'

I got into a train of misty recollections about a certain Duke Maximilian of old times, who had been the soul of the Catholic League when Bohemia was struggling for more light. I called to mind how Prague had then been taken; and that I had seen the royal crown of Bohemia in the Schatz-kammer of Munich. So were brought to a close all my ideas on Bavarian heroes; and, as I looked over the pedestal before the statue of the Bavaria, I saw only 'Fiery Frank and furious Hun;'

and heard them

'Shout in their sulph'rous canopy!'

OUR NATIVE TONGUE.

We grow acquainted with our native tongue
By gradual introduction. What denote
Those dreamy voices which around us float?
Do we remember, while the mother hung
Over the cradle, what she said or sung;
Or how the child began to learn by rote
Poem or parable, from land remote;
Or anthem pealing high, divinely rung
Over the babe divine? A daisy spring—
A flow of sound—a rivulet of light—
A river fordable by few or none—
A torrent down a cavern thundering—
A roll'd out volume, filling depth and height;—
One is the river, and the language one.

SUB-EDITORIAL PHILOSOPHY.—No. III. ON AN INDIA-RUBBER BALL.

A SAGE, whose name has escaped my memory, likens the period of adolescence to an India-rubber ball—by reason, I suppose, of the elastic nature of adolescence in general, and its capacity of bearing the early shocks of the world with a pleasant rebound, instead of falling prostrate before them in the manner of a leather cricket-ball before an earthen embankment. Would the shade of that sage, if he be dead, and the sage himself, if he be living, forgive me? first, for forgetting his name, and then for supplementing the analogy by saying that because an India-rubber ball is notorious, at the commencement of its career, for taking quick impressions of objects it comes in contact with, and no less notorious for getting them rubbed off in the course of its knocking about in the playground, I am of opinion that in this respect, also, it is not unlike the period of adolescence.

Joyfully do I contemplate that chubby-cheeked, pink-frocked little boy on the rug at my feet; amazedly do I conjecture what keeps him enchained to that spot at the north-west corner of the table, till I find that some moist sugar has been accidentally spilt there, which he is carefully picking up and depositing grain by grain in his mouth. Certainly I am proud of those well-shaped fat little legs kicking and sprawling about. (He is my nephew, and hight Tommy, surnamed Didymus.) But my soul is tinged with gentle melancholy, as I reflect that his sugar days can't last for ever. The time is fast approaching when he must be introduced to the world. Will he go easily and smoothly through it till he reaches manhood; or will he, in the course of his early pilgrimage, get seared and marked in his heart like the India-rubber ball, to be worn out by the hard flinty wall of experience? His eyes will soon begin to open on the world, and he will regard it as an honest world; he will have faith in it; he will, figuratively speaking, grasp the world by the hand, rejoice to make its acquaintance, and hope to have the pleasure of joggling along with it a long time. Sad to think that he will get less honest himself. Sad to think that that bright eye of his will get less lustrous, look less frank, peer more in the style of picture criticism at his neighbours, have a colder grasp of the hand for his friends, and smile pityingly on younger men who are commencing with as much faith in the world as himself. It is the prerogative of the world that it should mould down those that live in it to a certain similarity. Define worldly! Of the world! It stands alone and means much. He will observe his contemporaries, and he will soon become so much of the world that he will remark a change there also, and be on his guard.

No! my good madam or sir, I do not exaggerate, there is a great deal of wickedness and craft in those smiling little cherubs of your own; and pardon me for saying that they inherit it from you. It is a common inheritance which all children receive from their parents. These are very nice little misses, and they present a delightful picture sitting round the tea-table, and trotting out all their little accomplishments for the delectation of your guests. Miss Mary, the eldest, looks very innocent, and pretty, and amiable. She is so naturally; nevertheless, there is a great deal of latent wickedness in her heart. You acknowledge this, and you say that the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; and that good example and training are necessary to keep down that latent wickedness. Your intention is very good; and you make her recite her lessons, and say her prayers on your knee before going to bed—her sweet little hands clasped, and her eyes pretending to be shut, but withal half-open and peering at the miniature of papa on your brooch. This is very proper; in fact, you would be wicked to neglect it. This is one of those duties which do not sink deeply at the time; but still makes an impression which is certain never to be effaced, but to be long remembered, and very likely to blossom and bear fruit in after years. But there are a great many impressions which do make an early harvest in that young heart. When you sit down, after your guests are gone, to have a quiet bit of gossip with your husband, you let slip a great many remarks which that little cherub hears, and which she ponders over deeply when her hair has been put up in paper, and she has retired to bed. You are right to be proud of her; but don't you think it is injudicious to make so many remarks about her personal appearance, and how brilliantly she acquitted herself in all her infantile accomplishments compared with those odious frights the little Weekses? And don't you think she takes notice when you discuss the commercial position of Weeks himself, and your natural and proper astonishment that Mrs. Weeks should carry so high a head, and be so well got up, when her husband stopped payment only three months back? I don't mean to say that you should be debarred from enjoying your little bit of gossip; not at all. I myself am fond of it. You ought to hear myself and Baggs discussing Scraggs' position and affairs. How I gloat over the puzzling query which Baggs suggests, in an amiable way, as to how the dense Scraggs has contrived to get his hat dressed and re-lined. 'I can't make it out at all,' I say, with a significant look; 'nor how he has managed to get his boots mended.' 'It's mighty funny,' Baggs will say, with an ominous shake of the head—as if he were rather inclined to think Scraggs had waylaid and robbed some one. 'Blow'd if I understand it. I hear that he had on a clean shirt on Saturday, and it's rumoured about that he's got new buttons to his waistcoat, and invests regularly in paper collars. I won't be astonished if something happens.' 'Nor I either,' I say good-naturedly; and we both express ourselves to the effect that it would not startle us much if we were to meet Scraggs led through the streets handcuffed between two policemen! In the same manner do you reckon up Mrs. Weeks and her apparel—her bonnet, and cloak, and that Garibaldi jacket which she got last week, despite her husband's late bankruptcy! We, however, are more honest in our canvassing of Scraggs' position, you must acknowledge. We openly state to each other our opinion that Scraggs has been about something which will bring him within the pale of the law; but you have not the candour to do so; not only hint it, and express your opinion by ominous remarks and pantomimic signals. Why don't you put the children to bed, and frankly acknowledge to each other that you think Weeks has been forging some bill, or breaking into a bank? This canvassing of your neighbours' affairs is very apt to impress a bad idea of the world on your darlings, and make them precociously cunning and wide-awake as to what the Misses Weeks wear; and, in fact, leads to a great deal of mischief in their little impressionable hearts, which is never properly eradicated. Pardon me again for suggesting that there should be a little less emulation in their education. When you tie on Miss Mary's little hat at breakfast, and kiss Jack's honest little mouth, perhaps it would be more judicious if you would refrain from impressing on them the necessity of keeping themselves clean and genteel, in order that they may contrast favourably with the dirty little Joneses; and to learn their lessons well, in order to get a higher place in the class than the stupid vulgar little Tompkinses. It may be an inducement to keep themselves clean and study hard; but it would be better if you would impress upon them the duty of doing so for your and their own sake. I would rather see them a little dirty and backward in the lessons than with a jealous feeling and unjust attempt for their schoolfellows. On the whole, to me I think it would be the better plan if you would not cross-question them, on their return from a juvenile party at the Simpkinses, as to what they had eaten; how the other guests were dressed; what Mr. and Mrs. Simpkins said to them; and if they were paid much attention to by their hosts. This sort of thing is apt to destroy their natural candour, and make them jesuitical in their conduct; and it is very probable that they will turn this finesse, when they get up a bit, to their own use in blinding you to many little pranks which they know to be infra dig. I may be wrong, but still I am of opinion, also, that the dears should not be present when you are discussing the conduct of Mary Jane Jemima Ann, the housemaid; and your astonishment at her presumption in having her young man in the kitchen for a quarter of an hour, or your conviction that she has made away with some of your old clothes. This will make them suspicious, and perhaps malicious, in taunting the hapless Mary Jane Jemima Ann; and it is far from pretty to see children presuming upon their position to annoy domestic servants. Yes; I think that, taking all things into consideration, you will indorse my opinion that it is better to let them enjoy the sunshine of their youth with as little precocious information as possible. They will find out, by-and-by, for themselves, the way of the world; and it is a mistake to suppose that they must be up in all sorts of craft to keep their own ground. Few people, I acknowledge, openly maintain that such is necessary; but a great many kind monnaies (very seldom papas) act as if such were the case in the education of les enfants. But, to return to the subject of their own little private griefs, they will be abundant enough in all sooth, I am afraid. I shudder to think of the first indentation on that little fellow's heart, for instance. Heigho! I have experienced it myself; and although the scars have been healed and re-crossed with other and later scars, still there remains, after all, slight microscopic grooves which twinge occasionally.

Those early scars are no slight things after all. You! you grizzled, grizzled, wealthy nabob! who take a pride in asseverating that you would give all your wealth to become again an adolescent—a careless happy boy of twelve—let me reason with you calmly and dispassionately on the subject. Waive for a short time, I say you, the difference of our positions in the social scale, and let me put it to you—Would you really exchange your grizzled locks and immense wealth to be again an adolescent—a careless boy of twelve? You are candid, and acknowledge Yes. I shall give you an hour to reflect upon it. Think, nabob! of the pictures which your twelfth year ushered you into! You had elder brothers and sisters when you were at the age of twelve years; and your aristocratic parents were in the habit of giving balls, and The dansantes, and fashionable conversations at that time, at which you were privileged to attend till the hour of ten. And those aristocratic re-unions, all the wealth and society of your fashionable parents' acquaintances were present. I will not attempt to guess whether it was with the blonde and golden-haired Blanche that you fell violently in love—or the dark-eyed Italian-looking Juliana—or the graceful pette Barbara—or the stately Ida—or the slim and graceful Alice; but you did fall in love with one or more of them is beyond a doubt. Let me recall to you—I must be only to be kind—let me recall to you the torture of never telling your love, but letting concealment,

'like a worm i' the bud, feed on your damask cheek;' the deadly jealousy which you had of your brother Percy or Plantagenet; or the unspeakable anguish with which you observed the flirtation between one of those proud beauties and the Honourable Flipperty Flapp; the humiliation, the agony deeper than tongue can tell, when the object of your adoration kissed you as the fatal hour for bed arrived, and told you to be a good boy, and remember to say your prayers—you! who would have eloped with her on the spot, in her evening dress and satin slippers! In the gentlest manner possible, let me give you one hint, which will recall the sleepless nights you spent thinking of that proud beauty, so very far removed from you; and your muffled howls of agony, as you nervously rubbed and rubbed your smooth face for the hairs which were not there, nor would be likely to make their appearance for years to come—by which time your fair innamorata—horror to think of it!—would, in all probability, be the mother of a family! Think of that, wealthy nabob! and of your despair when you could not, by any arithmetical sophistry, make your age one day more than the dreadful reality! What do you say to this? Would you go through all this? would you renew your youth to suffer these tortures again?—tortures before which your later difficulties pale like a candle before the sun. Don't, for the sake of keeping to your word, sin against your conscience by saying—'I would'; or I shall so far forget the relative positions of a wealthy nabob and poor scribbler, as to say I don't believe you, wealthy nabob!

I wonder if that little fellow will ever suffer in this way? I am afraid he will. I am certain that his dreams will be troubled, and his young heart made to suffer much in his juvenile theatrical days. I thought that the theatrical indentations made in my own heart had been effaced; but as I look back, I am reminded that a scar is there still, although repeatedly crossed and re-crossed. Oh, the face and figure of that charming Miss Rosamond! Maude was her first name. How I pictured the felicity it would be to know her, to receive a letter from her, to be within a yard of where she stood! How I envied those seedy blue-chinned supernumeraries, who—wonderful condescension on her part—were privileged to speak to her at the side-wings, while she was waiting for her cue to go on! How she used to lavish those bright smiles which haunt me still upon them! From the stage-box, I could see her gliding about the wings. I sometimes laid the flattering unction to my soul that she was looking up; at which times I infused a tenderness into my general expression which she could not have mistaken. I loved her with all the ardour of a first passion, and all the strength of my years—fourteen! Where is she now? Alas! she is now old and plain—still on the stage; but now, instead of youthful waiting-maids and young boarding-school ladies, in love with first walking gentlemen, she performs the characters of old dowagers or maiden aunts of a certain age, and she has very often to put on blue spectacles as part of her make-up!

Fathers and mothers who, at that festive season of the year—Christmas time—are in the habit of treating the juvenile members of the family circle to the pantomime, let me warn you, for the sake of the peace of mind of the darlings—Don't take them. Think of the agony which young Tom or Bill or Bob suffers for many nights after, as he recalls the image of the little fairy, Peppita, who lives in a grotto at the bottom of the sea, and dances and warbles so gracefully and sweetly. Think of the rolling on the pillow for weeks afterwards, which Miss Lily or Miss Mary suffers, as she thinks of that charming Prince Poppita, who got married before the end of the piece to the fair young daughter of the King of the Coral Island, and who she knows, therefore, is far beyond her reach. What matters it if the fairy Peppita is the mother of three children, and Prince Poppita—personated by a younger sister—also married? They don't know this, and would not believe it. Therefore they suffer real inward heart-suffering, and pine away for weeks afterwards. You think it is the excessive cake-feeding and wine-sipping incidental to the festive season of the year; but I know better. It's 'the worm i' the bud.' Therefore, I say in all kindness, Beware!

Ah me! those indentations on their susceptible hearts are greater than one would imagine; and it takes a long time, and a great deal of crossing and re-crossing, before they are obliterated.

R. L. GENTLES.

THE FLOWER O' THE MAY.

THE baron's towers rise proud and strong,
His lands lie wide and fair;
But his young daughter Marjorie
Is the sweetest flow'et there.
Her mother looks wi' smiles o' love
On the fair face at her side;
While her father counts her beauties o'er
Wi' words o' mickle pride.
Oh! mony a lover sought her bower
Wha sadly turn'd away—
For ill to please and hard to win
Was the baron's bonnie May.
Then cam' a harper to the ha',
When winter nights were lang.
He touch'd the strings wi' ready hand,
And mony a lay he sang.
His cheek was wither'd o'er wi' age,
His locks were thin and white;
But the e'e that on the maiden smiled
Wi' youth's warm fire was bright.
His doublet was o' coarsest cloth,
His cloak was worn and bare;
But on each was wrought a cross o' blue
In silken colours fair.
'Why do you wear that cross o' blue,
Sae bright wi' colours fine?'
'It is the badge o' a knight I served
In the wild wars o' langyene.'
But what has changed the gay maiden?
Her lightsome laugh is still'd;
And the cup she to the harper bears,
Wi' trembling hand is fill'd.
Nae mair she dances through the ha';
Her step is hush'd and slow;
And, sitting at her mother's side,
Her sighs come deep and low.
'Your sangs o' love,' the baron said,
'They may ring sweet and clear;
They mak' my Marjorie to sigh;
And you bide nae langer here.'
When slimmer cam', and the young birks
Flung a' their tassels out,
And sweet scents met the westlin' winds
That roam'd the glens about,
The maiden sought her woodland bower
Beside the waters clear,
To see the yellow trout glide by,
And the burdle's sang to hear.
It canna be the mavis' note;
That sounds sae soft and low,
Wi' whisper'd words o' luv that mak'
Her cheeks like crimson glow.
It canna be the harper auld,

Wha at her feet doth pray:
And yet he wears a cross o' blue
Upon his doublet gray.
'O flee wi' me, fair Marjorie!
I've loved you true and lang;
And hameward to my southern ha'
Alane I canna gang.
'Twere vain to seek your father's towers,
His pride and scorn to dree;
I would but pine in dungeon dark,
And thou in sorrow be.
My steed is swift, my sword is bright,
The way you needna fear;
And four-and-twenty stalwart knights
Lie in the woodlands near.'
'I canna wi' a stranger flee,
And leave my father's tower;
I'd wither like the violet
Pluck'd frae her native bower.
Can I forsake my brothers brave—
My mother fond and dear?
Oh! rise you up, you gay gallant!
Your words I mauna hear.'
The winter nights were lang and mirk,
The sleot was drifting white,
When at the gate the maid again
Spak' wi' that southern knight.
'My followers a' are wearying sair—
My sisters mourn for me;
Now I am come, thou lady fair!
To bid farewell to thee!
Your father will a bridegroom find;
Nae bride shall e'er be mine;
Your norland skies are no sae cauld
As that young heart o' thine.
Far distant on my hameward way,
When braks the dawn, I'll be;
And you wi' smiles may greet the day
And think' nae mair o' me.'
She laid her lily hand in his—
'This night I'll be your bride;
I'll meet you at the lanely kirk,
The twialed oak beside.
For you I'll leave my mountain hame,
My brothers a' behind;
But wae's me for my mother dear,
My father true and kind!
The cock crew loud before the ha'.
That waukrife maids might hear;
The dawn cam' glintin' up the east,
And touch'd the Ochils near;
Yet still beside the twialed oak
The southern knight doth stay:
'My bootless tryst nae mair I'll hold;
It's time I were away.'
He turn'd him round in hasty step,
While the tear blink'd in his e'e—
'How could you brak your plighted troth,
You false, fair Marjorie!
Oh, why, this morn, does bonnie May Sae close her chamber keep?
I'll ride without my stirrup-cup
Sin' she sae sound maun sleep.
Unto her, when she seeks the ha',
Her father's greeting tell:
But wake her not till I come back,
Gin she wake not herself.'
The gloamin' mists were gathering gray,
When, hameward frae the chase,
The baron bold rode up the steep—
And a cloud was on his face.
The deer were swift, the hounds were slow,
The ready scent they mis'd:
'I rode without my stirrup-cup—
My May I hadna kiss'd.'
Wi' heavy tramp he trode the ha',

Nae foud face met his e'e—
 'Oh! sleeps she still,' at last, he said,
 'My bonnie Marjorie!'
 In haste they to her chamber cam',
 Nae sleeping maid was there;
 But on her bed was left a lock
 O' her lang gouden hair;
 And near it lay a snaw-white glove,
 Mark'd wi' a cross o' blue;
 And a feather, that had often flapp'd
 When far the raven flew.
 The baron's brow grew black as night,
 For weel he read the sign:
 'I'll mak' nae maen for that light leman—
 She is nae child o' mine.'
 They spread the feast as they were wont—
 Held wassail in the ha—
 In laugh and jest the baron's voice
 Rang loudest o' them a'.
 But aft her mother bent to hide
 The saut tears in her e'e;
 And her brothers speil'd, wi' wond'ring look—
 'Whaur can our sister be?'
 But little kenn'd they a' how changed
 Was that young smiling face;
 And little wist the southern knight
 O' his bride's sleeping-place.
 In the dark stream beside the fa',
 Aneath a treacherous stane;
 Oh, there the bonnie Marjorie
 Lay coudily a' alane!
 The yule-log blazed upon the hearth,
 And a' was cheer within,
 When to the baron's door a hand
 Cam' tirrin' at the pin;
 The touch was light as snawflake's fa',
 Or leaf by zephyr stir'd;
 And yet the sound rang out so clear
 That ilka reveller heard;
 And they hae open'd wide the door,
 When there stood Marjorie!
 Wha thought the maiden fair before
 Should now her smiling see;—
 In dazzling robes o' silken sheen
 The lady she was dress'd,
 And, rarely wrought, a cross o' blue
 Shone on her snowy breast.
 Her gown was deck'd wi' roses gay,
 Her hair wi' mony a flower
 That neither grew in Lowland shaw
 Nor yet in Highland bower.
 'I am nae light leman,' she said,
 'But a wedded bride sae true;
 And I canna rest wi' my bridegroom,
 For the lave I bear to you.
 Gie me ae kiss, my mother dear;
 Your blessing, father, gude!'
 The wondering baron rais'd his hand
 And bless'd her where she stood;
 Her brother stepp'd to lead her in,—
 But Marjorie was gane;
 And on the floor a watery foot
 Was mark'd upon the stane!
 Sae they hae search'd the darklin' stream,
 And there her corpee they found;
 And now, beside the twiled oak,
 She sleeps on holy ground.
 And frae that hour, for her fair May
 The mother griev'd nae mair;
 For she soon gae'd to the bowers abune,
 To meet her daughter there.
 And still, beneath the birks, the stream
 Gae singing on its way;
 But aye the maiden's name it bears,
 That water o' the May!

C. P. C.

A DAY'S RABBIT-SHOOTING.

I NEVER could see anything attractive—but many things justly discreditable to the fair-dealing English mind—in that German importation, battue-shooting. Turning one's servants into a slaughter-house agrees little with our national definition of sport. Nor can the principle of fair play—that instinct of generosity which forbids a man from shooting a sitting bird or a squatting hare—well be said to exist, where the shooter, standing at the corner of a wood, or daintily picking his way through a shrubbery, fires into a ruck of half-tamed pheasants, or among a crowd of hares and rabbits that run between his very feet in their terror. No. We shall be quite right in characterising battue-shooting as a lazy, selfish, cruel process—a massacre, not a sport; begetting, in the minds of all who systematically engage in it, a deplorable indifference to loss of life in the mass, and reversing the good old opinion that, not in the quantity of game secured, but in the quality of the sport attained, lies the excellence of the day's achievement. Certainly, if it pays to preserve game—pays to sell vast quantities of it, call the destruction a business, not a pleasure. Devise some means of netting your birds, and set the gamekeeper to wring their necks. Thus you will, mercifully, avoid the necessity of those half-broken wings, those bleeding yet vitally uninjured bodies, which their miserable owners carry off with them to fester and putrify in solitude.

The true sportsman is guilty of no such cruelty as this. To torture the pierced victims, whether by a clumsy mode of shooting them or by suffering them to continue in pain when shot, is abhorrent to his nature. He will refuse to fire indiscriminately, or when he can only injure without destroying. This results from his pursuit being not only a healthy out-growth of natural inclination, but an admirable training in the matter of self-control. For, besides skill, true and legitimate sport demands endurance, watchfulness, patience, and, underlying all these, an unfailing good temper. It is a discipline both of physical and moral qualities. It calls out and strengthens the manliest attributes of man. Fatigue, hunger, cold, are to be endured. Sharp disappointments must be borne with cheerfully; sudden opportunities must be embraced instantaneously; mind, hand, and eye must be ever on the watch. Success is to be achieved, not to be stumbled on; the contents of the game-bag—not so many but what unfaltering skill might have made them more, not so few that a trifle less would have been sheer disappointment—will offer in the end a just tribute to his patience and perseverance; and, besides these advantages, true sport exerts other beneficial effects quite as desirable and more apparent. Over the active organization it produces a healthy natural glow of excitement. Languor, headache, the fumes of dyspepsia, the irritations of bile, the gloom of discontent, the fear of adversity, the doubting of friends, the suspicion of evil, the bankruptcy of hope, the urgency of a poor purse—all disappear. The ways of life open out more clearly; the clouds break and disperse; things are not so bad as they seemed; self-inspection has given place to more kindly objective influences; there is truth, love, sympathy yet in store for us; this good world is not all a sham; these pleasant prospects—pleasant in spite of bare-armed trees, brown fields, and leafless hedges—wake up within us a healthy naturalism of feeling; the winds of youth begin to blow again on the recruited frame and softening disposition; the old love of nature—of a life spent out of doors, all rural sights, all rural sounds—returns so strongly, that we wonder we have ever wandered away from its vigorous genial influence.

It may be our lot to spend much of our time in 'populous cities pent;' but the effect left on the mind after a day, now and then, of hearty, healthy sport, never fails of quietly helping to counteract the spirit of over-anxiety and selfishness engendered by worldly pursuits. The man of business and the sportsman may present, in the same person, two very different phases of character; but it is impossible that the health, the courage, the vigorous activity of the hunter or shooter should not affect favourably the actions of the merchant and citizen. Nor will I believe that the silent teaching of the country—so tranquil, so remote from the hurry and agitation of man's ill passions—does not assist to refine and chasten our moral character; for, certainly, mean, vicious qualities—low, ill-blooded actions—are what one expects not, and wonders to find, in a sportsman. A return, if only for a time, to something like primeval freedom, the joyous instincts of the unfettered ranger of field and forest, seems to necessitate a corresponding deliverance from those despicable, malevolent passions which are bred, like a fever, from the compression and corruption of society.

Had I twenty sons, half of their education should be carried on out of doors!

Holding these opinions, I very gladly welcomed an opportunity lately afforded me, by a kind-hearted friend and country gentleman, of enjoying a day's rabbit-shooting. We were to meet at eleven; and, punctually at that hour, Willy, Brown-Eyes, and myself, walked up the garden path towards Carter's cottage. Carter—a man of a wild breezy look—was the Squire's gamekeeper; rather tall in stature, and exhibiting a certain liberal expansiveness in his mode of carrying his limbs, which, I fancy, is peculiar to large men who spend much of their time out of doors. He invited us into the house; and, if it were necessary to the subject I have in hand, I might attempt to give you a little Dutch picture of the interior; of the three-legged table—rather furry, so to speak, from frequent ablation; of the half-dozen straw-bottomed chairs; of the dresser set against the wall, adorned with cups, saucers, mugs, and plates; of the slanting shelf of books; the cottager's almanack; the various coloured prints decorating the sides of the apartment, from one of which it would seem that Joseph's brethren, when they made their first bow to him in Egypt, wore crimson small-clothes and outaway coats.

But I am ill at such descriptions. I have little or nothing of the talent, so popular of late years, which makes us fancy what we are reading to result from a cross between an auctioneer's catalogue and a street guide.

'Do you think we shall have good luck, Carter?' said I.

'Sure to find some rabbits out at all events, sir,' he replied; 'though, to be sure, the night was wetish.'

On the whole, this was encouraging; for, coming along, we had doubted, from the sloppy state of the roads, whether many of our furry friends would be outlying in the hedges and open fields. Unless driven out by fox or weasel, rabbits won't leave the cover in wet weather. They prefer to stay at home, and make morning calls on their friends and neighbours.

We were talking of these matters, when we heard the voice of the Squire. Out we sallied, and received a hearty welcome.

'Should have been here before, lads; but, coming along, shot this pigeon. The rascal flew so far that it took me a mile out of my way before I could get him. Well, Brown-Eyes, have you brought some straight powder with you? It's no use shooting with any other. Is it, Carter? Where's Peter, and the ferrets, and the boy? We'll try the cover first. I wonder whether there's a fox there! Come along.'

Nothing loth, we followed in the wake of our thoroughly genial good friend, whose kindness of disposition and heartiness of manner make him a universal favourite. Possessing capital lungs, and a rich fruity voice, as if, when he was a baby, his nurse had poured a bottle of port wine into him, and left the gurgle in his throat, the Squire—tall, stout, and rubicund—strode along his acres—the representative man of the best national type of squires and country gentlemen.

'Take us where we shall find some rabbits, Carter,' said he. 'Show our young friends the way to pop the question at a moment's notice. Teach the parson here how to deliver his charge. He may be a bishop some day.'

We all laughed at this. Even saturnine Peter—whose face from exposure to hard weather was as stiff and seamy as if it had been cut out of a pair of old corduroy breeches—condescended to look amused. Though, speaking of bishops, the gravity of Peter would have surpassed that of a whole bench. He was the stoic of the woods—a man without a smile.

By this time we had crossed the field—rather spongy from the previous week's rain—and drew nigh the cover. This consisted of a pretty dense wood, tangled and shrubby, standing on some two acres of ground. High banks, overgrown with bramble and hazel, ran round it as its boundaries, descending on the field-sides into deep ditches, thick with ferns and brake. It was agreed that the Squire should enter the cover, being more used to the ways of our nimble young friends, while the two boys and myself remained on the watch outside.

'Now, Peter; now, Carter, beat away! Something stirs. Brown-Eyes' heart pops into his mouth. Pahaw! 'Tis only two field-mice, which, as the pole struck the bushes, glided out of an old bird's nest and disappeared in the ditch. Look, lads, how warm and comfortable they have made it! Lined with wool, regularly restored and air-tight, it is evidently intended for the wants of a small family. There; put it back again, and note the fact.'

But as yet the chief objects of our solicitude made no sign. They kept themselves to themselves, and no impertinent curiosity to see what all the fuss was about seemed to visit the canicular mind. So many 'not at homes' replied to our delicate inquiries, that the Squire, at last, lost all patience. 'We must try the ferret,' said he, sententially.

On the word, Peter took out of a bag, which he had carried slung over his shoulder, the required little animal. It wasn't long before a mysterious-looking hole in the bank was discovered. Into this he inserted the ferret, which looked like the thin end of a lady's animated boa without a back bone. As if, like the Grim Feature, it scented its prey afar, the little animal made no pause, but slipped immediately out of sight. 'Now, gentlemen, stand from the hole, and stand deep as death or a tropical noon-day, if you please! Tick, tick, went the seconds in my watch; tick, thud, went the beat of expectation in my heart. Quarter, half-hour, seemed to go by while we waited. Silence! 'Don't move for your lives!' I drew a long breath. Wait—yes—at last there is a murmur, a swooping, a rustle—a rush! away down the cover, faintly to be traced by the bending twigs and yielding brushwood! 'Ah, my fast friend, it's no good.' A look that way—the pressure of a finger this—a flash—a report; and you have sealed your indentures to the cook in your blood.

'Good shot that, Squire,' said I.

'Fairish,' he answered. 'I could not see him, but had across his line of flight. Where's that boy? Here, stick him on the pole.' This was done by cutting the tendons of the two hind legs, and running a stick through both. One gets callous to the process, as well as to the preliminary one of suspending the animal, head downwards, and administering the coup de grace at the back of the head; but at first nothing but the distant prospect of rabbit stewed, boiled, or fried, seemed to justify the proceeding. Nevertheless, as I reasoned, rabbits were made to be eaten; and if to be eaten, made to be killed; and if killed, made to be shot; and if shot, made to be knocked on the head, and to have the sinews of their hind legs divided. I know no one who can justly find fault with the above syllogistic argument, except, perhaps, the rabbits themselves; but it is plain that they have no voice in the matter at all.

At the same time, I can't bring myself to like the employment of the ferret. In and out of the long burrows, winding here, gliding there, with deadly unobtrusive movement, that cruel-eyed, red-nosed vermin pursues its affrighted prey. A rabbit-burrow, like life itself, has its exits and its entrances. When, as sometimes occurs, the egress is stopped up, poor Bunny is caught completely in a trap. Outside, we wait and wait, becoming aware at last what deadly tragedy is being transacted under our feet. Often on the startled ear come clod-compressed shrieks and subterranean wallings, dying away in miserable silence. Like Sterne's starling, the poor conies cannot get out, and fall one by one into the power of their stealthy foe, whose favourite mode of attack is to jump at the throat, and bite through the jugular vein. It is not unusual, also, to find that the ferret has made a tit-bit of the eye of his victim.

Thrice on this memorable day were we detained, dismally enough, by the long absence of our small ally. It was in vain that Carter, hushing us all around, got into the ditch, and, applying his ear to the rabbit-hole, made a figure of himself more curious than graceful. His object, of course, was to determine the whereabouts of the internal contest. But it soon became evident that nothing was to be done but to dig out ferret and rabbits together; and who so fit for the job as Peter—taciturn Peter—who would have dug all day—and all night, too, for the matter of that—with the same steady, stolid, determined expression of countenance, as if to dig into a rabbit-burrow were among the highest of moral duties, and a buried ferret the ultimate end of life's energies? So we set him to work, and left him at it. When, after some forty minutes' labour, he rejoined us—outwardly impassive, but with a twinkle of triumphant splendour in his eye—he received our paeans of applause modestly but confidently.

'How many, Peter?' said the Squire.

'Three, your honour,' answered he. 'One rabbit and two hedgehogs!'

May your shadow never grow less, Peter! and may we laugh a thousand times in our lives as joyously as when we heard your reply, and witnessed your solemn cachinnation!

It was during one of these long interruptions that I made my first successful shot; and I glory in it. Let me observe that rabbits rush away at such a terrible rate, as if they had an engagement at the other end of the county, and were afraid of being too late, that it took me some half-dozen shots before I became accustomed to the nervous spectacle. I shot above them; I shot before them, over them, under them; no ways near them went my desultory pellets. Sometimes too close, I missed them with the barrel, when I could have brained them with the butt-end; at other times too far off, I might as well have shot eastward, in the hope of killing a jungle cock in India. 'Don't be in such a hurry; keep cool; let him go twenty yards'—were the separate items of advice tendered to me by the Squire. But, as is always the case, experience became my best instructress; and, under her guidance, I at last demonstrated that I had not always forgotten to put in the shot when I loaded my gun. I was pacing quietly along, when a sudden shout from behind assailed my ears. 'Look out there!'

cries Will. 'I've just kicked one out of the ditch.' Dashing past me went the now familiar brown streak of fur. Oh, there you are, my dear, are you? What a violent hurry you are in! Are you thinking of catching the up-train to London? I'm afraid you'll be too late. Pop!

Reader! Did you ever see the gambols of young bullocks in fresh pastures? With joyous uncouth flinging about of the limbs, they jump, run, scour the plain, return, stand still, and gaze, then start aside like a broken bow, resuming their high jinks, full of vigorous fun and jollity. Thus didst thou behave, my young friend Will, when the first victim of thy decided aim shed its fur before thee. Know, my dear boy, that your friend and elder, grave and wise as he is, had it in his heart to have behaved even as thou—so unrestrainedly, unaffectedly, transportedly exhilarated. But I was cool, you remember; I was cool. Doubtless, there was a conscious gleam of satisfaction in my glance; but with a wave of the hand, as much as to say, 'A trifle, friends; praise me not,' I re-loaded, and asked for my second rabbit.

No more of this. Let me only observe, without wishing to appear boastful—on the contrary, I am esteemed by my friends to be remarkably diffident and modest—that if any young rabbit wishes to know how I shoot, he had better, before he tries the experiment, make his will and take an affectionate farewell of his friends and family. The probability that he will not see them again is extreme.

But this by the way. Time would fail me in recounting all the dramatic incidents of the day; of the first-rate shots made by our old friend, between bush and briar and tangled underwood; how the shooting of too impatient Will, as a novel method of ploughing up the ground, perhaps had its merits, but, if judged of as rabbit-shooting, was certainly open to animadversion; how Brown-Eyes, the well-beloved of the country-side, untrusting, from youth and maternal solicitude, with death-dealing weapon, revenged his wrongs on the poor battered bankrupt of a hat which covered but did not adorn the brows of his ever-faithful Mentor. Let me not forget the dog, too, which, when the ferret had retired into obscurity and his bag, took up the sporting tale, introducing new incidents and scenery. Prowling along the hedge with nose on the perpetual sniff, Bell, at intervals, would make a sudden pause. Then, as from far we saw her, motionless, with head lowered and rigid tail, pointing into the hedge or ditch, 'So-ho! So-ho!' cried Carter, Squire, or boy. There was always a rabbit on those occasions—sometimes a foolish, fatuous rabbit, that, instead of making off at once, preferred to lie still as if awaiting our approach—often with light-brown body ridiculously apparent, refusing to stir till kicked out, shot, and strung alongside his friends on the stick.

Once or twice we came across the traces of the insidious fox; whereupon the Squire would tell us tales of the quantity of game which a single animal would destroy. Especially are foxes destructive of rabbits. Thus, when the latter have young ones.

warmly, and, as they suppose, safely housed at the very end of the burrow, Master Reynard troubles not himself to come in at the front door, like any other respectable gentleman; but, guided by his own exquisite power of smell, scratches his way right down upon them from above.

Here Carter breaks in:—'I know'd an old fox once—and a cunning one he was, too, to be sure—who, whenever he was hunted, always led the hounds a pretty dance round the country, he did. Always the same round, till he came to Desborough Wood, and there he used to go to cover; and they never could get him out, do what they would. However, when the huntsmen—and, for the matter of that, some of the gentlemen, too—used to be cursing and swearing away at a fine rate, out would come another dog-fox, as fresh as a daisy, right before their noses. But, bless you! the hounds were too tired to catch him, as well he know'd, I'll be bound!'

'And do you think one told the other?' asked Brown-Eyes.

'I think he let him know somehow or other,' replied Carter, cautiously and philosophically.

In fact, it would seem there's no end to the wily ways of a fox. Gamekeepers will tell you how, on moonlight nights, foxes may be seen practising their leaps, determining with the utmost exactitude the longest distance from which they can pounce with certainty on the prey. How, too, they will dip their brush in liquid manure, and, trailing it along a run in the wood or a ditch-side, conceal themselves, and wait for the rats and mice which are sure to be attracted that way by the odour. How, too, they will swim, unsuspected, towards ducks, and even wild fowl, under cover of a branch of a tree. How, also, if they are surprised in a place from which there is no immediate escape, they will pretend to be dead, taking care, however, to be off as soon as your eye is turned from them. In fact, what with his extraordinary devices to escape the hounds, his perilous leaps, and queer places of refuge, the fox, if he is one of the most mischievous of animals, is also, perhaps, the most dramatic. To country gentlemen he is invaluable. Nor are we ignorantly to suppose that the fox-hunter has all the fun, and the fox all the fright, or that the sensations of hunting and being hunted are diametrically opposed. 'The horses like it,' once observed a wiry old huntsman; 'the dogs like it; we like it; and I am not sure the fox himself doesn't like it.' Let us charitably suppose he does.

But it is time to bring these desultory remarks to an end. I suppose the number of rabbits we killed would appear ridiculously small by the side of the vast lists of victims which at this season of the year furnish occasional paragraphs to the newspapers. Nevertheless, what we did secure were obtained honestly and industriously. Even the amount of walking we got through is not to be sneered at. Across field after field, cold and wet, down into deep hollows set with thick bush and furze—grievously toiling along dense clumps of sticky blue-clay mud—ranging the sides of rasping hedges, beneath which revelled and gurgled the muddy waters of the Severn-seeking brooks—or descending into great broad pastures, undrained and soppy, stretching far away and mingling with the uplands which rose along the slopes of distant hills,—we tramped and tramped till, speaking for myself, I knew no more where we were than the dead. But what of that? That suspended puzzle in the mind as to one's whereabouts—which a turn in the road or a glance at the landscape from a changed angle of vision, will resolve into delighted recognition—not only added to the attraction of the sport, but made it partake of something like its original savageness and solitude. Meantime, as the day went down, the rabbits became fewer and fewer, our voices ceased, our thoughts turned homewards. Evening—gray, still, cold—came on; silence accompanied; the quiet country sank into more placid repose; the redwing, startled out of the hedge by our approach, flew noiselessly into the nearest tree; even the timid blackbird flittered off down the dusk without his usual foolish splutter and scream. Men, boy, and dog seemed as if they had had quite enough. The ferret only was restless, poking a ridiculously red nose through a hole in a bag, and exposing itself thereby to many derisive remarks.

“Squire, we must be off home. You have given me a jolly day. Brown-Eyes hasn't had one like it these holidays. We are all tired and hungry as mosquitoes. After dinner, we'll fight our battles over wine; and, between wine and walnuts, re-kill the weary slain. Nor will we conceal from one another what I think we each individually experience—that on this day Nature has not been niggard in her better influences upon our minds; and, while helping to strengthen our bodies, has been insensibly persuading us to seek for health in our pleasures, simplicity in our tastes, and sincerity in our thoughts.

A. S.

WORDSWORTH'S 'INTIMATIONS OF IMMORTALITY.'

Of all our modern poets, Wordsworth and Coleridge are the most metaphysical. Man is pre-eminently the subject of both. With Wordsworth, man as influenced and guided by Nature: with Coleridge, man as reflected in, and united to, Nature. Wordsworth painted himself, and the written histories of men and outward life, in order the more fully to yield himself to the silent but deep monitions of the invisible Spirit who fills the universe. The grand thought underlying all his poems is the passivity of the human soul. Coleridge's pages, on the contrary, are full of severe intellectual introspection. Coleridge's philosophy is the poetical development of Swedenborg's Theory of Correspondence; Wordsworth's doctrine is the higher expansion of Cowper's, and makes Nature the revelation of God, whose voice can always be heard, as well as the tiniest rain-drop as in the fearful thunder-storm. Perceiving every object of the material world—the unseen brook in the wilderness, the clear bubbling stream of the valley and the fairy flowers growing on its side, the grass-blades in the daisy-crowned fields, the far-off beauteous stars, the majestic rivers, and the ceaseless ocean and the awful cataracts, the gorgeous landscape and the homeless clouds—in everything of Nature is the Eternal Spirit, speaking through it to the heart and understanding of man. This dogma of an ever guiding and exhaustless inspiration in natural objects—of an ever new and perennial revelation from God, through the things which His hand hath made—is the foundation of Wordsworth's poetry. But with Coleridge, Nature is not the forming influence—not the unerring monitor from whom he is to inquire and receive, in a state of absolute quiescence, the highest truth, and for whose teaching the profoundest thinkings of the human mind, and the noblest achievements of the human intellect, are to be set aside; but it is the tangible, visible, and material reflection of man's inner life. With Wordsworth, to obey Nature with unquestioning reverence and the holiest worship; to lose and absorb your individuality in intense communing with her; to regard her as the embodied Deity; to be the recipient of the sublime truths she unfolds; to reject all forms and creeds and books and theories of men for the ever-present Divinity within us,—that is the one duty of our life. With Coleridge, to study Nature as the actual realization of our thoughts—the workmanship of our souls—the manifestation of our ideas in an accomplished fact. Thus, with Wordsworth there is no union between the soul and Nature as a material existence, but between the ever audible voice within her. With Coleridge, man and Nature are indissolubly one—man the living infinite spirit, Nature the acted thought of the creative soul.

In expounding this grand theme—the language of Nature to the human heart, and the sway of Nature over our thinking life; in endeavouring to apprehend the harmony that exists between the outer and inner world; in attempting to solve the secrets and unravel the mysteries of our present-conditioned being and of our ideal associations, Wordsworth has blended the profoundest truth with the finest eloquence and the most gorgeous description. His 'Intimations of Immortality' is a poem of the highest rapt imagination, uniting the deepest metaphysical thought, the grappling with a mysterious problem of our existence, the subtlest fancy, and the weightiest significance, with rich poetic clothing, glowing words, opulent imagery, and luminous description. It opens with a blessed recollection of the virgin joys of childhood, when the young, simple, glad heart laughs and beats in consonance with everything around it; when the depths of sorrow attendant upon maturer years are unknown; when the eye looks out and sees naught but what is 'passing fair and beautiful' as a fairy-dream; when the indefinable sense of the good is ever present; when sunshine is unmingled with cloud, and hope with tears and disappointment, and fresh gaiety and joy with the bitterness of large experience. Ah!

how unsyllable and profound is the significance of the sublime unity! The great heart of Nature—everywhere alike in all its infinite variety—one with the eternal and undying heart of the young innocent child! The feeling of unending life is there, down in the unfathomable abysses of the soul, laid in the foundation of our being as a universal instinct. But the delight lasts not long; the harmonious music presently begins to jar; the boundless joy is interrupted by grief; the 'Pleasure is mix'd with pain.'

How melancholy is the oppressive thought—

'Turn wheresoe'er I may,
By night or day,

The things which I have seen I now can see no more!

The soul is severed from Nature; but her appearances are still the same. The stern contact with life has divorced him from the objects he so ardently loved when a boy; but they are still unchangeable. Still the rainbow comes and goes; still the flowers blossom in 'witching beauty; still the sun shines in eternal glory; still the birds sing joyously and in gladdening melody; still the young lambs bound and frolic in primitive-like innocence; still the moon looks as spiritual in her far-off habitation; still the forms of Nature are immutable.

'But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath pass'd away a glory from the earth.'

Ah, there it is! The fact then comes upon our ripened manhood—the incapability of earth to satisfy the longings of the limitless soul. The rapt delight of the boy, upon whom is dispelled by the wants and yearnings of a spirit which earth with her countless riches cannot supply. 'Where is it now—the glory and the dream?' And why? Because the soul is a wanderer here, environed in a body and time-vesture which impede its upward flight; because in its deep consciousness is the intuitive sense or emotion of life without beginning; because, having become disunited from Nature in consequence of the development of mortality, there is a vacuum which can be filled only by the realization and enjoyment of that perfect and purely spiritual existence which is its sublimest aspiration, and which is the original state whence it has proceeded. For,

'—immortality
Broods like the day,'

'Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness;
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home!'

How subtle and meditative! How serenely beautiful the atmosphere around it! How magnificent the imagery! How deep the thought! The consciousness of pre-existence is an ineradicable feeling of our being—not logically demonstrable, because it defies our analytical reason, and belongs essentially to the region of the emotions. And amid the woes, and pains, and sorrows—amid the strifes and distractions—amid the grief and sufferings inherited by all in this life, there is one happy inspiring thought:—

'O joy! that in our embers
Is something that doth live!
That Nature yet remembers
What was so fugitive!'

This song of thanksgiving is not induced solely by the recollection of the joys of childhood, but primarily:—

'For those first affections,
Those shadowy recollections,
Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain-light of all our day,
Are yet a master-light of all our seeing;
Uphold us, cherish, and have power to make
Our noisy years seem moments in the being
Of the eternal silence.'

Hence, in the imperishableness of those truths, and the power imparted by them, the poet says:—

'In a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither;
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.'

There is the deep philosophy of the poem; the profound insight into the union between the past and the future; the expression of the deep-seated idea that looks backward to a life without beginning, and forward to a life without end; the deep intuition that we were, and that we shall be throughout the endless future. The dreams of our childhood, then, are the highest realities after all; not mere brain fancies and empty imaginings, flitting like phantoms across the mind, but the sublimest truths sounding in our being's depths, through the ages, from everlasting to everlasting.

FANCIES OF BYGONE ART.

We should scarcely venture to make the trite remark that high art and right sentiment are inseparable, were it not to distinguish such a legitimate relationship from a spurious one to which we are about to refer, and which was of such a peculiar nature as to warrant distinguishing notice in the history of art. We allude to the practice which prevailed during the period of Addison, and until the close of the last century, of delineating all scenes of domestic life under certain fictitious circumstances, with a view to heighten the aspect of the picturesque. It was not thought necessary to adopt this method in representations of historic events of the past, nor of naval and military engagements of the day—these being supposed to contain a sufficient degree of interest in themselves without the addition of ideal character. But the scenes of domestic life were not considered sufficiently poetic in their character to admit of their being painted literally; and we believe that Benjamin West, President of the Royal Academy, was the first to abandon the notion that men and women in contemporary times must needs be painted in costume

Doubtless the origin of this absurdity might be traced; but without undertaking this task, may we not reasonably inquire whether something of the same spirit is not perceptible in a considerable portion of the literature of that day? Did not pastoral sentiment, for instance, so prevail in the writings of the poets, as to influence the painters in the choice and manner of their works?—scenes of rustic life and love forming the favourite material for both. An excessive gallantry was the fashion of the day, and Love the all-absorbing theme. The high-flown verses which appeared in admiration of the fair sex, especially in the Lady's Magazine, were in general esteem. For a specimen we have only to open an old volume of Stenstone, Phillips, or Pomfret, and it will be strange if we do not hit upon some such couplet as—

'What! Celestina dead! Oh not she cannot die!
She's too divine—too much a deity!'

Artists, in willing conformity to this taste, found little scope for the exercise of their genius in those scenes of Arcadian simplicity—those blissful, imaginary regions, tenanted by rosy Cupids, whose only employment was that of 'Wounding, with unerring shaft,

The hearts of maidens fair!'

and give rise to innumerable fanciful productions in pictorial art, which the public received with perfect complacency. Nor were the caterers to this established public taste—which was the same in regard to decoration and ornament—slow to minister to it; Don Cipriani's paintings on the panels of state carriages, down to the ladies' fans, which were magnificently spread with languishing nymphs and love-sick païsa. The owners of these last-named trifles also delighted to sit for their portraits as rural beauties; we were ladies of quality considered to compromise their rank by receiving the poet's homage in sonnets, which addressed them as favourite shepherdesses, placing in the names of Gloriana, Roxana, or Myrrha; while dissipated peers and men of the town paid suit to them in language which affected to be heartless eloquence of the rustic clown, but rendered palatable by the complimentary style then so much in favour. Nor were the religious writers without their influence in fostering a false taste in art. We may instance Mrs. Rowe as a type of another class of sentimentalists too striking to be omitted. At one moment transported in meditating on the Divine perceptions, at another indulging in free descriptions of human passion, she so eloquently descanted on both as to draw forth a very natural question—Whether the claims of religion might not be in danger of suffering from such proximity? As far as art was concerned, religion was undoubtedly in some danger, for her letters were embellished by designs less likely to call up spiritual aspirations than to bring into prominence the licentious manners of the times.

We remember an illustration of one of her letters:—a young lady at her devotions in the foreground; and a group of half-nude youths and maidens in the background, paying attentions to each other, in the style in which Boucher, the celebrated French painter, loved to represent them in his pictures of the golden age. Even now, traces of this false idealism have not wholly disappeared. A search into the old print-shops in the unfashionable haunts of London would bring to light many musty records of the past in art—curiosities that would aid us in our conceptions better than the most elaborate description. We should see prints in the red-chalk stipple style after Angelica Kauffman, that lady painter of gods and goddesses, who astonished the world by her severe classic taste, and aided the imagination by portraying such characters as Mentor, Calypso, Telemachus, and Belisarius; varying her subjects with nymphs bathing in beautiful gardens, or dignified figures, half-women half-statues, all wearing an expression of sublime contentment and happiness. You would also alight upon young swains, if in coloured prints, with blue coats, bright buttons, knee-breeches and buckles, the admired of 'the charming fair'; and, possibly, upon an Amanda, weeping on a garden-seat for one of those false ones so attired, and who, in the background, is seen sporting with happy nymphs, the favoured, but 'fast,' shepherd of the grove. You will be arrested possibly by the peculiar expression on the faces of the ladies, who are invariably looking upwards, as if to bless Heaven for such unwonted felicity, or downwards, to hide their blushes from the ardent gaze of their capering partners.

Coming down more nearly to our own times, the names of Burney and Westall at once present themselves—names pretty familiar to those who are acquainted with the works of British artists, especially Burney, who stepped beyond his contemporaries to work out what he considered the truest sentiment in art. Being a disciple of the serpentine line theorists, who supposed they had discovered the secret of all true beauty and grace, he immediately adopted their principle in the drawing of his figures, rendering them in some instances so supremely ridiculous, that it required no effort to identify them as Burney's 'own.' He must have been a little disappointed that the chairs and tables did not admit of the same kind of treatment; but the animals were made to subserve his purpose, as, like his ladies and gentlemen, they writhed about in all directions—the domestic cat on the hearth, and the baby in the cradle, judging from their contortions, seemed alike contending to exemplify the line of beauty in its perfection.

As the public made no complaint against such proceedings, we presume it considered itself so properly constituted in regard to taste as to enjoy and admire them. It is long before a more consistent taste is thoroughly discerned; indeed we make no doubt there are still to be met with, in some sequestered corners of Britain, undisturbed by modern innovations, old gentlemen and gentlewomen, who, surrounded by the relics of their early days, sigh over them as pieces of perfection the world is never more to behold; like Mrs. Piozzi—the lively, witty, and gay of her time—who, as she drew near her end, considered that all things else were drawing to a close; the constitutional weakness in her throat increasing, Johnson gone, and friends going, she gave way to a morbid view of affairs. As to literature, it was on its last legs; the legislators of her country were becoming corrupt, and fearful times were advancing. It was, indeed, high time for her removal from 'the evil to come.' As she grew weaker, the imbecile condition she had predicted for mankind was about to dawn, and the strength of that generation was departing with her own.

We well remember the visits we were in the habit of paying a worthy old gentleman, in the days of our youth. Like Mrs. Piozzi, he believed he had seen the end of all perfection, particularly in regard to art, of which he had been a devotee, and somewhat of a patron. As it was of the kind of art we have been endeavouring to describe, we shall offer no apology for a more lengthened description of it as it appeared in the old gentleman's collection of prints and paintings—the walls of his cottage being, as he supposed, adorned with the finest the world would ever see again. One print particularly struck us. It was a representation of a pic-nic party—a number of ladies and gentlemen, robed as shepherds and shepherdesses, were sitting down, under the shade of a great oak, to a substantial meal of roast fowls, ham, bottled porter, &c. The gentlemen were assiduous in their attention to the ladies, though there was no lack of domestics; for, while some of them were in the background unpacking a hamper, which doubtless contained the second course, they were waited upon in front by a black man, in livery, of sober demeanour. The intense gravity of the black flunkey, as contrasted with the joyous smiles of the party, and his handsome livery with their rustic habiliments, caused us no little amusement.

The next pictures worthy of notice were a pair of well-executed prints, in the chalk or stipple style. To those who had read Pope's poems, there was no difficulty in recognising the subjects. The one represented Abelard in a monastery; the other Eloisa in a nunnery. The former looked profoundly melancholy, and very interesting, as he was engaged in writing an epistle to his beloved. Eloisa, in her nun's attire, was now the bride of heaven. The last tear shed for Abelard lay conspicuous upon his letter, which she had been perusing. The artist had bestowed unusual pains upon this tear, to render it large and pearly; and we were informed that it was considered quite an achievement in art, and universally admired. We do not say, in reference to these two pictures, that the sentiment they conveyed was any other than the right one. We allude to them simply as forming a portion of a unique set, strongly contrasting with a modern collection. Often we gazed upon them, pitying the unhappy fate of those very ardent lovers; and when the old gentleman informed us that Abelard's release was out of the question, and that Eloisa had declared her decided intention never to leave the convent, it almost brought tears into our youthful eyes. On the side walls of the fire-place were two other prints, with less of the romantic, but more inconsistently imagined. In the one picture the principal figure was that of a country gentleman in a hunting coat, booted and spurred, his whip under his arm, and wearing the usual powder and pig-tail of the period. He was smiling, with rather a forced benignity, on what we suppose was one of the smallest infants which the artist (Mr. Wheatley) had ever seen or painted. The baby was held up for the sportsman father to admire, in the arms of a most amiable nurse, as unlike Mrs. Gamp as possible. The mother of the babe was introduced in the background, the curtains of her bed having been drawn a little on one side, to show her placid and contented countenance, looking unutterable things. The gentleman had evidently seen the baby for the first time, having just stepped in from the amusement of the chase; whether purposely or accidentally, expecting or not expecting such felicity, we thought not of inquiring. In the other print, the members of the same family were introduced. Baby was just learning to walk, and papa was stretching out his arms to save it from a possible fall. The only noticeable thing in the picture, which savoured of inconsistency (if we except the sylph-like form of the nurse), was the fact of the father being still booted and spurred; conveying the impression that he had been hunting ever since the baby's birth, and had just paid another flying visit for a passing glimpse at his wife and child.

It would fatigue the reader to enumerate all the old gentleman's treasures, once conspicuous as the pride of the printshops of the Mall and St. James's; yet there were one or two others we can hardly pass over. Under an antique oval mirror, ornamented with those little burnished globes then so general, hung an oil painting of a shipwreck. It was, indeed, a terrible storm, and the waves surprised us by their size and roughness; but the calmness of the crew was something more wonderful, though quite in harmony with the idea which seemed to prevail with certain artists, that men in pictures should look more amiable than men out of them. The artist, in depicting this terrible gale, had taken care that those exposed to it should wear the expression of perfect resignation to their fate. The heads dotted upon the billows, and the figures clinging to the rocks, looked so well prepared for their everlasting change as to remind us of a crew of shipwrecked angels rather than men; nor could we account for the painter's fancy on any other ground than that of the desire to warn all not similarly situated to be ready for such a calamity, should it ever arrive.

Besides this last, there were two large prints, 'The Woodman's Return' and 'The Old Shepherd in the Storm,' both by Westall, R. A. The eyes upturned, and looking so radiant and meek, led us, in our boyish ignorance, to the inevitable conclusion that all aged shepherds and woodmen were among the most excellent of the earth.

If we were to begin a description of the porcelain figures, where should we end? Let us just allude to one group, as a type of all the rest. A gentleman and lady on an elegant sofa, tête-à-tête over their chocolate; and a Cupid, with his little golden bow, peeping slyly from under the cushions!

With these reminiscences, we close our description of the old gentleman's parlour, and the fancies of bygone art. C. N. W.

'TOO MANY ROW'NS IN THE POCK.'

"WHEN a youngster, running about the braes of Cowal," said a venerable Hebridean friend of mine, "I was accustomed, at the proper season, to gather a goodly quantity of hazel nuts, which, being kept for a time, and then shooled as we called it, or shucked, were taken to Greenock, and sold at so much per Scotch pint. It was by the produce of these that I got, one autumn, the first head-covering that I ever wore, and which was a hat; neither bonnets nor caps being at that time—half a century ago—so common as they have been since. I still remember how rejoiced I was at this event—so rejoiced that when the hat was out of my sight, I could scarcely believe that I really was the possessor of such an article. About the same time, and while gathering blueberries among the heather, I found a cuckoo sleeping; but, thinking it was dead, I put it in the palm of my left hand, while I began to stroke it with my right. To my surprise and dismay, the creature awoke and flew away, leaving me to feel the pangs of an irreparable loss. Often did I go back to the same spot, and thrust my hand into the hole among the heather where I found it, to feel if it had come back; but never found it again—a trial to a boy and of bird-nesting, which I leave to boys of that age to realise, as they only can—just remarking to my young friends, that, although I was very fond of finding birds' nests, I never really harried any of them farther than occasionally taking one or two for the young for pets, when they were on the eve of giving the nest."

"In the course of half a century—during which time my experiences have been pretty varied, if neither very wonderful nor even remarkable—I have, of course (and who has not?), met with many causes of regret, and the way of losses and disappointments, and I have had at times, also, substantial reasons both for thankfulness and rejoicing. I am not sure, however, that any of these ever produced on me so much sadness or sorrow as the getting of the first hat, or the losing of that cuckoo. But I am forgetting the row'ns."

"Well, then, one day, towards the end of the season, I set off to the wood, with my pock and smack, or stick, for pulling down the branches to me; but I was not very successful in finding nuts. Not wishing to return home with my bag rather empty, and 'row'ns,' or rowan berries, being plentiful about me, I from time to time thrust a bunch of these into the pock, until at last it was pretty well full. I then returned home; and, eagerly opening my treasure, found that there were fewer nuts than even I myself thought, but a good many more row'ns than I at all conjectured. When the latter were all out, some one present remarked—'Ah! you have too many row'ns.'

"Now, the rowan berry is a very pretty and showy fruit to look at, and perhaps may now be turned to more useful purposes than were then discovered; but, compared to hazel nuts at that time, rowan berries were thought very useless. Upon the occasion in question, I was thought to have far too many of them. I never forgot the circumstance; and, when I met with people who were very showy in their way, but with little substance, I always thought they had too many rowans. When, for instance, I met with a young man full of boasting and bluster, but without much courage or merit, I set him down as having 'Too many row'ns in his pock;' when I met with a young lady very gay in appearance or dress, but without thrift or much modesty, I thought that she had 'Too many row'ns;' when I saw a young merchant or tradesman living, or undertaking things, far above what he ought to do, I thought that he had 'Too many row'ns;' when I heard a young preacher very eloquent in his own opinion, and gaining credit and reputation only with those who were no real judges of his merit or performances, I thought that he had 'Too many row'ns;' when I read the effusions of one who thought himself a poet, but was merely a rhymester, I considered that he had fewer nuts than row'ns; when young ladies are addressed very passionately by some Lothario who may afterwards turn out unworthy of their confidence, let them beware lest there be 'Too many row'ns' in the case; and when young men are led on with expectations by mere coquettes, let them beware that such may not have 'Too many row'ns;' in short, let all and sundry, in their intercourse with the world, in the expectations they may entertain, and in the plans they may form, see to it that there be not 'Too many row'ns in the pock.'" L.

THE SHADOW OF A STORY.

THREE summers ago, I was staying at the Baths of Cronthal, in the Taunus. Ems, Wiesbaden, and Homburg were too gay for me—for I was really an invalid, and not a malade imaginaire—so I chose a retreat where, within easy reach of Frankfort and the Rhine, I was yet as secluded as though I were a hundred leagues from any tourist.

Cronthal is a charming spot, just off the road from Soden to Homburg, below the road from the latter to Kœnigstein, and the baths are so close to Cronberg that the latter, with its lofty castle, attracts all the attention of the by-passers, and allows its humble neighbour to remain unnoticed. Rest and the waters did me much good; and I began, after a fortnight's stay, to explore the neighbourhood. At first keeping low down in my walks, and then, by degrees, pushing them more and more towards the mountain, until at length my favourite rambles were high up beyond Falkenstein, in the forest that stretches away far and wide over the calf-country of the Clan-Chattan.

One day I was wandering as usual along a solitary road—the hour not far from noon. It was magnificent harvest weather, and here and there, through the glades, I caught joyous glimpses of the great plain below, yellow with the golden burthen of the grain. I was musing on the strangeness of that long, straight, solitary road, white and gleaming in the sunshine amid the dark-green trees—it must have lain due north and south,—when I was startled by observing, sitting on a stone just before me, the Shadow of a stout man tying its shoe. I say 'its shoe,' for there was no real man or shoe to be seen. The Shadow was seated on the summit of the shadow of the stone. Its feet were on the fussweg, or part of the road appropriated to foot passengers, but which could not be called a footpath in our sense of the word; and its back was towards the carriage-way, so that I saw it in profile. I looked for the Substance, but there was none. The top of the stone was dark with what an Irishman would call the substantial part of the Shadow, but otherwise there was nothing on it. The shadow of the hat covered the upper part of the features, only showing two-thirds of an aquiline nose, two full lips, and a large double-chin destitute of beard. Lower down, it exhibited the proportions of a well-fed Shadow; or, should I rather call it, the Shadow of a well-fed man?—but there was no man. It was not a delusion, for I saw the shadow-fingers tie the shadow-shoe with a shadow-string; and then it got up, walked on before me a few paces, and stood—with its face to the west, so that I had it again in profile—as if waiting for me!

I had frequently heard of strange stories in Germany, but thought that the day of such marvels, if ever they did exist, was long gone by. I remembered the tale of Peter Schlymil, the gentleman whose shadow the Evil One rolled up and walked off with in his pocket. But here was a very different case, the Evil One, if he had any hand in it, must have gone off with the stout gentleman and forgotten to take the shadow; or was the stout gentleman really there? Had he simply, by putting on a green silk cap, or by turning his magic ring on his finger, rendered himself invisible? No, surely not. We know that light must pass freely through all things that are invisible; nay, it even passes through some things that are visible, for Dante tells us that the visible shades in Purgatory cast no shadows, and how they always found him out by his. Still it seemed as feasible that a man should become invisible and cast a shadow, as that a shadow should exist without a substance. If the man were there, what was he going to do? Why was he waiting for me? Perhaps it was some new discovery in science applied to highway robbery. I could not turn and run away, for then my back would be to him, and I could not watch his movements; besides, I was an Englishman; so I did the next best, and moved out into the centre of the road, so as to keep him at a comfortable distance while passing him. What was my dismay to see the Shadow step out across the road also, and range up alongside of me, at least alongside of my shadow. I swept the air with my stick where the Substance should have been, but it was void. My shadow, of course, did the same; but the other took no notice of the action; it only edged a little nearer, took off its hat in a very polite manner, made rather an elegant bow for so stout a Shadow; and, as I saw the thick lips move, it was evident that it was speaking. But to whom was it speaking? Of course it must be to my shadow. The horrid idea instantly flashed across my mind that its purpose was to seduce my shadow from its allegiance, and all the consequences of becoming a shadowless man, forced themselves upon me! What, if my shadow yielded to its entreaties!

But what could he offer to entice it to leave me? Freedom, to be sure; freedom from me whose slave it had been all its life; on whom it had ever to keep a watchful eye; whose least action it had to follow with the most instantaneous promptness and the most unerring precision; and whom it would have to serve until the coffin and the tomb shut me out from light; nay, even then, would not my shadow be buried along with me, and perhaps some day be turned out with me by the sexton's shovel—bones and the shadow's bones? Now, here was the Shadow of a stout man, quite its own master, and, as it seemed, lacking nothing to its happiness save company, bent on persuading my slave to leave my service. What had I not to dread! In fact, I had everything to fear and nothing to hope. An accusing conscience rose up against me. I had never considered my shadow's comfort in any way; had scarcely ever noticed its existence; and had never once in all my life paid it the slightest compliment, shown it the most commonplace civility, or thanked it for all its years of constant and faithful service. I had done nothing to render its service less irksome, or to attach it to me in any way. I had not the slightest claim on its affections, nor on its gratitude.

Though at first almost stupified with terror, I soon began to bethink me of making some effort to get rid of our unwelcome companion. I tried all the forms of exorcism that I could remember or imagine. I crossed myself simply; I crossed myself in the elaborate manner that I learned in Spain, and which stamps the performer as the most faithful of the faithful; and I crossed myself with the equally complicated ceremonial of the Greek Church. I did all this with my face to the east, as looking towards the Holy Sepulchre, when, seeing it had no effect on the strange Shadow, I repeated it with my face to the south, so that the crossings might be properly marked on my own shadow. The effect was the same. I then did it with my face to the north, to see what that would do; and then with my face to the west, that no chance might be lost. It was all of no use; I crucified myself in vain; the stout Shadow kept talking on as before.

I sprang rapidly to one side; I ran two or three steps backwards; I jumped at it, so as to try and pass over it; and, finally, thinking that the stout Shadow might not have the power of running faster than the corresponding stout Substance might reasonably be supposed to run, which could not be very fast—though hitherto it had followed all my movements with a deftness that would have been amazing in him—and having myself been formerly noted for speed of foot, I set off down hill at my utmost stretch. For the first hundred yards I did not look behind me, but when I did, the stout Shadow was alongside of mine, not running, but skipping, with long strides and pointed toes, as children skip on their way from school—never on their way to it—and with his left arm placed affectionately round my shadow's neck! This was intolerable; I dashed on, straining every nerve, and hoping to see some symptoms of giving out on its part; but a shadow has no weight to carry; and as I neared the bottom of the hill, out of breath and exhausted, I saw the pointed toes, if anything a trifle in advance of me, dropping tour à tour with inexpressible lightness and regularity. Just then a new idea occurred to me. I turned sharp to the right, and plunged into the wood. In a moment I was in deepest shade, and sank exhausted at the foot of an ambrosious oak.

I had now got at least temporary relief, but, so soon as I had been the excitement both of mind and body that I could not benefit by it; in fact, I was stupefied: I only felt a consciousness of something oppressing me, but knew not what nor how. I remained thus for some time, till the chill gloom began to refresh me; and I gradually resumed its powers, and I remembered the Shadow. Where was it now? Annihilated? That might not be. I knew that as soon as I returned to light, and eliminated my own shadow from the world of shade in which it now was lost, that it would reappear; and why should not the other be able to extricate itself also, and reappear with it? But if, as I doubted not, it had the intention of leaving mine to go with it, was I not giving it every opportunity of accomplishing its purpose? Might it not already have seduced it to slip away while I had no power of observing them; and might not issue from my fancied security awfully alone? I then renewed energy, I sprang to my feet at the thought, and stepped quickly towards the road. I shall never forget the fearful suspense, the agony of the passage of these few yards. Should I come forth with one shadow, with two shadows, or with no shadow at all? I entered the sunshine, and there were two shadows! At first I felt happy that it was so; but then what better was I than before? Nay, I was worse; for now the tempter, using no longer mild persuasion, was having recourse to force, and I saw that he was endeavouring to drag my shadow away from me.

Very generally in Germany, and particularly in the part of it, the country people all live in the villages, and from one village to another there is not a cottage nor a hovel by the wayside. They issue forth in the morning to their labour, and spread themselves over the country; they take their humble dinner in the fields, and only return on the approach of night. At this season of the year there was no work doing in the woods; the harvest on the plain claimed every hand, and one might have wandered for days in the deserted roads of the forest without meeting with a human being. I had no prospect, then, of getting assistance nearer than Königstein or Cronberg. Assistance? What aid could any mortal offer me? It might be, certainly, that I should meet some one who had a shadow more compliant than mine, and that thus I might be relieved of my tormentor at the expense of another. One thing, and one thing alone comforted me—my shadow wavered not. At times the stout stranger threw himself on his knees before it, embraced its legs, and tried to prevent its progress, till he was dragged along by it; or he planted himself in my path, and threatened it with violence if it proceeded farther with me. But my efforts to get rid of him were not more vain; my shadow passed on as though the other did not exist.

Königstein was, if anything, nearer to me than Cronberg; but the difference of distance was trifling, and I could reduce it by taking a footpath from the cross roads, that I had discovered only a day or two previously; so I pushed on for home as quickly as my exhausted strength permitted me. All the while the stout Shadow ceased not in its efforts to seduce mine. It tried tears, for I saw it apply its shadow pocket-handkerchief to its eyes; and it tried scolding, as I could tell by its gesticulations. I had got hardened to it by this time, and scarcely gave it any attention, but plodded on in a state of dreamy abstraction. I had nearly reached the cross roads, when I was roused by the sound of horse's hoofs clattering behind me. I turned, and saw a horseman coming down the hill at a hand-gallop. What should I do? Should I stop him, and claim his aid? Could he, would he aid me if I did? Should I not rather excite his horror than move his pity? Would it not be better for me to leave the highway, and hide myself again in the shadow of the wood? I was unable to determine, and, while I stood irresolute, he came near. He was a stout, middle-aged man—evidently one of the ancient people—mounted on a powerful brown horse, well up to his weight, which was at present in a lather with the rapidity of his pace and the heat of the day. Good heavens! As he neared me, what did I see? My brain whirled as I saw it! Yes! there was no doubt about it. Though the shadow of the horse was there, there was no shadow of the rider! My eye sought the stout Shadow. There it was, standing so as exactly to cover mine, and appear in its place as my shadow. I would have cried out, but my voice was gone. I gasped vainly, but uttered no sound. Horrid thought! Would he gallop past me, and never see his shadow? No. He pulled up suddenly, just as he was going by; and, removing his hat with an air which I recognised as the original of that with which the stout Shadow first addressed himself to mine, he said, in German, in a voice husky with emotion, 'Sir, have you seen'—. He had not time to finish the sentence ere, with a glance of the eye and a sudden step to one side, I revealed to him what he was in search of. 'Ah!' he said, 'he is there!' Instantly he uttered a few words, in a language which I did not understand; and, as the sound of them ceased, the stout Shadow had passed from its place, and was seated on the back of the shadow of the horse—a correct copy, in attitude and movement, of the corpulent Hebrew. 'I must apologise,' said the latter, again addressing me in German, 'for any annoyance that he has caused you. Believe me, I am truly and sincerely sorry.' Again he made me the graceful salutation—which I was too dumbfounded to return—put spurs to his horse, and went off, up the hill, at speed.

I was alone with my faithful shadow.

Gratitude for its fidelity was mingled with joy at our deliverance. I sat down on a fallen tree by the wayside, with my shadow on a piece of smooth, soft sward. I bent forward and laid my hand upon the ground so that our fingers met. I turned my head so that I had it as much as might be in profile, and that thus we see one another to a certain extent. I could have knelt and kissed it, but I should only have kissed the back of its head; for no man yet ever saw his shadow face to face, unless it were the stout Israelite who had just left me. I must have spent some time in this way, asking pardon of my shadow for my long neglect, and resting after my exertions and emotions, for the sun was declining when we rose to return to Cronthal. I arrived there so altered in appearance that my good landlady sent off at once for my doctor. Kind and attentive, but a thorough materialist, he would have only laughed at my story, so I did not mention it to him. He decided that I had over-exerted myself in the heat of the day—perhaps had had a slight sun-stroke, and so brought on a fever. There was no mistake about the last part of it, for for three days I was delirious, and my landlady used to laugh afterwards, as she told me how I had the most singular fancies about people trying to steal my shadow, and used to attempt to get up and run out to the sunshine to see whether I still had one or not.

A month after I was well again, and went to Homburg for change of scene and the bracing air. One day, as I was passing the door of the large Salle de jeu in the Kursaal, on my way to the reading-room, I observed an unusual crowd gathered round one of the trente-et-quarante tables. I pushed my way gradually forward, so as to see the cause of the excitement, when I beheld the stout gentleman whom I had met on the Taunus. He was playing deeply, and winning everything. Rouge or noir, couleur or inverse, it mattered not—sometimes he staked on one, sometimes on two, generally 6,000 or 7,000 francs, and fortune never deserted him. The Chef de la Banque, spectacles on nose, was standing behind the dealer, watching the game with an unmoved countenance, but with intense anxiety. Before the Jew were a score or more of rouleaux, each of 1,000 francs, and a goodly heap of notes of the same individual value. A clerk from the inner den, near the entrance-door of the building, came with a fresh supply of notes, for which a croupier signed a receipt, and soon they began to augment the winnings of the stout man. 'He will break the bank,' was now heard whispered on all sides, and the excitement was intense. Just then his eye encountered mine; and by his glance I saw that he recognised me; while I thought he changed colour. He let a deal pass without playing; then risked a single note on noir; lost it; and then, gathering up his gains, changed his gold for notes, which he wrapped up with the others, and bestowed in an ample Russia-leather pocket-book; this he put in a breast-pocket of his coat, and, leaving the table, disappeared almost instantly among the ebbing crowd. 'Who is he?' said I, to the Baron de X., Attaché to the French Embassy at Tübingen. 'Ma foi! I think he is the Devil; but people say that he is only a Russian Jew from Moscow. He calls himself Schwarzschild, and dines with us at the Europa. He has broken the bank twice here, and thrice at Wiesbaden!'

A week afterwards, as I was going down the Rhine, I found, in the cabin of the steamer, the Frankfurter Zeitung, and read in it the following paragraph:—

'Three days ago, a Russian Jew named Schwarzschild, who had on several different occasions won the last three months put up at the Golden Eagle Hotel here, was found dead in his bed. Although he was known to have won large sums lately at the gaming-tables of Wiesbaden and Homburg, no money was found among his effects except a small roll of Russian bank-notes, which, when changed, barely realised enough to pay the landlord of the hotel and the funeral expenses; neither was there any banker's receipt or other clue as to where he had deposited his winnings, which we have heard estimated variously at from 500,000 to 1,000,000 florins. The Russian Consul has taken charge of the matter.'

TSADDE

THE AULD ASH TREE.

THERE grows an ash by my bower door;

An' a' its boughs are buskit braw,

In fairest weeds o' simmer green,

An' birds sit singin' on them a'.

Oh, cease your sangs, ye blithesome birds!

An' o' your liltin' let me be—

Ye bring deid simmers frae their graves,

To weary me—to weary me!

There grows an ash by my bower door,

An' a' its boughs are clad in snaw.

The ice-drap bings frae ilka twig,

An' sad the nor'-wind soughs thro' a'.

Oh, cease thy mane, thou norlan' wind!

An' o' thy wallin' let me be;

Thou brings deid winters frae their graves,

To weary me—to weary me!

For I wad fain forget them a':

Remember'd guld but deepens ill,

As gields o' licht far seen by nicht

Mak' the near mirk but mirker still.

Then silent be, thou dear auld ash!

O' a' thy voices let me be;

They bring the deid years frae their graves,

To weary me—to weary me!

Cuthbert, Earl of Glencairn, gathered together a considerable body of retainers, and attacked Eglinton Castle, set it on fire, and destroyed both the house and all the family papers and documents—a calamity only partially remedied by King James V. granting to the Earl of Eglinton a title to all his lands of new.

The Master of Montgomery, who was killed in Edinburgh, as before stated, left a son, Hugh, who succeeded his grandfather, as second Earl of Eglinton, and appears to have been one of the Justiciaries of Scotland before he came to the estates; therefore, being versed in law, he managed to keep the family feud somewhat in subjection. His son, the third Earl, entered into a bond of friendship, in 1572, with the Earl of Glencairn and others, binding them to refer any disputes to arbitration—a temporary measure, which was soon broken, by Montgomery of Skelmorly killing one of Glencairn's sons, in 1582; whereupon, the whole clan flew to arms again, and, having been joined by the Maxwells of Newark, whose mother was a Cunningham, prosecuted the quarrel to the utmost—one of the Maxwells being slain, while Montgomery of Skelmorly himself, and his eldest son, were sacrificed to the 'deadly feud.'

To those who are in the habit of passing up and down the Clyde, in summer or winter, the beautiful mansion of Skelmorly must be quite familiar, renovated, and, indeed, almost rebuilt as it has been of late years, for the occupation of the present tenant, John Graham, Esq. of Lancefield. At the time we speak of, however, there was little of the picturesque to attract, except the rough walls of the old Castle itself. There were certainly a few trees round the house, and reaching some distance up the banks of the rivulet which flows by; but, otherwise, there was no foliage nearer than Knock on the one side and Kelly on the other, while the hills behind looked bleak and barren in the extreme. After the untimely deaths of his father and brother, Robert Montgomery succeeded at once to the estates and to the animosities of the family. He was a young man of good parts, though headstrong and impetuous, and subject at times to eccentricities. But we must leave him for a time, in order to picture how it fared within the walls of Skelmorly, one day not long after the events we have thus attempted to narrate. A bright fire burned in the capacious grate within the old panalled apartment of the Castle, by the light of which, almost as much as by the few rays which penetrated the contracted windows, had one been privileged to peep into the room, one might have observed a family group, consisting of Dame Montgomery, the widow, dressed in sombre hues, plying her nimble fingers at a piece of tapestry work; while at her feet, upon a footstool, sat a slight pale girl, of a lively but noble appearance—her only daughter. Their conversation was aent stitches of green wool here, of blue there, of silken cord to suit one place and silver or gold tinsel for the other; they had no printed diagram to guide them in their subject, but at once aspired to be the artificers and designers of the work. The brothers were all abroad after their different occupations; and the only other inmate besides the servant-maids, who were plying their distaffs and spindles, was a friend and relative, one Captain Montgomery, who had come west from Edinburgh on a visit, to assist with advice and enliven the circle with his cheerful conversation.

The Captain was a gay man—well calculated to cheer them up; he was used to an active life, having been a trooper in his youth, but of late had been much about Court, and could con a madrigal or compose a sonnet with any one living. He had, indeed, already become celebrated, by writing a poem representing Virtue as a cherry tree, and Vice as a sloe, and had indited several verses, amatory and otherwise, to the beauties of his acquaintance; and, among others, had poured forth his muse in praise of his lady-love—Margaret Montgomery, his cousin, not the young girl whom we have referred to, but the daughter of the third Earl of Eglinton. Captain Montgomery was occupied in reading; he was seated in one of the window recesses, when his reflections were interrupted by Dame Montgomery calling to him cheerfully,

'Now, cousin Alexander, sure poesy is a dull trade; else why do you sit there rhyming at that sorry book, while Meg and I are so much at a loss to devise a pattern for this needlework? See here, if you please; I have projected having a huntsman, with his horn, pursuing the deer through a forest of trees, and we are planning to bring out the shapes on this canvas. Come now, good sir, advise us thereon, and leave your love sonnets for a time.'

'True, true,' said the Captain, gallantly starting to his feet; 'great fool am I; but you may see my thoughts are errant; poets, you know, have a thousand themes to think on, and e'en when they are merry, methinks mischief is mixed with their glee.'

'How so?' said the lady. 'Is your book so mischief-making?'

'Indeed it is,' said the poet; 'but "sic company I quyt," tho' Davie Lindsay is a sturdy cairle, and "dings" down the "duchtiest" duke as if he were a palter-book.'

'Ha, ha! your figures are most notable, good cousin,' said the lady, laughing; 'but pray look here.'

'Let me see, then,' said he, 'how this cunning work goes on.' And, scanning the tapestry, he continued,—'In my humble mind, a good conceit would be to introduce Cupid, with his bow and quiver, in mid air, pointing his wicked shaft at the huntsman.'

'Oh! how beautiful, indeed!' interposed the daughter, clapping her hands. 'And have a shepherd with his crook, playing on his pipe, while tending his flocks beneath the spreading tree.'

'Nay, truly,' said the dowager; 'you are both over romantic; I was contriving a scene much less poetical. Suppose we have here the huntsman with his hounds, and a stately tree in front, with a river meandering down the centre, winding its course from the distant mountains—to be wrought with azure silk; and the deer, leaping over the stream—raised with double stitch.'

'A most notable design, and well expressed,' said the Captain. And, quoting from his own works, he exclaimed—

'Forgive me, Cupid, I confess I fail
To crave the thing that may me not avail.'

'My pen,' he continued, addressing the ladies, 'thy princely puissance shall report and declare you perfitte a peer à in taste and comeliness'—

'A pair of pigeons, white as any flour.
And blood of sparrows thereon sprinkle and pour.'

'A famous couplet, and curiously put, although I scarcely see the point,' said the lady. 'But I wonder where the lads have been all day? I have not seen Robin since morning.'

'Excuse me, but 'tis notable how contrasts bring out beauties,' said the poet, 'as blood upon the white breast of a dove.'

'As Natur passis nuriture,
Of Natur all things hes a strynd;
So evrie loving creature
Aye covets comounly thair kind:
As Buk and Dae—the Harte, the Hynd,
Lyk dranis to lyk, we see this sure,
So I am alwaye of that mynd
That Natur passis nuriture.

'True; very quaintly contrived,' said the lady.

'But are you speak in riddles. Have those verses sought application to Robin, poor fellow?'

'Well, it may be so,' said the Captain. 'He is very sour at this time, and talks of little else than concerning a young lady you know of, and against the Marwells. I walked along the shore with him this morning. He was then in a very doleful mood. I understood him to say that he was to meet the Master of Montgomery at Largs or Fairlie. I was sorry, indeed, to see him so bitter, vowing deep curses against Newark,—“Vyle, venomous viper” that he is! Robin swore at him as against a false “howlat.”'

'I've noticed something of late,' said the worthy dame, a shade of anxiety passing over her calm face.

'I wish no ill may come to Robin; but he has the spirit of a true Montgomery, and will make the Cunnahams feel that the tree of Skelmorly is yet green, although the root and first branch have been cut off.'

'I've warrant so, if he be not too rash. Mayhap his love for Meg Douglas may settle him. He was greatly concerned this morning to indite a rhyme to her; and sought me to write a sonnet to his lady-love, saying that the sword fitted his hand better than the pen; that if he had a “lilt” to send to Meg he would give a ploughgate of the best lea land of Skelmorly.'

'Foolish lad!' said the mother, with anxiety. 'I fear,' she continued, changing the subject from the sonnet, which she evidently considered premature, 'that no good will come of this meeting with Hugh Montgomery. He will be sure to set Robin after some mischief. These Eglintons are certain to be at the head of anything like a tut mutet or collie shangie.† They are a stirring set.'

Thus conversing, the day wore on, till at length John and George, the two younger sons, returned from the field, where they had been spending the afternoon in some youthful occupation. Their studies had been so far perfected in the mysteries of English composition and Latin grammar, under the able superintendence of the parson of Largs, that it was even proposed to send one or both to the University of Glasgow, so as to finish an education which had already been conducted on quite as liberal a scale as was customary for younger sons of the better classes, when even signing one's name was considered a proof of superior attainments. Upon their advent, then, the family group was rendered complete, with the exception of the young laird himself, who was nowhere to be found. The last person who had seen him was the Captain, who accompanied him so far on his way to Largs, upon a preconcerted engagement with some of the neighbouring young hair-brained gentry; and it was not without anxiety that the widowed matron saw daylight wear away, and evening advance, without any appearance of Robin.

'He is a strange lad, no doubt,' said she; 'but I wish no ill may have come over him in these troublous times. He is sometimes as lively as a cricket, while at others he looks as morose as a hermit in a cell. Something tells me that all is not right with him. It was not for nothing that he kept tryst with wild Hugh Montgomery.' Evening passed into night; but still there was nothing to be heard of the missing one. It was arranged that, at daybreak, a party should set out for Largs, to inquire as to the whereabouts of the young laird, and if he had been seen in the company of any one; or gain intelligence of him anyhow. Meanwhile, Lady Montgomery spent a sleepless night; yet it passed over, and day dawned, but still Robin had not made his appearance. Accordingly, as had been agreed upon, Captain Montgomery and one of the brothers, accompanied by an attendant, took horse for Largs. If there be a fine road now from Skelmorly along the coast, it was little better than a cattle-track then; but, as the horses were sure-footed and accustomed to the way, the party soon found themselves in the little township of Largs—once the patrimony of the Baliols, but then a straggling place, on the banks of the Gogo—a small rivulet, flowing into the sea, near which once stood the shrine of St. Columba, whose high festival is still kept in the town, being the annual fair of the place, and styled 'Colmsday.'

They had no sooner arrived at Largs, than they began making inquiries, and learned that young Skelmorly and the Master of Montgomery had been seen together in serious conversation; that, towards night-fall, they had separated, the one taking the way towards Eglinton, while the other (Skelmorly), it appeared, had last been seen on the path through the glen, now called, of Brisbane—then the muir road of Kelsoland. Farther news the Captain could not obtain; so the party put spurs to their horses, and proceeded towards Eglinton, thinking that some trace might there be found of their young friend, or at least that they would learn where he had gone. On the way, they met the Master of Montgomery himself; and, upon mentioning the occasion of their mission, he seemed as much surprised and distressed as they were. From what he said, it appeared that he had had a long talk with Skelmorly the day before, upon the subject of the wrongs which they both had suffered at the hands of the Cuninghams, and many were the deadly threats which had been uttered by the latter, who had stated his determination to be revenged upon Newark, and the whole race of Maxwells and Cuninghams. It farther appeared that Eglinton had entered fully into the plans of Skelmorly, and it was arranged that something decisive should be done; but that, meanwhile, the residence of the Maxwells at Newark should be carefully examined, with the view of an attack being made upon it, Robert Montgomery undertaking to make the investigation; from all which, it was naturally concluded that Skelmorly had at once taken the road over the hill to Newark, in order to carry out the project of reconnoitring the house of their mutual enemy without delay—a supposition which was borne out by a consideration of the whole circumstances of the case; so that it was scarcely doubted but that the lost one would have accomplished his purpose, and reached home again before they should get back. Accordingly, the whole party changed the direction of their horses' heads thitherward, and, after proceeding at a brisk pace, arrived, as it was getting dark, at the old house of Skelmorly, where they fully expected the young laird would have arrived before them from his expedition. That night, however, also passed over without tidings of Robin; and sad and mournful indeed was the household—every evil foreboding pressing upon the inmates, already bowed down by sorrow at the bereavements which had fallen upon the family from the same quarter as the threatenings now came from.

Having thus far conducted our narrative, it becomes necessary, in order to elucidate the subject, to change the scene a little; we therefore request our readers to accompany us somewhat farther up the Clyde. In proceeding, then, along our course with a retrospective eye, in order to make the landscape accord with the period, our readers will require to imagine what the appearance might have been, before Greenock, Gourcock, and Port-Glasgow were projected; when all that existed of these now flourishing seaport towns were the castles, and perhaps a cluster of small houses not far distant from each; in fact, at the time we write of, Greenock was still in the parish of Innerkip, not having been effectually created a separate parish till 1592. Gourcock estate belonged to the Stewarts of Castlemilk; and what is now Port-Glasgow was then part of the Newark property, and was called Devol's Glen. It was sold to the City of Glasgow, who obtained a Royal Charter in 1668; and, in terms thereof, founded a customhouse and harbour for the trade of the Clyde. Viewing, then, the prospect of the country in 'the light of other days,' we are long arrived at the old mansion of Newark, which had not assumed the imposing shape which it now bears, even in its present dilapidated condition, but consisted of a keep or tower, with buttresses and turrets of the early Scottish style. At the period referred to, it was in the possession of George Maxwell, ancestor of the Maxwells of Dargavel and others of the name, a younger son of the family of Calderwood, who was married to a daughter of Cuningham of Craigends; and, as the estate bordered upon that of his chief, the Earl of Glencairn (a title which is now extinct, although Finlayston has passed through the female line to the present Grahams of Gartmore*), Maxwell was strongly imbued with the hostile feeling which animated the whole connexion against the Montgomeries; and, being a thorough party man, nothing could exceed the keenness with which he entered into the quarrels of his friends. His sons were exactly of the same stamp, and at the time referred to may be supposed to have returned from a palaver with the Crawfords of Easter Greenock (or Crawfords'-Dyke), and the Shaws of Sauchie and Wester Greenock, ancient public affairs and the common weal of the neighbourhood. The Gowry conspiracy had not long before been detected, and the Earl had suffered the extreme penalty of his rash act. Glencairn was one of the jury at the trial, and now advised his friends to keep at peace with the ruling party; arrangements, in that case, would have to be made for signing a bond of mutual support, or something of the kind. Upon their return from Greenock, the Maxwells formed a circle round their own fireside, and the evening passed without any incident occurring worthy of being recorded.

At break of day, however, the whole household were afoot, and the heavy clanking of jackboots rang through the winding staircases and corridors of the Castle, mingling with the gruff laugh and hasty rejoinder of the retainers in the court-yard without, preparing the horses for the saddle. Meanwhile the Laird of Newark, himself an elderly man of joyous pleasant aspect and kindly face, stood erect in front of the large fire which burned clearly in the principal room. Before him was the board spread for breakfast, whereon were placed goodly joints of venison from the woods of Kilmalcolm, flanked by coney pasties and game, which formed, with home-made bread the chief part of the repast; while fresh brewed ale and sack were the liquors with which these worthy folks washed down the good cheer before them when tea and coffee were unknown, and when the Temperance Movement may be supposed to have had fewer advocates than in the present degenerate days. It was remarked, in the course of conversation by some one, that on looking out at the first of dawn the figure of a stranger had been seen crossing the outer court of the Castle, and passing through the door leading to the western turret. The party who had observed the occurrence paid little attention to it at the time, but upon talking the matter over with the others, it gradually assumed a more important aspect, when, upon comparing notes, it was found that none of the family had been abroad; and, from the description, all agreed that it could not possibly have been any of the servants or adherents astir at that early hour; and besides, from the appearance which the figure had, it was quite evident it was that of a stranger of no mean condition, and not one of the gaberlunzies who were wont to perambulate the country, taking a night's lodging wherever that could be obtained, as these gentry did not allow their presence to be unknown, but boldly demanded the shelter and refreshment which the usages of the country made incumbent upon all to give before the days of poor-rates and rogue-money.

'It is a lonely quiet corner,' said one of the sons, Mayhap the cairl, whoever he be, is hidden there yet.'

'So, so,' said Newark. 'Get ye out, then, lads, and see. Bring me word if you find anything; or if it were but a gyre-carling,* uneasy in the glen, come down for a sight of sea-water.'

After some little time had been spent in the search, an exclamation from without showed that the investigation had been rewarded with success. A messenger was sent to inform the old laird that the unknown stranger had been detected, lurking concealed in the upper part of the tower. 'Sure enough,' said Patrick Maxwell, the eldest son, 'it is one of these Montgomeries. In God's name, how came he there? Get me my pistolet, that I may shoot the loon as he deserves. He can have had no good intentions, coming here at this time and in this clandestine manner.'

Hearing such blood-thirsty threats, the old man at once proceeded to the spot, and interfered on the side of mercy. 'Nay, now, lads,' said he; 'let me see what game we have in our trap. Have patience, lads. By my troth!' he continued, looking up the narrow tumble-down staircase, 'an' it be not Robin Montgomery, the young Laird of Skelmorly himself! What the fell fiend brought him here, I wonder? No doubt, he is as wud† as his uncle was; and has lost his judgment somehow, and taken to night-walking. Come ye down, Robin, my man!' continued Newark, 'and be not afeared. Know ye not that I have done ye a good turn before now, in making you both young laird and old laird in one day?' A rude jest, referring to the slaughter of his father and elder brother; which Skelmorly, of course, could neither boast nor resent at the time, as, perceiving that he had been detected, he naturally concluded that prudence would be the better part of valour; and, therefore, slowly descended from the hiding-place, whither he had taken refuge on being surprised, early in the morning, while making a survey of the house, by a party of retainers coming to the rendezvous. Upon being spoken to, he moodily refused farther communication, except stating, that, being on the way to the ferry at Dumbarton, he had observed the mounted party, and, fearing personal injury, had taken refuge in the place where he had been detected.

The Maxwells, finding their enemy thus thrown unexpectedly into their power, behaved with the utmost moderation, even extending to kindness and hospitality; so that, between them and Skelmorly, a friendship—not very cordial, certainly—was formed, and afterwards maintained, although Montgomery himself did not fail to indulge in his feudal wrath against the rest of the Cuninghams, intensified by the cruel slaughter, two years after, of his friend, Hugh Montgomery, who by that time had succeeded to the Earldom of Eglinton, and was a young nobleman of fair and large stature. He was barbarously murdered, while crossing the Annock Water at Stewarton, by a party of the Cuninghams, headed by a brother of the Earl of Glencairn, Cuningham of Robertland, and other ruffians, who were afterwards obliged to flee the country for their misdeeds—although one grieves to say that some of them afterwards found favour in high quarters.

The Montgomeries, of course, amply revenged the death of the young Earl; and Skelmorly was not one whit behind the others in his sanguinary propensities. These outbreaks, however, did not exclude him from Court, as he became a favourite of James the Sixth of Scotland and First of England, and also of the unfortunate Charles I., by whom he was created a baronet. He married Lady Margaret Douglas before referred to, in whose praise Alexander Montgomery, the poet, framed his most beautiful sonnets, which, to a modern ear, are about as unintelligible as Welsh; and they both spent long and useful lives together—she having survived till 1624, and he till 1651. The memory of Sir Robert Montgomery and of his lady, Dame Margaret Douglas, is till this day fondly cherished in the district where they resided, as well on the mainland as in the island of Cumbrae, where the family had considerable property, and of which they were the ecclesiastical patrons. Sir Robert became very devotional in his latter years, and was said to have passed many hours, from time to time, within the church of Largs, in secret prayer, to atone for those early misdeeds connected with feudal contests. He built the beautiful aisle of the old church at Largs, called the Skelmorly Aisle, under which, all that was mortal of both he and his wife reposes; and erected a church in Cumbrae, having the family coat-of-arms emblazoned thereon, a portion of which may yet be seen in the manse-garden there.

The estates of Skelmorly came to be united with those of Eglinton in 1778, in the person of Hugh, twelfth Earl, who was Montgomery of Coilsfield before he succeeded to the title, and was a son of Lilius Montgomery, the heiress of Skelmorly. The lands which they held in Cumbrae have for long been the property of the Earl of Glasgow, and the Montgomeries are but seldom mentioned there now. Some of our readers, however, may frequent the beautiful new coast village on the Clyde, so well and favourably known by the name of the estate, and may not be displeased at us for telling this short tale of the House of Skelmorly.

THE MARCH OF MIND—FEMALE AUTHORSHIP.

'It is meat and drink to me to see a fool. By my troth!
They that have good wits have much to answer for.'

—Old Play.

THE world is getting far too clever. Whether is the electric telegraph, or are balloons or cheap publications, to blame for this? I think the last, decidedly; for these have grown and grown, and come upon us so fast and furious, that they have fairly turned the heads of the public generally. And now the writing-desk is as indispensable as the pocket-handkerchief; and stories, poems, and essays of all kinds, are manufactured by the bushel. For my part, I pity the moon-struck individuals who agonise in spirit to have their lucubrations inserted in one or other of these periodicals. But far more I pity the editors, who would really require the dustman's shovel and bin to gather and sweep away the mental rubbish daily carted to their doors. What a splendid bonfire might be made of these accumulated MSS. (sent to the various journals within the last six months), if brought together in one vast pile of sacrifice, on the approaching occasion of our Prince's marriage! This would be bringing rejected articles to light at last, and might do good in checking, for the future, the alarming growth of learned litter. But be this as it may, cleverness is assuredly running riot, and I am growing quite bewildered by it. Everybody has so much knowledge at his finger-ends, talks so much, and writes so much, and is altogether so superior, that my poor little modicum of brain cannot make head against it; and, like Dickens' Micawber, I feel fairly 'crushed.' Not a man or woman now can one meet in society, but is either a celebrity or fast becoming one. There is no such thing as silliness, or even mediocrity, to be had. The only difference lies in the walk wherein talent chooses to disport itself. Science, philosophy, politics, religion, the arts—it is all the same. In some one of these (if not in the whole!) every human being is a paragon and a phoenix. We never hear a plain, sensible remark now-a-days, which can be easily understood, such as 'Health is a great blessing,' or 'The French are mostly born in France,' but we are startled by queries on topics of mystifying difficulty—'What are your views touching the Atlantic telegraph?' 'Do you believe in the plurality of worlds?' or 'Have you studied the nebular hypothesis?'

Oh! it is dreadful to find one's self in company with some of these ready, determined literati, male and female, whose every word is a pearl or diamond of wit and wisdom! My only resource on such occasions is to sit perfectly still, my eyes fixed on the ground (to hide their vacancy!), in the pitiful hope that silence may perhaps pass for profundity. A sorry expedient which, I fear, imposes on nobody.

Authorship has made a tremendous start of late, owing, doubtless, to the multiplicity of feuilletons to be had at a nominal charge. And thus a whole crop of geniuses has suddenly emerged from darkness, like Minerva full armed from the caput of Jove. Like the goddess, too, in another sense; for the fair sex are grown rampant in the field of composition, and promise soon, by numbers at least, to leave their masters far behind. Yes, the ladies have at length risen en masse, and asserted their rights with a vengeance. Nothing escapes them. Their vaulting ambition overleaps every obstacle. They must be painters, poets, modellers, novelists, printers, artistes of all denominations—nay, some intrepid female is at this moment debating the claim to the degree of M.D. in one of our Scottish colleges! How is this to end? I must confess my wits, not remarkable at the first, are fairly set a woolgathering over the wonderful wits of these anti-Penelopes. There was once a time when woman owned three noble implements—her needle, her distaff, and her tongue. The fruit of the first was tapestry, of the second the thrifty homespun, and of the third—what shall we say but the kind wit and the cheerful song? Alas! the fine old spirit of our great-grandmothers (on hospitable cares attentive) is for the nonce extinct; and pens are going faster than ever went needle or distaff; while tongues, verily, are going too, more nimbly if possible—it may not always be so wisely or so well.

Every second book we take up is by an authoress. The cacoethes scribendi has spread like wildfire, and ladies seem to have most easily caught the infection. In some quarters the disease is so diffused as to be positively alarming. Some houses are rendered scarcely habitable by the literary plague. I was staying lately with a female friend. Her husband, a shrewd, sensible man, labours in the vocation of the law; his wife, a quondam school companion, I had not seen for years. I remembered her as rather a smart, comely girl, without any pretence whatever to literary talent. To my surprise I found that she and her three daughters had simultaneously fallen foul of the authorship mania, and were immersed in its meshes at all possible and impossible hours. At first the trade was carried on in a somewhat smuggling manner, as a thing not to be rashly revealed to a stranger, and for a few days I was considerably puzzled by what I saw and heard. For example, I could not help noticing that the mother would frequently slip some article surreptitiously into her pocket if I came upon her at unawares. This, I afterwards discovered, was her note-book in which she registered her thoughts ('wipe saws and modern instances!') fresh as they arose. Then Janet, Catherine, and Maria were all floundering in the same learned whirlpool. And I was frequently made the unwilling auditor of curious enough styles of dialogue between the sisters. 'What is Hubert doing now?' 'He is living in London à-cognito, prowling about at nights, robbing right and left, garotting whenever he finds opportunity.' 'Is James going to marry Susan?' 'Nonsense! Don't you know he has murdered her brother and run away to Australia?' 'Oh! has he? That is delightful!'

Gradually the truth broke upon me, that these horrors were but harmless fictions in which the several members of the family were engaged. Yet though the veil was withdrawn, matters did not mend much. The worthy paterfamilias, indeed, seemed, on the whole, amused with the turn of affairs. But when shirts wanted buttons, or spice had been forgotten in the padding, his eye would glance in a serio-comic way at the shoals of cheap publications scattered about, as though he would say, 'These be thy gods, O Israel!' and then he would call out, good-humouredly, for redress of his grievances. I am not aware whether any of these ladies has yet been in print, but, of course, they all expect to be. The end of it was that, seeing everybody's mind was pre-occupied, my presence was manifestly a bore, so I cut short my visit.

But this literary madness has grown so great, and authorship so universal, that the only consolation left for luckless imbeciles like myself is this—that celebrities will soon be so common that incapables will become famous from their very rarity. When things reach to a certain pitch, a reaction must follow, and we appear fast verging to the period when people who have done positively nothing, either in science, literature, or art, will be the lions and lionesses of society. That will be the golden era, when the poor little small-witted creatures, who have long been ignored, will stand out in bold relief from the great number who have more or less created names for themselves. The reign of talent will cease; cleverness will be a byword and a reproach; and the man or woman who has never written a single line beyond a weak gossiping epistle, or an innocent card of invitation, will, from the mere scarcity of the order, be hailed with respect and applause! It is this thought alone that supports me and my compeers of like mean calibre at the present crisis. Every fashion in which the world has indulged meets revulsion at a set point, and darts off to the opposite extreme. And so, when the craze of authorship has attained its end, the worn-out faculties of a too precocious generation will seek relief in the delights of inanity and idleness.

Till then, I must be content to creep along in twilight privacy, anticipating the happier day-dawn when success will be at an enormous premium, and cheap publications—that did the heaviest part of the mischief—will all have died a natural death for sheer lack of readers—the whole world, with one or two noble exceptions, having sunk ignominiously into nothing!

JANE C. SIMPSON.

A SONNET

In Memoriam DAVID GRAY, Author of 'The Luggie' and other Poems. Died 3d Dec. 1861.

Oh, rare young soul! Thou wast of such a mould
As could not bear the poet's painful power!
Hence, in the sweet spring-tide of opening power,
Ere yet the gathering breeze of song had rolf'd
Out on the world its music manifold,
Death gently hush'd the harp, lest storm or shower—
Which surely life had brought some later hour—
Should snap the quivering strings or rust their gold;
Yet not the less shall tender memories dwell
In those sweet notes—and sad as sweet they seem—
Which from the burning touch of boyhood fell;
But long as little Luggie winds her stream,
And the twin Bothin prattles down the dell,
Thither shall many a pilgrim turn and dream!

ALSAGER HAY HILL.

A VISIT TO THE DELPHS OF STOURTON.

A SKETCH IN THE HUNDRED OF WIRRAL.

WHAT is a 'delph' you ask? What sort of a place can it be? Is it a pottery, where they manufacture the gorgeously figured earthenware one sees in country houses? Is it a factory or what?—a man or a fish? Easy, my good friend, easy. Come with me a little way up this sheltered sandy lane, and you shall see what you shall see; perhaps something you will think worth the seeing, and which shall explain to you both what a delph is, and what men do in it.

Just a little way up the side of this wall—for we are at the lower end of the old fox-cover which clothes the top of Stourton Hill—along here, under the shelter of the trees, a great advantage this sharp March day, and we shall reach the place we are to visit. Before we start, however, just look over there, downwards towards the river; you can see the Mersey, fair before you, for miles. It is a glorious stretch of vision even now, and you shall go far to find its equal, though it is only the bleak March sun which fitfully brightens it. The face of the country is bare and brown, the trees and hedgerows are leafless, the fields freshly turned over by the plough, and the pastures bleached and gray under their annual top-dressing. It is true you can already find the early sweetly-scented violet in sheltered corners, and it may be a fragrant spring primrose; but to-day it seems as if mother Nature were waiting for some more genial time ere she breaks the winter cerements of her darlings—the rough north-wester which is piping about our ears, and swelling through these sombre woods, would give but a rude and boisterous salute to the delicate offspring of the early spring. All the country is astir, however. You hear the sound of hearty labour on every side, and people may be seen busy in the fields below us. The farmers are in the full bustle of seed-time, the plough and harrows are going cheerily here and there, and the sower with the seed in his bosom is pacing his steady monotonous course up and down the ridges, scattering the precious seed which he is committing to the earth in hope.

The river is full of tall ships to-day; there are scores beneath the eye lying lazily at anchor. They are not, you can see, all in holiday trim; you perceive topmasts gone, ravelled rigging, tangled masses of cordage, and great seeming disarray on the usual slender and regular tracery of the spars. But see the trim all-atraught ships have not entirely disappeared either, neither are the great steamers awanting. Look below towards the right, you can recognise by the squareness of the yards, the loftiness of the spars, and the trim order of every part, how smart and ship-shape that vessel is. She is a clipper, famous even among clippers, and makes wonderful voyages to the uttermost ends of the earth; lower down lies her opponent, more out into the stream you can perceive her—second to none her owners say; both are preparing to start on a race round the world, and as eagerly betted on as ever was horse on race-course. Yes, there are some Marco Polos and Red Jackets in the river yet; but the great mass of vessels below there are the ordinary quiet merchant traders, whose names and characters few care anything about, and which yet are the centres round which many anxieties and fears revolve, and for whose safety many a heart yearns from year to year. There is a navy in the Mersey to-day, of which any nation under the sun might well be proud, and it is well worthy of a glance from this mount of vision, even though it be when a fierce March gale is blowing.

Our path lies up the lane, towards the crown of the ridge. Do you hear that clear, ringing sound of metal? and there, again, the sound of human voices from the centre of the woods, though the sounds 'Hee-ho! hee-ho!' seem hardly human that comes from the leader of one of the gangs? We shall speedily get an explanation. A rude gateway breaks the wall, and the trees terminate at this point; and, for a considerable distance, all is bare. Going in, we come to an immense excavation in the rock, some forty or fifty feet beneath the level of the lane. A huge irregular hole of great extent it is—most eccentric in its shape. This is the delph. You see what it is now. A great freestone quarry. And this great gulf, which yawns so threateningly, is the place whence most of the white freestone pillars and cornices you have admired in the buildings of Liverpool and Birkenhead have been hewn. And, see! we are in luck to-day. There are two operations going on. We shall see both the 'facing,' as these men call the process of clearing away the useless stone at top, and the more legitimate work of the delph itself—getting the huge blocks of building-stone out of its depths.

You perceive, throughout the excavation, a number of great, black; long-armed cranes, whose heavy chains dangle in the air, having winches and windlasses attached. Look how they are secured, with long heavy slugs of wood, to the sides of the quarry. See that hardy, strong-headed fellow, walking along one of them. It is well nigh forty feet long, and but three inches wide, and it sways a little from side to side as he walks; while there is nothing between it and the bottom of the quarry—full sixty feet below! Yet he keeps his footing, firmly and well, and seems so careless that you would fancy the heavy iron bolt and hammer which he carries would overbalance him at once.

On the top, and just at our feet, the 'facers' are at work baring the rock; and below, some sixty feet or more, a gang of the regular delph-men are cutting out the huge blocks which are to form portions of some palatial building. All here are as busy as bees, and they go about their work as systematically, though, it may be, somewhat more noisily.

About a score of men are 'facing.' Let us descend to their level. We see the rock is friable, and breaks off easily in very thin layers, which gradually increase in thickness as they descend. We see there is a thorough division of labour here—some are breaking up the rock with heavy pickaxes; some filling wheelbarrows; and others do nothing else but run these barrows up and down the narrow gangways—hard enough work, you will say, for the planks slope very steeply. And this goes on from day to day, the men only too happy if it shall continue steadily for weeks or months together. These two men are the chief of this 'facing' gang. They work as hard, or harder, than the others; yet they are the gaffers of the job, and are responsible both to the proprietors of the quarry for the performance of the work, and to the men for their weekly wages.

But they seem to be in consultation, and are busied about something close at hand. One is laying aside, just now, a coil, as it appears, of small blue cord; while the other is actually striking a lucifer-match. What is it they are doing, or are about to do? Before you can ask, almost, 'Fire!' shouts the one over the side of the rock into the gulf below; and 'Fire!' echoes the other to the men busy above, as he kindles the blue fuse and scampers off after the rest. The fuse is long enough to allow the men above to get out of harm's way; at least all but Big Bill, who is perched on the top of the crane. Big Bill takes it very coolly, and sinks down and hides, as best he may, behind the solid upright—finding a precarious foothold how he can on the heads of the bolts. After a short interval of expectation, there comes a dull, stifled report. You feel a slight tremor of the earth under foot; and all is over. It is very disappointing this blast, you say; there has been nothing to see, and apparently nothing to be afraid of either—for, save one small piece of the rock cast far into the delph—narrowly missing, by the way, the head of our friend Big Bill, who was peeping out cautiously from his lofty perch, there is no other evidence of the explosion; but let us look at the bed of rock on which we were standing a few minutes ago, and we shall find it rent and shattered, and see smoke issuing from myriad chinks and crevices; for the whole bed, for a foot in depth or even more, is loosened and broken up, and can now be removed with ease, and you hear the men congratulating themselves on having had so good a blast.

Descend we this ladder at the corner; it is rather frail and shaky, but it will carry us safely, never fear, to the lower shelf of the rock, on which a few of the quarrymen are clustering. See, one of these men—he who is busy there with the crowbar—is beckoning to us to come. Be sure he has got something strange to show us.

'What is it, Joe?' we ask. 'Have you found any thing to-day?'

'I spects so only way,' Joe answered. 'There allays sumthin' that you gentilefolk likes to see in the lift; leaseways, there have been, and I guesses there sumthin' here now.'

The shelf on which we were standing is a part of the rock newly bared by the labourers; you see how much of useless rubbish they have had to wheel off before reaching the valuable stone; these natural walls, some twenty feet deep, have been cut by the down to the flagstone lift—a bed thicker, sounder and more coherent than those above it, though not itself the solid rock. The men are shelling it off, you see, in horizontal slices; they have cut grooves along the sides and across it, in lengths of thirty feet, and then, with wedges, they have cut these into veritable flags. Our old friend the gaffer is here, busily superintending, and we must go and pay our respects to him by-and-by; at present we shall attend to Joe and his huge flag, when we shall see something worth going much farther to see.

The men tilt the flag up on edge. It is raised so far that we can see both the bed of clay (fullers' earth) on which it has lain for untold ages, and the lower face of the stone itself. 'Tis but a rough, coarse piece of stone, you say. Well, so it is; but let us look a little closer. The under side is marked with ridges, running parallel with the trend of Stourton Hill. You can clearly see that—telling as plainly as printed book that this height, long before the hundreds of successive beds above, which you can clearly see on the perpendicular wall behind, were formed—was a shallow tide-way, where the waters ebbed and flowed, and the sand could settle and consolidate, preserving the distinct ripples of each successive deposition. Look here, moreover, at those small wart-like spots sticking out from this flag. These are the impressions of rain-drops, which fell on this hill thousands of years ago, before men were heard of in Cheshire! You can see the matrix, the veritable dimple of the rain-drop, in the firm clay below! So this stone tells us, you see, that there was a heavy shower of rain on the shores of the lagoon or sandy estuary, long long ago, when the wind was blowing, as to-day, at north-west! The faithful mould and cast show to us the very depth to which the rain-drops penetrated; and thus records them, for the enlightenment of these later ages, as with an iron pen in the rock, till now they are disclosed—read them who may.

But here is something more wonderful, at least more noticeable, still. What is that bluff blunt mark, as if of five thick stumpy fingers, and the fleshy ball of a hand? You perceive it there on the flag, and again the cast of it in the clay, whence it has just been raised; and there, a little farther on, is its counterpart—not an exact fac-simile, however, for the two seem as if casts of different hands, and the impressions as if of the right and left alternately. You can almost fancy some human being sprawling up this hillside, before time began to be counted by ages, walking on his hands, as we see boys doing now for their amusement. In advance of each larger and deeper impression, there is seen a smaller one, less deeply impressed, of the same shape and nature, only so much less, that, but for the regular way in which it occurs beside the former, you would think them traces of a distinct creature. What can these be, you ask? Well, if these slight ridges be the marks of trampling water, and those little spots the pits which heavy rain-drops have made; if this hillside, unknown ages ago, was the shore of a sandy lagoon, what do these marks add to our knowledge of the aspect of affairs here in that unknown time? Something—not a very great deal perhaps, but yet something—and that of interest too; for they tell us that this country had inhabitants, and, in so far, what sort of creatures these inhabitants were!

This world of ours was tenanted, long ago, by races of living creatures which are now extinct. We have here an evidence that this hillside once formed the shore of a lake or estuary, and was visited by organised beings now altogether unknown. Strange creatures lived and enjoyed life on this hillside, perhaps fished in the waters, certainly stalked along the muddy shores, and passed away without leaving any further trace of their existence than is found in these stones before us; yet here we have irrefragable proof that they lived and moved in this very country! Of little moment all this to us now; certainly of very little to these men, who stand about gaping in wonder at the marks, which instinctively they call hands, and half suspect were made by some of the antediluvians before the flood. Yet here is handed down, to these late generations, a record of a life and mode of progression which, as regards the most mighty of the earth, are entirely wanting. As Dr. Buckland very beautifully said of the tracks of tortoises on the kindred rocks of Scotland:—

'The historian or the antiquary may have traversed the fields of ancient or of modern battles, and may have pursued the line of march of triumphant conquerors, whose armies trampled down the most mighty kingdoms of the world. The winds and storms have utterly obliterated the ephemeral impressions of their course. Not a track remains of a single foot, or a single hoof of all the countless millions of men and beasts whose progress spread desolation over the earth. But the reptiles that crawled upon the half-finished surface of our infant planet have left memorials of their passage enduring and indelible.

No history has recorded their creation or destruction; their very bones are found no more among the fossil relics of a former world. Centuries and thousands of years may have rolled away between the time in which these footsteps were impressed by tortoises upon the sands of their native Scotland, and the hour when they are again laid bare, and exposed to our curious and admiring eyes. Yet we behold them stamped upon the rock, distinct as the track of the passing animal upon the recent snow, as if to show that thousands of years are but as nothing amidst eternity, and as it were in mockery of the fleeting, perishable course of the mightiest potentates among mankind.'

In only one other place in the world, so far as yet known, have foot-prints similar to these been discovered. In Germany, when the marks were first found, the creature which had made them was named by the geologists the Cheirotherium, or the hand-beast, and supposed to be allied to the Marsupialia, an existing race of which the Kangaroo is the typical form, and has the same construction of its members.

'The large impressions, which appear to be those of the hind feet, are usually eight inches in length and five in breadth. About an inch and a-half before each of these impressions, a smaller print of a fore-foot, four inches long and three inches wide, occurs.

The foot-marks follow each other in pairs, each pair in the same line at an interval of fourteen inches between each pair; and though the fore and hind feet differ so considerably in size, they are nearly similar in form, and the impressions show the great toe alternately on the right and left side, each step making the print of five toes—the first or great toe being bent like a thumb.'

But we cannot delay, to-day, with further speculations as to this creature, however curious the details may be. Let us descend into the lowest part of the delph, and there also we shall find something worth seeing. Look here first, however, at the work now going on. This is a sawyer, in the language of the quarry; and cutting those long narrow trenches or gutters is sawing. Very painful and laborious work it seems to be, from the positions in which he must place himself in order to hew, with that sharp heavy pick, those narrow channels. Now he begins with two slight scratches at top, and anon he has descended two or three feet, till he comes upon a strongly marked bed, which will permit the stone to be raised with greater ease, and in a squarer and firmer block. You see him, poor unfortunate! with one leg buried in the gutter by the debris he has made, and the other stretched sprawling out before him, hewing as if for bare life, and jarring his arms, you are apt to fancy, with every stroke. Notice how deliberately he strikes, and with what regularity and success. You would not think it, but he will hew you out a length of forty or fifty feet, by one in depth, day by day, though each blow of his pick only brings away small splinters of the rock. Take the pick in your hand, and try its weight. What think you of it? You see how straight, compact, and sharp it is, and how weighty withal. You could not, at his price per score, make salt to your porridge; while he earns good wages, as wages go in this country—some four or five shillings a-day if he be diligent. Were Tom steady he might do very well, and save money; but Tom likes a day's play now and then, and takes it, so that he rarely, one week with another, earns more than three shillings a-day.

Try a stroke with the pick; it is heavy and requires considerable effort to wield it, and your arms tingle after your first awkward blow. But there is one thing you have not seen, my friend—that is, that all the men are grinning in anticipatory pleasure. I am free of the delph already; but you, unlucky wight! have not been made free of this corporation, and you must pay for it now. Here comes Big Bill, the butler, for your 'footing.' You know, everybody who touches tools here for the first time must pay for it; so you can't escape the time-honoured observance. Pay it cheerfully, therefore; it will be all the better for you; besides, it is only the price of a gallon or two of beer, and will not break you. So we shall send John Carrier for the proper allowance; and being now both freemen we may do as we like, and we shall be sure of respectful and civil treatment wherever we go.

Let us descend still lower, in the meantime, to the place whence comes the sound of ringing iron and cracking stone. It is full thirty feet beneath us yet Even on this ledge the atmosphere is singularly still and mild—there does not seem to be the slightest breath of air,—while the gale is blowing so freshly overhead that you can hear it whistling and howling amid the trees. If this excavation is so still and close to-day, what must its state be in those fiery days of summer, when the sun pours nearly vertical rays right down on the heads of these half-naked men! One can hardly wonder that they should long to escape to the shady woods, to enjoy the fresh breeze, even though they carry with them, as an additional charm, the odour of beer and tobacco, and end the day's pleasure by becoming 'very full,' as themselves say. Across this ledge of yellow rock, and we reach the level of the railway, on the verge of the wall, which carries the heavy working cranes with which the waggons and carts are loaded. You see these cranes in every sort of position—one subservient to another, so as to economise labour as extensively as possible.

Still below us are a number of busy men. You see a single plank, of some nine inches wide, stretched along the face of the rock, resting on iron levers firmly inserted into the solid mass. This is a gateway for the workmen, narrow and unsteady, affording very temporary footing indeed; and you would hardly like to trust yourself on it empty-handed; but look at these men hewing out narrow wedge holes, or driving home the wedges with hammers of forty or fifty pounds weight, and admire how steadily, yet carelessly, they stand on the frail staging. It does not cost them a thought or a care; and the ringing sound of the iron tells you how boldly and heartily they strike, constrained as is the position in which they stand, and you hear the crack of the stone, as blow after blow rends it from its old bed. All this time the cranes are never idle, but are busy clearing the piece of rock which they are about to raise from the remnants of the last lift. You hear the cry, 'Ware the chain!' at intervals, and observe the men, on the stage or in the gutters, moving out of the way of danger, lingering till the last moment ere they leave, and jumping back to their work again before the place is well cleared of chain or stone. Cranes give way, chains slip and break sometimes; but, on the whole, serious accidents are rare here, though the danger is great every hour, and familiarity with danger, and the long run of good fortune, have made these fellows careless and daring. The incessant creaking of the chains, the clear ringing strokes of the heavy hammers on the iron wedges, and the dull monotonous strokes of the pick, make a medley of sounds, not harmonious indeed, but very fit from disagreeable.

'Weight here, ho!' you suddenly hear, shouted by one whose steadiness and power you have been admiring, as he wielded the huge hammer on the precarious gateway along the face of the rock. 'Hi muckle!' is asked by one of the gaffers, whose pronunciation tells his country. 'All,' is the reply, and immediately you see the men scrambling from the depths beneath and down from the heights above. A few long heavy iron bars have been inserted in the wedge-holes in the face of the rock, and upon these the men throw themselves as best they may, while two stand by ready, with wedges and hammer, to secure every inch of vantage that may be gained. It is a difficult piece of work this, but the men manage it carefully and well. Some of them mount on the levers, others throw themselves over the chasm, hanging to the bars with their hands; and now, again you hear the strange sound, 'Hee-ho! hee-ho!' which a little while ago puzzled you. To this the men move in unison, endeavouring to shake the lift free from its bed, while quick sharp blows make sure of what is gained at each shake and forth-putting of their united strength. The rending of the rock is much more palpable now; you hear it giving way with each effort of the men. It takes, however, a considerable time and many efforts before these experienced men pronounce the lift thoroughly loosened and fit for the after operations; and there is, by this simple process, some hundred or hundred and fifty tons of stone freed from its tenacious bed, and ready to be cut up as may be most desirable.

There is no idleness here, and the men are on the point of returning to their places again, when the welcome sight of John Carrier is seen in the lane, and some intimates to him the whereabouts of his comrades, which brings him down into the quarry by a backneck road at the farther end. Your 'footing,' my friend, has now arrived, and it gives to those strong, hearty fellows the chance of a quarter of an hour's rest and a pint of their much-loved beer, which they esteem to be more desirable still than rest.

On beams of a dismantled crane, on the rock, or stretched at length on the sandy debris, the group of men are speedily gathered to wait the arrival of the carrier; and all, with hardly an exception, begin to smoke such black cutties as you will not see so many together every day. The carrier of all the beer consumed in the delph, John Jokes, is a short, stout, broad-shouldered fellow; and he comes along, as you can hear, with the tread of a giant, and as you would fancy, also, with a giant's load, two great stone bottles—the biggest on his shoulder, the other in his hand. You did not dream, my friend, of such a quantity; but the butler shall explain it to you. He says, 'It was as well to have a quart apiece when they were at it; and so they have added an extra pint apiece, 'on the strap,' to your more modest order.' John Carrier's office is now over, and he falls back into his own place among his comrades.

Big Bill, the butler of the delph par excellence, takes charge now, and proceeds gravely to distribute the liquor, according to rigid and unalterable rule and custom. A half-pint measure is filled, and handed first of all to you, as the stranger. You must drink with them, my friend, otherwise their dignity would be hurt, and they have plenty of that sort of thing about them, these roughs; next come the turn of the gaffers, and so on it travels in regular rotation. There is no hurry, no bustle, no grumbling nor quarrelling; is very well known while they are in the quarry, though the majority seem to attach none to its lapse when out of it.

While the beer is 'being decanted and consumed, you might, if an artist, make an admirable sketch; for albeit beer-drinking is one of the most prosaic of all pastimes or occupations, it is not every day that you will find such an assemblage of thews and sinews in such careless disarray of dress and attitude. There you have the butler himself for a centre figure—big, brawny, and bronzed by sun and weather—in blue striped linen frock, all marked and mailed with the iron and the sand, with sleeves tucked up above the elbows, displaying the hand and arm of a Hercules, and open at the breast and neck, giving a view of chest and throat red with exposure, which does not in any way belie the promise of the arm and hand. Here, stretched at length on the sand, with short black pipe in his mouth, is a figure that would make a guardaman envious, though his dress is only shirt and trousers, neither of the cleanest nor the most sound; but he is so tall, so graceful, and withal so athletic, even despite his clownish habits. There, again, is an older, lesser man, whose shoulders are most portentously developed, and whose bust displays the hard, firm outline of habitual and severe out-door labour; he is a sawyer, a cutter of gutters in the rock, and has been most of his life employed in hewing out those nine-inch wide trenches; hence the development of his arms. But each man here is a study, and, together, the group is physically interesting. It is a great pity that as much cannot be said for the intellectual as for the physical qualifications of the group. Education is rather at a discount among these people, it must be confessed. It is a most interesting time; a fierce war is raging, in which Englishmen take the deepest interest; but the only references to it you hear are the most wild and impossible conjectures. Yet they are not wanting in a desire to know, either. Just address them on the subject, and see how eagerly they will listen, and how earnestly they will wish you to tell them more. You would be surprised at many things they do know, however. Few, if any, can read, and to do a sum in any of the simplest rules of arithmetic far passes their ability; but they will read you off lists of measurements which would puzzle you, mathematician as you are, to easily understand, and tell you the cubical feet in a block of stone almost before you knew how to set about its discovery.

But the bottles are empty, and the men proceed to their labours once more. With the vigour of giants they swing about the heavy cranes, with blocks of many tons' weight depending from them; shoulder their picks and levers; and soon the delph resounds with the old familiar sounds of strenuous, hearty labour. Let us proceed along the level of the railway, if we desire to form some idea of the whole of the works which are being carried on in the bosom of Stourton Hill.

Passing down the cutting, the breeze blows freshly long enough to explore the south quarry, which is idle just now, so we hasten on, along the tramway, through a tunnel of considerable length—which, one day, years ago, was a hall of feasting, when the then proprietors of the hill first connected the delph with the Mersey by this railway, from which we emerge on other excavations, but deserted and vacant now, and have free vision once more, looking right down upon the upper part of the Mersey, which, with the Powder Magazines in the distance, lies full before us. At this point, we come upon another branch of delph labour, much less frequently seen than stone-getting. You have been puzzled to account for blocks of stones lying about you, and wonder why they have been cast down so carelessly and profusely here. What are they for?

Look here, my friend, and you shall see. Observe you this hut, ugly and ruinous as it seems? Well, here is a manufactory. It is quite close to the rails; and piled in open squares alongside are heaps of gray and red and brown pieces of stone, about a foot in length, which, at first, you cannot make out at all; but if you look a little closer and lift one piece in your hand, you will soon discover that these are whetstones for scythes and other rude cutting instruments. This almost roofless hut is the place where these are manufactured. When you enter, you find this is a dilapidated forge, with a smith's hearth, bellows, anvil, and a few tools; on the same hearth there is a huge cauldron, while on the opposite side are two large oblong slabs of freestone placed at a considerable angle, in great tubs of steaming water, at which two dirty women are working busily with an oblong piece of stone in each hand, rubbing them quickly and with a peculiar uniform sweep upon the large slab before them, dipping hands and pieces into the water at every descending sweep. On the other side, are two men equally busy, with curious picks of fantastic shapes, and hammers and wedges so small, that they look like children's toys after those we saw in the delph yonder. The picks are quite curiosities in their way, the points bent sharply inward and tipped with the finest steel; and did you not see them in use, you could never imagine for what purpose they were intended; but with them, used most deftly and rapidly, you see the solid masses divided, and subdivided, with a facility which is quite marvellous. The noise made in rubbing the sets, or roughly shaped pieces of stone, with the swash of the water which follows each descending sweep, drowns all the rest. The hut is rude and rather repulsive at first sight; but the material, when manufactured, is by no means so, and those piles out of doors may be safely and cleanly handled.

You would hardly think it, yet it is true, that a great trade is carried on in these small articles; and hundreds of grosses—for they disdain to count by any lesser numbers on Stourton Hill—are manufactured and sent all over the country—all over the world, in fact; for the whetstones made here are celebrated. It is quite surprising, too, how well they pay all the people concerned—the price for each seems so ridiculously small, and what good wages both men and women can earn. A cubic foot of stone, which costs fourpence or fivepence, is cut up into some sixteen whetstones, each of which is surely well worth sixpence. A good example this of how greatly labour enhances the value of material, when even the finished product is so rude.

Two miles lower down is the port of the delph, on Bromborough Pool. Here are shipped all the stone, which is carried by water to Liverpool or elsewhere, in the river vessels; while, close at hand, there is connection with a line of railway, giving access to all quarters of England.

But the day grows colder as we reach the wharf, and it is time for us to go homewards, however much we may be interested in the great works and what belongs to them, or in the grand panorama before us, of which you seem never to tire. It is becoming too raw and cold on this hillside to stay longer. Besides, my landlady is a real imperious Cheshire woman, and if her cakes and cates be spoiled, woe betide us! So let us hasten upward, homeward once more. But at least your afternoon travel has not been altogether without interest; you have learned something, and know now what a delph is, and how they work out on Stourton Hill.

A MOHAMMEDAN'S SONG.

I CARE not for the deep red wines
In purple beads that roll;
I care not for the luscious lip
Of golden-crust'd bowl.

For these the Prophet has forbid,
That all men's lives be pure;
And sea-green stones shall deck the brow
Of those who, strong, endure.

But I would climb the white, white hills
Of heaven's resplendent plain,
To toy in dreamy dalliance with
The maiden's golden train;

To wreath the long and fragrant hair;
To kiss the rosy mouth,
While her breath would linger o'er my cheek,
Like the warm wind of the south.

Oh white, white are the hills of heaven;
And dear the damsel's eyes;
And pure the snowy bosoms that
In laughter fall and rise!

Oh fragrant are the cassia groves;
And welcome all the shade
That deepens under cedar boughs
To bless the blushing maid!

I weary all the afternoon,
I weary all the day;
The sun falls straight, my mouth is parch'd;
I long to be away

Where blood-red rose-leaves lie in beds,
And lilies, wan and pale,
Stand sprinkled with the perfumed dew
That sleeps in shaded vales;

Where murmur of the falling stream
Comes softly through the trees,
And tinkling of the maidens' lutes
Enwraps the gentle breeze.

O come, thou sweetly-dying day!
When silver wings shall rise
To bear me to thy ripe repasts
And groves, O Paradise!

ANENT THE DECIPHERING OF AN ANCIENT INSCRIPTION.*

INSCRIPTIONS may be termed the bones of history; and the whole body of monumental literature belonging to a country may aptly be designated its historical skeleton. Those records have to do uniformly with great facts, and these they narrate in the simplest words and most direct manner. Tradition, ballad literature, written chronicles, form themselves frequently upon and around these, and give to history its fulness and hue; but without the more simple framework, these in many cases could not have existence, or, at most, could convey no meaning. It is therefore of the last importance that we should be able to decipher these inscriptions with reliable accuracy. Our appreciation of this truth induces us to offer our contribution towards the deciphering of an ancient inscription, which has given rise to much learned, and, we trust we may be excused for saying, profitless conjecture. The work whose title we prefix to this article is wholly devoted to assigning a meaning to six simple lines; and its author brings to bear on the subject an amount of diligence and research and learning, which we frankly confess reflects credit on his age and country. Not the less, we believe, he has not only utterly failed to exhibit the true meaning of the monumental record, but has actually, by virtue of his very learning, gone far out of his way to give a construction quite untrustworthy, and, in point of fact, 'ab ovo que ad malum,' erroneous.

It is proper that we should submit to your readers the inscription, in a form as nearly as possible as the simile of the original record:—

HEYDIDDLEDDIDDLE!
THECATANDTHEFIDDLE;
THECOUIUMPEDOVERTHEMOON;
THELITTLEDOGLAUGH'D
TOSEESUCHFINESPORT;
ANDTHEDISHRANAWAYWITHESPOON.'

The true rendering, then, of these six simple (we venture to call them simple) lines is the end aimed at in Mr. Brown's learned work. We have already said we think he has signally failed in his attempt; yet it is due to such a man that we should show cause for the judgment we have arrived at, and, following the example of the learned Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, when recently reviewing some new translation of Homer, not only point out the errors into which our author has fallen, but ourselves propound a theory and a translation, which we, in turn, willingly submit to critical analysis.

In order to enable the learned reader to estimate the value of our labours, it is necessary we should give a brief historical sketch of the inscription, and incidentally indicate the steps which have led us to the conclusions regarding it at which we have arrived.

It appears, then, that Messrs. Brown, Jones, and

* Inscriptio Antiqua in Agro Bruttiorum Nuper Reperta.
Edidit et Interpretatus est Joh: Brownius. Oxon: 1862.

Robinson, while travelling in Germany, chanced to meet with the celebrated Baron Munchausen, who presented them with the inscription, averring that it was copied from an ancient Calabrian monument. The task of deciphering the transcript was devolved on Brown; and he forthwith betook himself to the study of Mommsen and Huschke, in order to attain as much knowledge as can be attained in regard to the Oscan and Umbrian dialects. The result of these researches is that he presents us with the following rendering:—

'Hecus give willingly, willingly;
God (is) propitious, God (is) favourable;
God partaker of eggs at the cross-road, God of the world;
God chose kindly for atonement a kid; (and)
Once, to be carried within the precincts,
God, twice sprinkled, blesses the truth of Divine libation.'

Your space forbids that we should give even a summary of the steps which led Mr. Brown to the conclusions at which he has arrived; we have said we challenge these, and we think it due to him, and to the classical world, to give our reasons for the judgments we have formed. We venture, then, to think that our author has fallen into two utterly fundamental errors in the course of his inquiry; the latter, and probably the more serious, resulting from the former.

It was obviously of the last importance that there should be no ambiguity at all as to the locality of the monument whence the famous transcript was made, and, by consequence, of the tongue in which the inscription was expressed. But we venture to think that Mr. Brown has not taken the steps to verify this which were easily within his power, and which it was incumbent on him to take. There are, we are glad to say, scholars yet in Italy, and in very Calabria, who would gladly have lent their aid; but, so far as we can discover from the work, Mr. Brown has not put himself in communication with any of these, but relies with undoubting simplicity on the averments of the Baron.

It becomes, then, a matter of supreme necessity that we should know what amount of credit is due to the Baron; and it is here, we think, Mr. Brown makes his first great error. In a case of this kind, where historical truth is concerned, all false delicacy must give way; and, in consideration of this, we cannot refrain from saying that we have heard doubts insinuated as to the Baron's absolute veracity. We have heard it suggested, even, that although probably incapable of falsifying from any low or selfish motive, he was addicted to the vulgar habit of practical joking; and that the primary inference from the Baron's statement is that the inscription is not Calabrian.

We have said we would shortly indicate the steps which led us to the true rendering of this inscription. In this suggestion, then, as to the Baron's credibility, lies the germ or first principle of all our succeeding labours. It was, indeed, the start-point of that course of inquiry whose results enable us, with, we trust, pardorable confidence, to say, 'Exegi monumentum.' 'I have worked out' (Egi ex) 'the monument.' And in so doing, may we humbly hope we have erected a not indecorous little cenotaph for ourselves.

'Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime;
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints in the sands of time.

Assuming, then, the Baron's character to be such as we have indicated, we ask the candid reader what language would most naturally suggest itself to him as being that in which the inscription was couched? Would it not be the very vernacular of the parties at whose expense the Baron was disporting himself. We do not blame Mr. Brown for not perceiving this; a scholar himself, and a severe one, he had no suspicion of the 'fides' of his informant—thus easily and naturally were we, however, conveyed to the conclusion that the inscription was English.

Every one who has occupied himself in the task of deciphering ancient MSS. and inscriptions, knows that when the language of the record has been ascertained, the back of the difficulty is broken. We come now, then, to Mr. Brown's second error. Not perceiving the language of the inscription, and no one language thought of by him giving even a plausible sense, he has been reduced to the necessity of commingling at least three tongues, viz. Latin, Greek, and an unknown element—as he supposes, Oscan or Umbrian. This is unphilosophical in the extreme. We know he has Huscshke's authority for it in his rendering of the inscription from the Engubine monument; but not the less are we convinced that the principle is unsound. This principle will extract a sense from any markings, however nonsignificant. It is well known to geologists and philologists that there is a peculiar sort of granite, found in Arabia, and on the coast of Banffshire, known as 'graphic granite.' In this rock the silica is arranged in thin semi-lucent lines, and appears against the red felspar as if it were tracings made by hand. An enthusiastic traveller brought well-marked specimens home from Arabia, and submitted them to the most famous decipherers; and they, by dint of this licence so freely used by Mr. Brown, by borrowing letters and words from every language with cuneiform characters, did manage to extort a sort of meaning from the flinty bosom of the rock. But further inquiry dissipated their conjectural renderings into empty air; all that is left of their labours being simply the significant epithet applied to the stone.

When we name these two errors, we exhaust all with which we have to charge our author, but we submit they are fatal. With several of his canons of criticism we cordially concur; and, indeed, candour compels us to acknowledge that we are indebted to him for some very valuable suggestions. In particular, we would intimate our obligations to him for suggesting the importance of accurately ascertaining the sense of the first word of the inscription. This, in most cases, is a proper name; and when this is known, it is almost a key to all that follows. He, it will be observed, assumes it to be equal to Heius—a character referred to by Cicero; and, in ignorance of the true language of the inscription, probably no more plausible guess could have been made. But assuming the language to be English, the process of interpretation is easy. There is but one English surname like Hey, namely that of the noble family of Errol. In Scotland this is familiarly pronounced not Hay but Hey. The inscription is then probably Lowland Scotch, and applies to some event which occurred not far from Luncarty, in Perthshire—the hereditary home of the Hays. Now, at first sight we surmise the date to be somewhere about the fourteenth century. This we conclude from the following data:—(1st), Surnames were not in use in Scotland long before this. (2d), Monumental inscriptions recording historical facts do not occur of a much later date. (3d), The employment of the pronoun 'The' as a designation of the head of a clan or house, indicates a time when the Highland chiefs were known by semi-Saxon designations. The language, then, is fairly inferred to be old Lowland Scotch; and the monument, standing on the border land between Lowlands and Highlands, it most probably records some foray of a Highland clan upon their Low-country neighbours.

Before proceeding to give our own rendering of the inscription, we think it necessary to premise that, in all documents of such an age, the spelling is quite arbitrary and unfixed, varying frequently in the same record, so we are to be guided solely by the sound, and not at all by the appearance of the words.

We have thus the first line,

'Heydiddlediddle!

which at once resolves itself into—

'Hay did ill, did ill!

Now, two things are to be noted here. First, there is the ancient mode of repeating certain words and phrases for the purpose of intensifying the sense. Every scholar will at once recall many examples—

'In me, me convertite ferrum.'

Next, we have the peculiar sense of the word did, which, in vernacular Scotch, to this day is equal to 'fared.' Thus, one farmer will say to another, 'I did no that ill at last market'—i. e. prospered or fared. Indeed, we use the verb in the same sense in the familiar phrase 'How do you do?' The sense of the line is

'Hay fared very ill.'

Now, the next line assigns a reason for this. It is as follows:—

'Theostandtheafiddle.'

Which line very obviously resolves itself into

'The Catand theaf ill.'

i. e. the Chief of the Clan Chattan thieved (plundered Hay's lands) ill—severely; or, to express it in the noble language of Ancient Rome—

'Agrum Halcum Cattanus late graviterque populatus est.'

Now, here a new light dawns on us, affording an illustration of the well-known philological canon, that when one is on the right track, corroborations stream in from all quarters. Observe, first, the name of the clan—Chattan; the locality—Perthshire; the occupation—reiving; and say if we are not almost irresistibly forced to conclude that in some way this remarkable foray led to that famous contest between this clan and the Clan Quhale, which was fought on the North Inch of Perth.

'Thecovejumpedoverthemoon.'

The cove jumped over the (lands of, or laird of) Moon.

As to the locality here indicated, there is, fortunately, no difficulty. To this day, we have in the district the estate known as Bal-na-moon, which term even the merest tyro in philology is aware signifies the town or fort of Moon—the Gaelic 'bal' being identical with the Irish 'bally,' and probably allied to the French 'bailli,' and through that with our own 'bailie.' The fort was evidently not yet built; but it is probable, in the highest degree, that it arose in consequence of the raid.

The use of the definite article before names of places is too common in Scotland to require explanation; and the habit of naming a proprietor by his lands is universally recognised.

We confess, however, that the verb 'jumped' here presents a little difficulty. Several solutions have suggested themselves to our mind, which we will merely intimate. Can the word be 'jumped,' and imply that 'the cove' jumped on the prostrate body of the Laird of Moon, as Celts will do? Or does it mean that he passed over his lands leaping in a joyous manner, on account of the savage joys which awaited him in the country of the Hays? Or, finally, is it a contraction for 'triumphed,' and is the line to be read, 'The cove triumphed over the (Laird of) Moon?' The well-known passage in Livy (lib. 21, cap. 42), describing the fierce hilarity of the Celts in Hannibal's army, when, in crossing the Alps, that chief indulged them in a little mutual slaughter, led us at first to prefer one of the two first conjectures—'Ut cujusque exciderat alacer, inter gratulantes gaudio exultans, cum sui moris tripudiis, arma raptim capiebant.' But further reflection induces us to adopt the last rendering; for, first, the initial letter of the word 'jumped' is the same with that of the Roman shout of triumph, 'io'; next, the absence of the letter 'h' supports this conclusion, for we uniformly find the word 'triumph' without the 'h' when applied to the card which is the last to be distributed in dividing. This is called the 'trump' card; and, lastly, we think the context clearly demands this translation.

Note here the early use of the word 'cove,' equal to knowing fellow—dodger—thief.

'Thelittledoglaughed.'

Here we meet a difficulty of common occurrence. The name of a property of no great importance meets us spelled in quite an arbitrary manner. In consequence, it is not easy to verify the locality. We are not, however, without the means for forming a more than plausible conjecture regarding it. The first three letters have the form of our definite article. Every one acquainted with old Scotch knows that in many districts the 'th' of the article was sounded hard like t; and more particularly this held along the Highland border. There, indeed, the pronoun is pronounced broadly 'ta.' But in the Lowlands of Perthshire, where the Saxon and Scandinavian element were largely mingled, the pronunciation was 'Tay.' Here, then, is the key to the riddle—Taylit, Taylet, or Tayilt, is the name of some small property on the banks of that noble stream, at the sight of which the Roman legionaries shouted 'Ecce Tiber,' whose insignificance saved it from rapine. The proprietor, moved with envy at the greater dignity of his neighbours of Luncarty and Bal-na-Moon, laughed at their misfortunes. We will perceive in the sequel that he suffered a severe penalty for his unneighbourly jeering. The line then is—

'Taylit (ill dog) laughed.'

The inscriber, with rude, cynical humour, stigmatises Taylit or Tayilt as an 'ill dog'—a mode of objurcation not improbably brought over by some chivalrous Hay from the land of the Saracen, where the good soldiers of Christendom were often saluted with this obnoxious epithet.

The next two lines must be read together—

'Toseesuchfineport Thedishranawaywiththespoon.'

The general meaning of these is too plain to elude even the least initiated. The words divide themselves thus—

*'To Seesu ch fine a port,
The Dish ran away with The's (Tay's) Poon.'*

The The or Tay here is evidently Tayilt; such contractions being quite common in Scotland; and already poetical justice has overtaken him. From the soft liquid sound of the name, it is clear that 'Poon' or Poona was a lady—the daughter, let us hope, and not the wife, of Tayilt.

'The Dish' is obviously not the chief of the Clan Chattan, but some prime favourite on whom he used to confer a more than fair share of the plunder. His comrades, naturally dissatisfied, had applied to him this epithet, which, in Gaelic, signifies 'receiver,' or, as we might say, 'resetter.' There appears little doubt but that the Chattan designed the Dish for a son-in-law. This inference we draw from the chief's overgenerosity to him, and from the obvious conviction of the Dish himself, that in eloping with Poona he had transgressed beyond hope of reconciliation. He does not, it will be observed, convey his captive bride to the fastnesses of his own wild mountains, where, with the support of his clan, he might have held her against the world in arms, but to 'Seesu,' the nearest 'fine port.' It is clear that he fled here with a view to emigration. He durst not again meet his chief, after having so cruelly dashed his dearest hopes.

Now, we have said that it is probable that out of this raid arose the savage butchery on the North Inch.

Our supposition is that the old chief, maddened by disappointment, became reckless, and entered upon that course of proceedings which drew on him the royal vengeance. This conjecture we submit with, we trust, pardonable confidence. To the would-be captious critic we would address the admonition of the poetical sage of Venusia—

'Si melius habes, impertit,
'Si non his utere mecum.'

Secsu we at once identify as the modern Paisley, the 'tu' of the natives being modified into the more vocal 'u' or 'you.' At first we were inclined to read this fifth line,

'Secsu which is a fine spot, eliding the 'r' from the last word; but, philological reasons apart, a few moments' reflection induced us to reject this for the finer rendering,

'To Secsu (or Seestu) which is a fine port.'

The 'ch' in the original is obviously a contraction for which, and the 's,' there is little doubt, has been transposed from its natural position and appended to the end of 'fine,' instead of being made to precede it. This may be a mere clerical error of the copyist, or it may indicate a peculiarity in the patois of the inscriber. Be this as it may, such conjectural transpositions and fillings-in are quite permitted to decipherers of ancient records. Without them, indeed, there could be no room for controversy or difference of opinion; and in this light they are not only legitimate, but praiseworthy.

The fact that the rendering of this penultimate line adopted by us is the right one, is certified by the justifiable pride with which every son of the ancient city regards its noble harbour, with 'the shipping' which fill its docks. And long may noble argosies continue to glide, swan-like, round its classical 'Water-neb,' bearing love-struck swains and maidens to brighter climes; and, in return, bringing back the products of distant lands to the city which sits by the banks of the limpid Cart!

It would be deeply interesting to know whether any farther traditional records as to this raid yet exist in Perthshire; and, more particularly, whether Poona ever came back, or wrote home—what family she had—and to what colony she emigrated along with 'The Dish.' These questions we leave to local antiquaries. We conclude by presenting this valuable historical relic in extenso:—

'Hay did (fared) ill—very ill;
The Chattan thieved terribly;
The cove triumphed (also) over Bal-na-moon;
Taylit (ill dog) laughed
To Secsu (Seestu), which is a fine port;
The Dish ran away with Tay's Poona.'

ORLANDO.

P. S.—A learned friend suggests that Paisley, and not Perthshire, may have been the locus of the monument; and that the Baron may not improbably have received the inscription, with hints as to its employment, from a son of the maritime city. The peculiar intellectual recreation of the dwellers in the ancient port gives an air of credibility to the conjecture. In this case, however—as in that of Perthshire—we leave the matter to local antiquaries, who are in every way the proper parties to pursue researches. O.

'DISTRESS.'

Who will absolve me? I am sick
And weary—sick at heart.
Who will absolve me? Time is short,
And I must soon depart:
And weak, unaided, and alone,
Must tread, to me, the great unknown.

I turn me to the wall to die.
Must sinners perish so?
Is there no gleam of sunlight hope
To pierce my world of woe?
Oh for one short sweet whisper given
To tell of pardon and of heaven!

O heart that knew not charity
For aught below, above!
That never abridged a pitying thought,
That never leapt with love!
Where are thy comforters? Are they,
In this dread hour, to pass away

No widows' tears flow down for me;
No children call me kind;
No deeds of charity I leave
As legacies behind;
Only my soul I have to give—
To whom? O God that I could live!

That I could walk abroad once more,
To lavish all my gold
Upon the countless miseries
That pitying eyes behold!
That I could wash the beggars' feet,
And clothe the homeless in the street!

Yes! I would do it. Ah! how late
Come tears and penitence!
The hand that grasp'd so eagerly
Not gold alone but peace—
The hand that never did good deed,
Is fetter'd in its hour of need.

Yes! I would do it. Is this love,
Or is it sordid fear?
Turn from me, O compassionate Face!
I cannot bear thee here.
O Arms outstretch'd! I cannot come—
Ye may not offer me a home.

He has been blessing all my days,
And I have bless'd not one;
He has been giving golden gifts,
And I have given none:
The death-damps gather on my brow,
I cannot, dare not seek Him now!

Where is the god I served so well?
The god I fear to-day?
Ah! I am he! my god—myself,
From whom I turn away;
From whom I turn, with shortening breath,
To face the woes of living Death! W. C. D.

GEOLOGICAL REVERIES IN RAIN.

'Nothing in Nature is all evil.'

OFTEN during the present year have I thought of these words, when I heard the frequent rain cursed on all sides as 'only evil, and that continually;' and I have been tempted to become an apologist for rain, and to say a word in its favour. It is doubtless provoking to have our holiday walks or our pleasure excursions spoiled with rain; to have engaged a steamer, or organised a picnic, and then be obliged to postpone it, or to go and endure it under a deluge, which would be sure to make all ideas of pleasure a mockery to us; or, what is worse, to have our stated holidays, our fair-days and fast-days, rainy—often so rainy that we cannot step out of doors without being 'dripped' to the skin in a few minutes. These, I admit, are all serious charges against rain; nor do I intend to say a single word in defence or excuse of any of them. I have no desire to abate the price we pay for rain, to seek a reduction of the public water-rate Nature exacts for the supply she so liberally lavishes upon us, and which she will not stint, however vehemently we may shout 'Hold!—enough.' All we can do is to get rid of the surplusage by drainage, and to comfort ourselves with the thought that too much rain is better than too little—that showers of rain are better than showers of sand—that over-much vegetation is better than none at all—that a peat-bog is better than a Sahara—as, though we cannot indeed eat the peat, we can burn it to keep us warm; while with sand we can do neither.

It may be urged in favour of rain, that it is the great beautifier of the earth, and, indeed, of the heavens also. It is true that the great purposes which rain subserves in nature are rather utilitarian than beautiful—that to clothe the earth with grain and grass for man and beast was more thought of in the institution of the rain-making machinery of nature than to gratify a love for the beautiful. Yet, after all, perhaps, no other way by which we can imagine the water supply of nature to be maintained could be so full of beauty. A system of natural irrigation by an extension of springs (supposing that possible) would not answer the same ends, or confer the like benefits. We might, indeed, escape the evils of unwelcome or untimely showers, and might make a bonfire of our umbrellas and waterproof coats and haps; but beyond that we would gain little, while we would lose much. All the grand sky scenes—our gorgeous sunsets and our more subdued daydawns—the march of the thunder-cloud through the sky, with its trail of shadow across the earth—the gray morning or evening mist on hill-side or mountain-top—the sunny shower, with its coronal of rainbow—the grand snowy mountains in the air that the clouds become when transfigured with sunlight—the beautiful mottled appearance of light and shadow we often see in the broken clouds of summer weather—the fine ripple-marked form they assume when played upon by the passing breeze—nay, the very blue sky itself would be gone, for its blueness is due to the moisture that is ever in the air, and which is the raw material of which all rain is made. In that case, the sky would be a complete blank—good only at nights for astronomical purposes, as we would then have always a Chaldean sky over our heads, and our star-watchers could gaze from eve to dawn, night after night, without ever being blinded with cloud or mist, as they often now are.

But what I wish more particularly to notice is, that in the present arrangements as regards rain, we may find compensatory effects produced, which may in some degree mitigate the more aggravated evils, by enabling us to detect the 'soul of goodness' that lies under even the worst evils of rain. It has been always thought a mark of greater mind—an indication of higher intellect—to find many uses subserved by some single plan, law, or principle; to find the most diverse effects produced by the same cause, acting, of course, on different materials, or under contrary conditions. The law of gravitation attains almost the dignity of divinity, when we see it working everywhere and changing everything—from the flight of the comet through space, to that of thistle-down in a gusty day in August. We are also agreeably surprised and delighted to find unexpected results from familiar principles or long known causes. Thus, perhaps, nothing in the history of discovery gratified us so much, as the finding of the planet Neptune by means of that simple fact, that it was impossible to give attraction to the sun without giving it to the planets also; and that in virtue of the same power by which the sun holds the planets in their courses, the planets mutually disturb each other, making their courses slightly divergent from what they ought theoretically to be. Hence, when the disagreement of the true orbit of Uranus with the logical or predicted orbit manifested itself, the grand guess was made, that the disagreement must be due to an unknown planet; and when this idea was entertained, it was very easy, from the amount of the disturbance and its direction, to point the place and prove the character of the disturbing planet.

So, in connection with rain, there are incidental effects produced by it which, though necessary results from its manner of occurrence, cannot be looked on as intentional, and do therefore escape notice, and work as it were underhand. Perhaps none of these are so important, or produce greater effects, or are capable of suggesting grander thoughts, than the geological effects of rain. These may be divided into two kinds, the destructive and restorative effects—the first being immediate and direct, while the second are remote and indirect. The destructive effects are admirably described by the two words 'disintegration' and 'denudation,' which again may be aptly interpreted into 'tear' and 'wear'—disintegration being 'tear,' and denudation 'wear.' These, again, may be taken as characteristic of two kinds of rainy weather, which prevail in the different seasons of the year—summer and winter; winter rain being most promotive of disintegration, while the rains of summer are most productive of denudation.

Situated as Scotland is, on the verge of the great Atlantic sea, and in the direct course of the great rain-bearing winds, our climate cannot but be exceedingly moist, and our winters more characterised by rain and mist than by frost and snow. We are, therefore, familiar with long tracts of rainy weather in winter. Indeed, we have often seen our streets and roads wet for weeks together in mid winter—rain falling almost daily, and not drying quickly after it had fallen. The winter rains are generally never very heavy, there being, during the cold season, no thunder-plumps, nor any of those washing rains that our city sanitary commissioners consider of more value than many scavengers; but, generally, the winter rains fall in drizzling showers, which a man with a good greatcoat may pass a whole day under, and not get wet through. The air is often so thick with mist that we cannot see farther than a few bare, dried yards, while everything we handle is saturated with wet. In such weather, disintegration progresses rapidly. The continual infiltration of rain water fresh from the skies, and highly charged with gas capable of dissolving the ordinary rock-cements, must exert a most destructive effect on the rocks subject to its influence, and cause them to become what is very appropriately termed rotten rock. This is disintegration, which is, indeed, but another name for the wet rot in soils, stones, and rocks. If we examine the agents of induration in rocks, we will find them be generally oxides, or carbonates of iron or lime, simple cohesion, induced by pressure. These all yield readily to wet. The chemical agents change their character, and lose their cementing power; the simple cohered rocks—generally sandstones—having the cohesion destroyed by the mechanical action of continual infiltration. This is the ordinary course of disintegration in rainy weather in winter; but, should frost occur when the country is soaked with rain, the action of disintegration is changed, and its rate creased in a remarkable degree. The fact that water, when petrified into ice, becomes bulkier, and occupies more space, which space it must have at whatever expense, is the reason of this change and increase. The firmest cemented rock, the adamantine granite itself, is shivered like glass by the power of a few drops of frozen water. Of course the most destructive action of frozen water takes place when soil, stones, and rocks are over-saturated with rain. Every pore and interstice is then full of water, the conversion of which into ice loosens the strongest cohesion, resolving the gritstones into sand, and the shales into clay or mud. This method of rock-dissolution, like every other thing in Nature, serves a number of uses—uses not contemplated, or, at least, apparently not comprehended in the primary plan; but which, nevertheless, follow as inevitably as if they were the sole object of its institution. The matter which rocks yield, on disintegration, is often made use of as a soil, and that in situ. There are many districts where the soil is derived wholly from the rotten rock beneath; and which, if the rocks had not been disintegratable, would have been a region of barren stone—a stonier ground than that of the Parable, for there would, in that case, have been no depth of soil on it at all. The rocks that make the best soil are the traps, which, from the large proportion of iron in them—often one-fourth—yield readily to the influences of the weather, and the soil thus made is especially good for pasture, indeed, some of the best pastoral districts are trappean.

I have said that the summer rains are most denuding, because they are generally heavier, and fall more in sheets than in drops; and, falling so, they wash away the disintegrated rock—the accumulated debris of the winter rains—and bear it into our burns and rivers, down which it is carried with the running waters as they hurry oceanwards. That rock debris is not finally wasted, though it has the appearance, when seen floating idly as mud in the waters of our rivers, of being 'thrown as rubbish to the void.' Yet, if we follow it in its fate, we will soon see it deposited in what are truly Savings Banks, in the name and for the behoof of all whom it may concern in the future; and a very high duty, indeed, will it yield to posterity.

As that disintegrated matter is—however finely comminuted it may be—heavier, bulk for bulk, than the water it floats in, or rather flows with, it is evident that it is kept suspended solely by virtue of the swiftly-flowing current, and, of course, as soon as that motion slackens, by the river reaching a wider channel, the specific gravity of the sand or mud overbalances the carrying power, and it sinks to the bottom and forms a shoal. This may happen often in the wider reaches of the river, or where it expands into a lake; or it may not happen till the sea is gained, and the river's carrying power is lost in the ebb and flow of the tide. A copious deposition thereupon takes place, and a delta is the consequence. These deltas, in lakes or sea, do often, through natural growth, become dry land. As the delta bulges up near the surface, marshy plants grow upon it, and add to its height by leaving their mould among its sands or clay. Floods overwhelm, and leave a coat of sediment upon it; and thus the delta grows more and more above the ordinary level of the river, till only very high floods can overflow it. But ere this, man often steps in and bars the water out by a bulwark of earthwork, and thereby consummates the conversion of many a weltering delta into dry land. Another and a much shorter way is by a geological upheaval. Slowly, by a dilatation of the strata, through some secular change in the central heat; or, quickly, by an earthquake, the delta is elevated above sea-level, and the waste place of the sea becomes a fruitful field. This is the geological genealogy of all our great grain-growing carse in Scotland. They are all old retired sea or lake deltas of the rivers that now flow through them; and in them we have stored up for us the debris of the showers of the past—the rich legacy of geological rain!

Another way by which rain in drops or bulk makes soil, is in the form of snow or ice, or, rather, as glaciers and icebergs. The snow that falls on high mountains melts, in the summer-time, into a liquid ice, which exhibits all the properties, and conforms in its behaviour to all the habits, of a fluid. It flows down declivities—it is heaped up in strait places—it floats with its stray fragments of rocks—it wears away the sides and bed of its channel; in a word, it makes and carries with it a sediment as truly as water does. A glacier is, simply, a river of ice, and produces results identical in character with those of an ordinary river. A terminal moraine is its delta, and a lateral moraine is the wreck of a spate of ice; and both are glacial alluvium. In high latitudes, where glaciers flow into the sea, large portions are detached, and float away as icebergs. These often sail far before they melt; but, as they melt, they drop the sediment and boulders with which they are freighted upon the floor of the sea beneath; and thus a deposit of clay, gravel, and boulders is spread somewhat unevenly over the bare rocks of the sea bottom. This deposit—when the sea is, by an upheaval, converted into dry land—makes a first-rate soil; indeed, the very best soils that we have are composed, either primarily or secondarily, of this old glacier mud—primarily, in the 'till' of the agriculturist, which is simply a great collection of icebergal drift, boulders and all; while the heavy clay carse-lands are the clay of this drift without the boulders, being, of course, but a re-formation of it—the clay having, by an after-action of the sea, been sifted from among the boulders, and laid again in the regular way that clay is deposited from water. And thus, by processes we would never without the help of geology have known, we are indebted for the soil in which our daily bread is grown to fossil rain. We have, therefore, both recent and fossil rain combined together in providing for our sustentation.

It is thus that in these two effects of rain, disintegration and denudation, we have a geological destruction; and in the transportation and deposition of the debris of rain, by rain water in bulk, we have a geological restoration of the earth. If we follow both through all the changes and modifications they promote, we will find thoughts and fancies enough to make us regard rain, even when most of a mar-mirth, as one of those adversities that in the end turn into precious blessings. It may spoil our holidays; it may curse our excursions; it may often, when we take a meditative walk into the country, send us 'bootless back and weatherbeaten home;' but what of that, we cannot pray it away; we cannot coax or bribe it to postpone itself; we can only dodge it with umbrellas, or try to set it at defiance with waterproofs. I think it better for us to try and make the best of it, by finding in rain itself sources of pleasures—not agreeable sensations, of course, but entertaining thoughts—thoughts reaching both backwards and forwards through time, and awakening in their passage imaginations of the actual state of the earth in the dim ages of the past, and disclosing revelations of the possible state of the earth in the brighter but more uncertain ages of the future. I wish to make a magic mirror of the rain-drop, and see in it both the past and the future; the one dim and dark, yet definite—a land of shadows, indeed, but of forms familiar to the mind of the geologist; the other bright with hope and crowded with fanciful forms, the most kenspeckle of which are men transfigured into gods, knowing now both good and evil.

But there are other results of rain which perhaps are greatest of all. The sediment that flows seaward in river floods is not all deposited in deltas that by upheaval are restored again to usefulness, and may be made of service again to man; but many deltas are, by submergence, sunk beneath man's reach, and become, by some of the many 'long results of time,' parts and parcels of a new earth—the world of the far future.

Other portions of the sediment, the finest and most impalpable part of it, is floated away to sea; and there, perhaps, after floating many leagues, settles down in some deep recess of ocean, and lies through perhaps a thousand years before enough of it gathers to make a layer of one or two feet in thickness. It will of course enclose fragments of the present, to make of them fossils of the future; and I may safely assert that never before were fossils of 'such splendid purpose' wrapped up in rock as are now in all parts of the sea undergoing the immortality of petrefaction. No doubt, with many of the processes of rock-manufacture, rain has nothing to do. Its function is rather to supply the raw material, the chaotic stuff, 'without form and void,' of which worlds are made. It but 'sows the dust of continents to be' over the floor of the ocean, and leaves it there to ripen slowly into rock by the central heat, or to be baked quickly into stone by an overflow of lava from some oceanic volcano. But by whatever method this raw material, which rain furnishes, may be wrought into indurated rock again, we know that it will pass through many vicissitudes, and be subjected to many strange influences, ere it becomes again part and parcel of the stage on which the Drama of Life shall in the future be acted anew. Most eagerly would we inquire at theology or geology the likely character of the life that would be acted on earth then? Whether it would be the sad, unhappy marplot of Comedy and Tragedy in which we are fated to act a part? or whether it would be, as many fondly dream, a celestial comedy throughout, a perfect pastoral, wherein there would be no villanous parts, for there would then be no villains to play them? But, more than even this, we would like to know who will be the dramatis personæ. Will they be men, angels, or gods? Will our children still inherit the earth, and live the same life as we live, only living it better than it was possible for us to do? Or will man be supplanted by some higher race, liker God than he in mind, character, and fate? Or will we ourselves, after having undergone, through death, disintegration as complete as that which the earth suffers through rain and the other agencies of change, be like it, in some far distant time, 'blest with resurrection?' and will we, renewed in body and restored in mind, live for ever in the new heavens and the new earth, 'so long promised and so long looked for, in which we have been assured that only righteousness shall dwell!'

In illustration, I will relate in detail a late reverie, which was suggested by the brown, muddy appearance which the water of the Clyde had, after a 'terrible denudation-day,' as a friend calls a very rainy day.

The idea that occurred to me was,—How curiously compounded must the mud be that gave the water that colour! I then set myself to reckon, by the help of geology, the various rocks and the many formations that had contributed a portion of this mud; and found, in doing so, thoughts and imaginations enough to make the surface of this muddy river a magic mirror, in which I saw the past history of the earth represented in pictures and hieroglyphics, the interpretation and contemplation of which afforded me a pure and intellectual delight, far surpassing aught that unscientific poetry has ever afforded me in even its happiest efforts.

The metamorphic age passed before me; but so raw was it with fire, so lurid was it with smoke, and so loud was it with all the noise and bustle of frequent volcanic eruptions, that not only was it difficult to recognise that fire-world as the quiet, homely old earth we have dwelt upon so long, but we cannot even see through the trouble and the darkness which is actually taking place in or upon it, gaze we ever so intently upon it. We see, indeed, the earth enveloped in fire, or, as the old nursery rhyme has it—

'With fire above, and fire below,
And fire on every side of it!'

but we cannot determine whether these eruptions and earthquakes, these floods of flame and clouds of darkness, are simply creative phenomena, and that the earth is in course of being made out of nothing, or whether it is but a renovative and transmutative process that is going on, and that some old earth, of which we knew nothing, is being destroyed or changed as far as fire can destroy or change it; and that a new world is arising, Phoenix-like, out of the ashes and procreant embers of its former self. All that we can be certain of is, that our view backward through time is finally closed by a wall of fire so dense that we cannot pierce through the mystery. In it, however, we sometimes think we see strange faces, 'glowering' at us from the eternity that we know lies beyond it; but ere we can mark the character or even the form of these faces in the fire—whether they are bestial, human, or angelic—they change with the flicker of the flame and baffle the promptest perception. At other times, we think we observe a Vulcan-like God busily engaged in passing the earth through the fire, giving to it its spheroidal figure, and to the individual rocks composing it, the form and character we call Plutonic and metamorphic.

The Silurian age passed next, with its gigantic pterygotus and its minute trilobites—a time of shallow seas and muddy shores, when the mud stones of Lamachow were in the course of formation, as they are now in the course of dissolution.

Then the Old Red Sandstone passed, with its mailed fishes. But, ere I could mark the characteristics of the time,

'A stern and stalwart ghost' appeared to me, wrapped up in a gray plaid, such as Scottish shepherds wear in mist and rain upon the Highlands. I hailed him with 'What cheer?' and he turned on me a face radiant as that of Moses after he had talked with God on the Mount; and I knew that Hugh Miller, in mind at least, was himself again—that all his troubles had passed with time away; and that now, in rapt beatitude, he, like Enoch, walked with God. But beyond a quiet smile, which I felt instinctively meant that all was well with him, he gave me no news whatever—he was as silent as Lazarus, and blabbed out nothing of that dread thing death, or that dreadest of all times, the coming eternity.

The Carboniferous period next started out of the past, gleaming with the green light of its multitudinous woods. As my eye got accustomed to its green light, I marked with what beauty and grace the lepidodendron waved its green branches in the evening breeze, that came laden with vapour from the wide fresh-water lake or salt lagoon, ripple-marking, ere it came away, the shore sand into those beautiful undulations that are seen in every sandstone quarry round Marazion. I marked, too, the sigillaria rising stiffly up as a living pillar in a living temple—fluted and beaded with a beauty far surpassing aught of the kind of man design or execution. Casting my eye to the ground, I saw my Carmyle ferns start into life, and saw their graceful fronds in the evening breeze, not black and dead as now, but living and green, as its *agave*s now are, in

'You lone glen of green breckan,
With the burn stealing under the long yellow broom.'

The Boulder-drift period next came out of the black darkness of the past, white with snow and hoary with icebergs; and I saw a long train of icebergs and ice-floes floating round Dungoyne, at the end of the Campsie hills, and gradually fill up what is now Clydesdale with an ice-mottled sea. As I looked, I saw that these brilliant ships of ice bore, as cargo or ballast, boulders and mud; and, as I watched, I saw the boulders dropping into the sea and the mud floating away from the icebergs, destined, however, after a short suspension in the waters, to follow the boulders, and make, in time, what is now the native soil of Scotland.

One other scene came out of the past, as I looked on this magic mirror, but quietly, without noise or bustle, or emphasis of any kind. A broad, glittering sheet of sea, two or three miles broad, surrounded with quiet green banks—here pastoral, and there woodland—and so like the Clyde of the present day that we might almost think it the same. But no; there are the Cathkin braes to the south, with Dychmont crowning them as now; and there, far to the north, are the Campsie hills, dimly seen through haze and cloud—for the south-west wind is blowing as freshly as ever it does now. It is the elder and greater Clyde we are looking at; and, as we look, we see what was never seen in earthly scene before—we see man! Look close; shade your eyes from the light, and say what you behold yonder. A drift log, you say, floating seaward with the ebbing tide. Look again, and observe that it is not floating with, but against, the stream; and there, mark what strange figure is that so busily plying a paddle, as he looks anxiously at yonder black cloud rising over Cathkin braes. Saw ye ever anything like that in geology before? No; that is man, the future king of the world; and though he looks but little like a king to-day, wait till a millennium or two have rolled away, and you will behold the children of that log-canoeman build, on that self-same stream, ships that will bid defiance to wind and tide, and carry them wheresoever they wish to go. A voyage across the Atlantic then will have less danger to them than a voyage across Clyde to him now.

But enough of the past. Geology not only helps us to restore the past—it also enables us to forecast the future; and I could not help following the sediment as it floated down the Clyde, and saw, in imagination, its geological destiny and fate. Most of it will go and add to the delta now forming between Greenock and Helensburgh; a goodly portion of the remainder will go and add to the shores of Ayrshire, by Irvine and Troon; but its finer particles will float away far to sea, and, being caught by tide or current, will be deposited in the profound depths of the Atlantic, there to undergo all the metamorphoses necessary to make it rock again, and qualify it to be part of some future world—some new earth, wherein perhaps we, not as men, but as gods, may dwell!

THE MOTHER'S ROOM.

WHENEVER I think of my childhood,
And the home where my young days sped,
I remember one room of all others
With its quaintly old curtain'd bed.

The invalid chair by the fire-place,
And the phials that told a sad tale
Of patient and weary suffering,
Of a bright face wasted and pale.

So far as my thoughts can go backward,
I remember that self-same room;
Now fill'd with young hearts and their gladness,
Now shrouded in sickness and gloom.

It was there where we all were cradled;
It was there our sister died;
It was there where our mother mourn'd
For one lost in his young life's pride.

It was there in the Sabbath evenings
That we cluster'd around her chair,
To listen to lessons of kindness
And to Bible stories and prayer.

It was there we carried our burden,
And pour'd into sympathy's ear
Each tiny grief of our childhood,
Each joy, and each hope, and each fear.

It was there where in silent sorrow
We helplessly gather'd around;
And mutely, with aching hearts, listen'd
To Pain's agonized stifled sound.

It was there, when in life's glad morning,
I came to my mother's side;
And she knew that her child no longer
Was hers—for one claim'd her his bride.

It was there in the early winter
That a spring flower open'd its eyes,
Like a primrose of fairest beauty,
Or a violet of rarest dyes.

And my mother carried the blossom,
And laid in my arms to rest,
My living, my beautiful flow'et—
The first-born bird of my nest.

And there in that same old chamber
I learnt what each woman must know,
That no fountain of love runs deeper—
Or so fondly, freely, doth flow—
As a mother's love for her children,
Through happiness, peril, or woe.

So thus when I think of my childhood,
And the home where my young days sped,
I remember, above all others,
One room and its quaint old bed.

JESSIE EDMONDSTON SATTY.

THE STORY OF THREE DANCES.
INTRODUCTION.

You have seen me probably many times, but you would not recognise me in the street. Yet I know you—many of you—well. I know of your flirtation with Daphne; your quarrel with Chloe; your engagement to Medusa; and your sneaking kindness for Sarah Ann.

I have been allowed to witness all this, for I am a nonentity. I am an outcast from society, although I enter many more ball-rooms in the season than you, O light-hearted and lighter-heeled Adonis! I am—for I must confess the truth—what the smartly-dressed servant or white-gloved green-grocer designates 'The young man to play the pianer!' I have often smarted under the words; and, when some blooming, inexperienced damsel, struck by my noble appearance, flowing hair, and curled mustache, asks of the lady of the house, in low melodious tones, 'Who is that distinguished looking young man?' fancy the pang inflicted upon me by the answer—'Only the instrumentalist, my dear!'

I am a modern Diogenes, who, from a metaphorical tub, look with cynical eye upon the giddy throng around me. Night after night, as my weary fingers sweep the keys of the piano, in a mechanical manner, I glance from the corners of my eyes, and see the world—not the world of youths, not the world of poets, but the painted, made-up, false, smirking world—the world of shams, the world of humbugs! Look at Miss Lucinda, with her crowd of hopeful swains. Would they, think you, attend upon her so devotedly, if they knew the utter falsehood of the merry laugh, the innumerable repetitions of these pretty words?

Put one of them for a few evenings in my place. Let him hear and see for himself. She is angling for a good husband—good in the monetary sense of the word. She hides her hook with her piquante tones: she throws in her joyous laugh as ground bait, and the simple minnows hover round. The old carp are more knowing; many a one have I seen nibbling at the bait, but seeing the hook through it all the while.

How do I know? Because I am 'only the instrumentalist;' because I am a machine to produce music for the gratification of the party, and for ten and sixpence the evening! Bless you! (excuse the familiarity) they all come and talk where I can hear, without bestowing a thought as to whether 'the young man who plays the pianer' has ears or not.

If I were to publish half the things I have heard, it would diminish the number of marriageable young ladies by two-thirds.

However, I am above repeating scandal; and my object in writing is merely to relate what I saw in three fashionable drawing-rooms, in which several of the same company figured; but from whom I will extract but three or four, whose words and actions showed to me a little story of real life.

DANCE THE FIRST.

Mrs. Mountable was essentially a fashionable lady; that is to say, she frequented ball-rooms, theatre and flower-shows, with unparalleled assiduity. She preferred to live in a small and rather uncomfortable house, because it happened to be in an aristocratic neighbourhood; and in the said house she periodically gave a dance, to which all her 'set' were invited.

Mrs. Mountable patronised me; she recommended me to her friends as a 'very worthy young man,' and whenever she gave her dances I, in conjunction with a cornet (respectable but given to drink), was engaged for the evening.

It was at one of these parties I first saw Mr. Marlow. I had just finished playing a Mazurka, when a slight rustling and commotion among the company, and the turning of all eyes towards the door, proclaimed the arrival of some distinguished visitor; for it must be confessed that Mrs. Mountable was something of a lion-hunter, and that the writer of the last new novel, the explorer of some hitherto unknown region, or the discoverer of some new species of insect, were to her short-lived wonders, whom it behoved her to inveigle inside her house, and show off to her assembled guests.

Mr. Marlow was the latest novelty. He had written a book, which had attracted a good deal of public notice; and, consequently, Mrs. Mountable had given him no peace until he had agreed to make one of her guests.

He was a fine-looking, handsome man, with a lofty white forehead, and piercing eyes. I had but little time to look at him, however, for a fresh dance was being formed, and my aching fingers were called upon to supply the music.

Close by the piano upon which I was playing were seated two ladies. One short, old—well, middle-aged—and wrinkled; the other tall, red-faced, red-haired, and gawky. They talked.

Old young lady.—‘You see that girl Mr. Marlow is dancing with? That’s Miss Tudor, to whom he is engaged.’

The red young lady sniffed disdainfully, as if to express her disapprobation of engagements in general, and Mr. Marlow’s in particular.

‘They say he might have chosen better; but I suppose he knew what he was about. Do you think her pretty, dear?’

Red young lady.—‘Some people might, but I cannot do not admire such chalky complexions; and I should like her face better if her eyes were the same size, and her mouth smaller.’

Old young lady.—‘How satirical you are, dear; but I must say, that if she were not my dearest friend, I should be inclined to call her rather too stout, and a little too short, and a little too—there, now, look at Miss Stevens! She would be a proper wife for Mr. Marlow—such an imperial-looking girl!’

Red young lady.—‘H’m! Do you really think so?’

The dancing ceased for a few minutes, and I was able to look at the young ladies in question. They were standing one on each side of Mr. Marlow, and, indeed, presented a great contrast. Miss Tudor was certainly not pretty, neither was she the reverse, for she had a very lively and intelligent face, which beamed with joy when the great lion spoke to her, and answered him with rapid glances. Miss Stevens was a tall, stately beauty, with classically modelled features, without a spark of life in them. Mr. Marlow was relating some anecdote to them, and in no way would the contrast have been more apparent, for whilst in the face of one various expressions chased each other at each point in the story, the other’s countenance remained cold and impassive as if cut in marble.

Several times, when I looked up during the evening, I saw the literary lion dancing with Miss Stevens; and then, when I stole a glance at Miss Tudor, she was sitting by herself, watching the handsome couple whirling round the room. Supper was announced, and her face brightened in a moment when Mr. Marlow, surrendering his handsome partner to a smitten swain, offered his arm to Miss Tudor, and conducted her to the supper-room.

I feel tempted here to digress, and enlarge upon the pleasures of the supper hour to the instrumentalist, who, with a bottle of South African sherry and a plateful of stale sandwiches, rests awhile from his labour. I feel tempted to do so; but I won’t.

The cornet left me to procure for himself beer at the nearest public-house, which he preferred to the South African; and I, only too glad to do so, left the music-stool, and sat down upon a low, soft-cushioned, easy chair. The piano almost concealed me; and two persons entered the room, and stood close to where I sat without perceiving me. The two were Mr. Marlow and Miss Tudor. ‘I know you love me, Charlie, and are not at all ashamed of it; but would you mind dancing with me once or twice instead of with Miss Stevens. Please don’t think I’m jealous of her, and don’t be angry.’

‘What nonsense you talk, Carry!’

DANCE THE SECOND.

Mr. Stevens was a faithful representative of Her Majesty’s Civil Service. He lived in a pretty little villa in one of the suburbs, and liked to jog on comfortably and quietly through life; but this his wife would by no means permit. ‘My dear! we must keep up appearances,’ was an expression continually upon her lips; and Mr. Stevens sighed, and thought a very poor appearance was kept up by turning all the furniture from the drawing-room into his study, and taking up the carpet; but, like a sensible man, he kept his thoughts to himself, and became resigned to his fate.

Mrs. Stevens—who spoke of her husband as holding an important Government situation, (poor man, he was only a clerk!) and gave her acquaintances to understand that the family of Stevens was of great importance—was a stout, vulgar woman, although she was in the habit of saying, when speaking of her daughter, whom I have already described, ‘Ah! dear Georgina is the very image of what I was when her age!’ Her friends held their tongues, and thought she had altered very considerably.

Now, Mrs. Stevens determined to give a dance, and her husband, after feebly combating her desire, gave way, and preparations on a grand scale were made. Mr. S. agreed to have ‘a young man to play the piano,’ but resolutely stood out against the cornet, so I had that evening the sole responsibility of the quadrilles and polkas.

It was about three months from the day of Mrs. Mountable’s party, but many of the same people were there; amongst others, Mr. Marlow, but not Miss Tudor. The gentleman's whole attention was given to Miss Stevens.

'What a handsome couple!' said one old dowager to another, as they scanned the dancers through their glasses.

'Yes; a much better match for Mr. Marlow than that insignificant Miss Tudor.'

'Miss Tudor! Who is she?'

'Oh! only an old flame of his; but he has very prudently broken off the engagement.'

'Indeed!' said a third. 'I heard Miss Tudor's brother put an end to it, as he considered Mr. Marlow did not pay her sufficient attention.'

'Oh, indeed!' chorused the other two, in different tones of surprise; and no more was then said upon the subject.

I am not going to hold myself up as an object of pity; but I must confess that, when four o'clock struck, and the dancers still called for another waltz, my patience nearly deserted me, especially when I remembered I had a music lesson to give, in quite a different direction, at nine o'clock. I watched my opportunity, and quietly asked old Mr. Stevens if any one there would give me a seat on the box of their carriage, and save me a walk of six miles into London. In a few moments he returned, and informed me that Mr. Marlow was going to drive home, and would give me a seat in his cab.

Mechanically, I played a few more dance tunes, and then the party broke up. Mr. Marlow came up to me, and kindly repeated his willingness to drive me to town; and, after a coldly affectionate farewell to Miss Stevens, which I could not help seeing, he mounted, took the reins, and was on the point of starting, when his servant, touching his hat, said, 'Beg pardon, sir. Young woman, sir, left letter for you, sir; said it was important, and immediate.'

Mr. Marlow took the letter, and read it by the flickering light of the lamp. He turned deadly pale, but said not a word, and in another moment we had started. Had I not seen him so calm and self-possessed a short time before, I should have thought he had taken more wine than was good for him. Luckily the highway was deserted, or some accident must have happened, for we zig-zagged across the road every minute; and once, had I not caught the reins, we should have dashed against a lamp-post.

'Can you drive?' he asked me in a strangely altered voice; and on my replying in the affirmative, he handed the reins to me. 'I cannot see,' he said, and hastily brushed his coat-sleeve across his eyes.

I drove on silently, Mr. Marlow sitting back, his face buried in his hands. 'Poor Carry!' I heard him murmur; then, suddenly starting forward, 'No—no! it can't be true!' he cried. 'Carry dying!' and then again he became silent.

'Stop!' he cried, after a long pause, laying his hand upon my arm, 'pull up beneath this gas-lamp.' I did as he desired; and he took the letter from his pocket and tried to peruse it. 'I can't see the words,' he continued; 'read it to me;' and he put the letter into my hands. It was very short—

'SIR,—My sister is dying; and, contrary to my wishes, insists upon seeing you.—I am, &c.

'GEORGE TUDOR.'

'It is true, then!' said Mr. Marlow, with a convulsive sob, and he remained silent for the rest of the journey.

DANCE THE THIRD.

It was nearly a year after Mrs. Stevens' party, that I received a short note from Mr. Marlow, inviting me (in a professional capacity) to a ball he was about to give, and in the note he made mention of his wife. Who was she? I wondered. Had he married the marble, or the flesh and blood? or had he discovered a third, whose composition was a happy mixture of the two?

I arrived before any of the guests—took up my position at the piano—and anxiously watched the entrance of the ladies, in order to discover Mrs. Marlow. I had not long to wait, before Mr. Marlow entered with a lady leaning on his arm. It was the one I had known as Miss Stevens.

I was called upon to play; and my friend, the cornet, nudged me, and said every one was waiting for the music. The rooms were crowded, and dancing incessant—consequently, I got but little opportunity to watch for Mr. and Mrs. Marlow; but I had no doubt that the statuesque lady was the author's wife.

Biasful supper-time came; and a downright good supper it was. None of your South African and stale sandwiches; but regular good port and sherry, and anything you liked to ask for. 'Hurrah for Mr. and Mrs. Marlow!' said I, in a subdued voice, to the cornet, as I tasted the generous wine. 'Hurrah!' murmured he; and added, 'By the way, what do you think of her?'

'She is a handsome woman,' said I.

'Do you really think so? I've heard her called pretty, but never handsome.'

'Pretty! well, there's no accounting for tastes; and if people do admire a face artistically modelled in putty, what's the odds to you or me?'

'Putty! artistically modelled! Who on earth are you talking about?'

'Mrs. Marlow, of course.'

'There she is coming in with her husband. Do you mean to say her face is artistically modelled in putty?'

'Good gracious! Do you mean to say that she is Mrs. Marlow? I thought that lady behind, with the silly-looking old man, was she.'

'Ha, ha! They are Lord and Lady Monibago.'

'Then, he did marry Miss Tudor?'

'Of course. She was very ill, and he went to see her, and then she got better; then they pitched at the medicine bottles out of the window, and she got better still; then he asked her to marry him, and she got quite well. Where's the music? They're wanting a quadrille.'

THE NIGHT OF THE MARRIAGE—AN ODE.

BY THE EDITOR.

I.

So ends the Marriage-Day, this eve of March!
 Its ceremonies proud,
 Its crackling musketry and cannon loud,
 Its flowers, and flags, and bells, and martial strains,
 Have pass'd 'mid loyal shoutings of the crowd!
 Yet sweet are children's wiles,
 And bright are women's smiles,
 And hearts of men are more than worldly gains;
 For Darkness, hovering on her vaulty arch
 Of pallid stars, sees mountains-tipp'd with fire—
 Sees towns a-flame like glowworms on the plains—
 Sees torch-light glimmerings over endless miles!
 No night in Britain reigns;
 Nor sleep, that might an infant's eyelids tire,
 Weighs on the nuptial dream that fills our happy Isles.

II.

Now, while the astonish'd heavens shrink cold and blue,
 And scarce a star looks through,
 Ten thousand feasts are loud in civic halls;
 Ten thousand fairs are quivering with the beat
 Of music throbbing to responsive feet;
 Fantastic walls,
 Fronting the upturn'd wonder of each street,
 Show lambent jets, or lamps of many dyes,
 Shaped into hearts, or stars, or blazonries
 Of crowns and crested plumes; at every turn,
 Fair ALEXANDRA'S name
 And ALBERT-EDWARD'S twined in tremulous flame,
 With mutual ardour burn;
 Hard by and far, as warning back the night,
 From tower and natural height,
 Fitful and fiery splendours flout the skies,
 In arrowy shoots and spiral runs,
 Like sudden wrecks of rainbows bright,
 Or glittering fragments of exploded suns;
 While poets, with their visionary eyes,
 Divinely musing on their grand ideals,
 Sing glorious hymeneals!

III.

She has come with all the Sagas in her heart,
 The wild romances of her country olden,
 O fairest Norland blood as fair a part
 As e'er did ancient Scald embolden
 To make his numbers golden.
 She has come, the flower of all her fair-hair'd line,
 At guileless Love's command,
 The undisputed conqueror of the land
 That for her sea-king sires had oft a grave—
 That to the requiems of the Baltic brine
 The later navies of her nation gave.
 She has come, the pearl of tender womanhood,
 In this our age of gentler mood,

To show how sweetly sceptres may be gemm'd,
 And warlike passions stemm'd,
 And nations knit for purposes of good.
 She has come, the blue-eyed Dane, in joy she has come
 To share the topmost throne of all the earth—
 To be the mighty Mother of our Kings!
 Oh sing the Welcome Home
 Of her who brings
 Goodness and beauty, to ennoble birth
 And give new jewels to the Crown
 Of Britain's old renown!

IV.

Hark! the midnight chimes are striking!
 May the newly-wedded Pair
 Feel that one another's liking
 Better is than people's stare—
 Sweeter is than city's glare—
 Dearer is than courtier's speech!
 Blessings endless be to each!

V.

Ah me! I would that all were ended well!
 Would that this day might pass without annoy!
 The things we covet rarely with us dwell:
 Pleasure has its alloy:
 In trembling hands is held the cup of joy,
 For happiness is ever kin to grief.
 All holiday is brief;
 And each new morrow the old tale repeats:
 No meteor now with sudden splendour glows;
 On yonder hill the lonely bonfire dies;
 And silence creeps into the darkening streets.
 But the majestic glories of the skies
 Mock all these meaner shows.
 Oh elder than the day-spring, grand old Night!
 Who wert before the words 'Let there be light'
 Threw magic lustres on the wondering deep!
 Thine of creation was the primal sleep,
 Ere flash'd the first pale beam;
 Such deep and pregnant sleep as did abide
 On Adam's sinless lids, ere from his side
 Emerged fair Eve as beauteous as a dream;
 For Light and Love were both of Slumber born,
 And oh! what dreams this night will break before the morn!

VI.

Happy be your sleep and waking,
 Peerless Prince and Princess fair!
 Anxious eyes and bosoms aching
 Never be it yours to share!
 Ever Heaven in mercy spare!
 And when all your days are ended,
 May your names be sweetly blended!

VII.

Oh! fear not Denmark for your lily Flower!
The British Lion is of royal mood,
Like him that, ramping from the savage wood,
Shrank at the sovereign touch of Beauty's power,
And laid his sinewy strength at Una's feet!

He will on her steps attend;
He will all her wishes yield;
He will guard his Lady sweet;
He her fiercest foes will rend;
He will die to be her shield;
Like fairy Una's ever-faithful friend!

VIII.

When I reflect on all this day has shown,
Or dearer still on all this night may prove,
The simple flower of human sympathy
Assumes a sweetness that can never die:

O flower in splendour blown!

Thou mak'st this night a jubilee of Love!
Through thee the sage thinks of the time
He wept in ink and sigh'd in rhyme!
Through thee the worldling dreams of old
How one to him was more than gold!
Through thee the maiden and her swain
Have this sweet lesson for their gain—
That what is best is theirs to prize,
The life in one another's eyes;
That purest bliss to princes known,
By humble hearths may be their own;
That Love is kingdom, crown, and throne;
That GOD has endless blessings for the wise!

IX.

Poets, let your lays be dumb!
Ended be the nuptial strain!
Hush'd be every trumpet and drum!
Leave, oh leave the Wedded Twain!
While their moments are the fleetest,
While their pleasures are the sweetest,
Leave them to themselves alone!
Leave them to their blessings ample!
Leave them to the care of ONE!
Leave them to their dear example
In the Grave and on the Throne!

MARY GORDON'S FIRST DAYS AT SCHOOL.

CHAPTER I.

'Is this the day I am to go to Miss Weston's school, mamma?' said little Mary Gordon, one morning at the breakfast table.

'Yes, Mary; and, as soon as you finish breakfast, you must go up stairs to the nursery, that Rachel may make you ready; and then I shall go along with you, as this is your first day.'

'I am very glad you are going with me, mamma; it will be far better going to school than having a governess. And now I shall be a scholar,' said she, with an air of importance. 'I am very fond of Miss Weston, mamma; and I think she will like me better than all the other girls, because she was so long my own governess.'

'That is a very selfish idea you have expressed, Mary; and I am glad you are going to school, just that you may learn you are of no more importance than any of the other girls, and can only share Miss Weston's attention along with them. I thought of engaging another governess; but your papa thinks school will be better for you, and that a new governess could not know, as Miss Weston does, what a silly little girl you are, and how rash in saying and doing things that are wrong; but I hope, my dear, you will try to be more thoughtful at school, and obedient to Miss Weston; and you ought to be so, Mary, for you are now eight years old.'

'Oh yes, mamma; I love Miss Weston so much that I would like to please her always, and you too, mamma; and if you will allow me, when we are on the way to school, I shall take you by a street where there is a beautiful toy-shop, and such a pretty wax doll in the window, the very same size as my little doll Sophy, but with blue eyes and fair hair. Sophy's hair, you know, has been quite destroyed ever since the day I washed her head with soap and water; but I thought her little straw hat would just fit the pretty wax doll's head, so I went into the shop and asked the price, and it was only one shilling. Just think, mamma—only one shilling! Did you ever hear of anything so cheap? I said to Rachel I was almost sure mamma would buy it for me. Now, will you, dear mamma?'

'No, indeed, Mary; I do not approve of children having many playthings, and you must content yourself with Sophy for some time longer. Now, go away quickly, my dear, and get ready, for we must be at Miss Weston's by ten o'clock; and it is a long way from Queen-street to Russell-square.'

They were soon walking quickly along the street. Mary, in high spirits, holding her mamma's hand, and gaily chatting to her about everything she saw. The toy-shop, however, was still uppermost in her thoughts; and presently she exclaimed, 'Oh, do look, mamma, for only one minute! Did you ever see such a lovely doll? Do buy it for me, dear mamma.'

'You are a foolish little girl, Mary, to insist upon what I have already refused you; but come along quickly, for I fear we shall be too late.'

With most unwilling steps, Mary dragged herself from the shop window, and they soon entered Russell-square, where stood the large and handsome mansion now occupied by Miss Weston, in which she was this day, for the first time, receiving her pupils.

The hall-door stood open, and in the hall there were already several parties of children, with servants, besides girls of various ages, who had come to attend the classes about to be opened.

Mary was very much astonished and excited at the sight of so many people and children, for she had hitherto lived quietly at home, with no other companion than her little brother; and she was thinking how gladly she would now be at home, and in the nursery with him, when a young lady came forward, and said to Mrs. Gordon she would take charge of Miss Mary, if she would walk up stairs and see Miss Weston.

Mrs. Gordon thanked her, and turning to bid Mary goodbye, saw that her lip was quivering and her eyes full of tears.

'What is the matter, Mary?'

'Oh, mamma! I was thinking of Willie, and how dull he will be without me; and I would far rather go back with you than stay here. Please do take me home again with you, dear mamma!'

'No, no, Mary, I cannot do that; you must stay and get your lessons along with the other little girls; and, when you are busily occupied, the time will pass quickly and happily. At one o'clock, Rachel will call for you, and bring you home, so that you will have all the afternoon to be with Willie. Now, goodbye, my darling,' she said, kissing her, 'and let me see you dry your eyes, and go with this young lady.'

Miss Gray took Mary to the dressing-room, where she laid aside her hat and cloak, and thence to the school-room—a spacious and airy apartment, with three large windows facing the square—in which there was now a busy throng of youthful figures, and a hum of many voices.

Miss Weston, and the teachers engaged to assist her, had not yet made their appearance in the school-room, so that there was a good deal of confusion and many talking going on—Miss Gray being too young and inexperienced a governess to maintain authority and keep order among so many.

Upon her entrance, Mary stood, awkwardly blushing, near the door, for she was suddenly aware that many eyes were staring at her; but Miss Gray told her to take her seat on a form, beside some little girls of her own age, and she was soon able to notice that every new pupil that entered was quite as much stared at as she had been.

She began to feel interested in her companions on the same form, especially the little girl next her, who had long drooping curls of fair hair, from under which she peeped from time to time in a very shy manner. At length Mary smiled to her, and received such a sweet smile in return that she ventured to ask her name.

'Fanny Wallace; and what is yours?'

'Mary Gordon.'

'Are you to board with Miss Weston?'

'No, I am only to be a daily pupil. Are you to board?'

'Yes; papa has sent me to live with Miss Weston.'

'Oh, delightful!' exclaimed Mary, joyfully; we shall see each other every day; and perhaps Miss Weston will allow you to come to our house on Saturday and play with me, and we shall have such fun!'

Full of joyful anticipation, Mary clasped her arms around her new friend; and at the same time, a girl who was seated on the form behind, and had been watching her opportunity, mischievously jerked their heads together with such violence that they both uttered exclamations of pain and alarm, with their hands raised to their heads and their eyes watering; and Miss Gray, who supposed they had been quarrelling, rebuked them sharply.

'It was not our fault,' said Mary, pointing indignantly to the real offender—who had now a handkerchief at her face, stifling her laughter;—it was that girl who knocked our heads together.'

'Miss Jane Duncan,' said Miss Gray, 'I am astonished that you, who are so much blider than these children, can behave so foolishly.'

They had scarcely time to recover themselves, and were sitting demurely without venturing to look at one another, when the school-room door was opened, and Miss Weston came in, accompanied by several ladies and gentlemen; most of whom were teachers. There was silence immediately in the room; but, on seeing her beloved instructress, the presence of every one else was forgotten by Mary, and with her arms extended, and her face radiant with joy, she was hurrying towards her, exclaiming, 'O my dear Miss Weston, I am so glad to see you again!' when she was quietly arrested by a warning hand held up, and Miss Weston telling her, in a low voice, to return immediately to her seat, for Dr. Irving was going to address the school.

CHAPTER II.

A pleasant-looking gentleman now walked up the room, to take his seat at a table where a Bible had been placed for him. He had observed Mary's impulsive behaviour; but she thought he could not be angry with her, for in passing he stroked her head, and remarked to Miss Weston that he knew she was Mr. William Gordon's daughter; and Mary then recognised him as the clergyman who preached in their church on Sundays.

Dr. Irving opened the Bible, and read the Parable of the Sower, on which he remarked that the seed to be sown, as explained by our Lord himself, means the 'Word of God;' and the daily implanting of this precious seed, and training it up in the youthful mind, is that 'nurture and admonition,' without which all other teachings must prove vain and fruitless.

He proceeded to draw from the parable some useful lessons for teacher and pupil; to the former, recommending the exercise of kindness and forbearance, in preference to severity and punishment, which, he thought, should only be resorted to in extreme cases when gentler means failed.

In addressing the pupils, he earnestly advised them to try and be helpful to their teachers, by coming to school with minds prepared to receive instruction; to put away hardening things, such as quarrelling with one another, disobedience to parents, rudeness and impatience towards servants; these, and many other such unhappy hindrances, would harden their hearts, and render them impenetrable to every good influence; whereas, by cherishing good and right feelings towards every one, and so coming to school in a happy frame of mind, teachers will find they have got good ground to work upon, and will feel encouraged to do all they can for their best interests; or, in other words, they will sow good seed in the good ground, which, in some will yield thirty, in some sixty, and in some an hundred fold.

Dr. Irving then engaged in a short and earnest prayer for all those employed in the arduous duty of teaching the young; and for the young themselves, that the great Teacher and Governor of all, who taught as never man taught, would graciously vouchsafe by His spirit, to guide and direct them in their several duties; that He would pardon their errors and shortcomings, and supply all their wants out of His own inexhaustible fulness, so that the fruit might indeed be unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.

When he concluded, Miss Weston thanked him warmly for his visit, on this first morning of their meeting, when they had all so much need of his kind admonitions. He congratulated her on the auspicious commencement of her school, and hoped to repeat his visit soon. He was now going to visit a ragged school,

'which,' said he, looking round and smiling, 'will present a very different appearance from this one.'

After he had gone, the business of the school commenced, by the masters being shown to their classrooms; and the pupils separating into classes, followed, so that the large school-room was nearly half emptied; and Mary was whispering to Fanny Wallace, that she wished they might go too, when Miss Weston desired them, and all the little girls on the same form, to come to her, and bring their books; and after examining them successively as to their degrees of progress and ability, directed Miss Gray to give Mary's class a lesson in English reading, and when they had each read a portion, to hear them spell the principal words; after which, she might give them a simple lesson in grammar, such as naming the nouns, and whether they were in the singular or plural, &c.

Miss Gray, a young governess, or half-boarder, was really anxious to do as Miss Weston had desired, and got very well through the lesson, and so did the children; but when they came to the grammatical part of it, the word 'mouse' having occurred, Miss Gray remarked, that although the general rule for forming the plural was to add 's' to the singular, this word was an exception, for the plural was not mouses, but mice; 'and there are many other exceptions of the same kind,' said she; 'for instance, the plural of man is men; of woman, women; of tooth, teeth; of goose, geese; but perhaps I could make it plainer in this way. Suppose me sitting here alone; I am only one woman, and therefore in the singular; but suppose Miss Weston and I were sitting here together, could any of you tell me what we would be called?'

'Geese,' said Mary, without a moment's hesitation.

'Oh, Miss Gordon! what a strange mistake you have made!' said Miss Gray.

There was a sound of suppressed laughter throughout the room, and Mary looked down ashamed.

'Mary! Mary!' said Miss Weston, laughing herself; 'this foolish answer is entirely owing to your old bad habit of speaking without thinking.'

It was now twelve o'clock, and Mary's class was sent to get a lesson in writing in an adjoining school-room, where Mr. Macauley, a young assistant writing-master, was arranging copy-books for the pupils. This room was furnished with writing-desks, and in one corner stood a piano-forte, at which Miss Taylor, an elderly and experienced governess, was giving a music lesson to a most unpromising beginner, and at the same time trying to assist Mr. Macauley to keep his class in order and maintain his authority; this, however, being only a temporary arrangement, as the room to be occupied by Miss Taylor was still undergoing repairs.

The pupils were severally introduced by name; and Mary, along with the junior class, was placed at the desk nearest the piano, where she enjoyed the double novelty of getting her lesson in writing, and observing Miss Taylor, who was loudly beating time with a large pencil on the end of the piano, and her conversation running on as follows:—'Simple common time, four crotchets in a bar. One, two, three, four. Hold up your wrists, Miss Brown—down your shoulders, and in your elbows. One, two, three, four. Miss Fanny Wallace and Miss Mary Gordon, give over staring at me and attend to your writing. One, two, three. Mr. Macauley—sir, will you please to notice Miss Duncan, who is lounging over the desk, and poking her elbow in Miss Maxwell's face, so that she cannot write? Sit up, Miss Duncan, and attend to what Mr. Macauley is saying. One, two. Keep your thumbs over the keys, Miss Brown, and strike from your finger-joints, not with your arms; hold down one note until you play the next. One, two, three. Very bad, indeed; that is all out of time, and wretchedly played; you are lifting every note, and your fingers are so stiff, they look as if they had no joints at all. Now, Miss Brown, I must be so plain as tell you that unless you agree to practise as I direct you, I really cannot attempt to make you play the piano-forte; for, with untrained fingers, it is simply impossible; and, until your next lesson, I wish you to play nothing but this page of five-finger exercises; and now,' she said, looking at her watch, 'you may go to your writing, and exchange places with Miss Mary Gordon, who will come to her music lesson.'

Miss Brown started from her seat like a prisoner released; and Mary, who had been an awe-stricken spectator of Miss Taylor's energetic method of teaching, advanced towards her with fear and trembling, and stood looking wistfully in her face.

'What is the matter with you, child?' said she, lifting her on the piano-stool.

'Nothing, ma'am,' said Mary.

'Then don't look so frightened, Mary, but let us see how you make use of these flexible little hands on the keys. Will you play this easy lesson?' she said, opening a music-book, and placing it before her.

Mary played it with great precision, counting her time audibly.

'Very well, indeed,' said Miss Taylor; and she turned over the leaves to some more difficult lessons, which were all played with equal accuracy, and not without indications of musical taste existing in the little performer, who played, besides, a variety of scales and exercises, showing that her hands had been well and properly trained.

'Well done,' said Miss Taylor; 'I am very much pleased, indeed. Will you tell me, my dear, who taught you to play so well?'

'Miss Weston,' said Mary, her face glowing with pleasure.

'Miss Weston!' said Miss Taylor, greatly surprised. 'Then you are the little girl who was fortunate enough to have her for your governess?'

'Yes, ma'am,' said Mary, very much gratified; 'and she taught me a great many things besides music.'

'And I suppose you mean to tell me they were things of far greater importance than music; but remember, Miss Mary, I shall always consider your music lesson of great importance; and I hope you mean to do the same, and prepare for it accordingly. So, for to-morrow's lesson I shall expect you to practise this page, besides the exercises and scales you played to me to-day. And now, good-bye my dear. You may go.'

Mary ran down stairs, and found Rachel waiting for her in the hall.

She was in such high spirits that Rachel remarked she must have been very happy at school.

'Oh, yes,' said Mary, 'I have been very happy indeed, Rachel; school is such a different place from what I expected, that I think I shall never weary of it.'

CHAPTER III.

On the way home, Mary's attention was attracted by a little child sitting on the pavement before the door of a shop, and crying bitterly for a ball, which was selfishly kept from him by his brother—a boy of about ten years old—and with which he was amusing himself, regardless of the little one's cries. Suddenly, making her escape from Rachel, and following the direction of the ball, Mary succeeded very nimbly in catching it on its descent, and running with it to the child. 'Here is your ball for you, my poor little dear!' And he was smiling to her with tears in his eyes, when the boy rushed at her, and inflicted a sharp blow on her shoulder. He was about to bestow another on her face, when Rachel interposed herself between them; and, at the same time, the shopwoman, a powerful matron, who had witnessed the affray, issued from the door, and gave the boy such a blow on his back as sent him reeling into the shop; then, lifting the child in her arms, she turned to Mary—'It was very kind of you, Miss, to give him his ball; but I am afraid Tom has hurt you, and I am ashamed of him.'

'I am not hurt at all, thank you,' said Mary, as she walked away; but Rachel rebuked her for meddling with what she had nothing to do, and said, if she left her on the street to do such a thing again, she would tell her mamma.

On reaching the toy-shop, Mary stood to look again at the wax doll in the window; and she told Rachel that she liked it more than ever, for now she saw a likeness in its face to her dear friend Fanny Wallace; and she ventured to suggest that, if Rachel had a shilling of her own in her pocket, she might just go into the shop and buy it at once, and she would pay her back again the first time she got money.

'No, no, Miss Mary; you told me your mamma would buy it for you, and you cannot suppose I will give you anything she has refused.'

'A very well, Rachel; I suppose you are quite right; but mind you are not to tell mamma what I am saying.'

'You should never say anything you would not wish your mamma to hear, Miss Mary; but it would not be worth while repeating what you have said, unless she happens to ask me.'

'Oh then, I am not afraid; for she will never think of asking such a thing.'

'Indeed, it is not very likely,' said Rachel, dryly. On reaching home, Willie came running out to meet them.

'I am very glad you are come back, Mary, for I have been wearying for you so much; what a long time Miss Weston has kept you at school; I am sure you must be very tired.'

'No, no, Willie; not in the least. School is the most delightful place I was ever in; and I only wish you had been with me, you would have enjoyed yourself so much! I am very sorry you are a boy, and that you cannot go to a girls' school; but never mind, Willie, dear, you are but a little fellow—only seven years old—and so quiet and gentle that I daresay Miss Weston will let you come with me, although you are a boy.'

After their early dinner, when Rachel took them out to walk, Mary chatted away incessantly of all that had come under her observation at Miss Weston's. Mr. Irving's visit, the teachers and their classes, and, above all, her dear friend Fanny Wallace; and, at a later hour, when admitted to the dinner-table with her papa and mamma, where she was accustomed to observe a becoming silence, she continued to enlarge on the variety of tasks she had accomplished at school, until her papa reproved her for talking so much about herself, and, as soon as dinner was over, reminded her that, as she had so many things to do at school, she would better go and prepare for next day. When the children went up stairs, they found a young lady waiting for them in the school-room, who had been engaged by Mrs. Gordon to come for an hour or two in the afternoon, and give Willie his English lessons; and, as she was a good musician, to superintend Mary's practice, and assist her in preparing her lessons for school.

Miss Elliot was the daughter of an early and intimate friend of Mrs. Gordon's, who, since her husband's death, from a long succession of adverse circumstances, had been reduced to great pecuniary difficulties, besides having now become a constant sufferer from declining health.

Miss Elliot was quite aware that Mrs. Gordon's kind sympathy had led to her engagement, and sincerely desired to be of use to her pupils. She was but a young teacher, having only attained her seventeenth year; but her countenance and manners were very pleasing, and Mary was at once prepossessed in her favour. 'Miss Elliot,' said she, 'after you have finished Willie's lesson, I wish you would stay and take tea with us, and spend the evening.'

'You are very kind, Miss Mary; but your mamma has only engaged me to remain for two hours, and the time is nearly expired.'

'Oh, but I know mamma would like you to stay to tea, and I shall go down stairs and tell Thomas to place a cup and saucer for you; and away she went.'

'Stop, stop,' said Miss Elliot; 'I cannot stay, and you must not interrupt me by talking in this way, for you are preventing me from teaching your little brother.'

Mary said no more, but as soon as she saw Miss Elliot's attention occupied with Willie's lesson, she quietly seized her cloak and bonnet, which were hanging near the door, and slipping into the next room, concealed them under a table; then returning quickly, seated herself so that she might watch the result of the trick she had played. Just as Willie's lesson was finished, the tea bell sounded; and when Miss Elliot rose and looked round the room for her cloak and bonnet, wondering where they could be, Mary clapped her hands, laughing noisily, and clapping her round the waist, held her fast.

'Come away down to tea with us,' she said; 'you think you will get away, but you cannot. I shall not allow you to go. Willie, come and help me to hold her.'

Miss Elliot disengaged herself quickly, and looked displeased.

'Miss Gordon,' she said, 'your behaviour is really very disrespectful, and unless you bring my cloak and bonnet immediately, I shall ring the bell for your mamma.'

Mary looked a little alarmed, for she saw she was in earnest, and she was moving towards the door, when Miss Elliot recalled her.

'I feel sorry to part with you in displeasure,' she said; 'but I am sure that if you knew that I have to go home as quickly as possible to make tea for my own mamma, who is sick and has no one to help her but me, you would not think of detaining me.'

'No, indeed, I would not, if I had only known; and now I shall help you to go away.'

She ran into the next room, and returning with the cloak and bonnet, assisted her to put them on, and then running before her to the hall door, opened it for her, and wished her goodbye.

After tea, the children were allowed to remain in the drawing-room for some time and occupy themselves with amusements suited to their age; and so great was Mary's enjoyment of this privilege, and having the society of her papa and mamma, besides that of Willie, that when evening worship was over, and Rachel came to put the children to bed, she begged to remain a little longer, and said the day had been far too short—she was so happy.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. XII.

A POEM called 'Miann a Bhàird Aosda,' or 'The Aged Bard's Wish,' is supposed to be one of the oldest in the Gaelic language subsequent to the Ossianic era. It is said to be older than the conversion of the Caledonians to Christianity. I am not aware, however, that there are any other grounds than the internal evidence on which this very remote antiquity is claimed for the poem. Judging from its contents—its train of thought and its tone of sentiment—there is certainly no reason to suppose that its author was acquainted with any of the doctrines of Christianity; but, on the contrary, every reason to think that he was not—that is, of course, granting it was really an old heathen bard, and not some one assuming such a character, who composed the verses. In the closing lines, as will be seen, the singer wishes his harp, his shell, and the shield that defended his forefathers in battle, to be laid in the grave by his side; and he speaks of his soul floating in its mist, on the breeze of the ocean, to Flath-innis—the Heroes' Isle—where Ossian and Daol reposed and slept in the house of the Bards on Ar-ven. All this is certainly quite heathenish. But all this could easily be done by a bard who lived all his life among Christian Caledonians, and merely took on himself, for the occasion, the person of an imaginary predecessor.

It is difficult to identify the locality of the poem. Mrs. Grant of Laggan says it was composed in Skye. But the editor of the 'Beauties of Gaelic Poetry' thinks 'The poem itself seems to furnish some evidence, that at least the scene of it is laid in Lochaber. Treig is mentioned as having afforded drink to the hunters. Now, Loch-Treig is in the braes of Lochaber. We know of no mountain which is now called Ben-Ard or Scur-eilt. Perhaps Ben-Ard is another name for Ben-Nevis. The great waterfall mentioned near the end of the poem may have been Eas-bhà, near Kinloch-Leven, in Lochaber.'—Mackenzie's Beauties of Gaelic Poetry, page 14.

Like almost all reflective poetry which extends to any length, the 'Aged Bard's Wish' is sometimes a little obscure. It is not always very easy to trace the connection of one train of thought with another, nor is it always very obvious what the old man is turning his mind to at all. The objects of his thought, and the terms in which he was in the habit of referring to them, were both so familiar to himself that he, like other poets of his class, seems never to have suspected they might be less intimately known to his readers. The 'Old Bard's Wish,' then, although a fine poem upon the whole, and very much admired in the original, does not, perhaps, bear translation so well as some others.

THE AGED BARD'S WISH.

Oh, place me by the little brook,
Of gently wandering pace and slow,
And lay my head near some green nook
That kindly shades the sunny glow.

At ease upon the grass I'll rest
Of the balm-breathing flowery brae;
My foot by the warm wave caress'd
That winds throughout the plain away.

There the pale primrose let me see,
There the small daisy close at hand,
And every flower so dear to me
For grateful hue or odour bland.

About thy lofty banks, my glen,
Be bending boughs and blooming spray,
Where small birds sing from bush and fen
To aged cliffs their amorous lays.

Break rolling o'er the ivied rook
The new-born spring with heavy moan,
And let the answering echo mock
Its crowding surges' tuneful tone.

And let each hill and mountain steep
Return me back a joyous sound,
When thousand herds with lowings deep
From east and west will murmur round.

Let frisking calves before me play
By spreading hill or streamlet pure,
But the tired kild his head shall lay
Upon my breast and sleep secure.

Then, flowing on the breeze's wing,
Come the soft plainings of the lamb,
And let the mellowing distance bring
The answer of its bleating dam.

Oh! let the hunter's step go by,
His whizzing javelins let me hear;
And to my cheek youth's blood will fly
When comes the chase with tumult near.

New marrow to my bones 'twill bring
To hear the string, the horn, the hound;
When loud, 'The stag is down,' they sing,
I'll leap to hear the darling sound.

My dog, I'll see him in that mood
Who late and early follow'd me,
And O our dear hilly solitude
And crags that heard my bugle's glee.

And I shall see the welcome cave,
That saved us from the darkening night:
Its flickering flame shall wane and wave—
Its quails once more shall give delight.

The sweet deer-flesh we'll roast it well;
Treig's singing waves our thirst allay;
Though mountains roar and ghosts should yell,
We'll calmly rest us there till day.

Then high Ben-Aird his form will rear—
Chief of a thousand hills is he—
His looks, where dream the antler'd deer,
His head, where sleep the clouds, we'll see.

Sgor-eilt looks o'er the valley's brow,
Whence first the cuckoo's music flows:
The hill where thousand fir trees grow,
And green herbs for the elks and roes.

The young ducks cheerily skim the pool,
Round which the fir trees wave their head,
And toss their green arms beautiful,
Above the ripening rowans red.

With snowy breast the swan comes nigh,
And crests the waves with graceful pride;
Or, raising up her wings on high,
Amid the clouds she'll lightly glide.

Oh! doth she journey o'er the sea
To lands where breaks the cold white spray,
Where sail or mast shall never be,
Nor oaken prow shall cleave its way.

Come to the brakes and mountain caves—
Thy mouth full of love's plaintive sighs—
O swan! from the land of the waves,
And sing me to rest from the skies.

Oh rise, with thy mild and sweet song!
Tell thy piteous tale from on high,
The echo will spread it along,
And send thy grief mournfully by.

Raise thy wing o'er the ocean's bound,
Grasp its speed from the strong wind above,
For sweet to my ear comes the sound
From thy much pain'd heart of sad love.

Whence do the wandering breezes roam,
That wait us thus thy grief and care,
O youth! who went so far from home,
And left my hoary head so bare!

Are thine eyes tearful still, young maid,
So white of hand, so fair and wise?
Peace rest with him that ne'er will fade,
Who from his strait bed may not rise!

O winds! tell me, whose eyes have fall'd,
The sighing reeds where now they grow,
Past which the trouts have often sail'd
On wings that never felt you blow.

Oh raise me! raise me with strong arm!
Beneath a new shade let me lie;
The sun is riding high and warm,
Let the green branches shield my eye.

Then wilt thou come, O vision mild!
That wand'rest 'mid the stars of night;
And in thy music sweet and wild
Thou'lt bring me thoughts of past delight.

Oh see, my soul! yon maiden fair
Beneath the oak-tree, king of groves!
Her hand amid her golden hair—
Her soft mild eye on him she loves.

She silent while he plays and sings—
Her beating heart swims in the song!
From eye to eye his way Love wings,
Who melts the deer their hills among.

Now stops the strain, and her soft side
Is growing to her lover's breast,
And her fresh lips, the rose-tree's pride,
To his are long and longer press'd.

May joy attend you both for aye
Who wake my long-lost joy once more;
But on thy soul, thou fair-hair'd May,
My warmest, dearest blessings pour!

Oh dream of bliss! and art thou gone?
Return, return one moment still!
You hear me not; and I'm alone.
Then, fare-you-well each long-loved hill!

Farewell, O ye youths in your prime!
Farewell, lovely maidens, to thee!
I see not your bright summer time—
'Tis winter forever with me!

Not far from the waterfall's swell
That moans round its gray rock afar,
Let me lie with my harp and shell,
And forefathers' shield in wild war.

And come o'er the sea as a friend,
Thou mild-moving sephyr and slow,
Raise my mist on thy wings, and wend
To the isle* where the heroes go!

Where the heroes go—where they lie
And sleep sound without music's tone,—
Hall of Ossian and Dall! open—fly—
The night comes, and the bard is gone!

But ere it comes—ere my mist wings its way
To Arven, the house of the bards for aye—
With harp and shell for the road let me play;
Then farewell to the harp—the shell—the lay!

The measure is changed in the last verse of the original, as above.

'Suiré Oisein, or Ossian's Wooing,' is one of those old and popular bits of Highland poetry which, after having been sung for many generations, or many centuries perhaps, in ten thousand huts and houses, are still well remembered and repeated by people who never read them in a book. It and the 'Lay of Diarmad,' and the 'Death of Oscar,' and the 'Banners of the Fingalians,' and even the 'Address to the Sun,' are, to this day, found among old people who learned them from their fathers, who had again got them from theirs, and so on. The legitimate traditional lineage of every one of these pieces can even yet be traced back with ease for at least a hundred years, in a good number of Highland cottages where heroic poetry is never seen in print.

In the middle of last century, and before Macpherson published his far-famed work, 'Ossian and Eivir-Alin' was one of the most popular of Gaelic ballads, as may be seen by a reference to the correspondence printed by the Highland Society in their report on 'Ossian.' It is also found in all the collections of Gaelic poetry. The different versions of it all agree in their essential features. The age of the ballad it would not be easy to determine. It is probably one of the oldest of all the Ossianic fragments.

* The paradise of the ancient Celts, Fiath-innis, or the Heroes Isle—a word now appropriated to a sacred use—was supposed to lie in the Western Ocean. There was another place called Eilean na-h-Oigé, or the Island of Youth, which is still frequently spoken of in Highland tales. I once heard a long story told in prose in which it made a considerable figure. It differed, however, from the above, or at any rate did not accord with the old bard's idea of Fiath-innis. For there were not only an uninterrupted felicity and unfading youth enjoyed in Eilean na-h-Oigé, but there were also activity and consciousness—not sleep. Neither was it a place for disembodied spirits merely. The story I speak of represented a man having been carried thither by a fairy wife whom he had married; and with whom he had lived for some years in the world. He was a middle-aged man when he was carried off, but his youth was renewed in even more than its early bloom whenever he set foot on the island. He stayed there, with the most perfect enjoyment, for a few weeks, as appeared to him. Then he expressed a wish to go back and see another wife and family whom he had left behind him in his own home. His wish was complied with, after he had promised his fairy wife to return with her whenever his curiosity was gratified. He was carried back as he had been at first carried away, in the shape of a swan, his fairy wife accompanying him. He was set down on his own old farm; but as soon as he touched the soil he became extremely aged and withered-looking—a mere fistful of a man, the narrator said. His fairy wife then left him for a short time, and he wandered about, exciting a great deal of curiosity in all who saw him, but knowing nobody, and even noticing changes in the very localities he had been so familiar with, as he had thought, about a year before. At last some people that were working in a field near by gathered about him. To them he told his story; and one of them recollected having heard his grandfather speaking of a great farmer to whom that place once belonged, and who had suddenly disappeared one day, many many years ago, no one knew whither. A little after this, the old man's fairy wife returned, and carried him off, in the shape of a swan. He was never more seen in the world at all. So much for Eilean na-h-Oigé.

* At this place Mrs. Grant of Laggan—who has given a translation of the 'Old Bard's Wish' among her poems, published 1838—makes the following remark:—"As there is very little ice or snow in the islands, great numbers of swans come here from Norway in the beginning of winter. Some stay to breed, but they mostly go northward in summer. This furnishes the bard with the fine image, very strongly expressed in the original, of the north wind bearing towards him the moan of the departed; upon which he inquires of the swan from what distant country that well-known voice came. This affords him a chance for digressing."

OSSIAN AND EVIR-ALIN.

A POET'S WOOING LONG AGO.

Who is this friend that would soothe my grief
 Who comes my age to cheer?
 I know that light step and that gentle approach—
 It is thou, my daughter dear!

Daughter! a time was when I, now so weak,
 Could speed in the wild roe's flight;
 When I, now so blind, could the beacon descry
 Far off in the dim dark night.

The time has been when with sounding step
 Away with the chieftains I'd wend;
 Though this night thou must see me so lonely and sad,
 Without father, son, or friend.

My son! O my hero! how mournful the tale
 Which Cona's slow wave tells of thee!
 And Fingal and Fillan are all pass'd away;
 Not one of the leaders I see.

Alas! and my sight too has faded,
 Nought around I descry or above;
 Gone is the hue of my youth—all is gone;
 But the grave cannot alter my love.

White-handed maiden! this night though you see me
 Old and forlorn in this place,
 Renown'd have I been as a hero
 In my youth, with the bloom on my face:

On that day when soft-hair'd Evir-Alin,
 White-arm'd maiden follow'd me,
 Daughter of Branno of the silver beakers,
 Of many loved, herself of love still free.

Sons of kings and sons of nobles,
 She refused them great or small;
 Cormac woo'd her, gloomy chieftain,
 But him she hated worst of all.

Her I resolved to win, for I loved her
 With pure heart and steadfast truth;
 And with twelve of Fingal's chiefs I went;
 We strode in the strength of youth.

We came to the dark lake of Lego;
 There a noble chief came to meet
 And conduct us with honour to Branno—
 With honour and welcomings sweet.

Me he saluted—the twelve youths he hail'd;
 We sat with Branno at the feast;
 But ere the evening pass'd away,
 Ere yet the mirth had ceased,

Branno inquired, 'What is your purpose?
 What would you have of me?'
 And Calta said, 'We seek thy daughter,
 Her would we have of thee.'

Then Branno said, 'But which of you would have her?'
 'Fingal's son,' said Calta: 'this is he.'
 'Mighty hero of the wide ship havens,
 Happy is the maid gets thee.'

'So high the place, O Ossian!
 Do men's tongues to thee assign,
 If I twelve daughters had,' said Branno,
 'The best of them should be thine.'

Then they open'd the choice and spare chamber,
 That was shielded with down from the cold;
 The posts of its doors were of polish'd bone,
 And the leaves were of good yellow gold.

Soon as generous Evir-Alin
 Saw Ossian, Fingal's son,
 The love of her youth by the hero,
 By me, young maid, was won.

Then we left the dark lake of Lego,
 And homeward took our way;
 But Cormac, fierce Cormac, waylaid us,
 Intent on the furious fray.

Eight heroes Cormac had with him,
 And their men behind them stood;
 The hillside flamed with their armour.
 - Their spears were raised like a wood.

Eight heroes with Cormac the stately,
 Of the Firlbolgs the best at need;
 MacColla and Durra of wounds, and Tago,
 And Toscar's son good to lead;

Fredal the dangerous son of the king,
 And Dalro joyful and bland;
 With Dall in straits hardy and good,
 He had Cormac's flag in his hand.

Eight came with Ossian the lofty,
 All equal to shield him in war;
 Mulla and Skeno's son the generous,
 True Skellachie known near and far.

Fillan and Calrdal the rash were there,
 And the black son of Revl fierce and wight;
 And Toscar placed on the western flank
 March'd with my standard to fight.

Toscar and Dall met face to face;
 Fierce was their strife and long,
 Like the winds that rush forth on the ocean
 When the waves are heavy and strong.

Toscar remember'd his little knife,
 'Twas a weapon he loved to hold;
 Nine wounds he gave to Dall, and then
 The foe before us we roll'd.

But Cormac fiercely roused them, and look'd
 Like the hammer a strong hand wields;
 While he shouted and roar'd, and rush'd through the fight,
 And struck on our helmets and shields.

Five times he dash'd on my buckler;
 Five times I hur'd him back,
 Ere I struck him down on the greensward,
 Cormac in battle not slack.

I swept the head from his shoulders,
 And held it up in my hand;
 His troops then fled, and we came with joy
 To Fingal's mountain land.

Whoe'er had told me on that day,
 I should be thus weak to-night,
 Firm must his heart have been, and strong
 His arm in the wild and desperate fight.

'So Ossian won his Genevieve—his bright and beauteous bride.' This is one of the very few tales which that old poet, prince, and warrior, is represented telling of himself. He certainly cannot be accused of being too much his own hero. This little ballad is decidedly Homeric. The feasting and the fighting are both quite in the spirit of the Greek. The manners are very ancient. The mode in which the wooing was conducted; in which the welcome was given; in which the business of the guests was asked and stated; in which Cormac's jealousy and wish for revenge were shown; the numbering of the heroes, with their epithets on each side; the combat between Toscar and Dall and between Cormac and Ossian; and the description of the spare chamber, thatched with the down of birds, with the posts of its doors of polished bone and the leaves of gold;—all these things will remind us again and again of Homer. Indeed this may be considered altogether a very interesting as well as a very old and venerable fragment.

stantiate the correctness of that opinion, by showing wherein the system falls short of, or is hindered from, attaining its true purpose.

As our law at present stands, before sentence can pass against a prisoner charged with any of the more serious crimes, he must undergo a trial before, and have his case decided by, a few men, ignorant entirely of the principles of criminal jurisprudence. Indeed, many persons boast of this institution, and look upon it in the light of a great national virtue, that no man can be punished for any very serious crime unless found guilty of its commission by, in England, the unanimous voice of a jury of his countrymen, and, in Scotland, by the majority of the jury. This being the case, the first matter which demands attention is the character of the jury—how far they are capable of discriminating and giving due weight to conflicting evidence; of deciding what is and what is not evidence applicable to the case immediately before them; of selecting that evidence from the mass of proof to which they have listened; of giving a proper weight, and attaching a proper degree of importance, to such selected evidence; of distributing it between the case for the prosecution and the case for the defence, according as it is in favour of the one or the other; and of arriving—from a consideration of that evidence, and it alone—at a correct solution of the question which they are empanelled to decide.

To do all this in a careful and satisfactory manner is no easy task, and yet such is only a part of the work which a jury have to perform. It is not every lawyer who is capable of executing such a task correctly; much less, then, must it be the case with men whose ordinary occupations and pursuits are of a nature totally different—men who would never, perhaps, during a whole lifetime passed in the fulfilment of their ordinary duties, be called upon to decide the most simple question of conflicting evidence.

As a general rule, are jurymen capable of deciding questions of evidence, conflicting and otherwise? Of what class of individuals is the jury composed?

The qualification for serving as a jurymen is a money and not an educational qualification. A jury must therefore comprise men of all degrees of mental refinement—from the ignorant clodhopper, in possession of a little worldly wealth, to men of the most profound learning and talent. As the latter are the least common in the world, it necessarily follows that the former make the majority of juries, which is considerably increased by the fact that lawyers of all classes, ministers, doctors, professors in colleges, army and navy officers, parochial schoolmasters—in short, the very cream of educated men are exempted from serving, and of course never serve, as jurymen. This will give an idea of what is likely to be the general character of a jury.

But it is said that a jury have only to decide a question of fact—yes or no; that they have not to decide any question of law. And this being so, the individuals of which a jury is generally composed are quite capable of deciding a question of fact, without a knowledge of the rules of evidence—as much so as if they had studied these rules; that a fact is a fact all the world over; and that every man is capable of deciding when he is satisfied that a certain fact has been established. Besides, there is always the judge to explain any difficulty to the jury.

This is very true. The jury have only to decide a question of fact; but before that question can be decided, there are, in the vast majority of trials, a great many of the rules of evidence brought into play, which, to a non-professional person, seem to clash with each other, and involve the question in greater doubt than ever. Jurymen have to apply these rules. They have to accept some statements and throw aside others. They have to place one portion of the evidence, as it were, to the credit of the prosecution, and another portion to the credit of the defence. They have to throw aside and pay not the slightest regard to statements which do not bear directly on the case—which are not strict evidence (and to decide what is and what is not strict evidence is often a most difficult matter). And when all this is done, they have carefully to weigh the evidence in the balance, with an even hand, giving not the slightest degree of preponderance to one side more than to the other, but attaching to each proved fact its true legal importance; and, having carefully weighed the evidence, to decide in favour of the prisoner, or against him, as the evidence may warrant. This is a difficult task to fulfil. It is a task which the jury, unless compelled to perform, would shrink from. And yet it is not all. It often happens that there is very little, and sometimes no, direct evidence; but that the proof is all of a circumstantial or *presumptive character. This increases the difficulty of the task imposed on the jury a hundredfold. They have not only to decide matters of fact; but, after they have decided matters of fact, they must consider the various credible inferences which it is possible to deduce from such facts—a task which of itself involves questions of the most subtle nature, requiring often the highest intellect for their solution, and all cases a clear logical mind, trained for the work. The consequences of a wrong application of the rules of evidence, or a deduction of an erroneous inference are fearful to contemplate, and have often been exemplified.

Such are a few of the duties which juries have to perform; and in the vast majority of cases, the jury could scarcely be more unfitted for the task imposed upon them. If a jury are to decide the question of a prisoner's guilt or innocence, such jury should be composed—in trials for murder, at least—of men of the greatest intellect—men capable of discerning and discriminating, with clear heads to solve difficult problems, to deduce inferences, weigh conflicting evidence, and apply the result with firmness, confidence, and even-handed justice. The judge may be a man of this stamp, and his charge may be one which it would be well, perhaps, to follow; but, can the judge always rely upon the capacity of the jury to follow and appreciate his charge, and to accept his explanations of conflicting evidence, instead of following their own confused notions on the subject?

In trials for murder, it often happens that insanity is pleaded in defence. Medical testimony is adduced, alike for the prosecution and for the defence—the one flatly contradicting the other. Now, insanity is one of the most difficult studies within the range of the medical profession, requiring long years of incessant application; it embraces questions upon which the most eminent professional men appear to differ. Does it not seem strange, then, that it should be left to those comprising the jury—to whom in almost every case the evidence adduced pro and con is as unintelligible as if it had been given in an unknown tongue—to determine between the conflicting opinions of medical men? Is it likely that they will arrive at a correct result? I think not. But the other day, Alexander Milne was tried before the High Court of Justiciary for the murder of James Paterson, his dearest friend. Insanity was pleaded, and the evidence went clearly to establish the plea. His conduct, at the party which he gave on Christmas night, was not that of a person in his proper mind. But, besides, the evidence of the medical witnesses, by whom he had been examined after the murder on behalf of the Crown, as well as that of the other medical gentlemen examined for the defence, was conclusive, so far as evidence can be conclusive, of insanity. The address of the Solicitor-General (Mr. Young), who conducted the prosecution, was mild in the extreme, as if he had been impressed with a belief in the prisoner's insanity. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Glencorse) seems to have been of the same opinion, as was evidenced by his observations during the trial as well as by his charge. But, in the face of all this, the jury returned a verdict (by a majority) of guilty—thus showing that they believed Milne to have been perfectly sane when the murder was committed, as well as at the time of the trial. Similar instances might be multiplied; but I take the most recent case which has occurred under my knowledge, and I consider it a very strong illustration of the truth of my observations, for the jury in this case seem to have gone contrary to the opinions of the medical witnesses, judge, and counsel for the prosecution.

Juries, again, are liable to be guided by prejudices and preconceived opinions in arriving at their verdict. Although it appears simple, it is really a very difficult matter to lay aside preconceived opinions, and accept only proved facts in determining any question of difficulty. Besides, if a jurymen is unable to follow a counsel's line of argument, or to appreciate any of the evidence adduced by him for the defence, such arguments and evidence do not receive their proper weight, and sometimes no weight whatever; because, if the jury do not see the force, or the object of such arguments or evidence, they very naturally, perhaps, conclude that they do not bear upon the case, and consequently pay no heed to them in arriving at their decision. It may not be in the power of the prisoner's counsel to avoid this, and that for two reasons. He cannot be expected to know the mental capacity of each member of the jury, nor can he make the evidence so as to meet their intelligence.—Again, when any very great crime is committed, the newspapers take up, and comment upon, every little circumstance which comes to light, and many little circumstances which never come to light at all—the prisoner's conduct, and various other matters. These comments the jury can scarcely fail to read; and, long before they are aware that they are to sit in judgment upon the prisoner, they have formed their opinion, individually, as to his guilt or innocence; and it is a very difficult matter for them to renounce such preconceived opinions. It is much easier to form an opinion of a prisoner's guilt or innocence from newspaper articles, than, once having formed that opinion, to be convinced that it is erroneous. Every circumstance which turns up, in the course of the trial, of a nature favourable to the prisoner, the jurymen, who has already formed an opinion of such prisoner's guilt or innocence, places against his preconceived opinion, and endeavours to satisfy himself that the circumstances proved are insufficient to make him renounce that opinion. This is manifestly unfair to the prisoner; but it is, nevertheless, often true. And even suppose such jurymen should be compelled to admit that these circumstances are too strong for his opinion to be retained, he still has a hankering that his preconceived opinion was the correct one, and that there are other circumstances unproved, which, if brought to light, would show this; and, consequently, the prisoner does not receive the full benefit of the evidence adduced on his behalf. The jurymen is convinced against his will, and we know that 'a man convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still.' It is a very fine theory, that jurymen give up their preconceived opinions when they enter the jury-box; but, alas! for the theory; jurymen are but mortal; they do not differ from other men; and so it follows that this very fine theory seldom becomes more than a theory; the jury continue to hold the opinions which they individually entertained before they became jurymen, and, consequently, the evidence adduced does not receive that weight to which it is entitled. The law believes the prisoner innocent until proved guilty; but the law is in the hands of the jury, who, in most cases, believe the prisoner guilty until proved innocent. The reverse is the exception and not the rule.

I have stated a few of the objections which exist to trials by jury. Other objections might be stated; but I consider that what I have said is sufficient to prove the statement I made in the outset, that they are inconsistent and at variance with the proper administration of justice. If, as I believe, the system is an erroneous one, no one will deny that the sooner a change is introduced the better. That the present system, on the whole, works very well I admit; but why should an erroneous system be continued when a remedy is simple and easy of attainment?

I do not see that there could be any objection to the abolition of trials by jury. The only circumstance in favour of such trials is, that the verdict is not the decision of a single individual; but it is doubtful whether this is a favourable circumstance, when considered along with the objections stated above. Whether it be favourable or not, however, matters little; for, suppose it to be favourable, the objections which exist to trials by jury are of a much more weighty nature than anything which can be said in their favour.

But, supposing trials by jury were to be abolished, what system could be introduced which would be safer and better? This is a question for the legal authorities to decide; but there is one system which to me appears preferable, and which I consider would give more general satisfaction—trial by skilled lawyers alone. I would not have a single lawyer to try the more serious crimes, such as murder. In a trial for murder, there might be three or five judges, the verdict of a majority deciding the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. This would be much fairer and more just. An innocent prisoner would have the benefit of his case being investigated by men trained for the purpose of investigating such cases, by whom every circumstance weighing against him, if not strictly legal evidence, would be cast aside and paid no attention to. His case would be decided by men capable of appreciating, and justly weighing, the evidence adduced, and the arguments of his counsel. He could depend that the judgment pronounced, whether for or against him, would not be biassed by preconceived notions and opinions, formed upon newspaper paragraphs. Every tittle of evidence would be carefully tested before being admitted as proof against the prisoner; and, if the case were one dependent for its solution on circumstantial or presumptive evidence, the really innocent prisoner would have the satisfaction of knowing that only those inferences or presumptions would be deduced from the evidence which a logical mind would draw from the facts proved. He would also be sure to receive the benefit of any doubt which might exist; and, on the whole, he would be more certain to receive justice than he can be under the present system, for his fate would never hang upon the verdict of ignorance.

The subject of trials by jury is one deserving of full consideration, and free criticism upon the part alike of the legislature and the press. It is not one to be gone into hurriedly; for, in that case, bad might only be made worse. It is of importance to the country at large, for criminal jurisprudence is as worthy of reform as civil jurisprudence. The well-being and prosperity of the country within itself depends largely upon the effective state of our criminal machinery.

HERBERT GRAHAM.

MARY GORDON'S FIRST DAYS AT SCHOOL. CHAPTER IV.

Mary's first day at school had been indeed a success; and next morning she rose earlier than usual, that she might revise all her lessons—determined that this day should be quite as successful. But alas! in this expectation she was to be miserably disappointed; and it must be acknowledged that, although naturally of a very amiable disposition, Mary could be very naughty indeed, and thoughtless to a degree that often brought her into much trouble.

She rung the bell for Rachel to dress her, when a young servant-girl appeared who had lately been hired as an assistant-housemaid.

'What do you want, Nancy?' said Mary.

'I came, miss, to tell you that Rachel was sent for late last night, by her sister, whose little girl is dangerously ill; and Mrs. Gordon gave her leave to go, that she might assist in nursing her through the night, and said I might take Rachel's place this morning, and help you to dress.'

'Help me to dress, indeed! And a pretty-like help you will make!' exclaimed Mary, scornfully—for she was greatly chagrined at Rachel's absence, as she wanted to talk to her about school. 'You may walk down stairs again, for I can dress myself without you; and I wonder what you can know about dressing a girl like me?'

'Oh, miss!' said Nancy, 'I did not think you would speak that way to a servant. I am sure I don't want to dress you; but before Rachel went away, she directed me about all I should have to do for you and Master William. And I know I can do all that is required, if you will allow me.'

'No; I shall not allow you. You may go and awake Willie, and dress him, but I am quite able both to wash and dress myself; and if I happen to want you, I shall call for you,' said she, in a tone of assumed authority.

Nancy made no reply, but left her, and went into Willie's room, the door of which opened off the nursery where Mary slept; and in a few minutes she heard her little brother's voice, newly awakened out of sleep. 'Why have you come to awake me, Nancy? Is Rachel coming to dress me?'

Nancy gave him the same explanation she had given Mary, and he continued—

'It is a pity the little girl is so ill, and I would like Rachel to dress me; but I daresay you will dress me very well, Nancy.'

'That I shall, Master William,' she said, in a cheerful voice; 'and I am very happy to dress so good a boy.'

Mary felt a little conscience-stricken; but she proceeded with her own toilet, and succeeded wonderfully well, until she came to the combing of her hair, for the comb unfortunately got entangled among the long curls that hung in clusters on her neck, and she was quite unable to proceed. She became impatient and cross, and pulled with such violence and so untowardly at her poor head, that she only made matters worse.

By this time, Willie's toilet was completed, and he appeared at the door, refreshed by his morning ablutions—his hair nicely brushed and dressed, his countenance rosy and smiling.

'Good morning, Mary, dear. I see you are not dressed yet! and this is such a beautiful morning. I am going out into the garden for a little. Will you come when you are ready?'

'No; I have other things to do, so go yourself; and come you, Mistress Nancy, and comb out my hair.'

She was now looking like one of the Furies; for her hair was in a perfect uproar, and her face, flushed with her exertions, wore an angry expression.

Nancy commenced her task, and with difficulty succeeded in extricating the comb from the entangled hair, and then she tried to unravel and smooth it as gently as possible; but it was a difficult and tedious operation, and Mary's small stock of patience was fast giving way. At length, when her head was sorely hurt by some hard pulls, she turned quickly round, facing Nancy, seized the comb out of her hand, and flung it on the floor; and, when Nancy stooped to lift it, she pulled her cap off her head, and dashed out her comb, rudely tossing her hair about her shoulders.

'That is to pay you back, you stupid girl, for meddling at my hair, and spoiling it, and hurting me so much.'

'It was yourself, Miss, that spoiled it; and I wonder you are not ashamed to behave as you have done to me this morning. I am glad I am not your maid, and obliged to dress you every day, Miss Mary; and it surprises me that Rachel is so fond of you.'

Nancy lifted her comb, and fastened up her hair, and was proceeding to put on her cap, when she was attacked anew by her little tormentor, who leaped from the floor that she might seize her cap, and pull it off again. Nancy defended herself, and a noisy struggle ensued, when the door was suddenly opened, and Mrs. Gordon walked into the nursery.

'What is the meaning of all this?' she said, looking from one to the other, in astonishment.

Mary clasped her hands, and looked down on the floor, and Nancy was ready to cry with vexation.

'Mrs. Gordon, ma'am, I am sorry to tell you the truth, but Miss Mary has been very naughty this morning,' and she related exactly all that had happened.

'Is it possible?' said Mrs. Gordon. 'I could not have supposed my little girl capable of such rude and unfeeling behaviour, to a servant who was trying to fill another's place, and doing all in her power to be useful; and who, because she was a stranger, should have received better treatment on that very account.'

'And now, Mary, if you do not let me hear you apologise immediately for your naughty conduct, I shall keep you at home to-day from Miss Weston's school, and explain to her the cause of your absence.'

'Oh! don't, mamma,' she said, in great alarm, 'and I shall make an apology. Nancy, I am very sorry, indeed, that I pulled off your cap, and was so rude to you, and I shall try never to be so again; and I shall stand quite still now, if you will be so good as finish the dressing of my hair.'

'No, indeed, Nancy,' said Mrs. Gordon; 'you shall do nothing more for her; she does not deserve it. I shall finish the dressing of her hair myself; and, meantime, you may go down stairs and give Thomas this sovereign, for which I wish him to get change in silver; and tell him there are two gentlemen coming to breakfast this morning with Mr. Gordon, and I think breakfast will be a little later than usual; and you may tell him, at the same time, to bring Miss Mary's breakfast up to the nursery, as she is to breakfast alone.'

'Oh please, mamma, don't let him do that; for I want so much to breakfast with papa and the two gentlemen.'

'I daresay you do, Mary. But you have behaved so badly this morning, that I wish you not only to confess you have done wrong, but to feel it, and remember it.'

'Well, mamma, I am sure I feel it; and I shall try always to remember it if you will only allow me to go down to breakfast.'

'No, Mary; I shall not allow you.'

'Then will you let Willie breakfast with me?'

'No, indeed. Willie has been a good child, and shall breakfast with us in the dining-room.'

Mary now gave way to a violent fit of weeping, and continued to shed floods of tears while her mamma finished the dressing of her hair.

Mrs. Gordon took no notice of her tears, but, opening the window which overlooked the garden, called to Willie to come in; and he immediately laid aside his little spade, with which he was busily employed digging in his garden, and ran up to the nursery.

Mrs. Gordon then seated herself between the children, and heard them read their morning chapter from St. John's Gospel—questioning and instructing them verse by verse. When it was finished, she told Mary, that as Rachel was still absent, Nancy would walk with her to school; and she must remember to stay beside her, and be careful when crossing streets to keep out of the way of carriages. 'I regret much,' she said, 'that Rachel happens to be absent this morning; but far more do I grieve that your own behaviour obliges me to leave you here alone. But I trust, my dear Mary, that it will not occur again. And, meantime, I advise you to occupy your time looking over your lessons, until Thomas brings up your breakfast; and he will send up Nancy when it is time for you to go to school.'

She left the nursery, accompanied by Willie, who turned wistful looks on Mary as he went out.

'Mamma!' he said, as they went down stairs, 'I wish you would allow me to go back and get breakfast with Mary?'

'No, Willie; I shall not allow you. I wish Mary to breakfast alone.'

CHAPTER V.

Now that she was left alone, Mary shed some bitter tears. But, alas! they were not tears of repentance; for the evil spirit of jealousy was taking possession of her mind, and her thoughts were becoming more rebellious than ever.

'Mamma is turning very very cruel to me,' she said to herself; 'for yesterday she refused to buy me that pretty wax-doll I wanted so much, and which was only a shilling; and this morning she has refused to let me go down stairs to breakfast, although she has taken Willie down with her; and she makes such a pet of Willie, that he has grown a nasty, disagreeable, spoiled boy, and I shall not play with him any more. I suppose they will set him up at table next to Dr. Irving, who I know is one of the gentlemen that are coming to breakfast; and he will talk so kindly to him; and Willie thinks himself so pretty and so wise, he will set up his face and talk; and they will all listen to him, and admire him;—and not one of them will ever think of me, sitting up here all alone!' And again she wept bitterly. But tears she found were unavailing; and the remembrance of school and of Miss Weston coming fortunately to her aid, she took her books, and continued busily engaged with her lessons until Thomas appeared, carrying a small tray with her breakfast.

'I am sorry you have to breakfast alone, Miss Mary; and I have come early, that I may make you ready for school before I go to wait breakfast down stairs. But you must be quick, for if the bell rings I shall have to leave you.'

'Well, Thomas, you may just go away at once, and forsake me, like all the rest; for I don't care for any breakfast; and you can go and stand at the back of Willie's chair, and help him to everything he wants.'

'Come, come, Miss Mary; you must not speak that way.' And the old servant placed her kindly at table; and then taking out her walking dress, arranged everything, in readiness for her putting on.

Mary was greatly comforted by his presence, and certainly took her breakfast with a better appetite than could have been expected from her own predictions; but she had scarcely finished when the bell rang, and Thomas hurried away.

Mary dressed herself as quickly as possible, for she was unwilling to remain longer alone; and collecting her school-books in a leathern reticule, hung it over her arm, and ran down stairs, expecting to find Thomas in the butler's pantry, and that he would tell her the hour, and if it was time to call Nancy to accompany her to school.

In passing the dining-room, she stood for some minutes to listen, for there was a sound of lively conversation going on within; and she could distinguish her papa's voice talking so cheerfully to his visitors, that it was with great difficulty she restrained herself from opening the door and going in; but her mamma's prohibition recurred painfully to her mind, and again her foolish heart became darkened by an unhappy sense of having received injustice. In this miserable frame of mind, she sought for Thomas, but found he had gone into the dining-room. And now came the greatest and most unlooked for temptation that had befallen Mary, and into which, alas! she was to fall.

On a table in the pantry lay the change of the sovereign Mrs. Gordon had sent by Nancy to Thomas, which seemed to Mary a store of silver; and, as she stood looking at it, the following evil thoughts suggested themselves:—'What lots of money mamma has! And yet she will not give me a single shilling to buy a doll I would like so much to have. But I am quite sure if it had been Willie, she would have let him have it. Oh yes! she would have gone into the shop and bought it for him. Spoiled boy! I have a good mind to take one of these shillings and buy it for myself. I don't believe she would ever miss it; and I shall take good care to keep the doll out of her sight. Sophy's clothes will just fit it, so I shall have no clothes to get. How nice it will be to take it to school with me, and show it to Fanny Wallace! And I shall tell her I intend to name it for her.' This last idea was so delightful, that it filled up the measure of her temptation; and—oh miserable moment for poor foolish Mary!—the little hand was stretched out—the shilling taken, and clasped close within her palm! She hurried out of the pantry; and, thinking she heard the dining-room door opened, she fled like a bird through the hall out into the street, and continued to run at her utmost speed, often glancing behind her to see if there was not some one pursuing her. Her mamma's directions about Nancy going with her, and keeping out of the way of carriages, were all forgotten; and she rushed on, forgetful of everything in the world but that there was a shilling in her hand, and—oh dreadful thought!—that she had stolen it!

For a moment she thought of running back and replacing it; but it was too late, for she would likely meet the breakfast party coming out, or Thomas would be in the pantry and ask what she had come back for. So on she ran, with undiminished speed, until she reached the toy-shop, very much heated and out of breath.

'Give me that little wax-doll out of the window,' she called to the shopwoman; 'and be as quick as you can, please. Wrap it up in paper, and give me the parcel; and there is the shilling.' She flung it across the counter as if glad to be quit of it, and thrusting the parcel into her bag, was gone, as suddenly as she had entered, leaving the shopwoman so much astonished that she came to the door and stood gazing after her until she was out of sight. She was too much exhausted now to run, but she walked on quickly, grasping her reticule tightly in her hands, and thinking every one that passed was looking at her suspiciously!

CHAPTER VI.

It was a lovely breezy morning, with bright sunshine; and as Mary turned into Russel-square she saw a party of young ladies walking in the garden, in the centre of the square, and heard them laughing and chatting merrily; and as they came towards a gate in the iron railing, opposite Miss Weston's house, she recognised some of her friends of yesterday, and saw Fanny Wallace running towards her.

'Good morning, Mary,' she said, shaking hands with her. 'I am glad you have come so early, for we are taking our morning walk, and Miss Gray says that, as it is only half-past nine, we may go round the garden once more. So come away with us.'

'I am very glad to go with you,' said Mary, taking a long breath. 'I did not think it was so early, but I did not know the hour when I left home.'

Mary's voice and manner were so unlike herself that Fanny looked in her face inquisitively.

'Mary,' she said, 'I am afraid you are not well, for you are very much heated. Has anything happened to frighten you?'

'Oh no, dear Fanny; nothing has happened to frighten me, and I am quite well,' she said, trying to assume her usual manner; 'and I have something I want to show you when we go into the dressing-room.'

They had now joined the other girls, and Miss Duncan accosted Mary.

'How do you do, Miss Gordon? I hope you are well prepared for school, and that you have practised your music properly for old Mrs. Thalberg! You seem to be rather a pet of hers; at least, she had more mercy on your fingers than poor Kate Brown's. I wrote my French exercise this morning beside that poor creature, while she drummed away at these horrid five-finger exercises, until the drums of my ears were in torture.'

Miss Brown, who was one of the walking party, was in fits of laughter; and Miss Gray, who had overheard the misnomer given to Miss Taylor, told Miss Duncan, that if she spoke in this way, and gave her teachers impertinent names, she would inform Miss Weston, who, she knew, would not allow it. 'And I do believe,' she added, 'you are the only girl in the school, Miss Duncan, who would do such a thing.'

'Now, really, Miss Gray, that is too bad, and you are doing me injustice; for Thalberg, I am sure, is a grand name to give a musician, especially a pianist like Miss Taylor; and I take you all to witness that Miss Mary Gordon is far worse than me, for yesterday she called Miss Weston and Miss Gray by the disgraceful title of geese!'

They all laughed so merrily that even Mary was restored to a degree of her own cheerfulness, and forgot, for a little, the painful events of the morning; and when their walk was over, and they were ascending the steps at the hall door, Miss Weston looked from the window and smiled kindly to her. Mary tried to return her salutation with her usual affectionate frankness; but her next thought was, 'Oh, how glad I am she does not know what I have done!'

In the dressing-room, however, the contents of her bag were displayed to Fanny Wallace; and, 'Oh, Mary,' she said, 'what a pretty little doll!'

'Is it not lovely?' said Mary. 'And, do you know, it has such a likeness to you, that its name is to be Fanny Wallace.'

'Oh, dear me,' said Fanny laughing; 'that is a great honour, and I think I shall have to make it a present; for I once heard mamma say, when somebody named a little girl for her—"I shall have to give that child a frock."'

'You are very kind to think of that,' said Mary; 'but my old doll, Sophy, has so many clothes that Fanny will get the best part of them, and will not require anything new; and if Miss Weston will allow you to come to our house on Saturday, we shall dress it.' But now Mary's thoughts seemed to receive a check; for, she added in a lower voice, we shall go up to the nursery, and shut ourselves in; and I shall not let Willie come in, he is such a troublesome boy.'

'Did your mamma give you this doll?' said Fanny. Mary's countenance changed, but she recovered herself, and replied evasively—'No, she did not give it me; but it was bought with her money, which is very much the same thing.'

'Does she allow you pocket-money?' asked Fanny quite unsuspectingly.

'Sometimes I get a little, but I never have it long in my pocket,' said Mary. 'Do you?'

'I don't get any to keep myself; but papa gives Miss Weston a small sum to keep for me, and she gives me a little when I want it, if she thinks it right.'

They were here interrupted by Miss Gray coming to call them to their Bible lesson, with which the duties of the day commenced, and which was given by Miss Weston herself.

Mary wrapped up the doll hurriedly, and replaced it in her bag, thinking, while she did so—'It is strange that I feel none of the pleasure I expected, although I have shown Fanny the doll, and she is so much pleased with it. And now I don't care for it. And oh I wish I had never bought it!'

They went up stairs together in very different spirits; for Mary was a drooping little figure, with her bag hanging heavily on her arm and still more heavily on her mind; while Fanny Wallace tripped up gaily, singing all the way.

Mary got through most of her lessons quite as well as on the previous day; but all the keen interest she had then felt in everybody and everything that was going on, seemed now to have left her; and more than once, when she found Miss Weston regarding her with a look of grave inquiry, she turned from her and avoided her eye. 'How is it,' she thought, 'that school seems so different to-day from yesterday? And Miss Weston looks at me as if she was afraid I had done something wrong; and I don't like to look in her face, although I love her so much!'

Poor Mary imagined all was changed; but she did not realise that the change was in herself, and that she had spoiled her own happiness for the whole day by the great faults she had committed in the morning.

Her music lesson was played correctly, but without expression; and almost as if she neither felt nor cared about what she was doing; and Miss Taylor, having heard her play so much better on the former day, became first impatient, and then angry.

'Come, come, child!' she said. 'Arouse yourself, and let me see you make some exertion. What in the world is the matter with you? Are you half asleep, or have you not got your breakfast this morning?'

The question was meant for a joke; but it was an unfortunate one for poor Mary—giving rise to such miserable thoughts that her musical powers seemed all to desert her; for although she tried to do better, her playing became worse and worse.

'Stop, stop!' said Miss Taylor, pulling her hands off the keys; 'and let me ask you a question—Can you play any better if you choose to try? And she spoke in a peremptory tone, laying a strong emphasis on the first and last words of her question.

Mary was alarmed by her manner, but she answered simply—'No, ma'am.' And had Miss Taylor known she was really speaking the truth, she would have made allowance for her, for she was neither ill-tempered nor unjust, although a firm and indefatigable teacher; but she attributed Mary's answer to stubbornness, and became really angry.

'You are a very provoking, naughty child, indeed,' she said, lifting her off the piano-stool; 'and I shall not hear you play another note until you confess to me that you can play better if you choose; for I know you can. I can scarcely believe you to be the same little Mary Gordon who played so well to me yesterday; and I shall take care to tell Miss Weston how greatly you have disappointed me.'

This was too much for poor Mary, whose untold misery had been sufficiently overwhelming; and she burst into tears, and stood weeping at Miss Taylor's side, with her hands clasped, as if to implore she would make another trial of her.

'You need not stand there any longer,' said Miss Taylor; 'I have no more time for you to-day, but let me see you try to do better to-morrow. You may go and take Miss Maxwell's seat at the end of that desk, and she will play her lesson.'

Mary did as she was desired, still weeping bitterly; and Miss Duncan, next to whom she was now seated, was moved to such pity at sight of her distress, that she determined she would try to divert the current of her thoughts.

Waiting until she heard the piano sounding, and saw that Miss Taylor's attention was occupied, she spoke in a whisper—'I see you are not such a pet as I supposed; but don't distress yourself, it is not worth minding. I am quite sure, from looking at your sorrowful face, that you require some refreshment, and would be much the better of a little ink;' and she lifted an ink-bottle from the desk, and placed it before her. 'Will you allow me the pleasure of taking ink with you?' she said, raising the bottle to her lips and bowing her head.

Mary, with tears on her cheeks, and yet ready to laugh, gave her a deprecating look, and shook her head. 'You won't take it! Well then, I can't help it; but I shall drink myself to the health of old Thalberg, and, of course, you understand I mean the great German pianist.' Again she raised the ink-bottle, and was in the act of bowing her head towards Miss Taylor, when—oh, unlucky moment!—that lady suddenly turned her head to look at Mary, and so startled was Miss Duncan that she dropped the bottle on the desk, upsetting it, and sending the contents in dingy little streams over her spotted muslin dress.

Mary started quickly from her seat, that she might escape from sharing the blame, as well as the ink, which was collecting in small pools on the floor; and Miss Taylor rose and rang the bell—looking at Miss Duncan with an expression of disgust. 'Mr. Macaulay,' she said, 'I beg you will observe that girl's behaviour. I am glad to leave her to your direction; and wish I may have nothing more to do with her.'

She returned to Miss Maxwell's lesson; and Mr. Macaulay rose from an adjoining desk, where he had been writing some words for a pupil, and was advancing towards the scene of the disaster, when Miss Gray appeared at the door to call Mary out, telling her to go and get ready quickly, for her mamma had come for her and was in the drawing-room with Miss Weston, and the carriage waiting at the door.

THE COMING HOUR.

WHEN I shall have gone, be it late or soon,
Not many things would I care to know
Of the world above, in its changeful tune,
While I sleep at peace below.

Unless I could think of the seasons' bloom—
Each lovely by turn; of the violet's breath;
When children were playing around my tomb,
Unmadden'd by fear of death.

I would like to know that young loving eyes
Found beauty in earth and a hope beyond;
While their calm soul mirror'd the calmer skies,
Nor sigh'd at some galling bond;

How man and his ways, from year to year,
Grew holier, happier, rising still
To a knowledge of all that befits him here,
Pure in heart, with devoted will.

That no sinful passion, no foolish pride,
No selfishness, fraud, or aloth might stain
The race that must here after us abide,
Would be knowledge sweet to gain;—

So the rich and the strong were glad to use
The gifts that are lent for others' weal;
While the poor and the weak, contented, choose
One balm which all wounds can heal.

If I knew all this, it would matter less
That my own existence had pass'd away.
Even now, there is glow of happiness—
For it must come true, one day!

J. W. E.

ON CERTAIN TRIBUTES OF LOYALTY.

It would be difficult to form any approximate estimate of the cost of the late loyal demonstrations, throughout the country, on the occasion of the marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The aggregate must have amounted to many tens of thousands of pounds; yet the whole expensive show lasted but a few hours!

We make this remark in no carping spirit. In the large cities, it was a sore crush and weariness to perambulate the illuminated streets; but many old people were amazed—many young people were bewildered—all pretended to be happy; and a great deal of money was circulated among joiners, painters, gasfitters, pyrotechnists, and other meritorious tradesmen. Numerous enterprising firms, too, did politic strokes of loyalty in the way of advertising their establishments. They displayed their public spirit in a profuse expenditure of gas; and thus proved themselves to be good and true subjects, deserving of the extensive patronage which we hope they will receive. How delightful to think that the virtue of loyalty may thus, in a thousand instances, prove to be its own reward!

Our purpose, therefore, is not to blame the prodigious universal outlay in celebration of the Royal Nuptials. All we desire is, to direct attention to the fact of the extreme transiency of the spectacle which flared in the towns, and burned and smoked on the heights, and shot up rockets, with their dazzling constellations of green, crimson, and gold, compared with the length of time occupied in the preparations, and the vast lavishness of the cost. It was as if the enthusiasm of the nation had, after the most elaborate collection of combustibles, suddenly caught fire, and burned itself up in a night!

And is it really, then, all over? We confess it did seem a heart good to see stately monetary edifices, where the unprosperous can never get their bills discounted—austere and stern insurance offices, where sentences of death are pronounced on toil-worn and health-broken heads of families, desperate to make prudent provision for their families—and even legal establishments, whose business it is to turn remorseless screws of torture on the embarrassed and unfortunate—all tricked out in flaring theatrical gowaws, like buildings that had bowels, and could be merry. But has all the unsubstantial pageant faded, and for ever? What has become of the miles of thickly perforated gas-pipe? Have the padellas been thrust away as so much lumber? Whither have vanished the ill-favoured effigies of the poor calumniated Princess? Have all these things been destroyed, or turned to other account, or merely stowed past for some future use, like the scenery and decorations of a last year's pantomime? Beyond the incontrovertible fact of their disappearance, we confess that we know nothing. Looking upon the recent occasion as one of national rejoicing, we can only lament the fleetingness of the triumphant oration; the whole paraphernalia of the wild night of excitement being apparently as dead, after even this little lapse of time, as the shouts of the multitude that perished with the transitory breaths which gave them voice.

But we forget. Was not the wedding of the British Heir-Apparent with the beautiful daughter of the Dane commemorated in the bas-reliefs of the medalist, and, above all, in the jubilant strains of the poet? True. Yet the medals, not intrinsically valuable, may be set aside. Even the very loyallest of people wear not such things on their breasts. Few of them are on drawing-room tables, protected by morocco cases. Their chief destination we apprehend to be the nursery, where even full-length miniature representations of the human form divine seldom preserve, for any length of time, their eyes, their legs, or their heads. We have only, then, left the Epithalamiums of the Bardic race for a chance of anything permanent in the exultations which last week made the kingdom uproarious. The myriad lights which startled the night of the 10th of March from its propriety have long since been 'turned off,' or burned to ashes. Have the most brilliant tributes furnished by the sons of song proved equally ephemeral? This is the question which we wish gravely to propound; and we fear it must be answered, with scarcely an exception, in the affirmative.

If mere quantity afforded any title to immortality, then would the loyal versification of the present nuptial month endure to the remotest age. Poets of great name and poetasters of no name have been equally moved to vent their loyalty in song. The former have been passably successful, and the few lines of animated 'Welcome,' offered by the Laureate to the Danish Princess, will doubtless enjoy some faint life in the grand and lasting fame of 'In Memoriam' and the 'Idylls.' But that which must have struck every one is the extraordinary number of tame, spiritless, and distinctly trashy effusions with which the newspapers and magazines have been flooded. Professor Aytoun's 'Ode' is not without a certain elaborate grace; the verses of the Hon. Mrs. Norton and of Mrs. Newton Crosland abound in happy touches; but all the pieces we have seen, including even those possessed of considerable merit, are inevitably marked for oblivion. The failures, indeed, are so universal, and, in the case of some clever writers, so remarkable, as to render it worth while to inquire into the cause; and this, we may state at once, is the object of the present brief paper.

The remark has been again and again made, that poems written for particular occasions are scarcely ever happy. With the view of accounting for this, it is generally alleged that in such cases the subjects are suggested to the poet, in place of arising spontaneously in his own mind. In other words, when a poet supplies verses in celebration of any passing event, it is supposed to be somewhat forced-work—a sort of writing, as it were, to order, inimical to all natural and genuine inspiration. But to our mind this explanation is the reverse of satisfactory. No poet achieves his highest successes when merely weaving dreams out of his own brain. On the contrary, the best verses are those which some passing occasion has suggested. When Burns drove his plough over the daisy or the field-mouse, the event suggested certain immortal lines. Byron, Campbell, Scott, Wordsworth, and indeed all our best poets, founded many of their gems on incidents which kindled their fancy or touched their heart. Had not young Arthur Hallam died, Tennyson might not have produced his greatest work. Why—the poets are continually searching nature and books for themes. They are even eager to take suggestions from friends, and may thus be said to write, not from inward but from outward influences, when the subjects of which a hint has been given strike them as being good. The usual non-success of pieces written for such occasions as royal birth-days, weddings, and coronations, is not, we believe, from the themes being suggested by actual events, but simply from those events not being in themselves poetical, or capable of poetical treatment. No doubt, there appears at first sight to be something wonderfully poetical in the spectacle of a whole nation making holiday—animated by one sentiment of loyalty—and giving vent to their enthusiasm by means of flags, bands, illuminations, and fire-works. Such a spectacle, however, is a theme not for poetry but for rhetoric, and is merely so far poetical in semblance as to entrap poets into mistakes hurtful to their reputation.

Our meaning may be rendered more clear by analogy. Take the sister art of painting. Every artist knows that a palace is less picturesque on canvas than a thatched cottage—that a fashionable lady may make a better portrait, but makes undoubtedly a worse picture, than a country milkmaid—that a pair of lovers in a carriage-and-four are much less valuable, for all artistic purposes, than a pair of lovers on a bank of violets, or beneath a hawthorn hedge. It is the same in poetry. The Muse shuns high and splendid situations, to consort with the poor and the humble. She is no worshipper of rank. Her dealings are with the normal passions and affections of humanity, and with the simple unadorned beauties and grandeurs of external nature. Such a spectacle, therefore, as a great national rejoicing, has no genuine attractions for her. She shuns crowds. In her eyes, a lonely ship at sea is finer than a forest of ships in harbour. Her admiration is for the cool sweet stars of heaven, and not for rockets and bonfires. The simple courtships of rustics befit her better than the dazzling alliances of princes. Hence it happens that loyal odes and epithalamiums are either inflated, unnatural, and bombastic, or feeble, flat, and commonplace, in comparison with the enthusiasm of even prosaic civic officials, and other totally uninspired mortals.

Now, if these views are correct, the poets who have endeavoured to give expression to the national sentiment, on the occasion of the marriage of our young Prince-Royal and possible future King, do not so much deserve blame for their failures as credit for their partial successes. If they have erred, they have erred merely in seeking for inspiration in royal palaces, in densely-peopled cities, and amid the elaborate splendours of a nation's exultation, in place of by lowly hearths, among fields and running brooks, or wherever poor struggling humanity loves, languishes, or mourns. At all events, they are entitled to the approbation due to good impulses and lofty aims. They have laboured to give rhythmical expression to the magnificent homage paid by the people of this kingdom to the peace, order, and freedom enjoyed under their crowned republic; and, if their efforts have fallen short of their high and loyal desires, it is only for the reason that a ball-room—with its silks, feathers, jewellery, music, gleeful countenances, bounding motion, and dazzling profusion of lights—is, in reality, less calculated to stir the deeper fountains of poetic emotion than a ball-room dark and silent.

ONE WHO IS NOT A CANDIDATE FOR THE LAUREATESHIP.

AMONG THE GODS.

It was in December. The shades of night had descended on the city. The lamps were burning brightly, and the shop windows were brilliantly lighted up, as if on the occasion of some festivity. The streets were busy with passengers, protected from the cold and rain by an abundance of great-coats, mufflers, and umbrellas; while, at almost every step, was met some shivering wretch—man, woman, or child. I saw all these, but heeded them not. Hurried along by some irresistible impulse, I sped over the wet pavements—up one street—down another. I suffered no hindrance; for, at my approach, others made way, and allowed me to pass. Quicker and still quicker I walked, till, in spite of the piercing cold, the perspiration gathered thick upon my brow, then trickled down my face, till it mingled with the rain-drops. I could see the people stare at me; and could hear their mutterings, in which the words 'madman' and 'thief' occurred more often than any others. But they did not cause me to slacken my pace. On, on I sped, till I found myself in the centre of a noisy crowd. Panting for breath, and unable to move one way or other, of my own will—but swayed, now here, now there—I gazed for a moment upon the eager faces of those around me. One expression was on them all—an expression of intense desire for something—a something which I could not see. Nor could I ask an explanation of their excited looks. I was for the time deprived of speech. Ere long, the crowd swayed backward and forward fiercely, and the air rung with yells and laughter. I was lifted from my feet, and borne, struggling, onward—onward into almost total darkness; then up, and still higher up, I was carried, till I fancied I should never again set foot upon the earth. I had ascended to a considerable height, when suddenly a blinding flood of light burst upon me. For a moment I turned my eyes from the brightness, then eagerly rushed down a steep declivity, till I thought I must have fallen. But my course was soon impeded, and I was thrown back upon a seat. Here I sat, for I know not how long, with closed eyes—fearful sounds ringing in my ears, as if ten thousand demons were joined in some awful revelry. All imaginable shouts and cries were uttered, in every tone of voice, from the shrill treble to the deep bass. Then for a moment there was silence, followed by a burst of glorious music. I ventured to open my eyes and look around. The same eager faces were on all sides of me. I was seated near the edge of what seemed a yawning precipice. Looking down, I saw, away far beneath me, vast crowds of men and women, but they appeared small as pigmies. Above them sat other men and women, the former clad in dark funereal garments, and the latter in white that would have rivalled new-fallen snow. Here and there among them a something of a bright scarlet colour could be seen. A tumber of the women held in their hands what appeared to me to be fans, which they occasionally waved before them. Above these, again, were other men and women, having no particular costume; and all above these were the men among whom I sat. I had scarcely made these observations, when some one, apparently from below, began to sing. Then I saw men and women, in quaint dresses, moving backwards and forwards, before what appeared to me to be a castle. A clear rich voice—the voice of some one unseen—rose above all the others, which almost took away my breathing, so anxious was I not to lose a single sound of music so sweet. Then it ceased; the men and women in the quaint dresses passed away; other men and women came, who also sang; these ceased, and then I saw a beauteous female appear, who was received with great acclamation by those around me; then all was hushed; she moved forwards and began to sing; the voice was the same I had heard before, though the beauteous female I had not seen. Oh that music! How shall I describe it? In what language shall I tell how it fell upon me, piercing to my very soul? I fancy I hear it still, though it has ceased long ago. The words to which she sung I could not make out—they were strange to my ear. But what cared I for the words while the ringing music was plain? I leaned forward—oh how eagerly! But soon the last notes of that song were sung; and then how I joined in the thunders of applause that followed! Would she sing again? I thought. Yes, she did. Again and again the exquisite music rolled upward. She sang of love; and the happy object of her love replied. She disappeared. I saw her lover and another female before me. I heard them sing, and then they also were gone. Others came and went, and then she came back and sang again; but see! she strikes her brow! How wild and disordered grows her look! She tears the wreath from her head and dashes it to the ground. Those around her stare with affrighted gaze. Is it—can it be—that she is—is mad? She must be—she is mad; for hear how she utters that wild, wild air, and how they all join with her in the chaunt, which is a malediction on her lover, who has fled with the other female!

She has gone; and the echoes of her song are drowned in the wild uproar of those around me. 'Where am I?' I ask; and I hear some one answer, 'Among the gods!' 'Among the gods!' Are these the gods beside me? or are these the gods below? Surely not. Was it not the music of the gods I heard? It must be so, I mutter. Then I cease to wonder at the power of the beautiful female.

The music begins once more; but I am impatient till she again appears. Soon she comes; but how changed! She is mad. Ah me! I thought, is the life of one so beautiful doomed to such misery through man's perfidy? Her reason gone! I feel my eyes grow watery as she sings still so sweetly, but so differently from before. Then I, too, mutter maledictions on him who has blighted her young life. I feel glad when she is gone;—she is now so altered.

There is another interval; and once more I hear singing; but it is not the voice of the beautiful female. It is he against whom the maledictions were uttered. He sings sadly now. Has he come to seek her whom he so basely deserted? Hush! she comes again. I hear her sing. I see her. She recognises her lover. They embrace. The sight of him restores her reason. They converse together in songs. He did not desert her; he was not false. He tells her where he has been, and his errand—helping a helpless female prisoner to liberty. Then they sing together, more sweetly now than ever, pledging anew the vows of love. Her friends appear, to whom his story is told. And so at last they are united.

They are gone, followed by the ringing cheers of all. Then there is a rush to get away. I am in the dark again, descending—down—down. Now I am in the street. I awake as from a trance to find that I have been hearing Bellini's opera of 'I Puritani'; that the beauteous female and her lover were the celebrated Mdle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini; and that I have been among 'the gods,' but only those of a provincial theatre! J. C. S.

POETICAL CONCEPTION.

No. I.

It may not be out of place, though we hazard it only as a conjecture, to turn aside from the whirl, turmoil, and agitation of this busy age—in which the wheels of industry are ever running at their utmost speed—into some quiet, retired nook, suited for calm contemplation. An hour thus spent will, we trust, not be unprofitable in enjoyment. The emotions of the heart are certainly not less interesting than the deductions of the intellect, though they may not exhibit themselves in the same utilitarian results. If for these reasons our readers will bear it, we propose to take them along with us, by as simple a path as we can, into the fairy land, of poetical conception, where, if we do not gather all the flowers that deck that glorious country, we at least, in some small measure, 'smell their fragrance, and thence return with recruited spirits to the every-day business of life.

In certain domains of human investigation, mere reason may lead to what may perhaps be considered by us infallible truth; for instance, in regard to some of the doctrines of numbers, of size, of shape, weight, or distance, and many others, all relating to external objects which we may handle and freely examine. But when we attempt to investigate the properties and capabilities, the feelings and workings of mind, we find ourselves very much at sea. And it seems, indeed, impossible to measure, gauge, and take the exact height, length, and breadth of the subject of poetry. Though in all its aspects belonging to Nature itself, in some of its most interesting features it is one of the most incomprehensible, and perhaps the least understood of all subjects.

It is difficult, on such a vast field, to know best where to begin and where to end. The stars of heaven, as they shine forth beautifully in a wintry evening sky,

'Like tales of light,
So wildly, spiritually bright.'

may be counted, and many of them have been named. But what human mind can conceive, far less express, the almost infinite associations that may be linked to millions of minds in regard to poetical conceptions.

Poetry belongs almost, if not entirely, to the emotional and moral part of our common nature. This is scarcely a definition; at least, it is not the most comprehensive, or logical, or exact; but it seems to be the most simple and least abstract aspect in which the subject can well be viewed in a popular way.

Things are often difficult to be apprehended just in consequence of their entire simplicity. There is, indeed, and always will be, a charm in simplicity; and in poetry, simplicity is an essential element. And why so? Just because simplicity is the natural, and thus the universal feeling. There are some minds that, in their refined imaginative subtleties, are led away from true simplicity to some pre-conceived favourite notions or systems of their own; but these can have only very few admirers. The natural feeling, in its simplicity, will find the readiest sympathy and echo in the human heart. It is necessary to separate the subject of poetry into its feeling or conception, and its expression; or, in other words, first, to view it in its emotional conception, or as merely existing in the mind—and, second, in the expression of it as conveyed from the poetical mind to the minds of others. The first division of the subject, viz.—poetical conception, or feeling, or imagination, will form the subject of what we are now to state.

The feeling, the conception of poetry—or, in other words, imagination—gives life, animation, soul, and spirit to all the fine arts. When the poet Carpani inquired of his friend Haydn how it happened that his church music was always so cheerful, the great composer made a most poetic and beautiful reply:—'I cannot,' he said, 'make it otherwise. I write according to the thoughts I feel. When I think upon my God, my heart is so full of joy that the notes dance and leap as it were from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be pardoned me if I serve him with a cheerful spirit.'

And what would be all our paintings and sculptures, as works of art, without the living spirit which has conceived and executed them, and the mind which can relish their beauties? There might be, and there no doubt are, both paintings and sculptures faultless almost as to colour and form, as mere imitations of nature, but which fail to please or interest, just because the poetical conception or feeling is wanting in the painter or sculptor. In works of art, there may be only mere imitation, the view of which gives a certain kind and degree of pleasure altogether apart from the realization of the existence of poetical feeling in the simplest and most intelligible form; as we may wonder at, and perhaps even admire, the grimaces of a mountebank, who only professes to imitate some of the most grotesque forms of natural expression. But this is certainly the lowest form of poetical conception, which sensible men will ultimately reject as below the dignity of human nature.

There is unquestionably something in the nature of man beyond the power of appreciating what is merely useful, or even what we may regard as absolutely true. The eye is made for seeing, but not for seeing only, but perceiving, through the mind, external beauty; the ear for hearing, not for hearing only, but for appreciating the melody and harmony of sounds; the sense of touch exists, not for the mere handling of matter, as if all were alike pleasurable. What is the warm shake of the hand, or even the feeling of nearness, though not in actual contact, with a loved object, compared with the gentlest touch of the cold marble which the sculptor may have delineated with all the truth of nature, except that he has not filled it with soul and life, which, indeed, it was beyond the power of art to accomplish. We smell differences of odours, indeed; but it is more than the sense of smell that enables us to relish the delicious fragrance of nature; and although the mere sense of taste has less to do with our higher emotional enjoyments than any of our other senses, the pleasures of taste have by a poetical fiction passed into a proverb, and the man of taste though he may and most frequently is a man of common sense, is not a mere utilitarian.

The poetical conception or imagination is something quite beyond and apart from the utilitarian matter-of-fact view, which mere reason presents to us of objects. Imagination brings into play the idea of beauty, the feeling of passion of some kind or other, and to some degree. The memorial of some dear departed friend, trifling it may be in itself, and worthless as it may seem to others, is valued by affection as beyond all price. We would not part with the old arm-chair, now, alas! vacant, in which a now sainted father or mother used to sit, for double its weight in gold. We love their former places of resort, and perhaps all the more strongly just because of their absence.

We cannot fail to have noticed that children, mere infants, have often their likes and dislikes, their loves and hatreds, before ever reason can have taught them anything of the true causes of love or hatred. They have a feeling beyond, and altogether apart from, reasoning; and beyond, and altogether apart from, mere physical enjoyments.

You may have seen the helpless babe smiling on its mother's knee. We cannot dive into the depths of an infant's heart; but can any one say that this placid smile, which passes over its features so sweetly, is only the utilitarian feeling of having all its wants supplied by its loving mother. We are told that infants smile in their sleep. May not this be the first, the earliest germ of that feeling of beauty, which is poetry in its most simple conception? Have we not in this a key to poetical feeling, to the sense and appreciation of the becoming, the beautiful, the pleasing the lovely, as an inherent part of our wonderful nature?

The joys of childhood and youth are the staple of poetry. Who, among those who have reached full-grown manhood, and retains the real frankness and simplicity of humanity, has not seen and felt the exhilarating influence of childish sports and pastime; ay, and if he was one of nature's true nobility, was not ready to share in them with all his manly heart? If we stop to inquire what leads to such rollicking fun, such grotesque antics, such exhausting mirthfulness, it will not do to say merely that it is good for them, for they never think of that; they are enjoying themselves, giving expression to their feeling of happiness, and the gray-haired man looks on delighted. The scene brings back to him his own early, happy days. He, too, is for the time transported from the world of sense to that of youthful feeling and emotion. Perhaps, if the world has scowled on him, he forgets for a time its displeasures; if it has smiled on him, he thinks that, after all, its smiles are less pleasurable than the enjoyments of childhood.

Who has not seen a bevy of girls, in their artless simplicity, but with all the enthusiasm of nature, attempting it may be to delineate some of the ground lines of their ideal homesteads, by arranging together, according to their early fancies, a number of shells or ebbles, or even pieces of broken glass or earthenware, so as to form their conception of some very idle or quite unarchitectural dwelling? Or a few boys may be seen, on a wintry day, rolling snowballs so large as afterwards to form houses. The girl with her doll, and the boy with his wooden horse—what do we see in these but an illustration of the simplest and earliest of our poetical conceptions acted before our eyes, and which, could we who are older but turn to childhood, we too ourselves might again dish and enjoy?

Burns, like a genuine poet as he was, does not forget his childhood days, their happiness and enjoyment, in 'Auld langsyne.' He casts back his sympathising look from the present to the past, and beautifully contrasts the pleasures of childhood with the toils, and cares, and wanderings of manhood; thus adding, by way of contrast, a fresher beauty to both pictures, in the well-known stanzas—

'We twa ha'e paddled in the burn
When summer days were fine;
But seas between us twa ha'e roar'd
Since the days of auld langsyne.

We twa ha'e run about the braes,
And pu'd the gowans fine;
But we've wander'd mony a weary foot
Since the days of auld langsyne.'

In manhood, when we enter the great world of business—with its fears, its hopes, its cares, and even its difficulties—does the poetical feeling cease to exist, or is it less powerful or influential? No; by no means. We talk, and justly, of 'life's fitful dream'—of man's toiling ambition to reach the summit of fame—of his untiring efforts after wealth; and when, if he at all does accomplish his object, he finds it was but some vain imagination, some creation of his own fancy, that impelled him forward; and not learning wisdom from experience, he sighs for something more, and perhaps, like Alexander the Great, weeps because there are no more worlds to conquer.

We have had young poets, such as Chatterton, Kirke Whyte, Ferguson, Michael Bruce, and a host of others; but their feelings were all manly; their conceptions were not childish, otherwise they would not have been relished. They gave us the common feelings of a full-grown, not half-fledged, humanity, in all their length and breadth.

External nature is nothing without the mind to enjoy it. It is in itself, and without the touch of imagination, the mere canvas on which feeling may be painted. If it is beautiful, (and who does not feel and know that it is so?) it is because the human soul sympathises with it, or, in other words, because the feeling of the beautiful, the sublime, has a strong hold on our nature.

Hence the poetical conception is so different from what at first sight one would imagine; but if a conception is truly natural, it cannot fail to be poetical, though it may not belong to the highest class of feeling. Some have the poetical conception more largely inherent in them than others, but all who have the ordinary feelings of humanity possess it to some extent.

Perhaps most have heard of the almost idiot, regarding whom it was said that he was perfectly happy in possession of the poor and almost blank intellect God had been pleased to give him. This, it is said, was tested by Sir Walter Scott, when he asked the idiot if he was quite happy, to which he answered, 'quite happy;' but on being pressed, he admitted his happiness was sadly spoiled by 'a bubbly jock.' The fancy, indeed, was a mad one, but it was a fancy pregnant with untold misery to its possessor. It was a sadly poetical feeling; but, at the same time, true to nature in the case of the poor half-witted creature who entertained it. He, like the poet, felt it as a reality from which he could not escape, because the light of reason's lamp glimmered but weakly in his poorly furnished mind.

The consideration of such a fact, if fully carried out, might, by contrast, lead us to think of the grand conceptions of higher intelligences—of angel and archangel, and all the hosts of heaven; ay, and of the Devil and his angels, who cannot appreciate the beautiful, but entertain, in its most comprehensive fulness, the awfully grand and to them the overpowering idea of an Almighty God as their enemy; unlike the Christian, who, indeed, by no merely poetical feeling, but by the eye of faith, can recognise this glorious being as his Creator, Preserver, Benefactor, and even Redeemer.

The poetical feeling may not be, indeed, and is not always, that of the beautiful. It may be that of the tender or sympathetic, or it may be the feeling of the sublime, of terror, awe, majesty. It may be of the sweet beauties of spring—the lark soaring upwards in his heavenly anthem of praise; the glories of summer, with its flowers of surpassing odour and beauty; the riches of autumn, with its exuberant fulness; or the wild storms of winter, with their dreariness and desolation.

The elementary principles of our feelings, either of the beautiful or the sublime, may perhaps be far too deep for human investigation. Burke, like a true philosopher, owned this. He felt there were steps which might be made by human investigation, but he says, most beautifully and poetically (Part IV. Section I.), 'That great chain of causes, which, linking one to another, even to the throne of God himself, can never be unriddled by any industry of ours. When we go but one step beyond the immediately sensible quality of things we go out of our depth. All we do after is but a faint struggle that shows we are in an element which does not belong to us.'

Burke, indeed, endeavours in his own way to account for our feelings of the sublime, but he has done nothing more than merely given an illustration of that grand truth which he has enunciated, that in doing this he was going beyond his element. In the same way, Dr. Brown, in his lectures on moral philosophy, though he has given many ingenious and original thoughts in the best possible manner—clothed in the most beautiful and poetical diction—has yet failed to picture forth the true causes of the feelings of the sublime.

I believe we must be satisfied rather with illustrations than investigations into the causes, or perhaps, to some extent, the nature of the feeling. We must be content to admit that we are mere scholars, ay, poor scholars, perhaps only dunces, in the great school of Nature. Nature, or rather the God of Nature, is simple, beautifully simple, in all His arrangements, so far as we can understand them: and the man who has dived the deepest into the mysteries of nature, if at all of a philosophic and Christian spirit, will be the readiest to admit that there are mysteries that press upon his observation on every side, which he cannot solve. The ancient philosopher, Dion, when asked to say what God is, requested, day after day, to consider the matter; and when ultimately pressed for an answer, declared the longer he thought of the subject the more incomprehensible it appeared to him.

It was a beautifully poetical, and not less truly philosophical, saying of Sir Isaac Newton on his death-bed, who, in regard to what are called the exact sciences, has never been surpassed—'I seem to have been like a little boy gathering pebbles on the sea shore, and have left the vast ocean of eternity undiscovered.' And Dr. Chalmers, when his opponents cast in his teeth some of his early speculations, written before he had been baptised by the Divine Spirit, said, in answer, with all the humility of his child-like but great mind—'True, I admit it; these were but my sentiments; I was then engaged in discussing magnitudes, but I had overlooked two great magnitudes—the littleness of time and the greatness of eternity.'

The inherent feeling of the beautiful or pleasurable will be at once admitted; but the feeling of the sublime, comprehending the vast, the grand, the awful and terrific, the overpowering, the incomprehensible, the infinite, horror, terror, blackness, and darkness—how can such conceptions be pleasant, or how should we indulge in them! and yet, after all, we find the highest pleasures in them as poetical feelings.

We recollect, even yet with a feeling akin to terror, when a boy, of reading Mrs. Radcliff's romance, 'The Mysteries of Udolpho,' which was devoured on winter evenings with an awful relish. The narrative was horrifying; so much so, that we could not venture to look about for fear of realising the narrative in the conceptions of the authoress. The feeling was both pleasing and painful. The imagination was roused, and overbore for the time the faculty of reason.

And how can this be accounted for? However we may philosophise on the subject, the feelings do certainly exist.

Perhaps it may go some way, and in a negative form, to a solution of this apparent anomaly to state that we do not, after all, understand human nature. Man was originally created after the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness. He has not entirely lost these divine characteristics; and, though he does not naturally love the divine knowledge and holiness, he yet aspires after some ideal perfection of knowledge, holiness, and righteousness, which is presented to his darkened view, and he presses after a more full acquaintance with the method of Divine government—the ways of God to man. It is the finite endeavouring ever vainly to reach its source and its centre in the Infinite. We have the authority of Divine Inspiration that imagination was one of man's original mental qualities. The Prophet

Ezekiel pictures forth the darkness of the Chambers of Imagery, and the Apostle Paul tells us expressly that men through the fall became vain in their imagination, and their foolish heart was darkened.

Dr. Brown strikingly remarks, 'It is in the moral conduct of our fellow-men that that species of sublimity is to be found which we most gladly recognise as the character of that glorious nature which we have received from God. A character which makes us more erect in mind than we are in stature, and enables us not to gaze on the heavens merely, but to lift to them our very wishes, and to imitate in some faint degree, and to admire at least where we cannot imitate, the gracious perfection that dwells there. It is to mind, therefore, that we turn, even from the sublimest wonders of magnificence which the natural universe exhibits.'

There is a universality of the feeling or the emotion of greatness; but, coupled with this, is there not also a universality of the moral feeling of guiltiness? May not this account for the actual enjoyment that is felt in contemplation of scenes of awe, terror, and even horror—of darkness, dreariness, and desolation? as Milton thus makes hell to ring with the awfully solemn voice of the enemy of God and man, when he is banished to his dreary prison-house:—

'Hail, horrors! hail!
Infernal world! and thou profoundest hell!
Receive thy new possessor—one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time.
The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.
What matter where, if I be still the same?
Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven!'

If this theory be correct, the whole false religions which prevail in the world may thus be accounted for. They are illustrations of the poetical conception—the darkened imagination groping after the great and the glorious, or writhing in the agonies of conscious guilt and terror. It would form a very interesting subject, but far too extensive, to enter upon the vast range which the darkened imagination has embodied in the realms of superstition. To compare the superstitions together, and find how widely asunder they stand, we might almost conceive they could not have arisen, nor could be seriously believed in, by beings of the same order of intelligence, or mental or moral emotion. Immensely dissimilar, indeed, they are; yet they may be all traced to one source. The stumbling-block of the Jews—the foolishness of the Greeks—the gorgeousness of Poetry—the darkness and cruelty of Druidism—the subtleties of Hinduisms—the ferocities, and at the same time the voluptuousness, of Mohammedanism; what are they all but the wild, wandering, unsettled, erring, guilty, and terror-struck imagination of sinful and fallen creatures, groping in the midnight darkness after a realisation of the great and yet simple truth—'God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.' They are but illustrations of the poetical conception striving after the ideal of beauty, of grandeur, of sublimity, but warped in its exercise by, it may be, a thousand prejudices—the greatest of which are; however, the perversity of the human heart, its enmity to God, and its utter ignorance of him.

Dr. Johnson decried religious poetry; but, great critic as he was, he erred most grievously in this respect. Religion gives a new impetus, but it does not change any of the essential qualities of the human mind, which still preserves its own individuality. The capacity of poetical conception remains the same, but with fresher, higher, and nobler aspirations. If Byron, in the darkness of infidelity, mournfully conceived of man as a 'Poor child of doubt and death, whose hope is built on reeds,' an apostle could say, rejoicingly, 'I know in whom I have believed, and I am persuaded He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him, against that day.' The highest poetical conception and the most sublime strains of poetry are to be found associated with religion; and it would be wonderful indeed were it otherwise, for the God of religion is the God of nature, and is served with that mind which he has given to his rational, intelligent, and moral creatures. The works of nature are never contemplated with so high a zest as when associated with their Creator; and the separation of God from His works, the alienation or even indifference of the human soul to external Nature, or to its fellow feeling with other human souls, would be of all divorces the most unnatural and pernicious, and would, in the view of every pious and enlightened mind, throw a gloom over the face of creation infinitely more profound than the removal or annihilation of our material sun.

No one who has attended to his own feelings, or reflected on those of others, can fail to have observed how the same objects, seen under different circumstances, have at times excited far different and often opposite emotions. The objects presented to view may be the same, while the emotion is altogether different; or, which is as likely, the mind takes hold of one feature at one time, and of a different feature at another; or it looks at the object from one point of view on one occasion, and from another point of view on a different occasion.

It has been said, with true poetic feeling, there is only a step between the sublime and the ridiculous, and yet, how vast is the difference. We talk of some things intellectually grand, and of others as intellectually small. Could we appreciate facts in all their length and far reaching results, we might not think anything a small fact. There may be a grand poetical conception in regard even to what are thought small facts, which utterly sinks into insignificance what we think grand facts; as, for instance, the discovery of steam, &c.

What have been all the feats, the victories, the bloodshed of the Great Napoleon, compared with the little fact of James Watt observing the steam issuing from the tea-kettle, which originated in his mind the power of steam, and has led to all those mighty inventions, by which that power has been rendered applicable to a thousand departments of human industry and art. The great victories of Napoleon may have dethroned monarchs, scattered ruin and desolation over kingdoms, made rivers of blood and suffering to run down a part of this weary world; and there are some who no doubt will, with poetical feeling, glory in them, and there is no doubt much on such a theme to excite poetical feeling. But are they for a moment to be compared to the tranquillity, happiness, and domestic comfort, the glory and habits of peaceful industry, that the steam-engine has opened up and realised?

We are not going into political economy. We have been led into this train of thought as showing the different direction or range of poetical conception, and not for the purpose of comparing the victories of war with the triumphs of steam. Both have their admirers; but the poetical conceptions of each class, if strictly confined to the particular subject of their admiration, will find no sympathy in feeling from the other class. The imaginative glories of the one may be regarded by the other as disgraceful to human nature; and those of the other, by its opposite class, as mean and weak-spirited. There will be, in fact, no chord of sympathy between them.

There are undoubtedly glories in war as there are pleasures in industrial pursuits. The glories of war, however painful may be their attendant circumstances—and they will almost always be so—when they effect liberty for the slave, emancipation for the prisoner, and, above all, liberty of mind and action, will ever be regarded with the highest esteem, and call forth a corresponding poetical feeling. But the triumphs of peace and industry—a contented and happy home, especially if lighted up with the lamp of true religion, will give birth, if not to such turbulent passion as is excited by the horrors and victories of war, at least to a deeper, warmer, and more genial and heartfelt sympathy. These will reach every man's heart, and he will and cannot fail to rejoice in them with true poetical feeling.

Wordsworth, a true and a great poet, may be appealed to regarding industry and science as a source of poetical conception. He says, 'Poetry is the first and last of all knowledge, it is as immortal as the heart of man. If the labours of men of science should ever create any material revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in the impressions which we habitually receive, the poet will sleep no more than at present; but he will be ready to follow the steps of the man of science, not only on those general indirect effects, but he will be at his side carrying sensation into the midst of the objects of science itself. The remotest discoveries of the chemist, the botanist, or mineralogist, will be as proper objects of the poet's art as any upon which it can be employed. If the time should ever come when these things shall be familiar to us, and the relations under which they are contemplated by the followers of these respective sciences shall be manifestly and palpably material to us, as enjoying and suffering beings;—if the time should ever come when what is now called science, thus familiarised to men, shall be ready to put on, as it were, a form of flesh and blood, the poet will lend his divine spirit to aid the transfiguration, and will welcome the being thus produced as a dear and divine inmate of the household of man.'

It is utterly impossible to give all the actings of our emotional and moral nature, which form the essence of poetical feeling, taking in, as it does, the sublime and the ridiculous, the simple, the grand, the great and the small, the apparently mean and contemptible, and the glorious and overpowering in nature, whether animate or inanimate—whether of soul or body—whether the whirl of excited passion or the uncontentative calm of infancy; for to these, and much more than all these, do the poetical feelings extend.

It has been said of the poet Thomson that he could not have viewed two candles burning but with a poetical eye. Thomson had indeed a highly-imaginative cast of mind; but there is scarcely any mind, however thoroughly prosaic, which is not visited with some poetical feeling at one time or other.

ON THE SANDS.

In the morning I wrote on the sands of the bay,
And I pass'd by the spot in the gloaming gray,
But o'er it the winds and the waters had swept,
And my words in the womb of the ocean slept.

So when we and the few that have loved us are gone,
And the earth and the ages go rolling on,
O'er our mem'ry the tide of oblivion shall pour,
Blotting out every trace we may leave on life's shore.

Ye sons of ambition! who pant for 'a name,'
For the brilliant hope-bubble the world calls Fame,
Ye may get it when dead; you are certain now
Of a weary back and an aching brow.

Then live not for glory, nor labour for praise,
For a mention in story, a chaplet of bays;
E'en the fame that is fairest one tempest may blast,
And the greenest of laurels must wither at last.

But labour and live with a mightier view—
For the wrongs you may right, for the good you may do:
To lighten the blow of the chastening rod,
To woo some poor wanderer back to his God.

Oh! wherever you are, and what'er be your sphere,
You will find weary hearts that a kind word may cheer.
Some tear-bedimm'd eyes that your smiles can make bright,
Some soul-crushing burdens your hands can make light.

Whatever is noble, and holy, and true—
Of high purpose born—that think, speak, and do;
Seeking ever, in working out life's simple plan,
The glory of God and the saving of man.

Tracing thus on Time's sands, ye need never fear tide;
In faith if ye labour, the work shall abide;
And our Father's 'Well done' shall be glory for aye,
When the honours of earth have all melted away. J. T.

DRAWING FROM THE LIFE. BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER I.

IN reading the fictions of the great masters we are frequently forced to the conclusion that such and such characters must have been drawn from the life. This circumstance I often pointed out to Mr. Crayon, the celebrated artist, as constituting the grand secret of their success. My object in so doing was to stimulate that gentleman to attempt something in the department of fictitious literature, in which I believed him to be specially qualified to excel.

Perhaps of all men I have ever known, Mr. Crayon has the happiest knack at telling a story. His powers of graphic delineation are of the first order. Not only can he imitate the expression, voice, accent, and gesticulation of any one possessing the slightest peculiarity of feature, speech, or manner, but he is able to perform the much more rare and difficult feat of extemporising appropriate and characteristic dialogue, with an ease, freedom, and brilliancy which I have scarcely ever heard equalled. It accordingly always occurred to me, when listening to any of his dramatic—I might almost say Shaksperian sketches—that there was really nothing to hinder him from becoming, with a little courage and practice, a Dickens, a Thackeray, or even a Scott.

This high estimate of his powers I did not disguise from himself. He pleaded, however, that although he might succeed tolerably well in setting forth such characters as he chanced to be thoroughly familiar with, he had no facility whatever in inventing new ones. But therein, I assured him, lay his special guarantee of fitness for the task which I urged him to undertake. He who copies exclusively and directly from nature can scarcely err. This truth I impressed upon him by a variety of arguments, and I at length extracted from him a promise that he would turn the matter over in his mind, with a view to the production of some brief and humorous tale, if only by way of experiment.

There were several gentlemen of our acquaintance whom Mr. Crayon was accustomed to 'take off,' and that with so much force and vividness as to constitute them about the best portraits in his répertoire. One was Mr. Golfer, a tall, well-built gentleman, with dark whiskers and mustache, a spiritual forehead, and something of a military air. Golfer was extensively read in the poets, and had undoubtedly a fine, though fastidious and severe taste. Out of doors he wore that disreputable form of hat familiarly known as the 'wide-awake,' and his custom was to walk along the streets haughtily and dreamily, as if with his head towering in other worlds. This majestic, cynical individual, with his handsome Roman nose, and dreamy suspicious eyes, never seemed entirely comfortable except when discussing, usually in emphatic monosyllables, some doubtful point of poetical taste, with the aid of a long pipe and a glass of bitter beer. He scarcely ever smiled, and never laughed. If any one perpetrated a pun in his hearing, a cloud of rebuke would settle on his brow, and he would draw himself slowly up with an expression of ineffable disgust. If, however, the said pun happened to be conspicuously destitute of wit, he would perhaps smile a little, but with a grim expression, as if to indicate that he was ashamed of the slight weakness into which he had been betrayed.

Another of the set was Mr. John Anderson Bankier, a large man with a soft voice and a philosophic turn of mind. His head, which was thickly covered with hair prematurely whitened, was one of the hugest ever mounted on Caucasian shoulders. Within his capacious brain there were gropings of power, large and imperfectly exercised, yet evermore dim and vague, like the gropings of the blind Cyclops. Mr. Bankier had a habit of forcing down all discussion to a basis of first principles. When the argument waxed loud, he seldom failed to command attention, not so much by his massive presence as by soft persuasive waves of the hand, and some such gentle appeal as—'Hear me for my cause!—gentlemen, hear me for my cause!' It was only, however, when the hours warmed and brightened into a glow of conviviality that Mr. Bankier exhibited his finer characteristics. Then it was that his friends discovered the full and complete amiability of his disposition. At such times he became even affectionate—grasping, in a friendly way, the hand of any one near him—and crooning forth, in low, soft tones, like some veteran minstrel mellow with the inspiration of time, certain homely ditties expressive of the more tender and poetic emotions of the soul.

The third of Mr. Crayon's originals was Mr. Bowler, a square-built, high-spirited gentleman, very bald, and with whiskers and beard originally black, but now slightly grizzled. Mr. Bowler had a voice like a cannon. In the most uproarious company his laugh drowned all other noises. His belief seemed to be that the use of speech was to stimulate the risible faculties. Every time he opened his lips it was to thunder forth a joke.

Whenever he said anything smart, which was, in fact, always, his laugh followed instantly, like a guffaw transmitted through a speaking trumpet. He would then look his victim straight in the face, with a keen, vehement, and irresistible 'Eh! eh!' in order to compel a cacchinary tribute to his wit. This was awful to good-natured people, who found their features hardening into a fixed grin. After a night with Mr. Bowler, I have been fain to breakfast in bed, and enjoy a forenoon's rest. I have even felt as if I could luxuriate in quiet dreams for a week.

Then there was Mr. Mallet, a gentleman of pleasing Scandinavian complexion, but with a beard of flaming vermillion, of which he was perversely proud. Yet no wonder he clung to his beard, for was not every hair of it gold? His temper was as fiery as his chin, having a personal dignity to support which often caused him to stand angrily on the defensive. Between him and Mr. Bowler there existed a perpetual feud, which Mr. Bankier, reasoning from abstract principles, considered unphilosophic, but which Mr. Golfer, little given to speech, and for the most part a mere spectator of what was going on, pronounced to be 'decidedly amusing.'

Only one more character remains to be noted, that of my dear particular friend, Mr. J. B. Buckingham. This gentleman was slightly en bon point, bald-headed, and with a dark eye glowing like a coal, which the phrenologists described as indicating 'language large.' His vivid geniality, immense relish for enjoyment, and bright nimble faculties rendered him a kind of pivot around which all the others revolved. His forte, however, was oratory of the loftiest kind. His was no slipshod Parliamentary style. Had opportunity afforded, he would have shaken the senate. Yet, when pouring forth his fervid and sublime sentences, the smearing cynic Golfer would listen with a look of haughty disdain—Golfer, of all men, professing to despise sentiment!—Golfer, notorious as a stealthy concoctor of plaintive little ditties, like a youth who had been crossed in love!

Mr. Crayon had made an almost life-long study of this strange medley of persons, and the result was an elaborateness and perfection of portraiture which commanded universal approbation. His anecdotes regarding them were inexhaustable. With what intense relish did the silent and cynical Mr. Golfer listen to his cynical delineations of Mr. J. A. Bankier, Mr. Bowler, Mr. Mallet, and Mr. Buckingham! Then, how did Bankier chuckle, and Bowler guffaw, and Buckingham and Mallet scream with enjoyment, as Golfer was exhibited with his secret convivial heart and lofty morose exterior! But, indeed, they each manifested a thorough appreciation and enjoyment of Crayon's delightful caricatures of all the rest. Crayon would not have hurt the feelings of any one of them for the world.

The brilliant artist and myself had many a long talk as to how the five notabilities in question could be best thrown together in a consecutive and well-constructed plot. To both of us they seemed to be a set of well-marked and boldly-contrasted characters, and therefore admirably adapted for the purposes of fiction. True, Mr. Crayon continued to exhibit many qualms of ex- science. He did not like the idea of any writer holding up his particular friends to ridicule. The more, however, he wavered, the more I encouraged him to proceed. 'Why should not the litterateur,' I exclaimed, 'draw from the life, as well as the artist? And where is he to find life-models, unless among those about him and within the range of his study? Rely on it that creation of character means only observation of character. Frankenstein thought to create an entirely new man, and he only succeeded in making a monster.'

This reasoning had its effect; and Mr. Crayon, confirmed in his intention of writing an original tale, wrought at his task with a commendable degree of diligence. At first he proposed to introduce myself as one of his dramatis personæ, but to this I would not consent. 'No, no,' said I, 'there are no peculiarities about me; if I were really a character I would submit at once.' He tried to assure me that I would shine as the hero of a story, 'just as much as Golfer, or Bankier, or Bowler, or Mallet, or Buckingham.' Seeing, however, that I was seriously alarmed, he very prudently desisted.

CHAPTER II.

Artists are notoriously unpunctual. They work by fits and starts. As usually happens with men of lively imagination, they are not always in the mood. Even when most determined they are sometimes helpless. I have seen them waiting for an inflow of inspiration like mariners waiting for a tide.

Mr. Crayon had, besides, a multitude of engagements both professional and social. He had kept lively on the canvas the family pride and affection of more than one generation. To him many of the existing race of juveniles were indebted for whatever knowledge they possessed of their grandfathers and grandmothers. Filial, conjugal, and parental memories were extensively kept dewy and bright through his agency. By virtue of his art, innumerable walls glowed with a life—an immortality beyond that of the living men and women who daily looked on them with admiration and love. He had still many faces to preserve, so to speak, for posterity—many new links to establish between the age that was passing and the age that was to come. But the demands on the genial qualities of the man were even more engrossing than the demands on the exquisite skill of the artist. He was bombarded with dinners. For him the most accomplished cooks were daily perspiring; for him the most fastidious wine-merchants were daily producing their choicest vintages. His company was widely courted for the graces of heart, soul, and intellect which it was calculated to throw over the unspiritual materialities of wealth.

Yet he made good use of his leisure. The story which he had planned grew to considerable bulk in his imagination. In writing it out, too, he made surprising progress. When completed, the result was such as to justify my anticipations. It was plain to me that I had not misjudged the peculiar bent of his genius. He had, in fact, produced a work abounding in racy descriptions of character, imbued with the keenest wit, and pointing the most appropriate moral.

It would be gross and ridiculous affectation in me to pretend that I was not proud. That he was indebted to me for setting him on the right track he confessed. Had he set about inventing characters, they would, in all likelihood, have been monstrosities. They might have had no flesh and blood in them. But he had gone to nature—to the unerring fountains—to the eternal well-heads of truth. His descriptions had the veracity of photographs. There was nothing forced. Every touch was in harmony with every other touch. Some of the traits represented might be singular, but none of them were grotesque. Golfer, Bankier, and the rest, might be different from anything hitherto known, but only as newly-discovered plants might be different from those familiar to the botanist. In themselves they were clearly nature's handiwork, not something of man's device. Their vraisemblance was charming. I anticipated an extraordinary measure of success.

Not only had I put Mr. Crayon on the right track, looking at the matter in the abstract, but I had put him on that track with which he was most familiar, which was in fact his specialty, and on which his experience was prodigious. Hence the astonishing ease with which he accomplished his purpose. It was like Blondin on the tight-rope, or Leotard on the trapeze. He was like the man who had devoted a lifetime to drawing profiles of the late Duke of Wellington, and who could hit off, with pen or pencil, the well-known features of the Duke as easily as he could sign his name. Crayon had been describing, delineating, in fact impersonating the originals of his story for years. He was as much at home on them as the great Paganini was at home on his fiddle. The consequence was a certain easy mastery—a completeness of finish combined with an absence of elaboration—which materially heightened the effect.

Several of the scenes were superb. Among these was a quarrel between Mallet and Bankier, on the subject of art. The former was made to quote Ruskin dogmatically; while the latter was represented as not to be put down, but as motioning with his hand softly and deprecatingly, and exclaiming, in the blandest voice—'My dear sir! You don't understand Ruskin. I pity you. Ruskin is not for shallow and ignorant people to quote. You should begin with some simpler author.' Heavens! this to a man who had made art the study of his life! The flame of his beard burned upward until his very forehead was on fire! Bowler laughed like a cavern; while Mallet hurled defiance all round. In the midst of the mêlée, Golfer was made to smile sardonically. Golfer enjoyed a public execution. He also delighted, in his dignified way, in seeing a friend scarified.

Another good passage was one in which Buckingham was called upon to make a speech. His fervour, his intensity, his free and appropriate gesticulation, his vast range of imagination, his brilliant snatches of poetical quotation—all were reproduced, with their inevitable cheers, and with Golfer sublimely sneering, in a style worthy of Smollett, or Fielding, or Addison, or Goldsmith, or any of our best fictionists. The grand figure in the picture—that which gave it its individuality and humour—was still, of course, Golfer.

So clever, indeed, was the plot, so quietly and finely were all the characters developed, and so full of hilarious humour were some of the incidents, that I had really nothing to suggest. All I had to do was simply to congratulate Mr. Crayon, and hurry the precious manuscript into the hands of the printer.

But, at the eleventh hour, a difficulty arose which I had not anticipated. Crayon himself became alarmed at the idea of publication. His original delicate scruples revived in all their intensity. Every one of the characters would, he felt assured, be recognised at once, in spite of the false names assumed. He dreaded lest his conduct in the matter should be pronounced 'too bad.' In vain I tried to convince him of the contrary. They were all, I argued, men of sense, and would no more object to filling up the figures in a story, than they would object to filling up the figures in a historical picture. 'What!' I exclaimed, 'do you mean to tell me that Bankier would object, if you asked him to sit to you for an ancient philosopher? Or that Golfer would hesitate for a moment to stand to you for a Life Guardsman? Or that Mallet would have the slightest scruple in donning a broad-brimmed drab hat, and acting as your model for an unshaven Christian Israelite! Or that, if you desired to represent a modern Wamba, with sword of lath, scattering his jokes on all sides, Bowler would not submit to be your man? Or that Buckingham would not feel honoured to appear as the principal figure on the hustings in any Frithian picture of a popular election? How absurd, then, to suppose that they would give themselves up to painting, yet deny themselves to literature! Most men wish to be of some use in the world; and why should they be an exception? The fact is,' I concluded, 'that if novel-writing is permissible at all, the novelist must, like the painter, have a free run of society and the world.'

All, however, would not do. Crayon still shook his head. His apprehensions were instinctive and insurmountable. He, accordingly, determined to read the story over to each of the party in turn, ostensibly in the way of consulting their judgment, but in reality for the purpose of ascertaining whether they would take offence on discovering their own likeness. The result was a squelcher to the whole affair. Golfer thought the characters of Bankier, Bowler, Mallet, and Buckingham delightfully drawn. He must say, however, that he considered Golfer an odious caricature. The 'fine Roman nose of him' he especially deprecated as an exaggeration. Bankier, on the other hand, pronounced Golfer a masterpiece. But, patting the air blandly, he declared Bankier to be a truly pitiful failure. Bowler shook the neighbourhood with his laughter at the humorous portraits of Bankier and Golfer; he called them 'famous;' but Bowler, he exclaimed, 'would not do at all. To do him justice he should have had all the talking to himself. Ha, ha! A story to be worth reading should have dialogue, and how can you have dialogue with a character that allows nobody else to speak!—eh!—eh?' 'Well, allow me to speak,' remonstrated Crayon. 'No, no;

the fact is, you must either cut out Bowler, or allow Bowler to cut out everybody else. Ha, ha, ha!—eh!—eh!' Mallet was pleased with the story in the main, and thought most of the characters first-rate; 'but as for Mallet,' he said, 'it is neither more nor less than a piece of stupid impertinence; and I would recommend the writer to be very careful what he did. I like a joke as well as any man, but I must be laughed with not at.' Buckingham chuckled immensely, particularly at Golfer; 'but, for goodness sake!' he exclaimed, 'you must leave Buckingham out of the group.'

In short, greatly to my annoyance, Mr. Crayon decided not to publish. I urged, however, that the tale was too good to be thrown aside, and that if he would only disguise the characters a little the whole difficulty might be got over.

The artist became thoughtful for a moment. He at length said—'Your suggestion is a good one, and I shall see in a day or two what can be done.'

CHAPTER III.

The more I reflected on what had occurred, the more I became convinced that people were unnecessarily thin-skinned. Why should any one be eager to put on a cap merely because it happened to fit? I began to wonder how Shakspeare came by his characters, and whether he lived at perpetual feud with his neighbours whose characters he had pilfered. Or, did he manage to disguise them so as to render them unrecognisable, yet without destroying their inherent truthfulness! Did he, for example, take a hot-headed cheesemonger of Cheapside, who had captivated an alderman's daughter by telling her bouncing stories of how he had floored his rivals in the cheese-trade, and whose married career had terminated in jealousy, murder, and suicide! Did he, I say, take some such veritable personage—blacken his face so that his own mother would not have known him—call him by the strange name of Othello—and pass him off as a soldier under the Venetians! Or did he go more fearlessly to work, and incur the wrath of some grave prototype of Dogberry, by incontinently writing him down an ass! How Shakspeare did I know not; but I could not avoid thinking that, after Mr. Crayon's experiment, a modern fictionist trode upon dangerous ground the moment he attempted to make use of his friends in the way of literary portraiture.

Yet, unless models are selected from those really known to the writer, successful fiction would appear to be unattainable. A mighty genius like Shakspeare might no doubt take merely a broad basis of natural qualities, develop them in other circumstances, and present them under phases alike yet different. With any one else, however, such disguises could never be complete without utter confusion and defacement of those qualities which gave truth and naturalness to the picture. For instance, had any one but Shakspeare attempted to manufacture a Venetian Othello out of a Cheapside cheesemonger, the smell of the Stilton and the Cheshire would probably have clung to him through all his wars against the Ottoman. The littleness of the petty trafficker would have destroyed the sable majesty of the hero. It would still have been the soul of a Cockney cheesemonger in the gaudy trappings of a Moorish chief. However, I determined not to make up my mind on this point until I had seen how far so able a man as Crayon might prove successful in his attempt.

Two or three weeks elapsed, and still there was no appearance of the new story in its altered and inoffensive shape. At length, however, the artist came to me with a thin roll of manuscript, and assured me, with more confidence than I had hitherto observed him assume, that he had succeeded far beyond his expectations. I was naturally enough delighted, the plan of alteration having been a suggestion of my own; and pressing him into an easy chair, I ordered the wherewithal to make us both comfortable, prior to the reading being commenced. These preliminaries over, Mr. Crayon opened the first chapter with his usual gravity. The descriptions were minute, and characterised by occasional touches of exquisite observation. Here and there I discovered some distinct feature of our friends, but this was usually followed by something calculated to throw the most suspicious off the scent. I listened with keen attention, and got interested. By degrees, however, it began to dawn upon me that the new version of the story was nothing more than an elaborate practical joke. The first thing that awakened my suspicion occurred in the course of a philosophical argument. 'But before going farther,' Mr. Bankier was made to say, in a persuasive tone, and with a soft wave of the hand, 'let us first settle the question, what is the end and aim of all existence?' This was, of course, a natural and characteristic touch. But what was my surprise to find the same gentleman represented shortly afterwards as stroking his flaming beard, joking in a voice screwed up to the pitch of a cotton-mill or a boilermaker's yard, and ha-ha-ing as nobody ever heard the gentle Bankier ha-ha in this world. I then became suspicious and watchful, when, in due time, I discovered that Mr. Crayon had produced his disguises by sticking the beard of Mallet on the wrong chin, transferring Bowler's voice to somebody else, fastening the fine Roman nose of Golfer on a totally erroneous countenance, and producing other mixtures and confusions such as were never before witnessed in life. The result, I must say, was exceedingly droll to one acquainted with the parties. Mr. Crayon had, in fact, produced a burlesque—an extravaganza—taken from life, yet as unlike life as possible—like one of those toy sets of figures, cut into sections, and capable of numerous transmogrifications, none of them being good copies from Nature, but merely bizarre combinations of impossible occurrence in the flesh.

We had, of course, a good laugh over the affair, but the more we thought of the fastidiousness of Golfer, Bankier, Bowler, Mallet, and Buckingham, the more we became convinced of its unreasonableness. We set them all five down as the stupidly sensitive enemies of the just rights and privileges of authorship. Why should Bowler make such use of his stentorian voice if he is ashamed of it? Will Mallet pretend for a moment that he is not proud of the beard which Crayon designed to make famous? If Bankier is at all sincere in desiring to be heard for his cause, wherefore should he shrink from the glory of a wider audience? Does Golfer mean to contend that his beautiful gift of nose is a possession to be modestly concealed? On what principle of common sense should the splendid oratory of Buckingham 'go no farther?' I tell these gentlemen that they have lost a chance of that immortality for which thousands are content to toil and die. But their feeling is, I admit, a common one. Most people shrink from publicity, unless under lights so absurdly flattering as to be, in fact, glaringly false. There are few who care, like Cromwell, to be painted as they are, with all their seams and warts. No one, indeed, knows better than Crayon that, in the eyes of a sitter, it is only when the expression is pleasing that the likeness is held to be correct.

The hesitation of authors to make a free use of their friends as models, is probably at the foundation of much that is preposterous in current fiction. Our ablest writers exhibit a constant tendency to depart from nature. They are afraid to be personal. All around them, their keen eyes detect characters that would shine in their pages. But these they labour to avoid. They are thus engaged in a continual effort to get away from what is natural and true. Hence exaggerations, monstrosities, unrealisable caricatures of humanity. Hence a perpetual borrowing—not from men, but from books. Yet I can hardly blame the poor authors. Whenever they hold the mirror up to nature, some one is sure to recognise his own likeness, and start up with an angry—'How dare you?'—'gross breach of friendship!'—or 'abominable impertinence!' There is therefore nothing left for them but to exhibit men and women as alien as possible to anything that has ever existed, or can possibly exist, in nature.

In conclusion, I can only regret the existence of a weakness to which I thought the lofty cynicism of Golfer, the bland good nature and profound philosophy of Bankier, the defiant, bantering spirit of Bowler, the fierce resentful pride of Mallet, and the large-hearted bonhomie of Buckingham would have rendered them superior. I hope, however, they will profit by this narrative; and that, in particular, I shall not lose so valued a friend as Mr. Crayon by this hasty, and it may be courageous, attempt at drawing from the life.

SICKNESS AND HEALTH.

See how the brown leaves lie, mamma;
Scatter'd all around!
Hark how the sad winds sigh, mamma,
With such a wailing sound!
They are ever singing, singing—
Like the weary church-bells ringing—
Where my wee brothers lie, mamma,
Under the cold, cold ground!

Oh! it is bright and gay, mamma,
Upon the green hillsides!
I love so well to play, mamma,
Where the clustering harebells hide.
The merry winds are singing, singing,
Like the cheery church-bells ringing
On yon bright summer day, mamma,
When sister was a bride!

JOTTINGS ABOUT THE INSANE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'THE PHILOSOPHY OF INSANITY.'

THERE are few, if any, who have not some weak point, which requires to be watched and fortified, or some morbidly active feeling which ought to be checked and controlled. The first of these is a relative, though it may be a distant one, of idiocy; the second to madness is allied; and by neglecting the one or nursing the other, the mind may sink or soar below or above the temperate region in which alone exists true sanity. The study of the aberrations of the human intellect, if wisely conducted, naturally leads to a knowledge of, and a desire to, encourage the weak and control the strong points which every student will feel to be inherent in, and a portion of, his own individual nature.

There are a certain number of topics all of which are necessary, in different degrees, to our moral and physical development, and ought to be balanced in the mind in proportion to their usefulness. When any one of them usurps an undue influence over the others, then is the mind thrown off the balance, and a step, or it may be a stride, taken in the direct road to insanity.

There are very many crazy folks who have never been, and who have no reason ever to be, within the walls of a lunatic asylum; so that the student in this department of science can never be at a loss for subjects for study, and perhaps he would do well to begin by a careful examination of himself, and, by so doing, he may possibly discover some vulnerable point well known to all his friends and foes, and quite visible to almost everybody except himself.

Not far from where I am writing, there lives a man, a working shoemaker, possessed with a mania for collecting canary birds. He has been known to give fifty shillings for a fancy bird, and to fare sparingly and toil from morning to midnight, apparently grudging himself the necessities of life, in order to save money to buy canaries! He will then get upon what is vulgarly termed 'the fuddle'—sell off his favourites at whatever price they will bring—drink every feather of them; and then, lamenting over his empty cages, with trembling hands and aching head, he begins to slave and to save to buy back the old stock, or invest in new purchases! Can this man be sane? He makes a capital shoe; and a famous cobbler he must be who could beat him at mending. He is, upon the whole, a useful man, can talk well upon any ordinary subject; and certainly, so far as canaries are concerned, is decidedly a natural philosopher.

A very intimate friend, of something like twenty years' standing, lately deceased, believed that the Cloud department of Heaven was entrusted to his care, and that he was personally responsible for the aberrations and fluctuations of the weather. If a scorching, unclouded sun burned up the summer field, or rain flooded the ripe grain in harvest, his distress of mind was extreme; for this arose from a criminal neglect of some duty which he was placed upon earth to perform.

I called upon him a few nights after a concert in the Asylum at Gartnavel, over which he had presided, and been particularly lively and bright, and complimented him upon his very successful display. 'Oh yes,' he said, with a look of anxiety almost amounting to anguish; 'it was all very well till I came up to my room, and then I saw that before going down I had neglected to turn my pillow; and what distress I have suffered since for my neglect!'

'My dear friend,' I replied, 'why should the turning, or the not turning, of a pillow cause you to wear such a look as that?'

It was a dreadfully coarse night, the rain lashing and the wind roaring. He led me to the window, and pointing to the sky—'Do you not see,' said he, 'what sort of weather we have had since?' The appeal was perfectly unanswerable—not a word to gainsay it had I.

Peace be to his ashes! He had keen perceptions, a fervid imagination, a warm heart, and a fluent tongue. I sat by his bed on that night when the thunder-cloud of death burst over him, and for ever dispelled those vapour-bearing clouds which had troubled him so oft. I assisted to lay him in his grave; and I thought then, as I think now, that we could have better spared a wiser man.

In 1860, I was requested, by that true friend to the maniac, Dr. Mackintosh, of the Glasgow Royal Lunatic Asylum, to pay a little attention to a young gentleman, then a patient under the Doctor's care. I of course did so; and found him to be one of those from whom hope had departed, and given place to calm, quiet, settled despair. Sad cases these!—cases in which the cool, apparently passionless, sufferer clutches at death as eagerly as a drowning man would at a hand outstretched to save. Dangerously logical was he, and justified suicide religiously and morally; and, had his premises been true, proved it to be in his case an act of necessity and mercy. I got deeply interested in this man; for I, too, had suffered, and was at one time as hopeless as he—

'A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind.'

I advised, and, better still, I sympathised; and sometimes succeeded in sending a transient gleam through that terrible darkness which enshrouded his soul.

His was one of the pleasantest faces and kindest natures that ever I knew; but, from the first, I had little hope, for he had a small head, and had not slept for months without opiates. Bad—both dreadfully bad. Still, had he been watched, no one knows what time might have done for him. But his friends, misled by a false hope, removed him from the Asylum; and, although he had a kind and careful attendant, he took the first opportunity of taking the last dark leap. Poor fellow! He could no more help it than the ripe apple could help falling from the tree.

Had he been allowed to remain under the judicious superintendence of Dr. Mackintosh, how different might have been his fate! That gentleman, so far as regards his patients, is a personification of kindness, firmness, perseverance, and hope. No amount of provocation or perverseness on their part can ruffle his temper or cloud his brow. I have seen him purchase a small quantity of oatmeal in Glasgow; and take it with him, in his carriage, to the Asylum, to satisfy the whim of an old female pauper-patient, who had taken it into her head that the Asylum meal was too coarsely or too finely ground—I do not recollect which. He works and hopes to the last. There is no such word as 'incurable' in his vocabulary. Nor till death has seized its victim, does he cease from his efforts to alleviate mental or physical distress.

A remarkable case of what we might almost call tenderness of conscience, although I suspect that the proper name is diseased conscientiousness, occurs to me in the case of a very intimate friend of mine, who has been long insane. The neglect of that which the sane mind would justly consider quite immaterial, occasions to him a violent fit of remorse. His system, as explained by himself to me, is this: he believes himself to be the Personification of Purity and Order, and as such he feels the slightest deviation from either to be a crime against his high appointment; and consequently it results in a fit of deep mental distress. He also believes, by virtue of that Purity of which he is the incarnation, that any edible in passing through his hands loses all power to hurt the consumer. Even were it poisonous, he thinks it could scarcely kill; but he is not perfectly confident about this, and declines to try the experiment. On the other hand, the substance, whatever it may be, becomes imbued with a virtue transmitted from him to it which it never possessed before, and which is again transmitted from it to the person who is fortunate enough to receive the gift. This, combined with the natural benevolence of his disposition, causes him to be enthusiastic in giving. Any little present of confections or such like, which he receives, he freely distributes, seldom reserving anything for himself, and insists with a pertinacity which brooks no denial on returning a goodly portion of the gift to the giver, who, in his blindness, cannot see the use or the propriety of taking back that which he had so recently bestowed. I suspect that in almost every case of insanity there is a motive impelling every action, however meaningless it may appear to the onlooker to be. This man claims not the slightest degree of merit to himself for giving; for he believes that he who gives in compliance with an instinctive yearning to bestow is no more deserving of praise than the flower for blossoming under the influence of the summer sun, or the rain-laden cloud for gilding the broom-clad hill with a brighter gold, or for setting free the spirit of fragrance, which slumbering lies in the birch leaf, the heather bloom, and hawthorn blossom.

Nearly twenty years have passed since I resided in the same place with a patient who had been connected with the London press. His intellect was far gone; he was apparently unable, and certainly unwilling, to enter into conversation, but he was book mad. He was very near-sighted, and from morning to night the book was ever close to his eyes. You might be beside him for months, and never get a proper view of his face. He would read, or at least appear to read, every page of the largest book that was given him; and, if another was not forthcoming, he would read and re-read it again and again. Although habitually silent as the dead, if the book was taken from him he would chatter like an angry ape, and find no rest till it was restored.

For many years I had never thought of this man, or if a transient shadow of him passed before the eyes of memory, it was accompanied with the idea that he had long since gone to his rest; when, a few weeks ago, in passing through one of the galleries in a lunatic asylum, I was struck almost motionless by seeing the same figure that, twenty years ago, had been so familiar to my view—the book still close to its face; the same slow measured step; the same stooped shoulders; the same cut and colour of coat; the same soft slipper that so noiselessly moved over the floor.

Was I dreaming? Was I insane? Or had death and time really passed by this man, and not even altered a button upon his coat?

Upon inquiry, I found that his habits had, during this long period, remained unchangeable and unchanged, and that few inquired about him now.

Long continuation of life in a lunatic asylum is a melancholy thing. Old and true friends gone; and a generation arisen who—although, it may be, related by blood—shrink from visiting the old, forsaken maniac. Under some circumstances, how precious a thing is death!

From among a mass of papers, written while the mind was still hovering on the brink of insanity, I quote a few passages:—

'For months after I left the Asylum, everything spoke to me by signs. Every lineament in the still pale face of a corpse seemed bursting with tidings from beyond the tomb. Not an adornment upon the coffin-lid, not a fold in the winding-sheet or the shroud, but had a tongue. Not a skull grinned at the grave's mouth, but seemed horribly intelligent unto me. There was deep, there was dreadful meaning in the footprints of a beast. Every straw driving before the wind, or lying still in the calm—the raven's croak—the bird's song—were all replete with a meaning awful and intense. Not a cloud in heaven, not a shadow upon earth, but thrillingly told some tale of dread and fear. Not a sound in nature but to me was a signal; not a movement, but was a sign.

'Many years ago I saved a young woman from drowning, who fell into the water from the paddle-box of a steamer between the boat's side and the quay, at a very serious amount of personal injury and the imminent risk of my life. This I used to consider a good deed. But a fearfully heinous crime it appeared now—a crime utterly beyond the reach of salvation, a crime of a dye too deep for blood or tears to purify, of a nature too dreadful for repentance or remorse to cancel. The sting, the torture of this delusion lay in the intense belief that this girl was to be the progenitor of a race of monsters, who were to desolate the earth, and commit the most horrid cruelties down to the end of time, which could not have been the case had I not interfered with the merciful designs of Providence, but allowed the girl quietly to drown.

'At another time, within a few yards of the same place, a large glass vessel, containing sulphuric acid, fell from a cart and went to pieces upon the stones, drenching a lad from the feet to the waist with the acid, which would in a very short time have burned him to the bones. He stood still and terror-struck. I instantly seized him by the collar, rushed with him down a stair close by, which led into the river, and before the acid had time to penetrate his woollen clothing plunged him into the water, which, of course, effectually quenched the acid's power to destroy. This, also, was now a crime, for which my cries and prayers for forgiveness were hurled back, striking on heart and brain as forcibly as though the cries and prayers had been as material as shot or shell.'

The more fervently a maniac strives, the harder he struggles with his disease, the madder he becomes. The cause of this is evident, for by so doing he keeps his mind intensely fixed upon the delusion, drives it deeply, it may be permanently, into the brain, and keeps a stream of electric fire pouring in upon the already inflamed membranes which give forth the manifestation of mind; and the natural results are—first, agony; second, idiocy; and lastly, death. Passive, not active, resistance is the only true moral treatment; all else is throwing fire upon flame.

By far the most dangerous class of lunatics are to be found outside the walls of an asylum. The most violent maniac that ever flew at his keeper's throat, or dashed his own head against the walls of a cell, is harmless in comparison to a fanatic upon the judgment seat, or an ardent lover of military glory upon a throne.

MARY GORDON'S FIRST DAYS AT SCHOOL.

CHAPTER VII.

WE shall now leave Mary for a short time, and return to the home she had quitted so unhappily in the morning.

After breakfast was over, Thomas waited until he heard Mr. Gordon and his visitors leave the dining-room and go out, when he lifted the change of the sovereign from the pantry table, and took it to Mrs. Gordon, and, on counting it, was surprised to find there were only nineteen shillings.

'There is a shilling wanting,' he said; 'and Nancy must have made some mistake, for it was she who got the change, and I shall go and ask her about it.'

Before doing so, however, he searched in the pantry and over the hall floor, but of course the shilling was not to be found; and he proceeded to the kitchen, where he got Nancy, and asked if she could explain it.

'I can in no way account for it,' she said; 'for Mr. Anderson, the grocer, who gave me the change, laid it down on the counter, in four lines of five shillings each—which I saw with my own eyes, and counted them while I took them up, and held them in my hand until I walked home; and if Mrs. Gordon or you have any doubts of my word, you may inquire at Mr. Anderson, who will tell you all I have said is true.'

'There is nobody suspecting you,' said Thomas; 'and you should not labour so much to convince people of your innocence, for it will only make them think you guilty, whether you are or not.'

'You seem to think there is but a small chance of my being innocent,' said Nancy, who was very sensitive about her character; 'and I suppose Mrs. Gordon and you will agree that I have made off with the shilling. It is a very easy matter for an old servant like you—who have been so long in this house that nobody will suspect you—to turn over the guilt upon a poor girl like me, who only came a few weeks ago, and have nothing but my character to depend upon; and now everybody will set me down for a thief,'—and Nancy sobbed hysterically, and put her apron to her eyes.

'Did ever anybody hear such ridiculous nonsense?' exclaimed Thomas. 'You are nothing better than a young fool, Nancy, for you don't understand what people mean when they speak to you. Who ever spoke of you being a thief?'

In pronouncing the last sentence, Thomas raised his voice to a high pitch; and, while he was speaking, Rachel came into the kitchen, having only then returned from her sister's; and when she saw Nancy sobbing, with her apron covering her face, and caught Thomas's last words, which spoke of her being a thief, she was greatly alarmed.

'Tell me, Thomas, what all this means? What is the matter with Nancy?'

On hearing Rachel's voice, Nancy pulled her apron from her eyes. 'Rachel,' she said, 'I'll tell you myself. He says'—and she pointed to Thomas—'that I stole a shilling from Mrs. Gordon, and that he knows I am guilty because I tried to show him I was innocent.'

'Well! I declare that beats everything!' said Thomas, striking his hand forcibly on the table. 'And you are the stupidest girl I ever met in all my life; for all I said was, that if you know yourself to be innocent, you need not be saying so much about it to other people, for that will only make them think you guilty; but I shall not waste more words upon you. How is your sister's little girl, Rachel?'

'She is rather better this morning, thank you, Thomas.'

'I am very glad to hear it; and now, as I am going up stairs, I hope you will try to persuade Nancy, if she is really innocent, to say nothing more about it;' and Thomas left the kitchen.

'He is very impertinent,' said Nancy; 'and I have a good mind to tell Mrs. Gordon of the way he has spoken.'

'Oh! never mind him,' said Rachel; 'you are a stranger to Thomas yet, and don't know that he is a joker.'

She then inquired how Nancy had got on dressing the children in the morning.

'Very well with Master William, who is a dear good child; but Miss Mary would not let me dress her at all; and, when I was combing her hair, which she could not do herself, she pulled off my cap and called me names.'

'Oh, dear! I am very sorry to hear this. Does her mamma know of it?'

Nancy related exactly all that had occurred, and the circumstances connected with the lost shilling, as far as she knew them. 'And, indeed, Rachel,' she concluded, 'this has been an unlucky morning for me.'

For a few minutes, Rachel seemed lost in thought; and then, as if some new suspicion had arisen in her mind, her next question was—'Did you say Miss Mary walked to school alone this morning?'

'Yes,' said Nancy. 'Mrs. Gordon told me I was to go with her, but she went off without me.'

The dining-room bell now rang, and Rachel ran up stairs. She met Thomas coming out of the pantry to answer the bell, and said she would do it for him, as she wished to see Mrs. Gordon.

'Then tell her,' said Thomas, 'that Nancy says she gave me the full change of the sovereign this morning, and knows nothing of the lost shilling; and I have searched every place I can think of, but have not found it.'

'There is some mystery about the loss of that shilling,' said Rachel; 'and I feel almost afraid to conjecture how and where it is to be found.' And she shook her head ominously, as she opened the dining-room door.

'Rachel!' said Mrs. Gordon, 'I am glad you are come back. How is your sister's child?'

'She is a little better, thank you, ma'am; for the doctor says there is now some hope of her recovery. And I came to tell you that he assured me her complaint is not in the least infectious, or I would not have ventured to remain all night. But I feel very grateful to you, ma'am, for allowing me to do so; for it was the means of my sister getting a night's sleep, and she had not been in bed for nearly a week. I was sorry, too, for being so late of coming home this morning; but I waited for the doctor's visit, and he was later than usual.'

'You are most welcome to all the time you had, Rachel; and you shall have more if it is needful. But, meantime, it is fortunate the little girl is better. Has Nancy told you how badly Mary behaved this morning?'

'Yes, ma'am. She told me all about it.'

'What annoys me most,' said Mrs. Gordon, 'is, that she walked to school alone; for I have felt uneasy about her ever since. And I rang the bell just now, to tell Thomas to order the carriage, as I wish to go and bring her home. But you may give him my message, Rachel; and tell him he will require to be quick, for I have other places to go, and I must be at Miss Weston's by one o'clock.'

'I shall tell him to get ready immediately,' said Rachel. And, before leaving the room, she gave Thomas's message about the lost shilling.

'That is rather a strange circumstance, Rachel. But perhaps Thomas may find it yet.'

'I hope and trust he may,' said Rachel, earnestly.

CHAPTER VIII.

Truth had been carefully inculcated in every part of Mary's education by her parents as well as by Miss Weston, and her disposition was far too open and artless to admit of her continuing to practise deceit; but never, poor thoughtless child, had she been so far overcome of evil as on this unhappy morning, for there seemed to be no way of escape from the snare she had so foolishly spread for herself, and she was already suffering the punishment of her errors, in being obliged not only to hide the doll, but to tell untruths, in order to keep up her concealment of it.

When Miss Gray came to call her out, she was greatly disappointed that Rachel had not come for her, for she dreaded meeting her mamma, and having to answer the questions she would be sure to put to her; and so terrible was the idea that she might open her bag and look into it, that before leaving the dressing-room she seized it, and in great trepidation, stuffed the doll down to the bottom, disposing of her books and other things, so as most effectually to conceal it.

On going out, she was glad to find that her mamma was still with Miss Weston; and when Thomas lifted her into the carriage, she hid the bag in one corner, seating herself before it with her hand behind, holding it carefully in concealment.

While sitting thus, with a beating heart, waiting for her mamma, she looked up at the school-room and saw some of the girls' figures near the windows, and Fanny Wallace was nodding to her and smiling sweetly.

'How happy Fanny Wallace looks!' thought Mary, as she nodded in return; 'and oh! how I wish I could remain with her at Miss Weston's, and had not now to go home!'

On looking again, she saw Miss Duncan, who had advanced to the window, and was making hideous faces and gestures; while she held up to Mary's view her muslin dress all stained with ink; and so astonished was Mary at her strange appearance that she even forgot to watch for her mamma, who now came down the hall steps and into the carriage.

When they drove away, Mrs. Gordon looked anxiously into Mary's face, and inquired if there was anything the matter with her, for Miss Weston had said she did not think her looking well.

'I am quite well, mamma.'

'I hope you got safely to school this morning?'

'Oh yes, mamma.'

'And will you tell me, Mary, why you ran away without Nancy, after I told you she was to go with you?'

'I forgot all about it, mamma.'

'And did nothing happen by the way to frighten you when you were alone?'

'Nothing, mamma,' said Mary; but she blushed up to her forehead.

'Mary, I know there must be something the matter with you, for you are colouring so, and I see the marks of tears on your cheeks.'

'Oh, mamma,' she said, 'that is because I played my music lesson so badly that Miss Taylor was very angry with me, and turned me away from the piano, and I was crying just before I came out.'

Mrs. Gordon said no more, but she was far from being satisfied with her explanation.

On coming near home, Mary took her bag from its hiding-place, and by an almost imperceptible motion hung it over her arm, and was preparing to leave the carriage when her mamma told her to remain until Thomas inquired if Rachel had gone out with Willie. 'For if not,' she said, 'I wish to take you both into town to get you fitted with new boots; and as I have some visits to pay afterwards, you will then walk home with Rachel and get dinner.'

When Thomas inquired, however, he learned they had been away for some time, and Rachel had said they were going to the shoemaker's.

'Oh very well,' said Mrs. Gordon, 'it does not matter; I shall take you with me another day, Mary; and meantime you may go to the nursery and wait until they return.'

Mary alighted and ran up stairs.

'How fortunate it is,' she thought, 'that they happen to be out, for now I shall get Sophy's clothes tried on the new doll!'

She flung off her hat and cloak in great haste, so as to make the most of her opportunity; and fearing that Rachel might come in suddenly and see what she was about, she went to fasten the nursery-door, but found, much to her disappointment, that the bolt had been removed; and as the stair and passage leading to the nursery were thickly covered with carpet, it was impossible for her to hear an approaching footstep, and so be warned in time to hide the doll. She had therefore to proceed with her work under the dread of sudden discovery, and kept running out from time to time upon the landing at the top of the stair, that she might look over the railing and see if there was any one coming up, always closing the door carefully after each survey she made.

The whole contents of Sophy's wardrobe were spread out, and the clothes fitted the new doll exactly; the little straw hat was a crowning success, and Mary tried to persuade herself that she was delighted, and yet the pleasure she felt was far from being satisfactory or what she had expected; there was something wanting—something all wrong about it; and 'oh!' she thought, 'if Fanny Wallace were only here to see it, or if I might go down stairs and show it to everybody in the house, I should be so much happier; and now that I think of it, surely I might venture to go down to the housekeeper's room, and show it to Mrs. Wilson, for she would never suspect anything wrong about it! She must be very dull living always down in that room, and I think it would amuse her to see so pretty a doll.' She was preparing to go down stairs, when suddenly her ear was startled by a hand on the lock of the door; and with the speed of lightning the doll was flung headlong under the chest of drawers before which she was standing, and where she continued to stand without daring to look behind her, while Rachel and Willie walked into the nursery, followed by 'Prince,' a small pet terrier.

'Look at my new boots, Mary!' said Willie. 'I put them on at the shoemaker's, and Rachel carried home my old boots, and I can slide almost as well as if I were on ice—look at me!' and he began a skating expedition over the nursery floor. Mary, however, had been far too much frightened to notice what he was doing; and, as soon as she was able, tried to conceal her confusion from Rachel, by seeming to be busily occupied dressing her doll Sophy; but her agitation did not escape Rachel's observation, and, while she went into Willie's room, and told him to come with her and get off his boots, she continued, unseen, to watch Mary all the while, who, supposing herself now out of sight, began to recover a little; but, meantime, the little dog Prince, whose entrance she had not observed, ran ferreting about the floor in every direction. He had been taught many doll tricks by Mary and Willie, and, among others, to fetch Mary's doll, and lay it at her feet; but what was now her consternation on seeing him rush from under the chest of drawers, carrying the wax-doll triumphantly between his teeth; but, instead of dutifully laying it at her feet, he seemed instinctively to guess there was something extraordinary about this new acquisition, and continued careering round and round the nursery. Mary pursued him with the energy of despair, but he eluded her at every turn, always darting off in a new direction when she was about to seize him. At length, when he was making for the door of Willie's room, she sprang forward so as to intercept his entrance, and fairly caught him. 'You wicked, bad Prince!' she said, extricating the doll from his mouth, and putting it into her drawer, 'go down stairs this moment;' and he whined dismally as she shut him out. Mary returned to the drawer, where she had deposited the doll, and remembering that when Rachel dressed her for dinner she would likely open this drawer, she took it out again, and carrying it across the room, hid it under the bed-clothes at the foot of her bed.

All this was seen by Rachel; and most servants in her place would have searched the matter at once, and have obliged Mary to disclose the truth; but she had been directed by Mr. Gordon never to question the children upon suspicion of their faults, for fear of inducing them to tell falsehoods; but, whenever she suspected them of doing wrong, to come at once and tell Mrs. Gordon or himself; and although her suspicions of Mary now amounted almost to certainty, she thought it her duty to ascertain the truth more fully before speaking of it to her master or mistress. After dressing the children for the late dinner hour, and sending them down stairs, she searched for the doll where she had seen it hidden by Mary; and, on finding and recognising it, she put on her bonnet, and walked immediately to the toy-shop, where she learned from the shopwoman of Mary's visit in the morning, and her purchase of the doll; and so minutely did she describe her appearance, and the hurry and excitement of her manner, that there could be no mistake.

With a heavy heart Rachel returned home; for she was faithfully attached to the child she had nursed since her infancy, and had always borne patiently with her faults, from knowing and appreciating her better qualities. And now she found it a painful duty to inform against her.

CHAPTER IX.

When Thomas opened the hall door, Rachel inquired if Miss Elliot was come?

'She came a short time ago,' said he; 'and the children have gone up stairs with her.'

Rachel walked to the dining-room door, and opening it gently, looked in.

'Mrs. Gordon, ma'am, will you please to speak with me for a few minutes?'

'What is it, Rachel? Is there anything wrong with the children?' said Mrs. Gordon, rising from table, alarmed by Rachel's appearing at so unusual a time.

'Miss Mary has done something wrong, ma'am, and I wish to tell you about it.'

'Then come in, Rachel, and let me hear it too,' said Mr. Gordon. And she went in and shut the door.

'I am very sorry to tell you,' she said, 'that I have discovered it was Miss Mary who took the shilling that was missing from the pantry this morning; and on her way to school, ma'am, she bought the doll that you refused to buy for her yesterday.'

'Oh Rachel!' said Mrs. Gordon, turning very pale, and sitting down. 'This is far worse than anything I could have supposed of Mary.'

'For my part, I do not believe it at all,' said Mr. Gordon; 'the child is incapable of such things. What are your proofs, Rachel?'

She related every circumstance that had occurred, and was sharply cross-questioned by her master.

'I am sorry to find,' he said, when she had finished, 'that your evidence is only too clear; but I hope you have not put any questions to the child.'

'Oh no, sir,' said Rachel; 'I remembered you had forbidden me ever to do so.'

'I am very glad of that, Rachel; and I hope you will keep in mind that I strictly desire you will not now say one word to her on the subject, but leave her entirely to me.'

'You may depend upon me, sir.'

'Then you may go, Rachel; and I thank you for telling us so promptly of this painful affair.'

'William,' said Mrs. Gordon, after Rachel had gone out, 'I feel quite at a loss how we are to deal with Mary in this matter; for the fault—or rather I should say the crime—she has committed amounts to depravity, and is so much worse than anything she has ever done, that I really do not know how she is to be suitably punished.'

'I am not sure that I shall punish her at all at present,' said Mr. Gordon; 'at least until I have watched her for some time. She was unusually quiet and grave at dinner to-day, and from all Rachel has told us I feel convinced that a childish longing for a toy has tempted her to sin against her own convictions, and that she is now suffering in her mind for what she has done. I shall try, by showing her the evil nature of her sin, to bring her if possible to a voluntary confession; and I beg of you, therefore, as I desired Rachel, to say nothing on the subject, but leave her to me.'

'But if you are going to allow her to escape punishment altogether, I cannot leave her to you, William. You think her conscience will punish her sufficiently; but I can assure you that all Mary feels about it is dread of discovery and punishment; and I have no faith in the convictions of children.'

'Then you and I differ greatly, Anne; for not only do I believe in the convictions of children but in the conversions of many. I may possibly have to punish Mary, but there is no occasion for proceeding rashly to do so, as she does not yet know we have found out what she has done; and I must say, from what you told me yourself, that your punishment this morning was to very little purpose, for by being left to breakfast alone in Rachel's absence, she only fell into greater sin.'

'Then I can see very well that it is not likely you will punish her at all,' said Mrs. Gordon; 'but if her voluntary confession does not come to-night before she sleeps, I think she ought to be kept at home from school to-morrow, and confined in a room alone without Willie's society, until she is glad to make confession and regain her liberty; but I fear that even this will not make her confess such a fault, and perhaps she ought to be whipped at once.'

'I shall never whip her,' said Mr. Gordon decidedly.

'He that spareth the rod hateth his son, and his daughter, too,' said Mrs. Gordon; 'and how do you explain this text—Folly is bound up in the heart of a child, but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him?'

'That is an excellent text you have quoted, my dear, and most applicable to our subject, for it tells us that when folly is "bound up" in the heart—that is to say, when it is as a part of the child's very nature, and the little fool persists in it without any sense or consciousness of its own foolishness—then there is nothing but the rod of correction that will drive it out; but I cannot believe it is so with Mary—at least, I hope not. I shall soon discover, however, for her character is open as the day; so much so, indeed, that I am often amused with reading her thoughts in her face before she speaks them; and it will be all the more easy for me to search and try her, that I feel persuaded she has convictions. Yes, Anne, although I see you smiling so doubtfully and shaking your head, I repeat it—I believe the child has convictions of her sin, and no one shall intermeddle with these while I am here to prevent it.'

'Oh then, of course it is useless for me to say anything more, and I shall leave her to you, as you desire. I only hope her convictions may prove a reality, and that I may not have to punish her myself to-morrow morning!' And Mrs. Gordon rose and went up stairs.

SUB-EDITORIAL PHILOSOPHY.—No. IV.

ON SOME IMPOSTORS OF MY YOUTH, WITH A FEW REMARKS ON SOCIAL IMPOSTORS IN GENERAL.

HOWEVER much I may wonder at it, and despise myself for it, and endeavour, by whatever process of mental sophistry, to argue myself out of the belief of it, still it is a fact which I cannot get over, in my calm, reflective, reasonable moments, that at one time I had the most profound respect, awe, admiration, and hero-worship for several persons whom I discovered afterwards to be most barefaced impostors. True, I was very young at the time; and true it is, also, and a matter of congratulation, that I was not much older when the mist was removed from my eyes, and I saw to my horror that I had been grossly taken in.

In reviewing some of those impostors of my youth, I find the shadow of the late Dr. Baggall starting up, and with his old pomposity of manner, puffing his cheeks, levelling his forefinger at my head, and saying, 'Now, boy, attend to me, d'ye hear?' I will attend to Dr. Baggall, not solely by right of seniority, but for the satisfaction of refuting the constant assertion which he made, not only to me but also to large numbers of my friends—some of whom have, in consequence, had a bad impression of me to this day—that I would never rise higher in the social scale than a coalheaver or bricklayer's assistant. I am, in spite of Dr. Baggall's prognostication, at a considerably higher altitude in the social scale than either a coalheaver or bricklayer's assistant, and I have never been indebted to any of my friends for assistance. It was at Dr. Baggall's academy that I received my elementary instructions in knowledge, with the stimulating encouragement, at the commencement of my career, that once in possession of 'knowledge,' I should be in a far more enviable position than the rich proprietor of houses and lands of great yearly rental. It did not strike me at the time that there was no particular amount of knowledge specified; and it strikes me now that, though I have been to college, and honourably distinguished myself there, I cannot yet have gained the requisite amount of knowledge, as I find that, both in my own eyes and that of all my acquaintances, I am much less an object of legitimate envy than my brainless cousin Bob, who is the hereditary possessor of houses and demesnes of great yearly rental. So much was I in awe of the Doctor, and so great was my belief that his prognostications would turn out correct, that it was only by my removal from his academy that I believe my fate was averted. While with him, the shadow of his great presence hung over me like a prophetic cloud, which I felt certain would gather over my head and descend upon me like an avalanche, if I presumed to shirk the destiny which he had provided for me. Why it was that the Doctor inspired me with so much awe I cannot now conjecture. My honoured parent was also taken in with him sadly; for I recollect that, after the preliminary arrangements had been made by which I was to be transferred to the care of the Doctor, he (my honoured parent) gave me to understand, with much bating of breath and significant gestures of awe, that he (the Doctor) was a wonderful man, a man of 'presence,' and a man who was likely to draw out and fructify any seeds of genius which might be within my brain. There were seeds of a certain amount of genius in me; but I emphatically deny that it was through his influence that they blossomed and bore fruit. He was a great impostor Dr. Baggall, and of course his real character was found out at last. Nevertheless, it was a considerable shock to me when I discovered that the seedy, dissipated, peripatetic vender of stationery, who paid me periodical visits, was no other than the veritable Dr. Baggall, one of the impostors of my youth. I paid sadly for revealing myself to him. The Doctor's wares rose prodigiously after he discovered my identity. I am not a coward—would like to see the party who would venture to call me villain, break my pate across, tweak me by the nose, pluck off my beard and blow it in my face, give me the lie in the throat as deep as to the lungs; yet I will confess that I felt a little nervous every time Dr. Baggall came to my office; and although my consulting-room smelled, for an hour after he left, like a parlour next door but one to a 'public,' I could not refuse to ask him in and buy some of his wretched articles; nay, at such times I actually felt, and the injured expression of the Doctor's eye tended to heighten the hallucination, that I myself was the impostor; that the hard-earned balance at my banker's properly belonged to him; and that I had basely shirked the destiny provided for me, in order to clap it on his shoulders. He appeared to take that view of the matter himself, as, the other day, he called at my private house while I was entertaining some of my aristocratic friends—how he contrived to get in I am at a loss to conceive, both Ferkins the boy and Mary the housemaid deny having admitted him—and staggering into the room, during the course of dinner, publicly taunted me with dressing in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day, while I allowed him to feed on husks. 'Husks, bedad! Husks!' he repeated, blinking in the gaslight like a dissipated owl. 'I appeal to you, ladies and gentlemen. Cast him out from among you. The impostor! Shame, man! Shame!' Of course I could do nothing but blush up to the eyes, and assure the company that I had no connection with the man whatever. 'Hear him!' he shrieked out with an awful gurgle and hiccup. 'Hear him, gen'lmen! Declare to you my heart's breaking; it is, indeed. I was his preceptor. I put him in the position he now occupies. These chairs, tables, and this house, he has me to thank for. I am an old man, and my feelings will find vent (bitter weeping and hiccuping). Forgive those tears. I am fallen into the sear and yellow leaf; but what wrecks he? Not a fig! Ah, gentlemen (hiccup), how sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child!' The last taunt was sufficient.

'You drunken old idiot!' I shouted out. 'Your child! imbecile! Go out of the house, impostor! or I'll give you in charge.' In a minute I was engaged in a personal encounter with the drunken old hypocrite. He appeared next day at my office to apologise, and to force on me a job lot of envelopes at about four times the original value; but I sternly refused to speak, and now that idol is shattered and in the dust.

What an arch impostor was that Blatterton, of my native town; and what a shock it was to my fellow-townsmen when he married, and his real position came out! Blatterton had scarcely a farthing to leave; yet all the world of Whimperwell believed that he was rich, immensely rich; he looked rich; he looked a millionaire.

Why?

Did he live in a fine house? Did he keep a carriage? Did he subscribe handsomely to charities? Did he dress like a lord? Did he carry in his hand a cane with three-quarters of a pound of gold on the head? Did he wear gold spectacles, a diamond ring, diamond studs, diamond sleeve-links? No, he did none of these.

What then? Did he say that he had money?

No. On the contrary, he always asseverated that he was as poor as a rat, as a church-mouse, as a charity-boy. If he had stated that he possessed money, nobody would have believed him; but because he said the contrary, people whispered that he was up to the ears in money. Whimperwell had been his native town; he had left it at the age of ten years, and returned from foreign countries—California, folks said—after an absence of forty years, and settled down in the old town—all his relations being dead—a lonely old bachelor. Who it was that started the rumour that Blatterton had money, I cannot say. I should like to know who it is that starts any rumour. There is a tradition that no man, woman, or child has ever been witness of the dying struggles of a donkey, or present at its interment. I question this. Common sense suggests that this is a palpable exaggeration. If I were to advertise to-morrow for the remains of a dead donkey, I am confident I should get a hundred offers; but if I were to advertise till doom's-day for the originator of any popular rumour, I should remain unanswered. Who it was that originated the rumour that Captain Blatterton was rich, I, of course, am unable to say.—By-the-by, who was it, also, that gave him the title of 'Captain'? It transpired that he had not the remotest claim to such a dignity. Blatterton's crime was that he contradicted the statements about his wealth in such a mysterious manner, that it only made assurance doubly sure. He barricaded his wretched old hovel, as if he had the wealth of Golconda to protect. He contrived to be seen in strong moonlight evenings, surveying his mangy plot of ground, and poking into every nook and corner with a blunderbuss, as if searching for any unseen form concealed with burglarious intentions. He kept a huge Newfoundland dog in the house, and always had his front door double-bolted with iron bars, which took about half-an-hour to undo. If any of his acquaintances called after six o'clock in the evening, they were obliged to give a pass-word, which he used as evidence of their friendly intentions. He lived alone, paid for everything in advance, and disappeared for a month every year, not without employing a private watchman to guard the outside of the house. He would admit no one inside in his absence. He was mean, dreadfully mean; drank nothing but sour ale or porter; and when bantered about his wealth would asseverate, with a dry hard chuckle and a significant shrug of the shoulders—'No, no, gentlemen. I'm a poor man—a poor man; but you wont believe me.' Of course the company would take this as a splendid joke, grin, and laugh, and wink, and poke each other in the sides, with the most beaming satisfaction in their faces and knowing winks in Blatterton's direction. I used to do so likewise. I used occasionally to meet the old rascal out fishing, and joked him about his immense wealth, hoping to be remembered in his will; and with confident anticipations of being remembered, for I was his favourite, and used to spend days with him on the banks of my native stream, wondering to myself how such a wealthy chap could be content with the nain-by-pamby life he was leading; and speculating as to my own conduct if I had a tenth part of his money. I would be off to London, to Paris; I would travel; I would do a hundred things. Great heavens! If I had only known or believed him (for he was earnest with me); but, of course, I could not believe him. I left my native town for a few years. I returned one evening; put up at the 'St. George and the Dragon,' and the first object which I encountered when I entered the coffee-room was the veritable Blatterton, got up regardless of expense—a diamond ring on his finger, splendid gold watch and albert, best blue broad cloth suit, elegant scarf, boots, hat. He saluted me affectionately. He was intoxicated. I had supper with him. During the course of the meal I observed that both of us were scowled upon by a select lot of my late townsmen, by the landlord, by the very waiter who had served us. 'Halloo! John,' I said, after Blatterton had been assisted up stairs to bed; 'Blatterton has come out in his true colours at last, and is spending his money like a Briton.' John's eye assumed a stern look at those words, his brow grew dark, he breathed hard, he bit the nail of his little finger, always keeping his eye steadily fixed upon me, he sighed significantly, and his whole appearance suggested some grievous wrong which I had committed against his peace of mind. A casual observer would have fancied that I had slandered him grossly behind his back, and was now attempting with brazen composure to deny it; or had trifled with the affections of his only and beloved daughter; or had a set of silver spoons, for which he was answerable, concealed up the sleeves of my coat; or something equally as bad. I regarded him with innocent astonishment, depicted in nearly every one of the lineaments of my countenance. He kept the stern expression, however, for five minutes, growing sterner every minute, as if he were reading my very soul, till it reached a climax; it then all gradually dispelled, like weak snow before a strong sun. He said 'What! don't you know, then?' On my answering him, with the innocent astonishment depicted in every lineament of my countenance without one single exception, he dashed away a tear which had gathered in his eye—whether from remorse at his suspicion of me, or from the steadfast mesmeric gaze which he had kept up for five minutes, I have never yet been able to discover—held out his hand frankly, and said 'Forgive me! forgive me! I ask your parding from the bottom of my soul. I will tell you all when I have served those gents who have just rang in the commercial room.' He did tell me all, which was sufficient to prove that I, as well as a great number of the inhabitants of my native town, had been grossly imposed upon. 'Why, you sec,' said John, 'the fact is, as you know, every one believed that the old impostor had money; the consequence of which was that he began to be introduced into society. He always maintained, on those occasions, that he was poor as a rat; but nobody believed him. Miss Tweadell, old Tweadell the boiler-maker's daughter, did not believe him; made love to him (she is forty years of age, and therefore only ten years between 'em). He resspisritckated the attachment. Everybody expected that the £13,000 which she got left by her father would be doubled, and she of course expected ditto. He still maintained, however, that he was poor as a mouse, and was married in an old snuffy suit. His house was opened, cleaned, refurnished elegantly, at his wife's expense—she expecting, poor soul! that he would soon reveal himself in his true colours, and keep up a style like a British gentleman. She's awful fond of state, you know. Well, to cut a long story short, it turned out that his statements were true, although he had made them appear as if it was a fine joke. She took on awful, of course. Now he's got her money in his 'and, and is flaring up and down like a fury.'

The last time I saw this arch impostor, he was attempting to get up a lamp-post to light his dirty, greasy pipe—his fine blue coat was all mud—his hat was in the gutter—and his gold watch was dangling from the chain outside his pocket. 'Illo, my boy!' he said, on seeing me; and, sliding down as I disappeared, he shrieked out, with a horrid gurgie—'No offence, ol' chap! I'll 'member ye in my will! He! he! Poor's a rat!—s'elp me! Ha! ha!' He imitated an Indian war-whoop till I was out of sight, and I have never seen him since.

The commencement of my commercial career introduced me to a most unmitigated impostor, and whose fall was a cruel blow to my feelings, and a crueller blow to the pockets of some of my friends. I refer to the great Dottleton, of the firm of P. Q. R. S. & T. Dottleton, the great linen manufacturers—the men who were to revolutionise the linen trade by the introduction of straw as a staple of manufacture; the great merchants whose straw scheme came to such a dire conflagration; who depended so much on straw, surrounded themselves so thickly with straw, were so much over head and ears in straw, that the only way of extrication was by setting the whole place on fire, and creeping out like rats. They did set it on fire one fine windy day, and the flames spread so rapidly that hundreds of smaller ricks were smoking and flaring away all over the kingdom, to the dire consternation of myself and all who had sworn so implicitly by the great straw man; I say the great straw man, because I count Q. R. S. & T. Dottleton as nought—never had any faith in them. So entranced was I by the great Dottleton—not great in stature. He was a little man; a man with a half stoop, as if the great globe itself on which he walked were only one huge piece of foolscap, on which he was perpetually casting figures, leaving at every calculation hideous margins against himself, to be washed off either by one grand mercantile margin in his own favour, or one dire swoop which would bring down all the unfortunate victims whom he had honoured with his notice; a man who had visits from members of Parliament and peers of the realm, and who kept interpreters to show foreign princes all over his great establishment; and the foreign princes went, wondered at the multitude of the wares, at the numbers of the retainers, at the shrewdness of the great little Dottleton (great in finance, little in stature); and stepped into their carriages at the door with the opinion stronger in them than ever that this was a great country, a wonderful country, a country of merchant princes. Ah! if the foreign princes had known at the time that they were only walking on straw, and that the match was laid, waiting for the tread of the heel to set the whole fabric in a blaze! But they discovered at last, and still they said it was a great country—for gorgeous bankruptcies. I used to be almost petrified when my great idol walked into the room where I was working; the consciousness of his august presence confused me, and made the figures dance and caper before me like so many fiends delighted with my bewilderment. It was a sight to see him walking quietly through the room, his hands clasped behind his back, his small foxy face and keen black eyes moving from side to side. P.'s coming, we would whisper to each other, and down would go our heads close to our ledgers, and our pens would scrape away diligently till he had passed; and then we would stop, release our pent-up breaths, and feel a glow of pride at being, however humbly and remotely, connected with such a prodigy of mercantile genius. I used to gaze with reverence at his coat, at his boots, at his shirt, at his modest gold chain, and wonder how they were not blacker, shinier, whiter, more brilliant than Pringle's, my vis-a-vis at the desk, who dressed smart, and who pretended not to feel awed when the great Dottleton passed. The hypocrite! swell as he was, I am sure he would have felt himself grateful if the great P. had condescended to ask him to brush his boots, and would have bragged about it afterwards. But, my dear reader, such is always the case when an idol is shattered and laid low; its former most devout worshippers kick it for falling, and cry out that they never had faith in it. I, however, speak honestly, and say that I was grievously imposed upon by the great Dottleton. Smith may laugh at me; Jones may laugh at me; and Robinson may sneer at my misplaced hero-worship; but a word to you, dear readers, and bear witness that it is in all kindness I speak, without any secret elation and chuckling, no malice or unchristian crowing at the motes which are in Brown, Jones, and Robinson's eyes. They are, although they don't know it, bending and bowing before men of straw in all conditions of life. Alas for them when the heel touches the phosphorous, and the smoke and the flames mount up a short distance between heaven and earth, and leave Robinson, Brown, and Jones desolate, with their idols prostrate in the dust!

What a lot of social impostors go through the world with a mask! and how transparent the mask is after all! What a calf art thou, Scrawington, to suppose that because thou chooseth to wear a dirty shirt—to wash thy face only twice a-week—to be heedless of the state of thy tawny locks, except that they do not interfere with the development of thy polished brow, blue-veined temples, and huge ears—to walk the earth with pretentious strides, as if it were made for thee alone—to affect indifference of anything material—to glare wildly with thine eyes—to enter the society of thy fellow-creatures as if thou wert oblivious of their presence—to mutter scraps of Shelley, or Keats, or Byron, or Wordsworth! What a calf, I say, art thou to suppose that because of all these absurdities the world takes thee for a genius! Out upon thee for an ass! Get thy ways to a wash-house, scrub thyself well, abhor sack, and live cleanly like a gentleman. And you, my dear Puldub! you are a good fellow, but a word to you. You are among a bad set. Your means will not enable you to keep up the connection with such men as Captain Barzegreece. You are proud to be seen with him, you know, and when you are promenading up and down Regent-street, I dare say that you get credit from people who don't know you for being a fast blade. But you are not by any means a fast blade. You have not the ground to work upon to be fast. A railway train that has a hundred miles to run can put on steam to the full, and keep up a terrific speed for a time—drawing in before it reaches the station; but a railway train that has only a quarter of a mile to run could not venture to do it without being smashed to pieces at the end. You think you can play billiards; and you feel proud to display your linen sleeves, leaning over a table, with Captain Barzegreece's set. You think to stagger us poor fellows who happen to drop in; but we see through it. Don't ruin yourself for the sake of trying to put dust in our eyes about your position. We know you. You are counterfeit there; and only genuine when you are working away at your office in Gresham-street, No. 37, second north-east flat; or quietly taking your bottle of Bass and game at cribbage, in your parlour in Kentishtown, with a few of your City friends. Be advised now, like a good fellow, for your own sake.

Look at little Dott, as he struts about at the Academy exhibition; regard him as he peers at that picture through a roll of paper; look at the comments on his catalogue, and how cautiously, conspicuously he allows the pencillings to be seen by that group of young ladies. 'He's a critic,' whispers one of the darlings; at which Dott throws back his hair, and frowns savagely, making a memorandum on his catalogue, as if he were anything but satisfied with the work of art. 'Oh! see, he's writing on his catalogue; he is a critic,' another young lady whispers, at which words Dott's soul rejoices, and he passes on with all the airs which he fancies become a man of taste, a judge of pictures, and of one upon whose verdict great artists wait and tremble. Dott is wrapper-clerk in the Weekly Tadpole, and has contrived by some means or other to borrow a ticket. Some of his friends believe him to be, on the faith of his own statement, theatrical and art critic for that distinguished literary and artistic medium. He knows as much about art, and no more, as he does of the grammatical construction of the language spoken by Adam and Eve before the fall. Many mightier-looking men, however, have formed reputations on as slender materials as he, and have kept it up as slenderly. If you were to consult the pencillings on the catalogue, you would find that they were composed of scraps of bacchanalian songs, sentimental choruses, and a few of the names and addresses of subscribers to the Tadpole. Miserable little deceiver!

Ah! my dear Christian friends, who would believe that that amiable young pastor of yours was capable of perpetrating all sorts of little deceits, which of course are very paltry after all, but which are none the less deceptions. How severe he is on those little sins, and what a beautiful course of sermons he had on the subject; yet what an impostor he is himself! It is all very well for him to be so mild and delicate-looking, and soft-spoken and solemn in his manner; but you ought to see him when he gets shut up in that snug little back room of his, with his friends Hawkins the lawyer and Simmons the doctor, who were at college with him. How they chuckle quietly, over their punch and cavendish, at some of your peculiarities! What would you think of the rev. young pastor talking about you as 'wearisome old tabbies'? and how they discuss between them the prospects of his getting a good match among you? How the handsome young fellow puffs and sighs, and ruffles his fine black curly hair, and shows his fine row of pearly teeth as Hawkins and Simmons banter him about how many conquests of hearts he has made; and, good gracious! would you believe that he actually proceeds to count them on his fingers. 'Ah! my boy,' Simmons says, 'that Miss Gelatine is nuts upon you, be certain.' ('Nuts!' fancy the vulgarity.) At which the dainty young fellow smiles blandly, stretches out his elegant limbs, surveys the woollen slippers which Miss Gelatine has worked for him. 'I am certain that she is smitten,' he says, with a good-humoured laugh; 'but she's not for me. No, she won't suit—too old. Of course she has money; but I look for both—cash and good looks.' 'Can get both, my boy!' breaks in Hawkins, who is half-intoxicated. 'You play your cards well; you've the ball at your foot.' 'Of course he has,' echoes Simmons; 'I only wish I had his chance.' And the object of their flattery looks pleased, and insists upon another tumbler round, and after that another; and it is three a.m. before they part; and of course the Rev. Abinadab makes his appearance at that Dorcas Society meeting next morning, looking interestingly pale and handsome through hard study, poor fellow! This young fellow is actually getting hardened in imposture. You remember how you surprised him by inviting him to a tea-drinking in the vestry, and presenting him with a gown and a purse of thirty sovereigns. How gratefully surprised the poor fellow was to be sure, and what a beautiful reply he made on the spur of the moment, the tears actually standing in his eyes at your kindness to him; how he stammered, and made a stop a few times, to gather words eloquent enough to express his overflowing gratitude; and how surprised you all were that he should make such a beautiful extempore speech! Ah! it was very pretty; but if you had happened to know that the speech was written a week before, in the dead of the night, and was composed under the influence of strong tobacco and whisky-toddy, your admiration would not have been so transcendent. Of course he wormed out all the particulars of what you were doing for him, and of course he was justified in making a reply suitable to the magnificence of the gift; but there was no necessity for stumbling so often in the delivery, when he had rehearsed it, tears and all, about twenty times previously.

But what impostors are you and I, dear reader, ourselves? There is no use denying the fact. When we are comfortably seated in our cosy parlour, having a quiet bit of intellectual chat, in steps our friend Limpid. 'Ha! Limpid,' we say, 'how are you?' and off we jump from our chair, and grasp Limpid by the hand, and vow that we are glad to see him. No; I am not about to say that we are impostors, in so far as we feel annoyed at Limpid's intrusion, and although we pretend to welcome him heartily, wish him at Jericho. We are right glad to see Limpid, because we can amuse ourselves by drawing Limpid out with his conversation. He sits down; you call for another tumbler, and Limpid sips his toddy, and launches at once into glowing accounts of the mighty deeds which he has been about since we met him last; how he has had a private interview with Lord Palmerston, with reference to some scheme about which he (Lord Palmerston) wishes his (Limpid's) opinion; how he has received a letter from some distinguished author—an invitation to dinner from an equally distinguished actor, and to supper from a more distinguished actress; how he walked up Parliament-street, and round Trafalgar-square with Sir. R. Peel, and refused an invitation to luncheon from the O'Donoghue, on account of having an appointment with Bulwer. What a shallow impostor Limpid must be, to think for a moment that we take all this for truth; but what culpable impostors we are to pretend to Limpid that we do believe it! Much worse and more cowardly than he. But stay. What a world it would be if we were all to speak our mind about people of the Limpid genus! Oh the want of moral courage which is in the world! It would be rude to state bluntly that you did not believe Hawkins, when he states what you know to be an untruth. It would be a palpable insult to Hawkins to say—'Come now, Hawkins; stick to truth and shame the fiend.' But it never happens to strike us that in pretending to receive all this as fact, and in smiling, and 'indeed'-ing! and 'you don't say so'-ing? and 'really now'-ing! and 'upon my word'-ing! we are as much impostors as the people who are endeavouring to force the nonsense down our throat.

I am sure I could run on, for a couple of Numbers, about the small impositions which we all perpetrate every day, and which are perpetrated upon us, were it not that my space is exhausted for this week, my copy behind, and the printer's boy sitting opposite me—his cap on his knee, his eyes fixed, with a sort of pathetic indignation, on the point of my pen, and his soul wrestling with his tongue, to keep down the words of remonstrance which would fain escape from his lips.

Edited, Printed, and Published by JAMES HEDDERWICK, 13 Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, LONDON, E.C.; and 32 St Enoch-Square, GLASGOW. Sold by all Booksellers.

TO SUBSCRIBERS AND ADVERTISERS.

NEXT Week, will be published the FIRST NUMBER of the SECOND Half-Yearly VOLUME of Hedderwick's Miscellany, when the opportunity will be taken of introducing a few changes which, it is hoped, will meet with general approval. In particular, the first leaf will be devoted to Advertisements, so as to serve as a Cover for what follows, and save the repetition of the frontispiece in the Monthly Parts and Volumes. This will, of course, involve a slight reduction in the quantity of literary matter in each Number; but, independently of the fact that the Miscellany is about a third cheaper than any existing periodical of its class, it will enable the Publisher to keep up a superior quality of paper. The price of the Monthly Parts, however, being at present higher in proportion than the Weekly Numbers, will be reduced from 6d. to 5d.

A new story entitled 'Leaves from the Cardiphonia (Private Diary) of a Married Lady,' by JANE C. SIMPSON, will be commenced in next Number, and continued from week to week until completed. 'Gabriel Gray: A Glasgow Story,' re-edited by JAMES HEDDERWICK, will likewise be commenced in an early Number.

Cases for Binding the First Half-Yearly Volume are in preparation, and may be had in the course of next week at the LONDON and GLASGOW Offices, where also may be had, handsomely done up in Cloth, Vol. I. of Hedderwick's Miscellany, Price 3s. 6d.

The Publisher has only farther to thank the Public for the liberal support hitherto accorded to the Miscellany, and to urge its claims, both as regards the Weekly Numbers and Monthly Parts, on the earnest attention of Advertisers.

HEDDERWICK'S MISCELLANY.

VOL. II.—No. 1.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1863.

[PRICE 1d.]

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

INTRODUCTORY.

We have been acquainted only two years, yet I seem to have known her all my life. She is not young now. I see some tell-tale threads of gray beginning to peep out from her rich brown hair. But she is sweet and simple in heart, as she must ever have been, and I love her.

We were talking the other day of the present rage for authorship, and the multiplicity of female writers. I asked her whether she had ever attempted any literary composition? She smiled.

'Oh no! All my literary bent finds expression in my Cardiphonia.'

'And pray what is that?' I inquired.

'An old-fashioned name for a journal,' she answered. 'A true heart-utterance of the sayings and doings of my daily life. I have been carrying it on a long, long while—almost since I learned to write. Even after I was married, I held by the custom unremittingly, and by this time I must have covered as much paper as would fill two or three goodly volumes.'

Knowing the character with which I had to deal, I exclaimed, 'How interesting that autobiography must be!'

'Interesting to myself, I allow, and to a very few most nearly allied to me. But to all others "stale, flat, and unprofitable."'

I ventured to differ, without appearing to flatter her. For flattery, I felt, would be as distasteful to her to receive as it is foreign to my temper to offer.

'As to outward incidents,' she resumed, 'my history has been but moderately eventful, comparing it with the marvellous stories that some have to tell, making fiction pale and dull beside the phantasmagoria of living truth. But the inner life is ever changing its hues, and to watch and record these may be both pleasant and profitable.'

My sympathies gave ready echo to this sentiment. I suppose my face betrayed as much; for she added immediately, with all the fine ingenuousness of her nature,

'If you would care to see my Cardiphonia, I will show it you some day.'

Of course I reminded her of her promise on the first favourable opportunity.

'The whole diary,' she said, 'is far too voluminous for your perusal. Hercules had many labours; but to go over this entire chronicle would be an arduous attempt, scarcely repaid by its novelty. I will therefore give you merely some extracts, of various dates, from my married life. Take the leaves home with you; and when you have read them, tell me candidly whether I am anything better than a busy idler, making "much ado about nothing."'

My friend's MS. is before me. What induced her to register all these simple experiences? She has herself answered the question—the force of habit. But now here comes my dilemma. I have a habit too, which, though innocent in general, is sometimes far different. I always read aloud. Of course there is no harm in this when it is a printed book; but when they are private papers, it is another affair. I know the public has itching ears; and if they are told of aught that must on no account be blabbed, they never rest till they get hold of the secret. My habit, therefore, is altogether in their favour. I cannot help it. Read aloud I must and will; and, if any inquisitive sprites (I have heard say the air is full of them) are hovering about at this moment, and this private Cardiphonia gets wind after all, I can only assert my innocence, by pleading a harmless custom, and quote the national adage—Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Here commeth the Diary.

July 30th, 1834.

'Good-bye, George! You will not be later of coming home than six!'

'Not a moment later, my love! and you must not weary. Play your piano, and read one of these nice new books, and go out for a walk if the day continues fine. No doubt you will have some people calling for you; and now, one more kiss, Kate! and good-bye, my darling, till six o'clock.'

He is gone; and I am alone—more truly alone than I have ever been in my life before. Just five weeks to-morrow since I was married! We only returned last night from our wedding tour, and here I am, in my own house—I may say, literally quite alone—with nobody but the two domestics, and they are nothing to me as far as companionship goes—useful agents to come at my call, do my bidding, and then off again to their own separate quarters.

Well, I am glad of one thing, that George acceded at once to my wishes that we should live a little way out of town. And this seems a very suitable home, indeed, that he has provided for me—so light and airy, and handsomely furnished, too!—though I have scarcely had leisure yet to examine it properly—six rooms—that is the extent of my domain. The two sitting-rooms on the street floor, the bed-rooms above, servants' accommodation below. A neat, compact house, and quite as large as we are likely to want.

What a lovely day it is! Now, how far may George be on his road by this time? Nearly at his office, I daresay; for he is a quick walker. Men mostly do walk fast. Yes; he will now have got to his dingy chambers, and be sitting down among his papers and parchments, his law-deeds, and fire-proof boxes. How can he take any pleasure in such dry work? Yet, when I ask him, he says he likes it; and then he quotes some horrid Latin proverb, in which I think the word 'gustibus' sounds conspicuous. This he deems quite unanswerable, and so stops my mouth.

I have just been over all the house—all my part of it I mean—for I do not care to invade the servants' territory. They are strangers to me as yet; and, sooth to say, I am a little—afraid of them almost. That cook, Rachel (though I had an excellent character of her cooking qualities), seems to have rather a sulky temper; and Grace, the housemaid, though quiet and civil, has a look of watching and weighing every word I utter, as if making up her mind whether I shall play my part of mistress ill or well, according to her fancy.

But really our apartments (George's and mine), now that I see them properly, are charming. The dining-room is rich and warm, with its crimson hangings and massive mahogany; the drawing-room elegant and cool, with its rosewood and lively green. The bed-rooms, too, are commodious, and delightful in their garniture. Our own bed-room is just, if anything, too large. No doubt that magnificent wardrobe, with the plate-glass doors, needed space, as did also that superb bedstead and ample marble wash-stand. But the blue-room is my favourite. It commands such a lovely prospect of the distant country; and, facing the west, will catch all the glories of the sunset. I will often sit there in the little window recess, with my book or my work, and 'nurse sweet fancies till the daylight dies.'

Out into the garden. How hot the sun is! We have a bit of ground behind as well as before the house. The back part has fruit and vegetables, and a bleaching-green. The flowers are in the plot in front. Let me put these roses, lupines, and mignonette into the tall glasses on the mantelpiece, and then I shall eat the strawberries I have just brought in. I thought I saw the servants peeping at me from the kitchen window as I was gathering them, so I did not care to stay longer.

Mem.—I wish servants would mind their own business, and not be always spying. Perhaps they are waiting to know what I would have them do. Oh! by-the-by, I have never thought of dinner. I may ring and speak about that.

It is all settled. How thoughtful George is! The markets are made for two or three days, to save me trouble—everything we could need at hand, except green peas. George is so fond of peas, I have desired Rachel to go out and procure a dish wherever they are to be had. What did she mean by that aly little laugh, as I named the errand to her? Perhaps she surmised my reason for wishing this particular vegetable. N'importe. I must try to please George whether servants laugh or no.

What o'clock is it now? Only twelve. Six hours till he comes home! But I must not weary already. What did he tell me to do? I was to play the piano; and so I will, for a good hour and more. That will make the time pass. Besides, I am really a lover of music, and George likes my singing. So I must not neglect it.

Mem.—Of all natural advantages which a human being may possess, few, to my mind, appear more desirable than a musical ear—the organ of tune—a clear voice of song. To the owner it is a perpetual feast—an outlet for gladsome feelings—a sweetener of sorrowful ones—a delightful companion always. If others love it, the dower is tenfold more precious. I have seen George so pleased when I sang one of Moore's melodies, that I would not have changed places with an empress.

What a full, melodious tone this instrument has! Now to my practising in earnest.

Half-past 1 o'clock.

I have played enough. And, by-the-bye, I am still in my morning toilet! I must fly to change my dress. I shall wear my lilac silk; it is George's favourite colour. How long now till he comes home! Nearly four hours! But he bid me not weary; and I won't. Hark! The door-bell rings. Visitors are ushered in. I must go down.

4 o'clock p.m.

What a prim business is this reception of morning callers! I mean, when you are but slightly acquainted with them, and it is a visit of ceremony upon your marriage. Everybody is so careful to give me all my matronly honours; saluting me by my new name so determinedly, with—"How do you do, Mrs. Weston?" and "I hope Mr. Weston is well?" &c. &c. For the first day or two I was a little startled by my strange title; but that is over now, and I just hear it as a matter of course. I have held a levée for the last two hours! But of the whole ten persons who came, singly or in parties, those I liked best were the two Miss Thorndales and old Mrs. Aubrey. The former are nice lively girls, and my near neighbours here. The latter is George's aunt. A perfect picture of a staid, sensible, benevolent lady—one who could be a true friend—of valuable counsel in perplexity, and of soothing consolation in sorrow. Orphan as I am, I think I shall love and revere this Mrs. Aubrey; and gladly avail myself of her evident good sense and experience, should any little difficulties arise in my progress through life. But perhaps there will be none such in my case. For am I not united, heart and hand, to the man of my choice? And he is everything I could desire; and life is beautiful, and my cup is full to running over!

A quarter to 6.

The dinner-table is neatly spread, and the minor details exactly comme il faut. It is very near George's hour now, and I think I have done everything to-day that he wished me to do—except, by-the-by, the new books. I have not even looked at them. Let me see. How elegant the bindings are, and how varied the contents—history, biography, fiction, prose, and verse—something for every taste and every mood. But I really cannot read at this moment. I must sit at the open window and look out for his arrival. 'Tis pity I cannot see more of the road for these trees! He will be close at hand ere I am aware. I have a good mind to petition to have the branches lopped at once. Then I could watch his coming a great way off. He might be in sight just now, were it not for that impertinent beech spreading itself out so broadly! It will be different in winter, however; that is one comfort. How still everything is! Not a sound save the beating of my own heart. Hark! there is surely a footstep coming along behind the high wall! Will the gate be opened? Yes, it is George—let me fly out to meet him!

'Ha! Kate, my love! how fresh and happy you look! And what a delicious afternoon it is! and what a busy day I have had!'

'My dear George! I am sure you are tired. Come in and have dinner, and tell me all your news. Oh this is a charming house! And I am so glad we live here, rather than in the smoky town.'

We stand a few minutes in the porch looking out. The rose that I stuck in his button-hole in the morning is still there—faded a little, and drooping.

'You must give me a fresh flower every day,' George says, 'before my setting out.'

'And when the flowers are all gone,' I ask, 'what shall I give you then?'

George looks puzzled; so I make answer myself—'A sprig of evergreen, to be sure!'

George smiles—'We shall never want flowers where you are, Kate!' And so into the salle-à-manger we go.

8 o'clock p.m.

I have just ran upstairs for my bonnet and shawl, as George wishes a walk.

What cunning creatures servants are! George was praising the peas at dinner, saying he was glad our home produce had turned out so well. Whereupon I told him that, not knowing there were any peas in the garden, I had despatched one of the maids for some, and that she had remained out nearly three hours in her search for them. George laughed immoderately.

'Kate! Kate! these sly damsels have been too much for you; and no doubt one of them has taken a holiday with her friends in honour of your new house-keeping.' So, that was the cause of Rachel's merriment, which I noticed. It is provoking to be thus imposed on. I shall ring this moment, and speak about it. But then if I speak I must be angry, and I hate to lose temper. No; I will do nothing in it—only take a lesson for the future.

Tap, tap at my door—'Yes, George, I am coming; I am quite ready.'

'Have you been thinking any more of the peas?' quoth he.

'Of course I have been thinking of the peas, and a great many other things connected with them. I shall take good note, I assure you, of all the contents of the garden early to-morrow.'

10 p.m.

Never, never shall I forget this evening. We set out for a ramble in the adjoining woods. We ascended the hill, winding gradually upwards—the luxuriant herbage and wild flowers at our feet, the magnificent trees towering overhead. Ever and anon we caught exquisite gleams of the sunset through the foliage, when, all at once, by a sudden opening in the green enclosure, we came full upon sight of the noble river—turning, broadening, expanding, to meet the great ocean, dimly discernible afar. The sun had now gone fairly down, and the blended colours in the west—crimson, orange, blue, violet, gold, and pale green—threw their softened reflection in the waters. A lovely little island, on which stand the ruins of an ivy-mantled tower, lay cradled in the mid stream. The landscape was steeped as in a holy trance; on one side the dying glory of day—on the other the pearly radiance of the young moon! Urged by indefinable emotion, my clasp of George's arm tightened involuntarily. In true sympathy with the mood of our national bard, on a like occasion, I felt that this was indeed 'a golden moment for a poetic heart,' and my whole soul was subdued under the silent influence. For a few minutes neither spoke—my husband evidently enjoying, while at the same time sharing, my admiration.

'Kate!' he said at length, in a low voice which thrilled to my heart, 'let us rest here awhile. There is no hour of all the day so beautiful as this. Sit you down, my darling! on this mossy bank, and gaze your fill on that delicious scene.'

We seated ourselves beneath a spreading elm. And while my eyes wandered over the expanse of hill, wood, water, and sky, George drew a small volume from his pocket, and commenced to read that exquisite poem of Coleridge's—

'All thoughts, all passions, all delights,
Whatever stirs this mortal frame;
All are but ministers of Love,
And feed his sacred flame.'

Need I tell, that long ere he had finished, my tears had fairly obscured the prospect? I had taken off my bonnet, and fancied that my hair, which flowed profusely about my cheeks, would hide my emotion. But, no! For just as he reached the concluding stanza, an arm was thrown tenderly round me, and the tears were all kissed away; and I was smiling back my gratitude to the kind, manly, handsome face, dearest to me, till death, of all in this wide world!

Mem.—Few persons read well—poetry especially. Most readers attempt to make too much of the exercise, emphasising almost every word, and leaving no point for the listener quietly to interpret for himself. If the author's thoughts are powerful, and the feelings expressed are truthful and earnest, we do not need to have every sentence beat into our ear, and the close of each stanza clenched on our attention as with a hammer. But some again make too little of the work of reading, performing it in a perfunctory and slattern manner; and this, after all, is not the result of carelessness—it is the very mode in which they conceive most justice is done to the writer, by giving him no extraneous aid, but throwing the whole matter, as it were, whether for praise or blame, into his hands. George hits the golden medium exactly. As there is no exaggeration, there is also no remissness in his rendering of another's compositions. What a treat would it be were he to read to me out of Shakspeare, or Milton, or some of the grand American poets!

So the first day of married life in my own house is over! Can such felicity last? Is the full cup never spilt?

O fair young moon! now gleaming so softly through my window-pane, are any of thy bright inhabitants (if such thou hast) only one half so happy as is poor little earth-born Kate on this July eve?

THE VOICE.

It preferreth no set hours, but comes indifferently at all—morning, noon, and night—breakfast, dinner, and tea. Like royalty, I am waited on by music. Sometimes, with far-off murmurs, I hear it crooning and brooding over itself, like Wordsworth's self-commemorated stock-dove. Sometimes, with melancholy cadence, it falters and dies away. Again it rises, with reiterated power in its swelling tones, ending often in distressful shriek, as if to blame my inattention. But its gentler strains are the sweetest—when it murmurs, like a summer brook, and tells me of the days gone by, the hopes and animations for ever dead. True, the loud harsh call of business overpowers its music, as the breathings of a flute would be lost in the blast of a trumpet. When, also, my friends sit with me, and the laugh and jest pass round, its plaintive remonstrances fall on a heedless sense, and only in pauses of our conversation does its long and sorrowful wail strike through my heart a wordless rebuke of its inconstancy and mirth. Peace, perturbed spirit! Thou shalt have thy will anon. I do not deny I owe thee much. Thou hast made the sweet utterances of poets still more sweet, and hast given to the counsels of sages a wisdom more profound. Yea, from some distant past, from the land which lies beyond our birth and consciousness, methinks thou hast brought some murmurs of the winds which blow in ante-natal fields—some echoes of the songs which fall from lips untroubled and sinless.

When the day goes down in pomp, and the red clouds deepen and darken, till on the great sun-altar in the west lies but a smouldering sacrifice—when the dim eyes of the night, peering through the dusky windows of my room, see there a kindred darkness, broken only by flickering gleams of the firelight—when the shy shadows, which all day long have hidden themselves in nooks and corners, whither the envious sunbeams chase them, troop out of their hiding-places, and in quaint masques and revelry dance up and down the walls and ceiling—when the half-read sentence wavers away from my eyes—when the hand which holds the book falls unconsciously on my knee, and I find myself, after long fits of abstraction, staring at the dying embers in my grate,—then do I become conscious that the Voice has all along been accompanying my meditations, and ever blending with them its own melancholy suggestiveness and pathos. O vox et preterea nihil! But art thou, indeed, nothing more than a voice? Resolve this doubt—assume some visible, if shadowy, image of the emotional sadness and charm excited by thee in my breast. Gather from the impalpable air some ethereal outline and form expressive of thy gracious ministry. Afford some presential simulacrum of thyself to these desiring eyes; and though but dimly visible in thy remote mystic beauty, like the shadow of some fair angel seen in water, steal beside my chair, and sadly, sweetly, remember with me the story of the past.

Didst thou not visit—or was it thy sister sound?—during the long cruel winter nights, that lonely boy, the victim of their terrors? Five stories high, with but a tile betwixt him and the stars, slept that solitary child. How often, when he has been kneeling by the bedside, repeating his innocent prayers, has he cast a startled glance behind, as if dreading yet half expecting to see some felon face set in the gloomy frame of darkness at his back! Quick, quick into bed! There would he lie, with eyes upturned to the ceiling, seldom daring to turn his face sideways, lest he should discover a dreadful figure standing beside the bed, motionless but threatening! Poor victim of instinctive and engrafted terrors! I could weep even now for the shadowy agonies thou didst endure.

Nevertheless for this too imaginative little one, this infant St. John in that lonely Patmos of a bedroom, were reserved no trifling compensations—sweet in the long and bitter draughts of his loneliness—a sugared coating to his acrid nightly pill. Hours of comparative blessedness intervened—hours when there was a silver lining to the dark cloud of horror impending over him—a resolution into sweetest harmony of the frightful discord of his distorted imagination. Streaming through the narrow window-panes came the pitiful moonbeams, and his solitude was cheered. Gladly he lay and watched them, now lying across the little white coverlid, or stealing in narrow bands across the floor, or gleaming on the panels of that mysterious closet, which, whatever might be his knowledge of its contents during the day-time, punctually every night resumed its dread prerogative of concealing in its mysterious recesses every grim and ghastly apparition.

But when the moon was shining, the boy feared no longer. So long as those blessed beams stole into his room he was safe—safe from all wandering spirits, all gliding impalpable terrors, all corner-crouching eyes, all sudden terrible whispers, curdling his young blood, and making him sick and breathless with fear. No longer did mysterious frowns ever seem tampering with the door-latch; the boards forgot to creak; the rustling curtains hung down, quiet and motionless. Once in his life the child had witnessed a pantomime, the fairy scenes of which—resplendent with ethereal beings, floating in glorious tissues of golden gauze, and waving, in the varied play of coloured fires, their silvery rods—had supplied both memory and imagination with some of their choicest pleasures. Surely it was no unworthy, if childish, thought which, reproducing the old pantomime feeling, welcomed, in those slender threads of moonlight, the long white wands of angels, who, floating in an infinite azure of light, themselves unseen, did nevertheless charitably reveal to the poor comfortless babe the insignia of their power to befriending him.

Nor was this all. What though the gentle moonbeams passed away to other lands, to other little children, covering like himself in nurse-deserted beds! yet, in their place came sounds so sweet, so ravishing, that the smooth raven wing of darkness smiled, and every gruesome ghastly shape seemed banished, never to return. Yes, there came a night, the first of many blissful nights, when upwards from the street, the distant mystic street, floated a voice—a mellow, far-resounding voice—a voice that, rolling over deepening floods of human interests, rose like a flame, and, higher still and higher, went soaring onwards to the stars. Though subdued and awestruck, the child as he heard it rejoiced. He knew not whence it came; he did not care to know. To none did he ever speak of it. It was better that he should remain still deceived. Around the house of his parents, set in the thickest part of a great town, surged and clashed the multitudinous billows of a great red sea of brick and mortar. Life, plenteous and overflowing, flooded each street, and alley, and court; and, not content with this, from sullen areas and dirty cellars, dribbled over on the pavement, and dripped into the gutter. Surely, from this great sea of human lives weltering at the base of the house where he lay, he might well suppose that wonderful voice to have originated a clear distinguishable murmur in its ever restless tides. But no; such an explanation never once crossed his mind. There was nothing mortal or of the earth earthy in that voice. 'Twas a wandering utterance in space, an airy tongue that had no language except in the strange sensations of the heart. He listened, and at vast distances, sonorous still and musical, it rolled along over wide ranging heaths and windy wildernesses, where only rains, and storms, and lightnings dwelt, or across the waters of deserted seas went sounding on its long reverberative way, like the clang of the wild swans searching a path through the sunsets to some distant isle, placed far amid the melancholy main. Nor, to an imagination filled with Scriptural images from earliest years, did it omit to suggest a lonely John the Baptist cry of warning and remonstrance; or, while barely audible, dying faintly, sweetly, on the ear of night, to seem as if it had wandered earthwards from the music of angelic choirs, who, clashing their immortal harps, stood on the extremest verge of heaven, that men might catch more plainly the divine echoes of their song.

Thou wilt laugh, O reader! after this, to be told that this very voice—so musical, so melancholy—was nothing more than the admirable vocal organ of a poor man who, night after night, during the winter months, went about the streets of my native town, crying Oysters! But has thy childhood never idealised and made wonderful, spiritual, ethereal, some after-discovered commonplace? Heaven help thee if it never did!

Bear with me if I attempt to describe to thee another scene in the boy-drama of my life. With this voice at my elbow, babbling of old times, how can I help mauling of the man myself? and why shouldn't I? What subject am I better acquainted with? Reader, I do thee a service in being egotistical. There beats no pulse in my breast to which one in thine does not throb in the fellowship of sympathy. Ah! if I could only touch that heart! Alas! so thick a crust of worldliness gathers about the best of us! Yet, I beseech thee check me not in these juvenile reminiscences. Thine hast thyself been a child. Listen!

If, some quarter of a century ago, thou hadst been walking in one of the quietest parts of Warwickshire, thou mightest have seen a gallant gentleman riding swiftly along. Clapsed firmly on the saddle before him was that young boy whose acquaintance thou hast just now made. The road along which they were travelling was long and devious—pathing a dim way amid the silences of furrowed fields, patches of purple heath, sandy hollows, and by the side of gloomy pools into which the bushy thickets wove dark overhanging shadows. Hark! The child is shouting, as he feels the onward rush of the rapid gallop, which throws his long and sunny locks backward on the wind, and brings a flush into his cheeks and a fire into his eye which it will take some time for the narrow streets round his home entirely to quench. He fears not now that country solitude. Protected by the strong arm of love, he is tempted to look with disdain on those great wastes—those vast outlying silences of nature. A fico for the gloomy terrors which lie behind the clumps of gorse, or thread the silent paths of yon dark wood! They cannot harm him now. But yet he would not let the black-bearded gentleman should go away. What if he did? How would the dismal fears revenge his boastful scorn! Let us leave them altogether. 'Faster, cousin Tom—faster! Make him gallop faster!'

Ah me! even as he says the word, the horse is suddenly reined up. The rider has forgotten something, and is obliged to go back. The little boy must wait, sitting quietly on the grass till his friend return. Do not be afraid. He won't be gone long—a quarter of an hour or so. The child, unable to express the misery begotten of that dreadful loneliness, or too proud to confess his fears, allows his friend to depart without a remonstrance, and is left alone.

For the first few minutes it was not so bad. B-wildered by the novelty of his position, he experienced none of its terrors. But in a while, the silence—so deep, so awful—began to throb with a thousand pulsations on his acute nerves. The dry grass cracked and creaked, the loosened particles of sand rolled noisily into the great cart-ruts, the booming of the bees sounded like distant thunder, a wind arose and smote his cheeks in audible sighs, the once motionless clouds began to stir; and life, visionary, fantastic—the life of those fearful shapes with which his imagination had peopled the country solitude—woke up in all its terrors. What if some dreadful being had all along been creeping towards him through the shaggy furze? Or, thought as dreadful, what if those strange dark faces, those wild elfish locks, those long sinewy hands, ever connected in his mind with long red cloaks and weather-beaten straw bonnets, should suddenly come before him now there was no possibility of escape? How often had he been threatened that, if he were naughty, he should be given to the gipsies! Fearful, mysterious people, whose home was in the waste places of the earth—deserted heaths, and solitary gorse-covered ways like this. Oh horror! if he were to be seized upon now! His face darkened, those long sweet mother-locks to be cut away, that pretty dress to be exchanged for sordid miserable rags! Which way did his cousin go? Cruel, hard-hearted cousin Tom! Suppose he were never to come back, or night fall! But that last consideration was too dreadful. Impelled by terror, half-sobbing, half-screaming, the too imaginative child, barely six years old, ran back along the road.

He was stopped by a voice.

'Halloo! young shaver, where are you agoing?'

The speaker had been lying by the wayside, but so hidden by the heather that the child had no consciousness of his presence till he was addressed in the above terms. Perhaps the man was a tramp—perhaps he was a tinker—perhaps he was nothing more than a Brummagem button—perhaps a cadger, a mere picker up of unconsidered trifles; or, something worse, a slip of the gallows tree—a knight of the order of the hempen collar! The boy never knew. He only remembers that there was a man who spoke to him, and that the conversation ran somewhat after this fashion:—

'Where are you agoing to, I say?'

'Please, sir, I am going back to my aunt's.'

'Oh! And what have you been and done to that nice-looking gentleman as was a holding of you on his horse? I was looking at both of you, and I was afraid there was something wrong.'

'Oh no, sir; I assure you there was not. He's left something behind, and has gone back to fetch it.'

'And why didn't you stop where he put you down, instead of coming it along the road in that unchristian manner? I'm quite ashamed of you.'

'Please, sir, I grew frightened.'

'Oh! that's it, is it?' he replied. 'And now, you oudacious young sinner! I know all about it. You've been a doing what you didn't oughtn't for, and he's been a punishing you for it; and quite right too. I know a little boy as his father gives him a licking when he's been naughty, and he takes off his coat for it too. I've a great mind —'

'Oh sir; please, sir; don't,' screamed the boy.

'Well, then, I'll forgive you this once,' replied the scamp; 'but that coat I must have.'

The rest is a mist. Looking in the glass of memory, I see a vision of a young child running alone down the lane, minus coat, waistcoat, and the contents in the pockets of those garments—a handsome pearl-handled knife and bran new half-crown, of which he had been the possessor only some two hours. In this plight he was encountered by his astonished cousin. He supposes that they returned to the avuncular residence; but as at this part of a boy's reminiscences appears rather unexpectedly the face of his mother, the fact being that both his parents were then many miles distant from him, it is evident that the stream of his childish emotions about this time had returned into its usual placid channel.

What! art thou murmuring still, old Voice? Of what wilt thou now discourse? Shall it be of the first bird which the boy-sportman shot—alas! in ignorance of its being a robin? or of that foolish fish—that evidently life-wearied suicidal perch—that gorged the bait and felt the hook, and cowardly, unresistingly submitted to be dragged out of the water, when but a little effort towards self-preservation would have torn the feeble rod from those baby hands? Good heavens! how I gloated over that fish! Cook it! eat it! The idea was profanation. For that day at least I was never tired of looking at it; and, if family tradition is to be believed, took it up with me to bed!

Oh! Thou refusest to pursue those fond, old, silly memories? Good friend, they are very pleasant to me. But what wilt thou be busy about now? Didst thou not whisper, then, the name of that fine old mulberry tree, under whose shadows her childish lips and mine exchanged eternal vows, and ratified the declaration with a most sweet, cousinly kiss? Nay; an thou wilt babble of the innocence of love, like the old age—if thou preferrest to go sounding amid the things of many memories, till thou hittest upon that sadly sweet, that earthly-ethereal harmony in the music of our lives, that as often ends in the last sigh of a funeral dirge as it swells into the joyous strains of a wedding-march; why, have with thee, then! Only, do thou silence thy hoarser breathings. With faint, scarce audible murmurs, whisper her name—rehearse the glories of her shining hair—her eyes, within whose depths gleamed light ancestral, eastern—the fair, calm brows, bound with the beauty of two worlds—the splendour and the grace of Vashti and of Ermengarde. For in her veins, thou knowest, flowed the descended currents of that blood which, springing out of the hot soil of Syria, had murmured under the cedars of Lebanon, thrilled at the trumpet-blast of Sinai, and throbbed with religious exultation in the Temple-courts of white Jerusalem. And though, in the lapse of ages, some snows of the colder north had melted within the current, yet thereby lost the stream no whit of its intensity and fervour. 'Twas only made deeper and more equable. Less of a race, but more of mankind—as beautiful, but with the beauty which is universal as the light of morning or the loveliness of flowers—that fair heiress of orient and of occidental charm passed along the ways of men—a clear and legible type of their higher humanity. The young, beholding her, wished they might ever more behold—the aged, as they blessed her, in return were comforted. Parents desired that their daughters might grow up like her—brothers their sisters. And, with all this, she was yet more loved than praised—more sought for than admired. So perfect a union, so entire a simplicity, existed between and in her outward loveliness and inward graces, that her goodness would have been more largely commended if she had possessed less of beauty, and her beauty have attracted greater admiration if it had not so mysteriously and spiritually been allied to her virtues.

Peace! peace! thou troublesome remembrancer! Why wilt thou persist in turning back these leaves of life, wet with unavailing tears, and intercrossed by lines of hopeless sorrow, repenting harshness, and prayer-regardless death? Sure thou art pitiless, or thou knowest not what sad misery burns in my heart, as with eyes, grief-blinded, I look upon the rising visions. For Love, that held above our path his arching crown of life and hope—Love, after whose happy feet sweet flowers of gladness crowded along the ways of Time—Love, that from the strings of our united hearts fetched day by day some heavenlier harmony, so exalted and ethereal, but of such abounding temporal bliss withal, 'twas as if it had suspended in its mystic chords the scent of the earthly rose and the throb of the distant star—Love, that from his own intensity quickens every passion and emotion to their utmost power of suffering, illuminating with added brilliancy the ray which gladdens, but, alas! also sharpening the lightnings which destroy—Love, flushed in the dawn of his most glorious promise along the horizon of our lives—but darkened, shall I say died? Nay, not died, but floating over the boundary of Time, was met and absorbed into the aurora of its own eternal day. 'Tis gone—whither I hope to follow it.

For, O melancholy Voice! thou knowest well the last hour came—the hour of sinking life and sinking heart. There, in that darkened room, dim sacrificial scene of youth and love and loveliness, she lay and pressed this hand with last and dying clasp. Wilt thou recall her words? They were meant to be consoling. Alas! I remember them; but what of their consolation? So terrible a grief of heart! Comfort sinks before it, rebuked and silent.

'God of my fathers! it was Thy will that I should die; and if that will was bitter once, it is Thy goodness hath made it so no more. Weep not, dear friend. Thou seest death hath well ended the sorrow of that parting which race and creed would perhaps have enforced. And yet, how little now appear the differences that sundered us! Perhaps 'tis but a feeble woman's thought;—yet, O my Father! think if in the love which still endured those sharp and constant pains, that mutual confidence which during these long years of separation beat like an electric pulse within our hearts; think if in that love so earnest, so unfaltering, there be not some hints of a faith that is universal and a creed which shall embrace all the true and loving! Forgive me this. Sorrow and suffering have made me think of many things. O my love, my love, be comforted. Whither I go thou too shalt come. My home shall be thy home. Thy God shall be mine.'

It is well, too melancholy Voice! that even now thou fallest into murmurings indistinct and valedictory. I could not bear to have thee lengthen out that strain; yet ere thou sinkest asleep in the bosom of all-hushing silence, tell my bewildered readers that thou art nothing more but the sorrowful wind for ever crooning above the lintel of my study door. Tell them this, also, not to trust over-much in the substance of these shadows, and yet not altogether disbelieve that they are the reflections of some truth.

A CONTROVERSY IN SONNETS, ON THE PROJECTION, IN 1844, OF THE KENDAL AND WINANDERMERE RAILWAY.

I.—BY WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

Is there no nook of English ground secure
From rash assault? Schemes of retirement sown
In youth, and, 'mid the busy world, kept pure
As when their earliest flowers of hope were blown,
Must perish. How can they this blight endure?
And must he, too, his old delights disown
Who scorns a false utilitarian lure
'Mid his paternal fields at random thrown?
Baffle the threat, bright scene! from Orrest Head,
Given to the traveller's rapturous glance!
Plead for thy peace, thou beautiful romance
Of nature! And, if human hearts be dead,
Speak, passing winds! Ye torrents, with your strong
And constant voice, protest against the wrong!

II.—BY THOMAS SMIBERT.

O THOUGHT unworthy of the poet sage!
Can the most lovely of terrestrial scenes
Be marr'd, when human science intervenes
To place the marvels of a recent age
By God's old grandeur? What can so engage
And raise the mind as to behold the proud,
Long timeless elements of nature bow'd
To turn to mortal good their govern'd rage?
How grand to note the use of slightest things!
Such formless vapours as the mountain lake
Gives to the warming sun, serve, as man wills,
To bear him mighty loads on thought-swift wings;
At his call only, earth's full glories wake,
And echo else were silent on the hills.

III.—BY JAMES HEDDERWICK.

Nor all unworthy of the tuneful race
The wish to save, from 'rash assault,' the scene
To which affection clings, as doth the green
That clasps it yearly in a fresh embrace.
When the poor field-mouse fled before the plough,
Or the meek daisy crush'd and ruin'd lay,
The hand of culture held its onward way:
Yet were poetic tear-drops wept as now.
Art must pursue the triumphs of its might.
Yet ever, as a sweet, sequester'd nook
Is torn like some fair leaf from nature's book,
Blame not, nor think it either weak or strange,
That, though the patriot's heart may own the right,
The poet's feelings should bewail the change.

POETICAL CONCEPTION.

No. II.

THERE is a vast interval, in the range of imagination, between a Milton or a Shakspeare and the least mentally gifted of mankind. But can it be said that even in the lowest type of humanity imagination is quite wanting; that there is a total blank of poetical conception; that there exists nothing greater than the mere animal enjoyment of physical wants fully supplied? We perceive beautiful gradations, but no entire vacuities, in animate or inanimate nature; and the same grand and yet simple rule pervades the region of mind.

How different, how varied, how numerous are poetical feelings in different orders of mind, and even in the same mind at different times and under varying circumstances!

It is one thing to behold the ocean in a summer's day, like an infant asleep—smooth as glass—its ripple scarcely breathing a gentle murmur on the shore; but it is quite another thing to see this same ocean, with its mountain waves lashed into foam, and thundering among the rocks of our sea-girt isle,—and perhaps some noble vessel, with its hapless crew, exposed to all its awful fury, toiling for very life, or perhaps engulfed in its angry bosom. Or again, on some lovely day, we take a ramble among the hills, when all is calm and peaceful, bathed in sunshine, except where the deep glens, with their silvery threads marking the leaping course of the little rivulets, are clad in shadow, and contrast so finely with the sunlight around. But the heavens grow dark, and blacker still the Highland loch, and for a time there is an awful stillness; then the lightnings flash from peak to peak and down into the dark dreary shadow at the foot of yonder mighty precipice below; the thunders utter their voice; the rain pours down like a flood, and the war of torrents is heard all around; and what just before was a scene of surpassing beauty, becomes, by the mere change of circumstances, one of profound awe, terror, and sublimity.

Or again, we see noble rivers like the Forth, or Tay, or Clyde, carrying on their bosom from the sea, into which they pour themselves, the wealth of nations. But trace these to their sources, high up among the everlasting hills. What are they? Often not seen even as mere streamlets, but known by a rich green waving streak, giving variety and somewhat of animation to the vast expanse of rock or heath all around. Instead of busy haunts of men which stud either side of the noble Frith—the clang of the hammer and the ring of the anvil—all is solitariness and peace, perhaps dreariness, except the whistle of the plover, or the wild cry of the curlew. Is it not certain that these circumstances do call forth very different poetical feelings, scarcely akin to each other, except that they arise naturally in the same mind on different occasions?

Then, again, as we are fearfully and wonderfully made, what varieties of feeling arise, according to the prevailing disposition of our minds, and, it may be, even the state of our bodies, and what we may call for the time the overmastering passion! The dominant feeling will subdue everything to its own overwhelming emotions or excessive excitement. Unlike the plant whose roots search out the very soil that suits its vitality, the mind that is depressed naturally turns everything, even what to all others is pleasing, into gall and wormwood. It seeks for and associates with images of sadness and solitude, if not terror; and having discovered these, it finds in them a sad species of enjoyment.

There must thus be, for the time, a unity of feeling and of sympathy between the external object and the mind which perceives it. The soul, suffering under some sad bereavement, seeks solitude, where it may indulge the joy of grief. The house and the songs of mirth would only add to the darkness of its desolation. The wise king felt the dreariness of all his former pleasures when he cried, in the anguish of his spirit, 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!'

It is beautifully narrated by the Evangelist John, that the Jews—when they saw Mary after the death of her beloved brother Lazarus, and that she rose up hastily and went out—followed her, saying, 'She goeth to the grave to weep there.' Ay, and what imaginations, what almost overpowering sympathies, would naturally arise in the heart of Mary, as she thus, for a time, was supposed to have as it were satiated her grief!

The law of association of ideas—of sympathy—is one of the great laws of poetical conception. We do not see things, persons, circumstances just as they are in themselves—for this would be no better than the mere use of our sense of sight—but as we may possibly conceive them. Hence the circumstances of darkness, incomprehensiveness, vagueness, uncertainty, terror—a sense of loneliness, and solitariness, and wild and rude scenery are all favourable to, if they do not actually raise, the feeling of the sublime.

It has been beautifully and truly remarked by a great thinker, John Foster, that 'There are many to whom local associations present images which they frequently wish they could forget—images which haunt the places where crime has been perpetrated, and which seem to approach and glare on the criminal as he hastily passes by, especially in the evening or night. No local associations are so impressive as those of guilt. It may be observed that as each has his own separate remembrance, giving to some places an aspect of significance which he alone can perceive, there must be an unknown number of pleasing, or mournful, or dreadful associations, spread over the scenes inhabited or visited by men. We pass, without any awakened consciousness, by the bridge, or the wood, or the house, where there is something to excite the most painful or frightful ideas in the next man that comes that way, or possibly the companion that walks along with us. How much there is in a thousand spots of the earth that is invisible and silent to all but the conscious individual!'

'I hear a voice you cannot hear;
I see a hand you cannot see.'

Solitariness and loneliness, if not absolutely necessary to the feeling of the sublime, do certainly enhance it. It is not in a crowd that we can fully appreciate the grand and sublime in nature. And if our companion does not or cannot sympathise with us, we would be much better without his company. Byron says truly,

'There is a pleasure in the pathless woods;
There is a rapture in the lonely shore;
There is society where none intrudes
By the deep sea, and music in its roar.'

One of the writers in the Mirror, Mr. Craig, thus humorously writes,—'Our road lay through a glen,' and he describes some scenery as presenting views truly sublime. 'Mr. Fleetwood (he says) felt an unusual elevation of spirit. His soul rose within him, and was swelled with that silent awe, so well suited to his contemplative mind. Our silence had now continued for about a quarter of an hour, and a universal stillness prevailed around us, interrupted only by the tread of our horses, which, returning at stated intervals, assisted by the echoes of the mountains, formed of a hollow sound which increased the solemnity of the scene. Mr. Johnston, tiring of the silence, and not having the least comprehension of its cause, all at once and without warning, lifted his voice and began the song, "Push about the jorum." Mr. Fleetwood's soul was then wound up to its utmost height. At the sound of Mr. Johnston's voice, he stared and viewed him with a look of horror, mixed with contempt. During the rest of our journey, I could hardly prevail on my friend to be civil to him, and though he is in every respect a worthy and good-natured man, and although Mr. Fleetwood and he have often met since, the former has never been able to look upon him without disgust.'

This quotation is perhaps, and indeed we suppose is altogether, a work of fiction, but still it is quite true to nature.

Professor Upham, in describing 'Travelling in the Desert,' says,—'Marching over wide and arid plains, and with hills and mountains of rock and sand in sight, we go on from day to day. The eye rests upon forms and upon life, but forms are the background of beauty, and imagination sometimes fills up the picture. I walked out at midnight. The moon was in all its brightness; the sky, without a cloud to suggest the idea of form or limitation, seemed vast as eternity, and being studded all over with stars, it was bright with the brightness of God. The camels, stretched out at length upon the ground, were long dark shadows in the moonlight. The men slept at their side. There was no sound. But the soul heard the silence. I have stood at the foot of Niagara. I have listened to the deep moaning sound of the vast forests of my native land. I have been on the ocean, where each wave had its voice, and that voice was thunder; but these great voices entered less deeply into the ear of the spirit than the mighty silence of the desert at midnight. At such a time the soul opens its capacity; it magnifies and expands itself in the greatness of its dilated conceptions, and takes hold of eternity, and in the voice which is sent forth—a voice uttered in brightness without a shadow, in vastness without limit, in harmony without variation—it hears the proclamation, so dear to every soul, of the unutterable tranquillity of God.'

Much, if not all, of the sublime in feeling arises from the vastness, greatness, and apparent infinity of the works of nature. I visit the sea-shore. There is nothing in view, far as the eye can reach, but a mighty world of waters; and though reason cannot conceive of it, imagination can transport me into a space endless, boundless, illimitable. Or, I go to some of our grand and most elevated mountain-tops, where an apparently tiny world is scattered out before me, without living thing or work of man's hands in the whole range of my vision. I am alone. I feel overpowered by the grandeur I survey; the feelings for the time are too big for utterance. If a living creature or a human habitation appear in sight, they, rather than otherwise, distract the feeling; and I consider that any work of man, in the midst of such grandeur, appears like a specimen from some toy-shop. It is ill-assorted as it is placed there, and breaks the grandeur of feeling which otherwise the scene is calculated to produce.

Yet it is, notwithstanding, a true thing—true in poetical feeling—for it calls into operation some of the most beautiful and poetical aspirations and sympathies of the human soul, when, amid the grandeur of an ocean scene, whether in calm or storm, we can descry the full set sail, in a calm day, or the ship in an angry sea, without sail or rudder, tossed amid the tempest; or when we can discover some little peaceful nook, in some wild romantic glen, where man has fixed his abode, and the feelings of domestic affection well forth in all their tenderness. To some views of poetical feeling, external scenery appears like a body without a spirit, unless there be added to all the decorations of nature some signs of human life. An agreeable female writer has said—'Even the most captivating scenery is to me almost like a blank sheet of paper, till it be written over with the actions of feeling, the history or poetry of other days; and, as the loftiest mountain gains a new interest if even the most insignificant living animal be seen on the surface, and the wide ocean itself is overlooked while our most eager gaze rests on a distant vessel buffeting the breeze; so, also, the permanent abodes of men, where families have successively lived and died, and where the joys and sorrows of life have been or still are felt, afford subjects for reflection and thought not to be exhausted. Neither music, poetry, nor scenery can awaken permanent interest, without in some degree touching our sympathies. I seldom read books of Eastern travel, because they seem all filled with gold embroidery, dark eyes' fringe, and chocolate. I am wearied, too, of savage countries, with tattooing, red feathers, hunting, and idolatry; but, as Madame de Staël says, the homes of Great Britain are the best homes upon the earth; and there, among hills and glens of surpassing beauty, we may imagine scenes of domestic felicity such as can only be known in a civilised and Christian country. Here every mountain and stream speaks of days long past, and reminds us of the vanished generations whose history, distinctly recorded in the memory, is so nearly connected with our own.'

So much for poetical conception, as derived from or suggested by scenes from the great world of externals'

nature. But there is, if we may so say, another and perhaps even a greater world, of the existence of which every one is conscious. The sweetest, the most beautiful, and at the same time the grandest and most sublime poetical conceptions are to be gathered, not from external nature, but from the apparently little though really great world of the human soul. We may apply to this subject, in the widest sense possible, what the ancient poet said—'Homo sum humani nil a me alienum puto.' 'I am a man. I think nothing human is foreign to me.' Like a well-tuned instrument, soul answers to soul in all its circumstances of feeling. It is there that the depths of poetical conception are to be best found—in the warmth of associations which cluster around the domestic relations; or the almost overpowering imaginations which link us with the wild grandeur of a great soul in the highest exhibitions of human passion; with all the vast space of feeling that lies between these extremes. What are our mountains, our lakes, our rivers, even our seas, with all their amplitude, but spaces of creation which can be fully measured! But who has ever sounded, or will be able to sound, the depths of human feeling? As Burns says—

'Who made the heart—'tis He alone
Decidedly can try us.
He knows each chord—its various tone;
Each spring—its various bias.'

The poetical conception or feeling cannot be satisfied with any mere exhibition of external nature. It must, and always does, associate itself to some extent with life—the living and the life-giving Creator; or the life and soul of an intelligent emotional humanity derived from Him. It links itself to our common joys or sorrows, our fears or hopes, our aspirations, or, it may be, even our despair; and, unless it do this, it is not, and it will undoubtedly fail, to be recognised as true poetical feeling.

The poet may in words—like the painter in form and colour—picture forth some grand and pleasing view of external nature. Neither is bound to give an exact copy; and a mere copy, as I have already said, would scarcely be relished, for, though perfect, it would only be an imitation, which might indeed show the skill of the artist, but nothing more. The painter of genius may gather for his landscape a thousand beauties which, though existing separately, never have been seen actually combined in nature. It is in such combinations that he will manifest the richness, and fulness, and freshness of his imagination.

But this is not the highest branch of poetry. The poetical conception—at least if strongly excited—raises inanimate to the dignity of animate nature, and gives to mere matter human feeling, sentiment, language. Perhaps the most striking example of this is to be found in the Psalms, as, for instance, 'The waters saw thee, O God!—the waters saw thee. They were afraid. The depths also were troubled;' or in this passage, 'Let the floods clap their hands; let the hills be joyful together;' or in that magnificent Psalm cxlviii. where all nature is called on to utter praise.

How does Milton, in few words, set forth the beauties of Eve, and the nuptials of our first parents, as described by Adam—

'Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.'

To the nuptial bower

I led her, blushing like the morn. All heaven
And happy constellations on that hour
Shed their selected influence. The earth
Gave sign of gratulation, and each hill;
Joyous the birds; fresh gales and gentle airs
Whisper'd it to the woods, and from their wings
Flung rose, flung odours from their splay shrubs,
Disporting till the amorous bird of night
Sung spousal, and bid haste the evening star
On his hill top to light the bridal lamp.'

But the mind is not always, and indeed is rarely, in such a state of poetical excitement as to give birth to such exalted conceptions. There is, however, a world of imagination in the human soul, between the extreme of highly passionate excitement and the deep lonely wailings of sorrow, or the pathos of the gentle, loving, tender heart. The human soul is an instrument of almost illimitable compass, and will find its corresponding chords of poetical conception in every heart, if only there is the other human soul to touch the lyre. If the poetical feeling is not thus originated, it must fail to be interesting. Listen to the highest strains of poetical conception in deep distress—'Deep calleth unto deep; at the noise of thy water-spouts, all thy waves and thy billows pass over me;' or this almost unutterable longing of a human soul for its real happiness—'Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I fly far away and be at rest.'

While the passion of terror gives energy to the sublime, the passion of love gives a really new expression to beauty. The feeling of the sublime is unquestionably most deeply entertained or enjoyed in solitudes, if not loneliness, and may be so overpowering for the time as to command silence; but it is different with the passion of love, which is evidently of a social, gladness, enlivening character, and will not be repressed; but, seeking to meet with congenial sympathies, makes its object as alluring and inviting as possible, by setting forth in all its real or ideal beauties.

It is indeed beautiful to see how love, and indeed every human passion, can not only wake up an echo in the human heart, but how it can and does assimilate and subdue external objects to its own all-engrossing power, and make external nature speak in its own language. Innumerable examples might be given, but perhaps one instance from Burns may be sufficient. In his address 'To Mary in heaven,' when he last met her by the winding Ayre,

'To live one day of parting love,' hear how surrounding objects are made full of his own deep-welling passion of love:—

'Ay, gurgling, kiss'd his pebbled shore,
O'erhung with wild woods, thickening green:
The fragrant birch and hawthorn hoar
Twined am'rous round the raptur'd scene:

*The flowers sprang wanton to be press'd,
The birds sang love on every spray,
Till too, too soon, the glowing west
Proclaimed the speed of winged day.'*

This is an exhibition of poetical conception which, if fully understood, is worth a dozen of lectures on poetry. The passion of love, indeed, of soul knitting and mingling itself with soul, is perhaps more widely diffused over the human family than any other of our moral sentiments. As Southey says, most beautifully,

*'They sin who tell us love can die;
With life all other passions fly,
All others are but vanity;
In heaven ambition cannot dwell,
Nor avarice in the vaults of hell.
Earthly these passions, of the earth,
They perish when they have their birth,
But love is indestructible;
Its holy flame for ever burneth—
From heaven it came, to heaven returneth:
Too oft on earth a troubled guest,
At times deceived, at times oppress'd.
It here is tried and purified,
Then hath in heaven its perfect rest;
It soweth here in toil and care,
But the harvest time of love is there.'*

Love-songs are so innumerable that it would be quite a hopeless task to quote, in any reasonable compass, not the trash, but the real and substantive elements of poetical conception which they contain. Burns's love songs must ever remain splendid illustrations of this feeling, although every lover has his own picture of the object of his adoration, which he sees from his own stand-point. Yet, if he is to conceive of it at all worthily or poetically, it must not be arranged in the tinsel of dress, or show, or mere outside ornament, but in its enduring beauties. It is the depths of his own inmost heart that the lover must represent, for only these will be appreciated by others as quite natural feeling. Artistical decorations, however complete, or unnatural contrasts, will not fill up the universal poetical conception.

DESPONDENT.

*HEAVY days of pain—
Weary nights of waking—
Can a wounded heart
Be so long of breaking?*

*Friendless now, I muse
On the past days only;
Dark the future lowers—
Sad, forsaken, lonely.*

*Heavy days of pain—
Weary nights of waking—
Hush, O troubled heart!
Why so long in breaking?*

*Take thy griefs to Him
Who heareth not the scorners;
But whose kind voice said,
'Blessed are the mourners!'*

*He will not despise
This dark hour of sorrow;
Sad has closed the night,
Faint may dawn the morrow.*

*Life's dark dream may end
In a glorious waking;
Wounded hearts may find
Only rest in breaking.*

MARGUERITE.

MARY GORDON'S FIRST DAYS AT SCHOOL.

CHAPTER X.

WHEN the children came into the drawing-room to tea, Mary took her accustomed place next to her papa; but instead of chatting with her usual animation, she sat looking at him, as if afraid to speak.

'Mary,' said Mr. Gordon, 'you have scarcely spoken a word to me to-day! How did you get on at school?'

Simple as the question was, she was startled by it, but answered truly—'Not so well as yesterday, papa.'

'And will you tell me the reason of that?'

She hesitated. 'I am not sure,' she said. 'I think I did not do my lessons so well. At least, my music lesson was very bad; and Miss Taylor turned me away from the piano.'

'Have you been as happy as you were yesterday?'

'Oh no, papa.'

'To be good is to be happy,' said Mr. Gordon.

'Have you been as good as you were yesterday?'

'No, papa,' she said, in a low voice, turning away her face from him, and gazing into her tea-cup.

'Papa,' said Willie, 'when I was reading my lesson to Miss Elliot, some tears fell upon my book; and when I looked up, and asked her why she was crying, she said her mamma was very ill.'

'And why did none of you come and tell me?' said Mrs. Gordon.

'I was coming, mamma,' said Mary; 'but Miss Elliot would not allow me.'

'I shall go to see her to-morrow,' said Mrs. Gordon.

I forgot to tell you,' she said to her husband, 'that young Mr. Stanfield called here to-day, wishing to see you; and is to call again this evening. He is one of Mrs. Elliot's boarders; and she told me, some days ago, that his friends wish him to go abroad; and he is anxious to obtain a situation. She asked me to mention it to you, thinking you might possibly know of some one that would suit him; and I remembered that you had spoken of a vacancy in the establishment at Bombay.'

'That is filled up,' said Mr. Gordon. 'But perhaps I may learn of some other.'

When tea was removed, Willie brought to the table a Chinese puzzle, in which he was interested, and commenced putting it up; and Mary, glad to escape any more questions, stole round the table and joined him. The various pieces were nearly all put together, only one or two being wanting to complete the whole, and Willie was trying them in all possible ways; but when Mary lifted one and placed it correctly, Willie pushed her rudely away from the table. 'I don't want you to help me, Mary,' he said. 'I want to finish my own puzzle myself. You may go and dress your doll, that you are so fond of.'

'Willie,' said Mrs. Gordon, 'you were very rude to Mary just now; and if you push her from you in that way again, I shall take your puzzle from you. You may go, Mary, and open that box, where you will find some of the doll's clothes you were sewing yesterday evening.'

'No, thank you, mamma; I would rather not sew my doll's clothes to-night.'

'And why not, Mary?'

'I cannot tell you, mamma; but I would much rather do anything else, if you please.'

'Then come to me, Mary,' said Mr. Gordon; 'and Willie, come you too; I want to tell you a story I heard this morning.'

He seated himself in an easy chair, with the children on either side, placing Mary so that the light shone full on her face.

'One morning,' he said, 'some weeks ago, when my friend Dr. Irving was walking along one of the crowded streets of the town, he saw a ragged boy, of about ten years old, come out of a baker's shop, carrying a loaf of bread, and after looking around and behind him, with evident marks of fear, he darted down the street; and presently the baker came out and ran after him, calling out, "Catch the thief—catch the thief!" And when the boy looked back, and saw his pursuer, he threw the loaf on the pavement, and ran off at full speed; but the baker ran much quicker, and on reaching him, seized him by the collar of his ragged jacket, and shook him with violence.'

"You young thief!" he exclaimed, "how dare you come into my shop and steal?—but I shall get you sent to the police-office without delay;" and he signed to two policemen, who were standing at the corner of the street, who came immediately, and held the boy between them.

'Dr. Irving crossed the street to inquire into the circumstances, and a large crowd gathered quickly around them. The boy was crying bitterly, but seemed to take hope instinctively from the doctor's benevolent aspect.'

"Oh, sir," he said, addressing him, "I did steal a loaf, for our family are all starving, and mother sent me out this morning to beg; and I have been at ever so many doors, and got nothing; and when I came past the baker's shop the smell of the bread tempted me, for I was very hungry; but if he would forgive me this once—I would never do it again."

"Not till the next time," said one of the policemen. "I think I know your face, my lad; is your name O'Neil?"

"Yes, sir," said his prisoner.

"Then come along with us, my boy, and at our office you will meet with your respectable father, who was carried into it last night dead drunk."

"Jim," said the older policeman to his comrade, while he looked respectfully at Dr. Irving, "the boy is the more to be pitied; he is a young offender, and perhaps this gentleman could help to get him off."

'They moved along to the police-office, and Dr. Irving was so much interested, that he accompanied them.'

On the way, he learned from the boy that his mother and four children younger than himself were reduced to beggary and starvation, caused, he said, by his father having one of his drunken fits, and being off work. On reaching the office, Dr. Irving asked to see O'Neil, and found him in the gloomy stupor that follows excessive drinking. And with an earnest desire to save a sinking fellow-creature, he tried to arouse him, by every means in his power—by reasoning and expostulation, and, more than all, by sympathising with him; and showing him that, by cruelly forsaking his family, he had driven his poor boy into such straits that he was tempted to steal a loaf of bread to save them from starving. The man's heart was moved and softened; and he said, with tears, that he would gladly return to his work if his employers would take him back.

'By applying to the proper authorities, Dr. Irving not only succeeded in getting O'Neil and his son liberated, but through using his influence with the man's employers, he got them to make trial of him again, and reinstate him in his daily occupation, at which he has, as yet, continued to work steadily. But the good doctor's benevolence did not stop here, for he has got the boy placed at a ragged school, where he is getting on well, and the teachers say he is a clever fellow; and we all hope he will grow up to be a good man.'

'Tell me, Willie, whether you would be a clever fellow or a good man?'

'A clever fellow,' said Willie.

'But, Willie,' said Mr. Gordon laughing, 'do you think you could not be both?'

'I don't know, papa.'

'But you must try, Willie, my boy; and now, children, tell me what you think of the poor boy being tempted to steal a loaf of bread. I am sure you must feel sorry for him.'

'Yes,' said Willie, 'I am very sorry for him being so hungry.'

'But that is not what he was so much to be pitied for,' said Mr. Gordon. 'Tell me, Mary, what you think it was?'

'For being a thief,' said Mary, with such a deep sigh, that it sounded like a low moan.

'You are quite right, my dear; and there is something that he was more to be pitied for still—that his parents had never taught him to distinguish between good and evil, or to know that it was a sin to steal; for the poor boy cannot even read his Bible. But in pitying him, we must not overlook the fact that when he stole the loaf, he committed a great sin, for he broke God's holy commandment—"Thou shalt not steal." The baker did quite right in pursuing him, and delivering him up to justice, for he had tried to cheat him by robbing him of his lawful property—the very means by which the man was seeking to obtain an honest living. It is the boy's ignorance only that we should pity. And I should like both of you to think how differently you are placed from this poor boy, in being taught to know and fear God, and keep his commandments; and that, as you are provided with all needful food and clothing, you are not under the same temptation to put forth your hand and steal; and that if you were to do so, your sin would be so much the greater than his. But oh! my dear children, if I thought that any of you, in order to gratify some selfish whim, would secretly take anything that is not your own, or, in one word, would steal, I don't know what I should do," said Mr. Gordon, clasping his hands, and sinking his voice to a tone of deep sadness. "I think it would break my heart!"

Willie, who was greatly excited by the unusual tone of his father's voice, started from his seat, and stood before him, with one arm stretched out—

"Papa," he said, "don't be afraid of me breaking your heart; for I shall never, never steal anything from anybody."

"I hope you will never be tempted to do so, my dear boy."

Poor Mary would have given the world to use the same words that Willie had spoken; but alas! she dared not; for had she not already done what her papa said "would break his heart?" The thought was agony, and she bent down her face on the arm of his chair.

"What is the matter, Mary?"

"Oh papa!" she said, in a low earnest voice, "I would be very, very sorry to break your heart."

He raised her head from the chair, and, on looking into her face, was moved to pity at the misery it expressed.

"I do believe, my dear, you would be sorry to break my heart. I think it would break your own, Mary."

"Yea, papa," she said, trying to smile, but her eyes overflowing with tears—"it would break my heart too!"

CHAPTER XL

Thomas now came in with a card for Mr. Gordon, and said there was a gentleman waiting in the library who wished to see him.

"Mr. Francis Stanfield," said Mr. Gordon, looking at the card. "I must go and speak with him, Anne; but I am sorry I do not know of any situation abroad that would suit him."

"But perhaps you may hear of one," said Mrs. Gordon.

He left the drawing-room, and she followed him out, and shut the door.

"William," said she, "it is time for the children to be put to bed; but I cannot allow Mary to go without telling her that we have found out all she did this morning. I am sure it would be a relief to the child, before she goes to sleep, to confess it, and even to be punished, rather than endure her present state of misery."

"That very misery is her punishment, Anne, and a far greater one than either you or I could inflict; but her sin was a great one, and it is right that she suffers the penalty. I believe, however, that she will very soon make a full confession, for I saw symptoms of it in her face just now before I left her."

"She will never confess," said Mrs. Gordon impatiently, "unless she is made to do so; and I wonder how you can expect that a child like Mary can act as if she had the experience of years; but since you think her so near confession, it will be all the easier for me to make her speak out before she goes to bed, and I shall just go and do so at once."

Mrs. Gordon was about to open the drawing-room door, but was prevented by her husband.

"You will oblige me greatly," he said, "by leaving this matter to me. Send the children to bed, and if Mary is not asleep by the time Mr. Stanfield goes away, I shall go and speak with her; and if she falls asleep before then, which I think is not very likely, I shall go to-morrow morning and hear Willie and her read. I wish her to have the full benefit of her convictions, Anne; and we must let patience have her perfect work."

He left her and went into the library, and Mrs. Gordon returned to the drawing-room.

Mary was seated on a low stool by the fire, and she asked her if she was sleepy.

"No, mamma."

"But I am very sleepy," said Willie, "and I want to go to bed."

She rang the bell for Rachel, and told her she might put the children to bed.

Rachel looked earnestly at Mary, who was sitting gazing into the fire, and then turned a look of anxious inquiry to her mistress.

Mrs. Gordon shook her head. "No, no, Rachel," she said in a low voice; "there has been nothing said yet, and you must make no allusion whatever."

While Willie was put to bed, it was Mary's custom partly to undress herself; but this evening, when Rachel returned to the nursery, she found her sitting exactly as she had left her; and while she was undressing her, she stood passively in her hands without speaking a word. After her night-dress was put on, Rachel stood as usual waiting until she would kneel to pray, but Mary would not kneel.

"Lift me into bed, Rachel; I am not going to pray."

"I am very sorry to hear you say that, Miss Mary; you do not look happy to-night, and when people are unhappy they ought to pray."

"But I cannot, Rachel; put me into bed, please."

She did as she desired; and drawing the curtain so as to shade her from the light, sat down to read, thinking it unlikely she would sleep for some time.

Contrary to her expectations, however, Mary soon fell asleep, for she was worn out by the unusual strain that had been on her mind throughout the day; and as Willie had been fast asleep for some time, Rachel lowered the light, and went down stairs to the kitchen. On passing the drawing-room, she opened the door, and told Mrs. Gordon that Miss Mary had fallen asleep; and while proceeding down stairs she heard the gentlemen come out of the library, and Thomas showing out Mr. Stanfield.

"Is Mary asleep yet?" said Mr. Gordon, as he came into the drawing-room.

"Yes, Mary has fallen asleep; and I must say I think you have gone far wrong in the way you have treated her; but I am glad I am not responsible,' said Mrs. Gordon.

'Well, my dear, I am quite willing to take all the responsibility upon myself, and I feel convinced this matter will come all right. What a handsome young man Mr. Stanfield is!'

'Is he?' said Mrs. Gordon. 'I have never seen him.'

'From what you told me about his anxiety to obtain a situation, I expected to see a poor fellow with a shabby coat and a very anxious face, and I felt sorry to tell him that the opening you had spoken of was filled up; but to my infinite relief, he came to tell me that he has been appointed to an excellent situation, and is to sail for India next week; and he looks and speaks with as much independence as if he were going abroad merely for his amusement.'

'Did he speak of Mrs. Elliot?'

'I really think his principal motive in calling here was to speak of Mrs. Elliot and her daughter, and to bespeak our sympathies for them. He thinks Mrs. Elliot very ill, and fears she is dying; and is so sorry for Miss Elliot being left alone in the world, that I suspect there must be a stronger feeling than sympathy for her.'

'You are quite right,' said Mrs. Gordon; 'there is a far stronger feeling; and I am sorry to say it is a mutual one.'

'How have you learned this?'

'Mrs. Elliot has confided in me; and it was at her request I engaged Miss Elliot to come here in the afternoon, for at that time Mr. Stanfield is always in the house.'

'What is Mrs. Elliot's objection to him?'

'His friends are very proud people; and last time he visited home his father found out his attachment, and has forbidden him to make any engagement with Miss Elliot; he has even written to Mrs. Elliot, requesting her to warn her daughter against such an idea; and he is sending his son abroad, I suppose, that he may forget her.'

'Poor girl!' said Mr. Gordon, 'I can now understand the silent tears falling on Willie's book! Is there not some risk of her running off with him?'

'No; not the smallest; at least while her poor mother lives to prevent it. My acquaintance with Mrs. Elliot was during our boarding-school days; and I do not think I ever told you that she was the daughter of Mr. Anstruther, a wealthy country gentleman, and that she was disowned by her whole family and friends for her marriage with Mr. Elliot, then a young student, and tutor to her brothers, with whom she eloped from her father's house. I have never seen her since, until we came to town this winter, and I happened to hear of her, and went to see her; but dearly has she paid for her early imprudence, for her husband died soon after her marriage, and her life since has been one continued struggle with adversity. She tried at first to establish a boarding-school for young ladies, hoping thus to maintain something of her former position, and get her daughter educated; but the report of her runaway marriage, and her friends disowning her, went so much against her in this attempt, that she was quite unsuccessful, and gave it up in despair. Some of Mr. Elliot's friends, however, were kind to her; and she was glad, through their recommendation, to receive young gentlemen as boarders, who came to town for the university. She has succeeded so far in this way as to maintain herself and daughter; but it has been with great difficulty, for her education is too much that of a fine lady to fit her for such an occupation, and now that she is so ill I do not know how they are to get on. And what is to become of poor Jane Elliot without her mother, who is evidently dying?'

'We must be kind to her, Anne, my dear,' said Mr. Gordon; 'and if she is thus left alone in the world before we go to Lochlee for the summer, she must go with us, and be governess to Mary and Willie.'

(To be concluded in our next.)

BEYOND THE TOWN.

THEN she comes, a little girl,
Laughing, bright, and free—
Forehead fair as sea-born pearl,
Eyes that dance in glee;
Curis that tremble forth in light,
And, twinkling, fall adown
Her little neck, so stately white,
In ringlets golden-brown.

Sweet Helen! my Helen! little Helen Lee!
I would that all the flowers of spring were beautiful as thee!

Then her voice so sweetly rings
Through the shaded wood,
Where the crested linnet sings
O'er her chirping brood:
All the leaves in joy repeat
What she has begun,
Till again her tripping feet
Bear her to the sun.

Sweet Helen! my Helen! little Helen Lee!
I would that all the flowers of spring were beautiful as thee!

What! a woman—fully grown,
Beautiful, and fair!—
Azure eyes and ringlets brown,
Laughing curls of hair;
Pearly teeth, that, when they smile,
Two bright dimples fill:
Woman grown, yet free from guile—
So I think she's still

Sweet Helen! my Helen! little Helen Lee!
Ne'er a flower of all the flowers is beautiful as thee!

Cottage leafy-clad and small,
Whitens in the sun;
Roses up the garden wall
Clusteringly run:
There she dwells, beyond the town,
A very little way;
But just so far, when sun goes down,
That I can with her stay.

Sweet Helen! my Helen! here's a kiss to thee.
The prettiest wife in all the world is little Helen Lee!

THE MISSIONARY ABROAD.*

FIRST NOTICE.

MR. WADDELL'S name will be familiar to numbers in this country, as that of a distinguished and laborious worker in what might be called the black department in the Christian vineyard. Nine-and-twenty years, the prime of his life, has he spent among the negroes of Jamaica and Old Calabar, sowing the seed and superintending the growth of our Divine religion. From 1829 to 1858 has Mr. Waddell preached and exhorted, not in the language of Shakspeare, Jeremy Taylor, or Professor Caird; but in Negro-English—a dialect which, as a branch of study, could only be supposed to delight the souls of the missionaries, and that great master of philological anatomy, Professor Max Muller of Oxford. Not only, however, was Mr. Waddell compelled to express the divinest conceptions in this undivined of dialects, but he was also under the perpetual necessity of making these conceptions plain—not to understandings sharpened and prepared for their reception, but to minds darkened and overlaid with the jungle of old mythologies, from which the unboly ghosts of demon-gods were ever ready to start and play havoc with the little flocks of the missionaries—pretty much in the same manner as a famishing tiger, with eyes like comets, will now and then burst from a silent forest, frightening some Indian village out of its wits, and leaving perhaps the breast of some poor Hindoo mother vacant of its sucking babe, whose last cry of distress is heard as the mighty beast disappears like lightning in an opposite cloud of thicket.

Compared with the life of a missionary, the life of a minister at home is, in every essential respect, a perfect luxury. Home-keeping preachers move in a charmed circle of friends, whose converse is an endless feast of profit and delight; the missionary abroad has seldom more than his wife, if haply even her, on whom to depend for the luxuries of good English, British feeling, and British thought; clergymen at home have all the conveniences of good living at their doors; missionaries in foreign lands are compelled generally to live in the midst of a civilization which is known in this country by the name of barbarism; where science and art are as young as they were in the garden of Eden, and where the merest suspicion of modern refinement has only crossed the brains of the natives at the sight of some European despiser of the serpent and the tiger; and, more than all, preachers at home preach in complete safety, under the well-patched canvas of law; while planters in many foreign vineyards, standing face to face with nature, have not only to endure the vertical fury of the sun-torrent, but have frequently also to submit to the wild decisions of those original tribunals, whose attorneys are Malice, whose judges are Revenge, and whose executioners are Murder.

Yet, in spite of these little drawbacks, it is quite wonderful how eagerly the Christian volunteers step where their comrades stood—even although their last stand is a cruel field of death. To such men, there seems an absolute fascination in the crown of martyrdom; or, rather, the duty of sowing the Divine intelligence in the wildest wildernesses towers so supremely above mortal calculations—that dangers, difficulties, oppressions, nay, death itself, appear to be the very wages of such heroism. These men rightly think that, by pouring out their blood on the desert, they will make it blossom with the roses of Christ. Certainly, nothing is so fertilising as the blood of martyrs—a shrewd and beautiful process of compensation, which Nature has rendered, and will for ever render, invisible to oppressors. This phenomenon, in which Nature seems to snap her fingers at the apparent master of the situation, is everywhere the same—at home as well as abroad.

Still more remarkably does the heroic persistency of the missionaries appear, when we reflect on the apparent disproportion between the labour and the harvest. To take two instances, and study them through arithmetical and pecuniary spectacles,—How many men and how much money have been spent on Indian and African missions? and, What has been gained by the double expenditure? The human element in India and Africa may be regarded as two dark barbaric floods—the outer edges of which the crystal waters of Christianity have as yet only been able to touch, as with a pencil of silver, leaving the vast body of the two oceans as black and wild as they were twenty hundred years ago. Not only so, but even the silver edges are perpetually in danger of being diminished by the stormy overflowing of the barbaric element. So terribly fierce and irresistible has this re-expansion and restoration of chaos sometimes been, that on certain points of coast, Christianity has been entirely swept away, or so utterly deteriorated, as to exist only like rotting weeds, after the subsidence of a destructive inundation. But even the knowledge of such dismally mysterious workings does not appal the missionaries. Like true knights of the Cross, they return to the attack. Again and again do they appear in the old fields of conquest; again and again is the thin but glorious white line seen silvering up against the stormy and impetuous billows which lap the barbaric isles; and it is easy to believe with the deep heart, and see with the far-looking eye, of Faith, the certain coming of the time when the white line will clasp the darkness like a crescent moon; and, like a moon, increase until it overlap and overorb the world like the Eye of God.

This grandest of all consummations will not, however, be achieved by merely religious means. Even in civilised countries, a thousand secular agencies must combine to publish, and render universally effective, the smallest moral truth. Indeed, religious truth, like light, can only act and be propagated through material media; although in itself it is spiritual, and has spiritual as well as material ends to accomplish. Christianity flourishes best in new countries, when its plantation is coincident with the plantation of new colonies. Certain idolatries can only be wholly extinguished by the powerful bodily presence, so to speak, of the superseding religion; or when it manifests itself in its triple panoply of secular, moral, and spiritual power—with majesty of law, purity of life and custom, and reasonableness and divinity of doctrine. When the missionary goes into the wilderness, alone and unsupported, his success is fluctuating, precarious, and too often ephemeral. This is so well known to modern evangelists, that they wisely follow out the spirit of Christianity, by pressing every legitimate force into its service. In reality, all the powers of Nature work together for the discovery and propagation of truth; and, whenever it is possible, the aid which can be rendered by art, science, commerce, diplomacy, and even by military demonstrations, is not only not refused, but rather eagerly accepted, by those who would increase and protect the growing kingdom of their Divine Master. Christianity will henceforth more and more spread and expand with commerce, and commerce with Christianity; and the consular agencies which Britain has planted, and will yet plant, along the coasts of the savage seas, and in the interior niches of savage countries, will form centres from which the white religion may radiate into dark spaces, and to which it may return in seasons of wrathful passion, until the danger has disappeared.

In Mr. Waddell's book, while there is much to excite gratitude, there is also something to waken feelings of depression. Both in Jamaica and Old Calabar, the keen zeal and unflinching energy expended on missionary enterprise are conspicuous and superabundant; while the results do not always satisfy our expectation, either as to quantity or quality. Mr. Waddell's work in Jamaica extended from 1829 to 1846, and in Africa from 1847 to 1858—both periods being crammed with hard, earnest labour, and much curious incident. In 1829, the population of Jamaica consisted of the planters and their slaves, of whom there were, at that date, 322,000 in the island. The number had been much larger; but, after the abolition of the slave-trade in 1817, the slaves decreased at the rate of several thousands annually, in spite of the eager efforts of the planters to facilitate their natural reproduction. Nowhere is slavery an institution to be admired; but the manner in which it was maintained in Jamaica rendered it hateful and absolutely abhorrent. If multiplied insurrection can afford any clue to the system under which it occurs, the murderous character of slavery in Jamaica may be inferred from the fact, that, from 1678 till 1832, there were twenty-seven outbursts, which were repressed with such ferocious cruelty and vengeance, as well entitled the island to be designated the Pandemonium of the West Indies.

Liko others of the beautiful West Indian group, Jamaica is frequently subjected to the terrific influences of earthquakes and hurricanes. The most destructive since the island came under British rule occurred in 1692, when Port-Royal, the wicked and wealthy city of the buccancers, containing three thousand inhabitants, was swallowed by a merciless rent in the mountain, as if they had been mere pills or sparrows. Over the ruins of the old town the sea rolled and ships floated. When the city was rebuilt, near its old site, it was destroyed by lightning striking a powder magazine. Several years afterwards, when partially restored, it again took fire, and burned for three days; and again, in 1744, one of those hurricanes which blow solid wind, came rushing across the island, and smashed the hard masonry of the place as if it had been a town of toys. This was the finishing blow to Port-Royal. It disappeared, and Kingston took its place as the great commercial capital of the West Indies. The wildest hurricane which ever swept over Jamaica was accompanied by an earthquake, and occurred in 1780. Savanna-la-Mer and nearly all the plantations in the west end of the island were destroyed. So large and irresistible had been the surge of the sea, that ships which had been at anchor in the bay were afterwards found far up the town, stranded among the ruins of the houses.

Notwithstanding these little meteorological irregularities, Jamaica is a magnificent island—in fact, a sort of West Indian paradise, the loveliness of whose surrounding seas is only equalled by the radiant skies they mirror. The verdure is eternal, clothing the peaks of the loftiest mountains as luxuriantly as it enriches the lower ridges and the undulating valleys. Beauty and grandeur are its prevailing features.

'Through its whole length of 160 miles,' says Mr. Waddell, 'run lofty and precipitous mountains, from the Blue Peaks in the east, 8,000 feet high, to the Dolphin Head in the west, 3,400, clothed with eternal verdure and noble forests to the summits. In a succession of lesser ridges, they decline on the north side to the sea; while, on the south, great spurs, striking off, enclose vast plains, twenty or thirty miles each way. Everywhere the mountains are broken into deep valleys, abrupt, rugged, and filled with impenetrable woods; and everywhere the cultivated districts present the most lovely landscape of hill and dale and mingled woodland and plantation scenery. Innumerable groves of cocoa-nut trees, their giant leaves waving and glancing in the sun and wind, the bright skies, brilliant atmosphere, glowing colours, deep contrasts of light and shade, and universal irrepressible luxuriance, present a perpetual feast of tropical splendour to the imagination of the beholder.'

The first missionaries in Jamaica were the Moravians, who inaugurated their work among the slaves in 1754; they were followed by the Wesleyan Methodists at the close of last century; in 1800, the Scottish Missionary Society commenced operations, which were suspended, and renewed in 1825; and in 1814 the English Baptist Mission began to teach their version of Christianity with equal fervour. It should be remembered, also, that the Church of England occupied the field from an early period, although it was only in 1825 that Jamaica was constituted an Episcopal See. By these various agencies, some good had been done; the good work was going on; and although the religious condition and progress of the island could not afford unmingled satisfaction to a Scottish missionary, coming to the country inspired by a high and untested Christian ideal, still, reasonable hopes were entertained for the future. So Mr. Waddell went earnestly to work among the negroes of Cinnamon Hill and Cornwall, both sugar estates—at the latter of which he took up his abode, having received a free residence from the proprietor. The situation of these estates was naturally very attractive, being on the sea-side, in a scene beautifully fertile, and within little more than ten miles of the nearest towns, Montego Bay and Falmouth. It was also an excellent centre for missionary operations. About twenty estates, with some five thousand negroes, lay around it within a radius of five miles.

We do not intend to follow Mr. Waddell with particular closeness in his religious operations. All we profess to do, in the meantime, is to cull a few characteristic anecdotes and incidents, which will in some manner act as mirrors of the manners and customs of black and white Jamaicans during Mr. Waddell's residence in the island.

One of the first social discoveries made by Mr. and Mrs. Waddell, at Cornwall, was the notable fact that the negroes of the place were thoroughly acquainted with the eminent virtues of oatmeal. How they discovered the secret is simple enough. A Scotch overseer on Cinnamon Hill had a quantity of it sent from home one year instead of rice, for the use of the sick and the children. The women, in expectation, surrounded the store on Monday morning, with cans and calabashes; but when the new dainty was served out to them, they were horribly disappointed, examined it with their fingers, turned up their noses, and finally hid it down on the ground. 'How, now?' exclaimed the overseer, as he locked up the store, and observed the black eyes of the women made blacker with sullen thunder. 'Why don't you take your things and go away?' 'Busha, whara dis ting be?' said one of them. 'Why, that is the oatmeal I told you about.' 'And whara o' meal be?' she asked with contempt. 'Busha, dese 'im good for your dogs, give 'em; 'im no good for we picaninny.' 'No good for your picaninny!' he shouted. 'Look at me.' He was as tall and stout as a Highland chief. 'Look at me! Did ever one of your breed raise a picaninny like me? Now, that is what my mother fed me on, and what made a man of me. So leave it if you like; but you'll get nothing else till you find the good of it.'

It is needless to say that they were not long in making the grand discovery,—when the social sovereignty of oatmeal was established in Jamaica. So well did the negroes remember the virtues of the Caledonian delicacy, that when they found that the new minister had a quantity of it among his stores, it became in such demand for sick picaninnies that Mrs. Waddell, in a very short time, had a toom meal-pock.

Among the proprietors and overseers of the various estates, within the orbit of Mr. Waddell's labours, the missionary encountered such specimens of human nature as do not impress us with a high idea of the condition of society in Jamaica, at that period of its history. Indeed, Mr. Waddell's experiences in the island only furnish another proof of what has been long regarded as almost universally true—that the grand and ultimate effect of slavery is to produce a radical deterioration in the character of the slave-owners. When human beings are owned, bought, and sold, as mere cattle are, they come soon to be looked at and valued as mere cattle; if as cattle, then, tacitly, as soulless animals; but if blacks are probably soulless, then whites are perhaps soulless also—Who knows, or who cares?—and so the wild and withering welter of practical atheism crawls insidiously over the religious intuitions, beliefs, and moral actions of men, until right and wrong, and purity and its black opposite, are things, not of the individual soul and personal privacies of life, but of the law-courts, to be judged of according to the holy statute-books of the lawyers. This transitional declension is generally so gradual, as to be fatally imperceptible to its victims. So gross is their blindness to the actual phenomena of their lives, that they regard the revelation of it as a vile calumny, to be repelled with curses, or lived down with the hard and unresponding indifference of mud-embedded stone.

One of the gentlemen to whom Mr. Waddell presented his credentials as a regular Christian minister, so as to obtain leave to preach among the negroes of a certain district, was chief-magistrate of St. James, and a member of the island Legislature. His reply to the missionary was favourable, but singular. His people (about three hundred of all ages), he said, had a desire for religious instruction; and he thought it better for him to provide them with what was safe and approved, than that the poor creatures should seek it for themselves, and probably err in the search. 'But I must in candour own,' he added, 'that I am not influenced by religious principles myself in this matter, but simply by self-interest. I have a bad set of people. They steal enormously, run away, get drunk, fight, and neglect their duty in every way; while the women take no care of their children; and there is no increase on the property. Now, if you can bring them under the fear of a God, or a judgment to come, or something of that sort, you may be doing both them and me a service.' Some knowledge of the character of the Hon. Richard Barret (such was the gentleman's name) havinreached Mr. Waddell, this singular and rather cool declaration did not come upon him unexpectedly. It is almost comical to hear Mr. Barret immediately exclaiming—'By-the-by, what would you think to begin by christening them? It is long since the clergyman of the parish was here for the purpose, and I have got a good many people since. It might have a good effect.' Of course, Mr. Waddell declined this mode of procedure; declaring that, in the case of negroes, baptism should not precede, but follow, instruction.

Mr. Waddell was successful, also, in obtaining leave to visit the estates of Rose Hall and Crawl, which were both in Chancery, and at that time under the management of a gentleman who had gone from Scotland in the lowest capacity, but who had risen almost to the highest position in the Colony. He was 'Custos of Trelawny,' Major-General of Militia, and had the management of so many properties, that he was known by the splendid nickname of 'Attorney-General.' A reputed relative of the attorney overseer of the Crawl was one of the meanest, most despicable, and troublesome fellows whom the missionary ever encountered. He was, in every possible way, a mighty oppressor of the negroes; in fact, one of those who render insurrection not only possible, but a perfect luxury.

Although public marriage was permitted among the negroes in Jamaica, it seems to have been greatly neglected about the time of Mr. Waddell's visit; and had it not been for the missionaries, the rite must have entirely disappeared. Curiously enough, the legislature, which provided for the baptism of the negroes, did not only do nothing for their marriage, but actually 'recognised the state of concubinage as equivalent to marriage, by requiring that a body of new catechists it gave the bishop must either be married men, or "living with respectable coloured females."' The terms husband and wife were almost unknown among the slaves, brother and sister serving every purpose in their temporary connection; for, naturally enough, these ties were dissolved as well as formed with the strangest and most unthinking facility. When the minds of the negroes became somewhat enlightened by the teaching of the missionaries, the consequences in reference to marriage were altogether beneficial. At first, however, those negroes who possessed several 'sisters' were rather puzzled as to the principle of selection by which they should be guided in adopting their single and only wife, from the number of claimants which might present themselves. Generally, says Mr. Waddell, the one in possession was retained, especially if she had children. There were some who wished to make an entirely new choice, to the exclusion of every old claim; but as this was not precisely Christian in its aim and effect, it was strictly forbidden; and those who had thrown their wives and children overboard for new flames, were compelled to put away the young childless 'sister,' re-adopt the mother of his children, and marry her in a Christian manner. Those who did not adhere to the new law of marriage, were excluded from church privileges. To head men, who had several expectants of the matrimonial honours, the missionaries very wisely said—'Some have stronger claims than others, the first more than the last; the old "sister" more than her younger rival; the mother of your children more than her that has never borne.' Although there was some difficulty in the settlement of such cases, good sense and right feeling generally triumphed in the end. Indeed, to be a married man came ultimately to be an honourable distinction and a certificate of character. One of Mr. Waddell's anecdotes, relating to a head negro's method of choosing a wife, may form an apt pendant to this article. John had provided for the lady of his love the gown, hat, shoes, gloves, and whatever else was necessary to deck out the dusky belle for the happy occasion—such being the custom. But as in the matter of stability of affection, there is really little to choose between black and white, John's smoky flame jilted him for the refuge and ecstasy of another bosom. We are afraid, however, that John's own affection was no deeper than his black skin; for his chief and immediate concern was how to recover the bridal finery with which he had dowered his Jamaica jilter. The old rogue recovered his property, and was greatly comforted. Some time after, when Mr. Waddell inquired at the black lover what he was doing about getting married, his eyes flashed like the Twin-stars under his cloudy brow, as he replied—'Minister, me just look out one now to fit the gown!' Had John lived at the present day, and in this country, his reply would probably have been that he was looking out for one to fit, not the gown, but the crinoline. For it does actually seem as if crinoline had, by some mistake, been manufactured before woman was created, so vast is the disproportion between her own sweet slenderness and the uncircumnavigability of the outer circles in which she is fixed like a pole in a pyramid.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS. No. XIII.

ALEXANDER MACDONALD, universally known in the Highlands as 'Alasdair Mac Mhaighstir Alasdair,' that is 'Alexander, the son of Mr. Alexander,' is a very highly esteemed Gaelic poet. His father was the Episcopalian minister of Ardnamurchan, though he seems to have resided in Moirdart principally. It is in compliment, I suppose, to his clerical capacity, that he goes by the name of 'Maighstir Alasdair.' Alister, son of Mr. Alister, was born in the beginning of the last century. He was well educated, attended college for some time, and became, it is said, a good classical scholar. His studies, however, were interrupted by his marriage before he was qualified for a profession. He then lived in Ardnamurchan, teaching and farming, an elder of the Established Church, and a Presbyterian, till the year 1745; when he not only left his all to join Prince Charles, but even changed his religion and became a Catholic. The fiery and warlike songs with which he roused his countrymen, and animated their devotion for the unfortunate Stuart cause, prove how true a Jacobite and how good a poet the son of Mr. Alister was. He held a commission in the Highland army, but what his exploits as a soldier were I have not heard. To judge from his songs, he ought to have been a particularly good one. It is singular to think that both he and Duncan Ban MacIntyre were engaged in the battle of Falkirk, and on opposite sides too. Had they met, it is not to be supposed that MacDonald would have found a very fervid foeman in the younger bard. In his first song composed on this same battle of the 'Speckled Kirk,' Duncan Ban celebrates the defeat of his own party with great glee. The MacDonalds, who charged breast to breast against a troop of Galldom, seemed to have excited his special admiration. He has no soft words for the rout of the royalists, and himself among them. 'As if a dog,' he says, 'should follow sheep, and they running over the face of a glen. Just so did they take scattering on the side on which were we.'

After the battle of Culloden, MacDonald lived in hidings, and was exposed to considerable hardships for some time. The rest of his life appears to have passed in peace and quiet, but not much seems to be known concerning it. He died, it is said, at a good old age in Eilean Fionain, Loch-Shiel, Ardnarmurchan. The year is not mentioned. His first work was 'A Gaelic and English Vocabulary,' published in 1741. His poems were published in Edinburgh in 1751. As a poet, he displays a great command of the Gaelic language, and a vast deal of talent and fiery energy. His great fault seems to be that he composed too often, just to show his own power; at least, we do not so much feel the beating of his own heart in all his compositions as in Duncan Ban's; they do not appear to have sprung from so fresh and sweet a fountain of pure human love. This is perhaps the reason that MacDonald is less known and less popular on the whole than MacIntyre, though there are not wanting admirers of him who place him at the head of all the modern Gaelic bards. There is certainly no poem in Gaelic, or indeed in English, or in any language, which, in point of singular originality of conception, arrangement, and expression, excels that which now follows. Round a most unpromising theme it gathers an immense amount of graphic painting, and contains, in its short compass, a measure, pressed down but running over, of breathing, powerful, emphatic human life. The whole poem displays abundant proof of this. It is almost superfluous to point out the descriptions of the boatmen with their different offices, which have the verisimilitude of photographs, with the freedom of a great master; or that of the storm in the end, which even in its exaggeration has something Shaksperian about it. I must give the poem, as it is so long, without any further preface. The name it goes by is 'The Birlinn.'

THE BLESSING OF A SHIP;

Along with an incitement for the sea, that was made for the crew of the Birlinn, of the Lord of Clan-Ranald.

May God bless the ship of Clan-Ranald!

This first day it floats on the brine;
Himself, and the strong men who guide it,
Whose virtues surpassingly shine!

* In Bishop Carrwell's Gaelic Prayer-Book, published in the year 1667—the first book ever printed in the Gaelic language—there occurs a prayer somewhat similar to this one, to be used by mariners on going to sea. It, too, is a prayer to the Trinity; very well arranged and expressed, and full of devotional feeling. It could hardly have been used or appreciated by a wild and savage people, such as we are sometimes, I think, very incorrectly, taught to regard the Highlanders of three hundred years ago.

May the Holy Trinity temper
The stormy breath of the sky,
And sweep smooth the rough swelling waters,
That our port we may draw nigh!

Father! Creator of ocean,
And each wind that blows from the sky!
Bless our slender bark and our heroes;
Make all ill things pass them by.
O Son! bless thou our anchor,
Our tackling, helm, and sail;
Everything on our mast that is hanging,
Till our haven at last we hail.

Bless our yards and all our mast-hoops;
Our masts and ropes, one and all;
Our halyards and stays keep unbroken—
Let no ill through them befall!

May the Holy Spirit be at the helm,
And guide to the proper place!
He knows each port beneath the sun.
We cast us on his grace.

THE BLESSING OF THE ARMS.

May God bless all our weapons—
Our blades of Spain, sharp and gray,
And our massy mails which are able
The sharpest edge to stay;
Our blades of steel and our corslets,
And our curled and shapely targets—
Bless them all, without exception—
The arms our shoulder-belts carry;

Our bows of yew, well made and handsome,
Bent oft-times in the breast of battle;
Our birchen shafts not prone to splinter,
Cased in the sullen badger's hide!
Bless our poniards and our pistols,
And our tartans fine and folded,
And every implement of warfare
In MacDonald's bark this hour!

Be you, our crew! not soft or simple;
Hardly brave deeds encounter;
While four boards shall hold together,
Or one plank to plank be tied—
While beneath your feet she walters,
Or one knob remains above,
Oh! defy each sight of terror
Your strong hearts to melt or move!

If only you battle it well,
And the sea does not feel that you quail,
She will humble herself in the knowledge,
And her pride to your might will she vail.
Battle thy spouse on the land;
Let her not see thee get weak,
And the chance is she yields in the strife,
Nor such contests will daringly seek.

Even so is the mighty deep,
When fierce frenzy her bosom fills;
She will yield to you, nevertheless,
As the King of the Universe wills.

THE INCITEMENT TO ROW TO A SAILING-PLACE.

To bring the barge so dark and stately,
Whence we'd sail away,
Thrust out those tough clubs and unyielding,
Polished bare and gray;
Those oars well made, smooth waisted,
Firm and light;
That row steadily and boldly
With smooth palm foam white;

That send the sea in splashing showers
Aloft unto the sky,
And light the brain-fire bright and flashing,
As when coal sparks fly,

With purpose-like blows of the great heavy weapons,
With a powerful sweep,
Wound the huge swell on the ocean meadow
Heavy and deep.

With your sharp narrow blades white and slender,
Strike its big breast;
Hirsute and brawny, and rippled and hilly,
With the rough crest.

Oh stretch and bend and draw, young gallants!
Forward going;
Let your fists' broad grasp be whitening
In your rowing!

Ye lusty, heavy, stalwart youngsters!
Stretch your full length;
With shoulders knotty, nerry, hairy.
Hard with strength;
See you raise and drop together
With one motion;
Your gray and beamy shafts well ordered,
Sweeping ocean.

Thou stout surge-wrangler on the foremost car!
Shout loudly 'Sua's orr!'

The song that wakes the arm's best vigour
In each cruiser,
And hurls the Birlinn through the cold glens,
Loudly snoring;
Or climbing, cleaving the swollen surges,
Hoarsely roaring.

Then fling behind each awful mountain,
Those stout shoulders;
With 'Hugan' on the ocean walling, shouting,
And 'Heig' on the oar holders,

A thud, a dash of spray, from mighty billows,
On each timber,
And creaking oars, and blisters on each finger
Strong and limber,

The heroes, stout, and stiff, and manly,
Must work untiring,

Till each board of her is quivering—
Oak, and post, and iron;

While blades are splashing in the water,
And knobs creak on the side,
With such huge might she gives a lurch,
Bold in her pride.

Strong arms can drive the slender bark
Through the wide deep.

Right in the face of the blue billows,
Rising, bristling heap.

These are the mettled, manly crew,
Our oars to sweep;

To make the gray-back'd oddies whirl
Where each stroke press'd;

And flag not, tire not, drowse not, bend not,
In the storm's rough breast.

Then after the six men and ten are seated at the oars, in order to row under the wind to the sailing-place, let stout Calum, son of Ranaid of the Ocean, shout the Iorram† for her, and be seated on the foremost oar, and let this be it:—

Now, since you are rank'd in order,
And seem all to be well chosen,
Give her one good plunge, like champions,
Brave and boldly.

Give her one good plunge, &c.

* 'Sua's orr,' 'Up with her'—i.e., 'The Birlinn.' 'Sua's' is a common cry of encouragement. Whoever has seen the Highlanders dance their reels must have witnessed the inspiring effect of 'Sua's e.'

† Iorram (pronounced 'Yirram') is a boat-song or an oar-song and sometimes a lament. This double meaning it acquired from the fact of the Iorram being so often chanted in the boats that carried the remains of chiefs and nobles over the western seas to Iona.

Give her not a plunge imperfect,
But with right good will, and careful
Keep a watch on all the storm bills
Of the ocean.
Keep a watch, &c.

With a mighty grasp and manful
Stretch your bones and stretch your sinews:
Leave her track in light behind you,
Stepping proudly.
Leave her track, &c.

Give a gleesome bout and lively;
Stoutly rousing one another,
With the dainty boat-song chanted
By the fore-oar.
With the dainty boat-song, &c.

Raise the foam-bells round the tholopins,
Till your hands are bare and blister'd.
And the oars themselves are twisted
In the strong waves.
And the oars themselves, &c.

Let your brows be hotly lighted;
Heed not should your palms get skinless,
And the huge drops from your forehead
Fast be falling.
And the huge drops, &c.

Bend, and stretch, and draw, young gallants
Your shafts of fir, in hue light gray,
And pass with heed the wild rough currents
Whirling briny.
And pass with heed, &c.

Let your set of oars, full sweeping,
Mash the great sea with their vigour,
Going splashing in the wild face
Of the billows.
Going splashing, &c.

Row together, clean and steady,
Splitting the great swelling water;
Work with life and work with spirit,
No delaying.
Work with life, &c.

Give a graceful and a strong pull,
Looking oft on one another;
Wake the force that's in your sinews
All so strongly.
Wake the force, &c.

Be her ribb'd and oaken body
In the wild glens moaning sadly,
And her two thighs ever pounding
Down the surges.
And her two thighs, &c.

Let the ocean, crisp and hoary,
Rise with rough and deep-toned heavings,
And the lofty walling waters
Shout and welter.
And the lofty, &c.

Let the gray sea, ever foaming,
Splash her forward pressing shoulders,
And the currents groan and mingle
Far behind her.
And the currents, &c.

Stretch, and bend, and draw, young gallants!
Your shafts, with smooth waist painted red:
Work them with the pith and marrow
Of strong shoulders.
Work them, &c.

Sweep around you point before you,
Till your brows are streaming moisture;
Thence, with full-spread sail, leave Uist
Of the solans.
Thence, with full-spread sail, &c.

They then rowed to the sailing-place.

And they hoist up the new-bless'd sails
Tantily on high,
And rattle in six oars and ten
And lay them by,
Clear of the pegs that hold the sails
Along her thigh;
Then, Clan-Ranald from his nobles order'd
Good ocean skippers to sail by—
Men who fear'd not any spectre,
Or sight of terror came them nigh.

Then was it ordered, after choice had been made,
that every man should look after his own particular charge. Immediately on this, there was a shout raised for the steersman to take the helm, in these words:—

Let a broad, heavy hero sit at the helm,
Powerful, ready;
No dash of the rising or falling sea
Must make him unsteady;
A well-spread prop full of vigour,
Broad-seated, thick,
Stout and sure, and cautious and wary,
Skillful and quick.
Never once hasty while watching the linen,
Which swift winds unfurl.
When he hears the shaggy ridge of the waters'
Roaring whirl,
He'll smartly keep her narrow head
Against the swirl.
He'll guide her so that she rocks or reels not
In her tack;
Rolling sail and sheet with eyes that windward
Glances back.
He must not lose one finger's fore-joint
Of the right course,
In spite of all the tumbling surges,
And their force.
He'll beat so boldly, when there's need,
In the wind's eye;
He'll make each oaken plank and fastening
Creak and cry.
He must not blench or get confused
With doubts and fears—
Not should the sea's gray-headed swell
Rise round his ears.
This stalwart seaman every terror
Must withstand;
Nor stir, nor move, but keep his place,
With helm in hand;
And, watching the old hoary ocean,
Stern though it be,
Must loosen or draw in the sheet,
As need he'll see,
And make her battle, run, or beat.
With full-sail'd glee.
Thus he keeps her stiff and stubborn,
On top of the wild wave—
Straight and sure unto her harbour,
Let storms howl or rave.

A MAN IS ORDERED OUT TO WATCH THE RIGGING.

Place a shrewd man—great fisted—there,
To watch the rigging,
Who'll be sedate and full of care,
With huge grasp—strong-finger'd;
Who'll haul the yard with right good will,
When the ship needs it;
And watch the mast and tackling still,
And bind and loosen.
And he must know the winds that blow,
What course best suiting;

And he must work in harmony
With him who holds the sheet,
And guide the tackling manfully,
So long as his stout ropes and high
Shall hold together.

THE MAN SET ASIDE FOR THE SHEET.

Let this man, with mighty shoulders,
Sit on the thwart;
He must be sinewy and hairy,
With his bones big—
A thick-set, broad, and craggy champion,
With fingers huge.
The sheet he must be ever guiding
With scrambling force;
When the winds come fiercely blowing,
Pulling well in;
But when it slacks, and lags, and flutters,
He lets free.

A MAN ORDERED OUT FOR THE EAR-RING.

Let a man who's tight and sturdy,
Handy, nice, and fine,
Work the jib-sheet without flinching,
When she nears the wind;
Bring it up and down in order,
To each fitting hold,
As the wind may chance to follow,
Or the high-topp'd wave;
And if he finds the tempest rising,
Or loud groaning come,
Who'll bring it with good grasp heroic
To the gunwale down.

A LOOK-OUT ORDERED TO THE FORE.

Now, rising, let a slow man go
Up to the prow;
Our harbour with unerring knowledge
He must show;
Every art descrying keenly
Whence the wind can blow,
And telling to the steersman surely
The right way to go.
Each landmark he must note and gather
From afar,
Since it, with Him who rules the seasons,
Is our guiding star.

A MAN SET ASIDE FOR THE HALYARD.

At the halyard place a tight
Who is no sloven,
But athletic, full of might,
Skill'd, and well proven.
Careful ever, free of haste,
With dark frowns ready;
And to guide his rope well placed,
Dainty and not heady.
With a tug and with a twist
The sail restraining;
Bending downward on his fist,
And strongly straining,
Hard and fast he must not tie
The tough, tight rope;
He only dares a loose loop try,
Giving it scope
To run freely and to fly
And murmur hoarse
Round the peg, with hum and cry,
So swift its course.

A reporter of the waters set aside, and the sea getting too rough, the steersman says to him—

Let a man to watch the rain-squall,
Quick, come nigh;
And sharply on the weather's heart
Let him keep his eye.

Choose me a man half-frighten'd,
 Cautious, sly,
 But not a coward out and out,
 And let him pry,
 With curious watch, until the shower
 He rippling spy:
 Then mark keenly if the gusts
 Before, behind, it fly;
 Nor must he let my heedless thoughts
 Securely lie,
 But wake me up at sight of danger
 With an eager cry,
 When towards us the drowning waters
 Walling hie;
 He must say, 'The beam's thin head
 Quick put about!'
 'A breaking wave!' with thunderous accents
 Must he shout.
 He must thus inform me duly
 When danger's nigh;
 But let no other weather-watcher
 But himself be by,
 To make confusion, doubt, and tumult,
 Through the whole crew fly.

A balesman is ordered out; and the sea, rushing over her behind and before—

To bale her let a strong man rise,
 Active, brave,
 Who will not blench, or yield, or tremble
 For the shouting wave;
 Who will not quail, who will not soften
 For cold sea or hail,
 Though they lash and splash his neck and breast
 On the strong gale.
 With a thick, round, wooden vessel
 In his horny hand,
 He lets not the impouring water
 One moment stand;
 His trust he rigidly discharges,
 Not one moment slack,
 Nor straightening while a drop remaineth
 His bent active back;
 Though her boards should all get riddled,
 He could keep her snug,
 As a well-made lid, close-fitting,
 Keeps a polished jug.

Two are ordered to watch the ropes behind the canvas, and every appearance that the sails will be swept from her with the roughness of the tempest:—

Now let a pair of strong and raw-boned men,
 Rough and hairy,
 Be set to watch the ropes behind the sails,
 Well and wisely.
 With pith and marrow, and great bone and brawn,
 And tough sinews,
 To draw well in when time of danger comes,
 Or else let free;
 Careful to keep it always with smart hand
 In the right middle.
 Donald MacCormaig let us choose for this,
 And John MacLan—
 Two most audacious fellows and expert,
 Of the men of Canna.

Six are now chosen as a reserve, in case any of those I have spoken of should fail, or that the fury of the sea should pluck him overboard, then one of these could take his place:—

Let six men now get up—ready, agile,
 Handy, lively,
 Who will go and leap and run
 Fore and aft her,
 Like a hare upon the hill-tops,
 And the hounds near by.
 They must climb the hard smooth ropes,
 Fine and hempen,
 Like a squirrel in the spring-time
 Up a tree side.
 They must be skillful, hardy, active,
 Sure, and restless,
 And spring to rope, or chain, or sail, or any Needful order,
 Guiding the good ship without weakness
 Of Vic Dhomhuill.

Now, when everything appertaining to the sailing had been got under famous regulation, and every gallant hero drew without softness, without fear, without trembling, to the exact place where he had been ordered to go, they raised up the sails about the rising of the sun on the day of the feast of St. Bride, and they bore out of Loch-Ainneart, in Uist, looking southward.

The sun just open'd, golden-yellow,*
 From his case,
 When the sky grew dark and drumly
 In its place:
 Livid, swarthy, thick, dun-bellied,
 Tawny, gray;
 Every dye that's in the tartan
 O'er it lay.
 Far away to the wild westward
 Grim it lowers,
 With clouds that on the thick aqual wander,
 Threatening showers.
 Up they raised their speckled sails though,
 Cloud-like light,
 And stretch'd them on the mighty halyards,
 Tough and tight.
 High on the mast, so tall and stately—
 Dark red in hue—
 They set them firmly, set them surely,
 Set them true.
 Round the iron pegs the ropes ran,
 And the right rings through;
 They arranged the tackle rarely,
 Well and carefully.
 Then each man sat waiting bravely,
 Where he ought to be:
 Now the airy windows open'd,
 Spotted and blue-gray,
 Now blew the keen and crabbed wild winds—
 A fierce band were they.
 Then his dark gray cloak the ocean
 Round him drew—
 Dusky, livid, ruffled, whirling—
 Round it flew.
 And up he swell'd to mountains or to glass—
 Dishevel'd, rough, sank down—
 Soon the kicking, toiling water
 All in hills had grown.
 The blue deep open'd in huge maws,
 Wild and devouring,
 Into each other's grasps in deadly struggles
 Fiercely pouring.
 It took a man to look the storm winds
 Right in the face—
 Lighting the sparkling spray on every hill wave,
 In their fiery race.
 The waves before us, shrilly yelling,
 Raised their high heads hoar,
 While those behind, with moaning trumpets,
 Gave a bellowing roar.
 When we rose up aloft, majestic,
 On the heaving swell,
 Need was to pull in our canvas
 Smart and well.
 When she sank down with one huge swallow
 In the hollow glen,
 Every sail she bore aloft
 Was given to her then.
 The drizzling surges high and roaring
 Rush'd on us louting;
 Long ere they were near us come,
 We heard their shouting.
 They roll'd, sweeping up the little waves,
 Scourging them bare,
 Till they became one threatening swell,
 Our steersman's care.
 When down we fell from off the billows'
 Towering shaggy edge,
 Our keel was well nigh hurled against
 The shells and sedge;
 The whole sea was lashing, dashing,
 All through other.
 It kept the seals and mightiest monsters
 In a pother.
 The fury and the surging of the water,
 And our good ship's swift way,
 Spatter'd their white brains on each billow,
 Livid and gray.
 With piteous wailing and complaining,
 All the storm-toss'd horde,

* Any one who has ever watched a threatening February morning in the Hebrides, will be at no loss to perceive that this vigorous description has been taken directly from Nature. The varied colours of the sky, and the wild aspect of the sea, are particularly striking.

Shouted out, 'We're now your subjects;
Take us up on board.'
And the small fish of the ocean
Turn'd over their white breast,
Dead, innumerable, with the raging
Of the furious sea's unrest.
The stones and shells of the deep channel
Were in motion;
Swept from out their lowly bed
By the tumult of the ocean,
Till the sea, like a great mess of pottage,
Troubled, muddy grew
With the blood of many mangled creatures,
Dirty red in hue—
Of the horn'd and clawy wild beasts,
Short-footed, splay;
With great wailing gumless mouths,
A huge wide-opened way.
But the whole deep was full of spectres,
Loose and sprawling,
With the claws and with the tails of monsters
Pawing, squalling.
It was frightful even to hear them
Screech so loudly;
The sound might move full fifty heroes
Stepping proudly.
Our whole crew grew dull of hearing
In the tempest's scowl,
With the quavering cries of demons
And the wild beasts' howl.
With oaken planks the weltering waves were wrestling
In their noisy splashing;
While the sharp beak of our swift ship
On the sea-pigs* came dashing.
The wind kept still renewing all its wildness
In the far west,
Till with every kind of strain and trouble
We were sore distressed.
We were blinded with the water
Showering o'er us ever;
And the awful light-like thunder,
And the lightning ceasing never.
The bright fire-balls in our tackling
Flamed and smoked;
With the smell of burning brimstone
We were well-nigh choked.
All the elements above, below,
Against us wrought;
Earth and wind, and fire and water,
With us fought.
But when it dashed the sea
To make us yield;
At last, with one bright smile of pity,
Peace with us she seal'd.
But not before our yards were injured,
And our sails were rent,
Our poops were strain'd, our oars were weaken'd,
All our masts were bent;
Not a stay we had but started,
Our tackling all was wet and splashy,
Nails and couplings twisted, broken,
Feeble, fashie,[†]
All the thwarts and all the gunwale
Everywhere confess'd,
And all above and all below,
How sore they had been press'd.
Not a bracket, not a rib,
But the storm had loosed,
Fore and aft, from stem to stern,
All had got confused.
Not a tiller but was split,
And the helm was wounded;
Every board its own complaint
Sadly sounded;
Every trenel, every fastening
Had been giving way;
Not a board remain'd as firm
As at the break of day;
Not a bolt in her but started,
Not a rope the wind that bore,
Not a part of the whole vessel
But was weaker than before.
The sea spoke to us its peace prattle
At the cross of Ilay a Kyle.
And the rough wind, bitter boaster!
Was restrain'd for one good while;
It rose from off us into places
Lofty in the upper air,
And after all its noisy barking,
Ruffled round us fair.

* Sea-pigs (muca-mara) are porpoises.

Then we gave thanks to the High King,
Who rein'd the wind's rude breath,
And saved our good Clan-Ranald
From a bad and brutal death.
Then we fur'd up the fine and speckled sails
Of linen wide,
And we took down the smooth, red dainty masts,
And laid them by the side.
On our long and slender polish'd oars
Together leaning—
They were all made of the fir cut by MacBarais
In Eilean Fionain—
We went with our smooth dashing, rowing,
And steady shock,
Till we reach'd the good port round the point
Of Fergus' Rock.
There casting anchor peacefully,
We calmly rode;
We got meat and drink in plenty,
And there we abode.

THOMAS PATTISON.

MARY GORDON'S FIRST DAYS AT SCHOOL. CHAPTER XII.

MARY had fallen asleep, but her slumber was broken and disturbed, for her papa's story of the poor boy O'Neil had made a strong impression on her mind, revealing her own guilt, and exciting her imagination to such a degree, that it seemed still to be busily at work; and thus, in what appeared at first a happy dream, she was wafted away to her own summer home—a beautiful mansion on the banks of a Highland loch, surrounded by woods and rocky mountains, heaths and valleys, watered by streams, and enlivened by the rural abodes of the tenantry. It was a summer day of sunshine, and Mary, in her dream, was with Rachel and Willie, wandering in their accustomed haunts, through woods and over fields, gathering wild flowers, and striving with Willie which would collect the finest bouquet. She had run to some distance to pull a wild rose, when a beautiful butterfly passed her, fluttering sportively in the summer air; and Mary pursued it—not that she might catch it or hurt it, but that she might see it alight, and admire its mottled wings, with their bright colours; and so, continuing to follow it, from flower to bush, and from bush to flower, she forgot to think about Rachel and Willie, until she found herself in a woody dell, by the side of a stream too deep for her to cross, but over which—away flew the butterfly! She turned, and tried to retrace her steps, but Rachel and Willie were nowhere to be seen. She ran in every direction calling their names, but there was no answer returned, and she became greatly alarmed. Suddenly the sky was overcast with clouds, and heavy rain began to fall, and poor Mary felt utterly helpless and ready to sink with dismay; when lo! by one of those wonderful transitions that belong to dreams, but which in dreams never appear wonderful, she found herself in town, and on her way to Miss Weston's school; and on passing the toy-shop she looked in and saw the showwoman, who called out, 'There is the little girl;—catch her! catch her!' and immediately two policemen ran out of the shop and pursued her.

Terror seemed now to supply her with new strength, and she ran, with a rapidity amazing to herself, until she reached Russell-square; and on coming near Miss Weston's house, she felt greatly re-assured when she saw her standing on the hall steps, beckoning and calling to her to come quickly. She struggled on to reach her, but suddenly all strength seemed again to leave her—her limbs refused to carry her farther; and when she looked behind, and saw her pursuers close upon her, and one of them about to seize her by the arm, she clung to the iron railing, and with a piercing cry—awoke!

The light was burning very low, and the nursery filled with dark shadows, and Mary sat up in bed and called loudly upon Rachel; but the kitchen was too far off for her to hear. Willie, however, had been startled from his sleep by the cry she had uttered in her dream, and now he was thoroughly awakened; and, springing from his bed, he ran into the nursery.

'What are you calling for, Mary dear?'

'Oh Willie, Willie! Come to me and give me your hand. I have been dreaming a terrible dream, and I am very frightened; for oh Willie! I am a thief!' And Mary wept bitterly.

'No, no, Mary dear; you are not a thief,' said the kind-hearted little boy, getting up beside her, and putting his arms around her; 'you are dreaming yet, Mary.'

'No, Willie, I am not dreaming now. I stole a shilling of mamma's money, and bought a doll with it on my way to school.'

'Mary, Mary, why did you do that? Have you told mamma?'

'No, Willie, I could not; I was so much afraid. I once thought I would tell papa when he was telling us about the poor boy, but I was not able; and oh Willie! I am very frightened God will punish me.'

'You must come to papa, Mary, and tell him all about it, and he will help you.'

'But when I tell him what I have done, Willie, he will never love me any more, and neither will mamma,' said Mary, weeping.

'Mary, I am sure they will always love you, and so will I. Come away, and I will take you to papa.'

He helped her out of bed, and on opening the nursery door, they were dazzled by the brightness of the light that streamed in upon them.

'Look,' said Willie, 'the stair-case lights are burning yet, and nobody is to bed.'

Mary searched for the doll, and took it out from the foot of her bed.

'Oh Willie!' she said; 'how can I go and tell papa about this? I am all trembling.'

'Don't be afraid, Mary. I will help you.'

He supported her kindly, with an arm put round her waist; and they went down stairs together, and were advancing to the drawing-room door, when Mary stopped.

'Willie!' she said, 'I am not able to go in. Oh what shall I do?'

'Stand here for a little, Mary dear, and I'll go in and tell papa.'

He opened the door quietly, and went in.

'Papa,' he said, 'Mary has something she wants to tell you, and she is very frightened to come in.'

Mr. Gordon walked immediately to the door. 'Come in, Mary,' he said; but the little white figure neither spoke nor moved, but stood dumb and motionless, under the bright light of the stair gasolier, with one hand holding on by the railing, and in the other hung the wax-doll, the cause of all her woe.

When Mr. Gordon stooped down to look at her, he was shocked to see that her face was colourless, her breathing oppressed, and a cold perspiration stood on her forehead; for, besides the effort she was making to come into her father's presence, Mary was still suffering from the effects of her dream.

'My dear child,' he said, lifting her in his arms, and carrying her into the drawing-room, 'tell me what is the matter?'

When Mrs. Gordon came forward and looked at Mary's pale face and closed eyes, she was greatly alarmed.

'I told you, William, that this had gone too far; and now there is an illness coming on the child.'

'Don't be afraid, Anne; this will prove a salutary illness, and it is just what I hoped for, and told you would come. Ring for a glass of water, please.'

Mrs. Gordon went for it herself, and brought besides a warm shawl, and wrapped it about her.

Mary drank a little water, and for a short time lay perfectly quiet in her father's arms; and Mr. Gordon watched until he saw her colour return, and that she was really better, when he raised her up gently. 'Mary!' he said, 'Willie says there is something you want to tell me, but that you are frightened to do so. Now, I would like you to think that you are sitting on your own papa's knee, who loves you, and wishes to help you to do what is right; and if you have done something that is wrong, even although it is very far wrong, you are doing right now to come and confess it. So, speak out at once, my dear, and tell me what it is, and why you are so frightened?'

With a strong effort she roused herself, and, lifting up the doll, laid it on the table, shuddering as she did so.

'Papa,' she said, 'I have been very wicked. I stole a shilling of mamma's money from the pantry table this morning, before I went to school; and, on the way, I bought that doll, although mamma refused to buy it for me yesterday. I have been very unhappy all day; and when you told Willie and me about the poor boy that stole the loaf, I knew I had been far worse than him. I once thought I would try to tell you, but I was not able. And I have dreamed a terrible dream; and I am very frightened that God will punish me,—for I am a thief!'

It was out at last. The terrible truth was spoken; but so terrible did it sound in her papa's presence, that Mary hid her face on his arm and burst into a violent fit of weeping.

Mr. Gordon allowed her tears to flow unrestrained for some minutes, and then spoke.

'Are you going to remain a thief, Mary?'

'Oh no, no,' she said, earnestly. 'I shall never steal anything again.'

'Then you are really sorry for what you have done? You are ashamed of it; and wonder now how you could allow yourself to take, secretly, what was not your own? You despise yourself for it, and hate the very idea of being a thief?'

'Oh yes, papa!' she said, astonished at hearing her own thoughts so truly expressed.

'Now, Mary, I should like very much to know what could tempt you to do such a thing? And, although you are but a little girl, do you think, my dear, you could try to remember your thoughts after you rose this morning? And tell me what bad, unhappy feelings led you so far wrong. And, however bad they were, don't be afraid to tell me out truly.'

There was something in her papa's tone so calm and encouraging, and altogether so unlike the severity she had expected, that Mary gradually gained courage. And now that the ice was fairly broken, her confession flowed forth like a stream that seemed to be gathering strength as it went along, and revealing the innermost thoughts of her heart.

'Papa,' she said, 'I shall tell you everything I can remember. When I rose this morning, I thought I would try to be as good as I was yesterday, for everybody at school was pleased with me, and I was very happy; but when Nancy came to dress me instead of Rachel, I grew angry and naughty, because I wanted to talk to Rachel about school, and Nancy did not know anything about it. I was behaving very badly to her, when mamma came into the nursery, and punished me; and when she took Willie down with her to breakfast, and would not let him stay with me, I thought she was very cruel to leave me alone, and that it was because she loved Willie more than me, and was petting him—and oh! papa, I hated Willie for it. Yes,' she said—turning round to her little brother, who was seated on a footstool by the fire, gazing at her with a face of anxious concern—'I hated my own Willie, who has been so kind to me, and helped me to come to you to-night.'

'Never mind, Mary, dear,' said Willie. 'I know you don't hate me.'

'But I did hate you then, Willie; and I grew worse and worse; for when I came down stairs, and listened at the dining-room door, and heard you all talking so happily together, I thought mamma so cruel for keeping me out, that I hated her too. Yes, mamma,' she said, looking at Mrs. Gordon, 'I hated you too; and oh! mamma, will you forgive me?'

'Yes, I forgive you, my dear little girl, for I see you are truly sorry for having such wrong thoughts of me; and I shall say to you, just as Willie said—I know you don't hate me, Mary.'

'Oh no, indeed! I love you dearly, mamma,' she said, smiling sweetly for a moment, but her countenance changing again as she continued—

'And then I grew more wicked than ever; for when I went into Thomas' pantry to ask him the hour, he was not there, but on the table there was a heap of money; and I thought that although mamma would not allow me to be happy by giving me the doll I wanted so much, I would make myself happy, and take a shilling, and buy it; and I took—I—I—stole—oh, papa! I cannot tell you any more. I don't know what made me so wicked.' And again she hid her face on his shoulder.

'Mary,' said Mr. Gordon, 'I shall not ask you to say more; and I am glad you have had courage to tell me so much of the truth; for now I can easily comprehend the misery you must have endured all day—trying to conceal a theft you had committed—deceiving everybody, and telling untruths—drawn on by an evil power from one sin to another, until there seemed to be no way of escape; but I rejoice to learn, my dear child, from all you have now told me, that there has been a better influence ruling all the time in your heart, making you feel that sin brings its own punishment, and helping you to escape from it, like a bird from the snare of the fowler; and now, before you go to bed, Mary, let me ask you one or two serious questions. You say that you are afraid God will punish you, and it is quite right that you should fear Him at all times; but did you not forget to pray to Him this morning, when you went so far wrong, and broke his commandments?'

'Yes,' she said, looking down sorrowfully.

'Then you know you have sinned against Him, and you are sorry for it—you repent of it—and you will ask Him to forgive you, and help you to do so no more?'

'Yes, papa.'

'But you know, my dear little girl, that there is only one way—one only, Mary—by which any of us, young or old, can obtain forgiveness; that it is only through Jesus Christ, our Lord, you can be pardoned and kept from sin, and that all you ask must be for his sake.'

'Yes, papa.'

'And when you speak the concluding words of his own prayer—"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power"—will you remember that, by these very words, He teaches you that you have no power of your own to keep you from sin, but that your safety must all come from himself?'

'Yes, papa; I shall remember that.'

'Then, my dear, you need not be frightened any more; you may go away to bed, Mary, and sleep in peace and safety, for, sleeping or waking, He will take care of you. So, good night, my own Mary,' said Mr. Gordon, clasping her in his arms, and kissing her affectionately.

'Good night, papa!' she said, warmly returning his embrace, and smiling for the first time with her own happy expression.

'Good night!' said Willie, springing up on the back of his papa's chair, and clasping him tightly round his neck, at the risk of choking him, for Willie's spirits were mounting high, so glad was he that Mary's troubles had come to a happy conclusion.

'Come down, Willie, and ring the nursery bell,' said Mrs. Gordon. 'And come and speak to me, Mary, for a few minutes. I am sure,' she said, in a low voice, 'you will be glad to see this doll no more.'

'Oh yes, mamma. Will you hide it away out of sight?'

'Oh no, my dear; it is really a very pretty doll,' she said, smiling as she looked at it, 'and quite innocent, I am sure, as to all the sorrow it has caused; and I think we shall ask Rachel to give it to her little niece, who has been so ill.'

'Oh yes; thank you, dear mamma. I shall be very happy if Rachel will give it to her.'

Rachel now came in, and gladly undertook to do so, expressing great pleasure at seeing Miss Mary look like herself again; and the happy children accompanied her to the nursery.

CONCLUSION.

'From all I have heard to-night,' said Mrs. Gordon to her husband, 'I acknowledge I was wrong this morning about Mary's punishment. So you see, William, I can make "a voluntary confession" when I feel it is right to do so.'

'Then you must have "convictions," Anne?' said Mr. Gordon, smiling.

'Yes, I have convictions,' she said gravely; 'at least I feel now that I did wrong in leaving her alone when Rachel was absent; and I regret it exceedingly, for I only drove her from bad to worse.'

'You are quite right, Anne; but do not vex yourself, for it has been the means of drawing out her character in a new light, and developing such bold features as I did not know she was possessed of; and yet so warm is her heart, that I believe a single loving remonstrance would do more to turn her from doing wrong than any amount of severity or any punishment we could inflict; and I think we shall both know better how to deal with her in future.'

In about an hour after, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon visited the nursery, and found Rachel still watching by Mary's bed; and on drawing aside the curtain, they saw that she had fallen into a quiet sleep. Her long eyelashes were matted together by the tears she had shed, but no other trace of sorrow remained, and a happy expression rested on her features.

'She is all right now, Rachel,' said Mr. Gordon, looking at her.

'She is indeed, sir,' said Rachel; 'and she dropped asleep while telling me how happy she was; and that to-morrow morning she would go down to breakfast, and sit beside her papa.'

'I am afraid I shall grow jealous of such a decided preference,' said Mrs. Gordon smiling; 'so I shall go and pay a visit to my son.' And she stepped lightly into Willie's room, followed by her husband.

Willie lay in a profound sleep; his curly hair pushed back from his fair open forehead; his cheeks warm and rosy with health.

'He is a noble little fellow,' said Mrs. Gordon, stooping to kiss him; 'and how kindly he has behaved to Mary to-night!'

'He has indeed behaved nobly,' said Mr. Gordon, 'just because he behaved so kindly, and as every brother should behave to a sister in sorrow. You quoted a text from Proverbs this afternoon, Anne, when we were speaking of Mary, and I may now apply one to Willie:—"A friend loveth at all times, and 'a brother' is born for adversity."'

POETICAL CONCEPTION.

No. III.

THERE is often a loveliness, a grandeur in truth—the mere simple narration of which, without extraneous adornment, speaks powerfully to, or calls forth, our poetical conceptions. We have many examples of such in our older ballads, and in a thousand other narratives, in the simplicity of which there is an indescribable pathos which fastens on the soul, or strikes every chord of affection in our emotional nature. But this view, to be fully elucidated, would lead us rather to the expression than to the conception of poetry.

Truth, it has been said, is often stranger than fiction; and fiction will not please unless it bear the similitude of truth. There are circumstances and events ever occurring, in the history of human life, of such deep and overpowering pathos, as to call forth some of the finest and tenderest sympathies. We think of Napoleon the Great, the devastator of kingdoms, the dethroner of monarchs—who overthrew dynasties, and whose nod made Europe tremble—as at last the caged eagle, pining away his life and his restless and troubled spirit in exile, and terminating his strange career on the lonely rock of St. Helena. Or, turn we for a moment to another and a quite different scene,—we enter one of the cells in Bedford jail, and what do we see?—a prisoner; but not alone, for a blind girl is with him, the child of his deepest affections, over whom his manly heart yearns with such tenderness as only such a nature as his could feel. He turns to his Bible, which lies open before him, and he reads, and then he writes. This is Bunyan, the tinker of Elstow, working out his immortal allegory of the 'Pilgrim's Progress.' Or, take a scene of domestic affection. There is the childless Naomi intreating once and again that her daughter-in-law, now a widow, should separate from her; and hear the thrilling answer of Ruth, 'Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if I ought but death part thee and me.'

We have selected these instances as well known; but a thousand others might be given, of a similar description, in which the very circumstances are of an essentially poetical character, and he who does not feel this must be devoid of some of the finest susceptibilities of humanity.

It is the province of the poet—we should rather say it is the unfailing, constraining, all-controlling, ruling, and directing exercise of the poetical faculty—to view circumstances and events in connection with the sensibilities of our common nature. It does not require strange or great events, affecting perhaps a nation's destinies, nor the actings and doings of men of great renown, nor the stern strife of a battle-field, where victory may hang in suspense between hostile armies, to give birth to true poetical conception. Fitting circumstances for this purpose may be found in the walks of common life, and among the ordinary occurrences of every day's history. A slight, trivial, apparently casual incident may give birth, in a highly poetical mind, to some of the most tender and pathetic poetical conceptions; and that not by any affected, or constrained, or far-fetched sentimentalism—which, as mere trick and sham, are barely tolerable, if not positively disgusting—but by the fresh welling forth of the perennial springs of genuine sympathy and affection, which ever find their natural channels into the human heart.

Two well-known poems of Burns, written regarding apparently trivial incidents, are full of the deepest pathos, and might both be quoted at large as illustrations of poetical conception on such subjects. The 'Address to the Mountain Daisy' and the 'Address to the Mouse' are perfect gems. It is, indeed, difficult to say which is best. Perhaps the pathos in the address to the daisy, especially in the concluding stanza, is the deepest and most overpowering:—

'Ev'n thou who mourn'st the daisy's fate,
That fate is thine—no distant date;
Stern Ruin's ploughshare drives, elate,
Full on thy bloom,
Till crush'd beneath the furrow's weight,
Shall be thy doom!'

The address to the mouse is perhaps the more graphic in its description, though scarcely so full of pathos; at least the pathos does not reach the same depth as that of the other.

The description is so simple, easy, and natural, that when we read it we almost think—'Well! any of us could have done it.' But just let any one try such a theme, and he will find how sadly he has overrated his own powers; in other words, how far short he will come in his poetical conception.

'Thy wee bit house, too, in ruin!
Its silly wa's the winds are strewin'!
And naething, now, to big a new ane
O' foggage green!
An' bleak December's winds ensuin',
Baith snell and keen!

Thou saw the fields laid bare an' waste,
An' weary winter comin' fast,
An' cozie here, beneath the blast,
Thou thoughtst to dwell—
Till, crash! the cruel coulter past
Out thro' thy cell.

That wee bit heap o' leaves an' stibble
Has cost thee monie a weary nibble!

Now thou's turn'd out, for a' thy trouble,
'Bout house or hauld,
To thole the winter's sleety dribble,
An' cranreuch cauld !'

If we imagine it would be easy to conceive and write as well on such an incident, then let us feel the pathos, particularly of the last stanza:—

'But, mousie, thou art no thy lane,
In proving foresight may be vain.
The best laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft a-gley,
An' lea'e us naught but grief and pain,
For promised joy.

Still thou art bless'd compared wi' me !
The present only toucheth thee:
But, och ! I backward cast my e'e,
On prospects drear;
An' forward, tho' I canna see,
I guess an' fear.'

I hope it will be understood from these illustrations which are given of poetical conception, though they belong to poetical expression, what is pathos, or, as the original Greek word means 'passion,' so often referred to in critiques on poetry. It is not necessarily imagination, or fancy, or poetical conception, but, like all true poetry, it touches the passions—either the lofty or sublime, or the tender or affectionate; and perhaps it cannot be otherwise described than as meeting its echo in the human heart, as all classes of poetry must do. The field is thus, it will be seen, of almost illimitable extent and variety. The pathos of a scene, or event, or incident may be felt, perhaps, by any one; but to carry the pathos into a written description, as Burns has done, so as to affect the minds of others, belongs to the poet's art of description and not to poetical conception merely.

The poetical conception of events, or their attendant circumstances or results, however, remain different, it may be in different minds, but still they are not so in their marked rational reality, but only as viewed through some natural feeling, rising up spontaneously in the human breast; for feeling cannot be forced any more than it can be restrained. According to the Latin saying—'Tanquam furca naturam expellas, usque recurret'—although you expel nature with a fork it will still return.

Passion or emotion, indeed—not rage, nor hate, nor jealousy, nor any other exciting and turbulent passion exclusively—is the soul of poetical conception, as there is a pleasure in the placid stream as it runs noiselessly, smooth, and deep, like a coy maiden, between dark overhanging rocks—suggesting the still pleasures of happiness and contentment—as well as when it forms a cascade, tumbling, and whirling, and rushing, and roaring, filling the air with its thunder, like some mighty giant in a storm of passion.

Before dismissing the subject of poetical conception, there are at least two overmastering passions worthy of especial notice, viz. patriotism, or the love of country, and what has been called in the present day hero-worship—which two passions, though somewhat different, are not very dissimilar at least in their operation.

The subject of patriotism, or love of country, is the grand overmastering passion of Scotchmen; and, indeed, it is almost universally found to characterise the natives of mountainous countries. It is so strong that the air of 'Ranz des vaches,' the favourite song of the Swiss mountain herdsmen, was forbidden to be played in the French army, as it called up associations and feelings in connection with their fatherland in the Swiss soldiers, so exciting as frequently to lead to desertion from the service.

A somewhat similar trait has been said to characterise our own hardy Highland soldiers, who, in a foreign land, have been melted into tears on hearing some of their native airs; and 'Lochaber no more' has drawn a Highlander from America back to the land of his birth.

Sir Walter Scott says, like a genuine Scotchman as he was—

'Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
"This is my own, my native land?"
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd,
As home his footsteps he hath turn'd?
From wandering on a foreign strand?
If such there breathe, go, mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell:
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth, as wish can claim;
Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentr'd all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonour'd, and unsung.

O Caledonia! stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child!
Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood,
Land of my sires! what mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band
That knits me to thy rugged strand?'

And another Scotchman thus writes:—

'Dear to my spirit, Scotland! thou hast been Since infant years, in all thy glens of green!
Land of my love, where every sound and sight
Comes in soft melody or melts in light!
Land of the green wood, by the silver rill,
The heather and the daisy of the hill;
The guardian thistle, to thy foemen stern;
The wild-rose, hawthorn, and the lady fern!
Land of the lark, that like a seraph sings
Beyond the rainbow's quivering wings!
Land of wild beauty, and romantic shapes—
Of shelter'd valleys and of stormy capes;
Of the bright garden and the tangled brake;
Of the dark mountain and the sunlit lake!
Land of my birth, and of my father's grave,
The eagles' home, the eyrie of the brave!
Land of affection, and of native worth!
Land where my bones shall mingle with the earth!
The foot of slave thy heather never strain'd,
Nor rock that battlement thy sons profan'd!
Unrival'd land of sciences and arts,
Land of fair faces and of faithful hearts!
Land where Religion paves her heavenward road!
Land of the temple of the living God!
Yet, dear to feeling, Scotland, as thou art,
Should'st thou that glorious temple e'er desert,
I would disclaim thee, seek the distant shore,
Of Christian isle, and thence return no more.'

These quotations, though rather long, may well be placed side by side, and we have done so to show how two highly poetical minds may view the same interesting subject, and to illustrate poetical conceptions in a great variety of its phases. Indeed, we know no better way of enlarging our views of poetical conception than to collect together the many passages of our best poetry, and see how almost infinitely various they are in their leading features, yet all true to the grand principle of nature.

There is also, as we have said, the passion of what has been called 'hero-worship,' which is a most inviting subject. It is the origin of the heathen mythologies even of the present age. It exalts heroes into the place of gods, and sinful erring men into the calendar of saints.

Few, indeed, in this Christian land, and in our day, will admit this species of idolatry, founded on erroneous and overstrained poetical conception. But it is nevertheless true that each mind has the god of its own poetical idolatry, in some types of humanity, dead or living, which it exalts under the power of poetical feeling to a supernatural dignity and worth, and, with what is called a poetical licence, turns their vices into virtues. This is not a worthy, though it is a favourite poetical conception with many; and some casts of mind may so far sympathise with it. When this passion is not overstrained or warped by vice, it is at least an honourable, though sometimes a weak one; and we feel that, when rightly conceived, it adds dignity to human nature. The feeling in such cases leans to virtue's side; and if we do not always approve of it, we cannot find quite in our hearts to condemn it.

Wherever there is a perception of beauty, a feeling of loveliness, an idea of grandeur or vastness, an association of sympathy, a breathing of gentle emotion, or a storm of overwhelming passion; wherever there is a hope or joy, fear or grief, hatred or pleasure, the poetical conception will naturally and necessarily arise as inherent in and a part of the prevailing sentiment. Neither the humble cottage nor the palace of the great; neither the ruined castle, with its towers 'gray with the mist of years,' nor the modern seat of wealth and splendour; neither the dilapidated rural church, placed in some lonely nook or hollow glen, nor the stately city cathedral, with its vaulted aisles—no human occupation, from the shepherd tending his flocks far among the hills, or the sailor who, in loneliness, ploughs the midnight deep—no period of life, from the smiling babe to hoary, tottering, decrepit, half-childish old age—no relation in society, from the domestic hearth of our own beloved land, all through the vast and various institutions that prevail in Britain's great domains, over which, it has been no less truly than poetically said, the sun never sets—nothing in all external nature that we can perceive, and nothing in the universe around us, hid in the impenetrable recesses of distance, which even conjecture cannot for a moment reach—nothing, in short, whether in life, death, or eternity, but the poetical feeling may associate with or link to itself in some mysterious, yet, at the same time, truly simple, easy, and natural manner. As Shakspeare says—'What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason; how infinite in faculties; in form and moving how express and admirable; in apprehension how like a God! The beauty of the world; the paragon of animals.' If we could go over all the vastness and grandeur which are discoverable in external nature, and all the conceivable varieties and circumstances of human loves, fears, associations, and sympathies, we would then only perhaps reach but the outer bounds of poetical conception. The field is, indeed, to our view, without end or limit; for, as we continue to survey it, we find the prospect widening and stretching out before us on all sides, just as when we ascend some lofty hill, and think we have reached the summit, we perceive at each successive elevation some new features of the landscape; and when at last we reach the summit elevation, we descrie far off objects hazy and dim in the remoteness of distance. Were all our written and oral poetry at once and for ever swept away by the besom of destruction, we can scarcely conceive the extent of the loss we should sustain—irremediable, indeed, to an existing generation,—yet nature, animate and inanimate, physical and spiritual, intellectual, emotional, and moral, unchanged in themselves and their relations to each other—would still furnish new and fresh objects to delight the imagination. Like the fabled Phoenix, rising from the ashes of the fire, the human soul would again wing its adventurous flight over new realms of surpassing beauty or grandeur; and revel in the enjoyment, perhaps with a freshness of pleasure and delight, not now to be felt in consequence of our familiar acquaintance with poetry. It may be said in regard to such a catastrophe, what Dr. Chalmers has most beautifully and poetically said in his astronomical discourses—'To an eye that could take in the universe, the dissolution of this world, with all its inhabitants, would be as nothing; from many other worlds it would not even be seen, and from a few, and those the nearest of them, it would only be the disappearance of "a little star which had ceased from its twinkling."'

LANGIEWICZ—DICTATOR.

BY ALLAN PARK PATON.

[General Langiewicz drew up his small army in order of battle on the 12th, in front of his camp. He then formed a square, in the midst of which an altar was erected. After a sermon from the chaplain, the Dictator took an oath of fidelity to the nation. The troops and the civil Government afterwards took an oath of fidelity to Langiewicz, amid cries of 'Long live the Dictator!' At this moment a rainbow was visible, which added to the enthusiasm of the army. The soldiers imagined that this was a sign of a celestial blessing sent to the nation fighting for its rights. The Polish Dictator received a sash which had belonged to Kosciuszko, and was worn by him when he defeated the troops of the Empress Catherine in the adjoining valley of Radawitz.—Times Correspondent.]

My Countrymen! within your eager square,
And by the altar that ye here have raised—
Bound which we have the God of nations praised—
I stand, my oath of faithfulness to swear.

When Kosciuszko once, hard by, pursued
Our ruthless foe, this sword was in his hand.
To me you give it. O thou hallow'd brand!
While mine, be stain'd with nought save Russian blood!

Devoted weapon! While I draw free breath,
Thy blade shall be to foeman ever bare,
But sheath'd to years and weakness everywhere—
Shall wave in victory, or be clutch'd in death!

Clear Patriot Soul! Leave heaven's rest and light
A little while, to watch the dear old plains.
Once more, with raw wrists, Poland bursts her chains.
And rises, arm'd, against the Muscovite!

Swoop'd on and shared by the Imperial knaves,
Long time our nation hath been blotted out;
Her sons, at home o'ershadow'd by the knout,
Wandering the world, or, in Siberia, slaves;

Her mothers, brooding o'er their children's fate;
Her maids self-pledged from their loved dance and song
A ban laid even on her ancient tongue;
And little heard save sobs or words of hate!

But now, blind Tyranny! this long held cup
Of bitterest bondage and of glowing shame
Hath fill'd to overflow, and stirr'd to flame;
And, dashing it aside, the land is up!

Up, o'er its length and breadth! And here stand we—
You, Poland's soldiers—as Dictator, I—
To swear truth to each other; and to die
Freely, or make our goaded country free!

My brothers, we have sworn. See! God's fair bow
Set in the cloud! We hail it as a sign
Of Heaven's blessing—as a smile Divine
On this wrong'd People struggling. HARK!—THE Foe!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

July 30, 1835.

I am in the blue room now, lying in bed. I have been married more than a year; and though George has gone off to town as usual, I am not alone, as I used to be when he left me. There is a little waxen face laid close to mine on the pillow, and a sweet small breath is heaving from a tiny mouth; and a new interest and a new existence have been wefted into mine. This week has given to me the sacred name of mother.

I write a few lines by stealth while Nurse is absent, for I begin to see signs of tyranny in my guardian, and my babe and I must needs for a time be passive in her hands. To be sure, it is rather hard to be thus caged up, when I feel quite well, and able for all my wonted duties; but that sweet Aunt Aubrey does everything for me wisely and pleasantly, so I must not murmur.

George declares that nurse is always either eating or else dosing over some warm mixture of questionable ingredients; and I must allow there is some truth in what he says. But, I have heard tell, this is a weakness incident to all of her class; and I daresay the poor woman finds the day long enough in this dull room; besides, my little darling thrives with her wondrously, looking fresh as a daisy, and what more can I desire?

August 2.

Very grave thoughts will sometimes come over me, as I look on this tiny treasure lately sent me from God. To me the presence of a pure and helpless infant seems as a silent commentary on all that is harsh, and gross, and selfish in our human nature, whispering in language clear and unmistakable—"As I am to-day, such were you once; why are you now so different?" Yes, dear babe! thou art indeed a sweet still witness against the change wrought by years upon every one of us. Thy mild companionship is a protest against angry and unworthy passion, and I hail thee as a messenger for good—a teacher of all lovely and gentle things.

August 7.

Do what I will, I am rather fretted by that Mrs. Poole. She is so cool, so precise, so self-satisfied, and takes her own way so perseveringly! I should not mind it so much, but that I see it annoys George; and he is just a very little apt to be quick in temper, at any rate. Our kind aunt does all she can to smoothe matters, and is excellent company in herself for my husband; but nurse is a constant bugbear to him—ever cutting short that quiet converse with me which he prizes so highly, and making a hundred excuses (all on account of my health!) to have him turned out of the room, ere we have well spoken two words together. I can assure her that is not the way to make me get soon strong; for, unless the mind is happy, it is vain to lay the body at ease. And as for talking, depend upon it, there is far less harm in letting warm and earnest thoughts find expression, than in forcing a weak creature to swallow them down and make no sign. I wonder what nurse would say if she knew my writing propensity? Her offended dignity of office would be something awful to behold! One day, she found a pencil on my bed; and I shall not soon forget the stern perplexity with which she eyed it, and then darted a suspicious glance at me, requesting to be informed 'Whether I felt any inclination to headache that morning?'

But, as I tell George, the obnoxious dynasty will soon be over, and we shall be back once again to our old ways—only far more delightfully, with this cherub stranger to engage our love and care.

Dr. Armstrong, my medical attendant, has just left me. He says I may go down into the dining-room to-morrow; and George is in heroics at my promised emancipation, and is coming earlier home from town to inaugurate the occasion. Mrs. Poole looks more than usually important in prospect of the auspicious event; and George cries 'Bravo, Kate! This is the first alarm for liberty!'

August 15.

I like Dr. Armstrong. He is a superior man, of unquestioned skill; and with no pomposity or professional airs about him. A widower, without children. His wife died within twelve months of their marriage. To judge by looks, I should guess his age about 35. But, knowing the sudden darkening of his hopes, I should not be surprised though he were much less; for, though it is three years since his loss, the lines of grief are yet heavily impressed upon his features. His voice, too, has a melancholy touch at times—no doubt referable to his early sorrow. What a trial must that have been! Two loving hearts severed at the very commencement of their happy career! For my part, I wonder the Doctor could hold up his head afterwards! If anything were ever to happen to George! Oh horrible! (And I am sure he feels exactly the same in regard to me.) Neither of us could survive the other, or else it would be in the wretched despondence of insanity. By-the-bye, what can detain him to-day? It is past his usual hour. Ha! there is a step at this moment. Yes! it is he. His foot is on the stair. Foolish Kate! to be frightened for shadows.

September 6.

George and I have had a slight skirmish this morning; ending, however, very peacefully. The subject in debate was the name by which we are to call our little daughter. And it was a strife of love, after all; he declaring for Charlotte, after my dear departed mamma, and I proposing it should be Ellen, after his mother, also deceased. George wished me to fix which name I preferred; of course, I wanted him to do the same. Finally we agreed it was best to follow the prescribed rule, and so Charlotte carried the day.

Mem.—Nothing appears to me more absurd than the way some parents have of ignoring the good old fashion of calling their children after near relatives, and substituting, for ordinary sensible names, the rarest and most high-sounding ones they can think of. Hence the incongruous appellations we frequently hear, making us smile (we are expected, doubtless, to admire), when an awkward girl is presented to our notice by the grandiloquent title of Adelinc, or Constantia; or some raw, clumsy boy, is introduced to visitors as Master Frederick Augustus, or Reginald Vivian! The only excuse for such euphonious nonsense is, that it is a genuine patronymic which we would not willingly let die. And I would seriously advise all fathers and mothers to ponder this ere they invite the clergyman to sprinkle the holy water.

Mrs. Poole is gone; and George has celebrated the riddance by presenting me with an elegant new card-case, in token, as he phrases it, 'that the term of my bondage is ended, and that I may now go out and in at pleasure, and visit my friends, none daring to make me afraid!' Aunt Aubrey only waits for the baptism, to be gone too. Her husband has been dead many years. She has three sons, however, two in the army abroad, and one married at home. She lives in a curious old-fashioned house, situated on the property bequeathed her by her father, and which is nearly ten miles off. A charming woman—I shall regret her exceedingly; the more as she is not strong, and speaks of passing the coming winter in Germany, or the south of France. We had a little talk the other evening on the subject of health. It was in the sweet twilight, ere candles were lit. George had gone out for a stroll, and we were sitting in the window recess of the blue room, with our little lily snugly ensconced and asleep in her dainty cot, which was laid on the couch beside us. The day had been wet and windy, but had cleared towards sunset; and now the moon streamed into the room through a sky perfectly calm and cloudless. How I love the moon! Her light seems made to shine on a better order of beings.

The tender beams caught Mrs. Aubrey's placid countenance, and strayed among the folds of her dress of silver-gray, as she sat leaning her cheek on one hand, the other meekly laid upon her lap. I never remember noticing before how much expression there is in a hand. As a key to character, there is nothing like it next to the face. And I am persuaded that a very little study of the shape, colour, and general appearance of the hand, would go nearly as far to prove the idiosyncrasy of its owner as ever did the boasted science of physiognomy. Who could ever mistake Aunt Aubrey's for other than the hand of a serene, judicious, and most charitable soul?

I thought she looked paler than is her wont, and ventured to remark upon it.

'The moon's light is pale, Katherine,' she replied. She always names me thus, as if conceiving that the more endearing appellation of Kate should be held sacred to George's use alone. 'But I feel just the same as usual—not ill, and yet not quite well. Do you know, my love,' she went on, 'that it has been said (and I think correctly) that not one person out of many thousands enjoys perfect health. Ignorance may cause some to believe they do; but they are mistaken. A full, vigorous, delightful hold upon health is one of the rarest things in this world.'

I suppose I must have opened my eyes pretty wide; and I know that the words 'Nay, surely, you cannot believe this,' fell at the same time from my lips. My aunt resumed.

'You will not wonder at my theory, if you consider how complicated a machine is the body, and how numerous and subtle are the agencies constantly at work by which health is necessarily more or less affected. The food we eat, the air we breathe, the clothes we wear, the houses we inhabit, the occupations we pursue, the customs that govern us, and, what is perhaps of more consequence still, the temper and dispositions not only of our own minds, but of those about us too—the joys and sorrows which accompany our lot in life. We are not puppets to be wound up each morning, and so made to run smoothly and regularly all day. We are twofold, delicately organised creatures, the one half outward and material, the other half spiritual and invisible. And as these two parts are ever acting and re-acting upon each other, perfect health (as an invariable gift) grows less and less probable.'

'Yet George is perfectly well,' I interposed. 'The baby is perfectly well; and so I am myself.'

'Yes, yes; and it will be time enough for you twenty years hence to study so intricate a question,' pursued my aunt, taking my hand and looking with her soft gray eyes full of earnest kindness into mine. 'It is best that all knowledge should come by degrees; and always remember this, Katherine, that wherever there is most happiness, there is purest health. So I have no fear for you or yours in this respect.'

So saying, she embraced me affectionately. Then I turned towards my baby's cot, and noted, in the pearly light which had now shifted from my aunt's face to that of the sweetest child upon earth, that a smile hovered round the rosebud mouth. As I looked, one liliputian hand, with the miniature fingers spread out like a fan, was raised a moment in air, and the next fell softly on the coverlid.

'It is the angel,' murmured Aunt Aubrey, 'whispering a message of love.' Charlotte opened her eyes on the instant. My aunt took her up quietly, and placed her in my ready arms.

'This is my angel,' I breathed, stooping to imprint a kiss on the fair smooth brow. Was it a tear that touched my lips as I did so? Yes; it was indeed a modest tear-drop, fallen from the dear old eyes right on my baby's face. When I looked up once more, my companion was gazing out of the window on the placid night. I have heard that Mrs. Aubrey had once a little girl of her own—an only daughter, who died in infancy.

September 15.

The Miss Thorndales have just been here. They come a great deal oftener since my aunt is away, and my liking for them grows upon me. Hester, the eldest, has most intellect—Emma most beauty. I have a scheme in petto, in which I should wish George's co-operation. I want Dr. Armstrong to fancy one or other of these young ladies, and that we should do what we can to promote an attachment between them. The Doctor seems eminently qualified for domestic life—of a temper naturally lively and agreeable, yet rendered sombre and retiring by reason of the setting of his first hope. I would have him roused up, and all his inherent qualities brought into play. I would have him find a new object of interest. I would have him fall in love with Hester, as being on the whole best suited to him of the two sisters; and, finally, I would have him married and happy, as he deserves to be.

George says he has no taste for match-making, and is of opinion that it seldom turns out successful; but adds, that if I choose to indulge for once in an escapade of that sort, I may try my skill.

Let me consider, then, what are the chief points in an able general. Decision, promptitude, prudence, foresight, courage, sagacity, perseverance. Stratagem, too, is permissible; though George says I have no particular talent that way. Nous verrons. Meanwhile, I must review my ground, and decide what forces to bring into the field.—I declare, there is Dr. Armstrong at this very moment coming in at the gate. Now for the first stroke of my project.

I have engaged him to dinner next week; so I shall invite the Miss Thorndales and a few others (not to make my plan too apparent) to meet him.

September 18.

I have been rather puzzled about George for the last day or two. He is apt to be irritable and cross on slight occasions, and I am at a loss for the cause. He does not even care to have baby beside us as he used to do—often proposing to have her sent away, when I think he might be soothed by the innocent presence. Yesterday, he remarked to me, quite testily,

'Surely, Kate, you make a needless fuss with that child. I never see you but you are dandling it, as if your whole thoughts were riveted on it, and there was no other creature in the world worth caring about.' Is it a fault in a mother to be fond of her own infant? What can he mean? Only to-night, upon his asking me to drive out with him a distance of four miles to visit the Seatons, and my telling him I was unwilling to leave baby so long alone with the new nurse, he flew almost into a passion, declaring that I was never at leisure now, and things were quite different from what they were wont to be. And when, after a struggle with contending emotions, I had run up stairs, put on my cloak and bonnet, and came down ready to accompany him, I found he had gone off alone, without another word!

He had scarcely left, when Miss Thorndale came in. She and her sister are to dine with us on Friday, as I wished. My spirits were rather poor after what had happened with George; yet I did not quite forget the game I mean to play. I asked her, carelessly, whether she knew Dr. Armstrong? 'Very slightly.' Then I remarked, 'What an excellent man he is! and what a pity that a blight has been cast on his early life!' She heard me with apparent interest. And we spoke of other topics, till I grew more satisfied than ever that Hester is a superior girl, and would make a charming wife for the Doctor.

But again and again I ponder the matter nearer home, and say to myself, a thousand times, 'What does George mean?'

September 19.

What a relief! George has spoken out his mind. Who could have fancied such a thing? Oh! we are strange beings, and need a long while to understand each other thoroughly.

I was sitting alone last night, after Hester left me, and rather dejected, waiting his return from the Seatons, when George appeared. The cloak and bonnet which I had put on so hurriedly (and so vainly as it turned out!), and which I had thrown off sadly some hours before, still lay on the sofa. They caught George's eye as he entered.

'So, you went out this evening, after all?'

'No, George, I prepared to go with you; but, when I had got ready, you were gone.'

'Kate, I have asked you so often lately to walk or ride with me, and been so frequently refused, that I have been fairly provoked. It is all very right and proper to be mindful of your baby; but I am in the house only a small part of the day, and you might consider —'

Conviction flashed upon me in a moment. It was love—great, strong overmastering love—that made him grudge my time and care even to our own child. A strange flutter came over my heart—a bewildering joy—a sudden sense of relief from a mysterious burden. I flew to my husband, my tears flowing forth in a perfect stream. He must have thought my wits were deserting me, for he cried out in amazement,

'Kate! Kate! what is the matter? Speak to me, my darling; say you are not ill, not unhappy?'

I had thrown my arms round him, my head resting on his shoulder. At these words I looked up smiling, laughing through my wet glancing eyelids.

'O George! you are the dearest, best, most delightful of human beings! And I will try never again to give you offence in the way of which you complain.

But you will not be too hard upon me, George. Remember she is my first, my only one.' I could say no more. He stopped my speech by a process familiar to all affectionate souls. And after a time he ran up stairs, and presently reappeared with something in his arms, small, white, and soft, and with bright eyes that had not gone to sleep yet, though it was long past sleeping hour. This pretty bundle he laid tenderly on my lap, smiling archly, while he whispered, 'Here is your little friend, Kata. Use her kindly for my sake; for I never loved either herself or her mamma so much as at this moment.'

Mem.—Perhaps some young married ladies would do well to take warning by this little episode in my experience, and not pet their babies quite so constantly in presence of their husbands. Poor men! They have often things to trouble them out of doors, and it is but natural they should desire a monopoly of love at home. George is quite right. He is undoubtedly my first care.

CHILDREN IN THE VALLEYS.

CHILDREN in the valleys

Brawl, and sport, and run—

Wading in the brooklet,

Basking in the sun,

Gamb'ling up the hillside,

Romping in the bowers,

Chasing spangled insects

'Mid the honey'd flowers.

Happy, heedless children

In the twilight beam—

Picking shining pebbles

From the singing stream;

Sitting on the green banks,

Where tall shadows stand;

Grasping golden handfuls

Of the treacherous sand.

Foolish, thoughtless children,

Sporting all the day;

Lingering on their journey—

Home so far away.

Night is slowly dawning

'Mong her starlights pale,

O'er the homeless children

In the lonely vale.

Men are in the valleys,

Sporting through the bowers;

Chasing golden fancies

Through the fleeting hours;

Clutching winged shadows

In the noontide's flame;

Ardent fingers grasping

Bursting bells of fame.

O! we're only children

Pleased with every chime;

Twining fond affections

Round the neck of Time;

Sitting in the valleys,

Spending life's short day—

Never, never thinking

Home is far away.

Sunset beams are sinking,

Day is nearly done,

And a mask is falling

O'er the mellow sun;

Still we stay, dispelling

Every shade and fear,

Hugging empty phantoms,

As if home were here!

PERHAPS one of the greatest plagiarists, and, certes, the greatest good-natured egotist, that ever lived, is the Ettrick Shepherd. We remember how merrily the hour went round when reading his Autobiography; how we smiled at the opening candid sentence, and read on smiling, smiling. Written with ease and familiarity, with characteristic naïveté, and an absence of stiffness unusual in such books, it is at once amusing and entertaining—a record of the kind-hearted fellow's feelings and emotions, of his sunny hopes, of his extravagant ambition and pretensions. Hogg is the last man in the world to forget himself. He is an important personage. He is an admirable cook (vide the 'Poetic Mirror'), who talks to his lord with intolerable coolness and assumption. In company he is not backward, or awkward, or dull, but free and easy, at home, and on good terms with all, though but a cook. He is pleasant and jovial, and scarcely offends, and cannot be offended; but will not allow himself to be talked of with cool dignity and reserve. School-boy, or servant, or friend, or whatever he be to you, in his own thoughts he is your equal. Nature made no man to condescend: he tells you that off-hand and impertinently. Aha! my good friends, have I not arms, legs, eyes, and tongue as well as you? Is not my talk as eloquent? There is no fine man to me. There are no rulers and no conventional barriers between one man and another: I don't believe in colour or class. He will talk of Scott as his intimate friend and dear old chum. He will boast exultingly of friendship with some dozen of his famous contemporaries, though he only see them or nod to them; and he dogmatically persists in believing himself born to succeed and even to transcend Burns. Once a guest at the tables of the great and noble, he must have their doors ever open to him, and must himself be freely used and chatted with. An endless talker, not polite, or graceful, or chaste in expression, but easy and rapid, and with the air of a man who knows his subject. An intense delight in hearing his own voice; an idea pervading him, and here and there manifesting itself, that the universe would be less without him. But withal, a homely fellow, who sings nice songs or sentimentality to young ladies, with here and there a flash of poetic fire, and a 'wee bit' of common sense. A contented, happy cottager, who, without invitation, walks arm-in-arm with his lord, and makes his company amusing and delightful. A poetical farmer, who disdains arithmetical calculations and £ s. d., and determines to write to obtain cash for agricultural purposes. But, though careless, a mild, amiable, warm-hearted man, who lives merrily, and will not quarrel with the world; who does not believe in difficulties; who is never down-hearted and oppressed, but cheerily meets the reverses of his fortune; who is always on good terms with himself; who has a wide range of fancy—writes cleverly, gracefully, but diffusely, in a vigorous, lively style, but with a want of taste; who roams out of nature, and whose poems, therefore, have no relation to either outward or inner life; who luxuriates in fantastic, sparkling, copious, and ill-selected imagery; who brilliantly describes supernatural occurrences, marvellous events, and startling appearances, and throws a sweet, musical charm around the Scottish traditional romantic legends and innumerable ballads with which his mind is richly stored; who writes as his extravagant fancy and whimsical impulses direct, without the aid of art or education. Hogg is an observant man, industrious, expert, faithful as a servant, given to meditation, and reading of books with avidity. A happy man altogether; with a merry, lightsome heart, full of frolicsome humour; a frank, open countenance; a kind, manly disposition; of rural and simple manners; on the whole, a cheerful, artless, unsophisticated man—generous in the greatest misfortune,—with a mind that honestly speaks out the truth, a vein of sly humour, and a boy's kind, susceptible heart. The sense of egotism which his writings convey is instantly dispelled in his presence, when his unselfish heart beams out of his dark blue eye, and irradiates his intelligent face with pleasant brotherly smiles. Emotion is the principal element of the man; not passion with its mighty throes, nor reason with its calm guidance, but impulse quick and powerful, ever coming, ever changing. A combination of woman's tenderness, of a child's sentiments, a poet's sparkling fancy: that makes up his nature—truly an unstained, pure, generous, unworldly nature. What flashes of merry vanity! What blunt and irresistibly humorous assertions of self! What beautiful imagery, and true, touching sentiment! What bright, glowing description! What high ambition and clever imitation! What aerial visions and supernatural stories elegantly told! What vast knowledge of fairyland and the mysteries of witchcraft! What fondness for ghosts and superstitions! What love of beauty! What splendour, copiousness, and richness of language and spirituality in the 'Queen's Wake'! What active and versatile powers! Hogg is truly fine in the delineations of fantastic fairy dreams.

Hogg's character as a poet consists not in originality or depth, but in the fancifulness of his thoughts—in the cheerfulness of his sentiments—in his preference for unearthly stories, superstitious traditions, ghosts, and fairies; for the strange, extravagant, wonderful, and supernal; for abstract beauty; for ideal phantoms—in superabundance of imagery—in the wildness and charm of his narrations—in the easy flow and occasional elegance and polish of his style—in the union of the simplicity and vigour of the old metrical chroniclers with the refinement of modern poetry. For his rhythmical powers he is not, as some think, indebted to Scott, Wordsworth, and others of his contemporaries, but to his inherent love of music—a love which he cherished from his boyhood throughout his life; and to that also may be attributed the lyrical sweetness of many of his small pieces. He has not the vigorous thinking, the pathos, the passion, the intense humanity, the living soul of Burns; nor the ever-creating exhaustless fancy, the minute painting, the clear transparent style, and dramatic vividness of Scott; nor the ardour, masculine strength, and nationality of Cunningham; nor the animation and rich humour of Tennant; nor the genuine feeling, faithfulness to nature, tenderness, and frequent Horatian ease of Ramsay. Like Ramsay—frank, jovial, vain as a man, always looking to the sunny side of things; but, as a poet, deficient in taste: like Burns—whatsoever enduring qualities his poetry possesses, they flowed spontaneously from his nature, and were not born of education: like Scott—he loves supernatural lore, is generally as careless in diction, addresses not the passions and the inner life; but he wants Scott's fertile invention, picturesqueness, enthusiasm, and irresistibly fascinating powerful description. He is emphatically the child of a playful, discursive, aerial-wandering fancy; ever ready with simple, melodious words to clothe the magic creations of his brain. The finest of his tales is a fairy legend of inexpressible sweetness and far-off beauty. He is happiest in the world of romance, where his genius soars beyond all human experience, and his words find their source and echo only in the sphere habited by those beings who walk the air unseen. Like Spenser, he loves to luxuriate in imaginary scenes of enchantment and beauty; to steep ethereal conceptions in copious imagery and rich diction; to embody abstract visions; and to personify witches, ghosts, and other unearthly appearances. There is no human sound in his voice—no human reality or probability in his scenes and delineations. He holds no intercourse with the busy world—with the joys and sorrows of human life. He has not learned the language of the heart; and the feelings, emotions, and passions lie far beyond his reach. He never, like Burns, directs the thoughts inward—never enunciates a vigorous sentiment—never goes out of his ideal world—never speaks to us as man to man. We feel no sympathy with his creations. To him nature is an enchanted isle, and life a long, pleasant, dreamy reverie—a 'Midsummer Night's Dream.' To follow, in cheerful obedience, the travellings of his wayward fancy; to excite in his mind lofty imaginings of unreal beauties and of aerial magnificence; to wander in remote regions of space, far from actual life and the stern business of earth; to vivify and freshen, with the charm of a magician, legends of superstition and tales of sprites; to clothe lovely phantoms with the attributes of real intelligences—this is Hogg's work; by no means a common, yet not an important work. His abstractions are not, like Spenser's, representations or personifications of certain mental qualities and virtues, such as friendship, justice, courtesy, and so on, but pure visions—not allegories—having no human interest, and no affinity with human experience. He is for ever identified with fairy land.

The first published important work of Hogg's—a work which received the critical approbation of Scott—reveals a poet, who, if he cannot deal, like Burns, with questions immediately affecting the soul; nor, like Scott, delineate passion as contrasted with situation; nor, like Ramsay, touch the hearts of the people by reproducing their own feelings; can, nevertheless, excite the fancy by the narration of wonderful incidents, charm the ear by exquisite rhythm and pure diction, arrest and keep the attention by the warmth of his manner and the thorough ecstasy with which he relates his legendary tales. If he does not represent humanity, he yet goes to the heart—particularly to the Scottish heart—by the recitation of ballads which make wraiths the objects of superstitious awe. Burns was a universal genius. Like Shakspeare, he puts into words the multiform vicissitudes and experience of the whole human race. Hogg's power is limited. He has not the strength of imagination; but, more than all others, the playfulness of fancy. He seizes what is visible and on the surface; never unclothing, never diving, never searching. If he is unable to express, or enter into, a people's emotions, yet he knows that a magic power is in tradition; and that the relation of Border relics, however simple, has an interest little short of thrilling to his countrymen. 'The Mountain Bard' consists of a variety of tales, which, as imitations of the old ballads, are, on the whole, failures. They have the same simplicity—are the same in essence; but the language is different. They have no real effect. The persons do not live before our eyes. But they exhibit a deep appreciation of the ancient ballad.

Hogg loves these legendary tales, not for their symbolical worth, but for the effect of wonder and fear which they produced. He knows not the essence of them—the hidden thought which they figure. The delicate, spiritual texture of his mind is seen in the choice of subjects of the most romantic and aerial nature, and in the happy, minute painting in which he portrays them. Many are the beautiful moral lessons and chastened thoughts—which, for exquisite etherialism and spirituality, are not surpassed—scattered throughout his poems. But he weaves them in unconsciously. 'Tis the trick of nature; for the uppermost thought in his mind is the ghostly or fairy embodiment. Scott loved the chivalrous deeds of knights for their mere romance. It was the antique blazonry, the manners and customs of feudal times, the wild chase, the tragic feud, the old Border habits, that literally possessed his imagination, and that he sung with a vigour and martial ardour equal to Homer's energy. So Hogg loves the old legends for the mere gossamer fairies and beautiful fantasies.

In reading Ossian, we are forcibly struck with some minor resemblances existing between the 'Etrick Shepherd' and the 'Celtic Homer,' although the choice and nature of their subjects are essentially different. Ossian's genius exerts itself in the region of the wild, magnificent, and sublime; he has a strength and force of imagination equal to the singer of the 'Iliad,' who, undoubtedly, was his prototype. Homer, however, has a manifest superiority over Ossian in the comprehensiveness of his ideas, in sustained dignity of narration, in clearness and accuracy of description, in variety of incidents, in diversity of characters, in his knowledge of human nature, which is almost as deep as Shakspeare's. But in dramatic vividness, in fire, in solemn grandeur, in force of imagery, and in loftiness of moral sentiment, Ossian is fully equal to the Greek, and in one quality surpasses both him and Virgil—tenderness. He is pre-eminently sublime. He treats of the strong, heroic, morally noble; and sometimes approaches the majesty of Virgil. His sentiments are always elevated, his objects great. He moves the soul, now to high purposes by his virtuous tone and generous valour and magnanimous thoughts; now to awe by his powerful delineations of the terrible; now to tears by his pathetic strains; now to astonishment by his aerial magnificence, and quick lightning flashes; now to admiration by his expressively rapid, but dazzling descriptions of heroic deeds. He has not the impetuosity of Homer, but his grandeur is more regular. Now, while Ossian's genius is always employed upon the sublime, and never descends to the gay and trifling, never sports with nature, Hogg selects the delicate, the unearthly, fine fairyism, the supernatural. But, though the choice of subjects is thus totally different, there are, nevertheless, many similarities between the two poets. Both have a power of dramatic description. Persons, scenes, events, are by both brought vividly before us. Both have lively imaginations, which are impressed by uncommon external occurrences, and which conceive impossible things; and both body forth their impressions with liveliness and in spirited styles. Neither has the imaginative power to arrange and harmonise their materials, so as to impart a distinct unity to their works. Both infuse the spirit of life into the objects which they present to us; and so interesting are these descriptions, as to deceive us into the fancy that we are in immediate contact with real persons and events: the life outside our studies dispels the illusion. Now and then Hogg is as brilliant as Ossian, his style as glowing, his language as splendid, sonorous, and rich. Thus, the following is a powerful description of a sea prospect, as seen on a voyage:—

'The clouds were journeying east the sky,
The wind was low, and the swell was high,
And the glossy sea was heaving bright,
Like ridges and hills of liquid light;
While far in her lubric bosom were seen
The magic dyes of purple and green.
How joy'd the bark her sides to lave!
She lean'd to the lee, and she girdled the wave;

Aloft in the stayless verge she hung,
 Light on the steep wave reard' and swung,
 And the crests of the billows before her flung.
 Loud murmur'd the ocean with downward growl,
 The seal swam about, and the dark sea fowl;
 The pye duck sought the depth of the main,
 And rose in the wheel at her wake again;
 And behind her, far to the southward, shone
 A pathway of snow in the waste alone.'

Or this, written with considerable force:—

'To thee, who bidd'st those mountains of brine
 Softly sink in the fair moonshine,
 And spread'st thy couch of silver light,
 To lure to thy bosom the queen of the night;
 Who weavest the cloud of the ocean dew,
 And the mist that sleeps on her breast so blue;
 When the murmurs die at the base of the hill,
 And the shadows lie rock'd and slumbering still,
 And the solan's young, and the lines of foam,
 Are scarcely heaved on thy peaceful home—
 We pour the oil and the wine to thee,
 God of the western wind, God of the sea!'

Or this—the description of 'Kilmeny's' deportment:—

'Kilmeny look'd up with a lovely grace,
 But nae smile was seen in Kilmeny's face;
 As still was her look, and as still was her e'e,
 As the stillness that lay on the emerald lee,
 Or the mist that sleeps on a waveless sea.
 For Kilmeny had been she knew not where,
 And Kilmeny had seen what she could not declare;
 But it seem'd as the harp of the sky had rung,
 And the airs of heaven play'd round her tongue,
 When she spoke of the lovely forms she had seen,
 And a land where sin had never been;
 A land of love, and a land of light,
 Withouten sun, or moon, or night;
 Where the river awa'd a living stream,
 And the light a pure celestial beam;
 The land of vision it would seem,
 A still and everlasting dream.'

In carrying out the resemblances between Ossian and Hogg, we remark, further, that not only in vividness but in simplicity of description they are very much alike. Both write from nature, out of the abundance of the heart, and as it directs. Both are free from affectations and conceits and efforts to shine. There are no marks of laboured study; but the thoughts run freely, and, in the case of Ossian, rapidly.

But, though full of such fervid feeling, beautiful imaginings, and lyrical sweetness, as are exhibited in these extracts, and clothing his fine dreams in words of undying melody; though possessed of a wondrous facility in the luxuriant use of poetical, sparkling images, and of a power of copious and brilliant description; though strikingly delineating abstract beauty in flowing and musical versification, Hogg is left far behind in vivid dramatic reality of effect, and in varied graphic description, by the greatest of his Scotch contemporaries—Scott. While Hogg approaches, Scott equals, and, in some passages of 'Marmion,' excels Ossian in intense energy and onrushing force. Hogg's muse is essentially aerial; Scott's chivalrous; Ossian's imaginative and sublime—if sublimity consist in the powerful, and glowing, and adequate depicting of subjects of magnitude. Hogg's verse is musical—the song of nymphs; Scott's is vigorous, energetic, animated, and occasionally vehement; Ossian's is concise, grave, solemn, and pre-eminently dramatic. Ossian does not partake of the rise and fall—the inequality characteristic of Hogg's, and more particularly of Scott's poetry. In 'Marmion' only is there an exception to this alternate ascent and descent motion. That poem is undoubtedly the most powerfully written and masterly, as regards reality of effect, of Scott's metrical productions; and judged by that alone, his vivacity and fire are equal to Homer's. But sometimes his descriptions, though admittedly brilliant, lose in force from their redundant minuteness; his fervent and inordinate love for the antique loads him into tediousness. Hogg rarely flags, or grows cold and insipid; but though Scott is now and then (not frequently) prolix, led into dull details, and catalogues the most uninteresting and ordinary things, his representations in general have strength—a quality in which Hogg is deficient. He is unapproachably vigorous in the description of scenes of action. Homer, with his amazing fertility of invention, and fighting his battles in his pages, does not surpass him; Ossian, with his suggestive abruptness, does not excel him; Dryden, with his masculine strength and vigorous bold satire, is not his rival: his exhibitions of motion are brilliant beyond everything in modern or ancient poetry. The battle in 'Marmion' is painted in colours glowing as Ariosto. But 'Ossian' gains in conciseness, terseness, and condensity, what Scott achieves by glowing words, rich diction—by his long but spirited, intrepid, and splendid delineations. Vitality is the essence and characteristic of Scott's descriptions. Hogg's versification flows smoothly. The diction has the air of homeliness, looseness—is not stiff, laboured, or heavy; but lively, and of the fresh morning element. He speaks direct from his soul—from his ever-joyous, happy heart. His poetry is his own thought and feeling—his own dreams; no mere excrescence of the fancy, but the outpouring of his love for the more impressing aspects of nature, and for beings of another world, whom he talks about with an extraordinary degree of familiarity. His thought, light as it is, is spontaneous, and finds utterance in bursts of true poetry. Consider, for instance, the beautiful story of 'Kilmeny'—the chief of our poet's productions, in every sense—in naturalness, in abstract imagination, in descriptive force, in melody, in tenderness. But it is entirely supernatural—not human. It is illumined with lovely fancies. It is a very luxury of serene imagery. It is the essence and perfection of fairy legend; the triumph of his genius—a genius nursed by romance, and for ever associated with the wonderful. His love of the unearthly finds its tenderest voicing here; his appreciation of the beautiful its highest manifestation. It is full of soft, fine feeling. It is a splendid vision. It combines all his peculiar features—his belief in superstition, his exquisite sensibility, his profuse imagery, his conception of beauty, his want of reflection, his poverty of noble sentiment and of thought, and the absence of sympathy with our humanity. Poor Hogg—with all his acquaintance with the lore of witches—with all his pitiable fondness for ghosts, and bogles, and spectral shades—with all his intense love of fairies and phantoms—with all his dazzling descriptions and tinsel embellishments—has not the deep poetic insight which sees the workings of the soul and the movements of the passions; and which, further, sees that the visible is but the shadow of the great infinite Unseen.

S. F. WILLIAMS.

THE MISSIONARY ABROAD. SECOND NOTICE.

THE most exciting event which occurred during Mr. Waddell's ministrations in Jamaica was the negro revolt of 1831-2, the causes of which were those that almost invariably provoke such insurrections. The intelligence gained from intercourse with their white masters, and from the teaching of missionaries, reveal murkily to the negroes that there is such a thing as freedom—an awful, shadowy thing—which somehow they also ought to possess as well as their masters; but of which their masters have cruelly and craftily dispossessed them. They have been bought, but not with the divine price which their ministers teach them was paid for their eternal salvation. The salvation of their souls was purchased with a God's, their bodies with a devil's, price. When truths which are still half in shadow are acted upon, the consequences are in many cases disastrous. Yet, although in one sense the truth by which man may live lies about him completely revealed (as he has been told); in another sense, it lies in far distant and almost impenetrable depths; and its light, as the light of those stars which glimmer like faint lace upon the outer hems of creation, takes long years to reach his soul—peering from its narrow niche of time out upon the vast river which rolls into eternity. During his whole life, therefore, man sees that truth is undergoing a perpetually increasing revelation; and probably before he dies he has seen one little phase of it in a hundred lights, all of which, except the latest one—if, haply, even that—he discovers to have been successive crescents of the full moon of truth. Does it not follow that man must act on partial conceptions of truth, or on incomplete revelations? The fact that he must do so renders insurrectionary convulsions not only inevitable, but, in many cases, necessary, in the higher as in the lower stages of civilization. Must the Saxon bondsman behold liberty within arm's reach, and not pluck it from the helmet of the Norman? And must the African, in the twilight of his understanding, behold the great white vision of freedom, and not attempt to pluck the heart out of the apparent mystery, to see whether it is only a grand reality to the white man, and a lying mockery to the black—ever flying before him as if from some dusky horror? In neither case can man escape making the attempt; it is inevitable, and in both it is defensible. Of course an insurrection against bondage of any kind may be ill-planned and ill-timed. The revolt which Mr. Waddell witnessed in Jamaica was characterised by both faults, and consequently it turned out a grand failure. Yet not altogether a failure. It supplied what every unsuccessful but contributory revolt supplies, a further bloody piece of evidence in favour of the consummation—at that time so devoutly desired, and for which hundreds of poor negroes so heroically died. In the suppression of the rebellion, there was a good deal of impotent mismanagement at first. Had it been dealt with wisely, promptly, and powerfully, as it could and ought to have been, it might have been checked in its initiatory stages, and immense property and life saved from destruction. It is needless to say that it was suppressed with tremendous rigour, by the British troops, commanded by Sir Willoughby Cotton. One thing ought to be stated about this slave outbreak, that although over a hundred thousand were in revolt, not above a dozen persons were slain by the insurrectionists, while they themselves were butchered by the hundred. Mr. Waddell did good service during this dreadful crisis in Jamaica—soothing the passions of the negroes, and expostulating with the more sensible among them, so effectually that he contributed largely in preventing the hands on the estates of Cinnamon Hill and Cornwall from being swept into the black whirlpool of rebellion. When, therefore, the effects of the outbreak began to show themselves, these two estates presented a happy contrast to those whose hands had rebelled. On the faithful estates, the burdens were lightened; while on others, all privileges were withdrawn, and former oppressions redoubled and intensified. The overseers compelled the negroes to work not only long hours during the week, but also on a great portion of the Sabbath. So terribly severe did the poor negroes feel their oppressions, that life seemed hardly worth retaining, and religion became a sort of holy mockery. Of course, the missionaries did not escape calumny; this would have been a wonder, among a class of men who blindly imagined it to be their interest not to relax, but to rivet more closely the horrid bonds of the negro. But much good may be achieved under clouds of calumny; Mr. Waddell and his compeers, with the slow-sure miracle of Christianity in their right hands, wrought bravely on, so that gradually their spheres began to open and widen, and the seed they planted to exhibit signs of incipient vitality.

Mr. Waddell's experiences of the Myal and Obea superstitions, and their frantic manifestations in Jamaica in 1842, present rather unpleasant proofs of one of the earlier statements in these notes, as to the difficulty of planting Christianity in new regions; and of the danger to which it is there perpetually exposed of being invaded and pushed back, if not temporarily blotted out, by the dark surges of unextinguished demonologies. Like many other bad systems that profess to be good, the Myal and Obea delusions were directly antagonistic—the practitioners of the former declaring themselves to be angels of light, and denouncing their rivals in folly as angels of darkness; thus indicating a species of orthodoxy and heterodoxy even in the wildest superstition. It followed, therefore, that Myalism was set forth as a complete cure for physical and mental evils inflicted by the Obea. One of the most curious beliefs among the Myalists was, that the Myal man had power to catch the shadow, or soul, of a deceased person, which he held in bondage for necromantic purposes. The interesting game of shadow-hunting, or soul-snatching, had to be performed at the grave, in the dusk of the evening, when burials usually took place; or in the mystic moonlight, which seemed to be as favourable to the rites of Myalism as to the pale mysteries of Hecate. There is, however, little poetry in the Myal method of catching a disembodied soul. Among the mourners at the grave of the newly deceased, stands the African detective, waiting for the appearance of the errant spectre; which he does not always succeed in bagging on the spot, for the souls of dead negroes seem to think that, if they are to be caught at all, they may as well give the Myal-man a run for it. Of course, nobody but the shadow-hunter sees the shadow—he alone being endowed with the faculty and the vision diabolical. While, therefore, the black angel of light is making dreadful attempts to seize the restless spirit, which appears to go zig-zagging about like a modern squib, the spectators, without seeing anything but the evolutionary Myal-man, are wrought into a high state of excitement; somewhat from similar causes which work up a British audience in a theatre, when they witness the murder and knocking scenes in 'Macbeth,' in which the hell-made Thane of Cawdor is felt to be fearfully walking the shadowy and dagger-haunted way which passes through the throat of the silver-bearded King, on to the throne of Scotland. In both cases, the spectators are conscious of, though they cannot see, the performance of deeds which fills each particular hair with chill-rustling streams of horror. Sometimes the ghost is exceedingly kittle to catch, defying the most artistic feints of the sweating necromancer, and often dragging him into the wood, over dyke and ditch, in the delusive shape of a fire-fly or night-bird; though more frequently in the indefinite, undemonstrable something which supplies the basis for that fine latitudinarian breadth and variety of deduction so mysteriously fascinating to the negro imagination, and which is generally resolvable into nothing, or perhaps, in this case, into the potent suspicion of form. How often has an innocent broomstick stood for a portrait of the devil in the fear-clouded imaginations of belated travellers! When the Myal-man has caught his bit of ghostly game, he bottles it up, as he would pickles, for future use—not of course to be eaten, (who could eat pickled ghost?) yet, like pickles, to produce many a horrible nightmare. Such a neat delusion was naturally too serviceable to be confined to the shadows of the dead. It was therefore extended to the living—the belief being that one's soul could be stolen even before death. Mr. Waddell knew a girl of sixteen years of age, who was mightily afflicted with the idea that she had lost her shadow. Believing that some one had stolen it, she spent a good deal of moonlight in searching for it by the banks of rushy streams, or round the great cotton tree, and in other shadowy places where lost souls might be supposed to wander. As insane beliefs do not necessarily imply insanity, the girl's parents, who did not share her delusion, asserted that she was perfectly uncracked in the brain. By prayers and good words, Mr. Waddell tried to soothe and comfort the poor girl, but to no purpose—he naively adds, 'My faith perhaps being too weak to cast-out devils.'

Africa, it is needless to state, is the home of these, as of many other singular superstitions. Mr. Waddell found them at Calabar, where also it was believed that certain persons possessed power to call up departed spirits, to consult them on important business. But in such matters, as in everything else, the Africans were mere bunglers. It was left for enlightened Americans and British to elevate this sacred profession into almost the dignity of a science. Foreign and British spirits, called from the vasty deeps of death, are as plentiful as oysters in these times of steam-engines and telegraphs. A man may converse with the spirit of his great-grandmother for the low charge of a guinea! Nor let any man think that the science is not respectable, since it has found a Quaker for a historian. It was also believed in Calabar, not only that the soul or shadow could live separate from the body, but that the body could live apart from and without it, as in the case of the inferior animals that possess no discoverable souls. Strange even as this double-faced tenet may seem, it is more than paralleled in our super-excellently enlightened latitudes; for many of the human species among us, while professing to believe that all men possess immortal spirits, live themselves as if they hadn't a soul to be saved. But these are men who put on their beliefs as they put on their shirts—with sham breasts and paper collars, as the case may be. Another anecdote, illustrative of this soul-stirring superstition, refers to the chief of Old Town, Calabar. This old worthy had a sacred grove, near a spring of water, where his soul was securely kept; but as mission labourers were clearing the ground near this holy precinct, he complained that they went too near it, and troubled his soul. 'You always tell us,' said he to the missionary, 'that every man must mind his soul. Why do your men go troubling my soul at that place?' Alas! a worse calamity than that happened to the poor chieftain's soul. In his last illness, some unprincipled wretch had the audacity to bottle it up, so as to prevent it from ever returning to its original tenement. Of this flat burglary, the chief complained to the kings of Duke Town and Creek Town, whom he induced to issue a fiery proclamation, declaring that unless the person who had bottled the noble shadow would immediately uncork it, and set it free, he would die a death unknown in the calendars of men! But it was of no use. Either the thief's heart was hardened into a fossil; or the chief's spirit, being somewhat majestical, had been offended by the coars-manner in which it was sought to make it return to its inconsolable owner. A similar story is told of another chief; but the persons suspected of having spirited away his soul are called upon to come forward and maintain their innocence through the ordeal by poison. Not one of them, however, would quaff the cup of hemlock; and the poor chief wandered about his African solitudes, a sick-hearted and soul-less man.

Nobody who reads, with any degree of attention, Mr. Waddell's account of the outbreak of Myalism in 1842, can fail to perceive a singular resemblance between its manifestations and the grosser phases of the religious revivals which lately passed over Britain and Ireland. Being professedly a corrective of malignant Obea influences, Myalism wore a sort of benign, if not divine, aspect; and was therefore much favoured by certain classes of negroes, who naturally regarded the power which could expel and destroy the subtle evils of the enemy somewhat in the light of a saviour. Let the reader recall to memory the traditional effects of Scotch witchcraft, and he will have a pretty accurate conception of the evil effects of Obecraft. Its instruments were various; but by whatever means it chose to operate, the malign influence, whether placed in a person's house or garden, would find its subtle way into his body, and afflict him with wasting disease; or it would blast his property and twist his labours, so as to render misfortune inevitable. Whoever fell under this mysterious curse, though alive, felt as if he were already dead and damned; his health and worldly interests withered and fell from him, as the glory of the woods wither and disappear under the autumn rot; everything about him was wrested from the healthy course of nature; and at last the man himself dwindled, peak and pine, till he gave up the ghost. This is exactly Scotch witchcraft in an African skin—black, like its father the devil's. Mr. Waddell shrewdly supposes that these black revivals were superinduced upon the introduction of several thousand fresh Guinea negroes, who had been taken from captured slavers. These doctors of black divinity had come directly from their African colleges, with all their intellectual diseases about them; and not having been placed in any moral quarantine, they infected the old Jamaica negroes, in whose minds the ancient beliefs had begun to pale their ineffectual fires before the morning star of Christ.

As we said, the only antidote to the Obea poison was Myalism, whose mystic power was only known to initialed practitioners, or the dusky D.D.'s. A preliminary wave of the delusion broke over Spring estate, during the Christmas holidays of 1841. A number of people who were seized with it, went about in a condition of frenzy, crying that the estate was poisoned with Obea; that persons had even been killed by it, the cause of their death being discovered near their graves. Men and women thus affected, ran hither and thither as if deranged, stopping people at their work, and calling them to prayers, breaking into houses to dig out the Obea which the Devil had set in them, and in the name of God fighting with all who were supposed to be guilty of practising the infernal art. In 1842 the superstition burst out on Flower Hill estate. Blue Hole estate was also invaded by a company of Myalists, who came to cleanse it from its sins and miseries. They declared that they were sent by God to purge and purify the world; they had the Spirit, and were therefore Christians of an uncommonly high order. Most of these deluded fanatics, according to Mr. Waddell, 'were members of one of the principal missionary churches.' Indeed, Mr. Waddell gives the reader plainly to understand that the Myal manifestations of 1842, as also one which took place in 1860-61, appeared in connection with what he seems to consider a Baptist corruption of Christianity, which erred 'on the subject of the Holy Spirit's work in man's heart.' The system which thus erred was the American or native Baptist system, whose missionaries were foolish enough to regard Myal inspirations as due to the direct influence of the Holy Spirit. Whether this was so, may be judged from a study of the following little scene, in which Mr. Waddell attempted to exercise a corrective influence. It was an exhibition of Myal madness which occurred in one of the villages on a Sunday evening. A ring was formed by spectators, in the centre of which a number of females performed a mystic dance, sailing round the circle as on an orbit, and spinning at the same time as on an axis, gesticulating with outstretched arms, and staring with frenzied eyes. A low, monotonous tune was whistled or hummed by a sable orchestra, the dancers keeping time, as also the spectators, by hands and feet and the swaying of their bodies. The master of the ceremonies stood on one side, with arms cunningly folded, quietly watching, and directing the evolutions of the dancers. Mr. Waddell attempted in vain to break the current of this revelry; but the black president, on being appealed to, stopped the proceedings with the ease and speed of a magician. But the persuasions of the missionary only resulted in breaking up the wild assembly at this spot to be continued elsewhere. Similar and even worse scenes are recorded. Once, when Mr. Waddell was preaching in a negro house, he was interrupted by a number of Myalists present, one of whom strode wildly through the floor, bearing all the signs of an incipient attack of 'the Spirit.' As the delusion was singularly sympathetic, the preacher preserved the peace and order of his congregation by turning the fellow and his comrades out of the house. This is the very manner in which order was maintained in many a church during some of the wilder manifestations of the recent revival in this country. Strong intellect and strong hand act like wet blankets on all religious hysterics.

We must not omit one superb anecdote, illustrative of the manner in which the professors of Obea were treated by the Myalists. They had caught, on Content estate, a Guinea man, reputed to be a practitioner of Obea, whom they resolved to purge from his old sins. Laying him on his back, they baptised him by a new form, which had the peculiar merit of uniting all forms in its single self; for they poured eight pails of water over him—a sprinkling as good as a ducking. The poor man struggled mightily to escape during the operation, but he was held firmly down while the party, for a full hour, danced and sung round him to exorcise the Devil. At length they bade him rise, confess his sins, and call on the name of the Lord. Had the Myalists been dealt with in the same sensible manner, it would have been greatly to the benefit of their souls.

It is probable that the race of man will never be able to escape religious delusions of some kind—ghosts that haunt the twilight regions of the human understanding; yet if Christianity is to lap the world in its divine light, if it is to be planted in the new and maintained in the old regions of the earth, with the teaching of it must be coincident the teaching of all useful knowledge, the knowledge that is called secular, but which also ought to be called divine; since, although there are many streams, there is only one fountain of knowledge. We did not require to read Mr. Waddell's Jamaica experiences to find such a home-truth, but these experiences only furnish another proof of the accuracy of the declaration.

AT NIGHT, IN ILLNESS.

In my sick room
The angels come and go;
A pure, unearthly glow
Lights up its gloom:
Some of that shining throng
Come to keep vigil all night long.

And faces bright
Are crowding round my bed—
The peaceful, blessed dead
Array'd in light—
Friends loved in years past o'er,
Come back to smile on me once more.

Flowers near me lie,
Which dear ones brought to-day;
I watch them fade away,
And gently die;—
Which shall be first to fall
He only knows who knoweth all.

To me, sometimes,
Mysterious whispers come:
Voices which call me home—
Like distant chimes
Heard when, all wanderings past,
One nears the heart's true rest at last.

And more than this—
Songs in the night I gain:
Full many an angel-strain
Of holy bliss;—
Just to prepare my ear
For melodies more sweet and clear.

I would not stay
For treasures once so dear.
Now things seem very near Once far away.
I feel the immortal wreath
Fall on my brow. And this is death!

HARRY WHITEFORD'S COURTSHIP.

CHAPTER I.

BEFORE a blazing fire, in a comfortable room of a house in the outskirts of the busy manufacturing and shipping city of G—, sat a young man, of about twenty-five years of age, apparently in deep thought; after sitting thus some time, he lifted his head, and in doing so disclosed a rather handsome and intellectual face, and soliloquised, 'Well, I think I shall accept it;' and I daresay the reader, after hearing what he had decided on accepting, will be of opinion that he had arrived at a very natural and sound conclusion.

Harry Whiteford, the hero of our story, was head-clerk in the office of a shipping firm, doing a considerable business in the aforementioned city of G—, and had that day been offered a junior partnership, on the retirement of the senior member from taking an active part in conducting the business of the firm. He was in receipt of £250 a-year for his services as clerk; but considered that, taking into account the business done by, and the prospects of, the firm, he did right in accepting the share offered to him, although it was small.

Just as he had uttered the above-mentioned words, the door of the room was opened, and Mrs. Thomson—in whose house he had his apartments—came in and said, 'If you please, sir, the young lady has called about the shirts.'

'Show her in, please, Mrs. Thomson,' said Harry; and at the same time said to himself, 'By Jove! I did not know that young ladies were in the habit of making shirts!'

In a short time Mrs. Thomson again made her appearance, ushering in a beautiful girl, apparently about nineteen or twenty years of age, whom our hero at the first glance—although she was very plainly dressed in mourning—recognised as a lady. He made her a most profound bow, handed her a chair, and conveyed to her the gratifying intelligence that the night was rather cold. We shall pass over the business part of the visit, which the visitor and Mrs. Thomson had all in their own hands, merely remarking that our hero—who was dreadfully particular, and intended to give 'no end' of directions—forgot all the instructions he intended to give; tried to pass some miserable joke about his bachelor condition, on giving his verdict in favour of studs, when some question of buttons versus those useful articles was started; and thought himself deeply wronged, when his wrist was wanted for measurement, that Mrs. Thomson should perform that very simple affair, notwithstanding that he shoved his hand out in a hesitating manner towards the young lady.

'I wonder whether I ought to have offered to go home with her?' said our friend to himself, after the departure of his fair visitor—at the same time walking to the window, and gazing out at the gathering darkness. 'I never before saw such a beautiful girl; I wonder how on earth she ever came to be a sempstress! I expect Mrs. Thomson knows, as she is generally pretty well-up in her neighbours' affairs. I will draw her a trifle when she brings in tea.'

Harry, after settling his motions satisfactorily, resumed his seat and ruminations—although, I fear, the latter were not on the same subject as they had been before the advent of the fair sempstress—till the bringing in of his tea, when he commenced to extract the required information from Mrs. Thomson, who only wanted a hint to launch into a full, true, and particular account of Miss Clara Hartley's history, commencing with the marriage of her parents, prefixed with a slight sketch of the lives of her grand-parents, and concluding with a history of the circumstances which had led to Mrs. Thomson's securing her services for the efficient making up of our hero's linen. In substance, it was the old, old story. Miss Hartley's father had been a reputed wealthy and prosperous merchant; but on his death (which occurred about a year before the commencement of our story) it was found that his effects would not pay his creditors. His furniture and house were sold, and our heroine and her brother, who was at that time about thirteen or fourteen years of age, were turned out on the world. The usual fair-weather friends turned their backs; but, thank God! the world is not all barrenness. Clara Hartley and her brother, Arthur, found some kind Samaritans, who received the bereaved orphans into their house till the bitterness of their grief was over, and till Clara's plans for the future were laid. Clara might have got an appointment to go out as a governess, but she could not think of separating herself from Arthur; and thus we find the delicately nurtured merchant's daughter reduced to the necessity of taking in sewing to earn bread for herself and brother. This touching story roused all Harry's romantic feelings; and the thought of the devoted sister labouring thus, raised a feeling of respect and admiration which only wanted a little encouragement and better knowledge of its object, to spread speedily into a broad flame of love. His tea lay untasted on the table; and for a considerable time he walked up and down the room. When he sat down he had determined to make inquiries into the truth of what Mrs. Thomson had told him—not that he doubted the worthy Mrs. T.; but she, good woman, was just rather apt to give reins to her imagination,—and if he found it true, 'By George!' said Harry aloud; 'I have no one but myself to please, and if the girl will have me, I'll marry her.' Having come to this highly honourable, although rather sudden, determination, he relapsed into the comforts of his arm-chair, and gave up his thoughts to the devising of a plan to carry out his intentions.

As is customary in sketches of this description, I will not here reveal the particulars of the afore-mentioned plan or plot, but not for the reason generally assigned, viz. that it will become quite clear, and be worked out during the progress of the story. The plan Harry Whiteford laid has nothing whatever to do with the subsequent progress of our tale.

Harry, having gone over the pros and cons of his plan, dropped into a sleep, during which he had the following dream, which confirmed him in his intentions; and on awaking, he, in the very romantic frame of mind he was then in committed the following to paper:—

HARRY'S DREAM.

'My dream seemed to open like a scene in a theatre; and I found myself in a rifle-pit, with my rifle in hand. Away across a valley, which stretched out at my feet, was a beleaguered city, on which my eyes were fixed. While I continued to gaze, a maiden of wondrous beauty left the walls of the city, and advanced slowly into the valley. With rifle in hand, I breathlessly watched her coming steadily towards the place in which I was concealed. Having come within range of my gun, she stopped, drew a flower from her breast, and elevated it in her right hand, as if to encourage me to shoot at it. Instinctively, I levelled my rifle, fired, and saw the flower topple over, and then again resume its upright position. Leaving my rifle in the pit, I advanced towards the mysterious maiden, who still, statue-like, maintained her position. Having reached her, I took from the unresisting hand the flower which it still held aloft, and placed it in my breast. I then took her right hand in mine, and gazed into the liquid depths of her eyes. Still she spoke not. Unconsciously my tongue formed, and my lips uttered, the following words:—"I will come for you when the war is over." But while I yet spake, love, like a bubbling spring, welled up in my heart. I encircled her with my arm, and pressed my lips to hers in one long delicious kiss. We then turned, and, with arms entwined, wended our way to my place of concealment. But while we were yet some distance from it, I awoke. The beautiful vision had left my side; but the nectar of that kiss was still on my lips, and my frame still trembled with the delicious tremor of that embrace.'

CHAPTER II.

Having, rather ungallantly (while following the meditations of our hero), allowed the heroine of our sketch to go home alone, we shall now take the liberty of following her. Before going further in this history, I will explain the circumstances in which Clara Hartley was now placed. I do not wish the reader to understand that she was drinking the very dregs of bitter poverty, which is too often felt by sempstresses; or demonstrating, in her daily life, that it was possible to live on two shillings a-week, like the Lancashire mill-girl, who, as I the other day read in All the Year Round, received a prize for giving the best list of the very few and very common articles of food, purchasable for one shilling and sixpence, on which the lamp of life could be fed for seven days; and sixpence for lodging added, made up the two shillings. No. Clara Hartley was much better off than this. Thanks to a watchful Providence and some kind friends, she was able to pay for a modest lodging, and to purchase frugal but wholesome fare for herself and brother. The change, God knows! must have been great to one brought up as she had been. But Clara had a stout heart. And when adversity came, she bent her proud head to the blast; and, hoping for better times, braved the storm as best she could. Her principal hope for the future was placed in her fair-haired brother, to whom she was, and ever had been, the most devoted of sisters, lavishing on him all the affection of her loving heart. Perhaps, too, at times, thoughts of a lover would steal into her mind, as she sat sewing by the fire; and visions of some gallant gentleman at her feet would mingle with the flashings of the swift needle through the weary, weary work.

I think I see her now, as she sits working, and smilingly listening to Arthur, as he builds his castles in the air, and describes them for her benefit. 'What will he not do when he is a man! His sister will no more need to toil with the needle, for he will make her mistress of as fine a house as that in which they lived before good kind papa died.'

When Clara entered the door of her apartments, her brother came forward to meet her. As she stooped to kiss him, she noticed a shade of trouble on his handsome brow, and said, 'Well, Arthur, what is the matter?'

'Nothing, Clara; only I was down at Smith & Jones', the cotton-brokers, and they say the situation which Mr. Robinson told you of is filled up, so that chance is gone.'

'Never mind, Arthur; perhaps we shall hear of something else in a day or two.'

'Did you get the work you went for, Clara?' said Arthur, after a short pause.

'Yes.'

'Who is it from?'

'It is some shirts Mrs. Thomson got for me, to make for a gentleman who lodges in her house.'

'That is Mr. Whiteford. He is head-clerk in Keel, Wales, & Co.'s. Tom Jenkins, who is in their office, told me that there would be a vacancy with them soon. Perhaps if you got some one to speak to him he might give the situation to me.'

'Well, Arthur! come and let us take tea now, and we shall see about that to-morrow,' said Clara, who, during the above conversation, had been busily engaged preparing their evening meal.

The evident surprise betrayed by our hero at Clara's appearance, and his frequent glances of admiration, had not escaped her notice; and she felt grateful for, and perhaps a little flattered by, the gentlemanly manner in which he had acted during his short visit; so different, I am sorry to say, from the haughty looks and patronising airs of some of her customers, who, in past days, were very glad to number her among their acquaintances. She was therefore not a little perturbed, when her brother mentioned the expected vacancy in the office in which Harry was clerk, and proposed that she should endeavour to secure the situation for him, as she had formerly unsuccessfully endeavoured to secure a situation in other quarters several times. Something told her that if she could muster courage to go and prefer her request to Mr. Whiteford, she would not likely meet with a refusal, but to 'screw her courage to the sticking-place' would be difficult, she felt, for one of her timid and retiring disposition. Had Harry been an old graybeard it would not have been so difficult. She, however, at the same time felt that it was her duty to do her utmost to secure some situation for her brother, not only that his small earnings might add something to their slender funds, but Clara dreaded his making companions among the rude boys who lived in the neighbourhood in which her poverty compelled her to dwell. These and other cares weighed heavily on Clara;—but, before retiring to rest, she made up her mind to wait on Mr. Whiteford the ensuing day, and ask of him this situation for her brother.

CHAPTER III.

The night after the occurrence of the events narrated in the previous chapters, Harry Whiteford was seated in his room, and was revolving in his mind the plan he had laid for carrying out his designs on the hand of Miss Clara Hartley—which plot, I regret to state, did not look nearly so feasible as it had done on the previous evening—when Mrs. Thomson startled him by opening the door, and announcing that Miss Hartley had called, and wished to see him. He, however, managed to tell Mrs. Thomson to show Miss Hartley into the room; and when that lady made her appearance, he handed her a chair, and requested to know to what circumstance he owed the honour of Miss Hartley's visit.

'I took the liberty of calling on you, Mr. Whiteford, about a situation which I have heard will soon be vacant in your office,' said Clara, a little nervously.

'Well, yes, Miss Hartley, we have a vacancy in the office just now,' replied Harry, who was now made quite himself again by the business air the interview was assuming. 'Is there any way in which I can serve you regarding it?'

'Yes, Mr. Whiteford; I would feel very much obliged if you could give it to my brother, who has for some time been looking for a situation.'

'I am very glad that you called to-night about this, Miss Hartley, as I was just within an ace of giving it to a son of Mr. Chipps, whose father called on me to-day; and I daresay it would have been irrevocably gone, had he not brought his lubberly-looking lout of a son with him; and it might be filled up to-morrow; however, to guard against that, I now promise to give your brother the situation.'

'I thank you very much, Mr. Whiteford. But suppose he should also be a "lubberly-looking lout?"' said Clara, who saw where Harry had committed himself, and could not resist making this interrogatory reply.

'I have no fear of that, Miss Hartley. His sister is guarantee enough against that,' replied Harry, coming boldly out of the difficulty, and, at the same time, paying a compliment. 'But I hear it has commenced raining,' he added, going to the window (against which the rain was pattering) and looking out; 'and if you will accept of my escort, I will accompany you home, and we can there settle the whole affair in a few minutes. And as we shall want him at the office as soon as you can conveniently let him come, the sooner it is settled the better.'

'I am indeed very much obliged, Mr. Whiteford, for your kindness. There will be no difficulty about Arthur's coming as soon as you wish him; but I fear it is putting you to too much trouble to accompany me home this wet night.'

'It is no trouble I assure you, Miss Hartley, but a pleasure.'

No further parley taking place, our hero and heroine prepared to go; and I grieve to have to state that the former, while looking for his umbrella, speculated on the chances of Miss Hartley's having come without one, and, when they had reached the hall door, vigorously opposed Mrs. Thomson's proposal to lend one to Miss Hartley, when it was found out that she had left home without that very necessary article, alleging that his umbrella would do very well for both. And I have also to place on record, that when they had proceeded a short distance, Harry knocked his foot against some projection which had the effect of nearly pitching him on his nose. He, however, muttering something about the wretched state of the footpath, took advantage of this accident, and tendered the support of his arm to Clara; and she, undeterred by such a specimen of his guiding powers, accepted the proffered aid.

A quarter of an hour's walk brought them to Clara's home, the door of which was opened while Harry was scrambling for bell or knocker; and the embryo merchant shouted, before seeing him—'Well, Clara, did you get it?'

'Yes, Arthur, I have; for which you have to thank this gentleman,' said Clara, quietly indicating Harry, of which there was little need, as Arthur had scarcely his words out before he noticed him, and shrunk back rather abashed. Harry, of course, immediately disclaimed all thanks.

Harry, on getting inside and seated, felt that it behooved him to proceed immediately to business, which he did by asking Arthur a few questions, and explaining to him his future duties, and finally concluded with the offer of a salary (small, but more than either sister or brother expected it would be), which was accepted with thanks; and I hope Harry escaped censure from his senior partners next day for making the offer he did.

This business satisfactorily concluded, our hero managed to prolong the interview by talking on other subjects, till Clara asked him to partake of some tea with herself and Arthur, an invitation which he willingly accepted. Thereafter, he extended his visit for a couple of hours, and then marched home through the rain in such a frame of mind that he quite forgot to open his umbrella—indeed, he was going away without it, when he was reminded of it by Clara,—and arrived at worthy Mrs. Thomson's in a very wet state.

CHAPTER IV.

I have never had it made clear to me that Harry Whiteford had any reason, or even a valid excuse, for calling on Miss Hartley about a week subsequently to the occurrence of the events narrated in the previous chapter. I am inclined, however, to think that he trumped up some advice to give to Clara about Arthur, which, however, deceived no one, as Clara must have been very blind indeed if she had not ere this been cognisant of the attraction which drew Mr. Whiteford to her humble home.

Harry, however, manfully determining to trust no more to chance, or to making visits which possibly might be disagreeable, asked Miss Hartley's permission to visit her occasionally as a friend; and had his mind set at rest by the assurance that she and Arthur would be very happy to see him when he had leisure to honour them with a visit.

I have not here endeavoured to analyse Clara's feelings; but I think that Harry's manly and honourable bearing, combined with his very evident admiration of herself, and her gratitude to him for so freely giving the situation to Arthur at her request, had made some impression on Clara's heart; and it is not to be wondered that, about a month after their first meeting, when Harry found a favourable opportunity of revealing his love to her, she should have returned a not unfavourable answer. Harry frankly told her that when he first saw he admired her very much, and that the 'story of her life' had deepened that impression; that, under other circumstances, he would not have mentioned his love at so early a stage in their acquaintance, but he could not bear to see one he loved toiling so much for her daily bread, as she was forced to do; and, when Clara had given him assurance that his love was reciprocated, he, on the same grounds, pressed her to name an early date for their marriage; and concluded with the usual lovers' vows—vowed as lovers only can.

A few weeks subsequently, Clara and Harry were quietly married, and set out on a short marriage tour, taking Arthur (who had been removed from the office, and was going back to school) with them. When they returned, it was to settle down in a snug villa in the suburbs of G—. Passing which villa the other day, I saw my old friend Harry at the window, dandling something in long white raiment, which I believe to be a baby. And I think I may here safely state that in all the flourishing city of G—, there is not a happier couple than Clara and Harry Whiteford. M.

ELLEN AND THE VICAR.

THE Vicar, with a wonder open-eyed,
Regarded Ellen, till a tuneful flow
Moan'd to the murmur of the brook below.
'Gone! gone! An order came at eventide,
And Arthur went on board. I dare not chide
The way of duty, though it lead to woe;
But what could be their motive? let me know.'
The Vicar, poring on the brook, replied—
'We read not yonder water; nor the mind,
However shallow, seldom understood
The motive, Ellen, will remain unknown.
If Love be welcome, though he wander blid,
Let intuition go, and good be good!
I am for leaving the fond child alone.'

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'Is this a prologue?'—Shakspeare.

'WHAT a genius I must have had when I wrote that!' Such was the exclamation of Swift when reading, in the later years of his life, some portion of his 'Tale of a Tub.' The editor fears that Gabriel Gray is almost as great an egotist as the cynical and sarcastic Dean. Gabriel has been looking over these papers of his—written, for the most part, during the year of grace 1860—and he makes no secret of his belief that worse matter has occupied many shelves, in bindings more or less expensive.

Hence their publication in the present form. But the editor is much less confident. He describes in them more faults than it would be polite or politic to tell. The truth is that Gabriel—who is something of a bold thinker, but a good deal more of an insane visionary—has moved in a narrow sphere. Accordingly, he is apt to view everything and everybody under the strong colouring of his own peculiar position and circumstances. The editor deprecates his occasional vehemence. He flashes, gesticulates, and stamps. It is difficult to restrain him from oaths. 'The world,' he says, 'is filled with books, pared into shape like Dutch shrubbery—thoughts without free growth—language without natural exuberance—books of safe mediocrity, that compass nothing, because venturing nothing—that seem as if written, not by men, but by abstractions of men.' There is nothing which he is so constantly anxious to avoid as respectable dullness. He would rather be blamed for extravagance. Of criticism fairly roused he does not, indeed, stand in any particular awe. Its assaults, he fancies, he could bear, but he dreads its silence or its sneers. In other words, martyrdom has fewer terrors for him than neglect. Were he a soldier he would prefer wounds to disease—a death of glory in battle to a tranquil exit in hospital.

One of Mr. Gray's eccentric opinions is this—that a man, in order to obtain a hearing when such thousands are shouting, must be a contemner of the social decourms, etiquettes, and reserves—a simple, unsophisticated, fearless man, in short—speaking, out of the fulness of his heart, of his own business, friendships, affections, and distresses, directly to the hearts of others. He quotes Robert Burns as such a man, and attributes half his fame to his audacity of self-revelation. How he pities and despises the journalist whom, with some exaggeration, he describes as laboriously penning 'leaders' on questions in which he has no interest, when all the while some private wrong or sorrow is fevering his brain or breaking his heart! For his own part, he scorns to put his feelings in masquerade. He will be himself or nobody. On the fore-front of his lucubrations he hangs up his name for a sign. To hear him talk, one would suppose that he regarded an intense egotism as, in some sense, a synonym for genius. When he is merry, he would make laughter circulate to the ends of the earth; when he is sorrowful, he would exact tribute of tears from the universe.

All this may serve to explain why the domestic narrative of Gabriel Gray breaks through, and almost drowns, or wholly drowns in the end, his comments on passing events. It is obvious that his plan at starting was to treat of subjects of public interest as they arose; but his theory as to the best mode of prosecuting that plan has proved fatal to it. Hence an apparent ultimate failure in carrying out his idea. Had the world always gone well with him, he might have looked cheerfully on the world, and indited essays on abstract topics without caring to make his domestic affairs conspicuous. The Fates having proved adverse, his personal trials have overmastered his speculative dreams, and he has yielded to the promptings of whatever at the moment happened to be uppermost in his heart.

It ought to be quite unnecessary to remark, in this place, that all the names and characters introduced by Mr. Gray, except such as may be complimented, are utterly fictitious. True, he is a good hater. In this respect he would have pleased Dr. Johnson himself. But he is not a literary bravo. He would not stab an enemy, far less a friend. The only revenge which he seeks, when actuated by resentment against even a class, is to touch the conscience—to invoke the blush that is as a dawn of virtue on the benighted countenance—to elicit the tears that are as sap at the root of every good resolution—and to make his personal experiences and sufferings subservient to beneficent ends.

Respecting other matters on which the reader may desire to be informed, Mr. Gray will be found sufficiently communicative. He is non-acretive to a degree—perhaps even garrulous to a fault. Who he is, how he has laboured, and what he has undergone and achieved, he will immediately, or at least in due time, make known. He waits but the rising of the curtain to begin. Exit, accordingly, the writer of these prefatory sentences; and enter the venerable monologist himself—a gentleman well assured of his own competency to take full possession of the stage.

CHAPTER I.

'Have you got such a thing as tenpence about you?'

—Raising the Wind.

Hail to you, my masters! I have a mind to become famous. My cronic, Mathew Waddel—with whom I have taken an occasional tumbler any time these forty years—has persuaded me that I have parts. Of a modest truth, perhaps no one else—not even my wife Jean, whom the good angels protect!—holds me in the like reverence. But under its palatial terraces, and throughout its shady obscure places, ours is a dull and humbugging world, my masters! and honest Mathew is about the only man going in whose company I have hitherto cared to shine.

So Mathew—with the white head and eye-brows of him crowning his radiant face, like a fleece of snow sloping over the eaves of a house gleaming and tremulous with Christmas festivity—has been my solitary audience any time these forty years. He and I have formed a quorum. I have taken the chair of him a thousand times. How, indeed, could I ever think him too few? When I have been moved to speak with emphasis, has he not broken into 'hear, hears!' like a multitude? Have I not heard him, when my fancy has tumbled on the grass, and thrown handfuls of buttercups skyward, get up 'roars of laughter' astonishing for a single voice? Nay, have I not seen him, the moment I have struck the minor keys of humanity, squeeze out from his benevolent eyes moisture enough to dilute this ink of mine into undecipherable pathos? At our monster demonstrations, overflowing with two, he has carried my motions unanimously. I have been elevated to all fanciful posts by his universal suffrage. Knowing me well, he thinks I ought to be known more widely. But, like a discreet lover, I have been satisfied with my one admirer. I have enjoyed a concentrated reputation. Were it spread to the air, I have feared that, like steam, it might lose in force what it gained in noise. Some philosopher has said that any man who can write a page, could write another page, a third also, and so a whole volume. From this I have drawn a pretty parallel. Having become greatly renowned to one individual Mathew, why not to a world of multiplied Mathews? But ay me! and lack-a-day! my masters! I doubt whether the angels could find any such world, were they to search the immeasurable stellar spaces! What a wealth of affection some unfortunate anonymous woman, maid or matron, has missed, from good Mathew Waddel's paradoxical determination of bachelorhood!

We have grown gray together—Mathew and I; and during all this whitening process—Time's toileting mayhap to make us more fair for heaven—my venerable friend has been prompting me, not so much by set speeches as by ejaculations pointed like rowels, to climb all sorts of ladders, mount all sorts of steepes, and take my stand on all sorts of world's summits. Whenever I have faltered, he has propped me up like an alpenstock. He has taunted me with the spectacle of pigmies strutting, swelling, puffing, striving, and carrying off the social prizes—while the giants slumbered! Gabriel Gray a giant!—old Gabriel! O ye close-wrapping fogs! that have made my mighty stature invisible for these forty years, save to two loving eyes! 'The world,' I have heard Mathew say, 'is governed by sheer conceit.' Beautiful old soul! I fear he is morbid on the subject of my capacity to achieve some great public success. A long, long time has passed since my grandmother (God rest her!) called me her 'Wee Gabriel,' and human intellect, or human high gift of achievement, is not like the aloe that takes a hundred years to flower. Yet Mathew Waddel—a man of discrimination, with those twin stars in his head, nightly twinkling at me for forty years good—believes, with the strength of an indelible creed, that I was born to some loftier throne than that poor, inky, three-legged stool that wots not of any special burden. On this theme I have even heard him wax eloquent, and call me ignominious names of rage, fired with luminous compliment, in order to goad me to a career of impudence and victory. What a climax of rhetoric burned in his words when I reflected that listening was his forte! Except on great occasion, he had quite a brilliant capacity for being entertained. Never was any man so little of a bore. The goldenest scrolls of biography emblazoned no equal genius for silence. How overmastering, then, must the impulse have been that loosened such delicious thunder from his tongue!

I have rarely seen Mathew in a state of glee so superb as when I announced to him, a few evenings ago, that I intended to blaze into print. 'Rockets, Roman candles, and incomparable dazzling pyrotechnics!' he exclaimed. His snowy eyebrows leaped with congratulation. I half expected to see them thaw, and glisten in beads of ecstasy on his time-tanned cheeks. He made no secret of taking all the credit to himself. I am no honest bookkeeper if he did not assume airs, like Captain Sutter at his saw-mill, big with the secret of his Californian mines. Like a wealthy patron who had excavated a heaven-born artist from the toughly-stubborn social concrete, he appeared to have delightful glimmerings of a kind of joint immortality. When I should drive four-in-hand, he declared he would mount the rumble, and cry 'Heigh-ho, tantivy!' with all his lungs. Ah! my masters! it is well for me that I am old, and imperturbable of pulse, and not apt to be borne out of myself by the flattery of such partial lips! Mathew Waddel judges of me, and has done so these forty years and upwards, by what he calls my 'flashes of wit,' my 'bursts of eloquence,' and my 'touches of pathos,' but in dear Jean—a woman with no discoverable weakness for book-lore, but monstrously accomplished in baby-clothes and culinary economics—I am furnished with an antidote to all subtle poison of self-sufficiency. Jean is blessed with only a fine commercial eye for genius. Of that ethereal something she demands palpable emblems. She could see it in a cheval mirror for a birth-day gift, though her figure is a trifle less jump than in our salad days. Its step would be recognisable to her delicate ear on the softest Turkey carpet for our parlour. The rustle of a new silk gown would make her proudly conscious that it surrounded her. She could feel it at her bosom in the shape of a golden brooch. It might lead her childlike by the wrist with a bracelet of precious stones. But she has read what I have thus far indited, and thinks it 'haivers;' so that, having a respect for her plain, practical judgment, I keep my expectations of public applause, honour, and emolument secretly moderate, even while Mathew Waddel squeezes unspoken panegyric, like a gold guinea into my palm, and snuffles out his kindly-encouraging 'Go on.'

Not for kings' crowns would I disparage the good offices of my dear particular chum. I am too poor to risk the bankruptcy of a companionship so priceless as his; least of all should I think to quarrel with him at a crisis in my exchequer when I fear to need him most. Nevertheless, I feel it to be due to my own sincerity to say, that not alone for vain glory—which for above forty years has been no more valued by me than a mossed epitaph—have I collected resolution to burst my comfortable shell. For good a week past, I have felt my slender resources—or, to speak with strict accuracy, my no resources—menaced by a high officer of state. It is impossible not to entertain a lofty respect for the man who could speak the bulk of six Presbyterian sermons, without setting the House of Commons asleep. Mathew Waddel talks trash and nonsense, when he says that I could have performed the same feat, with equal brilliancy and more wit, had I possessed a tithe of Gladstone's opportunities and training. Gladstone is a Christian gentleman at heart; and I dare back him for blankets, coals, and such touching charities, against any of his order. My quarrel is not with Gladstone the man, but with Gladstone the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For seven dreary nights has that head inquisitor sat upon me like a nightmare. I have fancied him a vampire, with designs to suck my blood. After counting my few household gods, I have nightly resigned myself to a sleep which has been nothing but a tragedy of dreams. Ugly, uncourteous miseries, and 'Last Notices' like the ultimatums of kings when their armies are on the march, have snowed up my doors and windows, until only Jean's merciful jogs and pinches have saved me from being buried alive. Again has sleep come, bringing with it legion upon legion of down-browed ruffians, to pound and seize my poor shrinking mahoganies, dim with their old glory-stains; and with no hope, save that of the noise of crashing crockery, to release me from an agony of struggle. Mine is a true invasion-panic; and as my master's son, Joe M'Corkindale—who sits facing me at the comfortable side of my double desk—has taken up his rifle, so I, Gabriel Gray, have taken up my pen—for defence.'

What, then! do I behold no beauty in the famous Gladstonian budget? From some altitudes I might; but, situated as I am, its tenpenny income-tax blinds me. My peerless Jean, who is ambitious of good society, and who actually knows the M'Grubbers, the great west-end people, detests the word clerk, in spite of repeated attempts, on my part, to enlighten her as to its scholarly signification. Out of respect, then, for her aristocratic bias, I call myself cashier to the great house of M'Corkindale & Co. In that high and responsible office—which good Mathew Waddel thinks me so unfitted, from a lack of commonplace faculties, to adorn—my salary is £200 per annum. This must be a prodigious sum, since Gladstone the magnificent has thought it worth while to fasten a burglarious eye upon it. Yet somehow or other I find myself hardly financier enough, with all my experience, to make it stretch over the veritable necessities of my household. Jean, whose darning and patching are miracles of thrift, is a stout person, though indifferently elongated, and requires, say £30 of it for her special sustenance. Then Heaven has blessed me with five precious daughters, for whom £20 a-piece is surely a moderate calculation. My house rent, and I searched the city for cheapness, is other £20—leaving, after these deductions, but a poor £50 for myself—a mere workman's wage, out of which I am expected to pay assessed taxes, local rates, church seats, doctors' fees, gas, coal, blacking, hair-pins, the washerwoman, the Christmas waits, and sundries that would take all my fingers twice multiplied to count! Last summer, my second darling, Barbara, was recommended sea-bathing; but, after a financial study of the map of the world, I found Gourock about as far off as Brighton, Nice, or Hong-Kong. Was not the poor sempstress urgent, the baker six weeks behind, and the dairywoman threatening to cut off our milk? Were my £200 my own, I would be as rich as Croesus, or as Baron Rothschild, or even as Mathew Waddel, with his £150 a-year all to himself; but fortunately, thank God! I have the unselfish privilege of distributing my substance among seven humans, each with a back to clothe, a stomach to digest, a mind to educate, and a mouth to clamour. In my case, the two ends which I am continually trying to make meet are like the two ends of a stick. Not many days ago I borrowed £5 of Mathew to appease an importunate tailor; and it is in these circumstances of chilblained misery and intolerable debt that I am to be menaced with a demand from Government for the trifle of £8:6s.8d. in consideration of my superfluous means!

I know those in business who contrive to get off easy in all cases of income-tax; but old M'Corkindale is prominent at the plate on Sundays, and will declare my salary to a farthing—reserving his white little dishonesties for his own personal protection and profit.

'Ah! don't suffer yourself to get soured with the world,' insinuates my worthy old friend Mathew. 'Contemplate the budget on its sunny side! Consider how many taxes are to be remitted!'

'True, true, my philosopher! I am a purblind ass, and have miscalculated the coming millennium. When I have been mulcted of the £8:6s.8d. which I haven't got, I shall then be enabled to drink cheap claret, wear French kids at 10s. a dozen, read emancipated penny newspapers—with all the Town Council reports, accidents, murders, suicides, and divorces, which make up the sum of our modern British classics; and so adieu, my masters! that I may have one peaceful sleep in this fool's paradise!

THE PINCH OF SNUFF.

At the time of the French Revolution, the town of Coblenz had become the refuge of the members of the royal family and of the French nobility. Though the political aspect of events had assumed the darkest and gravest of colours, nothing could deprive the émigrés of their light-hearted gaiety. The position of most of them was precarious—in some cases, many were already reduced to poverty; yet all preserved the wit and mirth so deservedly looked upon as one of the chief characteristics of their class. The pleasures of the capital and also its vices were transported to the little Rhenish Court; and the excitement of gambling (the game played in public being roulette) attracted numbers of Germans and other strangers by its fatal influence.

Among the very small number of gentlemen who escaped contamination, one merits particular mention. The Chevalier de Mirencourt, in submitting to the necessity of immediate exile from his country, accepted at same time all the painful consequences. He placed the small sum he had been able to secure in the hands of a respectable banker worthy of his confidence; on that, along with a little he gained by giving lessons in French, he managed to live free from debt.

The malicious decried this sensible conduct. 'He was mean,' 'he was a miser,' but when it was seen that out of his very small income the Chevalier aided those more necessitous than himself, cette followed mockery; and he became, for the most thoughtless, a model worthy of imitation. De Mirencourt merited this admiration. In prosperity as in adversity his character had been tested; the same sympathy for the deserving, the same pity for the unfortunate, the same equity in his judgment of men and of things. In pursuance of his wise system of economy, the Chevalier lived in cheap lodgings in the outskirts of the town. A young man had recently come to lodge in the same house; he was a Frankfort merchant, who, with his mother and an only sister, had been reduced to poverty by a fire which had consumed their warehouse and all their goods. He had come to Coblenz to recover several debts due to them by some wealthy people there; but, without money or influence, he either wanted the necessary hardihood, or had not sufficient ability, to enforce payment from his debtors; some denied, some put him off—till the young man found himself penniless in a strange town. The Chevalier had shown a friendly interest in young Cardan. In meeting on the stair, he seldom passed without asking kindly how his affairs were getting on.

One day, returning from giving his lessons, he found young Cardan at the door of his lodgings with the postman, who held a letter in his hand. The young man regarded it with humid eyes, but did not take it; the postman seemed undecided.

The Chevalier addressed Cardan, by name, in a more than usually kind manner, as if soliciting an explanation of the trouble he appeared to be in. Cardan did not seem to understand his meaning, but the letter-carrier did. 'If this gentleman is an acquaintance, he will perhaps help in this difficulty.'

'What is it?' asked the Chevalier.

'A trifle, sir,' continued the postman; 'this letter is for this gentleman, from Frankfort; the postage is eight sous; but he has not the money on him at present.'

'Why did you not mention it?' said the kind Frenchman, his hand in his pocket.

Cardan stopped him with a gesture. 'No,' he said, with a broken voice; 'I have not this sum on me or anywhere. I shall not be able to repay you, sir.'

'Of course not, since I owe it you,' said De Mirencourt, in a natural voice. 'Take it, sir; it must be from your mother or sister.'

Cardan had scarcely power to thank him. He opened the letter and read it rapidly; as he read, his colour changed to an extreme paleness, he uttered an exclamation.

'You have bad news, I fear?'

'Only this misfortune to fill the cup of our misery!' cried the unfortunate, striking his forehead in his despair.

'What is it? What do they say?'

'The few creditors we had have seized everything; they have sold all off; and my mother and sister are homeless and without bread. They call me to come to them to aid them—I who could not even pay the postage of this letter—I who am also homeless and penniless!'

The Chevalier took Cardan to his room, where he endeavoured to calm his despair, and obtained a more full account of the losses that had reduced his family to beggary. De Mirencourt was too poor himself to replace the thousand thalers that the Cardans had lost, and that would re-establish them in their former position; but he decided at once on asking the assistance of the opulent—the more readily that he was asking for others, and that refusal, however painful, could not be humiliating.

He spoke kindly to the poor young man, encouraged him to look forward with hope, as he would try to interest others more able than himself in his fallen fortunes; and took the road to the chateau of the Vicomte de Rouci—an open-handed, warm-hearted prodigal, who gave readily when he had it to give. De Mirencourt knew that he was now in funds, and hurried to appeal to his generosity before the gambling-table had engulfed all.

The Vicomte was already at the roulette-table, and De Mirencourt hastened after him to that favourite resort.

On seeing the Chevalier, De Rouci exclaimed, 'Heaven forgive me! but what can bring Cato to the infernal regions?'

'I was looking for you.'

'Well, I shall be with you immediately; I have only two or three thousand francs to lose,' cried De Rouci, gaily.

'Save a few for me,' whispered the Chevalier.

'My dear Chevalier! take what you want,' cried

De Rouci, pushing the heap of gold towards his friend. 'Gently, gently,' cried a stout German; 'we must follow our vein of good luck.'

'Ah! true; I forgot I had the Baron of Haxall for associate; but take what you require, and I will account to the Baron.'

'No, no,' cried the German; 'you must never take money from the table—you lose your luck; let the gentleman wait for a few minutes.'

It seemed as if the Chevalier's presence brought ill luck to his friend—every number, every change of colour was against him. He rose in a few minutes, stripped of every farthing, bowed gaily to the company, and withdrew.

The German, with national obstinacy, played on, and again the luck changed, the heaps of gold grew larger and larger, and with its growth disappeared his taciturnity.

'I warned you how dangerous it was to take money off the table,' said he to the Chevalier, who continued watching his play with a pensive air.

'Then it will be of little use asking you for assistance?' he answered.

'What! me!' exclaimed De Haxall.

'It is for a good action, sir; to save a young compatriot of your own.'

'If it were my brother, sir, or for my father, I would not withdraw a coin, sir; it belongs to the play. Luck! luck continues! Every stroke wins!'

The Chevalier could not refrain from showing, by a gesture, his regret that luck should have favoured the grasping, and forsaken the generous.

'Ah! ah! you are envious of my good fortune,' cried De Haxall, with a silly laugh.

'Not for myself,' exclaimed De Mirencourt.

'Ah! I know. You are one of the good! The benefactors of mankind! Why don't you break the bank for the benefit of your protégés?'

'I have always feared and avoided gambling.'

'A good reason for trying your hand. Your luck is fresh, unexhausted.'

'I do not believe in luck,' said the Chevalier.

'Have you ever tried it?'

'No; never.'

'Then why not try?'

'But if I lose?'

'But if you win?'

The temptation was great. A few fortunate strokes might save the Cardan family; but when he calculated the small sum that he possessed, and the wants and debts it must meet, he felt that he could not be generous at the expense of his creditors. Convinced of the impossibility of withdrawing one gold coin from his purse, he let it slip into his pocket, and replaced it in his hand by his snuff-box.

'Well, Chevalier,' said De Haxall, 'what the devil are you hunting for all this time in your pocket?'

De Mirencourt reddened, and hastily produced a small tortoise-shell snuff-box. On the lid was a miniature portrait of his mother.

'So you can't make up your mind to risk a gold piece! Well, none but the brave deserves the fair! I'll trouble you for a pinch.' He extended his hand towards the Chevalier, who was on the point of handing him the box, when a thought seemed suddenly to strike him—he withdrew it.

'Well!' said the astonished yeoman, his hand extended.

'Excuse me, Baron, but every one has his principles. Yours will not permit you to give a sou when you are playing; mine impose on me the same obligation whilst I am looking on!' said the Chevalier.

'But this is a jest.'

'Not at all.'

'You refuse a pinch of snuff?'

'I refuse to give it.'

'That is to say, that I may buy it?'

'Yes, if you choose,' said the Chevalier.

'What a farce! Since when have you become a snuff-merchant? And what is your price?'

'A gold Frederick, Baron.'

'A piece of gold! But this is usury!'

'It is a speculation. Listen, Baron. A little while ago, I observed you searching for your snuff-box in vain; you will not leave your run of good luck; you must have a pinch of snuff; I therefore have your nose in my power! I take advantage of my position. I offer you a pinch for a gold Frederick.'

'Upon my word! Well, I pay for a pinch for the fun of the thing,' said M. de Haxall.

The Chevalier presented his box.

'I paid for one, for the sake of the jest; but, faith! my good fortune authorises a little extravagance; I'll take another, Chevalier; and here are the two pieces of gold.'

'Lay them on the table,' said De Mirencourt.

'You risk them at one stroke?'

'Yes, at one stroke;' and the Chevalier won. He then withdrew three-fourths of his stake, and again won. He continued playing, now losing, now winning, all the time watching the chances with the avide look of a confirmed gambler.

At length, he ceased and counted his pieces of gold. He had won a thousand thalers. He made them up into one rouleau, rose, and left the hall, whilst exclamations—cries of rage, and some cries of joy—rang through the rooms. He hastened to Cardan, still a prey to gloomy forebodings.

'Look, young man, at what Providence sends you!' showing the gold. 'Return to your mother and sister, and let happiness enable you to forget your past sufferings.'

It is impossible to picture the joy of the young merchant thus rescued from ruin. In his native city he recommenced his former business, and succeeded beyond his hopes. Whilst his generous benefactor returned, a few years later, to France, recovered his estates, assumed his title, and whilst relating to his Countess the trials of exile, assured her, with a smile, that though he had never returned to it, yet, that he had never regretted his visit to the roulette table of Coblenz!

DEDICATORY.

BY THE LATE DAVID GRAY.

DEAR friend! From river slopes and flowery leas—
From woods, where hyacinths their bloom display'd,
And violets their fragrance, in the shade
Of tangled hedgerows, breathed upon the wind—
From a dear home, amid round elder trees,
Like a dove's nest, embosom'd, did I seek
An answer to my hopes in the great heart
Of monster Glasgow! Oh! here did I find
Thee, who became the other, better part
Of my glad being. Never can I speak
The utter bounty of thy eager spirit—
The pleasure that thy friendship wrought in me;
And, if our brotherhood may yet inherit
Aught of renown and strength, I give it all to thee.

THE PHANTOM PUNT; OR, THE HOWL OF GUILT.

PROLOGUE—ROUND THE CAULDRON. CHAPTER I.

THE Boots in the coffee-room, who had been instructed to conceal himself under the table before they came in, and to remain there till they had finished their pipes and cigars, had unfortunately fallen asleep, and could only report one expression, which he accidentally overheard just before they rung for bed-room candles, and that expression he maintained was 'A blasted 'eath;' maintained fiercely and doggedly, in spite of the indignation of the head-waiter and of the incredulous sneers of all the waiters downwards, of the barmaid, and of the three chambermaids.

'A blasted 'eath! Wot d'ye mean, you sleepy-eded lunatic? I've a good mind to sack you on the spot—I've, nincompoop! Wot d'ye mean by wollenteering to take notes of their conversation and then going hoff to sleep, adding hinsult to hinjury, and leaving us all farther in the dark than hever by your confounded blasted 'eaths!'

'You be bel-lowed!' exclaimed Boots, more fiercely than ever. 'Wot do you mean by calling a individual a lunatic? and wot d'ye mean by saying that I wollenteered to go below the table like a Noofoundling doag, and spy on the gents?'

'Jusseph!' broke in Pinder, the first chambermaid. 'Oh, Jusseph! don't get excited, for any saka. You're getting blue in the face! Remember your dear father, Jusseph! and don't go to sleep the next time for all our sakes.' Boots turned pale at those words. He remembered the fate of his father, who had burst a blood-vessel one day, in a rage at his pipe which wouldn't draw. Joseph laboured and groaned in spirit over the idea that the complaint was hereditary. He looked with mild repentance at Pinder, and at the head-waiter with smothered indignation, which made the bursting all the more dangerous. Mrs. Fritters, the landlady, at this juncture bustled into the coffee-room, at sight of whom the head-waiter plunged his hand below his waistcoat, pulled out what would have appeared to a casual observer as a detached fragment of his shirt, but which in reality was his napkin of office, and dusted the corner of the sideboard, lifting up a salt-cellar, as if he suspected he had placed an odd fourpenny-piece under it a short time previous, and laying it down again with a stare of suspicion at the waiters downwards, which consisted of a weird figure in a withered dress suit, and another figure less weird and with a less withered dress suit, but both tending that way. Mrs. Fritters, the landlady, looked around with indignation, and at the flash of her eye the waiters downwards, the barmaid, and the three chambermaids vanished in affright; and she was left confronting the head-waiter, who, we may mention here, was named Artaxerxes, whose father had been a clown and had been killed by the kick of a horse, and who himself had suffered a serious domestic affliction, from the fact of his eldest pig (the mother of a large and bereaved family) having swallowed a horn spoon, and died with the handle half-way down its throat!

The head waiter adjusted his white neckcloth, and proceeded with his dusting.

Mrs. Fritters tossed her head, adjusted her cap, muttered something about 'Lazy set of people! always loitering about!' and addressed herself to the head-waiter—not without allowing a certain expression to appear in the glance of her eye, which suggested, to the mind of Artaxerxes, a suspicion on her part as to the genuineness of his zeal in his labours.

'Have the three gentlemen come in for dinner yet?'

'No, mem. Said they wouldn't be 'ere till siving o'clock.'

'Ahem!' Mrs. Fritters gave a significant nod of the head again, which suggested to the mind of Artaxerxes—knowing, as he did, the three travellers by sight—a suspicion, on her part, as to the general solvency of the three travellers; and a consequent doubt as to the probable payment of their arrears for board and lodging.

Mrs. Fritters—who prided herself upon her sharpness, and had often expressed herself to the effect that it would be an exceedingly hopeless task for any person to attempt to take her in—tossed her cap again, retired into the glass bar, consulted the ledger, and instructed Miss Namby to make out Numbers Eleven, Twelve, and Thirteen's bill. The head-waiter had also his own doubts as to the solvency of the three travellers; as had all the waiters downwards, the barmaid, and the three chambermaids.

'Half-past siving o'clock!' said the head-waiter, in a soliloquising tone of voice, looking up to the coffee-room clock. 'They'll be here in 'alf-an-hour. Fish, roast leg of mutton, sweet bread, port and sherry, ordered. Ah! it's a suspicious case! Don't like Number Twelve's boots at all. Can't take to them—and only one pair! That Halbert's plated, or I'm a Dutchman! Number Eleven—ah! the frockcoat's good; but there's no appearance of linen—not even a dicky! He's a nice chap, though: Jolly fellow! Number Thirteen's wust of all! That chap's either very dirty or very clean. The towel is allas wet, and the basin-stand splashed; but the water allas as clean a'most as it was when put in the night previous. He looks a dirty chap!' The head waiter chased a large blue fly up and down the pane in an absent manner, and started back as three figures passed the window. 'Blowed if that aint them!' said the head waiter; and, turning round, he recommenced the dusting of the sideboard, and presented a profile view to three travellers who entered, and who, without a moment's loss of time, ranged themselves with their backs to the fire.

The coffee-room, the head-waiter, the waiters downwards, the barmaid, and the three chambermaids belonged to the Hare and Hounds Hotel, Brownford, at which hostelry there had arrived, three weeks before the date of the conversation, three travellers, about whom the conversation related at the beginning of the chapter had taken place. The manner of arrival of the three travellers was strange, the travellers themselves were strange looking, and their conduct was decidedly strange and incongruous. I was also a residenter at the Hare and Hounds—a periodical residenter—and therefore privileged with the confidence of Mrs. Fritters, the landlady, and of the head waiter. Hence it was I did not deem myself an eavesdropper or intruder because I suffered the conversation to reach my ear at the writing-room, off the commercial room. I had been penning a communication at the time to one who, without exaggeration, I may term the best of her sex, and to whom my welfare is by no means of small account. When I strolled out of the coffee-room, in order to smoke a cigar and post my letter, the three travellers were still with their backs to the fire, and I also noted that, without exception, they all had a peculiar blank expression about the face, which suggested a disappointment of some kind or another. Being of a sympathetic temperament; and, in the course of a chequered career, having had reason to wear the same blank look at various hostelries, both in town and country (by reason of letters not coming to hand, and from other causes), I determined to walk to the post-office, smoke my cigar, return, and invite the three travellers to have something hot with me. I likewise determined that, if, in the course of conversation, I could satisfy myself that they were worthy of my sympathy, I would assist them out of their difficulty as much as lay within my power. I therefore strolled as far as the post-office, posted my letter, and returned to the coffee-room, my virtuous determination having gained strength in the course of the ramble. When I had reached the bar, and was about to pass, with a nod to Mary, Mrs. Fritters addressed me by my Christian name—a familiarity that will not seem strange, when we inform the reader that Mrs. Fritters' father, being in the public-house way, had married a cousin of my aunt, also in the public line. The drift of Mrs. Fritters' communication was that she had led a public life, girl and woman, for thirty years, during which long period she had never once been taken in by any lodger or feeder leaving the house without having settled his score, or leaving sufficient security that the score would be settled at an early date; that it would be very galling to her feelings, indeed, if she were now, when she was almost thinking about retiring altogether from public life, to be taken in by anybody; but that she had grave misgivings about the solvency of the three travellers; and that, if her misgivings were to turn out correct, and the three travellers depart surreptitiously, leaving only their paltry carpet-bags, she felt certain her existence, whether public or private, would be for ever afterwards embittered!

Being connected by ties of consanguinity to Mrs. Fritters, and taking a deep interest in the three travellers, I determined to pluck out the heart of their mystery, and, for that purpose, knocked at the door of the private room where they were dining, and was requested, by the possessor of a deep bass voice, to wipe my feet on the mat and come in.

THE JEWS IN ENGLAND.

SOME writers state that the Jews made their first appearance in England in the time of William the Conqueror; but the falsity of this statement is proved by a law, still extant, passed by Edward the Confessor, offering special protection to all Jews in his dominions, and strictly forbidding them to put themselves into the service of any person, of whatever rank, without the king's leave. Nevertheless, it may be safely stated that, whatever may have been the number of the Jews resident in England prior to William the Conqueror, there is every reason to believe that, with his appearance in England, their numbers were greatly augmented, he having brought over many Jewish immigrants from Normandy, where they had been his chief support in all financial matters, which they continued to be, both to him and his successors, for several generations, till the large sums of money that were extorted from them, and the rigorous treatment to which they were subjected, not only from the Crown but from all classes, compelled them to leave a country in which they had only found cruelty, oppression, and ruin. From the very moment of their appearance in England, this unfortunate class of people were regarded with anything but favourable eyes by the English; 'for,' writes Holinshed, 'among other grievances which the English sustained by the hard dealing of the Conqueror, this is to be remembered that he brought Jews into this land from Rouen, and appointed them a place to inhabit and occupy.' This unfavourable impression, both in England and other countries, the Jews had never been able to efface by any assiduity to please or conciliate on their part; and no doubt a great part of the hatred with which they were treated everywhere can only be attributed to a religious bigotry, which deemed the Jews fit objects for persecution, as being persons not enjoying the protection of Heaven, and professing a religious faith different from their own. These ideas—extremely prevalent in the time of which we write—it has been the work of time, the progress of civilization, and the diffusion of knowledge to eradicate. Another reason, and perhaps the chief one, that may be assigned for this hatred and persecution, was the natural cunning in all matters of usury which was everywhere attributed to them. But that usury is not a part of their nature will be shown in another part of this paper; and that other occupations, more honourable and more respected, though not conveying the same pecuniary recompenses, yet at the same time procuring happiness, respect, and honour, which are never to be counterbalanced by sordid gains, however great, would have been the objects of their aspirations, if they had had the same opportunities as other men.

In the year A. D. 66, the Jews, suffering everywhere from the oppression of the Romans, who then inundated the country, and precluded from the exercise of their religion, broke out into a rebellion, which terminated in the total destruction of the Jewish state; and, instead of gaining anything by this revolt, which no doubt in the moments of their wrath they had contemplated, they became a wandering people, scattered over every part of the surface of the globe, seeking in other countries that happiness and peace which had been denied them in their own. On September 7, A. D. 70, Titus took Jerusalem by assault, burned the Temple, demolished the city, and enslaved or sent into exile those who were so fortunate as to escape the general massacre. Some escaped to the mountains, where they underwent many severe privations from want of food and other necessities; and were at last forced to leave the country, now a barren waste. The number of Jews who perished during the siege and destruction of Jerusalem is reckoned at 110,000. This once favoured people of the Lord were now scattered over every part of the surface of the earth. By dint of their natural ingenuity they contrived, in most instances, to amass considerable fortunes. On account of the restrictions to which they were subjected, and their exclusion from more honourable employment, usury became the means by which they supported themselves, and through time they almost monopolised the business of trading and money dealing. Usury is very often ascribed as part of the nature of a Jew. But that such is not the case is very certain, since, while almost every other nation practised usury, which to them was always the source of misery and civil revolutions, it was totally unknown in Judea. Besides, it is expressly forbidden in the Mosaic Law, and every one must know how strictly it is observed by the Jews. Josephus, the great Jewish historian, remarks in his 'Antiquities of the Jews,' in speaking of Moses and how his laws were observed, that 'this man (meaning Moses) was admirable for his virtue, and powerful in making men give credit to what he delivered, not only during the time of his natural life, but even there is still no one of the Hebrews who does not act even now as if Moses were present, and ready to punish him if he should do anything indecent; nay, there is no one but is obedient to what laws he ordained, although they might be concealed in their transgressions.' There is no doubt that if the Jews had had the opportunity of effacing this imputation from their national character, they would have done so, as it was to them the source of much cruelty, oppression, and ruin. But this unfortunate people were excluded from all the higher professions, and thus trade was their only resource. After the destruction of Jerusalem, spreading themselves in every direction, they penetrated through time into Gaul, and from thence into England, though at what precise date is not known; but as was stated before, in the commencement of this paper, they are known to have been there in the time of Edward the Confessor. In England, they met with the same treatment as elsewhere. Considered under the special protection^o of the Crown—this protection was extended to them only on condition of large pecuniary concessions, which, when not given with good will, were always wrung from them by force. By the high interest which they obtained on their advances of money, much of the wealth of the country was continually flowing into their hands. This was the only compensation for the state of subjection in which they were held by the Crown, and the hatred which was everywhere manifested towards them by all classes of the king's subjects. Notwithstanding the enormous exactions of the Crown, they were still induced to remain in the country from a sense of gain, and also from a firm belief on their part that their circumstances could not be bettered anywhere else. They were naturally hated by the people, and this hatred it was the object of the Crown to encourage; for, as they were protected by the laws, any exactions on the part of the Crown, without this hatred, would have been regarded by the people as arbitrary and despotic proceedings, which they should do everything in their power to discountenance, from a fear of the like proceedings being taken against themselves. But as there was little fear of the people's enmity to the Jews diminishing, the Crown was left free to continue its exactions at pleasure, although not to such an extent as to induce this persecuted sect to leave the country. The law gave protection to the Jews from all classes except the king; but this law was very often broken by the people, and attended by many evil consequences to the unfortunate Jews: the perpetrators of the deeds in question generally escaping from the punishment which they merited.

We do not hear of any general massacre of the Jews till the coronation-day of Richard I., surnamed 'Cœur de Lion,' from his headstrong courage. On that occasion, 3d September 1189, the long pent-up spirit of hatred, which animated the people, vented itself in the most atrocious cruelties and barbarities ever practised on a harmless and unoffending race. The cause of this outbreak cannot be better explained than by some remarks on the subject by Holinshed. 'Upon the day of King Richard's coronation,' says this writer, 'the Jews that dwelt in London and in other parts of the realm, being there assembled, had but sorry hap, as it chanced. For they, meaning to honour the same coronation with their presence, and to present to the king some honourable gift, whereby they might declare themselves glad for his advancement, and procure his friendship toward them, for the confirming of their privileges and liberties, according to the grants and charters made to them by former kings, he, of a zealous mind to Christ's religion, abhorring their nation; and doubting some sorcery by them to be practised, commanded that they should not come within the church when he should receive the crown, nor within the palace whilst he was at dinner.' We here see exemplified the common usage to which the Jews were subjected by our kings. Notwithstanding his avowed hatred to them and their religion, there is every reason to believe that he accepted the proffered gift, and that very gladly. Some historians have asserted that this treatment of the Jews by the king was, in some measure, to atone for any harm there might be in accepting the gift. That

Richard shared the prejudices against the race, in common with his subjects, there is very little doubt; he, like every other person of that period, fully believing them to be hated by Heaven, and in consequence, fit objects for persecution. To return, however, to our narrative. 'But at dinner-time,' continues Holinshed, 'among others that pressed in at the palace-gate, divers of the Jews were about to thrust in, till one of them was stricken by a Christian, who, alleging the king's commandment, kept them back from coming within the palace, which some of the unruly people perceiving, and supposing it had been done by the king's commandment, took lightly occasion thereof, and falling upon the Jews with staves, bats, and stones, beat them, and chased them home to their houses and lodgings. Herewith arose a rumour through the city, that the king had commanded the Jews to be destroyed; and thereupon the people came running together to assault them in their houses, which, when they could not easily break up nor enter, by reason the same were strongly builded, they set fire to them, so that divers houses were consumed, not only of the Jews, but also of their neighbours, so hideous was the rage of the fire. The king being advertised of this riotous attempt of the outrageous people, sent some of his counsellors, Ranalph de Glanville, Lord-Justice, and other officers, to appease the tumult; but their authority was nothing regarded, nor their persuasions any whit revered, but their threatenings rather brought them in danger of life among the rude sort of those that were about to spoil, rob, and sack the houses and shops of the Jews; to the better accomplishment of which, their unlawful act, the light that the fire of those houses which burned after it was once night, did administer no small help and occasion of furtherance. The Jews that were in those houses which were set on fire, were either smoldered and burned to death within, or else at their coming forth, most cruelly received upon the points of spears, bills, swords, and glaives of their adversaries, that watched for them very diligently. This outrage of the furious and disordered people continued from the midnight of the one day till two o'clock on the other; the commons all that time never ceasing their fury against that nation, but still killing them as they met with any of them, in most horrible, rash, and unreasonable manner. At length, rather wearied with their evil doings than satisfied with spoil, or moved with respect of reason, or reverence for their prince, they withdrew themselves from their riotous enterprise, after they had executed many unlawful and horrible enormities.' That these outrages of the people were passed over with little or no punishment is very certain; though some historians assert that, the very day after these barbarous outrages were committed, the king caused the ringleaders of the riot to be apprehended, and to be hanged immediately. Very probably vengeance was thus taken on all those who could be easily got hold of; but no measures seem to have been adopted against those who deemed flight the surest manner to escape punishment. As has been stated over and over again, it was not the object of the Crown to persecute these people so as to induce them to leave the country, and no doubt the king, to show his sense of justice, caused several offenders to undergo the punishment which this flagrant breach of the king's peace well merited. Holinshed expressly says—'This great riot well deserved sore and grievous punishment, but yet it passed over without correction, in respect of the great numbers of the transgressors, and for that the most part of men—for the hatred generally conceived against the obstinate frowardness of the Jews—liked the doings hereof well enough, interpreting it to be a good token that the joyful days of the king's advancement to the crown should be doleful unto the Jews, in bringing them to such slaughter and destruction. After the tumult was ceased, the king commanded that no man should hurt or harm any of the Jews, and so they were restored to peace, after they had sustained infinite damage.' The peace was of very short duration, since, a few months after the enormities committed in London, the same work of destruction and cruelty was imitated in other parts of the kingdom. The first breach of the king's peace took place at Lynn, in Norfolk, where the same cruelties were renewed. But of all the outbreaks against the Jews, the tragedy enacted at York is the most memorable, as it was the most frightful. In that city the wretched Jews preferred killing their wives and children, and afterwards being their own executioners, to awaiting a more barbarous and dishonourable death from the hands of their infuriated assailants.

The enormities of London and York were frequently repeated in other parts of the kingdom; and a pretty good idea may be gleaned, from what has been already said, of the state of the Jews in England. There was nothing to induce them to remain in this country, where they had only found persecution and cruelty; yet they did not leave it till they were forced to do so by the entire expulsion of their race in 1290, the eighteenth year of the reign of Edward I. 'The manner and circumstances of this final act of tyranny,' says a writer on this subject, 'were highly appropriate. The king was, in the first place, bribed to give his consent to it, the Parliament making him a grant of a fifteenth as the price of his compliance. This, however, was but a small compensation for the permanent loss of revenue which the king thus entailed upon himself. During a space of only about seven years—from the 17th of December, in the fiftieth year of Henry III. till the Tuesday in Shrove-tide, in the second year of Edward I.—the Crown is stated to have extorted from the Jews (amounting in all to probably no more than five hundred families) the immense sum of £420,000:15s. 4d. Edward, however, could not resist the present temptation.' Such was the cause of their entire expulsion from England. The entire number who were thus driven out of the country is stated to have been 16,511, including men, women, and children. The Jews were rigorously excluded from England till 1655, when they were again admitted by Oliver Cromwell. With the progress of civilization and the diffusion of knowledge, their position has been greatly improved, and they now enjoy those privileges, which, through so many ages, were rigorously withheld from them. HOW I CAME INTO A FORTUNE.

To the best of my recollection, I began life as a page, to which honourable occupation I entertained not the slightest doubt that I had 'growed,' like our old friend, Miss Topsy. To attend upon Mrs. Primface and the Misses Primface was my only duty; but having a soul above buttons, I one fine morning departed from Flower Villa to seek my fortune, and wandered I knew not whither. After trudging on for several hours, I came within hearing of the bells of Showborough. Quickening my pace, I arrived at the outskirts of the town, and, tired and hungry, I sat myself down upon a door-step, and fell asleep. I was awakened by a voice shouting in my ear, 'Hallo, my boy! What—sleeping?' Starting up, I saw before me an elderly gentleman and a beautiful young lady. In mortal dread lest I had been guilty of some dire offence, I touched my hat (I still wore the livery of the Primfaces), and was for slinking off, when the old gentleman caught me by the shoulder, and, facing me round, he asked,

'What's your name, boy?'

'Tom, sir.'

'Tom what?'

'Tom Braid, sir.'

'Well, Tom, what are you after?'

'I'm hungry, sir.'

'Hungry! Well, come in and get-something to eat. Julia, my dear, give Tom some dinner, and then bring him up to me.'

As he said this, he opened the door, and we entered the house upon the steps of which I had been sleeping.

'Come away, Tom; come with me,' said Miss Julia.

'Yes, ma'am,' I replied; and followed her down to the kitchen, where were Mrs. Greasyface and Betsy.

'Mrs. Greasyface, give Tom, here, some cold meat and bread; and after he's done, send him up to Pa in the library.' So said Miss Julia, and then she left the kitchen.

Cold meat, bread, and a jug of beer were placed before me, which I caused rapidly to disappear, to the astonishment of cook and Betsy.

'Lor! young 'un, when did yer taste meat afore?' exclaimed the former.

'Yesterday afternoon,' I replied, giving another bite at the bread, and dipping my head into the beer jug. Then Mrs. Greasyface and Betsy fell a-talking. I knew they were speaking about me, but I was too busy to pay attention to what they said. I cared more for the cold meat and beer. All good things must have an end, however; and at last I began to feel that I had ate sufficient.

'Where did yer come from?' asked cook; but as I was unwilling to tell where I had come from, I pretended not to have heard, and busied myself brushing my hat with the sleeve of my jacket.

'Have yer 'ad enough?' she asked; to which I replied in the affirmative—at the same time casting a glance at the remainder of the meat, as if I should have liked to pocket it, which no doubt I would have done had I got an opportunity; but as both cook and Betsy kept staring at me, such opportunity was not afforded me. Any farther questions on the part of cook were prevented by the entrance of Miss Julia, who, seeing that I had done eating, told me to follow her. I rose and followed her into the presence of the old gentleman.

'Well, Tom, are you hungry now?' he asked.

'No, sir.'

'What made you fall asleep on the door-step?'

'I was tired, sir.'

And so I told him my story, making a few original additions, to the effect that I had been thrashed and starved by the Primfaces, all which, I am sorry to say, were untrue.

'Well, well, my boy; never mind that. What are you going to do now?'

I told him that I intended going up to London, where I understood fortunes were to be had for the trouble of picking them up. He laughed at my plans, and told me that if I went to London I would only be starved; and he ended by offering to take me into his service. I accepted his offer, doffed the Primface livery, and arrayed myself in a suit of pepper-and-salts.

Mr. Beverly, my benefactor (as he afterwards proved himself to be), was a lawyer in Showborough. He was a widower, and Miss Julia his only child.

For four years I continued in Mr. Beverly's service, in the course of which Miss Julia had been married to Mr. Beverly's junior partner, Mr. Gosling. At the end of the four years, Mr. Beverly called me into his study, expressed his satisfaction with my conduct; and offered me a desk in his chambers, at the same time stating that he would take care I was sufficiently provided for until I was able to provide for myself. His offer I accepted, and in due time I found myself mounted on a three-legged stool, copying law-papers—Mr. Beverly having taught me reading and writing while I was serving at his house. Here I remained about five years, when I removed to Birlstown, being induced to do so by the offer of a larger salary—an offer which I accepted on the advice of Mr. Beverly. Other three years passed, when Mr. Beverly died, leaving me one hundred pounds as a token of his regard. As I had by this time saved some money from my income, I thought of entering into business for myself. Birlstown being already sufficiently provided with lawyers, I removed to the neighbouring town of Scrimpley, and, opening an office, waited for clients.

My office had two apartments, one marked 'Clerks,' and the other 'Private.' The sole occupant of the former was a sharp little fellow named Harry, who passed his time practising gymnastics over the solitary chair with which his room was furnished. The 'private' apartment was occupied by myself. Open law-books lay before me, together with written papers. But these were placed for appearance sake, in case some one might drop in. Harry had instructions that when any one called he was to knock at my door before ushering them in, as it would never have done for me to be caught reading novels during business hours.

Waiting for clients is wearisome. I waited for several months without receiving a call from any one other than a host of mendicants soliciting charity. One day, however, I was disturbed in the middle of a very interesting portion of a new novel, by the entrance of Harry, who handed me a note, signifying at the same time that an answer was wanted. The note requested me to repair immediately to Blanche Hall, the seat of Richard Blanche, Esq. one of our wealthiest and most influential county gentlemen. Wondering what was wanted, I put on my hat and followed John Thomas to the carriage, which waited for me. On the carriage dashed at a furious rate, all Scrimpley staring after it. In about half-an-hour, we entered the avenue leading to the Hall, and shortly thereafter I got out; and was met by Drs. Lancet and Bluepill, who were in attendance upon Mr. Blanche. I was led into the library, and told that Mr. Blanche was very ill—indeed they scarcely expected he would recover—and that he had desired a lawyer to be sent for, in order that his will might be written out.

While we were talking, Miss Blanche entered the room, and told us that her father had fallen asleep, and it would be as well not to disturb him just now; and then, turning to me, she asked if I could spare sufficient time to wait until he awakened. Of course I could; but even suppose I had been overwhelmed with business, I do not think I could have given any other answer than the one I gave, when asked by such a person as Miss Blanche. She was the most handsome girl I ever saw—apparently about nineteen years of age, with black glossy hair, eyes—but why do I attempt to describe her? The attempt would only end in a miserable caricature.

'Who hath not felt how feebly words essay
To fix one spark of beauty's heavenly ray?
Who doth not feel—until his falling sight
Faints into dimness with its own delight—
His changing cheek, his smiling eye confess
The might, the majesty of loveliness?
Such was Miss Blanche—such around her shone
The nameless charms unmark'd by her alone—
The light of love—the purity of grace—
The mind—the music breathing from her face—
The heart, whose softness harmonised the whole—
And oh! that eye was in itself a soul'

Dr. Lancet and Miss Blanche left the room, and Dr. Bluepill and I gazed out of the window, no doubt thinking of very different subjects. I was dreaming only of Miss Blanche, and was deaf, dumb, and blind to everybody and everything else. The doctor must also have been engrossed with something, for neither of us heard any one enter the room. I was roused from my dream by a suppressed cry from the doctor, and turning round was startled to see an old man in a night-dress sitting at a desk, and busily writing! I had not the slightest doubt that it was Mr. Blanche; but how came he there? I could not tell. I looked at the doctor, and he looked at me. It was evident that Mr. Blanche was not awake. So whispered the doctor. Then, on tiptoe, Dr. Bluepill went out of the room, and returned presently with Dr. Lancet. In hurried whispers they consulted together, and agreed that it was safest to let their patient finish the work in which he was engaged, as it might be dangerous to rouse him. Miss Blanche came into the room, but was immediately led out by Dr. Lancet. They returned again shortly, however, and all four of us stood looking upon the somnambulist, on whose face death was written in the plainest language. A few minutes sufficed for him to finish his writing, then he folded up the paper, enclosed it in an envelope, lighted a taper and sealed the packet, which he placed in a drawer in the desk, after writing something on the cover. He next locked the desk and rose. He walked past us. We followed and saw him enter his bed-room, put the key of his desk into a pocket in his vest, which was hanging in the room, and return to bed. For a few minutes he lay still; then, rolling on his side, he muttered—'Desk—drawer—left side—true—true—tr-ue.' He ceased. His breathing became heavy, and soon his sleep was changed to that death.

I will not attempt to describe the grief of Miss Blanche, on being told her father was dead. It has no connection with my present purpose.

From Dr. Lancet we learned that he had left his patient and gone into an adjoining room to prepare some medicine, and, on coming back, he found the bed unoccupied. He was proceeding to the library when met by Dr. Bluepill.

The desk was opened, and, sure enough, the sealed packet was found in the left hand drawer. It was addressed, 'To be opened on my death.' Miss Blanche desired me to open it. I broke the seal. On unfolding the paper, I read as follows:—

'When my brother Charles died, he left an only son (also named Charles), about two years of age. By my brother's will, I was appointed guardian to the child; and, in that capacity, I entered upon the management of the family estate. For two years, I discharged my trust to the best of my ability; but, at the end of that time, the desire came upon me to get rid of the child, and thus succeed to the estate myself. I tried to combat the desire; but, day by day, it gained upon me, till at last it was put into execution.

'The boy disappeared mysteriously. I caused inquiries to be made in every direction, except that which I knew to be the right one. The search was fruitless. The boy never was recovered; and, since his disappearance, I have never seen him. He was carried off by a strolling woman named Hawkins, at my instigation. And I believe the child (why do I call him child?—it is now twenty-four years since he was carried off) is still alive; but where he is, or what he is doing, I know not.

'I have continued to pay the woman Hawkins large sums of money, to procure her silence. The matter lies heavy upon me; but I could not bear the exposure. I direct that, on my death, every inquiry may be made after my nephew; and that he be reinstated in his rights without opposition. For this end I give the address of the woman Hawkins, as contained in her last letter to me. It is "Gray's-close, Swilsbro'." This is the confession of a dying man, who trusts his daughter will carry out his last request.

'R. BLANCHE.

'Blanche Hall, 16th July 1847.'

HOW I CAME INTO A FORTUNE.

To the best of my recollection, I began life as a page, to which honourable occupation I entertained not the slightest doubt that I had 'grewed,' like our old friend, Miss Topey. To attend upon Mrs. Primface and the Misses Primface was my only duty; but having a soul above buttons, I one fine morning departed from Flower Villa to seek my fortune, and wandered I knew not whither. After trudging on for several hours, I came within hearing of the bells of Showborough. Quickening my pace, I arrived at the outskirts of the town, and, tired and hungry, I sat myself down on a door-step, and fell asleep. I was awakened by a voice shouting in my ear, 'Hallo, my boy! sleeping?' Starting up, I saw before me a gentleman and a beautiful young lady. I was dread lest I had been guilty of some offence, and touched my hat (I still wore the livery faces), and was for slinking off, when the gentleman caught me by the shoulder and asked,

'What's your name, boy?'

'Tom, sir.'

'Tom what?'

'Tom Braid, sir.'

'Well, Tom, what's your business?'

'I'm a page.'

'Hullo, Julia, bring me a glass of beer, will you?'

As the dress given me before, but whether Hawkins was her name they could not tell. As there was no clue to the whereabouts of the woman, and not having any description of her, I gave instructions to the police to find out a woman of that name, if possible; knowing that if she was to be found, the police were the most likely persons to find her.

For fully three months the search was continued without the slightest information being obtained. Every means I could think of had been adopted. I was beginning to despair. I could scarcely think it possible that Hawkins was alive and not yet found. I proceeded to the Hall (I was in the habit of doing so pretty often now—much more often, perhaps, than there was any occasion for, but I imagined my visits were not unwelcome) one afternoon, for the purpose of recommending Miss Blanche to give up the search, as it was only throwing away money. While we were discussing the matter, a servant entered, and handed Miss Blanche a letter, addressed to her father. After reading the letter, she gave it to me. It ran thus:—

'Sir,

'I needs munny & yu must send me 20£ bi tumore arr i wal split on yu.

'MOLLY HAWKINS.

'Please send these munny to mee att 25 Lyons close, swichly.'

'That, I think, confirms my father's statement,' done had I got an opportunity. Betsy kept staring at me. The cook were present, who, seeing her. I remembered the old gentleman.

now. Will you go to-morrow and the following morning I proceeded to the address given me. I found a man, who answered to the name, who showed her the note, and a Blanche, but that before she could see the boy. After a good deal of talking, she managed to get out of her that the boy was stolen, she had given him the name of Drysdale, whose address was at the address given me. I promised that, if the boy could be paid handsomely, in the event of her to remain where she was, so as to be found again, if wanted.

I proceeded to Slumley, but found no one of the name of Drysdale at the address given me. There was no such person there, I was told, but he had died many years ago. Again the clue was lost. I inquired at the police-office for the relations of Mr. Drysdale, but could get no information. I next inquired at the various solicitors in the town, in the hope of finding Mr. Drysdale's agent, but in vain. Since Mr. Drysdale's death, almost a new generation had sprung up. I consulted the Directory, and called on everybody named Drysdale, but without success. Every person whom I thought likely to have known the gentleman, I inquired at; but though some of them had a dim recollection of the man, they could give me no information as to his relations. As far as I could learn, he was a bachelor, so that his relations were the more likely to be few.

Tired with the inquiries, which had detained me four days, I proceeded to the railway, and took out my ticket for Scrimpley. I could not think when another clue was to be had. I stepped into the train, and, fatigued both in body and mind, I fell asleep. I could not have slept long when I started up. There was one person who could give me some information—the Inland Revenue officer at Slumley. I had not thought of him before. How stupid! The moment we stopped at the first station, I got out and crossed the line, just in time to catch the return train for Slumley. On the stoppage of the train at Slumley, I inquired for the Revenue Office. On entering the office, I discovered, to my mortification, that it was only a sub-office, and that the information I desired could not be obtained there; I must proceed to Timberton, the county town. To add to my mortification, I found that the last train for Timberton that night had already passed.

In no very pleasant mood I proceeded to my hotel, and strove to pass away the time; but how heavy it hung upon me! Minutes seemed to drag themselves into hours, and hours into days. I was feverish and excited. I could not explain to myself how it was that I should feel so; but neither could I deny to myself that I was feverish and excited. I tried to read, but I could not—the lines seemed to dance before my eyes. I tried to smoke, but before I had taken a dozen whiffs, I threw the pipe into the grate, where it lay shivered into a hundred pieces. I lighted a cigar, but I could not smoke it. I went out to walk, but before I got the length of the street corner I turned. My limbs refused to sustain me. When I returned to my room, I threw myself upon the sofa, and slept. About four o'clock I awoke as cold as ice. A fearful shivering was upon me. I tried to walk into my bedroom, but I grew dizzy and fell. I remember no more till I found myself lying in bed, with a doctor and nurse at the bedside. I attempted to rise, but was prevented. Soon afterwards I fell asleep, and when I wakened I felt refreshed but weak. For five days I remained thus; but at the end of that time I felt better, and would at once have proceeded to Timberton to procure the information I desired, but the doctor overruled my inclination, and on his advice I remained where I was for four days longer. Mental excitement, he said, had brought on a slight fever, and it was as well to rest a few days.

When the four days were gone, I proceeded to Timberton, and called at the Revenue Office. I was shown into the distributor's room, and, handing him my card, I introduced my business.

'About 24 years ago, perhaps a few years less, a Mr. Drysdale died in Slumley. I don't know whether he died testate or intestate; but I should like to know the name of the person who gave up the residue accounts, and paid the Government duties. I require the name of the executor in a matter of very great importance.'

Then I explained to him the object of my inquiry after the executor. The distributor consulted his books and papers; but as he could not then find any trace of the accounts being lodged with him, he promised to make a further investigation; and if he found any trace of them, he would write to London for the information required, and communicate with me. I requested him also to procure the name and address of the solicitor by whom the accounts were prepared. This he promised to do; and I left and returned to Scrimpley.

I called upon Miss Blanche, and gave her an account of my proceedings—of the success of which I was now quite confident. She shook my hand, and thanked me, in a voice and with a smile which I considered more than sufficient remuneration for all my trouble. She remarked my paleness, and, being pressed, I told her of my illness. Her eyes filled with tears.

'I know not how to thank you,' she said; 'but I am sure you will believe me truly grateful for your kindness.'

'Do not mention it, Miss Blanche. I can assure you that I am delighted at being able to afford you any assistance; and I shall always be happy to be of service to you. I am ever at your command.' I could not regard her as a client. I never could have accepted fees from her.

'My cousin, when found, will thank you better than I can,' she said.

'Believe me, I am sufficiently thanked already.'

We went into the garden, and after wandering among its mazes, we entered a little fairy-like bower, and sat down.

The twilight was deepening into night. Everything around was steeped in sweet repose. The evening was one of autumn's loveliest. We watched the stars as they peeped from the clouds above us, shedding their calm, clear light on the earth. We gazed upon the full moon, as she slowly climbed up the eastern sky. The scene was such that the heart was touched with a poetic fire. We talked of poetry. We quoted Shakspeare and Byron. As I listened to her rich, clear voice, my heart beat quickly, and I felt that I would have given all the world, if mine, to know that Miss Blanche loved me. We could not speak of poetry without speaking also of love. I repeated the balcony scene in 'Romeo and Juliet,' emphasizing the words—

*'It is my lady; oh, it is my love!
Oh that she knew she were!'*

And when I had finished, I whispered—

*'Oh teach me how to live, and by what art
To sway the motion of your heart!'*

A sigh, scarce audible, broke from her. Gathering boldness, I told her how I loved her; and then, then—oh what rapture to hear from her sweet lips that I was loved again! I could scarce believe my senses, but the little hand was placed in mine; and, as we sat, we talked of love untiringly, and felt not the chilling night air. As I pressed upon her lips the first kiss of love, a thrill ran through me, piercing to my very soul—a thrill of ecstatic bliss. Laura leaning on my arm, we retraced our steps and entered the house; and afterwards, as I bade her good night, I felt that I was happy in the love of one so beautiful and good.

A week had scarcely passed, when I received a letter from the Revenue officer at Timberton, with the information required. The person who had given up the residue accounts was Mrs. Primface, from whom I had ran away. Without any unnecessary delay, I proceeded to Falsington, and called at Flower Villa. I introduced myself as Mr. Braid of Scrimpley. They did not recognise the name; and I knew they could not recognise the person. After being seated, I turned to Mrs. Primface and said,—

'I understand that you are a sister of the late Mr. Drysdale of Slumley.'

'Yes, sir.'

'Do you remember if he had a little boy in his service at the time of his death?'

'I remember that Mr. Drysdale, some time before his death, adopted a little beggar boy he got from a strolling woman.'

'Do you know what became of the boy after Mr. Drysdale's death?'

'My brother requested that I should take the boy and bring him up. I did take him, and fed and clothed him; but the ungrateful little scoundrel ran away from us.'

'How old would he be then, do you think?'

'I should think—Amelia, my love, how old would Tom be when he ran away?—I think about fourteen or fifteen?"

'Yes, ma!' answered Miss Amelia, who was now a full-blown old maid.

I felt my ears tingle, and the blood rush to my cheeks. With an effort at calmness, I asked—

'And his name?'

'His surname was the same as your own. Braid—Tom Braid he was called.'

I leaped up from my chair, and went through some extraordinary evolutions, to the astonishment of the whole of the Primfaxes.

'I beg your pardon, ladies,' I said immediately, 'in me you see the identical Tom Braid, who is the heir to the estate of Blanche. I came here for the purpose of tracing that heir, but I little thought that I was searching for no other individual than myself.'

I told them my story, and took the earliest opportunity of leaving for Scrimpley. From the station I drove as fast as possible to the Hall; and, all excitement, I rushed up stairs and into the drawing-room; for I had seen Laura at the window.

'Hurrah! Your cousin is found. I've found him at last. Hurrah!'

'I'm sure I am glad to hear it, Tom. Where is he? I suppose I must prepare to quit immediately? What like is my cousin?'

'Laura, my darling! your cousin says he won't hear of you leaving the Hall. He's a fellow you'll like very much—at least I think so; speaking for myself, I rather like him. Do you know what he says?'

'No; what?'

'He actually has the impertinence to say that he is in love with his fair cousin, whom he has several times seen without being aware of the relationship; and that he won't enter this house as its owner unless he enters at the same time as your husband; that you must remain in it till you marry him.'

'Did you tell him, Tom, that—that—'

'Yes; I told him that I had some thought of you myself, but that I was prepared to resign before his superior claim.'

'Did you tell him that, Tom?'

'Yes, dear, I told him so, because I now think you'll be much happier with your cousin Charley, Blanche, than with the poor solicitor, Tom Braid.'

'I never can love him, Tom, as —'

'Oh, don't be afraid. I think there's no fear. Just try, now; that's a dear.'

'Are you tired of me already, Tom?'

'Yes; Mr. Thomas Braid is tired of Miss Laura Blanche; but Mr. Charles Blanche is not tired of her.'

'Then, good-bye, Tom! Good-bye!' And the tears began to run out of her eyes. I kissed them away; then seating myself by her side, I said,

'Tom Braid bids you good-bye; he'll never see you again! But Charles Blanche takes his place by Laura's side; twines his arm around her waist; imprints a kiss upon her lips; and asks his pretty cousin how long she intends to keep him out of his own house? And, as I spoke, I suited the action to the word.'

'What do you mean, Tom?'

'Tom Braid is no more. In me you see your cousin, Charley Blanche.'

She looked into my eyes, then laid her head upon my shoulder, and wept tears of joy.

'Fancy, Laura—fancy me searching for such a time, running here and there, looking for and causing others to look for myself! It is queer; isn't it?'

Of course it was; and of course Laura said so.

Proofs of my identity were soon found in sufficiency. There was not a doubt but that I was Charley Blanche, the rightful owner of an estate worth some thousands a-year. I don't wait for clients any more. My first client was my only one, and he was myself.

Laura and I are married. Two or three young Blanches are romping in the garden as I write; while their darling mother—I had intended to close with a panegyric upon Laura, but I find she is looking over my shoulder reading every word as I write. She says she isn't; but I leave my readers to decide whether or not she is guilty on her own confession. It will be sufficient to say that I have gained two fortunes; but I don't think it will be necessary to say which of the two is the most prized. J. C. S.

BURIAL OF SIR JAMES OUTRAM.

BURY him deep in immortal dust,

In the solemn Minster's silent aisle;

His soul is with the brave and just,

Beyond the moth and the stealthy rust—

Close menials of slow time and toll:

O bury him in the precious soil;

But keep, O England! his fame in trust.

His tender mother nor dream'd nor guess'd

That he should travel the sharky brine;

And battle through many a scene unblest'd,

To crush with the sword that monstrous Pest

Which, fierce and cruel and undivine,

Fill'd many a mother with mortal pine,

For murder done on her Bravest and Best.

But the Hero heard that shriek of woe

Which woke revenge in the soul of Peace;

So he went—he could not choose but go,

For the true knight's foot is never slow—

And he smote the Pest with a dark decrease,

Till the healing stars found sweet release,

And smiled on the outraged land below.

Yet not from the vaster deeds of death

Alone, doth the Hero's glory rise:

O rich with fame is the peaceful breath

Which wisely and calmly he murmureth

'Mid the babble of human hates and lies:

Sir James's sword was a sharp surprise;

But his counsels rear'd new walls of faith.

Then home he came with a deadly taint

Slow-colling within each fatal vein:

Yet dying, he breathed no dark complaint,

But like a heroical, silent saint,

He hush'd the moan of his mortal pain,

And died as if death were laurel'd gain.

And the praises of men both false and taint.

So gather around Sir James's bier,

Ye mourners! and lay him softly down;

While sadly, as from a tender sphere,

The wall of the organ wakes the tear

For the Chief renown'd beyond renown:

Full sweet are the wreaths of his greener crown

In the bloom of God's One Golden Year!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

September 22, 1835.

OUR dinner-party yesterday passed off most agreeably; only George is making merry this morning at my expense about my projected match-making, which indeed looks like a failure at the very commencement.

Eight persons had been invited—two married couples, the Miss Thorndales, the Doctor, and George's cousin, Charles Beaumont, a youth now completing his education at the university. As ill luck would have it, however, Mrs. Maberly (whose intimacy sanctioned the liberty) had written to ask permission to bring her niece, Miss Johnson, then on a visit to her. Of course I could not do less than say I should be happy to receive her. She came accordingly—a pale, timid, flaxen-haired girl, with downcast eyes and taper waist; shrinking manners, almost awkward; so ultra-blushing and extra-modest, she seemed but newly emerged from the school-room. Well, here was Hester sitting on one side, her fine dark eyes dancing with quick intelligence, and her graceful tournure, fit for the model of a duchess; and there was Emma, with her brilliant complexion, and luxuriant auburn tresses falling over a neck and shoulders literally of snow—both sisters perfectly conversant with all the bienséances of society. And what does my Dr. Armstrong do? Of course he is filled with admiration of the Miss Thorndales—fairly bewildered, and at a loss on which to fix his preference! No such thing. Oh! the perverse contrariety of human nature! At the very first glance he took of that dawdling Lucy Johnson, he seemed to have neither eyes nor ears for any other creature. It was like a positive bewitchment, and wholly unaccountable by ordinary rules. The girl herself appeared quite confused (abattue, as the French have it) by the unexpected turn of affairs, and looked almost relieved when the time of dispersal came, and she got fairly out of the house—the Doctor following her to the carriage, seeing her snugly seated therein, and taking his own departure immediately afterwards! Verily, some people, often the very last we should think of, have homage thrust upon them in a marvellous and provoking manner.

September 30.

Mrs. Maberly has just been here, and the mystery is out of the Doctor's admiration of her niece. A lady who knew the late Mrs. Armstrong well, says that Lucy so strikingly resembles her, it is no wonder the widower was fascinated. She has the same childish countenance (silly I would call it); the same slim (shapeless) figure; the same shy (sheepish) deportment; in fine, she is the same faint characterless shadow of womanhood that his quondam wife once was. Now, this little episode sets me a-thinking.

How very delicate are the threads which compose the affections, and how incontestably these bend to the mastery of association! Of a sudden attraction, as of a sudden repulsion, no explanation can be given. We see only this, that taste and imagination hang garlands on trifles undefinable, and that most subtle memories are often blowing about the heart, suggesting, moulding, and ripening its decisions. I am no philosopher, but I like to sift the reason of things; and I have made up my mind that in the matter of men's love (and women's too), for once that we can trace it to any rational motive, there are a thousand cases in which we are completely foiled to find a motive at all. The attachment of the sexes is full of anomalies. For instance, why are the youngest men, those just beginning to grow beards, certain always to offer assiduous attention to ladies greatly their seniors? Do these mere boys indulge the delusion that their importance is increased, and their incipient manhood advanced, by an affaire de cœur with some showy woman, so mature as nearly to have taken her place in the rank of old maidship? While more advanced bachelors (and widowers especially) seldom give a serious thought to any but misses in their teens, newly fledged and easily caught by the first fowler that aims an arrow at the fluttering little heart. Like does not draw to like generally, only in exceptional cases. Of course Charles Beaumont, who is scarce nineteen, was enraptured by Hester Thorndale, who may be eight-and-twenty; and Dr. Armstrong thought the cream-faced Lucy, just out of her pinafores, a very phantom of delight!

How did George ever come to fancy me, I wonder? I had a good deal of money, to be sure, left me by that old Mr. Grey. He was ten years older than my papa, and he wanted to marry me. When I refused, he said, if I would not take himself, I must take his gold. I pleased him somehow so much that, on my account, he disinherited his own son who had married against his wishes, and gave me all he had. Yet, George does not care a pin for money. For when, as I recollect, there was a talk about some informality in Mr. Grey's will, of which the rightful heir might possibly avail himself, George laughed, declaring it did not matter a pin whether I had a sixpence; and when the difficulty was got over, and the money was mine, he put it all away into the bank, where it now lies, strictly reserved, as he says, for my own private use.

Mem.—I sometimes doubt whether I should have accepted that money, and conceive even yet that I should not appropriate it. What although that son of Mr. Grey's did make a foolish marriage (according to his father's ideas), he was not the less his own child—really and truly his rightful heir. And then, perhaps, the young man may be in poverty, while I am surrounded with every comfort. He may have counted upon that ten thousand pounds—a pretty large sum, too!—and got into difficulties in consequence of my superseding him. His wife and children may be in positive want, and I the cause! Oh! I do not like to think of it. But once, when I mentioned my scruples to George, he looked at me with such a ludicrous expression, and called me a dear little fanciful goose! adding, 'the day would come when I should know better the value of money.' Plainly, then, not in respect of himself does he view this matter, but merely as it affects me. So the mystery still remains. How did George come to fancy me? and how came I to return the compliment? Ah! that would be a long story to tell, if indeed it could ever be explained to any sensible person's satisfaction. — Hark! there is baby crying; and that stupid nurse, who is forever deserting her post, and running out of the room, is now flying up stairs at the summons. I fear I must part with Martha. She is so given to gadding and gossip.

Is there any time when a conscientious servant is more covetable than when the wellbeing of a beloved only child is at stake? Again I fall a-thinking. Wealth has been called omnipotent; but I see many things—and these, perhaps, the rarest and most desirable in this world—which cannot be purchased. Indeed, I believe that whatever money alone can procure must necessarily be inferior, as appertaining merely to the gratification of the senses—the ministering to outward and bodily wants. The mental, the moral, the good, the estimable, cannot be grasped in the hand, to be weighed and measured by material agency. Invisible, invaluable, indestructible, these hold no common mart; they are never sold, in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Yet we may buy them. Affection, honour, truth, reverence, devotion even unto death, we may obtain; but the price is very high—far above a king's ransom. The gold which we offer for them is dug out of no earthly mine; the coin is of regal stamp, fresh from the mint of Heaven. Its worth is incalculable; its power resistless; its monarchy the oldest in creation. My pen should be of diamond while I write the name. Of these sacred jewels—the best possessions of mortals here below—the only purchase-money is Love!

October 10.

The days begin now to grow wet and chill, and the aspect of things out of doors is sadly changed from what it was no further back than last month. The flowers are all faded. One little pale blossom that I tried to cherish and protect from wind and rain, and so draw out its brief term of life beyond the usual limits, has sunk at length. I found it this morning with the delicate head broken on the stalk—a hopeless ruin! Dear me! I remember, when I first came to this house, George was to have a flower in his button-hole every day, and, when none could be had, I was to fasten a piece of evergreen there instead. But I had no baby then. And I am sure that, though I do not give my husband leaves and blossoms, I give him such enormous space in my heart's chambers, that there is little room left for any one else; except, always, a warm corner for the sweetest pet that ever nestled in a mother's bosom.

The distant country looks cheerless and bare to-day. The trees are fast yielding their honours. Last night's storm made awful havoc with them; and the leaves that have been gradually thinning, mellowing, and crisping to decay for weeks past, are either lying in mouldering heaps on the damp ground, or go swirling by on the merciless breeze. No need now to bear malice at the poor beech-tree, hiding my view of the road, on which I may watch George's coming afar off. I wish Charlotte were a little older, that she might watch for him with me. But the light soon fades; and, though I strain my eyes ever so much, I can but catch the faintest shadow of his figure in the twilight. When he nears the house, however, and gets under the shadow of the wall, I have no need to see him. I know his step so well, I could recognise him anywhere, blindfold, by that alone—a short, firm, honest, kindly step, at sound of which my heart of old used to leap wildly, and my pulses flutter, and thrill, and tingle almost to faintness. Ah! that was a strange, happy, agitating time. But now, when I hear his step, a full, quiet sense of happiness arises in my soul—a delicious security from danger and sorrow seems to wave, like angel wings, around my head. And, as I hasten to meet him with smiles of welcome, there is a depth in the glow of my tender emotions to which the rapture of earlier days is weak and shallow.

Mem.—I have heard say that romance ends with marriage; for my part, I think it only begins there. I mean the genuine romance of real life, not the transient phantasms, the ignorant fallacies of dreamy sentimentalism, but the ceaseless bona fide poetry of manifold active existence, when our interests and affections have tangible objects to deal with, and truth has waged the war with imagination, and triumphed over her. Surely this romance, so richly interwoven with every fibre of our pleasing, anxious, fragile being, grows with our growth, strengthens with our strength; and, never leaving us on this side the grave, is alone valuable, is alone deserving the name!

This evening, I opened my mind to George about Martha's idle habit of leaving the nursery whenever baby slept. I am almost sorry I told him. For he flew into such a passion at the trembling girl, and said such cruel things, threatening to dismiss her on the spot, that she fairly fell a-crying, begged pardon in the humblest manner, and seemed altogether so sorrowful and agitated, that I was vexed to see her. However, she promised in the end to be so careful for the future that I do not think we shall need to find fault again. But I am truly grieved to discover that my husband can be so very violent. His face grew absolutely fierce while talking to the nurse; and his eyes flashed with a terrible light, which I never saw in them before. He is dreadful when his feelings are roused. What if he should ever take occasion to be angry with me? I really could not stand it. His displeasure would quite crush me. I think my heart would just break at once. One thing, at any rate, I have learned by this little incident, viz., not rashly to complain to George of any private annoyance, but either bear it quietly or rectify it myself as best I may.

Mem.—I do not think it is advisable for married ladies to appeal to their husbands about the misconduct of servants. The mistress of a household, renouncing all foreign aid, should learn to govern by her own skill. Home is the female province, and thrives best under female rule. There should be no divided empire, else anarchy and confusion must ensue. Men are so used to bold measures in the great concerns of the world, that they are apt to run to extremes in small matters. And though they may do good, they clear the air as with a tempest, rather than scatter the clouds with gentle showers.

Poor Martha! I could scarce restrain my own tears at her distress. I may as well give her that claret-coloured merino gown of mine. It is not much worn; but George says it is too grave for me, and I daresay he is right.

October 15.

I was sitting by the window yesterday, looking out for George. He comes home earlier since the days are shortened. It was a mild afternoon for the season; and though the light had nearly waned away, a fine clear moon broke through the bare boughs of the trees, and not a breath stirred. Ours is not a very populous neighbourhood, and very few people pass and repass our door. I had not held watch long when my eye caught sight of a female figure in the distance, moving along in a loitering, expectant manner, as if waiting for somebody. She seemed tall and slender in person; but not being able to discern the face, I could form no idea of her possible age, though, from general appearances, I concluded that she was young. Neither in the uncertain dusk could I particularly distinguish her dress. I only noted that she wore a rather smartly shaped bonnet, and a short cloak, trimmed with some material that resembled fur. She kept mostly lingering at a point where the highway makes a sudden turn, dividing and going off in two directions, one leading towards our own and the neighbouring houses, the other striking away to the suburb on the left. Now, I must own that I felt just a little curiosity to know who this woman might be, and for whom she waited. A cloud obscured the moon for a few moments, and I lost sight of her. When I looked again she was no longer alone. There were two persons on the road. A man's figure appeared distinctly by her side; and that man—yes, no, my eyes did not deceive me—it was George who was standing with the stranger, and with whom she was talking! It was for him, then, that she had waited!

It was natural that I should hold fixedly by the window, feeling greater interest in the conference than perhaps I would have willingly allowed. The woman seemed much in earnest as she spoke, holding up her hand from time to time in an energetic manner, as if to enforce her argument. George was evidently listening attentively. And, to judge by his gesture as he in turn raised his hand deprecatingly, I should have fancied that he was decisively combating some suggestion and wishing to be rid of his companion. Still, however, she maintained her ground, walking when he walked (which he began to do towards home), stopping when he stopped, and growing altogether more and more excited, as the converse seemed nearing its termination, till at length, in manifest impatience, he fairly broke away from her and came hurrying along past the open fence, and so into the shadow of the wall which encloses our garden-plot. As for the stranger, she stood a minute or two irresolute, looking after him, then turned slowly down by the path to the left, and so disappeared from my view. Just then George's key rustled in the latch of the green door, and he came quickly into the house.

I ran down stairs (I had been sitting at our bed-room window as commanding a fuller view of the road), and met George in the hall, just as he was disencumbering himself of his hat and outer coat. The instant I looked at his face, I discovered signs of annoyance and disquiet. His brows were bent, his lips compressed, and his whole air abstracted. I did not speak. But he had heard my step; and when he saw me, it seemed as with an effort to regain composure that he said, in a constrained sort of voice,—

'Well, Kate; all ready for me as usual.'

'Always ready, and happy to get you home again, George.'

He threw his arm about my waist, and so led me into the dining-room.

I know I am very impulsive, and so is my husband. Bad hypocrites either of us would make. Yet, somehow, I could not speak just then of the little incident that was uppermost in my mind, and with which I could not help connecting the evident disturbance of his. Of course I expected every moment that he would himself lead to the subject of his interview with the woman, and tell me every particular regarding it, for I thought George could have no secrets from me; but he never once alluded to it, and I was restrained by a certain feeling (shall I call it pride?—I suppose I must, for want of a better explication) from putting the smallest inquiry that might indicate a wish to pry into his affairs. Should I ask to know what he plainly did not wish to disclose? Not I, truly! If there were anything he did not choose candidly to mention at once, let him wrap himself up in his taciturnity—let him ignore me altogether in the matter—let him hide his mystery carefully and by all means! The day might come when I should have a secret as well as he, and keep it too! What was the use of compulsive confidence? It was a contradiction in terms. No, no;—let there be free, spontaneous interchange—that alone was worth having. But perhaps there was nothing so wonderful to tell after all; it might be some mere trifle George scarce considered worth mentioning. Yet why, then, his ruffled countenance and altered demeanour? I cannot deny that my curiosity still clung to the circumstances; and though I tried to be piqued by his silence into caring nought about the business, it was rather a struggle with me to refrain putting the leading query that might have solved the difficulty.

Long ere dinner was over, George had quite regained his usual look and manner, and was chatting upon indifferent things. Now, when it is moonlight, we have a custom, at this season, of putting out the candles after having dined—pulling up the blinds; and, by the joint aid of Luna in the heavens, and a piece of fine, sparkling parrot coal thrown into the grate, we create a sort of phantasmagoric atmosphere very cheerful, novel, and suggestive. We indulged our whim last night; and were sitting thus, in a shifting, flickering, wizard kind of light, when, prompted I knew not how—the motive was wholly undefinable—I laid hold of George's hand (he was close by me on the sofa), and, looking earnestly into his face,

'George!' I said. 'I have been thinking again of late about that old Mr. Grey's will, and teasing myself with the possible idea that that son of his—who might have had the money, and whose it undoubtedly would have been but for me—may be in privation, in straits, in poverty, George; and I, however innocently, the cause of much distress to him and his family. Nay, somehow, I have taken it strongly into my head that this is actually the case. Now, seriously, George—I wish you would make some inquiry after the young man, and see whether I am wrong; and so satisfy my scruples.'

Was it fancy, or did my husband wince just the slightest conceivable degree under the unexpected appeal? He did not laugh as he had done before on the first and sole occasion when I had broached the subject. He appeared to start almost as I began; looked grave and yet graver as I proceeded; and when I had finished, answered not unkindly, yet decisively,

'Kate! I do wish you would banish, now and for ever, this absurd idea from your mind. The matter is all settled long ago; and I will not interfere in the disposal Mr. Grey chose to make of his wealth. The young man may be rich or poor; it is nothing either to you or me. He can scarcely be worth so much consideration on your part, when his own father saw meet to disinherit him.'

I confess I was crestfallen at these words. I looked piteously and a little reproachfully at my husband. After a pause, he resumed more gaily,

'You are very simple, Kate, and too imaginative by far; always day-dreaming, castle-building, weaving fine impossible tissues of charity and romance, and the golden age. For example, you were clear about marrying our Doctor Armstrong to Hester Thorndale. And Mr. Maberly informs me to-day that he has just popped the question to Lucy Johnson, after a four weeks' acquaintance! The silly child, it seems, thereupon went up stairs, and cried a good half-hour. (It should have been to the nursery, where she might have dried her eyes with her pinafore.) And when she came down again, Mr. Maberly took her on her knee, and told her what a pretty house she should have, and what nice clothes to wear (you know Lucy is penniless), and what a smart carriage to ride in, &c. &c. if she would only marry the Doctor. So, at last, after a trifle more coaxing, she wiped away her tears and laughed feebly, and said she 'would try.' Et voila c'est un fait accompli."

'But, George,' I cried—for, seeing him in his old familiar mood, I really could not restrain my curiosity any longer, and I do think I deserve credit for not breaking out much sooner—'tell me who was that woman you met on your way home to-day, and who detained you talking with her at the corner of the road?'

'Oh! you saw us from the window, did you?' quoth he, carelessly. 'That was a person who wished to consult me on business; but I am not going to take up her suit.'

With this he rose, and, seizing the poker, dealt a hearty stroke at the fire, which had sunk low and flameless. The coal, thus suddenly shattered into many fragments, blazed up and crackled as if bidding defiance to the moon, which chanced just then to slip her head into a noose of light cloud.

'Let us have the windows shut in now, and tea brought.'

The candles were re-lit accordingly, and the urn soon hissed on the table. Neither of us was so talkative as usual over that meal. And when the tray was removed, George commenced conning some papers he had taken from his pocket. I sat beside him: at my work, and pondered.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

THE MISSIONARY ABROAD. THIRD NOTICE.

MR. WADDELL'S West Indian mission ended in 1844, and in 1846 his African labours commenced. From the securities and comparative civilities of his Jamaica paradise, to the less healthy, somewhat dangerous, and rather barbarous kingdoms of Old Calabar, was a leap of latitudes which only missionaries or travellers of the Livingstonian type could take with honest buoyancy of heart. A true missionary is essentially a citizen of the world. His lips are attuned to the mingled music of many languages, and his heart is keenly alive to the very roots of sympathy. He is bold, ready, and cool; self-reliant and God-reliant; a man to face man whether black or white; and a man who is willing, at the suddenest summons, to encounter witch or devil, whether white or black. His resolution is eager for the most unpromising enterprise; he aims at the greatest, but is thankful for the smallest conquest; and, because his faith is telescopic, and describes the long results of time, his resignation is equal to any fate; for, if he should die to authenticate the truth and divinity of his message, he will die, knowing that the least of his achievements must necessarily have an eternity of success. If Mr. Waddell does not precisely answer to these wavering lines, it is probably because, as a missionary, his character is better than what they are meant to indicate.

About 3,200 miles nearly due south of London, is situated Calabar. The Calabar river—flowing along the lower edge of Upper Guinea, on the western coast of Africa—falls into the Bight of Biafra; from whose blue waters stand up, in tropical splendour, the beautiful islands of Fernando Po, Annabona, Prince's, and St. Thomas. Biafra's lesser twin, the Bight of Benin, lies about 100 miles to the north; and, between the two, shoots out into the sea the vast, swampy delta of the many-channeled Niger. This great river—rising as it does in the Kong Mountains, in the south-west of Bambarra, and flowing north-east to Timbuctoo, and then south-east to the Bight of Benin, a total course of 2,000 miles—is naturally regarded as the high road to the continent. Yet, while this is true as to the interior reaches of the Niger, in its hurry to get discharged into its Atlantic basin it divides itself into so many different channels, that among them all there is hardly one which can be pronounced of sufficient capacity to admit a first-class merchantman. In reality, its mouths are shut with ribbed gums of sand and toothed with devouring breakers. Calabar river, on the other hand, has a noble entrance, with a breadth of a dozen miles; which it maintains unobstructed up to Parrot Island, a distance of nearly thirty miles. Of course, Calabar river has also a bar; but Mr. Waddell says that it does not in the least interfere with commerce, being an extensive flat, with from three and a-half to four and a-half fathoms of water on it at all times, according to the state of the tide, and a channel two or three miles wide, with smooth water. Inside the bar, the basin is safe and extensive, having a depth of six or seven fathoms of water, with excellent holding ground. This basin would, in fact, form a capital harbour—the one thing above all others which Great Britain most requires on that coast, there being actually nothing of the kind from Sierra Leone to the Cape of Good Hope. Mr. Waddell even thinks that Parrot Island—which is not yet appropriated, and which has a fine depth of water close along the eastern side, where ships could lie as at a quay—might, from its commanding situation, become the emporium of the commerce of Central Africa. This idea is rendered more feasible, from the fact that Calabar river, at one part of its upper course, impinges so closely upon the Niger, that easy and safe communication could be opened between the two, by treaty with the natives, and the trade of the boundless interior reach its destination by Calabar more speedily and securely than in any other way.

The regal towns or capitals of Calabar, on Mr. Wad-dell's arrival in the country, were Duke and Creek Towns—King Eyamba reigning over the former, and King Eyo over the latter. Duke Town stands on the eastern or smaller river, while Creek Town is situated on a little stream which unites the eastern with the greater or western river. For some forty miles above Parrot Island, this huger trunk of the Calabar is divided into three channels by a singular continuity of alligatorish-looking islands, portions of which are swamp, while several patches of them have been converted into farms. Along both sides of the river, from the sea to the royal cities, and even above them, are extensive tracts of soft alluvial deposit, covered with forests of the mangrove tree, which seems to have a natural genius for the formation of new land, as it flourishes in the greatest luxuriance in the rich muddy shallows about the outlets of tropical rivers. Springing up within the tidal margins—and, like the banyan tree, shedding into the receptive soil innumerable shoots, which in their season become trees, to propagate their species, and their interlacing roots weaving themselves among the congenial slime into something like an all-grasping net of snakes—the mangrove intercepts the solid wealth washed down by the floods, and thus forms and consolidates new areas of soil at a rate which might astonish the geologist. By-and-by, when the land appears above the water, new species of vegetable life start into being; then man shows his conquering visage, when the aboriginal inhabitants of the virgin ground sicken and disappear. Man and the mangrove cannot flourish together.

In certain spheres of vegetable life, there is considerable luxuriance; but the proper soil of Calabar, although good, does not seem to be the richest in Africa. It is light and sandy, and singularly free from stones, none being found within eighty miles of the sea. To the agriculturist this might appear an excellent feature; but the architect and mason would find it a sorry field for the exercise of their peculiar genius. Calabar is not a mountainous country, the habitable parts consisting of gently swelling undulations, seldom more than two hundred feet in height, but growing more lofty towards the interior. Although the natives have subdued the primeval forests into farms, they have, of course, not learned the true science of farming. They can wrest farms from the wilderness, but they cannot—at least they do not—prevent the wilderness from assuming its original sway at the end of a succession of years. Take all and give nothing, is the practical precept of the Calabar farmer with reference to the soil, on which he mainly depends for a subsistence. He lacks the faculty to calculate results; and hence his best farms, receiving no compensatory nourishment, become barren and unprofitable, and ultimately clothe themselves in a fruitless mantle of bush. Under the fostering influence of this recurrent scrub, the soil is reinvigorated, and at intervals of five or ten years may again be cleared and cultivated; but when the black man, in his thankless greed, sucks the juice from its willing veins without giving the slightest payment in return, it again makes a grand resumption of its ancient reign, and dwells in the solitude of silent woods. It may be hence inferred that Calabar is not a pastoral country. Such is the case; and the miscellaneous cows, sheep, and goats, which exist in the country, are too few in number to merit the patriarchial epithet of flocks and herds. Milk, which is not used in the country, is regarded by the people as only fit for babies, though, curiously enough, some of their own children are able to scamper about the fields before they are weaned. The produce of the farms consist principally of yams, plantains, bananas, konkies, casada, and Indian corn.

As in more civilised countries, the 'aubong,' or native 'gentleman,' is a man of great importance on his own estate. He is also both like and unlike many native gentlemen elsewhere—in being exceedingly hospitable. One of them, whom Mr. Waddell visited at Ambo Town, was so highly gratified at the attentions of the strangers, that he provided ample refreshments, and made his son give the missionary a good fanning, which proved to be among the most delicious parts of the entertainment. One feature of the feast was a 'kid of the goats,' which, as a preliminary to its cooking, was presented to Mr. Waddell on a tray, to assure him that it was not monkey, dog, or civet-cat—delicacies which are greatly relished by native epicureans, though seldom by English travellers. The innate civility which prompted this touch of natural refinement, seems to find vent among the Calabarese in a certain rough code of good manners. They have many forms of salutation, which operate and are varied according to time, place, and circumstance. It is held to be rude and insulting, for instance, to pass any one, equal or superior, without friendly recognition; and it is even regarded as vulgar not to acknowledge the greeting of the meanest. Such rules are not imperative among ourselves; yet no lady or gentleman would disregard the honest salutation of a carter or mechanic.

Architectural science has made some slight progress in Calabar, although its most finished embodiments are still tentative and rudimental. 'Gentlemen' in that country, like gentlemen in Britain, have both town and country houses, which are adapted to the trading and farming capacities of their owners. Considering the insufficiency of building materials, they are generally well constructed, and seem at least perfectly suited to the climate and condition of the country. A gentleman's house consists of a quadrangular courtyard, surrounded by ranges of apartments, which open into it, the whole establishment communicating with the street by one main gate, which is guarded by a black porter. Painting is practised on a small scale; but native architects not having advanced to the conception of a window, glazing is an unknown art. A peeping-hole in the gable ends of each house is the nearest approach to our method of putting eyes into our dwellings. It is customary for a proprietor to have several yards, arranged in the manner indicated, for the accommodation of his servants, wives, and trade goods. The principal yard contains one state-room, in which all the valuable furniture and ornaments of the owner are arranged in the most artistic Calabar fashion; and the beauty of the completed picture may be inferred from the fact that the walls are generally adorned with rows of pewter-plates, brass-pans, and small looking-glasses. In houses of one storey, the floors, which are raised above the level of the ground, are, like many at the present day in Scotland, made of hard-baked clay; but, on account of their dryness, they are susceptible of a moderate degree of cleanliness. The arrangement of the house-rooms answers pretty nearly to the simplest form of Scotch division of their houses into a but and ben—the outer being a kitchen, and the inner a bed and store-room. Above the fireplaces—which are skilfully constructed of baked clay, and well adapted, says Mr. Waddell, to the best use of fuel for cooking purposes—lattice frames, or racks, are constructed to hold the necessary utensils, and also for the reception of fish or flesh which is intended to be smoked—an arrangement, we fear, which is not indicative of the best ventilation. The furniture made and used in Calabar is in beautiful conformity with the simplicity of the houses, and the inartificial wants of the people. In fact, the household plenishing of a common native could be stuffed into a cart or a canoe. Could there be a more unsuperfluous list than a cross-legged table, a few portable stools, each made from a single block, a pot or two, water calabashes, fans for the hot season, with a mat, pillow, and blanket for a bed, which a man could spread in a corner at night, and take on his shoulder in the morning and walk any distance! Of course, the character of the houses depends upon the position of the owner—the richer the man the better the house—the 'deck-houses' of the gentry being supplied with all kinds of furniture of British manufacture.

Arts and manufactures are naturally in a very primitive state in Calabar. The people, however, are not deficient in handiness, and what might be called imitative ingenuity. There are blacksmiths, carpenters, weavers, and potters among them; and the work they produce, although necessarily rough, is no doubt quite equal to the popular taste and requirements. The Ibo tribes, from the Niger, produce the cleverest blacksmiths, who also understand brassfounding. Native iron from the Qua mountains, regarded by the natives as superior to the English, has long been superseded by its rival. English anvils and bellows are imported by the chiefs for their smiths, who, unlike their English brethren, squat while working, and have all the materials about them on the same level. The native carpenters are also supplied with tools from England, which greatly facilitate their operations and improve their work. A primitive Calabar dress consisted of a piece of cloth, five or six feet long and three feet broad which was wrapped about the loins, and which was produced by the native weavers from an unspun fibre, made from the branches of a species of palm. But this grass cloth, though still produced and worn in other parts of the country, was beaten out of the Calabar market by the far-reaching and flashy fabrics of Manchester. Several countries on the Niger produce cotton cloth of strong spun thread, which is dyed with native indigo, and sent to market in broad and narrow stripes. But the great commercial product of the country is palm oil, of which, according to Mr. Waddell, about 5,000 tons are annually exported. As gold and silver are unknown, and the copper money uncoined, the trade is conducted by barter, and the oil is paid for with English manufactures of all kinds, and with salt, tobacco, and some of the fire-fluids, especially rum. The extraction of the palm oil from the oleaginous pulp which envelopes the nut is a singularly simple process. 'After the nuts are heated in pots, the pulp is rubbed off by the feet, in troughs of water; the oily vegetable matter which floats is skimmed off and boiled; the oil comes to the top, and is removed, and the refuse is thrown away. The nuts are also cast aside, to be burned in heaps, though the kernel is valuable if it could be got at. But the shell is so thick and hard that few spend time and labour on them. The oil is of a dark orange colour, and generally too thick to pour into bottles, or use in good lamps, without being filtered. When new, and carefully made, it tastes like fresh butter; and, moderately used in kitchen preparations, is palatable and wholesome. Natives could not do without it, and Europeans soon come to like it.'

Calabar zoology does not seem to be particularly attractive, judging from the lively catalogue of animals which Mr. Waddell enumerates as being native to the country. We have already named cows, goats, and sheep, the first of which is a small but beautiful animal, while the last is an ill-favoured creature, and hairy rather than woolly. Pigs are at a premium; they don't thrive; and die suddenly as if shot by pistolic strychnine. It is supposed that a gigantic snail—as big as a boy's fist—proves fatal to them, though safely eaten by the people. This fact seems to reverse our common gastronomical notions. In the matter of eating in this country, it is the pig that beats the man; in Calabar, it is the man that beats the pig—though it must be claimed for the British, but especially for the Irish, that though beaten by the living pig, they take ample revenge upon the same animal's dead pork by eating it in the form of baconian flitches, toothsome rashers, dream-compelling pies, and vermicular sausages. Horses are not native to Calabar, and hitherto all attempts to naturalise them have completely failed. Native dogs seem to be a worthless race of animals; they are hunted out of the towns; and English dogs, which are better-bred, are permitted to occupy the kennels of the unfortunate exiles. Cats are common in Calabar, both wild and tame, the latter being domestic as with us; the former is a handsome creature, barred like a tiger, long, lithe, and lightly made, and its motions gracefully insinuating. The detested rat is also there; but of the wild beasts, the alligator in the river, and the tiger in the bush, are both the most numerous and dangerous. Two species of the alligator are mentioned, the long and the broad snouted, the latter the most ferocious, being addicted to the dreadful pastime of capsizing canoes for the sake of their human cargoes. That beautiful son of lightning, the tiger, see where he comes, like a walking vision, from the silent solitudes of the desert to the edge of the slumbering town! Great-eyed, long-paced, and soundless footed, he moves around the dreaming habitations like

Satan when he paced brooding round the abodes of the innocent angels, his soul big with marvellous rebellion and hungry for eternal empire. The radiant beast stalks round the voiceless huts, as if to bind them in a ring-spell of fire; halting, he shoots his sphered eyes into the conscious gloom, selects his little victim, dark but innocent, and with one vast bound, he snatches it from the pillow, and as he returns to the unsearchable night, he drags behind him a long stream of voices, whose woful waves murmur, and fall, and die on the utmost edge of despair. This is no fanciful picture. Mr. Waddell records that 'At Old Town one night a poor boy, who had incautiously fallen asleep in the mansionhouse kitchen, without locking the door, was carried off by one of those ferocious beasts. His terrible shrieks were heard; but nothing could save him. Next day the remains of him were found.' On the upper part of the principal river, hippopotami abound; while on the banks of the lesser stream his truncated majesty the elephant promenades in his own royal zoological garden. Besides several species of deer, antelopes, and gazelles, there are innumerable monkeys—acrobats of the forest—who gambol about with such Shaksperian bounteousness of comicality and good-humour, that the traveller begins almost to believe that all Africa at least is a circus, got up especially for the exhibition of the genius of monkeydom. Fortunately, or perhaps unfortunately, the good sense of the traveller is preserved by the plentiful presence of snakes and serpents, famous from of old for dispelling illusions of ignorant ecstasy. The man who makes his abode in Calabar must be content to live next door to the cobra de capello, the boa constrictor, and their numerous family of glittering sinuosities. Merely to think of these bright companions—the 'double-headed snake,' the 'flying snake,' the 'horned snake,' the 'crested swamp snake,' and all their 'cursed kin'—were of itself sufficient to sober the most romantic imagination. Other zoological phenomena are furnished by the ants of Calabar, of which there are various species, both white and black. In the evening of a swarming season, they pour out of their holes, as from a fountain, in continuous and multitudinous streams. One kind might be called the edible ant; for when the lamps are lighted, and they come pouring into the houses, covering the furniture like black snow alive, the children capture them in handfuls, drown them in a basin of water, and finally, says Mr. Waddell, 'make a delicious stew of them!' Judging from the habits of the white-headed ants, we are convinced that they must be the souls of metamorphosed lawyers. These wigged creatures have such a wooden appetite that, if they were permitted, they would devour every timber house in the town. Nor have they altogether forgotten their literary tastes and avocations, being so fond of books that, unless they were prevented, they would soon not leave a library in Calabar. Nothing comes amiss to them but gilt edges, which they do not appear to relish—probably from some dim recollection that in their state of humanity gilt edges, too frequently implied tinsel insides. But the large black ant is the most destructive of its tribe—it is the gorilla of ants, being actually half-an-inch in length. From their holes they swarm out in millions, and attack the houses with the voracity of the Russian soldiery in Poland. Every digestible substance disappears into their innumerable and insatiable maws. With the instinct of their betters, they have quite a passion for the pantry. They pour themselves into every accessible corner, chest, or safe; they attack dressed food like a horde of black Vandals; and it is reported of them that they can strip the flesh from the bones of a new-killed goat in a single night. Dogs, cats, rats, mice, cockroaches, centipedes—everything with wings or feet, fly before them; and so would man if he could, but he is compelled to face them as best he can, which is only with partial success. The natives turn them back in their incursions with glowing embers; but as such a method would have been dangerous on a wooden floor, the missionaries tried to sweep them out. This, however, was just an African version of Mrs. Partington's attempt to sweep back the Atlantic with a broom. The animals rushed back in tumultuous waves, dashing up the broom-handle like black spray, and biting the hands and arms. Their expulsion is insured by sprinkling the floor with spirits of turpentine, diluted aquafortis, sulphuric acid, vinegar, or lime juice. Another member of this singular family is called the tree-ant, which, however, is perfectly harmless, and builds among the branches immense black nests, which are chambered like the honeycomb of the bee. In Calabar, the ornithologist would find some scope for the exercise of his peculiar science. Besides common fowl and Muscovy ducks, which are rather plentiful, the country abounds with a wild sort of Guinea fowl, the red-tailed parrot, the pelican, white crane, sparrow-hawk, fish-hawk, brown owl, green dove, toucan, king-fisher, and vulture, or great scavenger crow. Of the two species of bat, the house and the bush bat, the latter is a vampire, large as a rat, with a head like a horse's, long canine teeth, and wings proportioned to the size of its body. As it flits through the woods at night, it startles the silence with a wild piercing scream. Of the fishes peculiar to Calabar waters, Mr. Waddell mentions the shark and the maniti or sea-cow—the former the fiend of the sea, prowling about the mouths of the rivers, seeking whom it may devour. Mr. Waddell says nothing about the flora of the country, which, however, he thinks would yield ample compensation to the labours of the naturalist.

The Calabar seasons are divided into the dry, the rain, and the tornado—the first consisting of four months—December to March—when the 'smokes,' which are distinct from the morning fogs, prevail. Properly, the 'smokes' consist of a dry haze, which loads the atmosphere, dulls the eyes, parches the skin, withers vegetation, and hangs a blanket of obscurity over the face of nature. This condition of things is usually heralded and ended by a tornado. The tornado months are before the rains, in April and May; and after them, in October and November. From June to September is the rain season, when everything seems damp and chilly, clothes cannot dry, and books become blue-moulded. Mr. Waddell is of opinion that October and November are the most unhealthy months in the year, when the sudden change from clouds and fogs, and rains, to clear skies and piercing sunbeams, produce fevers among Europeans. Indeed, the climate, generally, is most exhausting and debilitating to the European constitution. It sucks out the vital energy so thoroughly that five years' endurance of it renders a complete change of climate necessary. 'It is, however, a great thing that missionaries can live there five years at a stretch, and after one year in Britain, return prepared for another campaign.' There spoke the true spirit of the missionary, who is ever ready to work up to the very doors of death, and pour out the juices of his body, if haply, in doing so, he can add growth and fecundity to the newly-planted slips of knowledge, the palms of God, from which the black African may extract those oils, sweet and divine, whose taste is as the taste of eternal life.

Such are a few facts concerning the scene in which Mr. Waddell found himself when he arrived in Calabar. We shall briefly take note of his adventures there in our next, which shall also be our concluding notice.

THE CRUISE OF THE HERMIONE

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

'A brave vessel,

Who had, no doubt, some noble creatures in her.'—The Tempest.

'2d July, 18—; Thursday.

'DEAR JACK,

'COME down as fast as you like. The final arrangements are all made, and at long last she's ready for sea. We sail on Monday; so you had better look sharp. Come by the night mail. I will meet you.

'Yours, BOB MARTIN.

'P. S.—Come at once, now. By ten o'clock on Monday morning, I hope to be fairly under weigh, on our long-talked-of cruise. Hurrah!'

Long talked of, indeed! For the last three months it had been Bob Martin's text—almost the sole theme, in fact, of his letters to me—his yacht, and the cruise round the west coast of Scotland. Bob Martin and I were old associates. We had been boys together in a West India house in Glasgow. Bob was now a junior partner in that house. I had been for some years settled in London. Bob and I had maintained an occasional correspondence. For three months, however, it had been more than an occasional one. First came the narrative of the purchase of the yacht, followed by innumerable descriptions of her, varying from two to ten pages in length; then each succeeding week brought an account of the progress of the repairs and improvements on her which were going forward; then came the programme of the projected cruise; then various very pressing invitations that I should form one of the party; then daily bulletins to hold myself in readiness to go north on a moment's notice; and, finally, written on a torn scrap of paper, the above despatch.

I had not at first felt very much inclined to avail myself of Bob's kindness; for—though I considered that doing so would be as agreeable a mode as any of spending a month's furlough—I had no great confidence either in his barque or in his seamanship; for, despite the glowing terms in which Bob wrote regarding her, the Hermione was plainly not quite A 1 at Lloyd's; and a trip in a steamer to Bristol, one to Liverpool, and another to Dublin, had, to my certain knowledge, been the whole extent of Bob's migrations by sea. My fears on the first score had been lessened, however, by Bob's solemn and reiterated assurance that, with moderate weather, and five or ten minutes at the pump every morning, the Hermione would be as tight as a bottle. My fears on the second score had been removed by the announcement that he had engaged an old Highland fisherman to accompany him as pilot, to whom he purposed delegating the entire command. 'He's an old man-of-war's-man,' wrote Bob. 'He can work a ship like a first-lieutenant, and knows every creek and corner of the coast like a-b, ab.'

On the evening of the day on which I received Bob's final epistle, I proceeded, in terms thereof, by rail to Glasgow. I found Bob waiting for me; and, after a most affectionate reception, was conducted to his lodgings. If I had before been both wearied and amused with the prominence which the yacht and the cruise held in Bob's correspondence, I was considerably more so now with the prominence which they held in his conversation. He rattled away without intermission—the Hermione, the ship's stores, the places we were to visit, the sights we were to see—wishing every few minutes that Monday morning were come.

'I don't think ever a Saturday and Sunday took so long to pass before,' said Bob. 'It's only two days, to be sure, but it looks to me like an age; it seems as if they never would pass.'

Pass they did, however; very slowly with Bob, who appeared to get more and more excited every hour; but, as I employed them in visiting one or two of my former haunts, and calling upon a few old friends, they passed very quickly with me.

'Well,' said Bob, as we walked home together on Sunday from an evening service, 'this day is nearly at a close. I don't think I was ever so glad of anything in my life—though you may think me a heathen for saying so. By-the-by, I forgot to show you the chart and parallel I bought yesterday. I got the chart for half-a-crown—cheap, wasn't it? We start for Greenock by the first train, you know, at twenty minutes past seven. We'll be there about half-past eight; then half-an-hour's walk will take us to Gourrock; so that by ten o'clock at the latest I hope we'll be fairly under weigh. I think I told you that she was anchored in Gourrock Bay? Stewart and Starry—heavens! they're the two fellows who are going along with us—are to meet us at the station; but I think I told you that too. There was another fellow who was to have gone; but he can't come. Perhaps it's just as well, for we haven't a berth for him, and he would have had to sleep on the table. I say, I think we had better turn in whenever we get home; we'll need to be up, you know, at five. If you waken, you'll waken me, will you?—and if I waken, I'll waken you.'

At five o'clock next morning, Bob knocked at the door of my room. Being awake, I answered the summons. At a quarter-past six, he knocked again; and, on my desiring him to come in, he entered, dressed, a hat-box in one hand, an umbrella in the other, the chart and the parallel under his arm.

'Hilloa! Is this all the length you are? I say, we'll be late!'

'Late, Bob! what are you talking about? It's only a quarter-past six. The train doesn't go for more than an hour; twenty minutes will take us to the station; I'll be ready in ten.'

'Well—perhaps,' said Bob. 'I've been up, however, for more than two hours. I hardly slept a wink the whole night. Beautiful day, isn't it? So fortunate! If it would only continue this way for three weeks, I don't care if it rained cats and dogs for a twelvemonth! I say, Jack! I don't see how you are to manage with all the things you can have in that little portmanteau. I'm taking a whole lot of things. I got them sent down last week, you know; two trunks—a big one and a little one, and a band-box, and a bag, besides my collar-box, and this hat-box here.'

'Why? What?'

'Why, you know, I'm taking three suits, and my overcoat, and a plaid, and a railway-wrapper, besides my Mackintosh, and a sou'-wester, and all that—we'll be getting wet, and so forth; and then I'll be the better of my hat, if we go to call on any one: Starry, you know, has some friends away where we're going—some young ladies among them, too. I wish you would hurry, though. I know, by the way you're taking it so coolly, that we'll be late.'

I allayed Bob's anxiety by applying with more energy to my toilet; and in the course of a quarter of an hour—during which Bob, under the impression that he was facilitating my progress, kept handing me things when I did not want them, and setting them down again in places where they were found with difficulty when I did want them—I announced myself as being at his service; whereupon Bob tucked his chart tighter under his arm and hurried away, while I took up my little portmanteau, and leisurely followed.

We reached the station a little before seven, five-and-twenty minutes before the starting of the train. Bob's friends were not yet arrived—I had not expected that they would be. But although the booking-office was not yet open—and the only passengers who had come forward were an old woman, who kept knocking at the window with the handle of her umbrella, and an Irish labourer, who lay with his bundle under his head, and his shillelagh by his side, asleep at the foot of one of the pillars—Bob could scarcely be persuaded but that they would arrive too late.

As the hour drew on, Bob's impatience approached to excitement. He walked hurriedly backwards and forwards; and three several times went half way across the bridge which spans the Clyde close to the station, to reconnoitre.

'I never saw such a pair of humbugs!' said Bob, as he returned the third time without having seen them. 'But I'll let them see! Come, we'll get our tickets, and go without them. I'll wait just ten minutes,' he added, taking out his watch; 'and if they don't come then—Hurray! there they are!'

Coming leisurely across the bridge, were a tall stout fellow, smoking a meerschaum, and a taller thin one, with a consumptive mustache of very fine texture, and whitish hue.

'Look sharp, you lazy wretches!' cried Bob.

'Hilloa! what's the row?' said Stewart, the stout fellow, as he came up.

'Row!—we'll be late, that's all. We've been waiting here for more than half-an-hour! Jack, this is Mr. Stewart; and this is Starry Heavens—I beg your pardon, Starry—I mean Mr. —. Oh, confound the mister—this is Johnnie Crauford.'

Stewart acknowledged the introduction by a nod; while Mr. Crauford held out a very lady-like hand, and gave mine a languid shake.

'You got my things, I suppose, Bob, and my contributions to the ship's stores?' said Stewart. 'But you aren't going to-day, are you?'

'Going to-day!' repeated the astonished Bob. 'What, in the name of all that's wonderful, do you mean?'

'Just that it won't be of the least use,' said Stewart. 'There is hardly a breath of wind, and what there is is dead ahead from the southward.'

'And what on earth difference will that make?'

'Well, that is a question to be sure! Why, it will make the difference that, if we weigh anchor at all, we will have the pleasure of dodging about all day without making an inch of our course; if, indeed, we aren't driven ashore. Of course we might get a cast out with the ebb-tide, and anchor somewhere during the flood; but for all we would make that way, it would only be a day lost, and, if this weather continues, perhaps three or four of them.'

'We'll be late for the train, with all this talk,' said Bob. 'Come along, Jack! Come away, Stewart, come away! What's the use of all this nonsense?'

'Stewart,' said Mr. Crauford (Mr. Crauford, Bob had previously informed me, was, during winter, a student of the arts at the Glasgow University—whether for the church or the medical profession he had not finally decided—and, during summer, rambled about the country, writing poetry and collecting botanical specimens)—'Stewart,' said Mr. Crauford, 'if I might presume to offer a suggestion, I think we had better go. I consider that it must be infinitely preferable to Mr. Martin, who has been for so many months confined and harassed by the cares of business—it must be infinitely preferable to him, as it is to me, to be sailing on the beautiful—a—Frith of Clyde, even without making much progress, feasting our eyes upon the verdant hills, and inhaling the sweet breath of heaven, as it comes impregnated with the—a—smell of heather bloom.'

I could hardly repress a smile at the style of Mr. Crauford's language, which was rendered considerably more peculiar by his manner of enunciation. I thought I now saw the origin of the soubriquet of Starry Heavens. Neither Martin nor Stewart, however, appeared to notice anything particular in it; probably they were too familiar with it to do so.

'Mighty fine, I daresay, Starry,' said Stewart; 'but I believe we have all inhaled the—what is it?—often enough already to have all the romance worn off it; and as for being harassed by the cares of business, I believe I have had just as much of that sort of thing as Martin has [Stewart was studying for the bar]; and yet I would twenty times rather have another week of it than have two days of knocking about in the Frith doing nothing, whistling for wind, and never moving out of the bit.'

'Come along, come along!' cried Bob. 'What's the good of all this? If you're coming, come; and if you're going to stay, stay—I'm off!'

'Well, I'll go, then,' said Stewart. 'Anything to keep you quiet.'

'There's the bell!' cried Bob; 'we'll be late! Quick, Stewart, get the tickets—we'll pay you again!'

'Indeed, my boy!' said Stewart, executing the elegant finger and nose symbol, 'would I ever see a farthing of it? Give me the money, and I'll soon get them—eighteenpence each—come on!'

'There! there! And look sharp about it, will you? There's another bell!'

'Ay, my boy! you're wide awake; but I'm not quite asleep. Come on with another sixpence! It's eighteenpence. I told you, didn't I?'

'It's only a shilling! We're going second class, aren't we?' said Bob. 'Good enough, is it not?'

'Good enough for you, perhaps. I'm going first. Tut! Come on with the sixpence, if it were only for the decency of the thing. I got half-a-crown from you, Starry?'

'Then you may enter the change to bad and doubtful debts,' said Bob. 'Stewart! Stewart! there's the last bell! It's no use your going now. We've lost the train! Give me back my eighteenpence! I knew this would be the way!'

'It's only a steamer at the quay,' said Stewart. 'Go up stairs. I'll be after you in a second.'

We went up stairs accordingly, but reached the platform to find the train moving off. 'Stewart! Tom! Look sharp! Quick! The train is off! Oh my knee! Confound that thing! Never mind. In you go! There! We're all right! I got a most abominable—Hi, Tom! Here! Quick! In you come!'

'Look, now—just look at that!' said Stewart, when we had contrived to pull him into the carriage, out of the grasp of one of the railway-porters, who had been endeavouring to enforce the regulation regarding the entrance of trains in motion, by holding on by the skirt of his coat. 'Just look at it—do! One of the tails of my new coat, that I haven't had for a fortnight, torn right half-way across! And the shank of my pipe, too! It's enough to make a fellow swear—pulling at me there by the arms as if I were a four-inch cable! Just look—just look at it! But, I say, what have you done with Starry?’

‘Why, I thought he was —’

‘I had seen him,’ I said, ‘go across the street a few minutes before we came up stairs.’

‘There he is,’ cried Bob. ‘I wonder how he got in. They shut the doors, don’t they?’

Looking out, I saw Mr. Crauford running along the platform at full speed, carrying a small yellow cane in his hand, to purchase which probably it was that he had gone.

‘Hi—hilloa—Starry!’ shouted Stewart. ‘Come down by the first train; we’ll wait for you at the hotel.’

But we were too far for him to hear. He ran to the end of the platform, lifted his arms, let them fall again to his side, waved his cane, and turned away.

‘Poor Starry! he’s a queer codger too,’ said Stewart. ‘I say, Bob, see if you can’t fix up that coat of mine. Well, I declare! of all the — just look at the carriage we are in!—a third class standing carriage, among a lot of.—Just look!’

‘I couldn’t help it,’ said Bob; ‘it was the first that came. It’s four shillings gone for nothing; but it can’t be helped. Sit up here on this cross bar, and perhaps you’ll be more comfortable.’

‘No, thank you. If you have any particular love for sitting in such close proximity to the point of a pick-axe, I haven’t.’

‘But, Tom, by-the-by, we can change carriages at Paisley—that’s the first station, you know—can we not?—the four shillings, you know.’

‘Oh, bother the four shillings! You may change if you like; I intend to stay where I am. But after all the trouble I had to get them—the window was shut, and I had to—Here! I wish one of you would fix up my coat-tail for me.’

A fruit girl who stood by volunteered her services. She produced a needle and thread from her pocket, and Stewart’s garment was soon temporarily repaired. Stewart then lit a cigar, put his head out, and smoked in defiance of the Company’s prohibition; Martin closed his eyes, and his head soon began to bob, so that I thought he would have tumbled from his perch; while I entered into conversation with one of the Irish labourers, of whom there were about ten or twelve in the carriage. Stewart did not speak, nor did Bob waken, till, in the course of an hour, the train stopped at Greenock.

We got out, and proceeded at once to the hotel, where it had been arranged that we should breakfast. Breakfast over, Bob was for setting off at once for Gourrock, where the Hermione lay, and leaving Crauford to his fate. Stewart, however, would not listen to this; and at last, after a good deal of bickering, he took a leaf from his pocket-book, and expressed a purpose of writing Starry a note, which he accordingly did in these words:—‘Dear Starry,—Bob is in the fidgets. Entre nous, he’s a humbug—in some things at least. We’re off. Follow as fast as you can. If you don’t, I don’t think he will wait, and you will lose your chance of inhaling the fresh sea breeze, as it comes impregnated with—what was it?—tarry ropes, and bilge water, however, will do.—Yours, most hastily, TOM STEWART.’

This document was consigned to a waiter, with the requisite instructions; the bill was paid; a boy was procured to carry my portmanteau; and off we started for Gourrock, where we arrived after a brisk walk of half-an-hour.

UP THE MISSISSIPPI TO NEW-ORLEANS.

PART I.

FARRAGUT’s fleet had thundered at its gates, the Stars and Stripes of Yankeedom were flaunting from mastsheads and turrets, and the modern Nero had proclaimed martial law in the ‘Crescent city,’ when I took my first cruise up the Mississippi.

I had long wished to visit the ‘Father of Rivers,’ as its Indian name implies; and now a double interest was attached to our journey, from the nature of events preceding it, and the dire effects still to be seen. It was a lovely calm evening, in the month of June, when, after a month at sea, our masthead man gave the joyful intelligence that there was a ‘Light right ahead!’ Early in the morning, for we could approach no closer to the land at night, the pilot came on board who was to conduct our vessel up the river; and a wonderful man is a Mississippi pilot, with his hard bronzed features, as he comes on board, with a smile on his face, as if welcoming us to his native shores. His duties are onerous and responsible, as he has sole charge of safely navigating the ship. Nor is his actual labour a sinecure, as he stands on the ‘bridge,’ for hours together, without once looking behind or engaging in conversation. Long practice has made him familiar with every stake and stone on the river’s bank; and with these he forms his sailing angles, with a most mathematical precision. ‘Starboard—starboard it is, sir! Port—port it is, sir! S-t-e-a-d-y—s-t-e-a-d-y, sir!’ And, with a foot of water beneath our keel, we have crossed the bar, and are fast steaming up the river.

To the traveller who has visited Rhineland, seen its deep fast-flowing waters, and dreamed over its traditions—who, in some floating hotel, has steamed up Hudson or St. Lawrence, admired their grandeur and venerated their wealth—or who, in homelier rambles, has wandered by Clutha’s meandering stream, or spent some halcyon days in its nestling villages, there is left for the Mississippi but one attribute of praise—Greatness. Ever rolling onward, for nearly four thousand miles—through dismal swamps, sombre forests, dreary prairies, and populous cities; watering nearly a fourth of the North American continent; bringing to the world’s markets the produce of a million square miles of territory; and bearing on its bosom, to the most remote interior of the New World, the commerce of every nation—one cannot but contemplate it with a feeling of immensity. The ‘mighty Missouri,’ far from rolling ‘on to the sea,’ as the popular version hath it, but contributes its waters to swell the Mississippi. The Ohio, too, of ‘Nancy Till’ celebrity, but goes to increase its noble stream.

The first impression, however, is disappointment at the total absence of all such picturesque scenery as had probably been anticipated; and the visitor who may have read Longfellow’s glowing description of the ‘golden stream,’ as depicted in his ‘Evangeline,’ may come to the hasty conclusion that it was truly a poet’s dream. But as the stranger travels onward in his journey, new beauties appear again and again; and he is delighted to find that every mile of progress, and every bend of the river, opens up to his view scenery of a more and more enchanting nature, and of that wild, majestic kind which does not pall by repetition, and which, after all, is the true measure of the genuinely beautiful.

The mouth of the river, or 'Delta,' as it is called, from having a triangular form like that Greek letter, is lined for some miles with a low swampy shore, scarcely elevated above the level of the waters, and which is completely inundated during their annual rise, the only vegetation existing being the long, slender cyperaceæ, which grows to an immense height; and among which, in countless numbers, the white storks (ciconia alba) are seen wading about with majestic and graceful forms. Further on, where the banks are somewhat higher, and the agriculturists' hand begins to appear, plantations come into view, waving with rice or bristling with sugar-cane. Here and there stands a planter's house among a shrubbery of cypress, and near it rows of neatly-built small whitewashed cabins for the slaves. The orange, lemon, myrtle, cypress, China trees, and a dwarf species of cedar, grow along the banks, and throw a beautiful shade in the current. Here and there are broad lagoons or bayous, on the muddy banks of which the pike-alligator basks himself by day, and myriads of bull-frogs set up their hoarse voice by night. Turkey buzzards—those aerial scavengers—hover over their prey in flocks, and by night the firefly (lampyris corusia) darts through the shrubs, emitting a meteoric light of indescribable beauty, and far surpassing the feeble spark of our glow-worm. Of the many forms of animal life, however, observed on the Mississippi, there are two only which I will, at another time, intrude upon the reader's attention—two specimens of natural history, both curious in themselves and interesting to us; both blights on humanity—the slave and the mosquito!

While passing up the river, nothing astonished us more than the defences of New-Orleans, as seen in Forts Philip and Jackson—those forts which the Southernists boasted so much of as rendering their metropolis impregnable, but were so easily passed by the Yankee gunboats. Either a blinded confidence in their generals, or an undue appreciation of the strength of the fortifications, must have misguided them, in leading them for a moment to suppose that two unprotected earthworks, nearly opposite each other, situated at a bend of the river, and mounting but comparatively few guns of a small calibre, could withstand the combined attack of Farragut's fleet in the Gulf. However successful the South may be in gaining that independence for which she has so nobly fought and bled on the 'red field of strife,' the fall of New-Orleans will ever be a stain upon their victorious army. None of their cities had better natural defences. By land, it is all but unapproachable by an invading army, and a hundred miles of river could, with but little military skill, easily be made impassable to the strongest vessel afloat.

It was moonlight as we approached the city. Our good ship was tearing along at full speed, and the deafening 'blast' of the furnaces was roaring in our ears. I was sitting in the port gangway, enjoying a mild Havana, and musing on novelty, as strangers in strange places will do, when suddenly my attention was arrested by a voice from the look out, exclaiming 'Sail right a-head!' It was in a bend of the river, and we had come upon her suddenly. 'Ease her! Hard a-port! Stop her!'—But too late. In a moment I heard a crash; and looking into the water, I saw a small vessel floating keel uppermost, and heard the shrieks of her drowning crew. 'Away life-boat's crew!' and a cutter being lowered, was immediately sent to the rescue. The upset boat was a lugger, going down to Fort-Jackson, and having on board seven men, most of whom were asleep at the time of collision. A careless look out had been kept, and no lights exhibited on board. Of the seven unfortunates now struggling in the water, six were happily saved; the seventh made the muddy bed of the Mississippi his last resting-place. As the saved ones were dragged over the ship's side, more dead than alive, I seized one poor fellow, and with difficulty got him below to my cabin. He was pale and trembling with fright and exhaustion, he could neither speak nor stand; his body quivered, and his pulse flagged. I laid him gently on my cabin floor, and endeavoured to make him swallow some stimulants and remove his dripping clothes. He beckoned me aside; and gently raised his hand to his bosom, and with an imploring look of earnest pity, drew forth——his pocket-book and——counted his dollar notes!!!

It was then I knew what a Yankee means by the 'Almighty dollar.'

THE PHANTOM PUNT; OR, THE HOWL OF GUILT. PROLOGUE—ROUND THE CAULDRON.

CHAPTER II.

THE possessor of the deep bass voice was seated at the top of the table, with a peculiarly purply-clammy look about the face, which would have suggested the recent discussion of an ample and hot repast, even supposing there had been no evidence to that effect in the debris of eatables which covered the table. The back of his chair was propped against the corner of the chimney-piece, his stalwart limbs were stretched across the fender in luxuriant enjoyment of the genial heat from the grate, which seemed to travel upwards from his toes and ooze out of his face in seething beads of perspiration.

The first glimpse of the man with the bass voice convinced me that he prided himself on his bass voice—on the ample chest from which the bass voice rose—and on the double-breasted mother-o'-pearl-buttoned waistcoat which covered the ample chest. When the gentleman with the bass voice wished me good evening, and asked me to take a chair, a casual observer regarding my face, would not fail to have detected a couple of tears starting into my eyes, and a general tender expression beaming across my face, which might have suggested—had the casual observer been of a sympathetic temperament—a love disappointment in early life, or a recent domestic affliction. The casual observer, however, would have been wrong: the expression was caused by the bass voice of my friend of the ample chest. Strange that my mind should have wandered back, in a moment, to my heart's first home—the scenes of my childhood; and strange that, for a few minutes, I should see (in my mind's eye) the quaint old pew still possessed by my family in the quaint old village church, nestling among trees—the homely face of the reverend divine who used to preach from that pulpit—and the quaint attire of the simple country folks who listened to the words of wisdom. In a word, the bass voice of my friend of the ample chest possessed such a striking and pleasing analogy to the deep tones of the organ of the quaint old village church, that it would have been a sheer impossibility for me to have restrained my mind from wandering away back to those early scenes, even supposing I had just finished a hearty meal off the lotos plant.

'Alexander, just fetch a drop of water for the gentleman; he looks ill,' were the next words which issued from the gifted throat of the gentleman at the fire.

'Not at all, thank you,' I answered, sitting down on a chair, and assuring the company that it was of no consequence.

I should like to have a glimpse for five minutes, and the liberty of touching with my hand, the individual—male or female—who, upon suddenly feeling faint in a promiscuous company, and having the same offer made to him or her, would not deprecate any attempt of the company to assist him or her, with the assurance that it was of no consequence whatever. I entertain the same opinion about such a person as I do of the Wandering Jew—that he or she is entirely mythical.

'Excuse me, gentlemen—first, for intruding upon you unannounced; and, secondly, for manifesting any slight symptoms of emotion at the tones of the gentleman's voice who occupies the chair; the voice revived old and cherished recollections, with which we are all more or less visited, and which many casual circumstances accidentally call up.'

This was addressed by me, in a conciliatory and apologetic manner, to the company in general, and would have been followed up by a few instances, which I had at my finger-ends, showing that my own case was not entirely without precedent, had not I observed a sudden change come over the appearance of the gentleman in the chair, who suddenly drew in his legs, sat bolt upright, gasped with his mouth, stared amazedly with his eyes, and, by some internal process, peppered his face with a fresh lot of beady drops of perspiration, and gasped out, in a tone of great excitement, 'Good gracious! No; it cannot be. Yes it is. Am I alive?' 'Angels and ministers of grace!' Yes! No! Yes! My eyes! This was trifling compared with what followed. He suddenly sprang up, seized me by the shoulder, pulled off my coat, broke my gold sleeve-studs in unbuttoning my shirt, rolled up the sleeve, regarded the fleshy part of my right arm with the most searching anxiety, then dropping it, sank down with a most profound sigh, which might have expressed either relief or disappointment—manifested symptoms of an apoplectic fit—and gasped out, 'Pardon me, pray. I was wrong. I apologise.' I discovered afterwards that the gentleman with the bass voice had a brother, who, in early life, had been marked with the representation of a lemonade bottle on the right arm, and after the operation, had disappeared, and had never been heard of since. This may account for his agitation at my appearance.

With the sense of my gratuitous, and I was not certain whether welcome or unwelcome, visit upon me; but, through natural timidity, inclining to the latter opinion, especially after having been so impressed with the bass voice of the chairman, I refrained from making any comment upon this curious conduct; and, addressing myself to the party at the left of the table, mentioned that it would probably strike him in the light of an intrusion the fact of my having ventured to join them; to which he replied politely, 'Not at all, sir; happy to make your acquaintance. Might I take the liberty of asking your name?'

'Allow me then, sir, to introduce you to my friend, Mr. Puldub [ceremony of introduction gone through on both parts], Mr. Plug [ceremony of introduction], and your humble servant [bowing], Alexander Flowdod.' Mr. Puldub was my friend of the bass voice, who was not quite recovered from his late excitement when he rose to greet me. Mr. Plug was a little dark-haired man, with a large nose, small eyes, no whiskers, and a general haggard intellectual look, which inclined me to the opinion, on further acquaintance, that he would sooner or later fall a victim to his brain. The fact of his eyes being so far sunk in his head, and both of them having a sort of peculiar inward squint, rather favoured this supposition, and impressed me with the idea that he entertained the hope that if he could once turn them round altogether he might possibly be able to make them bear upon his brain; the contemplation and superintendence of the workings of which would, I felt certain, be of much more importance to him than anything sublunary which he had as yet come across. Mr. Flowdod had the same brain look, with this exception, that whereas Mr. Plug endeavoured to keep his down by heaping up rich masses of dark hair, and adding to the weight by persevering grease saturation, which 'tainted the ambient air around him,' Mr. Flowdod seemed to entertain the idea that the skull which nature had given him was not in proportion to the airy and unconstrained nature of his brain, which required space to work in; and there was a great probability of the injured brain some day forcing its way through the skull, and, Phoenix-like, soaring up to Jove and singing for joy of its happy release. There was a sort of confident, resigned look about his face, which suggested that he was also well aware of the limited room in his head—that he had, in early life, had a presentiment to that effect, and had given his head the hint to grow larger—that the hint had been neglected—and that it would neither be a matter of astonishment nor regret to him if his brain found it impossible to stand it any longer—that he would certainly not throw any obstacle in the way in the shape of hair—and had therefore taken measures to ensure premature baldness, and been successful. He had also a peculiar way of putting his hand up, in a delicate way, and flitting over the smooth surface of his skull, as if for a slight crack or indentation; and a habit, after every one of these testings, of putting his hand down again, and smiling significantly, as much as to say—'Not any appearance yet? Ah! the day is sure to arrive. It is impossible to put up with it much longer. I prognosticated it long ago. See if I do not turn out correct?'

'Alexander,' said Puldub, with strong signs of emotion in the tone of his voice, 'ring the bell; instruct the waiter to clear away the dinner things; and ask our guest what he'll have to drink. I shall have some brandy, hot, with a little lemon in it.'

'Flowdod,' said Plug solemnly, 'don't ring the bell; I have a presentiment that we shall have to undergo the humiliation of a refusal from the waiter to supply further drinkables or eatables till the bill is settled. Why should we—Good gracious!—why should we, with a false delicacy, fearfully derogatory to our dignity as men of letters—why should we, I say, counterfeit a wretched appearance of a superfluity of cash when we cannot muster a shilling among us? This stranger is a gentleman. As a stranger we give him welcome. As one gentleman to another, we inform him frankly that, from circumstances over which we have no control, we are unable to ask him to have anything to drink.'

At this candid avowal, Mr. Puldub gazed at the fire with stony melancholy; Mr. Flowdod felt his skull, with the smile of presentiment on his face stronger than ever, as if he felt certain the convulsion was going on inside, and the crack about to take place; and Mr. Plug sat down and crossed his arms, gazing defiantly at myself, in the manner of a conscientious bankrupt at a meeting of his creditors, as much as to say—'There, I've made a clear statement; if you're inclined to be harsh with me, why, then, do your worst.'

'No! there's no denying the fact that we're regularly stumped out,' said Mr. Flowdod; 'and, as Mr. Plug says, why should we be ashamed of it?—it's only a temporary difficulty. Letters occasionally will not arrive when they're expected, especially if they've got remittances inside!'

I felt that it was now my turn to speak, and accordingly rose up, complimented Mr. Plug on his frankness, sympathised with them all in their temporary difficulties, and informed them that it gave me the greatest pleasure to be of any assistance to them, either in the shape of a temporary advance of cash or otherwise; and, with a fierce pull of the bell, instructed Artaxerxes to bring a bowl of punch, cigars, pipes, tobacco; and to light the gas, mend the fire, shut the shutters, and forbid any one from intruding upon our privacy.

'And now, gentlemen,' I said, in my blandest tone, when everything was comfortable, 'let us draw in our chairs, and we'll have an evening.'

'Oh! What about the blasted heath? Eh?' said Mr. Flowdod, after I had informed the company of the conversation which I had heard in the writing-room.

'Ah! The blasted heath?' said Mr. Puldub, in his most thorough bass.

'The blasted heath? That's the swindle!' said Mr. Plug. 'That's where it is!'

'The fact is,' said Mr. Flowdod, waving Messrs. Plug and Puldub down—those gentlemen having risen up under the influence of the strong excitement which that exciting name had called up; 'the fact is, my worthy friend! (if I may be permitted to call you such.) Thank you; much obliged. And here's to our better acquaintance! Let me wring your hand, sir; and clink glasses. The fact is, as I said before, it's a gross swindle! We—that is, myself; my friends, Ferdinand Sheridan Puldub, Esquire, dramatic author; and Lindraff Hawkkerton Plug, lyrical poet and journalist—are all the victims of a gross swindle. Are you aware, sir, of there being a blasted heath about these parts? No? Exactly. I should think not; and said so the second day of our search. Great fates! I knew it was a swindle; and they would not believe it. The fact is, we are about to start a new periodical. We have selected the title of "Round the Cauldron" as appropriate, and significant of the character and pretensions of the periodical; and we mutually swore, when our friend Mr. Plug, in an inspired moment, hit upon the felicitous title, to drink its success, and write the first chapter of the first story, in a real bona fide blasted heath, and round a real orthodox cauldron. It's a strange whim. You may call it a weakness; but it was our friend's opinion that the career of the new periodical would be inaugurated favourably, if we could carry out the strange whim. We came down here, at the advice of a friend in London, who asseverated that what we wanted could be found a few miles from this very road. 'Tis in vain! There is not such a thing as a blasted heath in the whole county. Our money has become exhausted. The capitalist who was going to back us out in this undertaking we have discovered this morning, per letter, has become bankrupt. We are unable to carry out the glorious project which would revolutionise periodical literature; and, what is worse, we are obliged to hang on here, waiting for a remittance.'

I need not describe here the gradual dawning of a project which will be consummated, by the appearance in these columns, next week, of the story of 'The Phantom Punt.' My excellent friend, the proprietor of this periodical, had an opening for good and original writers. I mentioned that fact to them next day, after I had slept over the idea.

'The plan of our periodical,' said Mr. Flowdod, 'is to give the public, in our writings, some healthy excitement. The literature of the present day, as you are aware, is of too tepid a nature. 'Tis not hot and strong enough for the people. What is wanted is good, healthy excitement; and I am of opinion that there is sufficient material in the social mysteries which surround us, to found serial fictions which will be of the intensest interest to the general reader, and will not necessitate the author to o'erstep the modesty of nature, as many of our romancists do.'

'I do not pretend to be a censor of the present style of periodical literature. I will give you an introduction to my friend of Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, and you can arrange with him about your services,' were the words which I addressed to the three travellers collectively, in reply to the individual remarks of Mr. Flowdod. I trust I am not o'erstepping the modesty of nature, in informing the reader that I relieved the three travellers from their temporary embarrassments; and I am only doing justice to them to say that the advance was promptly returned. I have been requested, by my excellent friend the proprietor of this publication, to introduce the story—which I have done in these few words, and with the pleasing sense of having rendered a service to him and to my three friends of 'The Hare and Hounds;' and, inasmuch as I have been the humble means of securing to these pages 'The Phantom Punt; or, the Howl of Guilt,' to the enlightened public who periodically peruse these pages. I lay down my pen, to make room for those who better merit the attention of the reader.

DOUBT AND ENDEAVOUR.

WITHOUT a chart, in a sea of wandering haze
Bewild'rd, Doubt, not altogether blind
To danger stretch'd before him and behind,
Hangs between apprehension and amaze.
Endeavour, voyaging appointed ways,
With labour both of body and of mind,
To reach a final haven—how to find
The sounded channel—doubts not nor delays:
But—hopeful, bold, enduring, and alert,
Sails under Heaven, and looking heavenward—
Pursues a course no season shall divert—
Aims at an end determined by the Lord;
Not for mouth-honour to proclaim desert—
Not for the mute cold marble to record!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'If yourselves are old.'—Shakspeare.

CHAPTER II.

IN the countinghouse of M'Corkindale & Co. there are a couple of junior clerks—Peter Macnab and John Dallas: the former, a clumsy, slovenly, large-headed fellow, with deep-set eyes, always cribbing odd moments to labour at some problem in chess; the latter, a slim youth, with light mustache and singularly perfect teeth, whose winters are measured by a succession of delightful tea-parties, and who is understood to be alarmingly susceptible to the tender influences of the fair. There is the making of a Beau Brummel in Dallas, much more than the shaping of a man of business; and, accordingly, he is intolerably addicted to idling and gossip, and to correcting the aberrations of his shirt-collar and neck-tie, with the aid of a triangle of looking-glass, which he keeps concealed in his desk. This whipper-snapper, imported the other day into the countinghouse a tradition that my venerable companion, Mathew Waddel, once upon a time played Brabantio in a barn at Kirkintilloch. Now, fancy my antiquated bachelor friend, with head and locks a-flame, and after him a trail of torches, streaming like a comet through the affrighted streets of Venice, in search of his lost daughter! I don't believe a word of it, although Joe—the heir-apparent of the great head of the house—declared, with the wide soft mouth of him, that to this day Waddel looked the very image of—'a senator.' The sudden familiar creaking of old M'Corkindale's shoes on the stair abruptly silenced the slander.

Yet Mathew, though now, and for these forty years, mainly an audience, is not without strong Shaksperian bias, as of one who knew how to rant it with the loudest when the world was more of a stage than in these later days, with the footlights lending lustre to incomparable cheek-roses, and all the dingy confusions of the behind-scenes invisible and unsuspected. Hence the spectacle, on Kean the younger being announced to enact King Lear, of our two white heads in the Theatre-Royal pit—like a fragment of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland astray, and shouldered thither by accident of the regardless crowd.

King Lear! O ye sorry Playwrights!—with all the envious pack of critics for enemies—I adjure you to uncover at that name! Strange that even aspiring adolescence—with its intellect still in gristle—should so often begin its literary ventures on the swelling deeps of tragedy! Youth after youth, fresh and buoyant from school, hastens, with audacious step, to the great shore of literature, and launches his paper skiff in rivalry of Shakspeare's mighty argosy! But the wisest of us, in our morning-time of hope, behold the latter only afar off, dimmed and dwarfed. How much more shining and glorious are our own fragile barks! As we advance, however, on the voyage of life, we look back with only sorrow and shame to our infantile wrecks, prostrate in the wavelets, or stranded on the pebbles, and forward, with suddenly dawning and constantly expanding admiration, to the majestic and full-sailed wonders of the great master, triumphant through nearly three centuries of storms.

For myself, I have lived, during what should have been my most vigorous and achieving years—subdued, humbled, and deprived of all capacity of high action—in the overshadowing presence of the immortals. How often, as the day darkened, and the hearth-fires and the stars caught up its moulting splendours, have I contemplated the monuments which human genius has built in the past ages of the world, and felt how feeble were my hands, and how unaccommodating was my petty and crowded space of life, for the accomplishment of any noble work! Hence, alas! purposes shaken and abandoned—brief, inconsiderate efforts breaking like ice under the shafts of the sunbeams—sudden and inconstant plans shaping themselves in air, and fitting and vanishing like dreams of the night—together with all the profitless phantasmagoria of a fitful and wasted career. If farther apology is due to any high-beckoning star flickering over my destiny, will it be unconjugal in me to extract it from my more vulgar surroundings? The tastes of my dear little giants are not literary, and from the unflinching love which I bear her through all antagonisms and afflictions, I have, since the period of our blessed union, habituated myself to walk in her unromantic ways. Yet is my thrifty Jean not without lofty ambition, of a kind which is fashionable in these days. The blood of the Chisholms is in her pulses, and she feels it when it is up. But her desires are for the base material upholsteries, after the manner of not a few of our great ones, and through some extraordinary perversion of idea, she has been brought to consider a mansion at the west-end of Glasgow a finer and more covetable thing than a monument in Westminster Abbey!

But is not this a digression? Was not King Lear my theme? And cannot fallen royalty like his be introduced without such preluding of trumpets? King Lear!—surely of all kings, ancient or modern, the royalest! We see him only in the frailty, the helplessness, the despair of dotage. Yet, through his staggering decay and tempestuous downfall—under every varying agony, even until the last flicker of his madness is extinguished in death—we experience a loyal compulsion to confess him kingly above all dignity of purple. We are not left to wonder how, in a rude time, he should have upheld the sovereignty of the state until his old age. The very weakness which renders him, in the end, unable to preserve or to recover his throne, is, through a miracle of art, presented to us in such shape of majesty as to impress us with a sense of strength beyond that of sceptres. Lo! the parted crown, and a forehead towering with the divinity of intellect! Lo! the falling ermine, and an arm of regal sinew immortally bared! The physical and mental sufferings of Lear—the mental overpowering the physical—are but the broken planks of the wrecked ship, revealing the massiveness of the timbers—the scattered leaves of the winter-shaken oak, disclosing the gnarled grandeur of the boughs. Crownless and kingdomless, he is yet 'every inch a king.'

Ah! what a length of years has passed, Mathew, since you and I—but we are old now—witnessed the magic-eyed little Edmund Kean in that terrible part! His royal desolation—irradiated with Heaven's lightnings, and transfigured into supernatural grandeur—burned a bewildering track in our memories. Have our two snowballs dropped a chill into our hearts, that we have now looked with such different eyes upon his son? But 'Lear' the tragedy is much too mighty a production for the stage. It is greater than the Pyramids—or the tubular bridge across the St. Lawrence—or the Great Eastern steam-ship. The noblest achievement of Homer, of Dante, of Michael Angelo, or of Milton, is dwarfed in the comparison. The plot, while intensely human, is yet ineffably majestic. Its grouping is pyramidal, with the figure of the grey-haired sovereign and sire towering in the centre. Dark shadows of villainy, and heavenly lights of fidelity, virtue, and affection, supply the most artistic contrasts. The foppery and cowardice of Goneril's Steward afford relief to the sturdy manliness of Kent; while the jests of the poor Fool throw peculiar and intensifying lights on the gigantic sorrow of the piece. Then, in what a framework of night, and thunder, and national convulsion, is the whole picture set! And with what a strange daring sublimity is the passion of the royal martyr made to break down into the old elementary simplicities of nature, and to blend with the awful terrors of the skies! Henceforth I shall read 'Lear' only, and Mathew Waddel will be my audience. Yet even young Kean—as I still call him by an inaccuracy of many years' standing—although in his early scenes a little too maniacal in his rage, was not without a conception of the character worthy of his high histrionic lineage. At times, indeed—especially towards the last—the sterling Shaksperian grandeur so burned in him, and came flashing through the chinks and crannies of the large shattered intellect of the dis-crowned monarch, as to touch us with a genuine sympathy, deepened, perhaps, by the reflection with which Lear himself seeks, in his madness, to inspire the very Heavens—namely, that 'ourselves were old.'

'Gabriel,' said Mathew, as we jogged homeward that night, 'I suppose I ought to congratulate myself that I have no daughters?' 'No, Mathew,' I replied; 'if Lear, in addition to his many noble qualities, had possessed a less fretful and overbearing temper, he would never have been the father of Goneril and Regana. Neither, save for that one defect in his character, would he have had occasion, as his last poor stroke of regal policy, to barter crown and kingdom—alas! how vainly—for the domestic love and nursing of which he began, through the frailty of his gathering years, to experience the need, and to set at so great a price. But you, my worthy friend, have nothing of the irascibility which, in Lear's case, engendered a retribution as of scorpions. On the contrary, you are endowed with a most blessed and Christian disposition; and your daughters, but that you have chosen to be a sorrowful old bachelor, must, like my own five darlings, have been all—all Cordelias.'

ROMANCE.

ROMANCE! what an ideal world of beautiful feeling, of high-souled enthusiasm, of disinterested affection, of daring courage, of deathless devotion, does this little word comprehend. But, alas! for the practical and go-a-head nature of the present generation, this good old word is seldom spoken and still seldomer understood.

Romance is, to a great extent, a thing of the past. Many yet regard it as a lovely dream of life in which our forefathers indulged—a fine poetical conception of men and women, whose principal charm consisted in the halo which the imagination of the beholder threw around them. But we, the wide-awake individuals of the nineteenth century, don't mean to be taken in with any such visionary notions—we intend to keep our eyes open.

Ours is an age of ceaseless activity. Fastness in everything seems the order of the day. We are fast in our locomotion, fast in our manners, fast in our dress, fast in our tastes, and fast in our literature. Our mind appears to take its tone from outward surroundings, and the telegraph and the express are characteristic of us. Now, there is no doubt much pleasurable exhilaration, and a delightful sensation of power, in this mode of life. It sharpens our wits, concentrates our views, and makes existence intensely real. But though we have greatly progressed in practical ability and quickness of perception on many subjects, yet I fear we have almost entirely lost that charming simplicity of thought and feeling, those high-born gropings after the good and beautiful, which impel the happy possessor to let fancy roam at will. Like some artistic genius, yearning to shadow forth his glowing imaginings upon the canvas, he half creates, half tries to perfect, what already is. Surely there is something ennobling to the spirit in this idealising of the common affairs of everyday life! 'Tis, as it were, a silent prophecy of the boundless aspirations of our diviner nature—an exhaustless craving which the things of time can never satisfy. Better, infinitely better, to set up an exalted standard of what we would fain believe, than be content with the matter-of-fact, utilitarian, and plodding notions of many respectable people. In the former case, we shall always be coming a step nearer our ideal, for what we intensely admire we ever strive to copy; while in the latter, we shall remain just as we are, having no loftier desires than what are comprehended in the usual affairs of life. The common proverb, 'Far away birds have fine feathers,' speaks to the experience of many. How doubly charming some objects appear when viewed at a distance! and very foolish would it be to detract from their apparent beauty by near and minute inspection. The child who destroys his musical toy to see where the sound comes from, ceases to be delighted with his plaything when he finds that there is nothing inside but a little bit of wire. The boy who is taken for the first time to the theatre, all aglow with pleasure and excitement, would not thank the well-meaning but narrow-minded father who strove to disgust him with the stage, by impressing upon his youthful mind that the whole concern was a delusion and a snare; that nothing was what it seemed; that all the gold was tinsel, all the scenery just painted daubs; and that next morning the fairies, who to his eyes looked so like angels, would be jaded and haggard mortals. Few things, as well as few people, stand very close examination. If the effect is pleasing, let us be satisfied; and not pry too curiously into every corner. Sad, yet undeniable, it is that rapid progression on some subjects causes a corresponding retrogression with regard to others; thus, the saying of the wise man, 'He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow,' is abundantly exemplified. Too much research, though it may gratify the intellect to lay all things bare to its inspection, does not of necessity improve us, for we are only truly improved by what it does us good to know.

In earlier times, when tastes were simpler and people more truly happy, because more genuine—when children were bona fide children, and treated as such—when boys and girls listened with reverence to the opinion of their seniors—when young men and women fell in love in real earnest—when fathers and mothers could understand, from experience, what they felt when money was less valued and independence of spirit more—when, it may be, sometimes imprudent, but generally disinterested, marriages were entered upon—when the happy pair were not ashamed of living in a plain way, keeping one servant and having no large parties—when, in short, everything was more natural, and, consequently, more what it ought to be—these were the good old days. Character was more distinct and diversified; feeling was less suppressed to suit worldly interest; and people were truer to their higher nature. Why is there so little of the youthful freshness and novelty of thought and feeling that existed of yore? How comes it that so many young people have such a small allowance of those charming qualities which are consistent with their years? The sensibility and modesty which become youth are very seldom to be met with. Instead of these, we find that assurance and premature sharpness have usurped their place. It is a favourite idea of mine that the youngest people now-a-days are the decidedly elderly—those who have been brought up in the good old school, whose tastes were pure and simple, whose manners were made not so much by square and rule as by innate good feeling. Romance was for them not a name merely, but a felt reality. How I prize the acquaintance of such people! And, as I write, there rises before me the bright vision of that benevolent, clever, and lively country gentleman—one who could make a joke and take a joke, and under whose dark green coat beat a heart more buoyant and romantic than many men not half his age possess. Long may he, and those like him, be spared—a blessing and a pattern to all about them; and, when their pilgrimage here is over, oh! may their mantle descend upon us, like the genial and cheering sun, refreshing, beautifying, and imparting its own light and warmth to everything around!

THE CRUISE OF THE HERMIONE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER II.

The Hermione lay at anchor in the bay. Old Archie, the fisherman, was on board—was to have been, at least; but there was no appearance of any one stirring.

'The lazy wretch!' exclaimed Bob. 'He's never up yet! And I told him to have the mainsail up, and the anchor—what do you call it?'

'Apeak,' suggested Stewart.

'Yes; the anchor apeak at nine o'clock, so as to have everything ready for sailing when we came.'

We went down to the beach, and hailed her. There was no answer.

'Hermione ahoy!' shouted Bob.

'Perhaps he isn't on board at all,' said I; 'and yet the boat is under the stern.'

'Hermione ahoy! What on earth are we to do?'

'Get a boat at the quay, and go off,' said Stewart.

'Hermione ah-o-oy!' shouted Bob, till I thought he would have burst a blood-vessel.

My fears for this catastrophe were obviated, however, by the apparition of a red Kilmarnock nightcap, and a beard like a superannuated shoebrush, which made their appearance at the cabin door.

'The dirty old beast!' exclaimed Bob; 'he has been sleeping in the cabin in one of our berths. Come ashore with that boat, will you?'

The red nightcap disappeared, and for ten minutes we saw no more of it.

'What can be keeping him now?' said Bob. 'Come ashore with that boat, will you?'

'Shouldn't wonder if he's gone back to bed again,' said Stewart, sending a piece of slate skimming along the water.

'Hermione, ah-o-o-oy!' shouted Bob, so loudly that he broke down at the last syllable in a perfect screech.

Ten minutes more elapsed, when the red nightcap again appeared, accompanied by a striped cotton shirt and a pair of blue homespun trousers, enclosing the figure of Bob's pilot, Archie M'Niven. Archie leisurely unloosed the painter by which the boat was made fast—lowered himself over the stern—drew the painter after him—wiped one of the thwarts with his nightcap—took up the paddles—and pulled towards us.

'What was keeping you?' said Bob.

'Keeping me! When keeping me?'

'Keeping you!—just now. We've been waiting here for half-an-hour, haven't we?'

'I suppose we'll need to get on our clothes, will we not?' said Archie.

'Clothes!'

'Tut, Bob,' said Stewart; 'let us get on board. The doing so will take us a short time, too: that boat will take no more than one of us at a time. I say, Bob, she's half-full of water.'

'Did I not tell you to bail her out?' cried Bob.

'And did I not?' replied Archie. 'Ye should ask if it was not raining here?'

'Raining! we hadn't a drop of rain in Glasgow.'

'Is this Glasgow?' asked Archie. 'I did not know that afore.'

'Tut, Bob; never mind,' said Stewart. 'Bail her out now, Archie.'

'If you can bail a poat without a dish,' said Archie, 'it's more than Archie M'Niven can do.'

'Why! haven't you one in the boat?'

'No, nor aboard either; excepting, maybe, one of the tea-cups, or the wee pot as boils the eggs.'

'What are we to do?' exclaimed Bob. 'With all that water, she will not float with the weight of another person. Then, if I go by myself, who is to bring her back for you? If we could fasten a rope in any way, so as to pull her ashore again.'

'What are you talking about?' said Stewart. 'Couldn't you bail her out with the "wee pot as boils the eggs?" But we won't need to do that. Come out, Archie, and we'll pull her up and capsize her here on the beach.'

'I'll do that when them that pays me my wages tells me,' replied Archie.

'Can't you come out of the boat when you're told?' cried Bob.

'Haul her up a wee bit, then,' said Archie.

Bob caught hold of the bow, and gave such a pull that Archie, as he stood up to jump ashore, fell splashing in the water at the bottom of the boat, where he lay, swearing like a trooper, both in English and Gaelic, while the air resounded with Tom Stewart's laughter.

We pulled the boat up on the beach; but Archie not showing any indication of an intention to rise, Bob seized the gunwale, and endeavoured to capsize her; but this proving too much for his strength, he began to call upon us, as we valued his friendship, to 'Come and help him to turn out the obstinate old beast!' At length, by a tremendous effort, he upset her, deluging Archie with the water, and entombing him under her. Archie yelled like a madman, and swore most fearfully; and, dreading he might have been hurt, Stewart and I replaced the boat on her keel, leaving him soaking among the seaweed.

'You are not hurt, are you?' said I.

'Hurt, pe tam! The leg of me is broke!'

'Oh, nonsense! Let me see it? Why, it is only a little bruised, that is all. It will be well immediately.'

'Never mind him, Jack,' said Bob. 'Come along! we'll go on board. Who is going to be plagued this way by an old mule like that? We'll do well enough without him.'

'Will ye?' said Archie, getting up, and extending his hand; 'then you'll pay three pound for three weeks' wage, and two pound five for three weeks' meat.'

'What do you say, you old rascal?'

'You engaged for three weeks, did ye no? But never heed! If ye have no remembrance of him, maybe we'll get somebody that will put ye in remembrance of him.'

'You'll make nothing of him, Bob,' said Stewart.

'Come, Archie! let us get on board, and we'll drink success to the cruise in a bottle of rum.'

'I'll go aboard,' replied Archie, a little softened; 'but I'll be for no good for three days with my ankle; for if she's no proke, she's sprained, and that's just so bad. Hows'ever, I'll go aboard.'

The yawl was launched again accordingly. Archie limped down, tumbled himself into her, and sat down on a thwart. I handed him the paddles, and, Bob getting into the stern, he pulled off.

They reached the yacht, and Bob jumped on board. Archie followed, leaving the boat unfastened at the side. Bob turned round, and seeing Archie also on board, he flew into a violent passion. What was said we could not hear; the argument, however, evidently was who was to return with the boat for us? Archie apparently had no intention of doing so, the plea being seemingly that of his sprained ankle. The yawl, in the meantime, was beginning to drift away with the tide, and there appeared every prospect of our having to procure a boat, and go in chase after her.

'Well, he is a queer old fish, I do declare!' said Stewart. 'Hilloa! Bob, look at the boat—she's going adrift—just look at her—do!'

Bob looked; and in what he seemed to consider the certain and final loss of his boat, he forgot the occasion of his anger; seizing an oar, which lay on the deck, he brought her back to the side with it, and throwing himself into her, pulled ashore with such energy that her bow ran two feet up on the beach. Stewart got in, and Bob pulled back in the same vigorous manner; Stewart was put on board, and Bob returned for me; I was put on board, and Bob returned for my portmanteau; and at last we were all safely on board.

And so this was Bob's yacht! Well! she wasn't exactly a very complete realization of the usual ideas of a yacht. She was broad-beamed, flat-bottomed, bluff-bowed; her masts and spars were diseased with dry-rot; and her sails—I took up the foresail, as it lay on the deck, and shook it out—there were hardly three square feet of whole canvas together.

Bob, happily, was too much engaged to notice the smile which I could scarcely repress, as I made these observations. He threw off his coat, and proceeded at once to remove the tarpauling which covered the mainsail. He then began to search among the ropes, which were belayed on the bulwarks and round the foot of the mast, for the end of the throat halyard, pulling several, but finding none to produce the desired effect.

'Where have you belayed the end of that halyard?'

'Just where she should be,' was Archie's reply.

'Where is it? Tell me this moment.'

'What you'll want her for just now? I'll told you when you need her. You're no going to hoist the mainsail just now.'

'Archie is perfectly right,' said Stewart; 'it is no use getting under weigh till ebb tide at any rate; there is hardly a breath of wind.'

'Till ebb tide!' exclaimed Bob; 'I'll get under weigh at once. Hurray! here's the halyard—there it goes. Come on, Jack, give me a haul. Hilloa! there's Starry!' he added, as a tall figure came stalking with rapid strides along the shore—a black satin hat under his arm, a white straw one on the back of his head, one hand holding a yellow cane, the other a cambric pocket handkerchief.

'Stewart,' said Bob, 'take the boat, and go ashore for him—there's a good fellow. Yo-ho-oo! there she goes. Come along, Jack, come along; bear a hand—yo-ho-oo!'

Stewart took the boat, and went ashore; and Bob having, after another search, found the end of the peak halyard, I went to his assistance, for I saw that there would be little use in opposing him—the mainsail, as we hoisted it, appearing thickly studded with patches—triangular, polygonal, circular, square.

'What made you lose the train, Starry?' said Bob, stopping to take breath.

'It was altogether by mistake,' replied Starry, wiping his brow as he scrambled over the bulwarks. 'I merely went to make a little purchase; when I returned the doors were closed. I, however, contrived to find my way by a private passage—in connection with the offices it is, I presume; but when I reached the platform the train was gone. Oh, how delightful is the cool sea breeze!'

'Rather a smart concern this,' said Stewart, taking Starry's straw-hat from his head. 'And you really walked through Greenock with that old chimney-pot under your arm! You don't seem to value much your reputation for soundness of mind.'

'Do you consider that I was guilty of an impropriety?' said Starry. 'I consider that when I have the approbation of my own judgment, the opinion of the world is of comparatively little moment.'

'But I don't think, judgment and all, Starry,' said Stewart, 'that you would have done it some hours later, when the young ladies would be out. Some good-looking girls in Greenock, Starry!'

'You do me an injustice,' returned Starry. 'Much as I esteem—much as I regard—much as I may say I—a—love them, I would—a—'

'What did you pay for this hat, Starry?' inquired Bob, inspecting the lining of Starry's purchase. 'I wish I had got one like it before I came away—this felt one is so fearfully warm. I say—it fits me to a nicety—I'll exchange with you, if you like.'

'You are very kind,' replied Starry. 'I shall consider your obliging offer, and inform you of the result of my deliberations.'

'Don't deliberate anything about it, Starry,' said Stewart. 'He hasn't been studying commerce for nothing: he knows how to make a bargain. Why, your hat is worth a dozen of his, and cost twice as much to-day as his did a year ago! By-the-by, that puts me in mind that I owe you a shilling, and perhaps eighteenpence, for another ticket—of course you had to get one!'

'That only cost me sixpence,' said Starry. 'I came down in the third class. I consider that, being open at the sides, it affords infinitely superior facilities for the observation of the beauties of the landscape and for the study of human nature—the shilling is of no consequence.'

'I knew that, Starry, and consequently never intended to pay it; indeed, it has already gone for tobacco. However, you owe me a little for my advice in the matter of the hats!'

'And if I haven't been studying commerce for nothing,' said Bob, 'you haven't been studying law for nothing;—you know how to charge plenty for nothing. I say, Starry, you would need to be careful when you come across characters like him. You're too good for this world, Starry. [Starry acknowledged this compliment by a bow.] But, I say, we're losing time. Come on, boys! let's to work. But what is the next thing we do?'

'The anchor,' said Stewart; 'but I tell you, Bob, it's no use for two hours at least.'

'The anchor; oh yes, that's it,' said Bob. 'Come on! let's get the anchor astern.'

'Apeak, you mean,' said Stewart.'

'Apeak—oh yes, of course—a lapsus lingue. I know it was a—something; I just mistook the— Come on, boys! do come on! Let us get the anchor apeak.'

As Bob rattled on thus, he kept running backwards and forwards, lifting things and setting them down again, and handling the ropes, as if he were looking for something. This was the light, at least, in which it seemed to strike old Archie; for as Bob passed the place where he sat on the larboard bulwark, cutting a piece of wood with his knife into the shape of a thowl, he looked up, and said in a tone which gave to the remark all the effect of sarcasm, that he would 'find the anchor at the bow!'

'Hold you your tongue!' said Bob. 'If you don't choose to help, nobody wants your dictation; though, if I thought it worth while, I would very soon make you help. I say, Stewart! take one of these handspikes, and give us a turn with the windlass.'

'I'm going to take Archie's plan, Bob,' said Stewart. 'Seriously, I don't see any use in our starting before the turn of the tide. Keep yourself quiet for an hour, can't you? I'm going down to the cabin for a little; I want to overhaul my things. Archie, I think you had better go to the fore-castle and change your wet clothes.'

'Stewart, you're a lazy beast!' exclaimed Bob. 'Come on, Jack; never mind, we'll manage it ourselves. Starry, take the helm, and keep her away from the shore, when the anchor comes up. Now, Jack, in with your handspike—there. Heave away, now, together. Starry, mind your helm when it comes up. Now, then, Jack, heave! There she comes! Heave away! Yo—ho! Hurray! she's moving! Yes, hurray! she's moving! Hi, Stewart! she's moving!'

'See she isn't moving the wrong way!' cried Stewart. 'I'll be more than astonished if she isn't.'

'So she is!' cried Bob. 'Starry, you blockhead! —Jack, Jack! we've forgotten to hoist the jib! Quick, quick—she'll be ashore! Starry, you blockhead! put the helm the other way—no!—go to the other side—no!—the other way—quick! What are we to do? She'll be ashore! The anchor, the anchor!—we'll need to let the anchor go again! Here, Jack, help me—quick! Here, you old Highland mule! come here. Never mind the helm, Starry! Now, back with the chain. There—more yet. There—I think that will do now. Oh! I'm all out of breath. I thought we were fairly ashore.'

'It's a wonder you weren't,' cried Stewart, from below. 'What a detestable row you did make, to be sure, with your running about, and your yelling, and the noise you made with the cable; it was more like a menagerie let loose than anything I know. You had to let the anchor go again, had you? I thought you would. You will know better the next time how to take advice. But when you did get the anchor up, why didn't you think of keeping her off with an ear, till you got out a piece?'

'Botheration! so we might,' exclaimed Bob, looking the very picture of vexation. 'How stupid! Jack, you're an ass! Why did you not think of it? I say, let us get up the anchor again, and we'll take the sweeps, and keep her off this time.'

'No, thank you, Bob,' said I; 'I've had enough of it.'

'You're a pack of lazy wretches!' exclaimed Bob. 'But if I had known that this was to be the way of it, not one of you would have been here; that's all.'

'And if I had known the real character of your dirty craft,' cried Stewart from below, 'I wouldn't have been here; that's all. Just come down and look at her—do! It's a spectacle—of all the—just come down—do!'

I jumped down into the stern-sheets. There was a space at the stern, not decked over, with a seat running round, from which the door of the cabin opened. The cabin was a box-like apartment, of about nine feet square; and so low that, as I entered, I struck my head against one of the beams which ran across it. Nearly two-thirds of the breadth were taken up by two berths, one on each side, and a cushioned seat on the larboard side, which would also serve for a berth. In the centre was a narrow table, running fore and aft. In the forward end was another seat, intended, like the other, to be used for dormitory purposes; though, how any person of ordinary size was to contrive, without previously undergoing some Procrustean operation, to repose on it with any degree of comfort, appeared somewhat of a mystery. The after-end was taken up by the door, a locker on one side, and a sort of cupboard on the other, in the shelves of which were ranged sundry culinary utensils—several canisters containing groceries, one tumbler, three jelly-mugs, a soap-dish, a hair-brush, and two broken glasses. The berths were boarded all round in front, leaving an aperture so remarkably small that the apparent difficulty of ever getting in was only to be equalled by the apparent impossibility, once in, of ever getting out. Old Archie, however, had managed it somehow on the previous night: the derangement of the blankets in the starboard one told that; and the flavour of peat smoke which pervaded them told that he had done so with his clothes on; while an empty bottle, with the neck broken off, and a cork, bearing on the wax at one end the legend 'Fine old whisky,' gave reason to believe that he had been unable to undress himself. But what struck me was the dirtiness and disorder which pervaded the whole place. The table was covered with the dishes which Archie had used in the meals of the two previous days—cups, saucers, and plates—and, with the remains of those meals, the shells of half-a-dozen eggs, the skeletons of as many herrings, scraps of bread, potatoes, and bones. The berths, the seats, and the floor were strewn with articles of dress, sails, pots, pans, and a basin of porridge, which lay broken where it had fallen, perhaps two days before.

'It's a palace, isn't it?' said Stewart, with a look of unutterable disgust. 'The dirty concern! If I had only known what she was—I do declare, I think I'll go back yet. Here, Bob, I'm going; come one of you to take back the boat.'

'What do mean, Stewart?' said Bob. 'What's wrong with her? I say, Tom, you aren't in earnest, surely!'

'I observe, Martin,' said Starry, 'that your friend has been making free with, and helping himself to, my bottle, which I had intended as a resource in the occasion of that—a affection which the uninitiated must expect to encounter in a sea voyage. It is rather a serious deprivation, as it was my only one.'

'You'll get plenty more where we're going, Starry,' said Stewart—'in the land of whisky.'

'I say, Stewart,' said Bob, 'you aren't going! No. I thought not. That's right. Come on! We'll set to work, and we'll have her tidied up in no time. Come on, Starry! Jack, you lazy wretch! off with your coat!'

We set to work. Bob washed the dishes; Stewart dried them—breaking between them, in the operation, two saucers and the spout of the teapot. Starry cleared away and swept the floor; while I went on my knees and scrubbed it—after a fashion, at least.

'Heigh-ho!' exclaimed Starry, when we had done. 'I will ever after this have a greater regard for the—a—the fair sex, than the great measure of regard I have hitherto entertained for them. I had no idea that domestic operations required so much address in the performance. How little do we reflect, when we behold our boards spread with the dainties and the delicacies of life, how much labour in the production, and anxiety in the—a—superintendence, they may have occasioned to our uncomplaining helpmates!'

The quiet, serious way in which Starry said this, rendered it irresistibly ludicrous. 'Well done!' said I. 'The gallantry of that speech makes it eloquent, though the sentiment is perhaps a little disproportionate to the occasion.'

'O woman!' he exclaimed, laying his hand upon his heart and fixing his eyes upon the crossbeam above—

'O woman! in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please;
When pain and anguish ring the brow'—

'I say, couldn't we get dinner ready now?' said Bob, breaking in upon Starry's quotation. 'It would save time again.'

'A ministering angel thou!'

'Oh, bother the ministering angel!' said Bob. 'What do you say about the dinner? Shall we get it ready?'

We all expressed our willingness to be guided by his judgment in the matter; whereupon he took a hamper from beneath the table, and proceeded, with waiter-like despatch, to lay the cloth. He then produced a joint of roast-beef from the hamper; and selecting a pot from where Starry had stowed them under one of the seats, he jumped on deck, calling upon Archie, in frantic tones, to tell him where he had put that bag of potatoes? Having discovered their place of deposit, we heard him washing them energetically, keeping up a running fire of abuse on Archie, which Archie, however, did not condescend to notice till he saw Bob taking the fresh water out of the cask to boil his potatoes in, when he seized the pot and filled it with salt water over the side, swearing at him as a lubberly blockhead for 'wasting the good clean water.' But his indignation was trifling compared with Bob's, when he came to the fire, and found that it had been allowed to go out. He stamped with rage, and swung his arms furiously, bestowing innumerable epithets on Highlanders in general, and Archie in particular.

Stewart enjoyed the scene amazingly. I, however, thought it but right to interfere. I endeavoured to explain to him that there was no necessity for his putting off time with the potatoes; that we could do quite well with bread for one day, and that he would have opportunity enough to display his skill in cookery again. Bob, however, took no notice of what I said, till he had made several attempts to rekindle the fire without success, when he came down to the cabin with a most rueful countenance, and placing a loaf of bread upon the table, invited us to sit in. We sat in accordingly; Bob, with profuse apologies for the poorness of the fare, making sundry obscure hints regarding the puddings, pancakes, and dumplings, which were to be evolved on some future occasions from materials on board.

'I hope we may never have worse,' said Stewart. 'But do you know what has just come into my head, Starry? It is, that we should make you secretary or recorder to the Hermione, or rather to our cruise; to keep a journal of everything, you know; describe the places we go to—the manners of the natives, and so forth. It would be capital practice for you, and then it would be a first-rate thing to keep by you to look at again—perhaps many years after this. We might each get a copy of it for the same purpose. None of us, you see, could make such a good thing of it as you, you being a literary man both by taste and education. Then you will have plenty of scenes worthy of being recorded—embalmed, as you would say, Starry, in poetry—storms, and such like; for it is very possible we may meet with one or two; and then all the sublime scenery, which has employed the Muses of some of our greatest poets—the Cuchullin Hills and Quiraing in Skye, and lots of other places we're going to.'

'I say, it's a capital idea!' exclaimed Bob. 'Starry, it would make your fortune; you could publish it, you know, and get a good deal for it.'

'No, no,' said Stewart, 'there would be little use in that; we have quite enough, and too much, of that sort of thing already—it's a threadbare subject. Ever since the days of Johnson and Boswell, and before them too, the literary market has been overrun with them—Rambles among the Western Islands; Voyages round the Coast; Descriptions of the Hebrides; Tours, picturesque and plain; Visits, Journals, and what not, by sentimental females and moon-struck tourists. But I think, Starry, that, without any ambitious projects of that kind, it would be a pleasure to yourself, and to us all, no doubt, to undertake such a thing.'

'Stewart, my dear fellow,' said the delighted Starry, 'I am everlastingly obliged to you for the suggestion. It will indeed be an excellent exercise. I undertake it with pleasure—though you must not expect anything very remarkable in a literary point of view, as I have as yet had comparatively little practice, beyond my college exercises, in the formation of my style; but I will do my best, and no one can do more. Stewart, accept my thanks for the suggestion.'

'All right, Starry. Take pains with it, now, and make a good thing of it. If you do, I wouldn't say but it might be worth publishing after all. Of course, you know, we shall have much better opportunities than most for going into out-of-the-way places, and seeing the people as they are. Novelty is a great matter; try and introduce some novelty into it if you can. Begin at once, will you? But what? Hear that! What in the world is the old fellow about?'

There was the rattling of a chain on deck, and soon afterwards we heard the clank of the windlass. Archie had hoisted the jib, and was taking up the anchor!

'What are you about?' cried Bob, going on deck.

'You go below,' replied Archie; 'we'll send for ye when we want ye.'

'What is it, Archie?' said Stewart. 'Where are you going?'

'We're going to the Hielands, are we no? Here, you're the only one among the lot that's worth his meat—go you and took the helm. Do you no see the air coming yonder? And a fine good air she is too.'

As he spoke, the sails filled, and waved gently in the breeze. Bob threw his hat up into the air, and catching it again with a loud 'hurrah!' took up one of the handspikes, and began to work vigorously at the windlass. The anchor tripped, the breeze came down, and away the Hermione skimmed over the rippling surface of the water.

We jibbed her off the point—the wind being from the west—and away we ran out the Firth. Bob was in ecstasies. He ran about, pulled at the ropes, and shouted 'hurrah!' till all rang again. And, indeed, we all felt a good deal of that elation which nature seldom fails to inspire. Seldom had I gazed upon a lovelier scene. Starry's pen, however, will perhaps do more justice to it than mine:—

'My heart leaped within me for joy,' says he in his journal. 'The day was beautiful, the air serene, the sun shining bright in the cloudless sky. Not a cloud was visible, save a wreath of mist which encircled the brow of the far-famed Ben-Lomond, casting a shade of gloom around, which rendered the rest of the scene more surpassingly bright and beautiful.

'The fair Roseneath, with the rounded towers of its ducal castle peeping out, in all the grace of architectural beauty, from amid the dark foliage of its wooded recesses, forms a pleasant foreground; while, to the left, the hills of Argyle raise their undulating bosoms from out the placid waters, their bases washed by the waters of Loch-Long and the classic waters of the Holy-Loch. Away to the south lies the low land of the arborous Bute, clad in its beauteous mantle of grassy verdure; and the rugged Arran, with Goatfell's frowning peaks raising their wild heads far above the clouds, piercing the blue of the ethereal vaults of heaven.

'Nature all around is glad; and even the works of man serve to enliven the scene. Here the graceful yacht glides her happy course, while gentle zephyrs fan her downy sails; there the mighty monster of the sea ploughs his turbid track, dashing the deep aside, and roaring like some angry leviathan restrained by the genius of man, clanking his chains as he turns, obedient to the will of his rider, while the black smoke of his nostrils commingles with the clouds. Here the stately merchantman spreads her sails to wing her flight to some distant clime; there the homeward-bound barque returns, laden with the rich merchandise of foreign lands.

'As the breeze filled our swelling sails—white and spotless as the bosom of the swan [Starry seems to have taken artist's licence in forgetting the patches]—and as our little ship—"walking the waters like a thing of life"—danced over the sparkling waves, which rippled in sweet music at her bow, I felt that this earth was indeed beautiful and fair.'

Neither Starry's pleasure nor ours, however, was destined to continue; for, in little more than an hour, the wind suddenly lulled, leaving us at the mercy of the tides, a mile and a half from the shore.

The afternoon wore on—there we were still. There seemed every prospect of our being there all night.

For the first hour or two, it was all well enough. But as evening fell we began to feel that it was not quite the most agreeable way in which to pass our time. Bob's countenance assumed a most dismal aspect; I was little better; and Stewart, notwithstanding his seeming indifference, frequently raised his head, from where he lay on the deck smoking at intervals, to see if there were no indications of an approaching breeze. Old Archie had gone to his berth in the fore-castle, so as to be in condition for keeping watch during the night. Starry, however, was completely in his element. He had begun his journal on some sheets of note-paper which he had taken in his desk; and from time to time he came upon deck with his pen in his mouth, and stood in an artistic attitude gazing round on the scene, making some further observations for the embellishment of the description upon which he appeared to be employed.

Night fell—there we were still. We had drifted out a little with the ebb tide; but the flood tide was now drifting us back again. Bob and I tried to gain a little ground with the sweeps. The small progress which we made, however, and the monotony of the work, soon disposed us to abandon it.

At an early hour we retired to rest. Bob and Stewart occupied the berths; Starry the one seat, and I the other. Archie was to keep watch. I was soon glad to change my quarters; and, stretching my cushion along the table, I slept (rather uncomfortably, however) till morning.

BOOK FIRST.—PART FIRST.

CHAPTER I.—THE YELLOW PARCHMENT.*

It was a night in which shivering wretchedness drew its rags tighter around it, and, by a natural instinct, sought out and found quiet corners in which to hide its miserable frame, and try, by help of an elastic imagination, to fancy itself more comfortable and less ragged than its neighbour at the other angle of the door step;—it was a night in which blasted plenty drew the curtains close, fell to at the sumptuous supper, and over the reeking punch chuckled in delight at the conflict of the elements outside, and derived greater enjoyment from the thought that there were plenty of miserable outcasts prowling about, upon whose skinny carcasses the biting frost and the nipping sleet, the drenching rain, and the cruel hail could operate upon effectually;—it was a night in which great gusts of rain, hail, snow, and sleet tore down narrow lanes and by-ways like grape shot, caught up unprotected females and helpless little boys and girls (who mayhap had gone out to play hours before, and had been driven by the wind far away from home), and whirled them leagues out into lonely marshes and obscure country villages, where astonished rustics picked them up next morning, either chilly and dead, or bruised and sore and miserable;—it was a night in which tall persons of slender build disappeared mysteriously, and were either discovered in distant parishes, clinging frantically to steeples, or chimney-stalks, or lightning conductors, or unfinished tenements; or doubled, ribbon-like, round Maypoles in quaint old English villages;—it was a night in which unwary pedestrians were carried far away out to sea, and either blown down funnels or spurted into sleeping berths, awaking up either roasted to death or to find that a voyage to Seringapatam, or Australia, or New-York, with hard work before the mast and short rations from the captain, who believed them to have been skulking in the hold for a free passage, was the consequence of entering the lists to battle with the elements;—it was a night following which interjectional advertisements appeared in the Times newspaper, entreating that B. O., or T. G. L., or Q. R. S. would return to his disconsolate father, or mother, or sister, or brother, or lover, and supplementing the announcement by graphic descriptions of how the parties were tall, and bony, and slender, and had gone out in their usual spirits on the night of the great storm;—it was a night in which the career of hardy poets, anxious to commune with the grandeur of nature and blow mimic hooting to the silent owls on mountain-tops, were prematurely brought to a termination, and their mangled bodies carried home on wheel-barrow from yawning chasms, where they had been hurled by the fury of the elements;—it was a night when resurrection-men, with blackened faces and dark lanterns, picks, shovels, and other implements of their horrible craft, crawled out to rifle the dead, and with fearful suspicion that their day was come indeed, and that the graves would open and their spoils rise spontaneously, fled precipitately before the elements, and were never seen or heard of again;—it was a night when pale fear rode triumphant on the gale, and blanched the cheek and shrivelled the heart, and laid his ghastly seal on the brows of guilty misers and millionaires who had been mumbling out startling confessions of guilt, which stamped these confessions as truth, and which enabled faithful attendants, who had had the supreme good luck to overhear the revelations, to commence business as publicans, with plenty of money, mysteriously got, to back them out for stock, furniture, and implements.

The Managers of London and provincial theatres are informed that arrangements have been made with eminent carpenters for dramatic editions of the story, which will be ready a month after its completion in this periodical. The sensation scenes are patented, and plagiarists will be proceeded against with the utmost rigour of the law. Burlesque and farce writers are warned that the right of travesty has been protected. The public are also specially informed that the Authors have no connection whatever with Mr. Doctor Booseycraft, of the New Royal Bermondsey Morning and Mid-night Theatre—five minutes' walk from all the tan-yards. Any distorted edition of the drama brought out at that theatre is without the sanction of the Authors, who are making arrangements for the erection of four new theatres for its representation—special dramatic companies being at present on their way from America.

On such a night, forty years ago, the little village of Dubdub, in Lowboroughshire, lay cowering under the blasts which swept its deserted streets—which whisked round its chimney-stalks, descending with a rumbling noise, and scattering convivial and family parties, gathered round the ingle nooks for warmth and sociality; which crept below doors and in at the chinks of windows, and through key-holes, with wild means, causing nervous sleepers to awaken with frightened yells, and fancy that the ghosts of injured friends or relations were creeping up stairs, and would presently proceed to call them to account for things done to them in the flesh, and exact terrible retribution, by means of shining army razors, or compulsory swallowing of Battles' vermin-killing powders; which rushed along deserted passages in fine old English mansions, banged at the doors, rattled at the windows, shook the long line of portraits in the picture galleries, till you would have fancied that the ancestors of the race were shivering with fear of the literal downfall of the house, and then, with frantic shrieks and yells and groans, went tearing along the grand rooms and suites of apartments, till the whole of the inmates—servants, butlers, footmen, knife-boys, cooks, and scullery-maids—grew frantic with terror and with awful presentiments of the general dissolution of the world, fainted away, and fancied it was death.

Far away out seawards, where the sea and the horizon meet, whirling and whirling and dipping down into the waters, and tossing the spray miles up into the sky, and rushing along by the white line of rocks on which the light-house stands, and dashing the salt foam against the red lamp—yelling in fury at its impotence to put it out—was one particular gale, which, tired of operating upon the waters, determined to make a rush shorewards, and see what damage could be done there. With a whoop and a scream that made the sharks' and the dolphins' and the mackerel's fins stand on end in horror, it flew wildly along, carrying a cloud of spray with it; and at length, alighting on the chalky cliffs, which had been bleached to a supernatural whiteness by sun, wind, and rain, it tarried not, but, tearing up the valley, whirled the stones of the black quarry about like brick-bats, and, with a yell, plunged into the hilly forest, which was the pride of the village of Dubdub. In an instant nothing was left for the inhabitants to brag about—the red-ribbed hills being rendered as bare and bald as a mad-man's head after it has undergone its morning's shaving; and the stately oaks, and elms, and poplars, and fir trees, scattered far up in the air, looking in the distance like paint-brushes or scavengers' brooms. With another wild halloo, off it went to the shrivelling little village, swept its deserted streets, whisked round the chimney-stalks, and dashed away down the High-street; turned the corner of Chipps's buildings, and shrieked and yelled down old Chipps's chimney; rattled at his doors, at his shutters, and lifted up the papers, rent-rolls, and mortgages, conveying deeds, bills (which Chipps held at a rolling discount, and which would have to be met punctually, or woe to the unfortunate acceptor), and at last blew Chipps on his back, among his strong boxes and his gold; and after in vain trying to blow off a few scraggy hairs which crawled down his cheeks and round about his dirty old skull, whisked up a piece of paper which Chipps had been grasping tightly and desperately a few minutes before, and which he had accidentally allowed to slip out of his hand, in agony, when the wind had been particularly severe with him, and made it whirl round about the room, careering, and fluttering, and dancing about, as if in joy at the agony of old Chipps, who lay on his back, grinding his teeth in rage.

Old Chipps lay on his back, the wind blowing his drapery about him, and forcing his neckerchief into his eyes, flapping the sides of his cheeks with his collar, and lashing his limbs with the many old dressing-gown, which, in derision, it had torn into strips. Old Chipps still lay on his back, his right hand closed forcibly, as if it still had possession of the paper. Old Chipps fancied he still had the paper in his hand, as, after he began to recover a bit, he clenched his hand again, and squeaked, with a sort of fiendish triumph,

'Ah, ha! It's here yet; I have it! Blow away as you will, you can't blow this little bit of parchment out of my hand! Wouldn't you like to do it, though? He, he! Ho, ho! I daresay! Very likely; very likely, indeed! He, he! It's grand! Ninety thousand pounds, and a rent-roll of forty thousand a-year! Ah, ha! You would like it, my fine master the wind! But you can't get it! No, no! Samuel Chipps isn't to be done in that way! It's too good a thing for him to lose! He, he! I should think so! Ho, ho, ho! Ah, ha! Did you think so? No you don't, my fine master! I have it here!'

The wind had rolled old Chipps again to the other end of the garret, and punched his head against a sharp key which protruded from his strong box. He lay on his face, clutching at a dirty piece of waxcloth, and squeezing the hand which he thought grasped the parchment.

'Ha, ha!' he continued, laughing in impotent glee—'No, you don't; no you don't, my fine master the wind—no, no, not at all, you shouldn't ask it. Ninety thousand pounds, and a rent-roll of forty thousand a-year! Wouldn't my patrician friend, the Marquis of Pennywistle like to have it? Why don't you blow it to him? Ha, ha! do, to oblige such an illustrious member of the British aristocracy! Oh yes, there's patrician blood there, and no mistake. He, he! Ho, ho! The blood of a noble race runs in his veins! Of course it does. He, he! Who says different? What hardy individual would dare to say the contrary, and to hint that there's one as is living in pig-sties and haystacks, and grubbing with swine on husks, has a better right to the title, the estate, and the money? Eh! answer me that? Ha, ha! ho, ho! he, he!

Old Chipps was again on his back, the wind was fiercer than ever, the piece of parchment was still careering above him. He looked up, and it whisked an inch above his head, and then started off on another wild career round the room. Slowly old Chipps drew his hand from his side, and, with a wild shriek of horror, he discovered that the parchment was gone. He looked up, and saw that it was above him, being whirled about with the raging wind. The doors and windows now rattled fiercer than ever, the wind howled, and old Chipps started upon his tottering old legs, the hairs on his head standing erect like porcupine quills, his eyes starting in their sockets, and his hands stretched frantically forth to try and catch the trusty parchment, which was still diving about.

'O mein Gott! mein Gott!' shrieked out Chipps. 'O let me get it. Oh why did I defy the power of Gott's elements in that way? A judgment! a judgment! as I am a miserable sinner. O give it to me again, and I'll repent! O give—give—give—give! O mein Gott! why did I open my box on a night like this? Give—give—give—give! Once again in the box, and it shall never go out again! Ninety thousand pounds, and a clear rental of forty thousand! Fine mansion, horses, carriages! Oh my sides!—Oh dear, dear, dear!—Oh, for mercy's sake!'

Old Chipps was rushing insanely about the room, jumping up on chairs, and leaping off them again, with his shaky old limbs, and his palsied arms trying to grasp the parchment, which was diving about, approaching uncomfortably near the chimney-place. Several times it was almost within his grasp; and a wild shriek always escaped Chipps as it evaded his clutches. At last, it wavered for a few minutes round his head, fluttering about his eyes, but still eluding his grasp, and, with a wild yell of despair, Chipps saw it rush up the chimney.

'Mein Gott! mein Gott! lost—lost—lost! Gone to make the fortune of whoever picks it up! Oh misery! misery! Stay, I will follow it! yes, I will follow it!' shrieked out old Chipps, with a frenzied glare in his eyes; and, in the twinkling of an eye, he was crawling up the chimney—the wind assisting his ascent!

He reaches the top!

His scanty whiskers and locks are ploughed up by the fury of the elements!

They are scattered to the four winds of heaven!

The gale is fearful!

The parchment is fluttering above his head!

It gives a fearful swoop into the distance!

Old Chipps can see it shining yellowly in the darkness!

'Now for a chase;—I must follow it. Ha, ha! I shall have it yet.'

With an unearthly whoop halloo, which was heard throughout every city and village in Europe, and which shook Dubdub like an earthquake, old Chipps

SMOKING.

I WONDER who first discovered the uses of the fragrant weed? I bow in respectful homage to the memory of the great unknown; and my lips pronounce endless blessings upon him—which, I am sure, are echoed by every worshipper at the shrine of the cloudy god. Of course I know that many great men have characterised smoking as a nasty, filthy habit; and some have not scrupled to cull, from their vocabulary, epithets worthy of the most choice specimen of a Billingsgate bully, and such as are not to be found in dictionaries familiar in polite circles. 'It is a shocking thing, blowing smoke out of our mouths into other people's mouths, eyes, and noses, and having the same thing done to us,' said Dr. Johnson, according to Boswell. Johnson's remark is mild, and provokes a smile from the smoker—nothing more. But when he hears the strong expressions already referred to, his only reply is a loud Ha! ha! ha! and a gaze of admiration on his pipe—to which he applies himself with a greater relish than ever. He can afford to laugh at the gentle language of the 'abolitionist,' the more so when he reflects that it is caused by the remembrance of the time when his friend of the big words first tried to blow a cloud, under the boyish impression that it was a manly thing to do—and of the rueful countenance which the poor fellow wore five minutes afterwards, when he was enduring all the horrors of sickness. The devotee can remember the time when himself was in a similar condition; but he only smiles at the remembrance, and, caressing the object of his affections, continues his devotions.

Byron has immortalised tobacco, in that charming poem 'The Island.' Hear what this great master of the lyre has to say:—

'Sublime tobacco! which, from east to west,
Cheers the tar's labour or the Turkman's rest;
Which, on the Moslem's ottoman divides
His hours, and rivals opium and his brides;
Magnificent in Stamboul, but less grand,
Though not less loved, in Wapping or the Strand;
Divine in hookas; glorious in a pipe,
When tipp'd with amber, mellow, rich, and ripe;
Like other charmers, wooing the careless
More dazlingly when darning in full dress;
Yet thy true lovers more admire by far
Thy naked beauties—Give me a cigar!'

If, by the last couplet, Byron meant that the true lovers of tobacco preferred a cigar to a pipe, then, with all deference, I beg to differ from his lordship. I never yet met with a heavy smoker who considered himself satisfied with cigars. He always resorted to his pipe when he desired a thoroughly enjoyable smoke. For myself, I prefer the pipe; but not all the hookas in hookadom would atone to me for the loss of a little cutty, blackened all over. This is vulgar, perhaps; but I don't mind. When I have completely coloured a cutty, I look upon it as an old and valued friend, from whom to think of parting is not without a pang. Meerschaums may be good for smoking—I don't say they aren't—but still I prefer my little clay. Meerschaum suggests mere sham. Mr. John Leech has completely satirised such shams. Little Ensign Snooks, of the blank Regiment, expends a small fortune in colouring his meerschaum. Bill, the railway porter, victimises Snooks—and serve him right—by extorting from him more money for tobacco in six weeks than he actually expends in that article in six months. When his victim has bled freely, and it is within an inch of being a moral impossibility to make him bleed farther, then, but not till then, does Snooks receive back his costly trifle, which he sports among his friends, asking them to admire his skill in colouring. The little idiot! Does he imagine everybody to be as stupid as himself? Snooks colour a meerschaum! Never could he effect such a result were he allowed the fourth part of the term of his natural life for the purpose. He smokes because it looks 'fast'; but as he couldn't take three whiffs of a well-coloured clay filled with tobacco of any strength, he must needs smoke tobacco as light as it is possible to have. He doesn't feel any enjoyment in having a good smoke. On the contrary, were his own feelings alone to be consulted, he would pitch his pipe where he would never see it again. But, as he courts the company of fast men, he imitates the leaders of his set to the best of his small ability. Ha! ha! ha! what a poor contemptible puppy is this representative of the army!

But the race of Snooks is not confined to the army. They are to be met with everywhere. They come out heavy, à la Dundreary. You know them at once. Everybody is acquainted with one or more of the race. I know several; but there is one in particular who takes my fancy, and at his expense I enjoy many a hearty laugh. He is about the middle height, and, if anything, rather good-looking. In his dress he is awfully loud; but his taste in this respect doesn't appear to lead him to take his complexion, &c. into account, for he is always dressed in such a manner as to give him an odd, comical appearance. He is, or pretends to be, very short-sighted, consequently he sports an eye-glass, which is always called into requisition when he sees any crinolines approaching. He has a pair of charming little whiskers, to the perception of which a glass of strong magnifying power would be necessary; but he seems to be very proud of them. Of course his hair is parted—painfully so—down the middle of his head, both at back and front. Such is my exquisite friend. I meet him very often in the street, and every time I so meet him he is filling his meerschaum. Mutual greetings being over, his first sentence invariably is—'Ain't thith pipe colouring doothed fine?' to which of course I reply in the affirmative, as it pleases him and does me no harm; for his pipe I seldom look at, although it is a very beautiful one, and cost rather a heavy sum of money. He seldom if ever smokes at home, unless he has some of his kind with him, when of course the meerschaum is exhibited, and the company asked if it 'ain't colouring doothed fine?' He smokes for appearance sake only. He still retains the idea that it looks manly. But such men I would recommend not to smoke at all. If they derive no good from the tobacco, and no pleasure from its indulgence—and they don't—much better for them if they wouldn't smoke at all; at all events, if they smoke—and I don't entertain the idea that they will renounce the practice until smoking is not one of the characteristics of 'fast' men—let them refrain from perpetually boring other people by asking if their meerschaums 'ain't colouring doothed fine.'

But the real smoker smokes only for the pleasure which it brings to him. If I am bored and put about concerning anything, I am soothed by my pipe. In sorrow it is my comforter; in mental or bodily pain it affords me relief; in thoughtful moments it aids me; and when happy it adds to my happiness. It is my friend at all times and in all seasons; and I appreciate the benefits which it showers upon me.

I have had a hard day's work to-day, and have come home to the dullness and loneliness of my bachelor hall. No kind voice greets me, and no beaming face smiles a sweet welcome. No merry children are here to prattle and play with. The only welcome I receive is from Mrs. Snapitup, my landlady, and Sally, her attendant myrmidon, and their welcome is not by any means a hearty one. No fire has been kindled in my room. I must therefore put up with the cold, which to-day is indeed piercing. I am kept waiting for dinner till human patience can wait no longer, and as I put my hand to the bell-rope, the door opens, and enter Sally with something supposed to be edible. I submit to my doom, and try to imagine I am enjoying a hearty dinner, but to no purpose. The meat is underdone, the plates are cold, the—but why should I enumerate? I am getting accustomed to such things, and habit, they say, is second nature. Let me atone for a bad dinner by a night's reading. I make the attempt, but I am in no mood for reading. I turn from my books with a feeling approaching to disgust; but as I do so my eye rests upon a little something lying upon the chimney-piece. I smile; the cloud begins to pass away. My face, which before wore a sullen expression, now brightens. The little something is my darling cutty. For a second or two I gaze at it with feelings which are indescribable. Then I fill it with 'sublime tobacco,' apply a light, and before I have taken a dozen whiffs, all remembrance of what a few minutes ago disturbed me has passed away. I am a different being entirely. I am happier than a king, for 'Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.'

I am wafted into a land where all is sunshine and happiness; where the flowers bloom, the birds sing, and the streams murmur musically for ever. Everything is bright and fair. I am monarch of all I survey. For me the breezes blow, bearing with them the perfumes of the sweetest flowers. Now I hear music. A low voice chants a song of love, to which I listen soul-enwrapped. A female, 'beautiful as an angel's dream,' is beside me. We sit and whisper to each other tales of love; and the birds, the streams, the breeze, and everything around, take up the tale and waft it to the farthest bounds of this fairy-land. And thus we sit, heedless of time. With my arm twined around her slender waist, she leans upon my breast. I bend my head to press my lips—Ha! my pipe is out, and the vision is gone; but with it is not gone a feeling of happiness at having such a comforter as my dear little cutty. S.

THE NEXT OF KIN.

A STORY OF THE MABHURST EXTENSION RAILWAY.

CHAPTER I.

'Now, look here, Miles. Don't you blame me, for I'm acting according to orders. The Squire says to me, if any of them don't pay their rent to the day, out with them. Now this is the second time I've been here, and still you are not ready.'

'It's the first time I've been an hour behind time, Mr. Lane; and if you were to tell the Squire how it is I've been disappointed in getting money, he surely wouldn't come down so hard upon a chap whose father and grandfather held this very farm under his father. I've never failed as yet; and now times are hard, I think Sir Hugh will give me a week or two.'

'Well, the fact is, Miles, I think Sir Hugh wants this farm of yours; and I tell you, my opinion is he'll get you out of it before long, rent or no rent.'

'No, Mr. Lane. There you're wrong. He may be a hard landlord, but he ain't an unjust one. I've worked on this bit o' land, and spent money on it. I was born in that cottage, and there I hope to die.'

'Well, Miles, I only tell you, Sir Hugh is going to sell the property; and it will be a toss up whether you stop on it or not.'

'Mr. Lane! he can't turn me off like that. It would be cruel to send me adrift after all these years.'

'I only give you a hint. Have the money ready to-morrow, and perhaps he may change his mind. Good day.' And Mr. Charles Lane, steward to Sir Hugh Burnett, stepped out from the garden, whistling a lively tune, and strolled off with a satisfied air; leaving Miles almost stupefied by the blow he had received.

For years and years, the Meadowcross Farm had been held by members of the Garnett family. It had descended from father to son, until it came into the hands of Miles Garnett, who was now threatened with ejectment. It was but a small farm, and scarcely one by which to realise a fortune; still, from time immemorial, the Garnetts had managed to subsist upon it; and the idea of quitting it caused Miles greater grief than he had felt since his father's death.

It was as pretty a little farm as you would wish to see, and the cottage upon it was the very picture of an English home; and, as Miles slowly walked towards it, independently of the family interest connected with it, no wonder he felt a pang of regret at the thought of leaving it. As he approached the rustic porch, a pretty light little figure ran out to meet him.

'What did Mr. Lane say? Why do you look so gloomy, Miles?'

'Am I gloomy, Lucy, dear? Well, never mind. Let us go in.' And the pair entered the neat little cottage parlour, with its speckless window-curtains, and bright chimney ornaments.

Lucy Garnett was Miles' sister, and they were the sole occupants of the cottage; she was the prettiest, brightest, neatest, and most useful girl for miles round, and an inestimable treasure to her brother. Their affection was more than the ordinary love of brother and sister, for they were everything to one another, and looked upon each other, respectively, as the pattern of their sex.

'Now tell me, Miles,' said Lucy, coaxingly, 'what is it that makes you so sad?'

'What should we do, Lucy, if we were forced to leave this place?'

'Do? But we are not, Miles. What do you mean? We shall be able to pay the rent in a day or two, and then all will be right.'

'Sir Hugh wants to sell the farm, Lucy, and then there is no knowing what the owner may do.'

Lucy became grave in a moment, for she shared in her brother's anxiety. They were both equally attached to the place, and to leave it would be heart-rending. 'I see nothing for it,' continued Miles, 'but to pack up and be off. There's nothing to be got in England. I shall try my luck in the Colonies.'

'Nonsense, Miles; you must not look only at the dark side of things. Sir Hugh may not try to sell Meadowcross; and, if he does, he may not find a purchaser; and, even supposing it bought, the new owner may not turn us out.'

'Three may notes, Lucy! Ours is but a bad look out,' said Miles, with a sigh, as he took up a country newspaper, and turned to the advertisements of ships about to sail. As he glanced down the columns, something attracted his attention. It was but a few lines of print, but, nevertheless, he read them over and over, as if unable to believe his eyes.

'Lucy, Lucy!' he cried, or almost gasped, after a few minutes. 'Look here, Lucy,' and he pointed to an advertisement, with quivering finger. His sister took the paper and read the paragraph to which he pointed. As she did so, her colour heightened, and a look of unmistakable joy beamed upon her pretty face. The words she read were these:—

'NEXT OF KIN.—The relatives of the late Ralph Garnett, who died 21st July last, at Montreal, will hear of something to their advantage, on application to Messrs. Quilpen & Shipskyn, 27 Lynch-court, Temple.'

'O Miles! It must be uncle Ralph, who went to Canada when we were children.'

'Yes, Lucy! There does seem the chance of something good coming to us in return for leaving Meadowcross. Leaving—why, perhaps, we might get money enough to buy it ourselves!'

'Oh, that would be beautiful! But are we the next of kin?'

'Yes; I have often heard father talk of his brother Ralph, although, unfortunately, they did not agree well. He was a confirmed old bachelor, and proportionately ill-tempered; and, after quarrelling with all his relatives in England, he emigrated; since which time nothing was heard of him at home.'

'Of course you'll go to see these gentlemen?'

'I should think so. Quilpen & Shipkyn! Why, they are Sir Hugh's lawyers! What time do the London trains go? Put some things into my carpet-bag, Lucy. I can walk over to Mabhurst at once, and take the first train. Hurrah! O Lucy! I feel so happy to think we may yet stop at Meadowcross!' And, betwixt laughing and crying, he took his sister round the waist, and kissed her heartily.

An hour afterwards, he was trudging manfully along the Mabhurst road, on his way to London, building innumerable castles in the air, in connection with the 'something' he was to hear to his advantage from Messrs. Quilpen & Shipkyn.

CHAPTER II.

All the legal world knows Lynch Court. It is celebrated for being narrower and dirtier than any of the other narrow and dirty courts in which lawyers love to build their official nests. Number 27 was not a whit cleaner than its neighbours; it was a tumble-down, smoke-begrimmed, dirt-encrusted house. The windows let in draughts, but not light; the chimneys served for passages for the wind, but not for the smoke, which, whenever a fire was lighted, hovered about the ceiling, and over the musty tin boxes, trying to find an egress. Nevertheless, in spite of these drawbacks, Quilpen & Shipkyn continued to transact business—as their fathers and grandfathers had done before them—in these premises; and it was here, in a state of nervous trepidation, that Miles Garnett found himself the morning after he had seen the advertisement for the heart of kin of Ralph Garnett.

After the necessary delay, without which it is impossible to see the heads of well-to-do firms, and after a narrow scrutiny of his countenance by several clerks—who were chiefly remarkable for their unhealthy, not to say dirty, appearance—Miles was admitted into the awful presence of Mr. Shipkyn.

'Well, young man?' said that gentleman, folding his hands in a benign manner.

Miles stated his business.

'Dear, dear! I wish Mr. Quilpen were here. So you are Miles Garnett? Ah! what do you intend doing in this matter, Mr. Garnett? Oh, here is Mr. Quilpen,' said he, with an air of relief, as a sharp-featured, eager-looking little man bustled into the room. 'Quilpen, this is the next of kin to Ralph Garnett.'

'Name?' asked the senior partner, turning sharply upon Miles.

'Miles Garnett.'

'Relationship to deceased?'

'Nephew.'

'Good! What proofs you are his next of kin?'

'Proofs, sir?' stammered Miles, taken aback. 'I only know I am his nephew, and he hasn't got another except my sister, and she was his niece, and lives with me.'

'A very loose statement, Mr. Garnett; but, luckily for you, we have caused inquiries to be made, and have ascertained a nephew to be the deceased's nearest living relation. If you can prove yourself to be that nephew, well and good. Come to us again when you have obtained copies of the register of your birth, your mother's marriage certificate, and so on, and then we will enter into further particulars. Good morning, Mr. Garnett.'

Miles was out in the dingy court before he could recover from the momentary disappointment; for, so little did he know of legal proceedings, that he almost expected the affair to have been settled at once; however, he knew there would be no difficulty in obtaining the necessary proofs; and as the night train, tearing through the darkness, bore him on to Mabhurst, his dreams of possessing Meadowcross were nearly as bright as when he started on his London journey.

Unpleasant tidings were in store for him on reaching home. Mr. Lane had been to the cottage while he had been absent, and, on behalf of Sir Hugh, had demanded the rent, at the same time announcing the Squire's intention of forcing him to quit Meadowcross at the end of the next quarter. 'But next quarter!' thought Miles, 'there are nearly three months to come yet, and in that time I may become the purchaser.'

Miles, however, was in the immediate want of money, for Sir Hugh threatened to distrain for rent. In his trouble he bethought himself of a rich neighbour to whom he might apply. To him he went, and told the whole of his story, and his present troubles.

Farmer Field was a good-hearted man, and made little difficulty about assisting him; and when Miles left Richacre Farm, he had with him enough money to pay the rent when Mr. Lane should call for it. Enough? Yes, much more than enough, for Farmer Field had entrusted him with a large sum of money to pay into a London bank, he himself being obliged to go to the north of England the following day, and disliking to leave the money in his house. Miles, who had procured the necessary certificates, was going to pay his second visit to Messrs. Quilpen & Shipkyn. Farmer Field, therefore, asked him to leave the parcel of notes at the bank.

The following day Mr. Lane received the rent, and Miles set off for London to prove his right to the property of Ralph Garnett, deceased.

CHAPTER III.

The proofs which Miles presented to Messrs. Quilpen & Shipkyn were quite satisfactory; and he heard, with pleasure, that the sum of money left by his uncle far exceeded the most he had hoped.

'Come to us again to-morrow, Mr. Garnett,' said the senior partner, 'and we will formally make over the property to you.' And, in the excess of his politeness, he accompanied Miles into the outer office, and shook hands with him.

As Miles was leaving the room, he heard Mr. Quilpen addressing one of his clerks. 'Mr. Craggs, have you sent out those bills about the Meadowcross Farm?'

Miles returned to the office once more, but Mr. Quilpen had already disappeared.

'Will he be long engaged?' asked he of a clerk.

'Can't say, I'm sure. Some fellow's with him about purchasing this lot,' and the clerk waved his hand towards a bill, which set forth, in large type, the fact that the land known as Meadowcross Farm, 'together with the messuages and tenements thereunto appertaining,' was for sale. Miles turned faint as he read it; and feared that, after all, he was too late. He waited, with feverish anxiety, until he could see Mr. Quilpen. At length, the gentleman who had been with him, respecting the purchase of the farm, came out from the inner room. Miles stared at him intently, as if to read in his face the result of the conference; and then hurried in to the lawyer.

The farm was not yet sold. Miles drew a long breath. But Mr. Quilpen expected it would be in a few hours.

'The fact is,' he said, 'the gentleman is very eager after it, but still objects to give the sum asked.'

'I will give it!' cried Miles, eagerly.

Mr. Quilpen stared at him, as if to make sure he was in his right mind; then said, slowly—'I suppose you are prepared to pay for it at once?'

'To-morrow, when I get my uncle's money from you.'

'The gentleman who just left will be back in an hour's time to tell me his decision.'

Miles put his hand into his pocket, and fingered the parcel of notes Farmer Field had entrusted to him.

'You are sure you can make over my uncle's money to me to-morrow?'

'Certainly.'

'Here then. How much is it?' And Miles, with trembling hands, untied the parcel, and scattered the notes upon the table. Mr. Quilpen was too good a lawyer to show surprise; he merely signed a receipt for the money, and promised Miles the title-deeds the following day, together with the other property.

When Miles was again in Lynch-court, he bitterly repented what he had done; he knew it was but appropriating the money for a day, but still he fancied the passers-by read 'thief' written on his brow. Every turn in the street he dreaded meeting Farmer Field, for his conscience accused him of having done wrong—he whose boast had ever been that all the world might know his goings-on. Then there was Lucy. He had never concealed a single thing from her, but this he dared not tell her. That night he slept in London, and the next day, at the appointed hour, he was again in Lynch-court.

Mr. Quilpen's manner did not seem so cordial as he shook hands with him that morning.

'Have you the necessary papers ready for me?' asked Miles.

'Here are those connected with the Meadowcross Farm,' Miles eagerly seized and pocketed them. 'But,' continued Mr. Quilpen, 'I must beg you to bear the news I have to tell you calmly.' Miles turned deadly pale, for he felt what was coming. 'We have this morning received a letter, purporting to come from the son of your late uncle. It appears Mr. Ralph married in Canada, but, in less than two months, quarrelled with, and separated from his wife. The offspring of that marriage now writes to claim the property —'

Miles heard no more, for he had fainted. In a moment a vivid picture had flashed before his eyes. He saw himself standing in the felon's dock—he heard the judge's sentence upon him—he heard him comment on his crime—he saw the averted faces of his friends—he saw his sister, his own little Lucy, turn from him; and then his brain whirled round, and he became senseless. He recovered, to find himself in a small inn near Lynch-court, whither he had been removed. In the evening he was strong enough to proceed to the railway station, and get into the carriage for Mabburst. No one would have recognised in that crushed, haggard-looking man the joyous, stalwart Miles Garnett of the previous morning.

Lucy came running out to meet him, with smiles and cheerful looks and eager questionings. 'I am a thief,' he muttered hoarsely, and pushed her from him when she would have embraced him.

CHAPTER IV.

Miles, the next day, lay in a species of stupor, from which even Lucy could not arouse him; but, in the evening, he summoned up courage to tell her the whole story. When he had finished, he scarcely dared look her in the face; but he little knew her love; her arms were round his neck, and through her sobs she entreated him to bear up. Farmer Field would not be back for several days, and in that time much might be done.

Two days later a stranger inquired in the village for Miles Garnett. 'It is a detective come to apprehend me,' said Miles. It was not. It was a civil engineer, who informed Miles of a projected railway which would pass through the lower portion of his farm, and ended the conversation by asking him if he would take a sum of money for the field they required. The sum he offered exceeded that which Miles had, three days before, given for the whole farm.

The railway was to have passed through Sir Hugh's park, but the price he required for the land was so exorbitant that the company looked about for ground owned by a less avaricious man. Meadowcross Farm had just been sold, they learned, and the result was that, the day before Farmer Field returned home, Miles lost a slip of land, and paid into the London bankers the amount he should have given them a fortnight sooner. But that was not all. Miles told Farmer Field the whole story; he could not bear to act a lie to him; and the good-hearted farmer readily forgave him, and they remained the firmest friends.

The strangest part of the story is, perhaps, that, after all, Miles did inherit his uncle Ralph's property. The young man who claimed it proved to be an impostor, who had formerly been Ralph Garnett's clerk. The imposition was discovered; Miles obtained the money; and he is now an old and highly respected farmer; but, from that time to this, he has never forgotten the lesson he received in connection with the Meadowcross Farm.

Lucy married as well as she deserved, and is now a grandmamma. The farm is still in the possession of the family; but Miles seldom goes there; he lives with his sister; and sometimes in the evening, as they talk over the past, they neither can refrain from an expression of thankfulness, when they remember how Miles Garnett was saved from disgrace by the Mabburst Extension Railway.

WARNER STERN.

SONNET.

BY THE LATE DAVID GRAY.

Not England, Italy, or tawny Spain,
Gay France, or all the golden isles of Greece,
Wean from my stubborn muse the burning strains,
Like Scotland and her glorious barrenness
Of hills, imbrowned with bracken's rusty gold
And the bell'd heather. Yet, at dreamy times,
Uneasy feelings of my heart take hold
To drink the keen air of diviner climes;
See the soul-blinding beauty by the south
Nursed to voluptuous ripeness, languid bloom.
And why? For scenes unvisited resemble
Those brightnesses and airy forms uncouth
Seen when we close our eyes, boil up and tremble
From the thick-spangled supernatural gloom.

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

January 7, 1836.

We have had Charles Beaumont staying with us for the last three weeks, sighing for love of Hester Thorndale, whom he has never forgotten since seeing her here last September. She laughs at him, and calls him 'boy,' yet flings him a crumb of comfort from time to time, in the shape of a pocket-handkerchief to pick up, or to give her lap-dog an airing, or to play her a tune on his flute. If this dalliance goes on, I should not wonder (notwithstanding all her good sense) but that something like attachment for her youthful admirer may some day be wrought out in her heart.

There's something rotten in the state of love. How strangely alliances are formed! and, stranger still, people don't seem to be in the least surprised at them! There is Emma, so very young and so very pretty, all but engaged, her sister tells me, to Mr. Alton, a man upwards of sixty! But, then, he is of landed estate, and will succeed to a baronetcy on the death of a frail elder brother. And so the world will see nothing preposterous in this marriage. Rather will they coolly congratulate the bride on her good fortune; and, by-and-by, when she becomes a widow, her ladyship may find leisure to think of love in earnest—that is, when she weds for the second time. Oh! I have no patience with such mercenary calculations. If an old man will be so foolish as to seek a wife young enough to be his granddaughter, and her relatives are so unfeeling as to wreath the garlands for the sacrifice, why does the victim herself not rebel? Such rebellion were noblest allegiance to truth and right. Why does she not cry out mightily for the freedom of choice that is the birthright of her maidenhood? Why will she barter the glory of her fresh affections for anything beneath the sun, save the fair equivalent of a devoted heart? And if she will thus forget her high privilege, and undervalue true love—the best gift that one creature can bestow on another—why does society ignore the heartless spirit, and receive the gilded automaton with open arms, as neither 'sinned against nor sinning'? I confess my head sometimes gets confused when I think on the world's ways. I discern so much inconsistency between creed and practice; such open adoration of wealth, however privately and abstractly the principle is denied; such erroneous ideas of what should constitute true happiness; such exaltation of trifling externals; such depreciation of veritable blessings! But stay, Kate, surely you are not going to turn censor upon mankind—you, whom George calls 'a linnet scarcely full fledged.' But, as the wise man says, 'A bird of the air shall have a voice, and that which hath wings may carry a matter.' By the way, speaking of carrying a matter—which no doubt, in its original application, meant a secret—I must record a little incident which occurred to-day.

I had gone into town this morning to do some shopping, consequent upon baby's laying aside her long clothes. (How nice she looks in her short frocks, and how neat are her tiny feet in the scarlet worsted boots!) Well, in the course of my perambulations, being not very far from the street, I thought I might as well call a minute, and ask for George. I went to his chambers accordingly, and tapped at the entrance door. No answer. Then louder, but with no effect. I next opened the door, and peeped in. The outer office, where the two clerks sit, was empty; but I heard words, rather loud and contentious, proceeding from the inner room, and my husband's voice distinctly raised, as he said—

'I will hear no more of this. Your interference is altogether absurd. I desire you may never trouble me again about the matter. The thing is done, and cannot now be undone by any effort of yours.'

Here strange tones—a female's, as I fancied—muttered an indistinct reply. I was not mistaken. In another instant the chamber opened, and George appeared in the doorway, 'showing out,' as we phrase it, some person standing behind him, who seemed very unwilling to vacate the sanctum. This was a woman—the same (I knew her the moment I caught sight of her) whom I had seen talking with my husband on the road that moonlight evening. She wore the identical smart-shaped bonnet, and the cloak with the fur trimming. She was young, moreover, and good-looking in respect of features; yet with a sinister expression in her eye—a sort of low cunning, as it struck me, which I did not like.

When George saw me thus unexpectedly standing straight before him (for I had not thought of executing my commissions to town when he left me in the morning), he seemed slightly taken at unawares. He made more haste than ever to get quit of his visitor—flying to the outer door, and holding it wide ajar, that she might make her exit the faster. As she was moving slowly away, with downcast visage, she suddenly lifted her head, and darted a quick glance at me—bold and defiant. George made a gesture of increasing impatience. Then she lingered on the threshold, as if meditating a parting word. It came at last. The accent was dry and disagreeable:—

'If I don't come back, Mr. Weston, you shall hear from me.' George answered nothing; but, closing the door so hurriedly as nearly to catch a portion of the mantle as she retreated, shut her out precipitately. When he turned to me, it was with apparent relief that she was gone; and I noted that his face was partially flushed from the recent colloquy.

'Sit down, Kate. My scribes are both out. Or perhaps you had better come into my study, though it is a sad litter to-day. I have been consulting old records, and the floor is quite strewn with the books and papers.'

Yet the stranger had found admission, I thought, I might as well go in too. He had not exaggerated. There was literally almost no available space; and I had to thread my steps, daintily, between the interstices of quartos, folios, and parchments, as best I might. While I was thus groping my way to a chair—into which I almost tumbled at last most unceremoniously—my husband had taken occasion to, hustle out of sight, into a big box close at hand, a considerable mass of old letters that lay upon the table—some recently opened, probably for re-inspection—some closed in the original foldings. This done, he composed himself to speak to me; and, for this purpose, seated himself on the said box, remarking, as he did so,

'You have little idea, Kate, how we lawyers, who are said to worry others so cruelly, are sometimes worried ourselves. And, when senseless people come making ridiculous proposals to me, I cannot help feeling provoked by their ignorant meddling.'

Of course I guessed he alluded to the woman who had just gone. So almost as if thinking aloud, I said, 'I daresay she is very troublesome; but I thought you had declined managing her affairs?' His eye did not meet mine, though I was looking full into his face, but glanced off adroitly in the direction of the window.

'Oh! that person whom you saw just now is not the worst of my clients. But the truth is, Kate,' he added, evidently desirous of changing the subject, 'I find the work here getting rather heavy for me, and I have serious thoughts of assuming a partner.'

'A partner!' I echoed in surprise, while vague notions of the privacy of our dwelling being thereby invaded rushed through my mind. 'You don't mean a strange man to come and live with us, to go into town with you every morning and come back with you every night, taking away all the pleasure of our fireside, talking loud, perhaps, and looking fierce, and frightening the baby. You don't mean that, George?'

He gave a small laugh. 'Kate, you are the funniest little dreamer. I do not want to have my home the less but far more my own than it has yet been. And this would be greatly facilitated by having a judicious person here with authority above that of a mere clerk to act in my absence. I wish to be longer in my own home, my love, and to go and come at pleasure; to be able to take a whole day's play occasionally, Kate, without the fear of business being neglected.'

'Oh then, get a partner by all means,' I broke in; 'the sooner the better if it will save you fatigue, George, and give you more leisure to spend with me and our pet. Do you know she is growing wonderfully, and will soon be able to walk and to speak, and be quite a companion to us?'

I was really in earnest; but my husband regarded me with such a comical expression, that I could not refrain smiling at my own enthusiasm. Whereupon, taking both my hands in his, he exclaimed—

'How many things there are, my darling, I should never have known but for you! Indeed, I have got new views of human nature altogether since I took you into partnership. But that other partner is a different affair, and I shall talk it all over with you this evening.'

Shortly after this I took my departure, well pleased and happy. Yet I must confess that for a good part of the way home my thoughts reverted to the owner of the furred mantle; and I half-resolved to put the questions point-blank to George—Who is she? and What does she want with you? But somehow I have not found courage yet. I have my own suspicions, however, which I should like to have either confirmed or removed.

To-night, as we were sitting by the fire, I took heart, and asked my husband quietly, 'Will you tell me, dear, whether the person I saw in your office to-day is not the wife of that Mr. Grey?'

'No, indeed,' he answered at once; 'she is not. Dreaming again, Kate! Oh you have the rarest fancy. You should write a volume of fairy tales, my love; it would be a complete success.'

I hung my head, for I felt rather ashamed of the failure I had made in my supposition. When I looked up, George was laughing in a sly sort of manner. I felt a little provoked, but I began to laugh too; I really could not help it. So I am no wiser than I was.

February 13.

A long letter came this morning from Aunt Aubrey. She has been at Nice for more than two months, and gives a charming account of the place, both in respect of society, climate, and natural advantages, fine walks and beautiful scenery. She writes, too, that her own health begins to improve, whereat I rejoice. But there is another part of the letter which interests me greatly. This refers to an acquaintance she has recently made. I shall transcribe the narrative in her own words.

'I believe, my dear Katherine, I told you formerly that I considered myself fortunate in the apartments I have got here—quiet, comfortable, airy, and with a sweet peep of country from the windows. My landlady is Scotch, her husband a Frenchman. There are other lodgers—an English gentleman and his two daughters, who are located here for the winter and spring. The girls look delicate, and I understand their mother fell a victim to consumption in the Isle of Wight. They are pleasant neighbours, and we reciprocate visits almost daily. I wish, however, to tell you of two persons whom I only discovered lately as being also resident in this house.

'I had not been here many days when I observed a child, who came out regularly every morning to play in front of my parlour casement. He was a handsome little fellow, with a sunburned cheek, curly jet locks, and flashing black eyes. Judging by size, I guessed him to be about six years old—the free and dauntless bearing might have suited a boy of any age. But what chiefly attracted my notice was the particular kind of amusement he affected, and the unflinching perseverance with which he pursued it. Punctually each day at nine o'clock a.m., the very loud beating of a very small drum fell on my ear, and, on looking out, I espied my tiny chevalier marching along with bold step to the accompaniment of his own warlike music, and heading a band of children, all wearing high pointed caps, who followed him admiringly to the rendezvous. This was an open quadrangle of some twenty feet square, marked off by a childish border of white stones, and manifestly set apart for the special purpose. Arrived here, the soi-disant general made a dead stand, and proceeded to marshal his troop. And now comes the ludicrous portion of the story. Most of these recruits were older and taller than their commander, and many of them of the female gender—most grotesquely and absurdly habited, moreover, considering their dignified profession. Their leader, however, with his bright defiant front, made amends for all the others' deficiencies, handing to each his weapon (a flat stick, fashioned with a handle, and pointed at the end to represent a miniature sword) with an air of great importance.

'Settling the youthful phalanx in double line straight before him, he proceeded to put them through various cabalistic exercises, to his own great glorification, and the evident delight of his soldiery. All this while the boy continued shouting his directions, with an authority and decision admirably in keeping with his position.

"Attention! Pas de rire—Marchez—Vite—A droite—A gauche—Chargez! Hola! Courage! Victoire!" Such was the routine of the daily drill. After the more serious business was over, the play commenced in earnest—girls and boys began scampering about in noisy merriment, chasing each other, brandishing their wooden implements, waging mock fights, attacking, defending, repulsing, backwards and forwards, to the right, to the left, ending at length in a complete mêlée of the whole corps. Old woman though I am, I confess to being entertained by the tout ensemble of the scene; and you will believe the interest was not diminished when I discovered that the hero of my little drama was actually domiciled under the same roof with myself.

'One day, after parade, I beckoned the child to come near and speak with me. The only answer he gave was to shoot up to me a rapid sparkling glance, and then bound away in the opposite direction. For several mornings I took no further notice of him, though once or twice I caught the flash of his black eye furtively darted at my window. This was precisely what I wished. His curiosity was piqued, and after that the conquest was easy. Next time I beckoned, he came willingly, and then our conversation was something like the following:—

"He bien! mon petit, comment vous appelez vous?"

"Non—non. Je ne suis pas petit," he replied, briskly, with a toss of the raven curls. "On m'appelle Capitaine!"

'Contrasting the diminutive figure before me with the swelling title he assumed, I could not refrain a smile.

"Dites moi donc, mon Capitaine, ou demeurez vous?"

"Ici. Dans ce maison, madame."

"Indeed!" I repeated, almost unconsciously, to myself.

"Yes; and indeed!" cried my companion, while his features relaxed into an arch laugh. "I live here—in this very house. Did you never know that before?"

"So you can speak English too, can you?" I asked, in some surprise. "Are you not, then, a French boy?" His hawk-like eyes flashed again, with a sort of burlesque pride. He drew himself up to his full height—and a very little height that was, after all—as he repeated,

"Je suis Capitaine!" As he spoke, he marched his small foot forward, and struck one palm upon his breast—raising the other aloft, as in triumphant vindication of his majesty of office. I nodded to him, and laughed.

"I know you are a captain, for I see you every morning drilling your troop. But by what name do your father and mother call you?"

"My mother calls me Louis; but my papa"—he paused a moment—"is dead!"

'I caught him by both hands, and drew him to my side.

"Was your papa a soldier, my boy?"

'He looked at me with quite a mysterious expression. "I do not know. But I hear my mamma say he is not dead as other people are dead; and he is not buried underground like them."

'Not buried. The thought darted through my mind—he must have been a sailor, and died at sea. I pondered a few minutes, during which the child, forgetting all his late military ardour, stood with a more pensive meaning in his black eyes than I had yet seen there.

"My mamma is always crying—triste, triste—when she talks of my papa," he said, in a softened tone.

"Where is your mamma?" I inquired of him, stroking the hair that curled round his temples.

"My mamma is in this house. She lives at the top of the long stairs. But she is not well," he added, with a short sigh. I bent over him, and kissed the small brown cheek,

"Do you think I could see your mamma, mon cher?"

"Peut être!" he replied, relapsing into the language of the country, "Elle est Ecossaise, ma maman; mais elle est malade; O si malade, ma cher maman!"

'I saw the little heart, late so strong, was quite feeble now, and collapsed with grief, while tears stood in the beautiful orbs, making them more starry than ever.

"I must see your mamma, Louis," I whispered to him gently; "I shall sit by her bed and nurse her, and depend upon it we shall have her quite well again very soon."

"He gave me such a look through his glittering eyelids. Was the poor fellow so unused to kindness that the chance sympathy of a stranger should call forth such dazzling gratitude? Yes. He seemed to take sudden comfort and confidence from my words.

"I like to hear you talk," he said, after a minute or two. "Nobody ever spoke this way to me before."

"Immediately he revived to his old brightness. The cloud and the shower were past, and the sun came forth again into the blue sky.

"I went to the store cupboard, which stands in a corner of my apartment, and, selecting from a heap of apples I had lately put there, some of the finest and largest, I placed them in one of the neat osier baskets (made by my gardener's blind son at Woodburn, of which I brought several abroad), and presented it to my child companion.

"Take this from your new-found friend, mon capitaine," I said; "and next time you come tell me when I may see your mamma."

"He gave me no spoken thanks; but you know well, Katherine, that there is a symbolic language oftentimes a thousandfold more eloquent than speech. Such was the manner in which this noble boy now sought to unveil his heart—seizing my hand by a quick and graceful action (no courtier could have shown more elegant gallantry), he kissed it honestly, impulsively, with tender respect; and then, turning his magnificent eyes full upon mine, he took up the basket, murmuring almost inaudibly, as he regarded the fruit, "My mamma loves apples," and so vanished from the room like a sunbeam.

"The same afternoon, I was sitting alone, meditating, as is my wont in the twilight, when a short tap came to my door, and, upon my answering the signal, Louis again appeared.

"You may come and see my mamma now, if you choose," he began; "I will show you the way."

"I'm quite ready, mon ami, venez donc!"

"He led me through a long passage, and up several flights of stairs. This is a rambling kind of house, and I seemed to be introduced into a sort of wing or abutment shut off from the main entrance. He paused before a door that was partly ajar, and giving it a slight push, and softly repeating—"My mamma is there," he tripped nimbly back again down the steps, leaving me most unceremoniously to make my own introduction. Such is childhood—forward, shy, confidential, and abrupt by turns.

"I entered very quietly, and was moving towards the bed which stood opposite, naturally expecting to find the invalid there, when I became dimly aware of a female figure half reclining on a long low seat in the window recess. The day had waned so much, and no lamp yet lit, that I had approached very near ere I perceived that the couch was empty, and that this (the only person in the chamber) must be she whom I had come to visit. When she saw me, she raised herself languidly from her recumbent posture. "You are the lady my little Louis told me of!" she said feebly. "Pray be seated. It is most kind of you to come," with a pause between each sentence to regain her failing breath. Weak as she was, I could note that the accent and manner were those of a refined gentlewoman. I sat down beside her; and as the last remnant of fading light in the west fell upon her face, which was turned thitherward, stranger as she was, I felt a pang shoot keenly through my heart as I beheld it.

"O Katherine! what is that which speaks to us so loudly, from some countenances, of the near doom of the grave? It is not that the features are wan and wasted, nor that the breathing is dubious and intermittent, nor that the blue veins go wandering too palpably over the marble brow, nor that the eyes look vague and dim, through utter weariness of outward objects. No. It is something far deeper than any of these. We feel it, but we cannot give it a name. The soul bows before the presence, as a solemn incontestible reality, a forewarning shadow of a dark hour that must come quickly. You will have guessed to what I allude. The young sufferer (she could not be more than five or six and twenty), whom I saw that afternoon for the first time, was plainly hastening away, and that rapidly—home to the better land.

"I need not give you the details of our conversation that night. The particulars I gleaned then, as well as on subsequent occasions when I visited her, are soon told. The dying woman, it appears, is a native of Scotland, the wife of a Mr. Falconer, a man well born and educated, who, for reasons she did not care to explain, could not accompany her to Nice when she came hither with their child, about three years ago. Neither has she seen him since. Indeed, she is exceedingly reserved on this point; leaving me quite in darkness whether his desertion of her was the result of choice or necessity. My own impression is, (as she always talks of him with unbounded interest and affection, and she is evidently very poor,) that her husband is of unsteady habits; and having found it impossible to make provision for his family in his own country, he gladly consented to their accepting the hospitality of a distant relative, this very Madame Dufresne, with whom I lodge. Mrs. Falconer accordingly came here, ostensibly on the score of health, but more truly to find an asylum for herself and her son. At any rate, there seems to be some mystery in the case, and she is slow to speak out.

"Taking it for granted, my dear Katherine, that you share in some measure my interest in this unfortunate lady, I shall not fail to tell you, from time to time, anything further that may transpire regarding her. Meanwhile, with love unfeigned, believe me, yours, M. AUBREY.

"P.S.—I must not omit to say to you what a sweet woman this Mrs. Falconer is. She must have been pretty, too, ere the fatal malady overtook her. By-the-by, do you know that lovely ballad of Moore's, entitled "The Stranger?" I know you sing his songs.

One of the verses I always especially admired. It runs thus—

"Nor long did her life for this sphere seem intended,
For pale was her cheek, with that spirit-like hue
Which comes when the day of this world is nigh ended,
And light from another already shines through!"

Alas! when you read these lines, you may think of the fast, fading flower in the attic room at Nice.*

Need I say that this episode in my aunt's letter hung about my memory and imagination long after I had read it; and hangs about them still, for that matter, with an intensity sometimes almost painful? What will become of that fine high-spirited boy when his poor wasted mother is gone? And where can the husband and father be? Not dead, they say, though dead to them. What can it mean?

Ah! what melancholy tales of alight and wrong some people in this world may have to tell! Poverty too. But my dear kind aunt is there, and she is the soul of charity and goodness. Once I dreamed that life was a long summer's day, and earth a garden of roses. Alas! I begin to see there are briars too; and as the poet has it—

'The heart that is soonest awake to the flowers
Is always the first to be touch'd by the thorns!'

One thing is certain, I must write to Nice this very night.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

THE MISSIONARY ABROAD. FOURTH NOTICE.

KING EYO HONESTY, of Creek Town, and King Eyamba, of Duke Town, were the reigning sovereigns of Old Calabar when Mr. Waddell arrived in that country in 1846. At the mouth of the river, the Warree, the ship in which the missionaries had come from England, was overtaken by H. M. steamer Ethiopo. On board this vessel, whither Captain Beecroft had invited him, Mr. Waddell reached Duke Town a day or two earlier than the Warree could have taken him. At the place of anchorage, where the river is about a thousand yards broad, were assembled half-a-dozen oil ships—five English and one Dutch—which presented a rather singular appearance, being roofed over and thatched from the bulwarks up nearly half-mast high. This, we presume, is the usual safeguard against all climatic pests in Calabar, and resembles the precautions adopted, for opposite reasons, by Polar voyagers, when wintering in the frozen seas of the north.

Among the very first to welcome the missionary was King Eyo, who happened to be in the river delivering oil to one of the ships. His Majesty, who approached in a six-oared gig, with an English ensign, containing his name in large capitals, streaming behind, was sheltered by an umbrella of enormous crinolinical dimensions. Two large war canoes followed him, in the form of an escort. These vessels were each rowed by twenty-eight men, between whom, down the centre of the deck, stood a body of armed warriors, ready to defend the person of their king. Like the royal gig, the canoes flaunted English ensigns, besides having a roofed house amidships, and a swivel gun in the bows. As the pageant advanced on the river, it was joined by several chiefs in their own canoes adorned with flags, and as the oarsmen bent to their work, they shouted a sort of rhythmical chant to the beat of their paddles. Captain Beecroft gave the king a cordial reception on board the Ethiopo; and the king in his turn welcomed the captain and the missionaries with all the suavity of a sovereign, shaking hands with them, and saying that he was glad to see them. Like most other human regalities, King Eyo was a kind of spectacle in his way. Although, however, a rather 'low-set and stout-made,' or what might be called a gutty man, his fine head and open countenance seemed to have favourably impressed the missionaries. As custom generally is king of kings, his Majesty of Creek Town was not above the prevailing style of scanty Calabar costume. With the exception of a beaver hat, which was probably the only royal innovation, his dress was purely native, and consisted of several yards of broad fancy-coloured silk wrapped round his loins and descending to his ankles. His only ornaments were strings of beads, which glittered from neck and arms; while his gold snuff-box, pistols, and sword were carried by a couple of sable pages.

It seldom happens to common mortals to meet two kings in one day. This, however, was Mr. Waddell's good fortune, if it can be called such, when both monarchs are black, and reign amid savage surroundings. In the evening, our missionary went ashore to visit King Eyamba at Duke Town. The royal city which, with few exceptions, is merely a mass of huts artlessly huddled together, lies along the minor trunk of the river. Eyamba's iron palace is the principal architectural feature of this metropolis of the wilderness. It was imported from Liverpool, and being constructed in the most recent style of art, it may be said to form the point of contact of the newest and oldest phases of human civilization. Judging from the picture of it which Mr. Waddell gives, it is really not inelegant, though somewhat florid and gaudy. Where it stands, it must, we fear, resemble a savage chieftain decked out with beads and bugles and other jingling trumpery, surrounded by his humble retainers, guiltless of shame, and unvitiated by the unstable and effeminate philosophy of clothes. The houses around this Alladin-palace were low, mud-plastered, palm-thatched, and without a single window to let in the sun and moon, though each had a capacious door leading into a small court-yard. This windowless city was also streetless; an inconvenience, however, which was greatly neutralised by the fact that there was neither horse nor wheeled vehicle within its walls.

A large, coarse man, with a good-humoured face, sitting in an arm-chair, with a few yards of Manchester cloth wrapped round his waist! That is the portrait of a king—King Eyamba—rough, as if new from Nature's African pottery. Bating the clothes, a little schooling, and, perhaps, the colour of the skin, the picture bears a wonderful resemblance to those of many monarchs whose mottled histories darken the annals of the Old World. Believers in metempsychosis would have little difficulty in imagining that the soul of a certain 'First Gentleman' of a large tract of civilised territory—the most intensely tailor-made monarch that ever was made—had, as a punishment for a few princely peccadilloes, been condemned to inhabit the black cabinet of a form, of all forms the most abhorrent to the dainty ideas of white civilization. We mean no offence, however, to the body of Eyamba's sable majesty. Kings, like other people, must make the best of the souls they get; and if that of the famous 'First Gentleman' chanced to be thrust under the black monarch's uncomely ribs, it was more a pity than a fault.

One good feature in the character of both King Eyo and King Eyamba, was their overflowing courtesy. They had invited the missionaries to come to Calabar. When the strangers arrived, they were made welcome; and were told at once to choose suitable ground whereon to build houses and churches. Each king was eager, indeed, to have the mission fixed in his own town; but though it was established at Duke Town, and the first church built there, the missionaries laboured in both cities, and ultimately a church was also erected at Creek Town. This capital, by the way, though smaller, was much cleaner and rather more orderly than its rival. A wide street ran up the centre of it. Eyo's house, however, was built of wood, two storeys high, with a front verandah, and the unregal arrangement of outside stairs. Its apartments resembled the rooms of a furniture warehouse more than those of a palace. They were stuffed with tables, sideboards, sofas, chairs, chests of drawers, a variety of time-pieces, all attempting to keep time, a barrel-organ, chinaware, pictures, chandeliers, and mirrors of all shapes, sizes, and prices.

Mr. Waddell brought from friends in Scotland the present of a large Bible to King Eyamba, which they presented to his Majesty on their first Sabbath-day in Calabar. When the missionaries—Messrs. Waddell, Edgerley, Chisholm, and Miller—went to the palace, they met the king and his chiefs in the state-room, which was a large, elegant apartment, and handsomely furnished. A beautiful peacock, which strutted about the floor, hastened away as they entered; but another, as proud and vain, remained in the person of black bedizened Eyamba himself. In hat and feathers, with waistcloth according to the fashion of the country, and loads of beads and brass rings, he paraded before the large mirrors, turning and admiring himself in every kind of theatrical attitude—as rare a specimen of the Brummel genus as ever fitted between chandeliers and carpets. Mr. Waddell thus notes the simple ceremony of presentation:—'Eyamba sat down in an arm-chair of solid brass, under a handsome canopy, meant for a throne. Four sofas were wheeled round in front for the company, and a small table placed in front for the gift Bible. When I had addressed him and his chiefs on the object of our mission, and the character of the present that Christian friends had sent him, he replied that he thanked us and them, and God also, for sending us. Mr. Edgerley and the rest followed with appropriate remarks, and we concluded with a prayer for the Divine blessing. They asked if Mrs. Edgerley would also speak, but were satisfied to learn that she would talk to their women.'

In Calabar, the investiture of a candidate with the most coveted honour which the king can confer is a very simple affair indeed, compared with the elaborate ceremonies on similar occasions in this country. Another difference lies in this, that, while honours are won in Britain, they are bought in Calabar. Mr. Waddell witnessed a young man completing his payment for the degree of 'Yampy Egbo'—which seems to be a secret semi-diabolical species of nobility. The candidate received his patent from Eyamba's own hands, in the form of three marks of yellow powder on his forehead and arms. If the powder used is not of a fast colour, the possession of such an honour must involve a deal of artistic manipulation in the diurnal renewal of the yellow badge, unless, indeed, which is probable enough, the 'degree' is supposed to lift its possessor above the troublesome ritualism of sanitary science. There being no official gazette in Calabar, the new-made noble, after bowing to the dust in acknowledgment of his sovereign's condescension, rushed forth like a painted fiend, making tremendously joyful proclamation of his elevation to the ranks of the painted peerage.

If any of our adventurous artists, who think nothing of camping in the Highlands, or of traversing Norway on foot, with knapsack on back, merely for the purpose of freshening up their ideas, or getting rid of the dusty sapless conventionalities of polished society, would only extend their peregrinations to the coast of Upper Guinea, they would be certain to encounter some phase of unsophisticated humanity which, if properly canvassed, could not fail to make a picturesque little fortune. A large picture, for instance, entitled 'The Calabar Market,' would be sure to sell well. The painting of such a picture would be rendered all the more easy from the absence of tailors and milliners in that part of the world. Half-a-dozen yards of printed calico, from the handiest haberdasher's, would furnish all the costume necessary to cover the nakedness of a nation—on canvas. How to dispose of the articulate buzz, the speaking eye and contorted mouth, and the many-attituded bustle, are secrets well known to British artists; although, we are sorry to observe, they are less frequently brought into requisition than they ought to be. Landscape is all very well in its way; but the ever-changing kaleidoscope of human life will always exercise the profoundest artistic genius, as it does of the poetic and the philosophic. In the picture of the Calabar market, the sellers squat on the ground, with their wares on mats or in calabashes before them; while the buyers walk about surveying and examining the merchandise. This would afford scope for the exhibition of an infinite variety of negro character. The goods sold are either English manufactures, or country provisions, smoked fish and flesh, with yams and plantains, dry shrimps, and fresh meat of deer or pig, with skin and hair on. Let the artist note the Italianised characteristic. It is a peculiar one, and marks an epoch in Calabar civilization. The law of the market requires that flesh should be sold with its skin and hair, to prevent cannibalism—a precaution rendered necessary, not by the gastronomical predilections of the Calabarese, but on account of the number of new slaves formerly introduced through the foreign trade from cannibal tribes in the interior. To indicate these phases of Calabar life would undoubtedly be a triumph of artistic invention. Currency in Calabar is still nebulous, and greatly needs condensation. It consists principally of copper and brass rods two feet in length, each equivalent to nearly a shilling. The only approach to coined money is the native half-penny, which the smiths manufacture out of the rod money. As there is no royal mint, there is no such crime as coining; and if a merchant suspects that the long money is not long enough, or of the right quality, he can refuse to take it without committing any offence. The artist would find no difficulty in representing this custom on canvas; although certain spectators might mistake the bundles of money for an imitation of the famous bundle of sticks with which the wise man taught his sons the beauty and strength of union. The picture would, undoubtedly, be a most unique one; and it might be still farther enhanced by a misty background of scrubland, with a hungry tiger or two prowling through it, scenting their prey afar off, as prophets foresee the dim shadows of coming events; or, perhaps, a distant glimpse of the river might be inserted, where the cavernous jaws of an alligator could be made to unlock themselves as if to receive a feast of negroes; or, if the artist was classically ophioidian in his tastes, he could dash an African version of the Laocoon into one corner of his picture, by putting a Calabar father and his two sons in the terrific folds of a tremendous cobra de capella, the exhibition of whose combined contortions would elicit the loftiest powers of artistic genius. This last touch would of course necessitate a slight change in the title of the picture, and probably some such name as 'An African Laocoon' would serve the purpose as well as any other.

If, however, the pilgrim-artist imagined that an African market-piece was too mean a work for the aspirations of his brush, perhaps he would have less objection to paint a Feast of the Kings of Calabar. In this theme, as in the other, there would be ample scope for the wide-working of creative artistic power; while in name, at least, there would be something in it to tickle the ears of the more dainty connoisseurs. Mr. Waddell had the honour of an invitation to the weekly feast of King Eyamba; and the account he gives of it shows it to have been a decidedly spicy affair. The day of the feast was 'Calabar Sunday.' The company, including black and white, were summoned by the firing of a large gun at two o'clock, and as the guests assembled, the king received them in the state-room, doing honour to the occasion by appearing in the very best costume in the royal wardrobe—broad silk waistcloth, hat and feathers, a profusion of jingling jewellery, but without either a shirt or a shoe. After going through the peacock operation of admiring his beautiful person in a series of mirrors, he marshalled the company to the dining-room, where he placed himself at the head of the table, with the white guests on his right and the blacks on his left, the foot remaining empty for the accommodation of late arrivals. The preliminary ceremony was a general washing of hands, which was performed in eastern style, by a basin, ewer, and towel being carried round, and a little water poured on the fingers of each of the guests. A corps of stout girls, in native undress, then defiled into the apartment, each bearing on her head a closed calabash, covered with an ornamental cloth, which she placed on the table. White guests might naturally exclaim, what have we here? The novel dainties were quickly disclosed. Each calabash was differently filled. One contained a splendid mess of yams and fish, deliciously stewed, together with palm oil, vegetables, and red-hot pepper. There was a steaming dish of yams and goat-flesh, cooked as above, which might have melted the teeth of a tiger. To natives, these dishes were perfection itself, though they created a slight hesitancy in the European appetite. Their smell was not at all unsavoury; but the British scent was made the fool of the other senses, for the eye could not approve of the sneaking desire of the nose. A favourite dish at this feast was a powerful black soup, accompanied with pounded yams or 'fufu.' Each dish naturally formed a course; and though the king distributed supplies to all the guests, they were free to accept or reject as taste or appetite might dictate. More from conscience than curiosity, Mr. Waddell tasted a little of the different delicacies, and found them not unpalatable, but rather oily and spicy. But while the white guests ate infinitesimal morsels, the natives enjoyed themselves immensely, eating bountifully of the various dishes, dispensing with etiquette—using fingers for forks and lips for napkins. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the dinner referred to the consumption of the 'fufu,' which was not eaten in the strict sense of the term, but actually swallowed or bolted in pieces as big as apples. Every native guest hewed a lump from the central mass, and laid it on the table beside his plate of 'black soup.' Then rolling a piece the size of a Guinea-hen's egg between his hands, into a ball, he stuck the middle finger of his right hand lightly and neatly into it, dipped it into the sauce, and then fired it down the knotted column of his throat without so much as grazing a single tooth. The Calabar nobility perform the 'fufu' trick with such expertness, ease, elegance, and artistic mastery, that it is very manifest the skill runs in the blood, and is transmitted from father to son, just as many of the properties and inseparable accidents of aristocratic breeding recur among the blue-blooded Britons. The art of bolting 'fufu' is in so singular a manner, that it furnishes a new argument in favour of the theory of the hereditary transmission of qualities. Mr. Waddell, indeed, asserts that European culture is no match against the inborn skill of the Calabar aristocracy, at the well-named and beautiful art of 'fufu.' During the consumption of 'fufu,' the most that the clumsy European artist can do is to sit, fast, and admire. The Calabarese appear to be well acquainted with the fact that good digestion depends largely on good temper and hilarity. At the feast in question, the trumpet of mirth made the table ring, and jokes exploded in laughter, as the sauced balls of 'fufu' descended into the bowels of the blacks. Indeed, while going into the feast tooth and nail, teeth were not allowed to usurp the province of tongue, which wagged in harmony with the collapsing grinders. The only drink used at the royal table was mimbo, 'a milky-looking liquor, fresh drawn from a species of palm-tree, of agreeable taste and unintoxicating nature.' Eyamba and his gentry quaffed it from overflowing quart mugs, while the white guests drank it from tumblers. We do not claim for this feast the qualities enclosed in the divine epithet 'Homeric,' yet are we of opinion that a shrewd artist, whose eye swims in a glowing sea of humour, could create a picture from its darkly grotesque elements which might whip European dilettanteism out of some of its effeminate conceits.

'Bequeathed from eating fire to son,'

Mr. Waddell dined also with King Eyo; but although the feast was much like the other, it was better served, and of higher character also, both as to company and conduct. The guests used forks; and in addition to sweet mimbo, they had the choice of champagne. Very little of it, however, was consumed. The king himself was a model of temperance. He never drank wine or spirits; and when one of the company pressed him, and filled his glass, he declined with great good temper and firmness, acknowledged his health, which the other drank, and handed the glass to a servant. 'King Eyo, why do you never drink wine?' cried one of the captains. 'If I begin to drink wine,' he replied, 'what will become of my trade and of yours too?' A very sensible question, King Eyo, and spoken like a Total Abstinence. This same monarch, while one day admonishing one of his chiefs, made the very Christian remark,—'It is not fit for a man who has to settle palavers in the town to spoil his head with rum.' Of course, we know all the precepts of that species of wisdom, although we don't carry them into practice; but it is pleasant to hear them from the lips of a barbaric king, who can practise them as well as preach them.

Creek Town 'Palaver House,' or Town Hall, which was simply a large, low shed, stood at the head of the one street of the city, with its front entirely open. Pillars of solid mangrove supported the ridge-pole.

Its only seats were made of hard-beaten clay, and were arranged along the two sides; a recess for Egbo mysteries was enclosed at the upper end; in front stood the great Egbo drum, which was beaten only on occasions of public importance; and before it stood two upright pentagonal stones, 'pillars of remembrance,' of basaltic appearance, which had been quarried in the Camaroon mountains. Both on the pillars and the drum, the missionary discovered the blistered blood of human sacrifices.

In exploring Creek Town, Mr. Waddell came upon the figure of a man, inartistically carved out of a wooden post, which also formed its pedestal. A serpent seemed to crawl up the front of the base, and up the back an alligator. On asking the boy who acted as guide, 'Who is that standing there?' he replied, 'The devil.' 'Is it for any good?' 'No; it be bad,' he answered at once. Other authorities, however, maintained that the statue meant nothing, being valued only as a specimen of ancient art. But if it really was a monument of the fiend, the depth of disrespect into which the memory of the original had fallen among the people, may be inferred from the fact that a brute of a cow was allowed to demolish it for ever. We are inclined to think, however, that there was a mystery about that cow; and, after some study of the case, we think it extremely probable that the animal in question must have been the Old Gentleman himself, who assumed the form of a Calabar crummie, in order the more effectually to crush to the earth so hideous a portrait of himself, which could serve no end but to weaken his power, by presenting a ridiculous handle to his enemies.

Continuing their stroll, Mr. Waddell and his guide came outside the town to a 'devil house,' a temporary structure, sacred to the memory of some deceased person, in which many articles of household use and value were damaged and left to perish. 'What are these things for?' he inquired. 'For the devil,' replied the boy. 'What does the devil want with pots and calabashes, rotten yams, and all the rest?' 'To chop.' 'Why, they have all got holes; what is that for?' 'Fear any one steal them.' 'Can the devil chop out of broken vessels?' 'So they do here,' said the boy, with a laugh; 'it be fool fashion.' On further investigation, Mr. Waddell discovered that the devil meant the ghost, and that everything in spiritland was done in shadow, as on earth in substance. The ghost of a man, therefore, ate the ghost of a yam, boiled in the ghost of a pot, over the ghost of a fire!

Of all departments of human adventure, missionary work demands the steadiest and most immeasurable enthusiasm. Mr. Waddell found in Calabar a rare field for the exercise of his peculiar genius. The Calabarese are certainly not the worst, but they are as certainly not the best race to be met in Africa. Their virtues are few, their vices many, though such as spring up in the deep darkness of ignorance, before the dawn of knowledge. Intercourse with traders from civilised countries has undoubtedly an enlightening effect; but as traders don't make it their business to instruct their customers or merchants, extensive commercial relations on the part of Africa are not incompatible with very extensive barbarism. The Calabar mind could without injustice be compared to a land of swamp and scrub, full of all manner of wild beasts, and with only a patch here and there redeemed from the infernal gods. The people believed every species of pernicious thing, and practised every conceivable kind of detestable custom. Trial by ordeal (eating poison), polygamy, human sacrifice at the death of a king or chief, infanticide, especially of twins, are only a few of the dark catalogue that could be compiled of Calabar vices and barbaric customs. Their theology and demonology exhibit great poverty of imagination. Both their heaven and hell are vague, undignified, and unattractive. They lack grandeur and breadth of conception. Their deities are demons, and their devil is anything but a gentleman. But the demons and gods most difficult to dethrone were the sensual and brutal customs of the people, and in assailing these Mr. Waddell found his Christian artillery put to the sorest test.

Moreover, although the Calabarese were willing and not unapt learners, they are mere children in the application of their knowledge—being, like all gentle barbarians, most tantalisingly inclined, while receiving instruction, to return to the practice of the ancient customs of their race. Through the missionary's teaching, many of the common people, principal men, and at least one sovereign, King Eyo, came to believe largely in the truths of Christianity; and of course, as a consequence, to give up and denounce their old habits. Yet, in spite of the new views they had imbibed, the least occasion made them waver. A chief, named Antica Cobham, was one of those who was partially affected by Mr. Waddell's teaching. He could hardly be called a convert; but, at the entreaty of the missionary, he had abolished human sacrifice at the death of his people; and the trial by ordeal, which was known by the name of 'chopping nut,' or drinking a fluid concocted by an infusion of the poisonous cœbre bean. But, when the son of this chief died, and the brother of the deceased was accused of causing his death, the trial by 'chopping nut' came in as a necessity; the young man, indeed, demanded the ordeal, which the foolish father, although disbelieving in the custom, did not prevent in the present case, and, as might have been anticipated even by himself, sacrificed his innocent son. The death of a chief named John Duke was followed by the massacre of a large number of women and girls. Several of the chief men in the town slew a number of their own domestic slaves in honour of the deceased, and actually sent off to their plantations for an additional supply. The mother of the dead chief said, 'He has left no children; kill the half of his slaves; what use he leave them behind?' King Eyamba, although not a Christian, was confessedly adverse to these sacrifices, regarding them as a bad fashion, yet he did not interpose his authority in the present instance till above a hundred persons were massacred. That these bloody deeds were done in Calabar amid the faint white light of the Gospel is not at all surprising, seeing that many wicked things are done in Europe in its full blaze. When this 'King of all black men,' Eyamba V., himself died, an immense number of slaves were murdered, to do honour to his memory. A mighty grave or pit, wide and deep, was dug inside a house for his interment. In one side of the pit a chamber was excavated to contain two sofas, on which the body of the king was placed, dressed in ornamental costume, and with a crown on his head. But as it would not do to send the buried majesty of Calabar into Ghostland alone, Eyamba's umbrella, sword, and snuff-box bearers, and many other personal attendants, were immediately dispatched, and cast into the pit with the insignia of their offices. Living virgins, also, according to old custom, were thrust in to accompany their king. But the royal party could not, of course, travel into the land of ghosts without refreshments, and money to purchase more on the road, if necessary; so, great quantities of food, trade goods, and coppers, were added to complete the arrangements. The pit was then filled up, the ground trampled and beaten hard, all traces of the king's whereabouts being carefully effaced, to prevent violation, which is sometimes attempted both from cupidity and revenge.

In spite of these and other discouraging events, however, Mr. Waddell continued to teach, and by a variety of methods to clear the scrub of superstition from the minds of the people. The schools were at first taught entirely in English, both because the people wished it, and because it was impossible for the missionaries to do otherwise, having no books in their language, and being unable to speak it. But as English is all over the African Coast what the Latin was in Europe in the middle ages, while its modern languages were unwritten or barbarous, it was of the utmost importance that the Calabarese should acquire the Anglo-Saxon. It is the general medium of communication from the Gambia to the Gaboon, and may fairly be regarded as the learned language to the natives, by which they study 'humanity,' and get access to universal literature. 'The Efik language was, however, studied and acquired by nearly all the missionaries, and the schools came gradually to be supplied with books in the vernacular; so that, both in English and Efik, the education was carried on simultaneously. The rule came to be that the scholars should learn to read in their own language first, a little at least, and then go into English; for it was obvious that they could learn more easily in their own at the first than in ours. The New Testament and portions of the Old have been printed in the Efik, with a grammar and dictionary of the tongue, and other educational works. Whether it was that the more intelligent youths cultivated a knowledge of the English, or that the acquisition of a literary language promoted their mental improvement, it is certain that the two were closely connected.'

Thus enlightening, teaching, converting, in the face of much opposition from traders, and the thousand climatic ills that missionary flesh is heir to in an African kingdom, did Mr. Waddell and his co-mates labour onward, sowing much good and permanent seed; though some, also, that fell on stony ground, was stunted in its growth—and some, that fell among thorns, was choked as it sprang from the soil. The record of his missions, from which we have culled the foregoing miscellaneous notes, is a book of nearly seven hundred pages. The style of the work is simple and unpretentious; and as it contains a great deal of curious matter concerning Calabar and the contiguous kingdoms, the general reader, as well as the particular student of missionary enterprise, will find it to be one of no common interest and attraction.

SENSATIONS.

THIS is a high-pressure age. Everything partakes of the sensational. We have sensation novels, sensation dramas, sensation songs, sensation feats on the trapeze and the tight-rope. In a short time, doubtless, there will be sensation hats, sensation boots, sensation coats, sensation sermons, and perhaps, also, sensation wives, and, of course, sensation children. Everything must be sensational, or it won't go down. No matter how absurd be the commodity if it is sensational. That is the great requisite. Shakspeare is thrown to the dogs, and those charmingly ridiculous dramas of Mr. Dion Boucicault and Mr. Falconer run by the hundred nights, and bring in immense fortunes to their authors. The novels of Scott lie on the book-shelf, gathering dust, while those of Mr. Wilkie Collins and Miss M. E. Braddon are scarcely to be had from the library without three weeks or a month's notice. The latest dramatic sensation is 'The Trial of Effie Deans,' to which I listened, a few weeks ago, with considerable disgust—a feeling which appeared to be shared by a good many others besides myself, if I might judge from the ironical cheers, sarcastic remarks (from the gods), and hisses with which the piece was enlivened every now and again. This was in the Scottish capital—the scene of Sir Walter's novel upon which the drama is founded. Shade of the dead! if thou couldst only have been present in the 'Queen's,' to hear and see this contemptible drama, how thou wouldst have frowned! And yet Mr. Boucicault's latest was characterised, by some of the London papers, as the greatest drama that had ever been played upon a metropolitan stage! If the critics had said that it was the greatest trash, they would have been nearer the truth. If it had been the result of a competition for the most effective massacre of the 'Heart of Mid-Lothian,' Mr. Boucicault would have been fully justified in claiming a crown of laurels. 'The Colleen Bawn' was bad; 'Peep o' Day' was worse; but neither of these can for a moment be compared with 'The Trial of Effie Deans.' Still it is with a feeling of pleasure that the admirers of the legitimate drama must witness such plays as this. Although astonished that such stuff should be represented on any stage, there is pleasure in the thought that their production will be the means of bringing about their own death; for the public cannot long be blind to the absurdities with which they abound, and each succeeding effort of Mr. Boucicault is only rendering these absurdities more and more apparent. They are very far 'from the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now, was, and is, to hold as 'twere the mirror up to Nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure.' Go on, Mr. Boucicault, and prosper, and when your dramas have had their day, and are no more heard of, then sit you down and calm your grief by the thought that you have at least gulled a discerning British public with your brilliant and captivating monstrosities!

And so with sensation novels. Though, for the time, they are in greater demand than the novels of Scott, Thackeray, Bulwer Lytton, Dickens, or George Elliot;

yet the time will shortly come when their poisonous taste will be felt, and they will be flung from their now most ardent admirers, with the contempt they so richly merit. But what a pity it is to reflect that a man like Mr. Wilkie Collins should become a panderer to tastes the most corrupt that he may receive the applause of the moment, when he might almost as easily raise for himself a name upon which posterity would look back with pleasure and pride! Long after the recollection of his writings is buried in the past, the novels of such men as Scott, Bulwer Lytton, and Dickens will be read and admired over, and over, and over again.

It is a strange fancy which some people have—people from whom better might have been expected—of paying a few shillings, for the purpose of seeing a man run the risk of breaking his neck; and it is not by any means a commendable one. People must have amusements; but, by all means, let these amusements be rational ones. Is there any amusement derivable from the sight of a man walking along a spider-like thread, high over the heads of his audience? If there is any amusement in the spectacle, I fail to see it. A single false step, and down he would come. Was not the fall of the 'Female Blondin' sufficient? Apparently not. One would imagine that it is the very probability of accident that draws so many people to witness these exhibitions.

Too much cannot be said or written against such perilous sources of entertainment. The satire of Mr. Thackeray and Punch has been levelled at them. Let us hope with success!

THE CRUISE OF THE HERMIONE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER III.

ON going on deck a little after sunrise, I found that we were nearly opposite the same point of land to which we had been opposite on the previous evening, and farther from the shore. The Frith, away to the south, was studded with small brown sails. I counted no fewer than fifty, and there were more appearing in sight. I was puzzling my brain, to discover what this unwonted spectacle could mean, when I observed that the Hermione had been left to take care of herself—Archie being fast asleep at the stern. I at once brought her bow round with an oar, and tried to keep her end on to the tide.

In about an hour, Bob and Stewart made their appearance. Bob looked at the sails; and, giving a gesture of vexation, muttered his customary 'Cos-found it!' Stewart nodded a 'Good morning,' lit his pipe, and laid himself down on his back on the deck.

'Did you ever see the like?' exclaimed Bob. 'It's enough to drive a fellow mad! Here am I, away for pleasure, on limited time, and paying a man's wages too—the lazy—just look at him! Get up, you old rascal! You've been sleeping there the whole night, I suppose. What do you mean, sir? What if we had drifted ashore, sir?'

'No fears,' said the unperturbed Archie.

'Fears, you old blackguard! there was every fear in the world. I say, Stewart, do you know I wish I had got her insured before we came away.'

'I wish I had got my life insured before we came away,' said Stewart, taking his pipe from his mouth.

'How do you mean?' asked Bob.

'Just that I think a few hundreds might have been a consideration to the governor. Not that he requires it, but still it would have been a very good speculation for him—a small investment, a large return, and hardly the shadow of a chance of a loss. There is one consolation, however, in having neglected it—that I don't think any insurance company would have taken the policy.'

'I say, Tom, what are you talking about?'

'Just that my former doubts have assumed the shape of a certainty,' said Stewart—'that, from what I have seen of your craft and your crew, I don't think there is the smallest chance of our ever getting out of your dirty concern with our lives. I had a dream last night enough to frighten any one out of their wits. Oh, you needn't start; I'm not going to tell it you. Hilloa, Starry! have you got up? How did you relish your first night aboard ship?'

'I never relished anything so much in my life,' replied Starry. 'I felt all the pleasure which is expressed in the line which says—oh, I forget the exact—something regarding being "rocked in the cradle of the deep." Yes, that is it. I trust you enjoyed a sound repose?'

'Repose! I might as well have been in a menagerie for comfort, or a band-box for room. I got a knock on the funny bone of my elbow in getting into yon dirty hole, that it won't get the better of for a week, and twisted my neck in getting out, so that I can hardly move it yet.'

'I am excessively sorry,' said Starry. 'What are these boats which we see so thickly spread over the water? Can you inform me regarding them, Archie-bald?'

'It's east country luggers that's went home from the Steornoway fishing,' replied Archie.

'Ah, indeed! returning from the herring fishing. What did you call the place from which they are returning?'

'Steornoway. Ye're no deaf, are you?'

'Oh! the Steornoway fishing. But does such a large number of boats repair to prosecute the fishing every year?'

'Number as that!' said Archie. 'Why, man, there'll be sometimes more as a thousand boats in Steornoway at on time. But the fishing is bad the year—tam bad.'

'Ah!' said Starry. 'Might I inquire what epithet that was which you prefixed to the adjective bad, which you made use of just now? I have a particular desire to become a little acquainted with your Celtic language. Many of our English words being of Celtic origin, it affords considerable assistance in the study of derivation. It was one of your native Celtic roots, I presume?'

'Ooch! she's just a bit word that comes out at times,' said Archie. 'There's no much ill in her—just by the way she's used; though maybe she's just as well left alone.'

'Ah!—I see!—oh!—I beg your pardon—at least—a—I am not sure whether I ought to reprove you for using such expressions; but—however, I will feel indebted to you for any little instructions which you may occasionally feel inclined to afford me in the matter of the Celtic roots.'

'Oh, bother the Celtic roots!' exclaimed Bob. 'Starry, you're an ass! Is this a time—with your derivations and nonsense? What are we to do?'

'What can we do?' said Stewart. 'The only thing that I see, and the best thing under any circumstances, is to get breakfast ready. What are you going to give us?'

'Oh! anything you like,' said Bob: 'I don't know, and I don't care. Get it ready yourself; you'll find coffee in one of the canisters. I can't eat anything myself. Archie, kindle the fire.'

'The fire be blowed!' replied Archie. 'Do you think that I have not got a head to sleep so well as yourself? I've been up here all night. I'm going to my bed now. Ye may kindle your fire or no as ye like. But I'll just thank you if you'll bring me my breakfast when she's ready.'

'You've been sleeping here the whole night!' cried Bob. But Archie had disappeared into the fore-castle—we might kindle the fire or not, as we liked. Bob tried it twice—burning one of his fingers severely the first time, and the second time nearly setting fire to the vessel with a lighted candle, which he let fall, through the open skylight, into the cabin. Stewart then took it in hand; and, in a few minutes, we had a fire burning brightly in the stove; and, in a few minutes more, the kettle was singing merrily. The coffee was made—the bread was toasted—the eggs were boiled—the roast was produced—the table was set—and we sat down to a genuine Scotch breakfast; the rapidity with which the viands vanished (to which, by the way, Bob, notwithstanding his avowed inability to eat, contributed in no small degree) showing that, as Starry remarked, 'The fresh sea breeze, even under circumstances of annoyance and disappointment, conduces considerably to the improvement of the human appetite.'

After breakfast, we washed the dishes, and put them away, strange to say, without breaking any. Starry then sat down to his journal. He sat thinking for nearly ten minutes, took up his pen, and wrote two lines, then stopped to think again.

'How are you getting on, Starry?' asked Stewart, taking up one of the sheets which Stewart had laid aside as finished. 'What's this? "The day was beautiful, the air serene, the sun shining bright—."'

'Oh, now, Stewart, that's too bad,' said Starry, taking the sheet from Stewart's hand. 'I will have great pleasure in giving you the manuscript to peruse sweltered in an oven, been roasted like a lobster, and all but treated like an Erromanga missionary!

To those who have never been within the tropics—or, at all events, in a hot climate—the mosquito is but a single specimen of a most interesting class of insect life; but to the voyageur who, in the heat of summer, lies at anchor in the Mississippi, it is the bane of existence.

No sooner do the shades of evening close around, and the gentlest zephyrs course along the waters, than you frantically rush on deck, gasping for oxygen—so delicious! You light a Virginian weed, sit down with the latest 'Blackwood,' and for the first time in the day feel comfortable. But, hark! what syren strains are these which greet your ear? What low seductive notes are murmuring around you? Buz-z-z-z from falsetto to altissimo, and all is quiet; that moment's quiet, like the lull before a squall, has lured you to destruction. There is a sudden shriek, a sudden smack at your own face, but too late. That is your initiative for the evening.

But this may be but a single stray insect, and you console yourself with that thought, smoke a little harder, read a little faster, and regret that for a moment you lost temper, while resolving to be more philosophical for the future. But alas! a fig for your philosophy!—that music again rings in your ear in fuller and fuller chorus, and myriads of tormentors now surround you, while you ply your hands about, hither and thither, in the vain endeavour to commit murder. But no, you have never been in New-Orleans before, and they seem to know you are a novice! You now shift your position; they shift theirs; you lay down your book, determined not to be overcome; you hit the nasal organ, upon which one has just perched, but miss your game, and only spoil a shirt-front! You are now thoroughly roused, you burst into indignation, and—but he. Reader! your morals are pure—let me not contaminate them; your lips have never muttered a profanation—let me not teach you blasphemy. I learned a little of it up the Mississippi!

You now rush below. Your cigar may have been cabbage-leaf, and your 'Blackwood' 'Kirby's Entomology,' for aught you know or were able to judge. On arrival in the mess-room, the announcement is made, by a sporting man, that the game is capital; while he enumerates the massacres committed during the past half-hour. The sport is somewhat contagious, and you join in; and, in a short time, half-a-dozen of Her Majesty's most faithful subjects, armed with towels, handkerchiefs, et hoc genus omne, are fairly off on a 'squeeter' hunt.

Flap! 'One hundred and nine and nineteen cock-roaches.' Flap! 'One hundred and ten and twenty cockroaches.' That was a double murder! And thus, after each one sacrificing his quota of 'squeeter' and 'roach,' you think of betaking yourself to the land of rest.

But this is a matter of no trivial moment. It is not, O fairest Isabella! (whose drooping eyelashes perchance o'erhang my tale,) that delicious plunge you made last night into your four-poster; where, buried in feathers, you sweetly dreamed of young Fitzjames's uniform, and how you loved to place your tiny hand upon his epaulettes as he whirled you around in the mazes of the giddy dance. Peace, O fair one! to thy slumbers! May they never be disturbed by a Mississippi 'galley-nipper'!

But, softly, you approach that little cabin-door, and peer around. Buz-z-z-z! A few more massacres are committed, and the process of undressing is gone through in the shortest possible space of time. The act of successfully getting into bed in a mosquito country is one worthy of the best efforts of a harlequin. Your servant has, before dark, lowered your mosquito-curtain, and tucked it in all round. He believes he has secured your safety, and you strenuously eye a corner through which you may wriggle yourself. With all haste, you nervously seize the corner of your curtain—raise it as if by stealth—one plunge—you are in!

Now you are safe; now at length you can lie in security and peace. Vain hope! Oh false delusion! You have avoided Scylla, now you are in Charybdis; less classically, you are 'out of the frying-pan into the fire.' Joe, in his over-anxiety to please, had secured your curtain so well that the animal life within was kept in, and their appetite but whetted by such confinement. You set rigorously, and with a show of some dexterity, to rid yourself of your enemies. You whisk about with a fan, sweeping the crowd into a corner, and through some place of exit from your cage; and, by dint of perseverance, all at length is quiet.

Streaming with perspiration, and glowing with the heat of conquest, you at length extinguish your candle, and lie down to enjoy a night's repose. You chuckle to yourself as your conquered enemies in vain struggle against the meshy walls of your sanctum—through which they eye their prey—and resign yourself to the sweet arms of sleep.

Presently you fall into that dreamy state preceding deeper rest, when suddenly you start with that old, familiar 'Buz-z-z-z.' You raise your hand in the direction indicated by the sound, but only succeed in boxing your ear—the reaction of which upon your nervous system thoroughly awakens you. His successors soon follow, and now commences the real tug of war.

To your dismay you soon find that you are undone; and a full chorus setting up convinces you—alas! too late—of the fruitlessness of all human hope, the ruthlessness of ambition, and the never-ceasing activity of insect life.

You now writhe with pain unendurable; unable to find the drowsy god, you toss to and fro in a temperature little under a hundred degrees; alternately you have fits of philosophy and madness, and in one of the latter you suddenly spring out of bed, rush on deck, and frantically gasp at a passing puff of wind, while casting a longing lingering look towards the maintop. Again do you endeavour to console yourself with a 'weed,' and walk the plank in hope of morning light soon terminating your misery. A single stroke of the bell proclaims it but little over midnight, and you wander about vainly endeavouring to rest your weary head. You may lie down upon the 'heart of oak,' but there is no slumber to your eyelids; and after a variety of attitudes and contortions, after boxing your ears and slapping your face, after an inevitable scratching, unknown even to the violin-players of Caledonia, and an agony of spirit which Zeno himself could endure with no degree of complacency, Aurora at length dawns upon the distant horizon.

Loaded with ennui and fatigue, you again drag yourself below to your couch. A cool breeze now plays in through your six-inch scuttle; you throw yourself down, and sink into rest—sink deeply into the profoundest snore.

A feeling only of self-preservation bids you respond to the early announcement that 'breakfast is ready.'

But what visage is that which meets your gaze as you peer into your mirror? Is it the 'human form divine,' or a calf's-foot jelly?

Are those your veritable hands or your days' allowance of pork? and how the d—! did you ever before get your leg into such a little boot?

There is a breakfast not fit for a Christian; and stewards, cooks, and every one around feel that the 'squeeters' have been taking a rise out of you, and that this morning you are a mighty swell!

But such things now dwell only in memory's page; they have long since gone, and their remembrance, though far from cherished, still tenaciously clings within; and even in this northern clime, this land of 'aling' and 'cocktail,' I can never calmly or dispassionately narrate the horrors of my first cruise up the Mississippi.

THE TIMMER TAE.

WALKING homeward from the city, one hot summer day, Thinking sadly, 'Tis a pity I can't get away
Where the cool sea-breezes blow to qualify the heat,
And the rippling waters flow to lave the glowing feet.

What's the use of all this fretting o'er a moisten'd brow?
There are tens of thousands sweating more than you are now.
Even though your feet are glowing, why so much ado?
Learn to look around you, and be thankful you have two!

So spake Common Sense, and really she had cause to speak—
On before me walk'd a man, with hot tears on his cheek.
Walk'd! did I say? He dragg'd himself along the dusty walk—
A man not more than thirty years—good-looking, stout, and tall.

A little child, with sunny curls, toddled by his side,
He look'd up in his father's face, and ask'd him why he cried?
'What gars me greet? my bonnie man, 'deed ye may weel say that,

It's mony a weary day, Willie, since your puir father grat.'

Then holding up the shatter'd wreck of a poor wooden leg—
'Just look at that! O Willie, man! we'll be obliged to beg;
My last half-crown is gane, Willie, an' it was but a loan—
I haen't got as muckle left as buy my bairn a soone.

I meant to walk to Paisley, where I had some hopes o' work;
I canna gang anither step, an' it will sune be dark.
If I was only back to Glasgow, Willie! I maun try;
If no, we'll baith sleep supperless below the starry sky.'

He sat him down so wearily upon a stone which stands
By the road-side, and bowing down his face within his hands
He wept, as I would never wish to see another weep—
It haunted me the whole day long, and grieved me in my sleep.

His little boy stood by his side, and stroked his tawny beard;
I allipp'd a biscuit in his hand;—how soon it disappear'd!
Another and another went, each quicker than the last;
At length the father rais'd his head—that bitter spasm past.

He turn'd his sad eyes up to me, then downward to the child;
'I see ye've fand a frien', Willie,' he said, and grimly smil'd.
I prais'd the boy; the sad eyes kindled with a look of pride,
An arm stole gently round his waist, and drew him to his side.

He smoothed the sunny hair, and said, 'He is a bonnie wean;
Although I say't that should na say't, seein' he is my ain;
He's just his mother's image, leddy; ilker couldna be;
Ay, Willie, ye're the makins o' a braver man than me.

Oh! if she only had been spared, I ne'er wad hae been lame;
I gaed an' join'd the navvies, for I couldna rest at hame
An' see anither nurse her wean; no, that I couldna bear;
Oh! a' thing wad been different if she had but been here!

No, no! I couldna bide at hame; an' there is such a stir
In railway wark, it kept my heart frae pining after her;
But I had only wrought a month when an embankment fell,
An' crush'd my leg—I wouldna cared tho' it had been mysel'.

I could hae dee'd wi' pleasure, an' it werena for the wean;
But it was hard to lee's the lamb in this caul' wor'd his lane.
I sought for wark, but aye the maisters o'ed the timmer pag.
An' said, "Wha ever saw a carter wi' a wooden leg?"

I begg'd ane just to try me; after I wrought a week,
If he was discontented, no so penny wad I seek.
I waena daunted! for I kent that I was fit to ca'
A cart wi' ony in the toon—ay, timmer tae an' a'.

He tried me; and I ser'd him weel, and took wee Willie hame.
An' noo it was nae grief to me to think that I was lame.
I had as life-long sorrow eatin' the heart frae me;
But, save for that, I was as weel as ony man could be.

The maister trusted me far mair than some wi' baith their legs.
He dee'd! An' noo my bitter cup I've drucken to the dregs;
I've sought for wark frae morn till nicht, frae weary weak to weak.
An' noo I fin' it's no in Glasgow toon that I maun seek.

I meant to walk to Paisley, mem, an' try my fortune there—
Oh! poverty's an awfu' thing for a proud heart to bear!
An' this is me! that little thought that I had come to grief—
That aye had half-a-croon to spare when neighbours sought relief.

I've come to poverty mysel'—weel! poverty's nae sin—
Since beggin' is to be my lot, I'd better just begin.
An' try my luck wi' you, mem, afore ye're oot my reach;
I couldna get a better chance to mak my maiden speech.

Oh! thank ye, leddy! But I canna gie the beggar's whine;
There's ane will bless ye, an' his blessin's better far than mine.
Willie, my man, tak aff yer cap, an' mak a bonnie boo.
'Is't for the biscuits?' Willie said; 'laddy, they're a' dune noo.'

'And could you eat another, Willie?' 'Twas a cruel joke.
'Could I eat ane? Ay! I could eat a' that ye're in the pock!
They're awfu' funny biscuits these—sae sugary an' wea'.
So Willie got the cakes I meant to carry home to tea.

'Weel! thank ye ance again, leddy; an' may ye never feel
What it's to hae a timmer tae, an' a sair blister'd heel;
An' mair than that, an' waur than that, may ye ne'er seek for wark

Wi' a' life's licht ahint yer back, and a' afore ye dark!'

POPULAR SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS.

No. XIV.—(Conclusion.)

WAR songs, or battle incitements, were used in the Highlands from a most remote period until a comparatively recent date. There is a very extraordinary one still extant, composed by Lachlan Mor Macvurich, the Scotchman (Albannaich), hereditary bard of Clan Rannald; and chanted by him to his clansmen at the battle of Harlaw, 1411. This most unique production consists of three hundred and thirty-eight lines. The theme of the whole is, 'O children of Conn, of the hundred fights! remember hardihood in the time of battle!' Round this theme, the poet has gathered no fewer than six hundred and fifty adjectives, arranged in alphabetical order, and all bearing a special reference to the subject in hand. A good many of these were probably compounded for the occasion; but when they were all rattled out, with impetuous, vehement declamation, in their astonishing alliterative array, they could not fail having a very powerful effect on the children of Conn going to battle.

The following song, though not exactly a battle incitement, is a poem of the same class. It is a war ode, composed by Alexander MacDonald, the son of Mr. Alexander, in praise of the Lion—that is, the Lion of the Macdonalds, not the Lion of Scotland. It is a very spirited lyric, full of energy and fire, and certainly sufficiently ferocious. It is not, however, on that account the less characteristic of its author. MacDonald is a rapid, vehement, exciting singer; but he is never tender, soft, or plaintive. He has more force than beauty, and more boiling energy than grace. If we could trust the description given of him in Reid's Bibliotheca Scoto-Celtica: An Account of all the Books, which have been printed in the Gaelic Language, we might suppose that the personal appearance and habits of the poet corresponded to some extent with the attributes of his genius. 'In person,' Mr. Reid says, 'MacDonald was large and ill-favoured. His features were coarse and irregular. His clothes were very sluggishly (so written) put on, and generally very dirty. His mouth was continually fringed with a stream of tobacco juice, of which he chewed a very great quantity. His manner of composition was to lie on his back, in bed in winter, or on the grass in summer, with a large stone on his breast, muttering to himself in a low whisper his poetical aspirations.' In Mackenzie's 'Beauties of Gaelic Poetry,' it is said that 'like most men of genius who have made some noise in the world, MacMhaighstir Alasdair has been much lauded, on the one side by the party whose cause he espoused, and as much vilified, and, in some instances, falsified, by the other party. Mr. Reid, in his book "Bibliotheca Scoto-Celtica," seems to have had his information from the last-mentioned source.' The grotesque description of MacDonald, then just quoted, may be either a total fabrication or a gross caricature by one of his enemies. Who ever heard of a poet, or any sane man, lying on his back in his bed with a stone on his breast when he was composing!

THE PRAISE OF THE LION.

To the air of 'Caberfae.'

Hail! thou rending Lion,
Of matchless force and pompons pride!
When up thy chieftains roused them,
Gay banners flutter'd far and wide.
All thy tribes would gather,
With martial pace and manly grace.
Then losses came and crosses
On every foe that met with them;
Their line so splendid, far extended—
Fiery, flaming furious;
A stormful path their joyous wrath,
With gory blades carved curious.
With sharp rage, wild war to wage,
Heads, and limbs, and brunks they'd hack;
No soft foe with swords could go
To keep the haughty heroes back.

Wake yet, thou battling Lion!
Wake and rise with sounding stir—
So tawny on thy white flag,
With thy badge of heather, sir.
Raise thy head so airily,
In the blue sky restlessly,
And to the fray, as well's I may,
Will I go and fight for thee.
Oh! let me raise the precious praise
Of that head, so royal held.
This realm is fair, but none hath e'er
Throughout its bounds thy might excell'd.
In hardihood so firm and good—
Lovely, free of fear and doubt,
With vigorous zest in terror's breast
Thee thy clansmen flock'd about.

Oh! who could taunt or tease thee,
Or with mean things disparage thee,
Or venture to displease thee,
Or once hope to discourage thee,
Thou kingly splendid creature?
So fierce, full form'd, and fairly seen,
On thy silken pennon clean;
With fine smooth mast of sapling green.
There thou flutterest, proudly, loudly,
Flapping fast and saucily;
While a gallant host heroic
Stand beneath thee gaudily.
Rage for bloodshed makes their brows red—
Rage and wrath to follow thee.
Now slaughtering blades and death's cold shades
Will come on all who slighted thee.

N'e'er backward nor inglorious—
The noble race thou well dost grace;
But, prosperous and victorious,
In battle bright and great in might;
With guns, and swords, and shields of gold,
And corselets. What a deadly set!
Their glaives they plied, and deep and wide
The wounds they gave to all they met.
Powder blazing—war smoke raising
Till a cloud about them grew;
The lively, fair, and active youths there
Then out ribe and marrow through.

With bitter blades—thick-back'd, dark blue—
In every stubborn stripling's hand,
That cleft the sturdiest body through.
My joy! I think their pride was grand.

Sufficient, strong, and manly—
A daring band, and clannish all—
The race of Collal red hand—
Full of might and spirits tall.
Keen their ire as flames of fire,
When March's wind put strength in them—
Without falling, rust, or ailing
In the breadth or length of them.
With buoyant life they go to strife,
No dread of wounds can hold them back;
They need no strain to make them fain;
Hearts, and brains, and reins they whack;
Heads they sweep off—hands and feet off—
In the smoke, with battle's mirth—
Each one so brave, with hardy glaive—
So manly, sharp, and full of worth.

The lovely race—the daring—
Well equipp'd in war array,
Their long smooth muskets wearing
So deadly in the dread affray.
With lock, and flint, and hammer
Ready trimm'd to give the blow
That sends away the powder gray
In a bright and fiery glow.
Then bullets red in showers are sped
Through smoke and roar and lustre quick,
That smash and slay and crush and bray
The cassock'd bodies short and thick.
With broken bones and with groans
On the field they toss and kick,
When like wasps in your strong grasps
You wield your blades so sharp and allick.

Clan Donald, I am saying,
Right honourable race are they;
Oft the conflict swaying;
Their foes they grandly swept away.
They are fearless, bright, and peerless,
Full of stinging venom too;
Like serpents on the mountains bred,
Their hard blades so sharp and blue.
Smart and airy, wild and wary,
With quick hands that nothing mar;
Hard as rocks and swift as meteors,
Their whistling strokes are heard afar.
My manly men, shamefast* and nimble,
Solid, strong, and firm, and sure,
Like the flood's course that thunders hoarse,
Or flames that light the mountain moor.

Strong rock, and everlasting,
Hard, and old, and undecay'd;
High thy royal crest show,
For thousands gather in thy shade
With mirth in their armour bright—
The dauntless race that never yield—
The spectres that stir panic flight,
When quick striking swords they wield.

Many fair-hair'd youths beneath thee,
With stout hands and shoulders great,
Go rushing on where honour's won,
For wild fight they're never late.

* Shamefast ('narach,' susceptible of shame). This was a much esteemed quality in the Highlands. There is another word something like this one in appearance—'naisinn'—implying a delicate and almost morbid sense of moral obligation—which is very frequently heard still, and always applied only when a man is meant to be highly commended. These two words are very characteristically Highland, and are both extremely creditable to the moral feelings of the people among whom they took their origin and were in constant use.

With steady foot and agile hand
To thrust or cut each weapon gleams;
Bed on the ground death gasps around,
But gay o'erhead the Lion streams.

Thou roaring, frowning Lion!
Who fright and fear canst spread about—
Often proved where war has moved,
In furious fight or turbid rout.
When thy semblance, looking dire,
From the tough staff flutters free,
Then a kindling, troubled fire
On every cheek around we see.
Strong and steady, stubborn, ready,
Is their rank where strife is hot;
Fear of foe they never know—
They are rocks that tremble not;
Group'd together, fleeing never,
Unyielding wood of oak are they,
Their shout of triumph's oft been heard
O'er fields of death where foemen lay.

If violence should assail thee
From strangers' bounds, and seek thy hurt;
If foemen should draw near thee,
With ill will, and strife, and sturt,
Many an Islay hilt* then,
With a strong, smooth blade in it,
Beneath thy silken stream would gleam
To succour thee—to succour thee.
Thine are men who would not bend
In showers that pierce the body through;
Nor yet be slow to rise and go
Where heads were back'd and fury grew;
When, over all the tumult spread,
The thundering pipes were heard afar,
That might put spirit in the dead
To rise for gallant deeds of war.

Clan Donald's tree is all thine;
Its bough and branches ever held
As true a wood as ever stood—
Chieftain-like, unparalleled.
When all its tribes came trooping round
So manly, where the Lion's seen,
Then woe betide whoever tried
To pluck his beard or rouse his spleen.
Their hands and heads you'd lop and prune
With the glittering claymore's sweep,
And on the grass their blood would splash,
And run in little streams and creep;
Your stinging dark-blue blades would make
The heads of Galls to steam in gore;
And groaning hard and moaning,
Would sound the site of battle o'er.

Where, in all this kingdom,
Are men of deeds your race excel?
When songs incite you to the fight,
Your thousand virtues who can tell?
You anvil strong and precious,
Of true steel that weakens not,
Who always have been faithful,
And word of truth have ne'er forgot;
Hounds of fight, like arrows' flight,
Down with glistening swords you break,
Nor rest a moment till a breach
Through and through your foes you make:

* Islay hilts, invented by a celebrated smith of the name of MacEachern, who lived in Islay, were famous all over the Highlands. 'Blades with Islay heads' were considered the very finest weapons.

† Gall, though usually applied to the Lowlanders, here means any one unfriendly to the MacDonalds. There is an old song on the massacre of Glencoe, in which the Campbells, and all who had a hand in that bloody tragedy, are called Galls.

Trunks are cleft and steel is shaken,
You feel a bloody, bloody thirst;
Battle raves and whistling glaives,
And dreadful shouts around you burst.

There are thousands now in Alba
As stout as are in any land;
The gray Gaels from Scots,
Who cheerily round your colours stand;
With love of hardy deeds and bold
They fasten round you steadily,
Where the Lion's furious hold,
And his paws shine bloodily.
Bring with you then your well fed men,
Your stately, stalwart heroes show,
Your dexterous, lively, active line,
Who with a will to battle go;
Who ne'er were seen where strife was keen,
To blench or shun its reddest tide,
But foes have fled, where'er have been
Their speckled banners fluttering wide!

'Scots,' in this last stanza, occurs in the original, but is printed in italics. The Scots are said, I believe, to have been a Celtic tribe from Ireland. If this is the case, it is very singular that the name 'Scot' is not only utterly unknown in the Highlands—except through books—but has even no connection whatever with the Gaelic language. The name 'Caledonia,' though never used now, is different. It has a Gaelic derivation.

I don't remember any song except this in which the epithet 'gray' is applied to the Highlanders, nor do I know exactly what it means—whether it refers to their clothes or their complexion. There is another old Gaelic song, in which it is applied to Lowlanders, however, who are called in it 'the gray Galls.' The Celts are said to be a dark-haired race; but the Gaelic songs show that the people of the Highlands always considered their Lowland neighbours at least as dark in complexion as themselves.

In concluding, for the present, this series of articles on popular Highland poetry, the writer* of them wishes to make the following remarks. He wishes that these translations may be taken only as specimens of the poetry which is yet popular in the Highlands; while it is to be remembered that there is also still extant a large quantity of Gaelic verse—represented by the Dean of Lismore's book and other collections—which was once popular, but has in a great measure, principally owing to the change of manners, now ceased to be so. It is also earnestly hoped that the translations, now brought to a close, have been executed with sufficient skill to make the English reader aware that much poetry, and really good poetry, has for a long time been composed, and admired, and cherished in the Highlands. And lastly, the translator hopes to be excused for saying that he would feel especially pleased if he could think that any one of his countrymen had, through his means, come to form a higher estimate than before of the merits of that remarkable and most unassuming man, Duncan Ban MacIntyre. That he was a Scotsman in whom we may all feel pretty much interested—a true poet, with a very clear vision, an excellent understanding, and a genuine, not a merely imitative, gift of song; and that he is as such entitled to a place among the foremost of our rustic bards—second, surely, to none excepting

Burns—the present writer has no doubt whatever. If the translations which have been given of 'Corri Ceathach' and the 'Address to Mairi Bhan og' incline any of the readers of these poems to the same opinion, it would form a most pleasing and appropriate reward for the labour of translating them. It had been intended to translate something from the works of other bards, whose productions have not been touched upon at all; but these must be left to a more convenient occasion, or to other hands.

CHAPTER II.—KATO'S HAWKS.*

WE left old Chipps about to take the plunge into the darkness in pursuit of the yellow parchment. Exactly.

We will now transport our readers to Van Diemen's Land.

The sun is strong in the heavens; and the gangs of convicts, who are grunting and sweating under the combined influence of the fiery burning heat, and the compulsory exertion of digging and shovelling at loads of clay, stones, and sand—the gangs who are to be seen lessening in the distance, hauling their shadows and their burdens of soil behind them—the gangs who seem to be dipping down like ducks as they work in the trenched roads—the gangs who can be seen winding along from the fort (over by the bay there, standing white and defiant before the sun), throwing up clouds of dust around them, which the sun streams upon and makes golden with his rays—are all individual in the fierce hate which burns like a fever within them—hate at the sun above, which is blistering their bodies—at the cool and tranquil sea, visible in the distance, rising and falling luxuriously, and tossing up little waves in glee, as if to mock the hard-worked thirsty souls, who would cheerfully give their lives for one cool plunge—at the overseers, who are walking about—and at the Government at home, which has sent them to that Gehenna on earth, Van Diemen's Land.

The convicts are divided into gangs, and to each gang is attached an overseer, dressed in a semi-military semi-police style of costume, and with a semi-military semi-police style of pacing up and down, fingering the pistols in his belt, and playing with the handle of the sword attached to his side. The uniform drab dresses of the convicts; the short-cropped hair, beetle-brows, (which long brooding upon their miseries has perhaps engendered, or is it a curious physiological fact that criminals are generally beetle-browed?) sun-burned faces, and skull-caps which should protect their heads from the heat, but which only serve to make it more unendurable; the dead silence which is maintained as the labour progresses,—all combine to crush out any individuality which would distinguish them under ordinary circumstances, and to suggest a general analogy to rats and other loathsome vermin which eat, sleep, and work in gangs.

The overseer, who has charge of the outside gang, appears to have an eye to the picturesque, as occasionally he regards the mountains and the sea with hungering eyes, almost as hungrily as the convicts. He is a square-built, fat, little man, upon whom the uniform sits stiffly and tightly; and who appears to go through all his duties, like the convicts, under protest. He has a habit of trying to squeeze his hand between his belt and his body, and a habit, after having failed to manage this, of sighing, frowning, stamping violently for a moment with his foot, puffing out his cheeks, and nearly strangling himself in the attempt to frown at the leather stock which girds his neck, and which squeezes up a ring of superfluous fat, browned by the sun into a not remote likeness of a piece of tarry rope; his head is perpetually moving about from side to side, as if to seek some relief from the stock; and he periodically forces up a deep grunt, which might express either dissatisfaction at the convicts under his charge, at the climate, at his uniform, or at everything in general.

He strutted about among the convicts, and the grunts became more frequent; he wasted very few words, but infused into his looks, when surveying them, a certain contemptuous indifference, which implied something more than mere consciousness of the difference between their relative positions. After each of his surveys, he retired to his box, which stood on a little eminence commanding a view of the fort and of the bay, and spent a short time in trying to get his fingers between his leather stock and his neck, and in unloosing his belt for a few minutes to give himself free respiration. Between the gusts of parched air which he breathed forth, he indulged in short spasmodic soliloquies, some of which seemed to relieve and some to annoy him amazingly. 'Ha!' he said, 'what fools some people are, to be sure; and I not among the least! What an ass I am not to cut this cursed place, and return to the old country! Blow that sun! literally and figuratively it be blowed! Look at it now upon the fort. Why, every window looks as if the glass would soon be melted, and the sun force its way in and shrivel up everything. I declare, my sword-handle is nearly red hot. Ha! what a set of fools those miserable devils of convicts are, to be sure. What's the good of a man, say I, running his head against a stone, even supposing he does not get it cracked the first, or second, or third time? And yet that's what these beggars do, running their heads against the law. No use going against law—it's a failure—the country won't stand it; might's right here, and right's might. What a noosance it is that some people will run their heads against a stone! Oh dear, I wish I was out of it—that's all. I daresay my hawks do the same. What a couple of rum uns they are. What a chap that tall un is, to be sure, and what a peppery little devil is Vavazour! An Englishman like myself, sandy-haired like myself, but more of a fool than me, I'll swear. That peppery temper 'ill be the death of him yet—see if it don't. What a world it is. Ah! curse that stock, it'll be the death of me some fine day—the sun and it between them. Hawks! hawks! what a funny chap I am, to be sure! I was always fond of my joke—would have it in spite of everything; joke with a beadle, I would, and done it often enough. Wish I was a beadle now;—better luck than this. Think I ought to have called that French fellow my crow, he is so black. If I stay much longer here, shall be as black as him. Duferny—what a cool chap he is! and so polite—Frenchman all over—rather a good idea to chain him up with Vavazour! How he's tamed him no one would think. Good communications reform bad manners—that's truth. Eh! dear, I shall walk round and see my hawks—ha! ha!—good for Kato. Kato's hawks—good.'

He adjusted his belt, and with a few more grunts (this time of satisfaction at his own wit), strolled along to where two figures were working together on the outside of the gang. When he had reached them, the tallest of the two, with a bright hopeful smile which made his row of white teeth glisten in the sun, and his dark swarthy face darker by contrast, put up his hand to his brow, and gave the overseer a military salute. 'Bon jour, mon capitaine! What a devil of a sun this is, and how it makes one sweat! Mort de ma vie, how my shirt sticks to my skin! I shall melt away some fine day, and absorb into the sand. La!' He dug his spade into the sand, and wiped his brow.

'Ah! not when I am here, Jim Crow, you won't. What capital manure you would make if this was arable land, and we cultivated garlic. But you were melted away before you came here. Your country can't afford fat. If you were to talk about your friend there; he's got fat and to spare. Eh! my hawk number one!'

The tall figure showed his teeth again. The short figure turned round, his face purpled with rage; his neck seemed to swell. He hissed out between his teeth, 'Ass!' and resumed his work again, digging with redoubled energy. Duferny shrugged his shoulders, elevated his eyebrows, and, with a smile of meaning to the overseer, commenced again with a pick.

Kato played with the handle of his sword a moment, smiled at Duferny in return for another military salutation, and walked slowly away, with the remark, 'Sotto voce! Duferny's a philosopher like me; Vavazour's an ass. Human natur is human natur all over the world, penal settlements included!'

The man who stopped ofttest in his work, and scowled under his thick eyebrows at the overseer—the man who every now and then threw up his head in rage, as if he would like to return the compliment which the sun was paying him, viz. to stifle it—the man who panted and fumed, and stretched his head east in the direction of the sea, and groaned and cursed because there was no cool wind to meet him, and play about his heated face, to dry the clammy sweat—who chafed and fumed, and made impotent attempts to smother himself outright by restraining his breath, was of course the little man—Vavazour.

He threw up his head again skywards, in the manner of an enraged bull at bay, and then swayed it to and fro, as if with the feeble hope of making a slight current of air. At last, with an oath, he commenced again, and yelled out, 'Curses on this fiend of a sun, who will have no mercy—on that villainous Kato, lounging about, the reptile!—on the sea, on the ground, on everything; on everybody; on you imbecile pig, rat, grubbing and grubbing, and shovelling, as if you enjoyed it. Why don't you fret like me? You've got no soul, no fire, no hate. I'll kill you some day. Yah!'

He aimed his spade with fierce energy at his companion's foot, missing it by about a quarter of an inch.

The tall figure was drawn up to its full height—the swarthy face turned almost black—the white teeth gleamed in a long row almost from ear to ear—the eyes flashed, the pick was raised, and the compliment about to be returned with terrible effect, when he stopped suddenly, struck it into the soil, and said, with suppressed voice and quivering lips and nostrils, 'Diable! No, I won't lame you, it would not answer my purpose; but don't provoke me again, Vavazour.'

'You're an ass, a fool, Duferny. Why don't you brain me? I should have done it to you, and may do so yet; you've got provocation enough, God knows. A pestilence on you! Do you think I am to be cajoled into loving you by your pretended magnanimity? I hate you as I hate that sun! Worse—I hate you as I hate this place; as I hate Kato there, whom I shall kill some day and be hanged for it. I hate you almost as much as I hate him over the water; curses on him (he spoke to the accompaniment of his teeth grinding)! No, I can't hate any one so intensely as I hate him. I shan't kill Kato; I don't wish to die yet. I've a mission to fulfil yet before I am hanged. There's still a sweetness for me, even in this place, and that is for the hope that I shall be some day free from it—not, mark you, Duferny! not because I would wish to be again free and cool, and able to plunge into water, but for the pleasure of meeting him, and bringing him to death on a slow fire. I would suffer the torture for the luxury of seeing him suffer first.' A yell this time, as he struck his spade into the ground, and shovelled with wild energy as if to give play to the passion which was consuming him.

'You call me an ass, Vavazour,' said his companion; 'you are the greatest of the two.'

'How, fool? Speak! explain! you lie!'

'What would you do without me? What chance would you have of escape? None. Yet you try and irritate me in every way! You are eternally howling; and cursing, and shirking the work, and fretting and fuming under the yoke. What would you do if you were chained to the bulky fellow who brained his companion within our sight yesterday? Do you imagine, for a moment, that you are gaining anything by that conduct? You may provoke me far enough to do the same; and then adieu to your hopes of vengeance, and welcome the luxury of reflecting that the aristocratic friend whom you helped to his titles and estates would never be disturbed in his possession, and could glide quietly down the stream of life in uninterrupted bliss. I wonder if he is yet married! Eh?'

Another grinding of the teeth, another fierce dig with the spade, another flash of hatred at his companion, and Vavazour hissed out, 'Why the fiend do you torture me so?'

'As if,' continued Duferny coolly—'as if I could not, if I took it into my head, give up the scheme altogether. I shall be free in two years; you will die here, and rot under this cursed sand soil. You will be slaving away in this manner, and with a worse companion, while I am either in America or back in the old country, in luxury compared to this. You will, unless I take pity on you.'

'And you will take pity, won't you?' whined out the other. 'You won't leave me, will you? You know, Duferny, I have really an affection for you. I haven't got a bad heart for my friends—I haven't, indeed; only I get it soured with this cursed climate—these fiends the owners, and that cursed fiend of a sun—who wishes to kill me.'

'Very likely; yes, very likely. A soft heart is your weakness, my friend. I can appreciate it; but suppose you work now. If you don't wish Kate to risk his life by beating you over the head with the flat end of his cutlass, you'd better. Come now, begin.'

He took up his spade again, and Vavazour, stimulated by his example, recommenced, but in a very short time his energy slackened, he ground his teeth again, scowled at his companion, and again grunted out,—

'A soft heart! Yes; you may well say that. It's been my curse since my cradle; but you mock me, Duferny. I know what you mean by that sneering tone. I take a long time to understand your meaning; but I'm not to be deceived. You've a purpose in wishing me to escape.'

The tall figure started up, his eyes flashed, and he gesticulated wildly with his arms.

'Mortdemavie! What do you mean, imbecile? You're only fit to be hanged! A purpose with you! Of course I have a purpose; otherwise, do you think I would cumber myself with a wretch like you—a mere tool in every one's hands! Diable! what brought you here? By becoming the tool of our friend the Marquis—ha!—of Pennywistle! A thousand devils! Bah! your intellect is contemptible! Look at me—would you dare to put yourself on an equality with me, Pig? I will use you for my own purposes. It is my interest that you should escape with me. Cease your blustering, and swearing, and chafing, or I will be tempted to leave you to your fate. Purpose with you! Ha! as if I had not! Good! it makes me laugh. Now, work, my friend! Work, imitate me, and keep up the character which

I have formed for you of a moral convict, or I shall cut the connection, and have you removed to another gang. Ha!' He finished up with a tiger-like grin, which again made his teeth whiter, and his face blacker by contrast.

Vavazour was again cowed, he spoke nothing, but seemed to shrink up under the words of his companion.

They both recommenced their work, and continued without exchanging a syllable for about an hour. At last Duferny broke the silence.

'Voici, mon ami!' I will put you up to a way of giving a zest to your labour. You must dig at that trench. Good. Just imagine to yourself that you are cutting and hacking at your patrician friend Pennywistle! Put it, that you are shovelling out his brains or his bowels, or hacking his limbs. Now then. Remember, you may have the luxury of doing it some day, if you behave yourself and stick to me! Now then.'

With a yell of rage, Vavazour struck out in a maniacal style at the part where the shallow trench was to be made, Duferny occasionally regarding him with a satanic grim of delight on his swarthy countenance, and encouraging him now and again with interjectional expressions of approval—'Bon, mon ami! vous faites bien! Diable! but that was a good one for our friend. Scoop out his eyes, now! crack his skull! Ha! Good! you're at his entrails now! That's the way. Pah! that was a bad stroke. Now, at him. Ha! good, mon ami! Good! you'll do; you'll prove a worthy confrere. I have hopes of you yet. Work! Death of my soul! Work! We'll win yet!'

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER III.

'City! I am true son of thine.'—A. Smith.

MY mansion is in Portland-street, at an elevation of one stair. Up till last week, my wife and girls had secret aspirations after a self-contained lodging; and searched every decaying suburb for some tenement of that dignified type, sufficiently small, shabby, dilapidated, or depreciated in value by noise of neighbouring factories, to give promise of being within our limited means. It was argued by my shorter and broader half that, had we been able to find such a habitation, the world was not to know that we did not cling to it from old family attachments and associations much too deeply rooted to be torn up by steam-engines. Her idea appeared to be that a silk gown, a Brussels carpet, and real silver spoons had always an air of gentility about them, although the first might be stained with grease, the second threadbare—almost in holes—and the third but the mere ghosts of spoons. In other words, poverty was always in her eyes tolerably respectable, and easy to be borne, when it wore a reminiscence of grandeur. But anything in the self-contained line, capable of holding out rain, and not given over to women who take in washing and dressing, or who keep cows, was nowhere to be found at our moderate figure. Accordingly, we retook our mansion in Portland-street—that locality furnishing, on the whole, the maximum of gentility at the minimum of cost.

By this judicious proceeding, we spared our flatter cabinet-work the shock and peril of a 'fitting'—surely of all earthly tribulations among the sorest! Our grates had a reassured air about them, as if feeling that they fitted. The eight-day clock forgot its infirmities, and leaned against the wall, apparently conscious of strong backing. My old coats looked homely on their pegs. Every rising anxiety concerning the safety and whereabouts of my papers subsided. A couple of pounds which I carried in my pocket-book, and which must have gone hopelessly on carters and whisky, became all at once my own, to expend as I best liked—in the diminution of household debt—in a warm cloak for Barbara, who has been looking sickly of late—in square miles of indifferent penny letterpress—in a handsome testimonial 'from G. G. to M. W.'—in anything or everything which the shop windows boasting the largest panes offer to itching fingers. But this direct money-gain was doubled. Our landlord—a polite gentleman, in bodily terror of losing us, and having his house untenanted, or tenanted by some wretch fastidious in wall paper—took a couple of pounds off the rent. Fancy this being done by a politic landlord, of his own free will! I felt it like a gift. It thrilled me with a sensation of riches. The peregrinations of my feminine household in search of a domicile which should be our own down to the earth's centre and up to the celestial zenith, with no noises below but earthquakes, and none overhead but thunder, had resulted in actual profit! I called them my town-travellers, and complimented them on their good stroke of business. They might have done it in cabs and come off gainers. Kate, my youngest born, who is not the least of a heroine, and contents herself with a kind of comic chamber-maid business, has been speculating on another tour of the vicinities next February or March—this time of a purely menacing and make-believe character; but I question whether a further reduction of rent would be conceded under that pressure. Politic landlordism might suspect a trick, and take steps to retaliate. My venerable household gods might then look uncomfortable with good cause, under peremptory notice to quit, amid such disruption of the established harmonies as it were chaos and misery to picture.

So here we are in Portland-street, one stair up, for another year at least. There are families below us, and families above us, and in this way we live, layer upon layer, like a Bordeaux cake. I sometimes describe the position of all these geologically as the primary, the secondary, and the tertiary formations. We are stratified. A family of peculiar complexion up stairs I call the "Old Reds." Over the way are a houseful of woolly half-casts, and these I term the carboniferous or coal-group. Ah me! how much more strange are these treble plies of humanity than all the penetrated strata of the earth's crust! What are dead rocks, fossils of the algae and shellfish of dried-up seas, the grimy grave-yards of the forests of forgotten continents, or the bones of the monstrous Mastadon or Megatherium, compared with the pulsing activities—the living joys and sorrows, the eager hopes, the bitter accidental discomfitures, and the silent heroic struggles of such a street as Portland-street! Could I ascend up through its tenements, one after one, as by some invisible factory-hoist—pausing at every floor, asking no introduction, necessitating no hypocrisy, but spying into its parlours, and catching at a glance the actualities of its daily life—what contrasts should I behold! What running commentary should I make with the changing phantasmagoria! Play on, happy children! with your unblown noses, and boisterous contempt for the adult etiquettes! Ah! heart-broken wife—more melancholy than any widow, no matter under what depth of crape—trying to see the needle with which thou labourest to stab thy griefs continually! Lonely—lonely! and not even, close by or far away, a poor tombstone on which to pillow thy sorrows! Fond youth and maiden! sweetly whispering, contented with the firelight and patient for the stars, what are the pictures of a Claude or a Salvator Rosa to those which you at this moment paint? Crouch, old age! by the fireside—spectacled—loving thy newspaper intently, as if thy interest deepened in worldly matters the longer thou hast lived to discover their fleetingness! But lo! a floor throbbing to the piano and the dancers,—and above, a sleeper whom neither piano, nor trumpet, nor thunder shall ever awaken more! What bareness is here, and what hieroglyphs of poverty are darned into carpet and curtain! Anon, what lavish upholstery, and full, confused cupboards—the upholsterer's and the grocer's bill unpaid! O magical mosaic of life! O indescribable patch-work! O bewildering panorama of summer, snow-storm, and shadowy midnight masses ghost-like! Portland-street has mines of riches for me. It is my daily living library, in which histories, romances, and farces are ranged side by side, shelf above shelf, in various bindings, in due and uniform order, and numbered even, for easy reference of the studious. What satisfaction, for another twelvemonth, to sojourn there, untroubled by other ambitions, in slippers!

Portland-street is of a goodly length; and persons with no eyes—by which I mean the bulk of mankind—might believe it to be dull. There is little through traffic in it. Its occasional coals are to brander its own steaks, and to boil its own kettles. Scarcely a cab goes noisily over its causeway, that is not bringing its own visitors or airing its own invalids. Few besides Portland-street people and their friends are ever seen on its pavements. Yet, day after day, and year after year, I can look down from my window on its fitful or straggling stream of life, and feel no more lonely than any Isaac Walton on his solitary bank of cowlips. Not an odd fish passes but I hook him for my special delectation. I pluck out the mystery of faces, and calculate which of my life-studies have bills to meet not well knowing how; and which, on the other hand, have made fortunate ventures in the stock-market. Most of the young folks in the street I know by headmark, and I profess myself competent to foretell marriages like a gipsy. The man going down with drink—alas! poor suicide! drifting or driving whither—O angel of Death! whither?—is read by me as I might read a tragedy, noting the scenes and the acts, and anticipating the end—the disappearance—the terrible 'no more,' saddest and terriblest when without a happy memory to survive. What families are scaling the sunny social slopes, and what succumbing to down-draughts, and ill-fate, and possible business incapacity, I observe with an eye of philosophy and science, and scarcely ask for other romances than these real, enacting for my richer experience, with brightening or deepening lines, towards luminous or tragic dénouements, making me old and wise.

On the street-floor nearly opposite, my essential friend, Mathew Waddel, has his apartments. I can look diagonally at the glacial crown of him every morning over the low blinds. At first, it is usually surmounted with a nightcap like snow, but this thaws off as the daylight advances. Scarcely an afternoon passes without telegraphic signals between us, and speedily thereafter the shrewd observer may behold an elderly gentleman, of respectable demeanour, voyaging across the street, sometimes in a kind of easy fireside deshabille. Such is our usual mode of assembling, and, though quiet as a raised finger, we find it as efficacious as the clang of innumerable bells. Apart, therefore, from the high, prudential, and philosophic considerations on which I have desecanted, the near vicinity of Mathew should have been enough of itself to make us conquerors over common-stair gossip, back-green disputation, the sorely beaten piano of the 'Old Reds,' and other disadvantages of the stratified mode of life. It was a poor compliment paid to a musician that he 'perspired more than Liszt,' because had he even split his coat like the American stump orator, he would have been no nearer perfection in his art for that singular triumph of gymnastics. Of this truth the powerful performers overhead, with their sorely-tried stay-laces, are mainly ignorant; but I look across, or step across the street, diagonally, and feel myself not only reconciled, but, through martyrdom of a sensitive ear, in some considerable sense heroic.

Truly, a wonderful life-world, my masters! What sounds would we hear, and what sights see, every day, all round us, and under our very rooftrees, but that we are deaf and blind, and crusted up by familiar usage, and tyrannous conventionality, against the more delicate and appreciative instincts! How often, indeed, does a too great nearness destroy our focus of observation, and render the glowing lights, and pathetic and tragic shadows mere smears without interest or significance! Let any of us, artist-like, step back to observe, at true distance, what colours are on our dearest home-pictures! Ah Mathew! I have made a discovery. My wife has been accusing Barbara of sitting up late at night, and drawing the white moonlight into her blood. The poor girl has, it seems, taken to 'scribbling' nonsense, and a proof of it has been put into my hands. Here it is, in her own trembling caligraphy:—

The sunset waned on Gilmorehill,
But night was far from me;
For Edward's eye was on me still,
And darkness could not be.

Though soft the notes of summer birds,
More soft the vows he made;
They might be false or foolish words,
But sweeter ne'er were said.

How tender is the April beam,
Ere skies are overcast!
How fearful is the lightning's gleam!
Like love too bright to last.

You cloud that now so dark appears,
I saw in splendour shine;
Its splendour gone, it breaks in tears,
As breaks this heart of mine.

Let Kelvin mourn a weary mile
Its lonely banks between;
For how can summer deign to smile,
Where love has faithless been?

No pearls are on the flowers of June—
My tears they only wear;
No joy is in the light of noon—
'Tis dark with my despair.

Of friendship let the aged sing,
And warm their souls with song;
But friendship is a cheerless thing
To hearts that still are young.

Then, canst thou, Edward! coldly claim
A friend alone to prove?
No, now thou scorn'st a dearer name,
Let friendship die with love.

When I had finished reading this, I observed that Mathew held on by his tumbler, staring at it without uttering a word. I at length broke silence, half soliloquising—'She shall have a new cloak—a warm one—one of the season's comfortablest. It shall be like my own arms round her. She shall find it both nurse and physician. It shall be a summer to her blood, and bring back the roses to her cheeks. By Jove! Mathew! it shall clasp her like a southern climate!' 'And it shall be a special gift from me—I insist on it,' shouted good Mathew Waddel, upstanding and wringing my hand, with tears glowing on his eyelids.

A GLANCE AT TUNIS.

Of all the States of Barbary, that of Tunis is perhaps the most interesting to the student of history, on account of the many remarkable cities, towns, and ruins for which it is famous. It lies to the east of Algeria, and has an area of 78,700 square miles, or about one-eighth less than that of Great Britain. Its population is estimated at 1,500,000. The climate is of a mild and, upon the whole, salubrious temperature. From the great scarcity of water, however, in some parts of the country—particularly towards the eastern portion of it—the soil is very unproductive. Yet, notwithstanding this, the cultivation of the soil of this State far surpasses that of the other kingdoms of Barbary. It is in the western portion of it that the ground is most productive; being exceedingly fertile. This, no doubt, is accounted for in a great degree by the number of rivers which flow through it—the plains being irrigated by their waters. The fruit which grows upon the mountains and in the valleys is of the richest and most delicious description. It is very plentiful; and, together with wool and olive oil, is largely exported. The trade of the country—which is the largest of all the Barbary States—is principally carried on by caravans, which visit it in great numbers every year, and import into the State many articles not cultivated or manufactured within its borders.

The reins of the Government of Tunis are held by the Bey, who is of such an independent spirit that he yields obedience to no foreign power, with the exception of the Sultan, to whom, however, he pays little attention, and very frequently little respect. He is not only the chief of all the ecclesiastical institutions in the country, but the most important civil offices of the State are vested in him. The decisions of this person, when presiding in the Hall of Justice, are what our Transatlantic cousins would call 'expeditions.' He allows no time to those who have been proceeded against to get up or prepare a defence. If they are not ready on the instant with something palpable, they must abide the consequences; the result of which is that justice is sported with, and the poor victims of this 'Star Chamber' inquisition not unfrequently suffer most severely at its hands, although perfectly innocent of the charges brought against them.

The most important commercial city in Tunis is the capital, which is called after the State. It is enclosed by a wall, which has six gates or entrances. The population of it is estimated at from 150,000 to 200,000. The streets have a very miserable appearance—being narrow, irregular, and dreadfully filthy. The houses, which all consist of one storey, are generally minus those requisites of such tenements—namely windows—without which our optical propensities would be denied many pleasant scenes in daily life. However, there are many beautiful, we were almost going to say magnificent, buildings within its walls. The Bey's palace is especially noteworthy, being built in the Saracenic style, having handsome marble courts and galleries. Then there is a large number of mosques (into which no Christian is allowed to enter), synagogues, and other places of worship for Jew, Greek, and Roman Catholic, which contrast somewhat strangely with the generality of buildings in the place.

The place next in commercial importance to the city of Tunis is Kairwan. It is what is called a holy city. We certainly feel amazed at the pretext for such a designation. If it were a universal asylum for all the imbecile people in the region round about, we might have excused their fanaticism and want of taste; but that they should give it such a designation—and, moreover, exorcise every infidel dog (the name they give to both Christians and Jews) who may unfortunately be found within its walls, merely because the mortal remains of the great Prophet's barber are deposited under its soil—is certainly enough to disgust any one. Nor is this all. On account of the possession of the aforesaid barber's remains (we mean no disparagement to the members of that honourable profession), this city is the recipient of thieves, murderers, and every description of ruffians who seek its shelter; the consequence of which is, that, once within its consecrated gates, no power on earth can apprehend them, though their crime be of the darkest hue. However, this city presents, notwithstanding the sanguinary and crazy character of its inhabitants, a most animated appearance—the grand mosque, especially, standing out in bold relief, being supported by no fewer than 500 beautiful granite columns.

But, passing from the cities of Tunis, we shall direct our steps towards some of the more remarkable of its ruins and remains of former greatness.

We now approach a pile, and that a truly noble one, which, as we gaze upon it, sends into our being unspeakable awe. We all know the feeling which takes possession of our breasts when we for the first time become acquainted with something wonderful—something that we never expected to realise, and which becomes an actual fact. And such was the feeling which possessed us as we contemplated for the first time, with the aid of such materials as we had at hand, the majestic but now desolated El Jemme. Ah! and is this the noble amphitheatre of other days? This the place whither the noble, the wealthy, and all the beauty of the Eastern nations were wont to flock? This the place where 60,000 human beings were located, night after night, to gaze upon and digest the scenes—in all likelihood brutal and disgusting—which were enacted within its arena? Yes, it is so; and what a sad and mournful spectacle it now presents! It is now no longer the pride of a magnificent nation. The nightly revelry of ambition and passion are now no longer displayed within its walls. The ringing cheers, the loud swelling notes of disapproval, and the fervid excitement of the mighty audience, no longer rebound through the air. All, all is as silent as the grave. Alas! El Jemme! Time has wrought a wonderful change upon thy fortunes. Standing quite isolated in the midst of a dreary waste, and visited now and again by a few daring adventurers, what a sad picture of decayed grandeur does this noble structure present! Enough, however, is left to touch the heart and arouse the sympathies of those who view it. Although in a very dilapidated condition, there is remaining, as a symbol of its former greatness, no fewer than sixty-four arches, with four rows of columns, placed one upon the other. And that is all. Not another stone is there to mark or give one an inkling of the former life and activity which prevailed around it. All has gone down with Time, that great leveller of human greatness—which leaves to posterity its solemn lesson as to the deceitfulness of human hopes and aspirations.

But leaving El Jemme, with its somewhat conflicting reminiscences, to its frequent visitors and steadfast friends—the howling beasts of prey—where they may enact in its solitude, on a small scale, those scenes which characterised it when at the pinnacle of its glory—we betake ourselves to the contemplation of other ruins, those of the once noble Carthage. Again do our thoughts take a melancholy turn, as we think upon and draw a lesson from such scenes as those which are before us. When we think of her noble sons, her illustrious chiefs, and her patriotic people; when we think upon her warlike and mighty achievements on land and water, and the noble industry of her people in every walk of life; nay, when we consider that this once great empire was the inflexible rival of glorious Rome herself—how pungent appear the well-pointed queries and conclusions of the poet:—

'Where are the heroes of the ages past?
Where the brave chieftains? Where the mighty ones
Who flourish'd in the infancy of days?—
All to the grave gone down. On their fallen fame
Exultant, mocking at the pride of man,
Sits grim Forgetfulness.'

Ah! yes, it is Time that works and conquers all. It will not court the favour of the fawning sycophant, neither will it quiver or stand aghast at the hidden malice or open hostility of enemies. We see its workings too plainly in the records of past transactions, and, alas! too frequently in those of to-day. And are we not under the influence of a dream in gazing upon this once noble place? Is it possible that this wild and dreary waste—the habitation of barbarous people and prowling beasts of prey—is the site of the Carthage of ancient times? Can it be that these few marble columns—standing, as they do, as landmarks for the adventurers who visit it—mark the place before whose prowess Africa, Spain, Sicily, Corsica, and even Italy had to bend the knee, and yield obedience? Alas! it is so. Above the site but little remains to tell the traveller that he is treading on the classic soil of Carthage; but underneath, in the bowels of the earth, there is enough to awaken the curiosity of all. Near the sea coast, in the year 1837, a Roman villa was discovered; and, from the many beautiful and magnificent mosaic paintings and other works of art which were excavated, it is to be hoped that another Layard will betake himself to the spot, and rescue from oblivion many interesting and precious relics of this once noble and industrious country.

'Trodden down
Beneath the oppressor; darkness shrouding thee
From every blessed influence of Heaven:
Thus hast thou lain for ages, iron-bound
As with a curse. Thus art thou doom'd to lie,
Yet not for ever.'

Be it so, noble Carthage!

THE CRUISE OF THE HERMIONE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER IV.

ON rising next morning, I was not a little surprised to find a fresh breeze blowing, the deck deserted, and the vessel at anchor. I could not but think it strange that the noise of letting go the anchor had not awakened any of us. The next thing was why, when there was a breeze, we had not continued on our course. When Bob came on deck, this, of course, was the first thing that presented itself to his mind. He flew into a tremendous rage, vented innumerable 'confound its;' anathematising Archie under the distinguishing appellation of the 'old beast.' He then went forward to the forecabin; but the scuttle being fastened so that he could not remove it, he put his mouth close to the deck, and began to upbraid Archie in words of severest bitterness, commanding him, and calling upon him, as he would have his wages paid, to return instantly to his duty, and get the yacht under weigh.

The noise Bob made brought Stewart on deck. 'Hilloa! what's all the row about?'

'Row about!' exclaimed Bob, starting to his feet with flashing eyes—'row about!—do you not see what the row is about? Do you see the wind there? Do you see the sails? Do you see the anchor? Do you see where we are?'

'Rothsay Bay, is it not?'

'Rothsay Bay, is it not?' repeated Bob, imitating Stewart's tone; 'and you can talk of it with such indifference! Here have we been two days out, spending time, and paying men's wages, and here we are no farther than we could have been by a steamer in almost as many hours, and seen no more than we can see any day for eighteenpence! Here we are, when we might have been running out to sea with this breeze, lying idle in a nasty watering-place, for I don't know how many hours; and that lazy vagabond snoring there—just hear him! Stewart, how can you take it so coolly?'

'Coolly, my dear Bob!' said Stewart. 'Why, what is the good of making such a noise about it? To tell the truth, I'm rather glad of it than otherwise. I think we may spend a day or two here very comfortably. It's better, I'm sure, than being where we were yesterday.'

'Is there any need of our being either here or where we were yesterday, I would like to know?' said Bob. That breeze would carry us to the Mull of Cantyre in a few hours. Come on, I say, and get up the anchor!'

'But, Bob, will the breeze continue—that's the rub. I don't believe it will; and then we'll have a nice time of it. Let us stay here for to-day. Starry has some cousins here, I believe; and I know one or two very nice families who are here just now. We'll go and call on them.'

'Oh, bother your families!' cried Bob. 'What does anybody want with families just now? You and your families! If I only had hold of that old vagabond! What on earth made him put in here? Stewart—I say, Stewart! tell the truth, was it not you who put him up to it?'

'I was just wondering, Bob, that you hadn't accused me of that sooner,' said Stewart. 'I expected you would. Well, perhaps I did give the old fellow a hint that I wouldn't very much mind if he did put in here.'

'And you tell me this to my face?' cried Bob. 'You told him to put in here? It's enough to drive a fellow mad! You told him to put in here? Stewart, you're a—a—beast!'

'What is the use of making such a row about it?' said Stewart. 'Just let us have breakfast, and go ashore; and, if we haven't some difficulty in getting you away afterwards, I'll be surprised.'

'Stewart!' said Bob, 'I see what you wanted. It's that confounded Fanny Mitchell! The Mitchells are here just now. Aren't they, Starry? Yes; I was sure of it. And here we are—spending time and money for nothing, all because he wanted to see that little baggage! But he won't see her—I'll show him that! Come on, Jack! Hi, Starry! Give up your dirty scribbling for ten minutes, and give us a hand. We're going to start. Hi—you—old lazybones—Archie! Answer, can't you?'

No answer being returned, however, Bob seized a handspike, and tried to force open the scuttle. Succeeding—the wood being decayed—by breaking it in two, he jumped down into the forecabin. 'Come out of this,' he cried, 'come out of this. Do you hear, you old Highland vagabond! What!—why, there's nobody here. What on earth!—where, in the name of all that's strange?—'

'There's an end to our starting now, at any rate,' said Stewart, 'for of course we'll never get on without Archie. So, Bob, you had better keep yourself quiet. Why, if you keep throwing yourself into a state of excitement every five minutes this way, you'll go home in a raging fever. Keep yourself quiet, can't you? Come, we'll have breakfast, and go ashore and visit the families.'

'Are there any young ladies in any of them?' inquired Bob, after a pause.

'Yes, lots of young ladies,' said Stewart—'seven of them in one family—from ten years old to four-and-twenty, and all good-looking—the nicest girls ever you saw in your life.'

Bob was mollified at once by this announcement: he expressed his willingness to go. The matutinal exercises of kindling the fire, cooking the breakfast, and eating it were agreeably performed, and Stewart and he proceeded to dress for going ashore. Starry was to accompany them on a visit to his cousins; I was to remain on board, in charge of the vessel. Stewart was ready in a few minutes. It was nearly an hour, however, before Bob made his appearance, decked in all the effulgence of gilt-buttoned waistcoat and anchor-crested cap.

'I say, Bob,' said Stewart, 'what's all this? You want to pass for a lieutenant in the navy! Why, man, you look for all the world like the steward of a tug-boat. Do go and put off that cap.'

'You mind your own business,' replied Bob. 'When I want your opinion I'll ask for it. Starry, are you ready? Come along; we're waiting for you.'

'I'm just finishing,' answered Starry, from below. 'I'll be this instant. "Above the clouds, piercing the blue of"—I'm just finishing—"the ethereal vaults of heaven." There! I'm done. I'll be with you instantly.'

'Look sharp, then! Jack! we'll be back in the course of the forenoon. I say, Starry! are you going to keep us here all day? You can put your things away again, can't you?'

'Here I am!' said Starry, coming up, with his spectacles on his nose, his slippers on his feet, his head like a mop, and his hands dabbled over with ink. 'I am at your service. Come along!'

'Starry!' said Stewart, 'just go and have a look at yourself in the glass—do. You look for all the world like a literary orang-outang. Do go and wash your hands;—and, I say, where are your boots?'

'My boots?' said Starry, looking down. 'Oh! I beg your pardon. Excuse me for a moment. I'll be with you instantly.'

He withdrew to the cabin.

'Starry!' cried Stewart, 'you had better wash your face, too, when you are about it.'

'Oh! I beg your pardon,' said Starry. 'Yes, thank you, Stewart, for the suggestion. I shall carry it into effect.'

Carried into effect it accordingly was, but in such a manner that he transferred a considerable portion of the ink which had been on his hands to his face, and appeared on deck with a black circle round each eye. Stewart shook his head, and turning away with a laugh, lowered himself over the stern into the yawl. Bob then got in, and, after a vehement discussion whether the boat was capable of carrying another person, Starry was suffered to take his seat at the bow. They pulled off, Stewart at the oars, Bob sitting in the stern, holding on by the sides, and looking as if he thought every moment was to be his last; and, indeed, there was some reason for his fears, for the gunwale was only a few inches from the water. They reached the shore, however, in safety. They made the boat fast at the quay, and walked away.

The forenoon passed, but they did not return. I began to feel not a little tired of waiting. I tried reading, but I could not settle to it—even Meg Merrilees and the Dominie had lost their interest. Then I sat on the deck, watching the steamers as they went and came, and the boats with pleasure parties which passed from time to time. I observed that several of the latter, as they approached the Hermione, varied their course, and pulled towards her, and when they came up, rested on their oars, and surveyed her with countenances expressive of subdued merriment. They evidently considered the Hermione quite a feature in naval architecture. At first I felt inclined to regard these surveys with the indifference which what might be considered an impertinence seemed to merit; but as party after party stopped opposite her, some of them even going the length of pulling right round her, I could hardly control myself so far as to remain on deck, feeling almost ashamed of any connection which I might be supposed to have with her.

The afternoon wore on, and still they did not return. I was a little astonished that Bob, at least, should remain so long—the breeze still continuing, and being fair for running out: it had been arranged that, should the weather be favourable, we should go round by the Mull of Cantyre, in order to visit the Giant's Causeway on our way—Bob being influenced, also, by the consideration that, as he said, 'We would save the dues, and the expenses for horses, which we would have to pay if we went by the Crinan Canal.'

But I was more surprised, still, at the non-appearance of Archie. What had become of him I could scarcely imagine, unless he had contrived to get put ashore in the morning by some passing boat, and gone to fraternise with some of his countrymen.

I was revolving in my mind the probable time and condition of his return, when I thought I heard a voice shouting the Hermione's name; and, looking towards the shore, I saw Archie seated upon a stone.

'Are ye deaf? Come ashore with the boat! Smack ahoy!'

I answered his hail, telling him that the boat was at the quay.

'Are ye deaf, or are ye drunk?' shouted Archie. 'Can ye no come ashore with the boat? Smack ahoy!'

I answered as before, and he seemed to comprehend. He got up from the stone, and steadying himself against it, stooped down, and picked up something from the beach, took deliberate aim at me, and threw it towards me. The missile lighted about ten yards from the shore. He then, with one hand in his pocket and his body swaying to and fro, shook his fist in a threatening manner three or four times, and walked away.

In about half-an-hour I observed a boat, which I recognised as the Hermione's yawl, leaving the quay. After directing rather a zigzag course towards us, it touched the side, and Archie tumbled on board.

'Where have you been all day, Archie?' I inquired. 'You, pe blowed!' replied Archie, kicking the broken scuttle from the fore-castle hatch, and lowering himself down.

It was almost dark when Bob and Stewart returned, they having procured a boat at the quay. Starry had remained ashore with his cousins, but was to come off later in the evening. They had called on 'the families,' and had spent the day with the one in which were the seven young ladies. By Stewart's account, Bob had been particularly attentive to the third young lady, aged eighteen; had walked with her, had sat by her, and in short, Stewart said, 'had become completely spooney.' Bob, however, denied the charge; but any measure of faith which we might have had in his denial was entirely destroyed by the acknowledgment which he made, on Stewart's suggesting that we should set sail at daybreak next morning, that 'he had made a promise—at least he had—he had expressed an intention—of calling again to-morrow.'

The question of sailing was then discussed, Stewart arguing that it was a pity to be losing the breeze, and endeavouring to persuade Bob that he would have opportunity enough of seeing 'her' again; Bob retaliating by sundry allusions to the absence of Miss Fanny Mitchell on a visit to her aunt. It was at length, however, ostensibly settled that we should remain where we were for another day, and Bob was satisfied.

CHAPTER V.

WHAT was Bob's astonishment, however, on coming on deck next morning, to find that we were running down along the coast of Bute! Stewart and Archie had got quietly under weigh at break of day. Bob, at first, was a good deal annoyed; but we contrived at length to pacify him—a powerful argument existing, in the progress we had made and were still making, for we ran before the wind at the rate of five knots an hour—a wonderful speed for the Hermione!

By noon we were off Pladda. For the last hour, however, the wind had been gradually dying away. It was now almost calm, though there was still enough of wind to enable us to head against the tide. On the turn of the tide, we drifted out; and the breeze coming on a little again, we made six or seven miles of our course. But towards nightfall it died altogether away, and we were left again at the mercy of the tides. We repaired to our berths—Bob confounding our ill luck—all of us hoping that next morning would bring us better.

Next morning came. We had lost ground during the night. We were drifting in the middle of the Sound of Kilbrannan—the sea as smooth as glass.

'Did ever mortal see the like?' exclaimed Bob. 'It's enough to drive a fellow mad!'

'Hush, Martin,' said Starry. Starry had come on board on Wednesday evening, as arranged. 'It is hardly proper in you to be speaking in that way. Of course this is not quite so agreeable as to be rushing before the wind, with the waves in our track and the spray dashing over our bows—with

"A wet sheet and a flowing sea," as Allan Cunningham has it—the former expression being, I presume, in allusion to the water pouring into the berths of those on board; yet we have a bright sky, and can enjoy the beauty of the surrounding coasts—the green Cantyre, the wild Arran, and the lonely, sea-girt rock of Ailsa Craig.'

'Ailsa Craig, Starry!' said Stewart. 'Where?'

'Do you not observe its black form rising from out the sea, away yonder in the distance?' said Starry.

'Starry, my dear fellow! that's a fishing smack, becalmed, like ourselves, about a couple of miles off.'

'Is it possible? Oh, I beg your pardon. I am a little short-sighted, you know. Though, I must confess, it is rather a disappointment to me; for I was just enjoying a little poetic rumination at its expense,—its rocky, sea-beat cliffs—its wild and lonely solitude—the never-ceasing cry of the sea birds—and the hermit existence of its solitary inhabitant!'

'Oh, bother the solitary inhabitant!' exclaimed Bob. 'I never saw such a set in my life. You don't seem to care a single bit if we were here for a month—one smoking there like a tinker—another poking his spectacled nose up into the clouds—and the other lying in the sun there like a beast! I do believe I'll throw myself overboard!'

'Martin!' cried Starry, seizing hold of Bob, with the intention of preventing his suicidal purpose, 'this behaviour is disgraceful—it is puerile—childish! Why can you not compose yourself? We surely cannot be in this predicament—though assuredly you infinitely exaggerate its inconveniences—we surely cannot be in this predicament long now. Ask Archie there. He can probably inform you regarding the ultimate prospects of the weather. I believe these calms do not usually continue for any considerable time together. Archibald, can you inform Mr. Martin how long there may be any probability of our having to remain in our present position?'

'Maybe two days—maybe three—maybe a week,' replied Archie.

'Oh, surely not so long as that,' said Starry. 'Is the navigation of the coast usually attended with so much delay?'

'Whiles; she's a bad time o' the year for sailing just now; she'll be so often calm, and then again she'll come on to blow. I wouldna be a bit surprised now, if, before to-morrow night, we had a regular breeze—more nor we want; and she's a bad boat to stand a sea this—very bad. I never seen worse, and I've seen a few.'

'Then, at this rate,' said Starry, 'our voyage may occupy a considerably longer period of time than we had counted upon or anticipated.'

'Oich! I don't know that. I've seen hookers would run from the Moil here to the point of Ardnamurchan—she's the westerlymost point between Cape Wrath and the Land's-End, and a bad place she is, too, with the swell of the Atlantic coming right in—I've seen them run to the point of Ardnamurchan between this time and to-morrow morning; and then, again, coming back in the winter time, they'll maybe be for a month in Ilan Ornsay with the head winds—couldna get round the point; and some o' them big veshels, too, that's coming that way from Roossia, maybe trying it three or four times, and putting back with their sails all split!'

'Indeed!' said Starry. 'I trust we may not experience anything of that description. Might I inquire what you call those dark birds which we observe floating on the water there?'

'It's dookers,' replied Archie. 'There's a good lot of them about; yonder is a drove, away flying yonder.'

'I say, Bob,' said Stewart, 'if you want something to keep you from fretting, there is a job for you. Go and have a pop at them. It's first-rate sport.'

'What does anybody want with sport, just now?' said Bob. 'Well,' he added, 'perhaps, after all, I daresay it is better than doing nothing here. We might have some of them for dinner.'

'Dinner! faugh! the nasty cod-liver oily things—neither fish, flesh, nor fowl! But you'll have some sport. It's capital fun. Perhaps you may fall in with a seal, and you can have a pop at him. You may take a bullet or two with you at any rate. You'll find some that I brought with me beside the powder. Only see and don't shoot yourselves. You'll find powder and shot in the cupboard. If you haven't enough of powder in the flask, you'll find a canister in the broken teapot in the locker, at the starboard side, away at the back. I put it there the other day to be out of harm's way. See and don't drown yourselves now; and take care of the guns. Keep them at the bow, with the muzzles over the gunwale—do you hear?'

'But are you not coming? Jack, will you not come?'

'Thank you, Bob; but I would rather not. There is Starry;—he will be very glad to accompany you, I am sure.'

'Yes; it would afford me great pleasure indeed,' said Starry. 'With the exception of a little shooting on the moors, on two occasions, I have never had very much experience of the sports of the field; and, although I had only the happiness to bring down one bird on the first occasion, and to wound another on the second, yet I have had sufficient experience of them to have felt some of the—a—enthusiasm which they are calculated to inspire. And yet I feel that it would scarcely be proper in me to indulge in this sport on the present occasion, seeing that, as Stewart has remarked, the birds are not calculated for human use. I feel that it would be indulging in a gratification, at the expense of unoffending and harmless creatures.'

'Harmless creatures!' said Stewart; 'get you a bite from one of them, and I venture to say there will be an end of your scruples; you will ever after have a hatred of the whole race of them. However, bring on board what you shoot, and then we'll talk about what we're to do with them.'

'Never mind him, Starry,' said Bob; 'they're good enough to eat. We'll cook them up, and have a jolly feast of them to-morrow—if we aren't out of this, that is; and we'll make up a dumpling, or a pudding, or something—though, if they get a bit, it's more than they deserve—the lazy wretches! Come along, Starry! Bail out the boat—I'll go and get the guns.'

The boat was bailed out; the guns, two in number, were procured; and Bob and Starry lowered themselves over the side. They rowed away in the direction of the Cantyre coast; Starry manœuvring the oars in rather a novel fashion; Bob, at the bow, loading a gun with the muzzle pointed directly at the back of Starry's head.

'There is one just come up,' cried Bob, when they had pulled about a hundred yards from the yacht. 'See yonder! What a whopper! Pull—quick! Your left hand—no, the other one. Don't speak now, for your life! Pull hard! Confound it, don't make such a noise. There he goes! He's swimming away! Pull, Starry! You blockhead! pull. Pull your left hand. Back water—not that way—the other way! Quick! We'll have him! Steady—no—pull yet—your left hand best—left hand best—both together! Steady now! I'm going to take aim. There now. Steady. Bo—the-ration! he's gone.' Dived just when I was going to pull the trigger. Starry, you're an ass!'

'If you are to accuse me, in this manner, of faults of which I am entirely innocent,' said Starry, 'I will take the liberty of returning to the yacht, and leave you to prosecute the sport by yourself. I have almost exhausted my strength, endeavouring to perform my allotted work to your satisfaction; and all the return I get for my pains is to be called a blockhead and an ass, by one who has at least as great a claim to those titles as I have.'

'You're getting angry, are you?' said Bob. 'Well, I'll try to be more careful of how I speak the next time. Here's another one! No; it's the same one come up again. What a distance he has swum under the water! After him, Starry! We'll have him. Pull, you blockhead!—your right hand—no, your left—now, straight on. Don't make such a noise. Now we'll have him! Steady.'

'Fire!' cried Stewart, from the yacht.

Bob fired, but at the instant the bird dived, the shot striking the water about two boat-lengths from where he had been.

'Stewart!' cried Bob, starting up in the boat so suddenly that he almost capsized her,—'Stewart, you're a—a—beast! What did you mean—what did you mean, I say? What did you cry out that way for?'

'You wouldn't have hit him even if you had fired before he dived,' said Stewart; 'and why, man, there are lots more of them. Look! there he is up again; after him—you'll have him this time surely.'

'Come along, Starry,' said Bob; 'give me an oar, and we'll go where we won't be interfered with. See, yonder is a flock of them. Give me an oar, and we'll pull for them.'

'Put the muzzle of your gun over the gunwale, will you, Bob?' cried Stewart. 'You don't want your heads perforated, I suppose.'

'Hold you your tongue,' replied Bob. 'When you learn to use a gun yourself, you may dictate to other people; in the meantime, mind your own business. Come on, Starry. If I had my way of it, I would put both of them ashore, and let them find their way home as they liked. They'll look with clear eyes, however, the day either of them sees me asking him to come with us again next year, I can tell them. Come on, Starry! Pull.'

They pulled away towards the coast, and were soon out of hearing. Then we saw them pulling about hither and thither. We saw Bob standing up frequently, and gesticulating violently, and heard the occasional bang of a gun. By degrees, the distance between us increased, until the boat appeared only a black speck on the water.

As the dinner hour drew on, we expected they would have returned; but they apparently had no intention of doing so. I had all along had some misgivings regarding their expedition; but I now felt a strange undefined dread coming over me that it would have a tragic termination. I at first regarded this as a mere fancy; it assumed, however, a more tangible form when one of those damp mists which in summer sometimes fall on these coasts, suddenly overspread the sea. If the fog should continue, it was ten chances to one if they would find us.

'Stewart,' said I, 'this is rather serious. What is to be done?'

'I really don't know,' said Stewart. 'We'll knock up Archie.' Archie had gone some time ago to his berth. 'Perhaps he may be able to tell us how long there is any likelihood of its continuing. Hi—Archie—halloa! come up here for a moment, will you?'

'What's the matter wi' ye now?' cried Archie, from the forecabin. 'Can ye no let a pody sleep?'

'Come up, Archie, for a little, and see this fog,' said Stewart.

'Fog!' said Archie, putting his head up through the hatch. 'Oich! a mist. Well, what's about her?'

'Why, Archie, Mr. Martin and Starry—Mr. Crawford, I mean—are in the boat, more than a couple of miles away,—that's all.'

'They went away in the fog!' exclaimed Archie. 'Well, well! did ever anypody hear the likes of that?'

'They went away before the fog came on,' said Stewart, 'just a little after you went down yon time.'

'And what was tookin' them away?'

'They went to shoot, I believe. But that is not the question—it is,—What are we to do?'

'To shoot!—to shoot dookers, I suppose; and what was they going to do with the dookers—the dirty things? I have a taste in my mouth whiles yet with one I eat this time two year. Well, well! did ever anypody hear the likes of that? They went to shoot dookers! Well, of all the stupid pluckheads I ever seen (and I've seen a few), they is the stupidest!'

'But that is not the thing, Archie,' said Stewart. 'What are we to do?'

'Oich! what can ye do but wait till the fog'll went off? She's very wetting though—very—just like rain. I'll give ye my skins to put on.'

'Could we not take the sweeps and pull towards them?' said I.

'Oich! I suppose ye could,' said Archie. 'It's maybe your best plan. Man, but she's wetting, the mist! I'll bring ye my oilskins to keep ye dry. Yes, it's maybe your best plan. Hows'ever, I'm going to have my sleep out; and don't you be wakening me up the way ye've been doing every two meenutes. Ye can just do as ye were saying, and maybe ye'll meet in with them.'

We took the sweeps at once, and having noted by the compass the direction in which we had seen them last, we steered accordingly.

In about an hour we had attained the distance at which we had reckoned they had been; but we could see nothing of them. Any further use of the oars might now only serve to carry us farther from them. We abandoned the work, and waited anxiously, hoping that the mist might clear before night.

Night came—the mist was thicker than ever. There was now little hope of their finding us before next day at least. If, in the meantime, a breeze should rise, it might prove too much for the capacity of the boat; and if the fog should continue longer, there could be little doubt what their fate must be; for there could hardly be a prospect that they would fall in with us, or even be able to make the land; for they must long ago have lost every idea of the direction in which to steer. Our only hope was, that the mist might disperse before morning; and even in that case, there would be some danger of their lives; for, unaccustomed as they were to exposure, they must both be totally exhausted with cold and hunger.

We did all that could be done in the circumstances. We hoisted a light at the masthead. We then rummaged about for something with which to make a sound sufficiently loud to be heard at some distance. But we could find nothing, excepting an old key, which Stewart—with the fragment of a file, which he found in the forecabin—endeavoured to manufacture into a species of fire-arm, by filing a touch-hole at one end. But the file was worn away by use and age, and he had to abandon the design. We then tried whistling into it; and finding it to produce a tolerably loud sound, we continued it at intervals.

We felt painfully anxious. Even Archie manifested some concern. He came on deck, to keep his accustomed nocturnal watch. Stewart and I went below; and, throwing ourselves on the seats, endeavoured to obtain some repose. Stewart soon fell asleep; but I lay awake till long past midnight. We had a fire burning in the stove, and warm blankets ready; so that restorative means might be applied at once, if we should have the good fortune to fall in with them in the morning. The faint, flickering light which the fire shed around—the gentle heaving of the vessel—the dead stillness, broken alone by the low creaking of the cordage and the murmuring wash of the water, mingled confusedly in my mind with what seemed to me to be their all but certain fate. Towards morning I fell asleep, and dreamed that I was drifting, in an open boat, at sea—with a pair of human skeletons lying in the bottom.

DAYBREAK ON ZIDON.

A PLANET climbs from Hauran; one more fair
Rolls, orb'd in silver, down the sea-bathed sky,
Beyond a land of love and memory.

It sinks. A radiance, flushing earth and air,
Flames over Zidon! Crimson clothes the bare
Sands—the surf reddens—vanish from on high

The stars—yon garden feels a fruitful eye!

Behold! And hark! the call to morning prayer!

Men rise—the camel may no longer sleep—

The roused horse snorts for water. Ye who draw,

White vell'd, admiring how the weary roam,

Admire, but do not wander; rather keep

Unchanged your old hereditary law—

Remain among your people—dwell at home.

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

March 1, 1836.

GEORGE brought home a gentleman to dinner to-day, whom he has lately adopted as partner in his business. He is considerably older than George; and it seems that his acuteness and great general information, and, above all, his high legal knowledge, are things quite extraordinary. He has, moreover, an immense acquaintance among that sort of people with whom lawyers have most to do. So, though he brought no money, in immediate pounds, shillings, and pence, into the service, my husband seems well pleased with the prospective advantages offered by the connection. Notwithstanding all this, I don't care for Mr. Locke. A tall spare man, with a hard gray visage, cold eye, and dry manners, he wears to me rather a repulsive aspect. He has a hesitancy of manner, too, even when speaking on the most ordinary topics, as if he had something to cover up, which jars upon me. This is not the class of men that I fancy; but nice, out-spoken, happy-hearted (like George, for instance), who say what they mean, and feel kindly as they look, and who, if at times they do utter a quick word, think no more of it and have nought to hide. But I suppose it would not work well if the entire world were peopled with the same species of characters, however good and pleasant these might be. There must be individuals adapted for every different scene and circumstance, or the various affairs of this earth could never go on. For example, what would become of law if amity were universal? If there were no selfishness, no envy, no anger, no revengeful feelings, how many people might eat the bread of idleness—mayhap have no bread to eat at all? So, perhaps, it is better as it is, though I cannot reconcile myself to that concealed way which some persons affect. And, by-the-by, speaking of concealment, how is it that George never touches on the subject of that young woman, who seems to have the power of making herself very disagreeable, and of whom he yet cannot quite get rid? Only two evenings ago, I caught a glimpse of her again on the distant high road, in busy conversation with my husband as he was returning to dinner; and yet, upon his coming into the house, he forbore as usual any allusion to the matter! I was too proud to speak of it, after all that has past. Still, I puzzle myself—why should George have any secrets, and what can this one be?

To return to Mr. Locke. I have been thinking, if he were married (as by good luck he is not), what a curious unsatisfactory sort of a husband would he not make? With such an grand talent pour la reti- cence, his life would be all a secret together. It would be a constant game of hide-and-seek between him and his wife, and she would never know anything he was about from morning till night. What a dull stupid fireside theirs would be! No pleasant reciprocity of thought and feeling. I should not survive it a month.

But do any of this awfully taciturn genus, I wonder, ever enter the gates of wedlock? How could such men find time, or speech rather, for the work of courtship—that work which looks so like play, and is yet so serious, and will not be hurried over either, as a duty done by clockwork? Their wooing would needs be in some short abrupt style, like a piece of leger-demain—the lady being of course without a spark of fancy. No delightful small talk with these parties—no preliminary sighs or palpitations—no doubts or fears—no lovers' walks or lovers' quarrels; nothing but a few bald, plain-spoken words, coming at once to the extremest point. The only fitting resemblance to this mockery of courtship is the story of that eastern damsel's wooing by proxy—she who let down her pitcher from her shoulder, and gave the camels to drink, as told in the first book of the oldest record in the world. 'Wilt thou go with this man?' And she said, 'I will go.' Oh! it is dreary, dreary to think of! Then, if this frigid couple had ever any children, they would have no idea how to speak to them, as children love to be spoken to. They would give them clothes, and food, and lessons; but would never draw out their playful fancies, or quicken their latent affections. And so the poor boys and girls would grow up grave, unnatural, reserved, stunted things—like small apples withered by untimely frost—good for nothing save to perpetuate the stiff parental prototype. But stay, perhaps it is the very want of all these qualities which I am deploring that George values in Mr. Locke. He may be too abstractly intellectual to be imaginative—he may be too superior to be agreeable. His mind may be so crammed with the useful that there is no room for the ornamental. The excess of nutritive vegetation may not leave a corner for a single flower. Yet, in his own walk of life, he may be a paragon and a tower of strength. Casting my eyes back on past years, I remember my papa once remarking upon this very theme, and saying of some one he had met, 'He is a clever man—amazing erudition, a perfect mine of solid sense and judgment; but you could never have an hour's genial intercourse with him on a familiar footing. You might as well try to put an oak into a box of mignonette, and bid them both grow together.' Now, Mr. Locke seems to be exactly the counterpart of this. And it may be very right for George to choose an oak for his own purposes, but for my part I would far prefer the mignonette.

Mem.—I have always heard that children were excellent judges of character. I never understood till to-day what thorough physiognomists mere babies could be.

When Charlotte was brought into the dining-room after dinner, she was not long in fixing her eyes on Mr. Locke. The more she gazed, I could see that he grew less and less to her taste. She nestled close and closer to my arms, ever and anon stealing a scared furtive glance at the intruder; till once, when he chanced to turn round his face and gave her a cold uninterested look, she pursed up her mouth, and seemed on the eve of uttering a cry of alarm. I secretly hoped that Mr. Locke might not have observed the disagreeable impression he made upon my darling's mind. Whether he did or no, the only outward evidence he gave was a small sardonic smile, that perished almost as soon as it was born, and which somehow made his grim features grimmer and harsher than before. George says that men, absorbed in the momentous concerns of life, cannot be troubled with the littlenesses of children's ways. Yet I have heard of grave statesmen, with the burden of a nation's affairs on their shoulders (such as Pitt, Fox, and others), who not only did not disdain childish companionship, but became very children themselves in their hours of relaxation. Mr. Locke, however, is like none of these. The more the pity, say I.

March 25.

This is the first true spring day we have had, and I am enjoying it thoroughly out in the garden with the early flowers—the snowdrops, the crocuses, the primroses, and the budding bushes. The wind is west, the sun is brilliant, the birds are singing. I hear the cuckoo in the adjoining wood 'cuckoo! cuckoo!' and all nature is making a simultaneous start into green exuberant being. Now, what is it (I wonder could philosophers tell?) which causes that delicious thrill in the heart, rising in responsive sympathy with the season on a morning like this? It is not hope, nor joy, nor gratitude, nor love, nor any separate emotion, so much as a mingling of the thousand lights and shadows of our conscious sensibility. Have we a new element infused into our vitality; or is it that we sit more loose to our material frame at such a time, and are more permeated by the spiritual and divine? Mamma used to say that spring was all glad anticipation for the young, but all mournful memory for the old. And what did this imply, but just the potency of atmospheric influence upon the universal mind? Everybody knows Felicia Hemans' exquisite rendering of 'The Voice of Spring,' beginning with a joyous shout, as of a leaping sparkling fountain dashing about its silver spray in glorious wreaths, and then spreading in deeper, grander, more tender beauty, on to its solemn close—the great ocean of eternity! There is another poem I met with lately, on the same subject, whose melancholy tone arrested me. I shall transcribe it here as long as I remember it.

'SPRING.

'I fear thee, Spring! to feel thy fresh, soft wind
Go dallying o'er my cheek and round my brow;

To see thy glittering fingers' touch unbind
The icy seal on meadow, bush, and bough;
I fear, through nature's frame, the electric start;
I fear the awakening echo in my heart!

'For, as a stream long clasp'd by winter's chain,
Or herbage wither'd in the snow-clad field,
My drooping thoughts in sorrow's plight have lain,
And joy's sweet fount lone watching hath congeal'd;
And thou wilt loose the bands of wood and river,
But my soul's gloom, O Spring! wilt scatter never.

'I fear thee, Spring! The tender memories, gushing
From the heart's citadel, long dry and cold,
Come not as from the rock the flood came rushing
Soon as the Prophet's rod was rais'd of old;—
That blessed shower like Hope's sweet presage fell;
But tears are none in grief's unfathom'd well.

'I fear thee, Spring! I fear thy fitful brightness—
The faintest odours of thine opening flowers;
For ah! the loved that made my bosom's lightness
Gaze now on blossoms fairer far than ours!
For me, alas! no lovelier verdure waves
Than the soft grass that bends above their graves!

I have spread a shawl on the smooth young grass and set my baby thereon, propped up with cushions, leaving her free to use her eyes, and ply her arms at any sort of light work to which she has a mind. At present her dimpled hands are tugging with might and main at the blue woollen boots woven for her by my worshipful self at odd intervals.

Query—How is it that babies are so fond of seizing hold of things, pulling at them, and, if possible, tearing them to pieces? Phrenologists would tell us it was the early development of the acquisitive and combative organs. Now these are not very pretty qualities. Yet certain it is Charlotte never looks so defiantly happy as when her restless fingers are intent on destruction. At this moment, she is uttering such a shrill scream of satisfaction, that I am fain to turn away my head and cover up my ears from the dissonance. And yet, sooth to say, there is a touch of music in it too, at least to a mother's perception, inasmuch as the wild ringing of the little voice proves that the legion springs in the corporeal mechanism are all in sound active order. Soon, however, the fledgeling energies are exhausted. Then comes the reaction. Fatigue, with fretfulness occasionally, supervenes upon the boisterous epoch. The head droops, the half-closed eyes become gradually unconscious of outward objects, the face loses its roseate hue, the faculties grope and linger irresolute on the borders of the real and tangible—the dim precincts which divide the waking and sleeping worlds—till at last the heavy lids close gently down. The waxen arms lie motionless by the side, and with a long drawn breath the announcement is made that the infant has dropped asleep.

And now that she has sunk into slumber in my lap, inhaling the scent of flowers on the balmy breeze—now that I fix my gaze earnestly on the fair smooth countenance, white as a lily (all babies do grow so white when they sleep!—now that I am alone with this pure spirit of humanity beneath the blue canopy,—I fall a-thinking, for the thousandth time, what may be my daughter's destiny in the distant years? Here not unnaturally the thought arises, will the dower of beauty be hers? Will she grow up a creature of loveliness, and will her mind partake the outward excellence—so that she shall indeed realise the poet's description,

'Made to enchant all hearts and charm all eyes'?

And again, is this birthright of beauty really so desirable? Some have said it is a fatal gift. We cannot tell. Mankind may err in their intense desire after it, as they err in their coveting of gold and other perishing possessions. But I for one shall rejoice with moderation should Charlotte turn out pre-eminent in charms, remembering that there is no boon lavishly bestowed which has not its attendant drawbacks. If, on the contrary, my darling should grow up to womanhood with very ordinary features, and be even remarkable for plainness, I shall not repine, hoping for counterbalancing advantages. Yet, looking at her as she now lies before me, with that delicate contour of visage, and rounded outline of form, how can I imagine she will ever be other than she is at this moment,

'A thing of beauty and a joy for ever'

April 1.

George has been from home on business for the last two days—more than a hundred miles off. He was summoned by a gentleman, who thought himself dying, to draw out his will. Now, I am somewhat interested in this visit of my husband's, inasmuch as Mr. Halliday, to whom he has gone, resides in the house in which my Mr. Grey used to live, having purchased it of the trustees shortly after my old friend's death. I believe this gentleman is quite a hypochondriac, who every now and then takes it into his head that his end is approaching, and needlessly alarms himself and his friends about fantastic maladies which he is sure will end fatally. I know that his sole reason for purchasing 'The Grove' was that he fancied the air particularly salubrious in that quarter—having taken note of several very aged persons who had been born and lived and died in the neighbourhood. Ten to one if his present ailment is serious; only, as George has not yet returned, it is possible he waits to do the work for which he was sent.

Yesterday being wet, and nothing particular to occupy me in George's absence, after an early dinner, and a long colloquy with Charlotte, I ascended to the large garret at the top of the house. By-the-by, I do not know if I have mentioned this room before. Indeed, I was not aware of its existence myself till I had been a good many weeks here; and, conceiving it as merely a receptacle for lumber, I never thought of paying it a visit. When I did go to spy out the land, I was surprised to discover several pieces of furniture, of whose existence I was either ignorant or had totally forgotten them. Being hurried, however, at the time, I could not stay to make any special inspection. Last afternoon, however, the thought recurred most opportunely. So I went up determinately, and opening the door on the bed-room landing-place with the large key I had purposely brought,

I climbed the rather steep flight of stairs which this door encloses, and speedily found myself in the isolated chamber. The first thing that struck me on entering was the atmospheric haze that brooded over the interior, involving every object in dusky obscurity. The window is small; I am sorry to add it was so dirty, little wonder the light was dingy and defective. I stood looking round a few minutes, and then concluded to examine a large oak-chest standing in a corner, which somehow I recollected having seen before, though when and where I could not tell. The moment I lifted the lid, the veil of memory was lifted too. And straightway the remembrance came that about the time of my marriage, various heterogeneous articles had been here deposited, not of immediate use, and therefore the more liable to suffer neglect. Of these, it appeared that books and papers formed the staple, though other things had been stowed away into corners of the capacious box, which indeed in its breadth and bulk reminded me of Genevra and the mistletoe bough!

I do not know how long I rummaged, for I took no note of time, among the olla podrida of this chest—ever lighting upon some relic of my childhood's home, with which I had been unwilling to part;—now an ivory needlecase, the gift of a dear school companion far across the sea—now a sewed cushion, with colours well nigh faded, the handiwork of a mother long laid beneath the sod. As the search proceeded, I felt most grateful in being perfectly alone; for, so quick and varied were my emotions, I should not have liked any one to have been present—not even George.

Mem.—Talk as people will of independence of thought and speech, as being the birthright of the human race, there come seasons, to the experience of every one of us, when all this boasted liberty dwindles into a shadow—when influences, over which we have no control, rise like viewless airs, we know not whence, and sway our finer sensibilities hither and thither without question or resistance. Who compares the soul to a watch, or a musical instrument, or to any other piece of mechanism, however delicate and complicated? It is a poor imperfect simile. For whereas we know the agencies which, when brought to bear on the lyre or timepiece, must produce particular results, we know neither the causes which may agitate the soul, nor the effects which these may engender. One philosopher laughed at every new contingency he witnessed in life. Another wept. Each believed himself the wisest. The majority are content to steer a middle-course, keeping their smiles for days of sunshine—their tears for nights of gloom. But oh! how immeasurable, how indefinable, is that emotional expanse within the heart (of which memory and imagination hold the rule) which is subject to no special ascendancy, either of joy or grief, but is changing as the autumn cloud, and evanescent as the snow-flake on the river!

I lighted upon an Æolian harp, the bare sight of which caused the blood to rush to my face, and my pulses to tingle—so vividly was it connected with the olden time, when my father used to sit of evenings listening to its fantastic minstrelsy; while I, a thoughtless child, dressed my doll on a stool at his knee. I felt quite old myself in looking at that harp.

Next my hand came upon a large volume which I did not at first recognise. I opened it, and read on the title page, 'R. Grey, 1797.' (He must have been a young man then.) And on the fly-leaf was written, in the cramped penmanship of advancing age, 'Miss Atherton, with every kind wish, August 2d, 1832.' This was one of the books—there were many of them—which had fallen to me from my too generous benefactor. It was Shakspeare—a handsome, massive copy—with my own pencil markings visible here and there on the margin, signalling favourite passages. I toyed with it a few minutes pensively, and was about to replace it in the chest, when a loose sheet came fluttering from between the boards, and fell at my feet. I picked it up, and saw a picture. I carried it to the window, when it proved to be a beautiful water-colour portrait, executed with great skill and taste. The tints were slightly faded; but the tout ensemble, even at a first glance, struck me as most interesting and pleasing. A boy was seated on a rustic bench beneath a tree, modelling the hull of a miniature ship. In his hand was a short knife with a broad blade coming abruptly to a point; while around him lay scattered on the green turf the refuse fragments—small splinters and shavings of wood which had been evolved during the operation. But he was not working just then; he was looking up—a bright, earnest, happy face, with dark curling hair, and eyes in which sweetness and intelligence shone out in rich combination. As I gazed, I felt irresistibly attracted to the charming countenance; and, holding it nearer and nearer to the light, I discovered at length some writing at the foot of the page. The words I read were these:—'Stephen Grey, at the age of seven years.' Stephen Grey, I repeated meditating. Then, then, was the likeness of the son whom I had disinherited! So fair and engaging in childhood, could he indeed have turned out so unworthy in maturity? I ruminated long and seriously over this. At last I walked slowly to the oak repository, shut down the heavy lid, and, taking with me the portrait and the Æolian harp, retraced my steps by the precipitous staircase.

Once more in the drawing-room, I looked out and perceived that the rain had ceased, and a light breeze had sprung up toward sunset. I placed the lyre on the outer ledge of the window, rang for my baby, and, when she was brought, took her in my lap and showed her the pretty picture of the boy. Soon the wind began to do its duty; and we sat listening to the wild music which played fitfully from the harp strings, until the twilight had fairly sunk into night. When the first star came out, I found that Charlotte had dropped asleep in my arms. Still, I did not move; but looked alternately at the portrait and at my slumbering child, while the sweet, strange melody went waiving on in my ears.

THE ROYAL EDINBURGH HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN.

I CAN scarcely imagine a more painful sight than that of a little, helpless, suffering child. The merry smile has faded, and the innocent playfulness has ceased; and instead, there comes upon the pretty little face a strangely old expression, touchingly sorrowful in its beauty. And when the twinges of pain become more severe, when the features are contorted, when the limbs quiver, and the cry of agony is uttered, his heart is hard indeed who can look upon the little sufferer emotionless. Yet the diseases common to children are many, and the sight of a suffering child is not a rare one. Indeed, it might almost be said that the life of a child, from its birth until it reaches the age of six or eight, is one long disease. These diseases of childhood are not peculiar to the children of one class of people—they are common to all. But the ability to procure proper medical aid is not shared in common. There is a class of people to whom it is a hard struggle to procure the daily bread; and when sickness enters among them, it is often permitted to spread itself, simply because they have not the wherewithal to procure the necessary assistance to stay its progress. Very true, that in every town of any importance there is an hospital to which children can be sent, and where they will receive able medical treatment. But it is almost unnecessary to say that the common run of hospitals are not the best places to which the children of the poor might be sent. The diseases of children and their treatment are so peculiar that an ordinary hospital is scarcely suited for them.

In many of the leading Continental towns, and in a few of our own cities, this truth has been realised, and hospitals have been established exclusively for the reception and treatment of sick children. In every place where such institutions have been established, they have been found of great service, not only in curing the sick, so that their diseases might not be communicated to others, but also in the advancement of medical science.

As the existence of these institutions, and the benefits to the communities among which they have been established, are not so widely known as they deserve to be, I purpose, in the present paper, to lay before the readers of the Miscellany a few facts connected with the establishment of one of them—the Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Sick Children. I select this hospital, in preference to any other, for the simple reason that I am more intimately acquainted with it than I have the means of being with any other; and, consequently, my information is the more likely to be correct. But I believe the principles upon which this and kindred institutions are managed to be somewhat similar; so that, though these remarks are confined solely to the Edinburgh hospital, they will, perhaps, give a pretty fair idea of the manner in which such institutions are generally conducted, and the good results of which they are the cause.

During the year 1859, and for some time previously, the attention of the public of Edinburgh was directed to the necessity which existed for the establishment of a sick children's hospital. It was shown by statistics that, of all the children born in Edinburgh and Leith, nearly one-half died before attaining six years of age. A meeting of those favourable to the establishment of such an institution was convened, and, immediately afterwards, a sum exceeding £2,000 was subscribed for that purpose. Directors having been appointed, they, after some difficulties, succeeded in leasing a building suitable for the purposes contemplated; and, on 15th February 1860, it was opened as the Edinburgh Hospital for Sick Children. The objects of the institution, as contained in the constitution and rules, are threefold, viz.—

(1.) To provide for the reception, maintenance, and medical treatment of the children of the poor during sickness, and to furnish with advice and medicine those who cannot be admitted into the hospital. (2.) To promote the advancement of medical science with reference to the diseases of childhood; and to provide for the more efficient instruction of students in this department of knowledge. (3.) To diffuse among all classes of the community, and chiefly among the poor, a better acquaintance with the management of infants and children during health or sickness; and to assist in the education and training of women in the special duties of children's nurses.

The institution is governed by a general court of contributors, who meet annually for the election of office-bearers—consisting of a president, vice-president, an honorary secretary, an honorary treasurer (who are also directors ex officio), and an auditor; also, twenty-four directors, eight of whom retire annually; and five trustees, in whom the property and funds of the hospital are vested. Other general business is likewise transacted at the annual meeting.

The general management of the affairs of the hospital is vested in the directors, who appoint their own chairman, and select from among themselves a committee of management, composed of not less than nine members. The secretary and treasurer are members of the committee of management. The whole of the hospital officials are appointed by the directors. A medical committee is likewise appointed by the directors annually.

There is also a ladies' committee, nominated by the directors. This committee appoint from among themselves lady visitors, whose duties are to visit the hospital, to examine into the efficiency of the arrangements, and to inscribe in a book kept for the purpose, any observations or suggestions that may occur to them, for the consideration of the directors or committee of management; also, 'to revise, half-yearly, along with the matron, the stock of household and cooking utensils, bed-clothing, &c. within the hospital, in order to ascertain whether or not they are sufficient in quantity and in good order, and to report accordingly.'

The internal management of the hospital is under the care of two consulting physicians, a consulting surgeon, three ordinary physicians, a surgeon dentist, a resident medical officer, a matron, and nurses. The ordinary physicians are on duty, one after the other, in regular succession, and the changes take place once every three months. The acting ordinary physician visits the hospital daily, and sees and prescribes for all the in-patients, whom he also admits and dismisses. He superintends the dispensary, seeing and prescribing for whatever out-patients the resident medical officer may bring under his notice, or others, according to his own discretion; and this whether the patients are in waiting at the hospital, or at their own homes. He has also to observe that the resident medical officer keeps the hospital books properly; to give clinical instruction to the pupils in attendance at the hospital; and he must not absent himself from duty without finding one of his colleagues as a substitute. He may invite the consulting physicians and consulting surgeon to attend along with him, and advise or operate upon a patient, if necessary.

The resident medical officer must be unmarried, and a registered medical practitioner. He resides constantly in the hospital. His duties are to visit the patients every morning and evening, or oftener if required; to accompany the acting ordinary physician in his visits; receive directions as to the management and treatment of patients; and see that they are attended to. He has also to keep the hospital books; dispense medicines for patients in the house in emergencies; and also, if necessary, to prescribe. Under the acting ordinary physician he prescribes for out-door patients, and visits them at their homes when necessary, keeping a register of them in the hospital books. He must not absent himself from the hospital without the consent of the acting physician.

The matron also resides in the hospital. Her duties are to look after all the household work, and the furniture, linen, &c.; to inspect the wards twice a day, and superintend the nurses. If requested by the acting ordinary physician, she must accompany him on his visits to his patients, and see that his directions are carried out by the nurses.

The nurses are engaged on condition of receiving a written certificate from the medical committee, after a month from the date of their hiring, of their then competency to discharge their duties. None are appointed who cannot read and write. They keep an inventory of every article in their respective wards, which is examined once a quarter, and certified by the matron. They take care that the beds of the patients are kept clean and decent; and that their wards, furniture, and utensils are cleaned and in order every day, by eight o'clock in the morning in summer, and by half-past eight o'clock in winter. 'It shall be the duty of every nurse, not merely to tend the children with gentle firmness and care, but also, by all means, to keep them cheerful and contented; and while impatience, ill-temper, or anger towards the patients will be followed by dismissal, the inability generally to make children happy will, of itself, be regarded as a sufficient cause for not retaining a nurse in the service of the hospital.'

There is, besides, a dispenser, who attends the hospital daily, at a fixed hour, to make up all prescriptions; to give to the out-door patients their medicines, and prepare the medicines prescribed for the in-door patients.

Out-door patients of any age, from birth to twelve years, are attended at the dispensary, or at their homes, if necessary. The name, age, sex, residence, and disease of every out-patient is entered in a book for the purpose.

Children of both sexes, between the ages of two and eight years, are admitted as ordinary in-patients. Children to the age of twelve years are admitted in special cases. Patients on whose behalf application is made for admission into the hospital, must be presented at the dispensary hour; but, in certain cases, the resident medical officer is authorised to admit them at any time. A register of in-patients is kept, similar to that of out-patients, with the addition of the dates of admission and discharge. A detailed account of each case is also kept, by the resident medical officer, in the hospital case-book. Each patient has a number in the books, which is inscribed on a ticket placed on his or her bed. On this ticket are also inscribed the name of the patient, the disease, and the diet. There are separate rooms for convalescents, patients whose diseases are not infectious, and patients whose diseases are infectious. The parents or guardians of the children are expected to provide the necessary clothing, and to take away such soiled clothing as the matron may direct; but there is an exception to this in the case of patients suffering from infectious diseases. Clothes are provided for these while in the hospital; and their own clothes, in which they were admitted, are washed and disinfected, and returned on the discharge of the patient. Patients who die in the hospital are removed by their friends; but when they have been recommended for admission by a public body, that body is bound to take charge of the burial.

The parents or nearest relatives of in-patients, not exceeding two in number at one time, are admitted to the hospital at certain hours; but in special cases, the acting ordinary physician, the resident medical officer, or the matron, may admit them at any time; and this is always readily granted under circumstances really justifying it.

No one connected with the hospital is allowed, directly or indirectly, on any pretence whatever, to accept of any fee or gratuity, from the parents or relatives of the patients, or from persons supplying the hospital with goods or furnishings.

It is intended that pupil nurses shall be admitted to the hospital 'for such period and on such terms as may be considered advisable,' to be trained and educated in the special duties of children's nurses; and these, if considered worthy at the expiration of their period of instruction, shall receive from the committee of management a testimonial, designed to recommend them for usefulness in private families, and which shall bear the signatures of the chairman of the committee and of the medical officers of the hospital.' I am not aware that any pupil nurses have as yet been admitted. I rather think there have not been any, on account of the limited accommodation.

Medical pupils are admitted to the hospital under certain conditions.

These are the leading features in the method of management adopted in the hospital. Let us now see what has been done since the opening of the institution, on 15th February 1860. From that date until 1st January last, being the date of the last published report, there have been admitted into the hospital no fewer than 582 patients. The numbers in each year were:—

From 15th Feb. 1860 to 1st Jan. 1861,.....	154

In order to realise the full importance of these figures, it must be borne in mind that the number of beds regularly available in the hospital has been hitherto, at most, only 23, and for some time considerably less; although, on occasions of great urgency, more than 23 patients have been in the hospital at one time.

Besides in-patients, there have been treated, at the dispensary and at their own homes, out-patients to the number of 7,015:—

Showing an average, in the last year, of 300·10 monthly. The lowest number of patients treated, at the dispensary or at their own homes, in any one month since the opening of the hospital, was 35—in March 1860, when the hospital was only newly opened. Since that time the number of out-patients has been almost constantly increasing. In September last, the number was 389; in October, 405; in November, 351; and in December, 392.

These figures will give an idea of the benefits which this institution has already conferred upon the poor of Edinburgh. But there are many others which no tabular statements can approach, for it is impossible to say how many lives have been spared through the treatment received by patients at this hospital,—not only the lives of the patients themselves, but others to whom the infectious diseases might have been communicated.

In regard to the ages and sexes of the patients, it is worthy of remark that the number of in-patients between six and seven years of age is higher than that at any other age. There appears to be a gradual increase until the age of seven is reached, and then a gradual decrease. The ages of the patients, in each year, have varied from between one and two years to between eleven and twelve. The ages during which children were entitled to be admitted were fixed originally as between two and eight years; but the peculiar circumstances attending many cases, below and above these limits, were considered sufficient to warrant the admission of the patients under two and above twelve years. A considerable majority of the in-patients are females, while the majority of the out-patients are males. There are no figures in the annual reports of the hospital which furnish the exact majority of female over male patients admitted annually. The relative numbers of male and female out-patients stand thus:—

Male out-patients treated during 1860.....	486
1861.....	1,252
1862.....	1,839
	—3,577
Female out-patients treated during 1860,...	499
1861,...	1,168
1862,...	1,771
	—3,438
Total.....	7,015

Making a majority of male out-patients to the number of 139.

Among the out-patients, the highest number treated appears to be under one year. The number of out-patients under one year, from the opening of the hospital till the last day of 1862, is 1,458. (In 1860, 188; in 1861, 557; in 1862, 713—1,458.) Above one year there is a gradual decrease till we come to the maximum age of twelve years. At that age the number treated during the same period amounts to only 57. (In 1860, 10; in 1861, 24; in 1862, 23—57.)

The hospital is supported almost entirely by public subscriptions and donations. A bazaar was held in December 1861, for behoof of the hospital, from which a sum of £1,420 : 1s. was realised.

The directors having often experienced considerable inconvenience from the want of sufficient accommodation, it was unanimously resolved, at the annual meeting in January 1861, that a fund should be established for the purpose of building an hospital of the requisite size and accommodation. An appeal was issued to the public, and responded to in such a manner that in May 1861 the directors were enabled to purchase Meadowside House, of which they obtained possession in May 1862. The bazaar above referred to was in aid of the building fund. The necessary alterations having been made, the new hospital was opened the other day, as 'The Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Sick Children'—Her Majesty having become patroness of the institution, and sanctioned the adoption of that designation.

In regard to the new hospital, the annual report, published in January 1862, says:—'The ground extends to nearly an acre, and slopes towards the Meadows, with which it is intended to open a communication. A large play-ground, having a southern exposure, and remarkably well sheltered, is provided for convalescent children; and, according to plans which have been prepared by Mr. David MacGibbon, architect, the house is capable of being altered so as to furnish forty beds for patients, including a separate fever ward. In addition to this accommodation for patients, there is ample provision for a dispensary, resident-surgeon, matron, nurses, bath-room, &c.; while great care has been bestowed by the architect on the arrangement of all the wards and rooms, and in providing the most approved system of ventilation.'

Some-time ago I paid a visit to the old hospital, and I could not but admire the manner in which everything was arranged. Many of the little patients were propped up with pillows, and amusing themselves with toys, which are very properly supplied 'to while away their weary, waking hours.'

The blessings which this institution has already showered upon the people of Edinburgh—rich as well as poor—directly and indirectly, are very great. The poor have had their children treated by the leading medical men of the city, and provided with almost everything which could assist in their convalescence; while the wealthy have had their children treated by men who have now better opportunities for studying the diseases of children, and consequently they are better able to understand and administer to those diseases than they possibly could be before the establishment of the Sick Children's Hospital. Wherever such institutions have been reared, they have been found immensely useful. People only require to understand their objects to appreciate these hospitals, and it is with the view of diffusing a little information in regard to them that this paper appears in the pages of the Miscellany. LOVE'S PSALM.

THERE are poems in the mountains,
And in the waving trees;
In the silver-springing fountains;
In the winds' melodies;
In the day's resplendent light;
In sunset and sunrise;
In the solemn hush of night;
In heaven's glittering eyes;
In the boundless, ageless sea;
In foam-wreathed waterfall;—
Throughout Nature's works by me
Poems are read in all !
But oh! the grandest of all these
Is that still psalm that lies,
Breathing an ecstasy of peace
Within thy dovelike eyes!

W. COOK SPENCER.

UP THE MISSISSIPPI TO NEW-ORLEANS.

PART III.

IN my last paper, I diverged somewhat abruptly from the subject of New-Orleans to that of Entomology; but my reader may trust my affirmation that the subject was not altogether irrelevant to the title of the article. But having fairly arrived at the city, and safely passed through the first night's trying ordeal, it will now be our duty to make the most of our trip, and, as a professional tourist would say, to 'do' New-Orleans.

The arrival of an armed English vessel, at a time when English subjects were trembling for the safety of their persons and property, was hailed with no small demonstration. The inhabitants had longed for some friendly hand, if not to stretch them material aid, at least to grant them sympathy, and exercise some moral force over the further lawless proceedings of the Union power, which was not simply that of martial law, but an absolute and despotic monarchy. And, whilst we could not hide from ourselves the fact that the South had for years held an embittered hatred towards England and everything English—that the man who now on his bended knees begged our nation to give him a nationality, had, within the memory of every one, cursed our abolitionism and denounced our aristocracy,—how could we, with a Briton's heart, look quietly on the execrable doings of one of the sternest military chiefs who ever wielded authority, without a feeling of indignation that he should be of a race with ourselves, or that his shameless mandates should have been couched in the Anglo-Saxon tongue?

Our officers and crew were lionised. Crowds flocked to the wharf during the day, and seemed to satiate their vision with gazing on that millennial flag which adorned the peak; 'loafers,' that numerous class of indescribables who flock American cities by thousands, were found at earliest dawn staring at us with an air of professional criticism; whilst, nightly, flocks of men, women, and children assembled together to join in a choral detestation of their presiding Government, and repeated assertions that they were

'A band of brothers,
Native to the soil,
Fighting for the property
We gain'd by honest toil.'

Whatever truth we may attach to the latter portion of the strain, it is certainly a fact that no small portion of the 'band' was composed of sisters! These midnight orgies were frequently and successfully cut short by a raid of police, and woe to the luckless wight whose lips were caught incautiously uttering a meed of praise in favour of 'Jeff.'

We were frequently treated to 'My Maryland,' 'The bonnie blue Flag,' 'The Volunteer,' and others of Secession birth; but perhaps the most curious fragments of song ever born of rebellion were those in which the principal oppressors were each condemned to his own peculiar punishment, in a tune as unique as the castigation. Although somewhat unchristian in sentiment, and what my readers may perhaps deem not altogether orthodox, I cannot refrain from a sample, to the tune of 'Old John Brown'—

'Drown Abe Lincoln in the Mississippi;
Drown Abe Lincoln in the Mississippi;
Drown Abe Lincoln in the Mississippi—
As we go marching on.

Singing glory, glory, hallelujah!
Glory, glory, hallelujah!
Glory, glory, hallelujah!
As we go marching on.

Hang old Butler on a sour apple tree;
Hang old Butler on a sour apple tree;
Hang old Butler on a sour apple tree—
As we go marching on.

Singing glory, glory, hallelujah! &c.

Chain Major Stafford to a black nigger woman;
Chain Major Stafford to a black nigger woman;
Chain Major Stafford to a black nigger woman—
As we go marching on.

Singing glory, glory, hallelujah! &c.

And so on, ad infinitum.

These were the lower classes, the canaille, of New-Orleans; but they did not the less on that account represent the prevailing sentiment of the educated and more wealthy portions of the community, who, though in less public manner and more refined tone, yet proclaimed their contempt at the treatment received from those who did not hesitate to outrage every rule of modern warfare, and act upon that everyday yet erroneous and absurd dogma which holds everything as 'fair in war.'

But, while thus briefly dwelling on our reception, I must not forget to give some slight sketch of the city itself—a city interesting not less from its present position in the Southern rebellion than from its former history of colonization, and of progress in all the 'arts of war and peace.' Ranking among the most important commercial cities in North America—being the great market-town for the Southern and Western territories, as also the abode of wealth, luxury, and refinement, and the seat of America's 'democratic aristocracy' (which, by the way, is not wholly the 'aristocracy of colour,' as a recent popular writer would have us believe)—it claims no second place among the objects of interest to the traveller in the Western World. There is little, certainly, to be done in that style of peregrination termed 'sight-seeing,' and still less when the ruling powers had closed not only the theatres and opera, but even the churches, and prevented all ingress and egress to the outskirts of the city, except under the strictest surveillance.

Of public buildings there are but few to boast of, either as regards solidity of structure or beauty of architectural design. One or two hotels of that mammoth description found in Yankeland, the City Hall in St. Charles-street, the Opera, several churches of modern erection, and the Customhouse (as yet unfinished) include nearly all the public edifices of note. It is, however, from no want of municipal enterprise that such scarcity of architectural decoration exists.

but from a want of the material, which has to be brought from the North. The Southerners have always had a great aversion to such dependency—long indeed before such aversion grew into hatred, or such hatred grew into open rebellion.

In New-Orleans—as in New-York, Baltimore, and other large American cities—the more modern style of street travelling is adopted;—I refer to the railroad cars; which, in spite of the late aspersions upon the sanity of Mr. Train when endeavouring to introduce them into England, are found to work admirably, and are certainly a most comfortable mode of travel. They are clean and neatly kept, are well cushioned, and in every respect preferable to our omnibuses at home. Nor is the tariff of fare higher—the charge for riding any distance within or immediately around the city being five cents. One cannot fail to remark the total absence of all rural scenery in the neighbourhood of this Southern metropolis. Its peculiar situation precludes all country seats, pasture fields, and lowing herds; and one may wander far before he hears 'the milkmaid's song' in the vicinity of New-Orleans. The planters rarely reside on their plantations, except during the working season—preferring a city life to the isolated and monotonous one on their estates. To take 'a walk into the country' is a feat nearly impossible; for you are soon interrupted by swamps, lagoons, or miles of sugar-cane. But if, by enterprise, these are overcome, there but lies before you the endless rolling prairie, or the interminable 'forest primeval.'

The periodical press issues several daily newspapers, and one or two tri-weeklies and hebdomadals; together with some magazines, of general and class interest. The French and Dutch population have also their 'organs.' The state of the press, however, under martial law, could not be seen to any advantage. All freedom of utterance was suppressed, and Fort-Jackson ball and chain held in terrorem for the luckless editor who should dare to mutter a syllable against the ruling authority; and, during my stay, a 'daily' was more than once suppressed, for daring to breathe, in strictly neutral tones, a fervent wish that the bloodshed should soon terminate, 'if even by mediation of European Powers.'

The population of New-Orleans is, perhaps, the most curious of any one city in point of diversity. It consists chiefly of two parts—French and American; the former occupying the older and lower portion of the town; the latter the upper portion or 'west end,' which it really is, consisting of buildings of more modern and agreeable style. The distinction between those two parts of the city is well marked, being separated by the principal thoroughfare—Canal-street,—a very broad and magnificent street; and I have been assured by several residents, that so completely do the French isolate themselves from the other portions of the community, that there lived not a few of the old French settlers who had never once crossed the 'Rue Canal'! Many Spaniards also live in the lower parts of the town, where the houses are of ancient and foreign construction, and where the manners, language, and customs of its people are preserved in all their individual purity. Indeed, there are many parts in New-Orleans where it would be hard for a stranger to believe that he was in an American city. There are also Germans, Creoles,* and coloured races of every hue, from the bright complexion of the 'yellow girl'—which renders her descent somewhat dubitable to an unpractised eye—to the burnished ebony of the unmistakable 'nigger.' Every civilised nation in the world has a representative in New-Orleans; and it is remarkable to witness how totally distinct they remain in those features characteristic of their countries. Their individual languages are retained with a jealous pertinacity. According to the part of the town you inhabit, your dirty clothes are sent to a 'washerwoman,' a 'blanchisseuse,' or a 'wischerin,' and you are measured for new ones by a 'tailor,' 'tailleur,' or 'schneider.' If by chance a dinner-party should assemble—a company of frigid Englishmen, æsthetic 'Crapauds,' and intriguing Spaniards—there is just as sure to be one end of the table occupied with imperturbable calculation, and another with gesticular raving, while the third party are grouped together in some deeply laid conspiracy, each in his own language and style. Nor is this any fault in society or an outrage on its usages, but an inherent custom alone. There are few residents in New-Orleans but can speak more than one language fluently, and few nations can boast of an education more eminently polite than that of the Southerner. A curious patois of the French language is spoken by the negro servants in French families; it is called 'Creole French,' and is little more than the 'baby talk' of that language formed into a kind of idiom.

New-Orleans has been designated 'a modern Babylon' by more than one writer, but for what reason does not so readily appear. I know too little of it either to support such an assertion or to defend its morality. Statistics, however, of police reports go far to show that, unlike the great Chaldean bagnio, it holds no maternal relation to that class of unfortunates which earned for Babylon its infamous soubriquet; as—numerous though they may be—but few can claim ancestral relations to New-Orleans; nor are they permitted—in all defiance of social outcry, the disgust of every finer feeling, and abhorrence and contempt

* I would make a remark on the word 'Creole,' lest any of my readers ever fall into the egregious error I did on my first visit to New-Orleans, or expose their woful ignorance in a manner which may not only mortify their pride but lead them into serious embarrassment. It is in vain to look for any accurate definition of this word in a dictionary; and if the reader has been accustomed—as I believe is most general—either to regard the 'Creole' as a West Indian by birth or as a mixture of white and black blood, he will pay no compliment to the Louisianians. I shall not so soon forget having been told one evening, by a Southern lady, that the Creoles are the most beautiful women of the South; and while looking somewhat aghast at hearing what appeared a very wonderful statement, I was informed, with the utmost degree of naïveté, that she herself was a Creole! In Louisiana, a Creole means any one born in the State whose parents were not.

of the more virtuous of their sex—to ply their avocation on the public streets, and flaunt their tawdry trappings under the very eyes of authority. If the evil is not thereby diminished in itself, it is certainly diminished in its attendants; and one sense, at least, is gratified by their absence. It may not, after all, be that severe and shameful punishment, as it at first appears, which Major-General Butler, in his 'infamous' order, pronounced upon those females who should, 'by word, deed, or gesture, insult any officer or soldier of the United States,' seeing that it was only to prevent them from walking the streets. Let us trust, for the honour of that nation which he represented, and the humanity of a commander in this nineteenth century, that such was its true construction. What a pity that the diction of such an order should be at all ambiguous!

It is true that the city was occasionally overrun by scoundrels who could murder, lie, and steal; and that, either through leniency in the administration of the State, or want of activity in the detective authorities, they too often escaped their merited rewards. But where is the city like New-Orleans free from such? Where is the great mercantile and speculative community which does not offer abundant opportunities for vice to thrive at the expense of honesty, or support its gambling-houses and haunts of debauchery? It is also too true that many who appear in society, with every air of refinement and respectability, hesitate not, on a Sabbath evening, to take a hand in a 'rubber,' to listen to sectarian ballads, or even to join in the mazy waltz. But is it not so in La Belle France, of which these are natives or descendants? And is the Parisian opera not open on Sunday evening, as well as others? This is certainly no defence; but why should moralists travel so far to discover errors so near home? I do not, however, write on morality.

The French Creole population possess an air of languidness and ennui, rivalled, I believe, only by those 'dark-eyed senioritas of Cuba,' who 'Sleep all the morn to gild the eve of day.'

Many of them, however, are really pretty—a redeeming trait which, in spite of every poetic description, is rare in a Cuban.

The Creole men have nothing, however, to recommend them. They are generally of an effeminate cast; and, while their more hardy brethren had gone to the war, they seemed to prefer a life at home, talking of rebellion and treason—leaving their braver fellow-citizens to defend their soil from the onward march of the invader.

PICTURES IN THE FIRE.

A FIERCE wind is blowing, and heavy rain is falling—adding to the wild music of the wind, as it whistles among the house-tops and down the chimneys. With a thud, thud, thud, it beats upon the windows, as they shiver and rattle in their casements, through the fury of the blast; while, at every fresh gust, the gas-light flickers, and the smoke from the fire sweeps out into the room. It is impossible to read. I draw a cloak around me, and sit gazing on the glowing embers as they burn in the grate. They seem to form themselves into intelligible pictures. Sometimes a well-remembered face is visible, bearing the old familiar expression upon it. I can trace the features of the friends of my school-days; and they seem to smile upon me in recognition. Then the old games we played are joined in once more. The buoyancy and thoughtlessness of earlier days return, and we indulge in the merry pranks of old. There is the face of one I loved with all the fervour of a schoolboy. We wander once again, as we used to do, chatting and laughing gaily. Care and thought we have none beyond the moment. A summer sun smiles upon us, spreading its genial influence around. With light hearts, we run and tumble in the green fields—among the daisies and the buttercups, which we pluck, and then toss carelessly away. Everything ministers to our pleasure and adds to our happiness. The old lays are sung, and the old stories are told. But the picture begins to fade, and soon is altogether gone. Memory fills up the blank, connecting the past with the present. Our school-days are ended, and we part—many of us never to see each other again. Some are in the city, poring over the dreary ledger, or haunting the marts of commerce. One is tilling the soil, and reaping the golden grain. One is ministering to the spiritual, and another to the bodily wants of his fellows; and still another is studying the dry details of law. Some have sought employment in foreign lands—one among the hordes of China, and another with an Indian sun above him. One is enrolled among the protectors of his country, and seeks for military fame; while another ploughs the ocean for the purposes of commerce. And, alas! some have been cut off in their very flower and beauty. One sleeps beneath the restless waves of the Atlantic—ah! well do I remember him; and the happy days we passed together I can never forget. Another was laid to rest by stranger hands, in a land where the sun is ever bright and the flowers are ever blooming, but where no friendly eye ever sheds a tear upon his grave. And still another lies in the church-yard, where so often we have played together; and the daisies grow beautiful above him, and friends come and sit beside his grave, and think of the young soul that has gone. Strange that the little band should be scattered so, and have its representatives in almost every quarter of the globe.

But another picture is in the fire. What means it? I see a vessel, with everything trim and neat, and in its proper place, commanded by one who seems worthy of his post. Slowly she is towed out of harbour, and sails majestically down the river to the open sea. Then, with every stitch of canvas spread to catch the favouring breeze, she speeds over the blue water. I look again, and I see the captain and crew loll idly on the deck, gazing at the huge creatures that play around the vessel's side. What a happy life they seem to lead! Except the man at the wheel, every one is idle. Soon even he begins to grow less careful in his work. He looks eagerly upon the compass, but seems not to heed it. A black cloud is in the sky, and coming ever nearer and more near. The sea in the distance is lashed into foam. Madly the white-topped waves chase each other onward, as if striving which should reach the vessel first. The men on board perceive not the approaching storm. One more rush forward—a retreat—another rush—and the waves dash over the vessel, sending her on her beam-ends. With blanched lip and pale cheek, the captain beholds the position of his ship, in doubt whether it is a dream or a reality. A moment more, and his look of doubt is gone. His voice is heard above the fury of the gale. Manfully they strive to make up for the carelessness which has caused them so much. Their struggles seem fruitless, and for a time their doom appears certain. One by one the masts are cut away, and once more the vessel is on her keel, but still at the mercy of the wind and waves. With renewed efforts, they apply themselves to their work, rigging jury-masts and setting sails. The storm passes away, but its effects remain. The vessel ends her voyage, but what a change from the trim neat thing it was before. The storm has left its mark behind, and the crippled vessel retains little of its former beauty.

But the fire is nearly out, and the room grows cold. I go to bed, and dream of those pictures in the fire; but in my dream the vessel takes the form of a man, and the sea is life. S.

THE CRUISE OF THE HERMIONE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER VI.

I WAS wakened suddenly by the shock caused by an embrace from the larger of the two skeletons. I started up. Was that Martin's voice, or was I dreaming? 'Hallo! Jack, how are you? Good morning. We've come back, you see.'

'Martin! Do I—is it possible?'

'Possible! of course it's possible; and more than possible, it's probable.'

'And more than probable, it's positive. Mr. John, how are you?' said Starry, jumping down and extending his hand.

I was indeed surprised to see the pair, who had been so recently associated in my mind with thoughts of starvation and skeletons, in such apparent good spirits. Suddenly it flashed upon me that it might be the excitement of the fever which exposure might have superinduced. I hurried on deck. 'Stewart,' I whispered, 'this may be rather serious. Come down, will you? and help me to see after them.'

'Yes, I'll be down immediately. I'll just make the boat fast—they have just come on board. In the meantime, go down yourself, and see what you can make of them; every minute, you know, may be of consequence.'

I went below at once. 'Martin,' said I, patting him soothingly on the back, 'I think you had better get into one of the berths. Lie down both of you. I will make you some tea, and put a little brandy into it, and bring you a biscuit. You must not eat too much all at once.'

'Ha, ha, ha—ho, ho, ho!' laughed Bob, till he sank into a seat with fair exhaustion. I had now no doubt that he was in a raging fever.

'Thank you; we are very much obliged to you indeed for your consideration,' said Starry; 'but we have breakfasted.'

'O Starry, do lie down like a good fellow,' said Bob; 'here are some nice blankets that we have been keeping warm for you all night—we'll roll you up in them, and you'll be so snug; and here's the brandy all ready waiting, and the water boiling—do lie down, and I'll make you some toddy.'

'O Bob,' said I, 'do. Will you not listen to reason? Will you not?'

'I'll listen to reason, Jack, when you talk sense. In the meantime, I think you look more like sleeping than we do, with your eyes more than three-quarters shut, looking as if you had seen a ghost.'

'I see,' interposed Starry, 'that you are labouring under a slight hallucination. You imagine that we spent the night in the boat; whereas, we had a most comfortable night. We were picked up by the fishing-boat which we observed in the forenoon.'

'And which you mistook for the Rock of Ailsa?' said Stewart, coming down.

'The same. At least, I don't know,' answered Bob. 'It was either it or another one—the Katie of Inveraray.'

'The fishermen were most kind. In point of fact, I do not think I ever experienced more kindness in my life,' said Starry; 'though it was no more than I had expected, from all I had heard of the hospitality of the Highlanders. When we got on board, they made us drink some whisky, out of a curious utensil manufactured from the horn of a goat; and, indeed, we were cold enough, for it was late in the afternoon before we fell in with them. We pulled towards you when the mist came on. We must have passed you, though not close enough to observe you.'

'Ay,' said Bob; 'and that was all owing to their confounded stupidity in pulling away. If you had remained where you were, we would have come right down on you; for I had noticed where you were before the mist fell, and then we turned her head in that way, and kept right on—noticing always to keep the track which the boat left behind her perfectly straight.'

'But who told you that we had pulled towards you?' said I.

'Stewart there, when we came on board. I suppose you were asleep when we came. It was the stupidest thing I ever heard of. However, you did it for the best; and I daresay you had a more uncomfortable night of it than we had.'

'I should hope so; but, Stewart,' said I, 'why did you not tell me?'

'He wanted, I suppose, to see the manner in which your hallucination would develop itself,' said Starry. 'If you will allow me, however, I will continue my little narrative. Well, then, as I observed, we were considerably revived by the potation which the Highlanders made us drink. They then made us remove our wet coats—it is rather a phenomenon how that mist saturates—and brought us some of their own—very rough they were, and of a peculiar smoky flavour; they heaped more fuel on their fire in the little apartment in the front end of the vessel, and made us dry ourselves at it. We soon began to feel quite comfortable; the only counterbalancing consideration being the recollection of the feelings of anxiety which we knew you must experience on our account. Then they prepared dinner for us—a species of soup, made with oatmeal instead of vegetables, and most excellent mutton. Then they made us drink another potation, to prevent, as they remarked, any ill consequences ensuing on our exposure, we being not much accustomed to such exposure. We had a most pleasant evening among them, one of them being an excellent player on the violin, with which we beguiled the time—was he not, Martin? Martin granted his acquiescence. ‘They were very kind in replying to my inquiries regarding their language. I made considerable progress in my acquaintance with the Celtic derivatives. When night approached, they insisted on our occupying their berths; but Martin and I expressed our disinclination to deprive them of their accustomed place of repose, upon which, after a little farther pressing, they spread coats, sails, and other articles along the seats, upon either side of the fire, and we slept most comfortably indeed till morning, when, the mist being cleared, we observed you in the distance; and the fishermen having prepared breakfast for us—coffee and oat-cakes—I made particular observation of their diet, mode of living, &c. for insertion in my journal—coffee and oat-cake’—

‘And fresh herrings,’ said Bob. ‘Capital fresh herrings! I punished no fewer than four. I say, Stewart, did you take our day’s shooting out of the boat?’

‘I took these out of the boat—if this is what you call your day’s shooting,’ replied Stewart—‘one seagull and one wild duck—the latter evidently as old as the hills and probably as tough as bend-leather.’

‘I’m sure there’s nothing wrong with him,’ said Bob. ‘We’re going to have him for dinner to-day. I’m going to begin to him at once.’

‘Talking of cooking dinner already!’ said I. ‘We haven’t had breakfast yet.’

‘You haven’t,’ said Stewart; ‘but I have. I let you sleep; but I’ve been up for more than three hours. But I have it all ready for you on deck; you’ve only to go and get it.’

‘Just as well you had,’ said Bob; ‘for we shall want the fire. Come on, Starry! Off with your coat, and we’ll set to work. Spread something here for the feathers.’

‘Starry, my trump! you’ll do no such thing,’ said Stewart. ‘The place is bad enough already without your turning it into a poultry-shop. Go on deck, can’t you? if you are determined to cook that old bundle of bones. A precious cooking it will be, I dare say.’

‘You hold your tongue till you see what sort of cooking it will be,’ said Bob. ‘And I say, Stewart, you give your orders pretty free to be on board another man’s yacht! Starry, we’ll go on deck. Tie something round you for an apron.’

‘Here you are!’ said Stewart, fastening the tablecloth round Starry’s neck, so as to give him all the appearance of a great pinafores schoolboy. ‘There! That will keep your clothes clean. Now, up you go; and see and keep the feathers together, and don’t have them flying about all over the vessel.’

‘I shall endeavour to do so to the best of my ability; though I must confess that it is to me rather a novel field of operation,’ replied Starry, gathering up his pinafore and stumbling on deck.

Stewart and I followed, and found Bob, already seated at the foot of the mast, tearing away savagely at the feathers of the duck. ‘Come on, Starry, here’s work for you. Sit down here and take hold of him by the wing there. I say, who gave you that table-cover? You’ll get it all spoiled, and then won’t I catch it from the old lady? Go and put it off.’

‘I was just about to do so of my own accord,’ said Starry; ‘for I tripped there in coming up, though you were too much engaged to observe me. I tripped in coming up by its catching under my feet, so that I thought I would have been precipitated head foremost into the water. I have now, however, replaced it by my pocket-handkerchief, and am now at your service.’

‘Here—sit down beside me here. There’s the wing for you; pluck away now like mad, and see you pluck it clean—do you hear?’

‘What capital poultersers you do make, to be sure!’ said Stewart, cutting up a piece of tobacco with his knife. ‘You’d make a capital picture, I do declare! Look now, Bob, there goes a whole handful of your feathers; they’ll be all over the vessel, and you won’t get them out again for a month.’

‘So there is,’ cried Bob, jumping up. ‘I want to keep them,’ he added; ‘they’ll stuff a pillow capital!’

‘Certainly,’ said Stewart; ‘perhaps two or three of them. Penny for your thoughts, Starry—concocting poetry—eh?’

‘Oh, no,’ replied Starry; ‘that is, I was merely—a digesting a few ideas previous to arranging them in a rhythmical form. The term of poetry, however, is too high a one to apply to any effusions which may flow from my muse.’

‘I say, Starry, what is poetry?’ said Stewart. ‘Give us a lecture on it; anything is better than this.’

‘Well, Stewart,’ said Starry, ‘you have assigned me a more difficult task than you seem to imagine. Critics have entertained various and different opinions regarding the terms in which that species of literature ought to be described; and, as Pope has it,

“Who shall decide when doctors disagree?”

Some maintain that it exists in the ideas—that poetry may be clothed in the garb of prose; others, on the principle of the common usage of the term, maintain that it exists more in the form—that it is a distinct species of literature altogether. According to the first definition, I would scarcely venture to call myself a poet; according to the second, I might venture, I think, to insinuate that I am a poet.'

'Hem! Poetic occupation you're at now—rather!' 'Oh, as to that,' replied Starry, 'I consider that it is no—a derogation to any one to engage in a little occupation such as the present. In the first place, I may remark that it affords an excellent opportunity for the observation of the anatomy of birds—the beautiful structure of the whole, and the adaptation of every muscle and member to its particular use. Then, secondly, it has been remarked that one half the world do not know how the other half live. Now, does not this give considerable insight into the manner in which a considerable portion of the—a—female population of the world are accustomed, either directly or indirectly, to spend a considerable portion of their time? And I can assure you, that even the very short space which I have been engaged upon it, has contributed not a little to increase my great respect for the sex, from the difficulty which I experience in performing it to my satisfaction. Again, surely a poor student need consider it no—a—derogation to employ himself in plucking the feathers from one of Nature's noblest handiworks, when the great Roman general, of whom we have all heard, after having repelled the enemies of his country,'—

'I say, Starry,' cried Bob, 'I wish you would stop all that stuff, and pluck that wing properly. See, you have left half the feathers behind you! And now, just look—just look at all those stumps!'

'I believe that there is poetry in everything,' continued Starry, forgetting his employment in the enthusiasm of his disquisitions. 'Something of a similar sentiment has been expressed by our great dramatist, when he spoke of finding

"Sermons in stones, and good in everything."

But I believe that in the commonest scenes of—a—the commonest scenes in nature—in the every-day incidents and occurrences of life, there is poetry. It is the prerogative of genius to extract the poetry, clothing it in the expression which suits the scene, whether humour or pathos—so truly has it been remarked that

"Wit is nature to advantage dress'd."

'I say, Starry, just look at those stumps, will you?'

'Oh!—a—I was forgetting, in the heat of the argument. I will endeavour to be more careful in future.'

'Well, see that you are,' said Bob. 'I say, do you think you could manage it now yourself; it is almost time I was beginning to that dumpling. I think I remember hearing at home that they took a good while to boil. Does anybody know anything about it? Here, Stewart, do you know? Does a dumpling take long to boil?'

No one being able to furnish any satisfactory information on the subject, Bob, with the remark that it was better to err on the safe side, rose, and repaired to the cabin, leaving Starry to prosecute the denudatory operations.

'Starry,' said Stewart, lighting his pipe, 'give us a scree of your last. I know, by the way you sat gazing at the beams last night, that you were concocting something. We'll give you the benefit of our criticism. Do, man—don't be bashful—poets seldom are; we'll say you are none.'

'Oh, it is a mere trifle—a mere bagatelle,' said Starry, going aft. 'I, however, shall have much pleasure in having the benefit of your criticism upon it.'

'Starry, where are you going?' cried Bob, appearing on deck, his sleeves tucked up, a towel tied round his waist as an apron, in the one hand a jug, in the other an earthenware basin, containing eggs, butter, and flour. 'The dinner will be late. You can read your trumpery again, can't you?'

'I beg your pardon, Martin,' said Starry; 'but I shall be at your service presently.' He jumped down into the cabin, and shortly returned with a sheet of foolscap in his hand. 'Meanwhile, I shall be much obliged by your lending me a few minutes' attention, in order that you may be enabled afterwards to give me the benefit of your critical remarks. The subject is a storm,' said Starry, seating himself on the windlass. 'It is a little outline which I have sketched, so that, if it should be our fortune to encounter anything of the sort, I may be enabled to grasp its distinguishing features. I have observed that when I have endeavoured to embody a scene or an aspect of nature which I have not had an opportunity of observing, that I can make much more minute and satisfactory observations, when such opportunity does occur, if I have endeavoured previously to embody it in words. The scene, then, opens on the evening of the night of the storm. I have endeavoured to delineate the stillness which reigned—the repose of the cloudless sky—the placid, child-like slumbering of the sea—so as to heighten, by the power of contrast, the effect of the storm, when it—a—rushes in its fury on the devoted barque, lashing the ocean into foam. However, I am betraying some of the secrets of the art which I have used; which is calculated to diminish the impression which I am desirous of producing. We shall allow the poem to tell its own tale.'

Starry cleared his throat, spread out his sheet of paper, and began as follows:—

'The west wind whisper'd with soft sigh—'

'The dinner will be late,' cried Bob, setting down his basin on the end of the water-cask. 'I wish you would leave that alone and attend to your work.'

'Yes, I will return to it in the course of a short time,' replied Starry. 'Meanwhile, I have to request that you will not interrupt me.'

The west wind whisper'd with soft sigh,

And calmly rose the evening star;

Nought told that o'er the midnight sky—

Now, here, the remaining line of this stanza is not quite to my satisfaction; it hardly supports, as it were, the style of the three previous lines. Can any of you suggest a word which would rhyme with star, and could be introduced as a termination in an appropriate line?'

'Tar,' suggested Stewart, performing a necromantic feat with a mouthful of tobacco smoke.

'Tar!' repeated Starry, thoughtfully; 'I do not exactly see how it could be appropriately introduced.'

'What is your third line again?' said Stewart—'yes—let me see—'

Nought told that o'er the midnight sky
The clouds would fly as black as tar.'

'The clouds would fly as black as tar,' said Starry. 'I am afraid that is liable to the same objection as the line which I have temporarily supplied. We will consider it, however, on a future occasion; meanwhile, I will continue the recital:—'

The sea heaved in a golden swell,
When low the sun sank in the west,
Soft as the maiden's bosom heaves
Upon her lover's manly breast.

'You're coming on, Starry,' said Stewart. 'That's not so bad. I see you have had some experience in that line.'

'What—a—' said Starry—'to which line do you allude, might I inquire?'

'Oh yes! That's it. Pretend you don't know! The love-making line, of course. Don't your last two lines tell that?'

'Oh!—a—I see. That does not necessarily follow,' replied Starry. 'Well—a—however, if you please, we will continue the reading:—'

The sea-gull to his nest had flown!—

'Starry, you're an ass!' cried Bob, seizing the manuscript, crumpling it in his hand, and sending it flying over the water. 'There! The sea-gull to his nest has flown! Perhaps we will be able to get dinner ready now.'

'Perhaps this will form a more perfect illustration of the flying of the sea-gull to his nest,' said Starry, quietly taking up the half-plucked duck, and sending it after the manuscript. 'Perhaps we will be able to proceed with the dinner now?'

'Bravo, Starry!' cried Stewart. 'Your lesson in plucking has surely given you pluck. You've served him right, at any rate.'

'Crawford!' said Bob, when he had sufficiently recovered himself to speak—'Crawford! go and bring back that duck!—go this instant; it will be better for you.'

'Indeed, I shall do no such thing,' replied Starry; 'I think it would be more consistent with what is right and proper, if you should bring back my manuscript. It has cost me time and labour, and is of incomparably greater consequence than your paltry bird, which, even if it were in itself of any value, would be spoiled by your execrable manner of cooking.'

'You'll pay for this yet, Crawford, I tell you!' said Bob, between his teeth, lowering himself into the boat, and sculling violently towards the floating bird.

He stooped over the side, and picked it up, leaving Starry's manuscript to drift away with the tide.

'Bring Starry's paper, can't you?' cried Stewart. 'We want to hear the rest of it.'

Bob made no answer; but, turning the boat round, and sculling towards us in the same violent manner—the oar slipped up, and away Bob, went head over heels into the water!

'Help! murder! oh! I'm d—drowning!' he yelled, spluttering the water from his mouth as he rose to the surface. 'Stewart, I'm going d—down!'

Stewart coolly took his pipe from his mouth, knocked the ashes out of it, and set it down on the deck, and taking up the coil of the peak halyard, threw it towards Bob. The rope was too short. The end of it reached within three yards of him, but he could not swim. He struggled to get to it, but the tide drifted him away—he was sinking.

'I'm going down. Help! Stewart! Stewart! Stewart! help! help! I'm going down!'

(To be concluded in our next.)

MAGGIE.

Maggie! Maggie! sister Maggie!

In the dear familiar room

We are sitting, sad and lonely—

Wearied, wearied of its gloom.

Fast and warm the tears are flowing,

Down each alter'd, sorrowing face;

Dark and awful is the shadow

Resting in thy vacant place.

Maggie! Maggie! gentle Maggie!

Sweet, and innocent, and mild;

Lovingly thou nestled 'mongst us—

Trusting as a little child.

I am sitting by the firelight,

Gazing as we used to do—

Dreaming strange, bright dreams together;—

Now I dream not, wanting you.

Maggie! Maggie! loving Maggie!

Still and mournful is our dwelling;

Through the silent rooms we wander,

Each its own fond memories telling—

Memories of a face we loved, so

Girlish, beautiful, and fair;

Sweet young tones and smiles of gladness,

That we find no longer there.

Maggie! Maggie! patient Maggie!

How we watch'd thee many an hour!

Watch'd thee slowly fading, dying,

Like a broken, wither'd flower.

When, at last, we sat at midnight

With the light made pale and thin.

Then we knew that we had lost thee,

And that death had enter'd in.

Maggie! Maggie! angel Maggie,

In thy home beyond the skies!

Oh! I fain would have thee near me,

With those sinless, loving eyes.

Fast and warm the tears are flowing,

Down each alter'd sorrowing face;

Dark and awful is the shadow

Resting in thy vacant place!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'Oh, sir, the good die first,
And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
Burn to the socket.'—Wordsworth.

CHAPTER IV.

MR. M'CORKINDALE—OR, more properly, David M'Corkindale, Esq. of the Drums, the interior of which country-seat I never witnessed—sits in his office in the city, in an inner chamber thereof, distinguished by a carpet, dimly-patterned, that was new when he and I had more hairs and blacker. He sits at a table-desk, the purple leather of it frayed with highly lucrative tear and wear, and with a worn mat under his feet, which are like boats. There he sits, fabulously rich and authentically unhappy. The muscles of his face are screwed into an everlasting suspicion. No beggar entering that chamber, by accident, would waste a word of his professional rhetoric there, unless his stock-in-trade were sockets—not eyes. The thunder, hugest of noise-makers, roars only when the heavens are black; but Mr. M'Corkindale, nearly the next hugest, is Mount Vesuvius under divinely cerulean and serene skies. More than any man I ever knew, he has a capacity for storming without occasion. Internal fires have devoured him under the vineyards until he is all hollowness and crust. Aha! it is a worldly politic face his—a chronic Sunday unchristian face, as befits his position of elder. So devout a man might find it painful to make negative apower when struggling and aspiring merit importuned. But his face is a perpetual negative. It shows like a crouching, red-eyed watch-dog, or a stormy placard warning trespassers. Behind it his riches are safe. It affords him the immunity of rage. Oh, an infinitely politic face, good churls! Yet I have seen his name in subscription lists which were to be advertised, and where mercantile considerations whispered at the ear of charity. Let us, accordingly, do the old curmudgeon justice, as he sits in his office, in that inner carpeted chamber, like a throned tyrant, conquering his silent alarms, or trying to do that feat.

Said Mathew Waddel to me the other night, in my own mansion—for he had just come over for an egg.—'Gabriel Gray! you are the biggest fool extant. Fancy,' quoth he, 'one of earth's God-made kings—with no more stately and luxurious throne than an odious countinghouse tripod, picked up a bargain from some shivering wreck of bankruptcy, ringed with vultures! How is it that you have suffered an old vinegar-crust, like M'Corkindale of the Drums, to lord it over you for forty years almost—you, by Jupiter! who have more brains in the tip of your little finger than he can boast in his whole body-bulk? It makes one's blood boil,' he continued, feeling if the little brass kettle were hot, 'to see genius like yours content to cower under the table, and nuzzle among gouty silk stockings for crumbs, while braggarts, and swaggers, and skinflints, and hypocrites, and nincompoops are cracking the walnuts and passing the silver-mounted decanters overhead. By George!' he exclaimed, grasping the bottle for a fresh tumbler, 'you are an incomparable jackass!'

Without uttering a word, I rushed to the half-dozen crazy shelves which I call my bookcase—bulked myself with Shakspeare, Milton, and such of my other own treasures as I could on the sudden muster—and making each, like a bag of sovereigns or an orator's knuckles, ring upon the table, asked whether I was not richer than any poor M'Corkindale of them all, though with actual metallic nuggets piled high enough to make Ossa like a wart.

'Mathew, poor devil!' I cried, 'you are a miserable Mammonist, with not an inch of soul above £ s. d. No matter. You are a licensed calumniator. But let any one, except yourself and any despicable Income-tax commissioner, dare to set me down as a poorer man than old M'Corkindale, and I will knock him into insignificance with a display of wealth which I defy all the Bourses of Europe to parallel.'

At this moment, too, hearing high voices, my fair nucleus blazed into the room, followed by a luminous tail—Kate the sprightly, Barbara, like a white angel, and the rest; whereupon I pointed to these, my luminous living riches, and Mathew, throwing himself back in his chair, roared and shook with laughter, and incontinently confessed himself floored. In the midst of the giggles and explanations which ensued, down came the 'Battle of Prague,' like a rattling tempest of hail, from the piano of the Old Reds, a broken, jingly-wired instrument, that was never in tune in its life; and Mathew, patting the brass cheek of the kettle, admitted that, after all, he would prefer it hot.

But let the truth be out. In spite of my contempt for Mr. M'Corkindale, I hold him in a certain degree of awe. Oh, I have been behind the scenes of him, and, even while taking his sorry wages, esteem myself colossal his master. Yet I would rather crave audience of twenty noblemen, of the courteous, high-bred stamp, than stoop to solicit a sparrow's leave to pick and chirp at his bloodless, unpulsing hands. Mathew declared this to be ridiculous modesty on my part, but I feel it to be ungovernable pride—such pride as goes tingling to the toes of one's boots when confronted by a pompous wind-bag. Modesty, dear Mathew! Why, the very floor—I declare it conscientiously—becomes a royal dais under my feet, whenever, goaded by some petty insult, I pull up to my full stature at his side. Yet not pride exactly; pride is never tall. It is his littleness alone makes me gigantic. Never, in my most cowering moments, have I suffered him to stand above me by the thickness of his own carpet. How could it be that I should have known him so long, and not made the discovery that yellow dross, though ever so regally minted, constitutes but poor stuffing for a seat, let alone a pillow?

Yet I had lately occasion to go before him, burning with a blush of humiliation, to ask if I might attend a funeral.

'Whose funeral?' he interrogated, as if he thought I lied, but without lifting his pen or eyes from the paper on which he gloated.

'You have heard of Hugh M'Donald,' said I, 'the Rambler.'

'I never did,' was his gruff response. 'What was he?'

'A well-known local writer and poet,' I said.

'A what? Humph! Was he a relation of yours?'

'No, sir.'

'Then why do you wish to attend his funeral?'

'Out of respect.'

'Is there no one else to bury him?'

'I daresay there are, sir. Man or dog of us, we are easily put under ground. Any hireling with a spade can do that.'

'Your remarks are impertinent.'

'I am sorry you should view them in that light.'

'Are those invoices made out?'

'They are, sir.'

'I suppose you may go, although I don't see the necessity.'

'Why, sir, absolute necessity can seldom be pleaded even for our most urgent duties.'

'Mr. Gray, I'm busy.'

I left him thinking himself a great man—thinking he had done the dignified thing—thinking he had administered a useful lesson while granting a superfluous boon—thinking he had towered to a sublime height in the eyes of his poor bookkeeper—thinking he had performed a noble action in snubbing a slave who durst not retaliate—thinking, perhaps, how he might be cheaper and better served by some younger man who would 'know his place.'

We had agreed—Mathew and I—to meet in Mr. Menzies' omnibus office, as we contemplated a two-penny ride to Bridgeton. A young man, James Bryson—with something of the inborn gentleman, as I think—bade us courteous welcome, invited us to warm our toes, and promised that we should not miss the 'bus. The day was gaily and wild, and there was a draggly crowd continually coming and going; while every five minutes, some blue-coated guard entered, exchanged his belt and bag, shouted the name of the district for which he was bound, and vanished with his little trail of city travellers to be packed. In due time came the announcement, 'Bridgeton'—whereupon Bryson picked us out from the throng in a moment, and gave us polite convey across the pavement. By dint of compressing two or three ladies into the natural bulk of such women as God made and Praxiteles sculptured, the guard was enabled to find us suitable, though somewhat tight, accommodation. This, however, we were not long permitted to retain. Decency, feeling, politeness forbade that exercise of selfishness. We accordingly set a gallant example to two or three young fellows—lazy underbred rascals, who stuck to their seats like Chartists, while weary women with infants had to rock awkwardly on their feet between impudent unyielding knees. But the journey, besides having its humours, was short. We soon found ourselves in Bridgeton—a locality lying wholly out of our usual beat, and which I had not visited for years. 'What a city, after all, is this, Mathew!' I exclaimed, as I surveyed the busy, unfamiliar streets. 'How easy would it be to excavate a town like Paisley, or Kilmarnock, or Falkirk, or Stirling, or Perth—steeple, police-office, and all—out of any odd corner of it, without its ever being missed, except by the handful of unhoused dwellers in the actual gap! Yet look at these shopkeepers. Morn and night they put off and on their shutters, and perform their daily drudgeries, knowing little of the great, brilliant city else, as it runs coyly away from them—towards the west-wind—its threads of smoke blown back from its bright young face, like hair à la Eugénie. All their world is hereabout. Ah, Mathew! the most cosmopolitan of us live and labour in strangely little rounds. Even those most addicted to travel carry with them a clinging and trailing mass of habits, memories, associations, prejudices, and fancies to shut them in, and mar their clear vision. They are surrounded and circumscribed by these, as the voyager—wander over what vague expanse of ocean he will—is girded by his familiar clothes, hammock, cabin, sails, ropes, shrouds, and impassable bulwarks. Man, in his largest orbit, is ringed like Saturn. Death, dear Mathew!—for the theme harmonises, like crape, with the eternally-solemn dust-to-dust business on which we are now entering—death, I speak it piously and philosophically—is your only enfranchiser.'

There was a grieved stir in John-street—the rather narrow street whence the funeral procession was to move—a stir as of troubled dreams, and thoughts of the infinite mysteries, coming down like wreaths of mountain-mist and cloud on the lowly waters of life. Women and little children, from shop-doors and the mouths of closes, looked out as if under some passing shadow of doom. No hearse displayed its sable plumes as yet; but, taken by the current, we found our way without asking. A yielding deference was visible, as we moved through the crowd, in compliment to our silvered age; and we got into the place of mournful rendezvous by a kind of noiseless swirl, like a couple of sere leaves into a slow, quiet eddy. It was a hall by the side of a modern-fronted church, entering level from the street; with a high-pointed roof—plain, somewhat Gothic, and charmingly suburban. A matted passage ran up the centre, and terminated in a pulpit, slightly raised. From each side of this passage, forms diverged at right angles through the length of the apartment. These rapidly filled. A little lull ensued; and, looking back, we saw, by the large round face of a clock above the door, that a quarter of an hour had elapsed beyond the time appointed for assembling. Punctual to that moment, a dark-complexioned gentleman entered the pulpit, whom I afterwards ascertained to be the Rev. George Simpson, parish minister of Bridgeton. There was a hush as if every breath were held. Slowly and solemnly dropped his words upon the silence—words selected from Holy Writ, haloed with celestial flame, and flashing and dazzling upward to glorious and immortal issues. Then, borne high on the wings of these inspired splendours, ascended a purely human prayer—burdened with the sorrow of a little bereaved household, petitioning for heavenly comfort. The simplicity and the earnestness translated themselves into pathos and eloquence. Every heart, we doubt not, was impressed. When the company loosened itself into the open air it became very large. It amounted to several hundreds. Straggling some little way down the street, to where the hearse now stood in front of a certain humble and I dare vouch for it very sad dwelling—we formed ourselves in its rear, four abreast as directed, and the procession moved on. It moved with a steady tramp, back through the main thoroughfares, towards Hutchesontown Bridge. Oh! how infinitely more solemn and sublime than any dull string of carriages, with nothing of sorrow visible but its hired liveries, was this marching mass of mourners! The mud was thick on the stones, and tears from the sympathetic clouds—tears wildly funereal—came down on paroxysms of wind; but the procession held steadily on its course. Windows were thrown up as we passed, and faces invalidated, blear, or with pipes, braved the raw gusts for a moment to gaze upon the unwonted spectacle. We trudged through the open space lying betwixt the Jail and the public Green, where, time out of mind, mountebanks have tumbled and juggled, and murderers were hanged. Hats were crushed down like helmets, and umbrellas stubborned like shields for the storming of the bridge. The usually quiet river was roused into a plaint and a wail. A tornado was encountered in Crown-street—one of those sudden and terrific gusts which drown fishing-boats and shatter Indiamen at sea. For a moment it partially broke our column, blowing one man into a whisky-shop—we believe after his hat. But a heroic rally took place, and the compact mass, stimulated by strong love and duty, charged the remorseless south-wester, and triumphed. By the time the Southern Necropolis was reached, a shimmer of sunshine fell upon the wet tomb-stones. Under a huddled arch of down-staring earnest faces, the mortal remains of Glasgow's favourite 'Rambler' were deposited—by the side, it was whispered, of his first love. At this moment a wretched, ragged woman who had joined the procession, forced her way through the crowd, looked into the grave, and hurried away. The remarkable funeral was over, and the mourners gradually dispersed; but how I could have wished old M'Cor-kindale to have been an onlooker throughout the whole scene, in order that he might have wondered and reflected, in his sick moments, by what curious, inscrutable necromancy it came to pass that a man who had so little of the world's riches while he lived, should be so honoured when he died!

Poor Hugh M'Donald! The world did not do much for him, but he did something for the world! His soul hungered for beauty, and, in the intervals of hard work, he sought her in the grass, near the hedgerows, by the purling streams, among odorous farms, under blue spirals of smoke—wherever a bough blossomed, or a bird sang, or a wee well 'skinkled,' or the lichen, and the moss, and the ivy gave Nature's silent burial to dilapidated baronial hearths, or grave-stones whose carvers were dust. My daughter, Barbara, has asked me what he was like? Well, my dear, he was not tall, but of homely Scotch build—somewhat slow of gait, as if scorning to use his feet fussily—in other words, a deliberate, contemplative man, like one who had something to observe at every step, and feared lest he might tread, by accident, on some of his dewy-eyed darlings of the year. A brave poetic reaper he was, who went out and gathered, through all seasons, sheaves and harvests of floral and traditional wealth, from virgin fields lying all round within reach of a morning or afternoon saunter. These he threw into the surprised heart of the city; many a sweet rush took place to the local Californias he had discovered; and in dim workshops, in steamy factories, in anxious counting-houses, and in languid conventional drawing-rooms, a healthier beating of pulses gave miraculous triumph to his labours. But although loving the country much, he loved his kind more. Truly, an intensely sociable man! Mathew and I met him several times some years ago; and I shall never forget the gusto with which he enlarged upon 'the Wallace wight,' stood up for Robert Burns, or warbled out, with his honest Scotch face finely a-glow, his own favourite song of 'The Flower-Lovers.' What wonder he is missed and mourned? O thou great money-bag of a M'Cor-kindale, wilt thou tear thy thumbnails with rage if I set down this lowly dweller in Bridgeton—a dweller there now no more for ever—as having been infinitely richer than your ignoble merchant prince? Man, man! how often must the lesson be pressed in upon thee, that the sure way to die unregretted is to live unbeloved? It is such wealth as Hugh M'Donald possessed that has all the world for sorrowing and grateful heirs. Think of his great funeral! But more is behind. Tears, happy memories, impulses of good, minds awakened to beauty, and hearts made glad by song, are magically in the track of him, like the silvery foam where a noble ship has passed—like the margin of bright green where a river has meandered to the sea.

Farewell, thou city-bred son of toil, ever strolling countrywards, and bringing back the flowers of many a field, and the melodies of many a grove, to make our crowded and choked-up dwellings sweet! My friend Mathew Waddel and I—considerably stricken in years, but worshipping Nature and delighting in song—are fain to claim thee as kin to our own blood. We have, therefore, taken in resolution to visit thy humble grave annually, what time the gentle Spring will be hand in hand with us, and the tiny minstrels of the air hover about our tryst, to keep thy memory fresh and beautiful at our hearts.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

MUSIC.

THERE's a language full of power,
Mighty in its varied play;
I have heard 't hour by hour,
As it changed from grave to gay.

Air, and melody, and song,
Time, and tune, and voices all,
Notes that swell and linger long
On my grateful senses fall.

Melodies of moments gone
Long ago, in days gone by,
Still so sweetly sounding on,
Linger with me till I die.

Harmonies of fullest chords,
All the mightier being one—
Oh! the joy their sound affords,
Ending ever—never done.

Ah! how life-like all comes back,
When some simple air is play'd!
How along my earliest track
Childhood casts a fleeting shade!

I have seen the bed where Death
Came and took his iron stand;
I have watch'd the gasping breath;
I have press'd the bloodless hand.

Yes! and stood by hollow grave,
Gaping for its kindred soil;
And have seen the grasses wave
Silent o'er the crumbling spoil;

Voiceless rooms and vacant chairs,
Signs that dared me to forget,
Everything that token wears
Of a missing some one yet.

Yes! I've seen them all, nor wept
As each one its story told,
And did marvel if I kept
Not one thought for times of old.

But when music comes and sings
Strains I used to hear 'them' play,
Something rises up and rings
Passing bells of soothing lay.

And their notes fall one by one
On my ear and on my heart,
And before the peal is done
Silent tears unbidden start.

Give me music—give me song—
Echoes all of bygone years;
Let me list their voices long,
Bring they smiles or bring they tears.

Thus unfetter'd in thy might,
Men and angels honour thee;
Music e'en on heaven's height
Makes eternal minstrelsy.

OUR TENDER BLOSSOMS.

A FLEA.

As I write, the sound of hammering and busy work is going on in a spacious building, pleasantly situated among trees and green pastures and grand old hills. It is a favourite 'bit' with old and young; and from generation to generation it flourishes on in everlasting freshness and beauty. Who amongst us that were cradled in Edinburgh has no rich associations with the 'Meadows' in 'auld langsyne,' when every season had its joys, and the dew of youth made summer fadeless. It was there the 'toddlin' wee things' looked out for buttercup and gowan—there the school-boy proved his strength and fleetness in many a race round the smooth level walks—there they frolicked in the sunshine—there they snow-balled in winter weather! The Meadows are altered now; but children come there to play still, and the grass is as green and the trees as large and loving as in the days when we were young, and rejoiced under their shade. Above the din of youthful glee, the hammer strikes out with clear and hearty ring, and willing hands are giving the finishing strokes to the noble edifices that tower like a princely palace. Fair it stands in the sunshine of heaven—every stone hallowed by love, and consecrated by pity to suffering humanity in its feeblest form. It is an Hospital for Sick Children.

Many have never heard of this benevolent project. It originated in London many years ago, and the example of London has been followed in Edinburgh, in Birmingham, Liverpool, and other towns. Some account of a recent visit to the Edinburgh Hospital may be interesting. The subject recommends itself to all who have a fellow feeling with childhood's weakness and dependence. The original Hospital is an old-fashioned family mansion—a stone cast from the building which is shortly to supersede it. We present ourselves at the door, and a cheerful portress admits us. We are prepared for a sad sight—eyes, that should be sparkling with youthful joy, heavy with trouble; limbs, made for active play, enfeebled by disease; forms of beauty wasted and worn; the rose of health withered in life's dewy morn. But lo! we are ushered into a bright, airy, cheery nursery, pictured, and furnished with a superabundance of brilliant toys. The sun streams in through the polished windows, and we can hardly believe ourselves in a sick chamber. Two long rows of little iron cribs occupy each side of the apartment; in each is a tiny white image propped up with pillows. The sharp suffering is past with the patients in this ward—some are nearly convalescent. Each crib has a moveable board attached, for toys, and the child can amuse itself without fatigue. One little fellow was proudly examining his gun—a regiment of wooden soldiers filled the board, and an array of miniature military 'gearing' was scattered about. His complaint is disease of the heart; and he can never be laid down to rest. He sleeps in a sitting posture, and in a prone position. They watch him carefully; for in a moment, suddenly, death may overtake him at play. Sad we think it; but the boy's merry laugh drowns the sigh of pity.

Calm contentment sits upon every young brow, and the pale faces wear a pleased smile. It is a scene of peace and comfort. Here is a baby, with a broken arm in a sling. It has fallen asleep to the music of its noisy rattle. The lady superintendent stops to smooth the pillow; the blue eyes look up to smile, and peacefully close again—no fretfulness—no tears.

In the next crib, a serious little maid is hushing her doll on her feverish breast; and, near her, a young girl, dumb with palsy, is quietly looking at some pictures. The lady again stops to say a kind word here; and she is thanked, with a smile of bright intelligence, from the poor speechless lips.

Is not this a hopeless case? we ask. She is recovering the use of her limbs, we are told. The patient has made great amendment in the Hospital.

In this ward there is another baby, no bigger than the china doll, staring at 'Bonnie Bessie Lee' in her new scarlet jacket.

'What an atom!'

'Ah, yes,' replies the matron, patting the thin little hand lying on the bed-quilt, 'its mother died, and it was starved, poor thing. There is a wonderful improvement here, though,' adds the lady; 'and all this skin (hanging in bags from the bones) has to be filed up.'

We draw back with a shudder. A little helpless infant starved, perishing for food in a Christian land, amidst plenty! Oh publish it not lest we be mocked at our philanthropy, and alms-giving, and benevolence!—lest savage and barbarian, true to the instincts of a divine nature, fling back to us the charity that passes by a famishing babe to preach a pure and exalted righteousness to unconverted nations! It has been under good treatment a considerable time, but it is a mere skeleton yet; you may tell all its bones—they look and stare upon you.

'But we are improving,' insists the lady, as she tenderly 'tucks' in the small breathing image again. The baby looks out in amazement, as if it had fallen asleep over life's troubles and awaked in paradise. We go back to 'Bessie Lee,' her wondrous beauty is a spell. Is the child a 'patient?' we ask; for a rich glow mantles the clear olive cheek, and the beautifully moulded limbs are rounded and plump. She has passed through much suffering we are told; but it is past and forgotten, and the little foreign lassie is getting strong again. The large liquid Italian eyes flash up in splendour, and a little white dimpled hand flings kisses freely to all. Bessie's father is far away with Garibaldi; he is an Italian, but the child says she is 'Bessie Lee.' She has found a home among 'strangers,' and she dreams not of kindlier skies.

As we pass out, a 'tousie' urchin runs up against us.

'Tommy! Tommy!' says a nurse.

'And who is this?'

A city Arab who has travelled far and seen rough weather. He was picked up in a den in the Cowgate in the last stage of fever. They have brought him through with careful nursing. Tommy is a 'character,' and his 'experience' amuses the 'Hospital.'

'How old are you, Tommy?' we asked.

'Seven,' was the reply.

Threescore and ten was written on the shrivelled, puckered face; but the limbs were those of a weakly undeveloped child of three or four years.

'Why don't you grow, laddie?' asked the nurse.

'I canna, nurse, for tramping,' answered Tommy, apologetically; 'me and mother tramps twenty miles sometimes, and whiles we sleep under a hedge, you ken.'

'But that is not good, Tommy.'

The boy looks wistfully across to the hills.

'I am the bread-winner, though, nurse; mother will miss me sair; she's no sae clever at pattering [begging] as me. We make most on rainy days.'

'Can't you do something better, Tommy—you are a smart fellow?'

'I sing at nights, ye ken—grandfather learned me to sing—he was a merry man in a show, but he turned ower auld, and syne he gathered prayer-meetings in the Grass Market. I can sing all Richard Weaver's hymns, nurse—they are bonnie.'

'Does your grandfather let you go about begging, Tom?'

'Grandfather's dead; but me and mother buried him respectable in the middle o' the earth without the Parish, says Tommy, proudly.'

Tommy's mother is an Irishwoman, his father is in jail for wife assault, but they are better without him, the boy says, for he does nothing but drink and fight when he has his liberty. The mother drinks too; and if the poor child were to be sent back to her to-morrow, warmly clothed, she would strip him naked to get money to buy whisky! Many a weary mile has poor Tommy trudged hungry and foot-sore. On the marriage-day of the Prince of Wales, he was singing in the streets of Paisley. When he got back to Glasgow, he was tired and sick; but he travelled on foot to Edinburgh, with fever in his blood! When he is dismissed, he has no home, but he says he will 'aye mind the Hospital, though he should have to travel the world 'round!' God help him when he leaves that kind shelter! Higher up there is another ward, similarly furnished. Every little crib is occupied—some are asleep; some are playing with their toys; pictures pleasing to children hang against the walls; and cheerful surroundings beguile the little sufferers of their troubles. Unless in acute pain, a tear is seldom seen, the matron informs us; and children are readily won by gentleness and kindness. The law of love is the rule here, and we have no difficulty. Friends are admitted to see the patients, but the little sufferers show no disposition to keep them; and, when they depart, they lie down on their pillows quite contentedly. We hardly wonder, for the little sufferers are nursed with motherly tenderness, and they have every comfort.

'But are not some diseases contagious?' we asked. 'Will not one child affect another?' It never happens, we are told. The fever ward is remote, and approached by a separate staircase, and there is also a ward for special cases. No disinfectants are used; but the Hospital is strictly aired, and the utmost attention is paid to cleanliness. 'We are very watchful on this point,' said the lady, 'and sanitary regulations are rigorously observed.' Few deaths take place, but parents sometimes delay sending their children to the Hospital until the disease has run on too far for recovery, and some children have died the day after admission.

We are invited to visit the other departments of the Hospital, but we have lingered with the children until our time is up. In passing out, we merely glance into the household rooms, dispensary, &c. All are in perfect order, and good management is everywhere apparent. The garden is rich in flowers, and the convalescents are inhaling healthful breezes. A little hand thrusts a pale blossom into ours, as we depart—a token of love from the Sick Children's Hospital.

In every town and city there are fair blossoms rich with promise of golden fruit; but unkindly frosts have nipped the tender bud, and blighted it in its bloom; shall these droop and die without fostering care?

Sweet flowerets on the dusty battle-field of life, fresh with the dew of morning! Ye gladden the scene and bring back pure and holy memories of childhood's sunny hours. Shall you languish and die in our path unheeded?

We have asylums and refuges and shelters, and princely munificence is bestowed on charitable institutions by wealthy cities; but no provision is made for the lovely and unerring. The little children droop with the lilies, and are swept into the cold churchyard like autumn leaves!

Objections have been raised to Hospitals for Sick Children, on the ground that children's diseases are mostly contagious, and that it is impossible to prevent them being propagated from one to another. This, however, has been proved fallacious, as may be seen from the medical reports of the institutions in operation. The blessings of a Child's Hospital are obvious; and in such cities as Glasgow, we make bold to affirm that no appeal beyond a simple suggestion will be needed to establish this good work.

But, apart from philanthropy, an Hospital for Sick Children is a desideratum for medical science. These institutions are exclusively devoted to infantile diseases; and a more perfect knowledge of these ailments will be acquired by the physician and student. And it is a well known fact that, while rapid strides have been made in every other department of medical science, this branch has been less attended to, although the proportion of children's diseases is much greater than those of adults. This weighty consideration will have power with those who live for the good of others, and, in so doing, find their own.

STUART MILLER.

THE THREE NEW ELEMENTS—CÆSIUM, RUBIDIUM, AND THALLIUM.

New elements are not so often discovered nowadays as in the time of Berzelius, the great Swedish chemist, when one could hardly take up an unknown mineral without finding something new. But within the last two or three years no fewer than three new elementary bodies have been discovered, by the process of spectrum analysis.

Before going further, it may be as well to explain what is meant by the term 'element' in chemistry. An element is any body that has never been decomposed into simpler ingredients by any force at the command of the chemist. Spectrum analysis has also revealed the wide distribution of other elements which, until its application, had been considered comparatively rare; and has even shown us the elements existing in the sun and planets.

It has long been known that certain bodies impart colours to flame. Thus soda gives a yellow colour, lithium a red, and strontium a crimson; and the reason is that the bodies volatilise at the high temperature of the flame, and the vapour gives this peculiar light. On decomposing the coloured light thus produced by a prism, it gives rise to various coloured bands, differing in number, colour, and position, with the different bodies employed. This, then, is the principle of spectrum analysis, and by which these three new elements have been discovered.

In 1860, Bunsen, while examining the spectrum of alkalis obtained from certain mineral waters in Germany, discovered the first of the three new bodies, and named it cæsium, on account of its giving rise to certain blue lines in the spectrum. Not long after, he announced the presence of a second new element, which he named rubidium; it gives two beautiful red lines in the spectrum. Cæsium and rubidium have a great chemical similarity to potassium. Cæsium is found in largest quantities in mineral waters; rubidium is found in largest quantities in a mineral called lepidolite. Cæsium and rubidium have likewise been discovered in saltpetre residues, at a manufactory at Paris.

Cæsium.—This metal is easily decomposed by water. It is less abundant than rubidium; a ton of the mineral water of Druckheim yielded not more than three grains of the chloride of cæsium. Cæsia, like potassa, is deliquescent, and easily dissolves in alcohol. With sulphate of alumina, the sulphate of cæsia forms a brilliant octohedral alum. 1-70,000th of a grain of cæsia may be discovered by spectrum analysis.

Rubidium.—It is generally found accompanying cæsium. It amalgamates easily, and decomposes water, burning like potassium. A ton of the mineral water gave four grains of the chloride of rubidium. The mineral lepidolite yields about 1-2,000th of its weight of oxide of rubidium. Rubidium has likewise been discovered in coffee, tea, tobacco, and beetroot.

Thallium.—In 1861, Mr. Crookes, while examining some sulphur residues by spectrum analysis, discovered this new metal. It is named from the Greek θαλλειν, a green twig, owing to its producing a brilliant green line when examined by the spectroscope. The discovery of thallium in the sulphur residues is analogous to that of selenium by the Swedish chemist, Berzelius. Berzelius, searching for tellurium, discovered a new element called selenium. Mr. Crookes also, while examining the residues for tellurium, discovered thallium. Thallium is a white metal, somewhat of the appearance of lead. It is malleable, but not very ductile. It is softer than lead, and possesses the peculiar property of welding together by pressure in the cold. It is easily fused, and may be distilled at a red heat. Thallium, when precipitated from its solutions, appears as a black powder. Those who visited the International Exhibition would see a specimen under a glass shade, in the eastern annexe.

Mr. Crookes remarks that, in its metallic state, it tarnishes too readily for much practical value in that form, but that, in the form of alloy, its uses are likely to be great. Owing to the magnificent green it communicates to flame, it may be used for pyrotechnical purposes.

Thallium has likewise been discovered in copper and sulphur from Spain, in metallic zinc and bismuth ores. It has likewise been found in commercial samples of bismuth and copper salts, and in sulphuric and muriatic acids.

CHAPTER III.

THE HAWKS TAKE WING.

VAVAZOUR at last broke down from sheer exhaustion, and leaned on his spade.

Duferny regarded him with a sinister smile.

'And now, my friend, what a condition would the most noble the Marquis of Pennywhistle's carcass have been in by this time?'

Vavazour wiped his brow with his hand, stuck his spade into the soil, and said, 'I shall die in a month, Duferny, if I do not escape from this place.'

'Courage, mon ami, don't talk of dying.'

'You say that I can be of service to you in England. You say, also, that you have a grudge against that plebeian hound. How do you mean to escape from here, and when? Come?'

'How and when? Good!' He gazed at Vavazour for a moment, as if he would read his soul, looked round to see if the overseer was within sight, and, compressing his brow and clenching his teeth, hissed out 'To-morrow night, if you are discreet, we shall be free. Hush, imbecile!'

Vavazour had given a slight cry, and his mouth and eyes had opened in amazement.

* The right of dramatising, translating, and reproducing this serial fiction is reserved by the authors.

'To-morrow night!' he echoed.

'Yes, if you are discreet; to-morrow at midnight we shall be on board Le Kokt At Vert. Attendez—the captain is my friend. I have had an interview, by means of a private telegraphic signal established between us in France. If Kato can be bribed to assist our escape, we shall be in England at the end of this year.'

Vavazour's jaws fell. 'Kato bribed! Impossible.'

Duferny's teeth gleamed again—a smile of ineffable disdain flitted across his swarthy features. 'Bah, mon ami! nothing is impossible to me. Kato's one of my puppets. I shall play with him like the rest. Death of my soul! who could resist me? I tell you I shall work him like a marionette; but you must assist me in finding the string. Comprenez?'

'What do you mean?' said Vavazour, testily. 'When will you cease to speak in parables, and when will you drop that cursed egotism? I'm sick of it. What are you driving at?'

'Driving at, mon ami! Now you speak in parables. Que voulez vous dire by driving at? What does it mean? Impart?'

'What do you mean by saying that Kato's one of your puppets? And what the blazes do you mean to infer by saying that I must assist you in finding the string?'

'Now, look here,' said Duferny, coolly, and, despite the serious nature of their conversation, evidently deriving a malicious enjoyment from the testiness of his companion. 'Look here. I understand what the nature of the idiom 'driving at' is. My little idiom should be less difficult to you—should be, mark you, if you had brains. You haven't brains; at least, nothing to speak of in comparison with mine. I'm all brains. My brain will get you and I out of this petit enfer, c'est a dire, if your deficiency of brain does not counteract my scheme. In such a case, I should take care that you would suffer most for the attempt; and I should quietly allow my brain to rest for a little, and then go to work again for my own especial benefit. Voyez vous? Soyez tranquille, mon ami! you are nothing without me; but my brain will get you out of this. See if it don't.'

'If it don't, I swear by all that's holy I shall prove whether there is such a superfluity by cracking the skull with my spade, and scattering them about the sand here, where you can pick them up again if you think they will still be of service.'

Duferny's teeth glistened again, and his swarthy face took a darker tinge from the sun, which was setting behind the hills.

'Ah! you say so, my friend; you are a true John Bull—brag, brag, fanfaronnade; but you waste your breath on me. Attendez, encore. Listen!'

The presence of the overseer, who had sauntered up, put an end to their conversation, and both resumed their work.

'And now,' continued Duferny, when Kato had gone, 'what I mean by Kato there being one of my puppets is this, as you might have seen—I mean through you to make him the chief instrument of our escape. Now don't interrupt me, and don't scowl, please, and you shall understand all. You tell me,' he continued, 'that you had the felicity of knowing our friend Kato in the old country, that you had the honour of being Monsieur le President of a society of which he was a humble member. N'est ce pas?'

'I did.'

'Good! You also imparted the information of the fact of our friend Kato having the misfortune, through his connection with the society, to be deprived of the privilege of being master of his own actions; and the paternal government, upon whom fall the responsibility of the direction of his wasted talents, having deemed it advisable, for his own good and the good of the country, to transplant him for a time to a more genial soil.'

'Go on. I see what you're at.'

'Bien! In due time the date expires at which the supremacy of your amiable government over our friend ceases, and its representatives here deeming (I do not say whether rightly or wrongly) that, in the event of an early return to the land of his nativity, he would be apt and liable to be employed in fresh dangers, considerately make him an offer of an official appointment, as overseer of his late companions in chains.'

'Exactly.'

'Good again. Our friend Kato, being of a plastic nature, and inclined to be influenced by the last speaker, whether for good or evil, incontinently accepts the appointment, with, I have no doubt, the prospective idea of accumulating a little money, by salary and perquisites, returning regenerated to England, and investing his savings in some virtuous and profitable speculation—say a skittle-alley or a rat-pit; or perhaps a billiard-room; or even matrimony and a joint-stock interest in a small public-house, with obscure and mysterious entrances and exits, known only to the initiated.'

'Quite possible. But what the dev'—

'Soyez tranquille, and listen without impatience. You also gave me to understand that the society on which you conferred the distinguished honour of officiating as Monsieur le President, consisted of several skilled artificers in copper, lead, and other metals, not to speak of paper, and that the united talent of that section of the society, viz. the skilled artificers, was directed to the manufacture of a new and original medium of circulation, which was designed by your society to take the place, or mix on terms of equality with the more expensive current coin of the realm; that, with a characteristic modesty (which does you credit) you had no wish to intrude your ingenious invention too prominently before the public, from a vulgar prejudice which they, in common with (I blush to name it) your paternal government, had against inventors in coin; that, for this reason, you made demands upon the exertions of the second section of your society, whose duty it was to call up as much as possible of the old coin, and substitute your own clever and less bulky invention. I see that you comprehend. Our friend Kato, with a burning thirst for money (the society's profits were of course in proportion to the skill and ingenuity of the members) enrolled himself in your corps and flourished—flourished, mon ami, as you all did, till an unlucky transaction with a penetrating Methodist cheesemonger, in which the opinion of a policeman was unfortunately called for, put a stop to his'—

'Little game,' said Vavasour.

'Merci! or, in the more symbolical poetical language of the society,'—

'Blew his gaff, eh?'

'Merci, encore!'

'I admire your straightforwardness in coming to a point known to me before,' said Vavasour, with strong irony; 'but I confess that I am as far in the dark as ever with regard to a knowledge of your intentions with Kato.'

'Ah! Je ne suis pas encore fini. Mark! Our friend Kato, as you have told me in one of our many little tête-à-têtes (which are the only relief to the monotony of this existence), was brought up before Old Bailey—though who that gentleman is, in his non-official capacity, I know not.

'Curse your shallow jokes!' broke in Vavasour. 'You are sure to renew the acquaintance, if ever you live to return to London.'

'Pardon my little joke, and allow me to hasten back to my mutton. Kato was brought up at the Old Bailey, and was offered a respite of the sentence if he would—again to use the mystical language of the fraternity—blow the gaff upon the honourable society. Is that not so, mon ami?'

'Kato refused to split,' said Vavasour, sententially.

'Bravo, Kato! I admire his fidelity. Then, mark you, Kato refused to inform on the society. Rather than do so he preferred to suffer six years' penal servitude.'

'Exactly.'

'Then, I say that Kato had hopes of returning, and again enrolling himself among the honourable gentlemen, where he would, of course, be received with open arms—not only on account of his professional abilities, but for the high and general admiration which his disinterested conduct at the bar of his country called forth.'

'Of course he had,' replied Vavasour; 'and has still, for two reasons—first, because, though risky, it was a paying game till another less disinterested member split, and broke the concern. Of course it's useless now, being broken up—blown to the winds.'

'Mais, mon ami, our friend Kato here does not know of its having been blown to the winds. I have no doubt he cherishes the idea of returning; besides—and here is the great point at last—you tell me that the society, in gratitude for his noble conduct, voted a sum of money, which was to be laid aside for his special benefit when he returned; that the friend to whom that money, as also his private fortune acquired in the service of the society, was entrusted, was Monsieur le President—yourself. Good! We have already proved that Kato is stanch to his friends; we have also proved that his ruling passion is money. We have found a clue to the string. You, mon ami, are the string. Comprenez? You are Monsieur le President, unknown as yet to Kato by that distinguished title. You have recognised him, but he has failed to recognise you. Work upon his respect for your former position; but, above all, bring the influence of your possession of his money, and the prospect of your being able to assist him to multiply it by hundreds if you were once free, to bear upon him for the furtherance of our interests.'

'But his money is spent. I was not such an ass as to keep the money for him; he might never have returned.'

'Good! You spent his money. Very natural; but you are not at the confessional. It is not imperative that you should confess your sins to him. Let him remain ignorant of your having spent his money; and let him think that the secret of its whereabouts is in your head; that you are, in a word, Monsieur le President; and that you can coin money, literally and figuratively, my friend, when you are free and in England. Mort de ma vie! c'est bien simple. 'Tis clear as possible.'

'It is as clear as possible,' said Vavazour, [thoughtfully; 'but how can I obtain an opportunity of speaking to him about it? and, above all, how could I break the matter to him in a sufficiently delicate manner? Besides, the risk of his conniving at the escape of two convicts is great, and would be sure to imperil his own liberty. It's a difficult job.'

'Pas de tout, mon ami. Death of my soul! why difficult? If you can only work upon his cupidity, it's all right. He means to return to England. He can do so if he pleases. All that we ask him to do is to give us a couple of files, find a duplicate key for our cells, furnish us with a rope-ladder; and, with those little favours, we are safe. There will be a boat from Le Koko At Vert lurking about the west point of the bay every night for a week, in expectation of my arrival. I shall take you with me.'

'And pray what have I done to deserve such a great favour at your hands, Duferny?' said Vavazour, with the ironical tone again.

'Mort de ma vie! don't you see that you are a necessary accessory of my own escape? Further, after we are in England, I have use of you on a matter concerning a certain Marquis of Pennywhistle and a yellow parchment, both of which articles can be turned to our mutual profit and revenge. Penny-whistle is as much my enemy as yours.'

'By all that's holy I would dare the Devil to pay him back.'

'You shall do so. I have told you the first step.'

Vavazour was again silent. Both recommenced their work as Kato approached.

When he had retired once more to his sentry-box on the eminence, Vavazour ceased working, and said, 'I have been thinking about that, Duferny; and I'm sure I could not come round Kato in an artistic manner. Suppose that you, who are so great at palaver, undertake the job? You are sure to succeed—I might fail.'

'Death of my soul! Yes, a good idea. I shall undertake and do it. I shall break the subject to him to-night, in our cell. Mort de ma vie! why could I think of trusting you? Nous verrons ce soir.'

Next evening the convicts were startled from their slumbers by the loud report of the guns of the garrison. Each turned on his back, grumbling at the disturbance, and grunted out 'Some poor devil of a fellow has escaped, and will either be drowned or shot.'

Shot followed shot at intervals, and some of the convicts fancied there was a general uprising.

Each started up in bed, and prepared to take a part in the general struggle for liberty.

Suddenly was heard from across the bay a demoniacal shout of triumph, which pierced the ear like the shrill tones of a fife.

'It's the Frenchman's yell,' said [the convicts simultaneously.

Another shot boomed from the fort.

It was answered from far across the bay.

The flash revealed the dark hull of a vessel, with all her sails set, making way with great rapidity across the dark waters.

Another shot from the fort!

Another!

Another!

'Twas in vain.

Another yell of defiance from the bay, which was even more demoniacal than the first.

'It's the Frenchman's comrade—the sandy-haired Englishman, Vavazour—said the convicts, wildly. 'How the fiend have they contrived to get off!'

Kato, during all this excitement, was rushing madly up and down, apparently in deep despair at the escape.

So thought the governors of the settlement when he made his appearance before them; and such was their confidence in their moral overseer that they calmed his fears and exonerated him from all blame. They would have stared if they had overheard the soliloquies in which he indulged next day at his usual post, and with his eyes fixed Britainwards.

'And so I have unloosed their wings, and they're off!'

—The hawks had at last taken wing.

THE CRUISE OF THE HERMIONE (Concluded). BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER VII.

STEWART in a moment threw off his coat, tied the end of a rope round his waist, threw the other end to me, and dashed over the side. He swam rapidly to the spot, and, diving down, returned in a few moments, dragging Bob by the hair.

'Haul away aboard there,' cried Stewart. 'He's all right—more frightened than hurt.'

'Don't—don't, Stewart,' cried Bob—'don't let me go. Pull, Jack—quick. I thought it was all over with me. Don't pull my hair that way, Stewart. Pull, Jack. Oh dear!'

Starry and I drew them to the side. Stewart fastened the rope under Bob's arms, and we hoisted him on board. He sat down on the bulwarks, and put his hands up to his head; he shivered violently, partly with cold, partly with terror.

'Bob,' said Stewart, 'you had better change yourself; come along, I will help you. Indeed, I don't know but you would be better to tumble in for a little. Starry, get him a thimbleful of brandy, will you?'

'Oh, I shall be better in a few minutes,' said Bob; 'I am getting better already. I will just change my wet things, and then—but the boat! she's going adrift—she'll be lost! What are we to do?'

'Never you mind the boat, Bob; go below at once; we'll see after her. Come away, Starry. Here, Bob, take this.'

'Oh, thank you. Yes; I feel a little better. But I wish you would look after the boat.'

'Yes, yes; go you below,' said Stewart. 'Here, Jack, take you one of the sweeps; I'll take the other. I say, by-the-by, we had better knock up the old fellow; he has had a good long spell of sleeping now. Hi! old truepenny!—Archie—hallo! Come up here and give us a hand.'

The invitation was repeated several times, aided by sundry stampings on the deck over his berth, when his shaggy head at length made its appearance.

'Tam! will you no let a pody sleep for five minutes together?' he exclaimed, rubbing his eyes. 'What's wrong wi' ye now?'

'We want you to help us with the sweeps to go after the boat; she's gone adrift,' said Stewart.

'Gone adrift! how you'll let her go adrift?'

'Mr. Martin was in her, and fell into the water; we picked him up, but the boat floated away.'

'Floated away! Well, ye're the queerest lot ever I met in with, and no mistake. Ay! I thought there would be some o' ye drowned; there will be before we got home. Have ye all been in the water? Ye're soaking wet yourself, and this one's as white as a clout—was you the one as tumble into the water?'

'Yes, Archie, I was,' replied Bob. 'But I wish you would go after the boat. Mr. Stewart and I will require to change our wet clothes. It will not take you long.'

'She wouldna need,' said Archie, looking up the Sound. 'There's a breeze, and a stiff one, coming on. Pe fast, lads, pe fast—out with the oars. Here you, Big-legs!'

'Did you wish for me, Archibald?' said Starry.

'Yes, just; stand by the helm. Now you, Hairy-face! work away like grim death.'

Starry, as directed, took the helm; and Archie and I wrought with the sweeps till we reached the boat, when we took Bob's duck out of her and made her fast at the stern.

'Now, lads,' said Archie, 'we'll took in a reef of the mainsail, for the breeze will be none of the smallest for a crazy old smack like this. Her upper works pe bad—very bad. She'll took in the water when she'll pe lie over. Hows'ever, if it comes on very bad, we'll make for Campbelton Loch. Never heed, lads; we'll took in our reef. Here, you—Hairy-face! you'll stand there. Now, lads, see that none o' ye will tore the sail, or poke your fingers through him. He's papery—very papery.'

We reefed the mainsail accordingly. In a few minutes the breeze came down; our sails filled, and away we steered for the Mull.

'Hurrah!' cried Bob, coming on deck—he had changed his clothes, and appeared quite to have recovered from his fright. 'Hurrah! We're on our way again; and, once round the Mull—three cheers for the Mull of Cantyre! Hurrah!'

'Ye'll pe better no to crow quite so big, my lad,' said Archie; 'ye're no just round the Moil yet—no just.'

'Hurrah!' shouted Bob. 'Oh, I say, chaps! we are forgetting all about the dinner. Come on, Starry—we'll have it ready in no time. Where did you put the duck? Oh yes, here he is. Here, Starry, take him, and finish the plucking; you haven't much to do now. You singe them, or something, with a piece of paper afterwards, don't you? Do you know, Stewart? But, at any rate, he must be plucked first. I'll begin at once to the dumpling. We can boil them in the same pot, I suppose, which will save time—or no—we can tie him on a string before the fire, and roast him, only that I wished to make the kind of soup with him which we got from the fishermen yesterday. Up hands for roast or boiled!'

'Bob,' said Stewart, 'who ever heard of cooking a bird so soon after he was shot? Stop this foolery, and let Archie cook the dinner in the usual way, can't you? Here you have been skittling all day; it is already past our dinner hour, and you are no further on than when you began! If you have such a particular affection for your duck that you must eat him in some shape or other, keep him over till to-morrow, can't you? and let us have a rational dinner to-day.'

'To-morrow is Sunday,' argued Bob, 'and I don't think it would be right to be working and skittling, as you call it, so much as it will require—especially—well—I was going to say, especially the very first Sunday, and the very next day after, by your means, Stewart, I made such an escape as I made to-day. But just you leave us alone for half-an-hour, and you'll see how we'll get on. That's it, Starry; tear away! Starry, you're a trump; you're worth a dozen like them! Where did I put my basin? Oh yes, here on the water-cask. Oh isn't it a splendid breeze! How nicely she lies over to it! Jack, you lazy wretch, take these eggs, and get a bowl and whiuk them up, will you?'

'Keep her up a bit—keep her up!' cried Archie, who was coiling ropes forward to Stewart, who had the helm. 'The wind is getting up. I doubt we'll need to make for Campbelton. Keep her up—keep her up!'

'Look alive, Jack, you blockhead! Here are the eggs; I'll be ready for them in a moment; and bring up a cupful of sugar, will you? and a plate, and a spoon.'

'But are you sure they put eggs in a dumpling, Bob? I rather think not.'

'Eggs! yes, I think so; yes, to be sure they do. Look alive, Jack, look alive! Starry, what on earth are you about? Look at your feathers—just look; there they go, blowing all over the vessel! Sit over there under the bulwark, can't you? Well, did you ever? I say, Jack, I think you had better take it in hand. Starry, you'll whisk the eggs. Here you are! Bring up a cupful of sugar when you're down, and a spoon; look alive now! Now, Jack, tear away like mad! See that you pluck him clean, and keep your feathers together, will you?'

'I think we had better took in another reef of the mainsail,' said Archie. 'Pe fast, lads! we'll took her in. Here, you, Hairy face!'

'Bother the mainsail!' cried Bob. 'Jack, where are you going? Never mind the mainsail, I say! The dinner will be late.'

'If you value your dinner more than your life,' said Archie, 'it's more than Archie M'Niven does. Here, Hairy face! come away. Pitch that tirty pird over the side; I'm sick of him. Give him to me. There! that's the way of him,' he added, sending the duck away to leeward.

'What do you mean?' yelled Bob. 'What did you—what did you do that for, I say? Take the boat and go after that duck—go after it this moment, I say! Put the helm up, Stewart. Stewart, do you hear? put the helm up!'

Stewart taking no notice of the mandate, Bob rushed aft; but Archie caught him by the collar. 'D'ye want another dooking? Ye're taking the fair way to got him. If you do, I'll soon show ye the readiest way of getting to your pird, by sending ye after him. So, you just look out, my lad!'

'You're choking me!' gasped Bob. 'Stewart! Stewart! take him off! He's choking me!'

'Och! I'll soon do that,' said Archie. 'As well pe choke as drown. So, my lad, you just look out.'

'I wish you would take a look below,' said Starry, coming on deck, alarm depicted in his face. 'The water is fast trickling in on the low side of the cabin. I was trying to stop the places with flour, but it only got worse.'

'It's more nor likely,' said Archie. 'Pe fast, lads; pe fast! We must took off the foresail, and put out a storm-jib. Pe fast, lads; pe fast! We'll make for Campbelton. I wouldna venture the Moil to-night.'

Another reef of the mainsail was taken in—the foresail was lowered—the jib was replaced by a smaller one. We brought her up a little, and steered for the coast.

'Where are you steering for?' cried Bob. 'That's not the way; we're going right on to the coast.'

'Mind you your puddin',' said Archie; 'it's all ye're good for. However, I would just like ye to have her done pefore night; ye'll please to mind that I ha'na tasted nothing since breakfast time.'

'And you're likely to taste nothing till breakfast time to-morrow, if you get no more than you'll get of my dumpling,' said Bob. 'Look alive, Starry. I think the eggs will do. Hold on; it's rather sweet; hold on till I put a little more water in it.'

A little water was added; this made it too thin, which made it necessary to add a little more flour, which again made it necessary to add a little more sugar; the eggs made it too thin again, and the various additions had to be repeated; so that, when Bob at length announced it to be to his satisfaction, it had attained a size so prodigious that there was not a pot on board large enough to receive it! Bob, however, after a good deal of reflection, obviated this difficulty by dividing it into two; and each division being tied up in a towel, it was found, to Bob's great delight, that the pot would now contain them; whereupon Bob poured some salt-water over them, and placed them on the fire.

It was not till he had arrived at this satisfactory stage in his operations, that Bob seemed to become conscious of the position of the yacht. The wind had increased to what a sailor might have called a good stiff breeze, but what we landmen certainly considered something of a gale—a gale it certainly was for a vessel of the Hermione's size and character. The sky wore a wild, threatening aspect; the sea was rapidly rising, breaking in long lines of foam; and notwithstanding the small extent of canvas we had still exposed, she lay over till the water came rushing under her bulwarks over the deck—her bowsprit, as she dashed through the spray, being sometimes buried to the stem.

Bob soon began to look rather uncomfortable. Gradually his face assumed rather a clayey colour. He went below, when we heard him calling on us to come down and look at the water, and, as we valued his life, to bring him a mouthful of brandy.

On going down, I found Bob groaning on a seat. The floor was several inches deep in water, and more was pouring in at the seams on the leaside, faster and faster, every moment. I became much alarmed—there was reason for alarm. I jumped at once on deck; and with Starry's assistance, having adjusted the handle of the pump, we soon had the water gushing in volumes from the spout.

'What's up, lads?' asked Archie. 'She's filling, is she? Ay; I thought so much. Took it coolly, though—took it coolly. Ye'll maybe need all your pith before morning. Take spell about—one of ye at a time; one of ye is enough. Where's the other one—the puddin' fellow? He's sick, is he? Ay; I thought so much. It's the way he was working wi' yon tirty pird, and the muckle puddin', that done it. If he had ta'en a good dinner of salt beef, he wouldna have been this way. We've a night's work before us, lads; for I'm thinking we'll maybe have more trouble in making Campbelton Loch than we're thinking for. We're drifting a heap to the south'ard, —so it's time we had some dinner. We'll put on the piece beef now—petter late than never,' he added, taking Bob's pot from the fire, and emptying the contents over the side! 'There, that's what they're good for. We'll maybe get them, some o' them fine mornings, in the form of a good fresh herring. Now, lads, we'll put on the bit beef. I cookit before he was born; and I'll let him see that I can cook yet without him. Hoich! Below there! I'm thinking it's time ye was coming up, to give the other lads a hand wi' the pump. Ye're no going to lie there, like a shentleman (as ye're no), when other folks is working their fingers to skin and bones, to keep your leaky old smack afloat!'

'Leave me alone; leave me alone,' groaned Bob; let her go to the bottom. I wish I was dead! I wish I was dead!'

'Do ye? Ye'll maybe change your tune before long. I'm telling ye, lads, I wish we was safe in Campbelton Loch. We're going fast to leeward. If she had not been for that plockhead's being in such hurry to get off, we might have put more ballast in her before we come away; she's too light—too light. There's bad tides here, lads—very bad tides; and it's getting dark too—it's getting dark.'

As he spoke, heavy drops of rain began to fall. It was still an hour from sunset, but all at once it became dark as night. Suddenly, a flash of lightning illumined the sea, followed instantly by a peal of thunder, so loud that we stood transfixed with awe. The rain poured down in torrents, but, heedless of it, Crawford and I wrought silently at the pump. Archie, with a bucket, emptied the water as it gathered in the stern-sheets; while Stewart stood, with knit brows, at the helm, his eye fixed steadily on the lighthouse of Devar, which now gleamed out far away through the darkness.

In a couple of hours we had approached, as we judged, within three miles of the lighthouse. But we had been drifting considerably to leeward; for Stewart had gradually to bring her up more and more, until, at last, steering towards it, the wind was almost dead ahead. The lightning had passed, but the rain still continued to pour. In the darkness, we could discern no traces of the land. We were now evidently losing ground instead of gaining it; but still we headed towards Devar, toiling to keep her afloat.

'The water is rising up over the seats,' said Bob, crawling on deck. 'Oh, give me something to eat. I think it was wanting my dinner so long that made me so bad; I'm better now, though. Are the dump-lings ready?'

'They'll be ready enough for them that's to eat them,' said Archie. 'We threw them over the side.'

'You threw them over the side!' cried Bob. 'What do you mean, you old rascal?'

'Just that we wasna going to want our dinner for any capers o' yours—that's what it is.'

'You threw them over the side! You don't mean to say that you threw the towels along with them—did you? Tell me this moment—did you throw the towels along with them?'

'Is this a time, Bob,' said Stewart, 'when our lives may not be worth an hour, to be going on in this way?'

'It's all very well for you,' said Bob; 'but if you had an old mother to be kicking up rows when you go home, for losing her towels?'

'Martin, are you mad? Do you see the condition we are in? She's settling down, Martin! The lighthouse—I saw it there this moment. Look, Martin! Martin, look! It was there this moment.'

A peal of thunder crashed above our heads. As if by a common impulse, we stopped in our work, and looked fearfully at each other. Another flash. 'We're on the rocks!' cried Stewart. 'Help! Martin—the sheets—Martin, Martin—down with it—down, down!'

Another flash. The cliffs of the coast rose before us, the sea dashing up the beach which skirted their bases. She came up to the wind—her sails were filling on the other tack; but the jib-sheet broke loose, the sea drove her on, and dashed her on the shore.

Another wave carried her higher up, when she lay, thumping on the beach, with the sea breaking over her. We could now see dimly the outline of the cliffs, seemingly at no great distance from us. From their apparent nearness, we had at first but little fear that there would be any great danger, when the sea should go down a little, in our venturing ashore, one by one, in the boat. But as the sky cleared, we found that we were considerably farther from them than by had imagined. We began to fear that instead of being on the shore, as we had fancied, we had struck on the ledge of rocks which Archie informed us ran some hundred yards from the shore, along the part of the coast on which he believed we were.

If it should be so, to remain in the yacht seemed to be almost certain destruction; for as the tide rose, it might lift her off the ledge and carry her into deep water, where she might go down. The safer alternative of the two was to venture at once in the boat: though even this, from the distance of the shore and the violence of the sea, would be attended with not a little danger. But on going aft to get the boat ready, we found to our dismay that she had broken away—the painter not having been properly secured.

'What will we do? what will we do?' cried Bob, wringing his hands. 'She said all along it would come to this; and her words have come true—her words have come true! O mother, mother! had I but taken your advice, this would not have been—this would not have been!'

'O Martin!' exclaimed Starry, putting one arm round Bob, while with the other he held on by one of the backstays, 'I cannot bear to see you so! I have been in a measure the unintentional cause of what, I fear, must be our melancholy fate. It was I who tied the boat.'

'No, Starry; it is I who am to blame, for letting my temper get the better of me, when I threw away your paper. That was at the bottom of it all—that was the cause of it all! What are we to do? what are we to do? The tide is rising. O Stewart! Stewart! Stewart! can you think of nothing?'

'Nothing, Bob,' said Stewart. 'The sooner we say our prayers the better. When the tide rises, we may go up the mast. Perhaps she may remain fast till morning, when I will try to swim ashore with a rope. If I don't reach the shore, you will—but no matter; we'll try it, at all events.'

The tide began to rise—we went up the mast. It rose higher—she remained fast. The night passed—we still clinging to the rigging, drenched and shivering.

In the morning, the wind had gone down; but the sea was still boisterous. Whether it was that the darkness had deceived us, or that the waves had carried us in during the night, our distance from the shore seemed now to be considerably less than it had before appeared. We thought it prudent, however, that Stewart should postpone his attempt to reach the shore till the tide should abate a little; and, indeed, the decks being covered, we could not have found the ropes, nor tied them properly together so as to form one which would stretch ashore.

When the tide had ebbed sufficiently, we went down, though scarcely could we move, so chilled were our limbs, and scarcely could we speak, so famished were we with hunger. Stewart, however, dived down into the cabin, and brought up some biscuits, which, soaked as they were, we greedily devoured. We then set to work, fastening together the ends of all the ropes we could find, leaving only the stays of the mast, so that we might have it as a resource should our attempt fail. Stewart then made fast one end of the rope round his waist, and jumped over the side. He walked for some little distance; we were glad that he could do so, for he would then have more strength to swim when he got to the edge of the ledge, and reached the deep water. But what was our surprise to find that, instead of getting deeper, it gradually got shallower, until it scarcely reached to his knees. Could it be possible? Yes, he was actually coming out of the water—he had walked every step of the way! Any lingering doubts we might have had were dissolved by the loud 'Ha, ha!' which echoed from the shore. Old Archie joined in it after his own fashion, in a sort of grunt. 'He had knowned it all along,' he said; 'but he thought we might just be so well to get a bit fright. It was the tirty pird as was at the root of it all. He was just telling Hairy-face and the other big lad that he had a taste in his mouth whiles yet with one, something the same, he eat this time three year; and it was the capering that was about him that done it. The smack was finished, and no mistake. He was only just sorry that there was like to be none of us drowned; for she would be a good lesson to the rest no to meddle again wi' things we knewed nothing about. Hows'ever,' he added, 'it's my first voyage wi' the likes of ye; and, tam, but it's the last!'

Stewart made the rope fast round a large stone; and, having made fast our end round the mast, we walked ashore one by one, steadying ourselves by it. Bob came dragging his trunk after him; but Starry and I were too cold and uncomfortable to think of or to care for anything. We felt supremely wretched—we felt not even the pleasure or the gratitude which our escape might have inspired; for it scarcely seemed as if our lives had ever been in any real danger.

Archie having announced that he knew the part of the coast on which we were, under his direction we proceeded along the shore. Bob, having dragged his trunk upon the beach, remained behind us for some minutes, gazing wistfully at the battered wreck of his yacht. He heaved a deep sigh, struck his forehead with his hand, and turned away.

After walking for some distance, we came upon a cabin which had been erected for the accommodation of two customhouse officers, who kept surveillance on the landing of the cargo of a large outward-bound ship, which had been wrecked some weeks before, and now lay, a dismantled hulk, on the ledge of rocks on which we believed we had been. They received us kindly, and entertained us hospitably. We remained with them the greater part of the day; and in the afternoon (Bob having obtained a promise that his trunk would be forwarded by water in the course of a few days) we set out on our way to Campbeltown. We arrived in the dusk of the evening, and took up our quarters at one of the hotels.

Next day, none of us, with the exception of Bob, felt any ill effects from our night's exposure; but he was as hoarse as a landrail. Notwithstanding this, however, he set off, accompanied by Archie, to ascertain whether there was any probability of the Hermione's ever being put again in a condition to float. But all that remained of her was a part of the bow, the rest being scattered in beams and planks along the shore: whereupon, Archie gave it as his decision, that 'She was like Sandy M'Carrigil's gun—she would need a new stock, a new lock, and a new barrel.'

Bob returned in a most melancholy mood; he hardly spoke a word all the rest of the day; and, on the day following, set off in a steamer without telling where he was going.

Stewart, Starry, and I remained in Campbeltown for a couple of days, exploring the country. We returned together as far as Greenock. Stewart and Starry then took passage for Rothesay, where they purposed spending a week. I proceeded on my way to Glasgow, vowing, with Stephano, that

'I'd no more to sea, to sea;—
Here would I die ashore.'

I found Bob at his lodgings—very different, however, from what he had been a week before. I endeavoured to prevail upon him to accompany me on a tour through the Highlands, but my arguments were unavailing. I set off by myself, and spent a fortnight very agreeably.

Bob did not recover his equanimity for some months.

His spirits for the time seemed to have been completely broken—his temper to have been completely soured. In none of the letters which I afterwards had from him, however, was there the slightest allusion to the Hermione.

JOHN FOSTER.

BY THE LATE JAMES MACFARLAN.

ONE of those retiring hermit souls that carry pure lights with them like haloes; a calm dignified nature, walking in the quiet byeways of life, and, without despising the great world, living apart from it, as one may dwell beside the ocean without trusting himself to its waves—such I take to be John Foster. His life, or those portions of it which are left others to record, and what we see of him in his writings—the autograph of the soul—seem to give such a portrait.

The external life of a man like this might almost be summed up in the language of the simplest headstone—'John Foster, born 1770; died 1843.' There is nothing to entice the marvel-hunter in that existence, and any points of interest receive their colouring from the life within.

In his boyhood, Foster was meditative and retiring, and indulged in those long rambles which have delighted so many similar spirits. But these could not always be enjoyed, as his father was a poor man, earning subsistence by the somewhat irreconcilable callings of small farmer and weaver, and the son had to assist at the spinning-wheel. The web of fancy was, however, spun at the same time; and, amid companions, who could scarcely be expected to sympathise with the thoughtful, young Foster soon became thoroughly isolated. It was this meditative disposition, doubtless, that led the parent, who belonged to the Baptists, to first think of making his son a minister of that sect. Accordingly, Foster went through the usual studies, and, after a time of stiff and rigid training, we find him a preacher in his seventeenth year. But the hopes entertained were never quite realised by John in his evangelical character. He was destined to become a Baptist preacher; and we see him, ever afterwards, in a hopeless struggle to fit on a garment that was out of all proportion to his herculean frame. Circumstances forced him into the preacher of a sect, but nature was continually urging him to address a larger audience. Hence his want of success, and constant shifting from place to place—now in Newcastle; now in Dublin; now in Chichester; now in Frome. But the scene was ever the same. The little chapel, with its congregation of plain-speaking and plain-thinking people—all no doubt pious souls and true, but no more able to comprehend John Foster than John Foster was able to tie himself down to the exact measure of their thoughts and leanings.

At one time we find him nearly falling into misanthropy; but his love of nature saved him. No man indeed ever worshipped nature with a purer or more earnest spirit. His devotion was as deep and true as that of Wordsworth; while his intercourse, if not quite so uninterrupted, forms a striking feature in his history. The happiest circumstance that ever befel Foster was meeting, in his thirty-seventh year, with a partner who could understand and appreciate him. The sympathy and companionship he had so long yearned after came at last, and that in the most agreeable of all forms—a noble woman's admiration. To her were addressed, in the shape of letters, those four splendid essays which are the pillars of his reputation. His life, henceforth, was more that of a man of letters. His writings were well received, but never exactly popular, in the wild, horn-blowing sense of the term. He did not throw his readers into a fever, but kept them in a state of pure and thoughtful enjoyment. He has indeed done nothing wild or daring—dazzled the world with no lightning flashes; but is full of great moods, and deep and solemn communings. We have never in him a roused ocean, but the full onflowing of a broad, majestic river.

THE CAVALIER.

A SKETCH.

[Sir Hugh Gratian stood pre-eminent among the young Cavalier knights of that period for his brave and daring spirit, and his handsome person. He married the lovely daughter of Sir Thomas Clifford; but, ere the honeymoon was well out, he was called on suddenly, one bright winter's morning, to join the King's troops. He fell at that engagement, with the words literally on his lips, 'For God and the King!'—Lives of the Cavaliers.]

SADDLE my good steed,
Give me to drink;
There's no time for parting,
There's no time to think.

Brush from thy fair cheek
That bright falling tear;
So should a Clifford
Meet trial, my dear!

Again I may clasp thee,
By setting of sun,
Skirmishing ended,
And victory won.

Snow-clad the landscape,
Clear, bright, and still;
Press on, good Rover!
Swift o'er the hill.

What though the air bites,
Cutting and cold,
Warm beats a strong heart,
Cheerful and bold.

Crush we those traitors,
Our peace who would stifle,
Strong in our watch-word,
'For God and the King!'

Shout we that war-cry
With our last breath,
Thus shall a soldier
Meet danger—meet death!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

April 2, 1836.

WHAT an alarm and agitation I have had this morning! In George's absence too. Though, now the worst is over, I scarce regret he was not here, considering his violence upon provocation. And no doubt, if ever he was violent at any time, he might have been so to-day; and how to tell him when he does come!

O my poor dear darling, Charlotte! Little did I think when, no later than yesterday, I was rehearsing the chances that transcendent loveliness might be your future dower, how soon all these visions would be put to flight. But let me tell my story connectedly.

I had nearly finished dressing this morning, when I was startled by the noise as of something falling in the adjoining room, followed immediately by a sharp cry. Alarmed, I ran into the nursery, when, to my amazement, I discovered my baby lying screaming on the floor, having been evidently precipitated out of bed, and with nobody in the apartment but herself. On my flying to her, and taking her up, how was I horrified to find her face blood-stained from a deep wound on the left eyebrow! An ordinary fall would have been bad enough; but the cause of the cut was too evident in the sight of a broken stone jug, against the sharp edge of which her head had struck, shattering the lip from the vessel. I easily guessed how it had all happened. That careless cruel Martha had given the child some toys to play with (I saw a doll and a whistle on the coverlet), while she ran down stairs on some selfish errand; and behold the consequence of her neglect of duty! Just as I laid my hand on the bell to summon assistance, the culprit appeared; and really when she perceived the mischief she had occasioned, she looked so conscience-stricken that my fast-rising displeasure was in some measure disarmed. Indeed, anger at such a crisis, when I knew not what might be the issue of the frightful mischance, seemed quite out of place. Another minute, and Martha, her eyes streaming with tears, was off for the doctor, leaving me pacing the chamber in a wretched, bewildered state, straining my baby to my breast, and vainly trying to hush her piteous cries. What a relief when Dr. Armstrong's kind face appeared at the door! He seemed to have come as on the wind; and I disburdened my miserable anxiety into his sympathetic ear. When he had looked at the wound—

'Calm your fears, dear Mrs. Weston,' he said. 'It is not so bad as you fancy. I will make all right by-and-by. Have you a needle in the room—a large darning needle, and some worsted?'

I was not much quieted on hearing these requests, which sounded with an awful meaning to my heart. Martha came forward, agitated and frightened, to offer her services. I bade her begone, for I could not bear to look at her. She shrank away, while I gave the doctor what he required. But why dwell on what followed? Suffice it to say that, with my knees trembling as if I had been in ague, my pulses thumping like hammers, and my whole nerves racked with the recent shock they had sustained, I sat and held my baby's head firmly (by the doctor's directions) towards the light, till he had actually sewed together the lips of the wound, and finished his work by bandaging the poor eyebrow with the needful strips of plaster and fine linen. This done, I looked timidly in his face, and put the dreaded inquiry that was vaguely floating in my mind, 'Doctor, do you think it will be a mark for life?'

The worthy man, who I verily believe would not tell a lie to save his own existence, answered me mildly—

'I scarce think so; but, as yet, I cannot say positively. Assure yourself of one thing, however, the worst of the pain is over, and you need have no dread of more serious consequences—I mean in reference to the child's general health. I will see you to-morrow.' With these words, he shook me warmly by the hand, and departed.

As soon as he was gone, I began pacing the apartment once more, holding my poor wounded dove close nestled in my bosom. Gradually she ceased crying. Indeed, the strong convulsive sobbing to which she had just given vent appeared to have entirely exhausted her, and she was on the eve of sinking to slumber. I hushed her tenderly, with the yearning fondness which none but a mother can know, and that in seasons of sore trial, and was at length rewarded by seeing the tear-stained lids fall over the heavy eyes, and by hearing the deep-drawn sigh, which told me she was mercifully asleep. I laid her warily—fearfully lest she should wake—on the velvet pillow of her downy bed. And then—oh! then my own pent-up emotions gushed forth, and with a heart faint, well nigh to bursting, I sank into the nearest chair. I wept long and bitterly, till by degrees my agitation was subdued, and Charlotte's sweet low breathing came to me like an augury of brighter hopes. My tears flowed more softly then. And I slid noiselessly from my seat, till I perceived myself fallen into that attitude suggestive of holiest and sublimest thought, which it is the privilege of mortals to know—when the veil which conceals Heaven's awful majesty is for the time withdrawn, and the soul goes up with the angels on the mystic ladder to the skies.

These are consecrated moments, whose secrets are inviolable. For the spirit's communion with its Author, there is found no written Cardiphonia. Mortal speech may not profane it by revelation to outward ears. There is no book but one wherein such matters may be registered, and that book is in no human hand. Truly there is a life within a life, and that is the one which the soul lives with its God alone. O book of remembrance! impenetrable in the awful secrecy of its memorials, which none but He, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, will be found worthy to open on that day. O life!—humanity's noblest prerogative of hidden communion with the Father of the Universe—how cold, how blank, how aimless and imperfect were our being here below, without the sublime talisman of the immortal hope!

My darling slept long and soundly; while I continued my watch beside her, closing the window-shutters the better to favour her rest. I had sat thus for a good while, when, observing that the door stood considerably ajar (I suppose the doctor had left it so), I rose, intending to push it to very gently, when I became aware of a figure crouching on the outer threshold, and leaning dejectedly against the lintel. It was Martha—poor, penitent, self-condemned Martha; and though I did not see her face, which, besides that her head was much downcast, was partially shaded by her hand, there was enough implied in what I did see to quell every wrathful impulse I had felt inclined to harbour against her. Lying there so lowly, so abject, so miserable, the silent picture appealed at once to my compassion; and when she looked up to perceive me standing before her, and showed me her eyes red and swollen, and her lips tremulous with compunctious grief, as, clasping my gown, she murmured in a piteous voice, 'Oh! forgive, forgive!' what could I feel but that we are all weak fallible creatures? and what could I do less than just say to her, 'Martha, you have wrung my heart deeply, cruelly; but I spare you all further reproach?' I fancy she was affected by the clemency these words implied, for she fairly sobbed aloud; and then, fearing (as I interpreted it) that baby might be thereby disturbed, she made a hasty retreat down stairs, holding up her apron to hide her woe-begone visage.

When I re-entered the nursery and hung over my lily's couch, she opened her eyes at the very moment, and gave me such a beautiful smile, my heart leaped with rapturous surprise. It seemed like the recompense of my forbearance to her who had injured us. Never, never, my own Charlotte, did star at midnight give light more precious to the storm-girt mariner than did that quiet smile give solace and gladness to thy mother's timorous heart. Twine thy dimpled arms, dear one, closer, closer round my neck, and let me kiss thee a thousand times with the kisses of love and thankfulness.

April 3.

George has come back, and no business done. But when I was about to condole with him on his needless errand, he stopped me, saying gaily—

'It is better as it is, Kate. See the good of having a partner. This man's hypochondriacism will be a rare thing for me. He may send for me as often as he pleases. I can see that both profit and amusement are to be got out of the affair. Mr. Halliday is quite a character, Kate; and as he is in a position to pay handsomely for his whims, I shall find no fault with his indulging them.'

'And was he not seriously ill after all?' I asked. 'Oh! as to that,' George answered, 'he is never well, mentally I mean; and a diseased mind will gradually work even upon a strong body. I have no doubt, in his case, the one has made important inroads upon the other. But give me something to eat, Kate, for I have ridden fifty miles and not had a morsel.'

While he was busily devouring cold pie and quaffing his sherry and water, I thought it a good time to tell him of baby's accident, which I related as cautiously as I could in reference to Martha's blame. Well, whether it was his hunger, or the good humour engendered by his late jaunt, I know not. Certain it is, he did not break forth into the violence I feared; but went on with his refreshment, merely remarking quietly, at intervals,

'You should part with that woman at once, my love, before she does any more mischief. What a comfort that you got the doctor so readily. My poor little wife, you must have been sadly flurried—'

Flurried! This was cool speaking of a verity! Little did he know the amount of distress I had suffered on the occasion. Evidently he viewed it far more lightly than he would have done had he been told the full particulars. And was it for me to undeceive him, at the risk of rousing up the most impetuous feelings? I trow not. I was well content to let the matter tide gently over, though I could not help appealing to him in conclusion:—

'O George! I really never was so frightened in all my life, and you from home, too; yet it might have been worse. And our darling is quite well, only the mark; and if that goes away through time —'

He looked more serious when I said this.

'The mark! Of course it will go away. It cannot be so deep as that. Let me see it.'

I was glad baby was sleeping just then, and told him so, when his mind quickly reverted to other things, as if nothing had happened.

Mem.—People are always learning by slow degrees, and having their eyes opened to home truths. For example, it is now plain to me that the love of papas for their babies is a mere figment compared with that of their mammas. My model poetess, Felicia Hemans, has set this forth in her impassioned verse, beginning

'There is in all this cold and hollow world no fount
Of deep strong deathless love, save that within
A mother's heart!'

And though, when I first read the passage, I could scarcely agree with the principle it enforces, I can now do so very emphatically. For natural affection is one thing, and the affection of habit—of daily familiar intercourse—is another. Each exists entirely independent of each; yet the intensity of the former is increased in exact proportion to the agency of the latter. Parents love their children primarily simply because they are theirs; afterwards very much in the ratio in which they are used to their companionship. Of course I do not speak of children old enough to have developed their peculiar dispositions, but merely of those of tenderest age. Now, how short a time the father spends with his baby compared with the mother! Consequently the space which that child occupies in his heart is little more than nominal (being solely the natural affection), contrasted with the vast extent which the near and dear and constant fellowship has made in hers. Thus, though George is as fond of Charlotte as a papa can be, it is not the engrossing fondness which mine must be. Perhaps some married ladies who are disposed to chafe at this state of things would do well to consider that what they may call a fault is only a necessity. They say that when daughters are grown up, their fathers usually idolise them. Is this because their girls remind them of what their wives once were in their own young days? And do the graceful pliant figures, flitting about the rooms, recall the early images of some who are now, alas! rather dowdy, rather fat, and rather elderly matrons? Association again! What a power it is! Somebody writes,

'We live by admiration, hope, and love.'

Truly, as far as my poor experience goes, we live more by association than by any other ascendancy, and our feelings are governed by habit and memory far beyond what we take account of.

From all I can learn, this Mr. Halliday must be half an entertaining, half a provoking type of mankind. When George arrived at the Grove, post haste, expecting to find his client stretched on a sick-bed, mayhap scarce able to articulate, he was startled by the information that he had set off about an hour before to the nearest fishing village, a distance of about fifteen miles; and he was more astonished still when told by the old butler that the object of the journey was to procure oysters, that being the only panacea which his master deemed suitable for the present phase of his disorder. 'Was any message left for me?' George asked.

'Oh yes, sir; if you are the lawyer, master begged you would wait his return in the afternoon.'

George followed the servant into the house.

'Why did Mr. Halliday go himself on this errand? Could he not have sent?'

'Well, he might have sent,' was the response; 'most gentlemen would; but master's not like other folk, leastways about health he isn't, as more people can tell besides the doctors.'

Having delivered himself thus, the butler gave a sort of chuckle, as if pleased that a fresh victim was being gained to the cause he served; and ushering his visitor into the library, he bowed and disappeared.

Here was a fine situation for a quick-spirited man, his mind full, primed for business, to be mewed up in a dull apartment in a strange house, to await, he knew not how long, for a person who seemed to be governed by no ordinary rules of common sense or common forethought!

After looking about the room, which had an odious scent of drugs (as indicated by the presence of sundry phials ranged upon the mantelpiece), and convincing himself that nearly every book on the shelves treated of health, or rather of all the diseases under the sun—horrid volumes with plates, rashly unveiling the intricacies of the human frame, and disclosing the legion of unimagined distempers which people might but never do take, George boldly resolved to burst his bonds.

'And so,' to use his own words, 'lifting the under sash, I stepped out over the low sill, and got out upon the lawn. The Grove is a large square erection, not exactly modern, and yet not ancient enough to be romantically suggestive. I was strolling along, and gazing at the general aspect of the place, when I observed another loiterer moving slowly across the grass, as if his sole aim, like my own, was to pass an idle hour. He came up, a young man with sand-coloured hair and pale eyes. We got into conversation; and then it turned out that this was a medical practitioner newly-fledged, who was also "biding his time" till Mr. Halliday should come home, having been strictly charged thereto by himself ere his departure in the morning.'

"Mr. Halliday wrote for me in an extreme hurry, to come and draw up his will, as he thought himself dying," I observed. The young Esculapian laughed.

"Easier said than done. That job has been talked of—let me see—yes, off and on, it has been talked of for the last ten years. I was just a boy, in Dixon's laboratory, when I remember being once despatched, in prodigious haste, to fetch a lawyer to do that very business. And it's never done yet! That is a joke! Some people fancy they'll die as soon as they've signed their last will and testament; but this man thinks it will be all over with him whenever the will's made out."

"And who was the lawyer for whom you were sent, can you remember?" I asked, wondering why Mr. Halliday did not continue to employ him still.

"Oh, bless your simple heart! I beg your pardon," he added, comically; "it's not so simple, maybe, seeing you're a lawyer; but you little know the patient. He has had a dozen of your sort since that far away time. He quarrels with them, he does, regularly. At least, he talks so absurdly and disagreeably to them, that their pride rises. One after another they take flight; and every week or two there's a new lawyer to seek."

"A fine prospect for me," I rejoined, smiling. "I had better decamp at once, before I am boarded by the enemy."

"Boarded and bearded both you'll be, most assuredly," quoth the vivacious youth; "and, sooner or later, retreat will be your course—that is to say, unless you are either a better-tempered or a cleverer man than any of your predecessors."

'You see, Kate,' George said to me, by way of parenthesis, 'I was to have rather difficult cards put into my hands to play; but this forewarning by the stranger was not amiss by way of preparatory discipline.'

'Well, but, George, take me to the climax, the dénouement,' I said; 'tell me about the principal actor of the dramatis personæ. When did he return, and what ensued?' My husband resumed—

'I walked about a good while with this juvenile physician, whose name was Herbert, and who, I discovered, was a fellow pretty tolerably given to fun and frolic, till at length, feeling hungry, I frankly put the query—"Was he aware what was the dinner hour at the Grove?" A loud fit of laughter was my friend's primal response.

"Dinner!" He echoed the word in high glee, as if gloating over my perfect innocence of the mysteries into which he was himself thoroughly initiated. "You will need more ability than the handling of the quill if you come here to live. I can tell you that." He had rather an aggravating way of thus emphasizing every scrap of information he gave me. "Whenever you want to eat in this house you have to set your wits tremendously to work to plan how to get it." Another laugh. "The first week of my apprenticeship at the Grove nearly finished me. That was in the days of my nonage; but even now I am sorely put to it sometimes to procure a mouthful."

'I suppose my face had grown long at this announcement,' George continued; 'and certainly I could not regard the matter as much of a joke—remembering that I had brought no edibles with me, and that the nearest shop I had noticed in coming along was a good four miles distant. Herbert could not restrain himself. Glancing at my blank visage, he threw himself on the turf, and absolutely roared. I stood ruminating, while vague notions of making a sudden bolt homewards at once glanced rapidly through my mind. A wretched, unreasonable, ill-tempered, sordid, hypochondriac, who would sould, and starve, and torment me, body and soul, till I should be tempted either to knock down the poor, feeble creature—and so make myself liable to a criminal charge—or else burst away from him at last (after suffering unknown miseries), to re-appear among my old friends a very skeleton of want and unrest. Why expose myself to such a chance? It was not to be thought of. Yes; I would disappoint the abominable churl, and escape from his clutches ere I had ever set eyes upon him. Thus I reasoned for a few minutes. But prudence and curiosity quickly took up the defence; and, in fine, prevailed. Let the worst come, I would brave it all; only he should pay for it, the unconscionable imbecile. And, meantime,

"Oh for a beaker full of the warm South!"

'What was I to do about the needful aliment? There was that ridiculous young man still lolling on the green sward, and indulging his most provoking merriment at my expense. I consulted my watch.

"I am going into the house," I said determinately;

"I see it is past five o'clock." My companion started up. He would go into the house too.

"Is Mr. Halliday a miser," I inquired of him, gravely.

"No—not exactly. I do not think parsimony is his besetting sin. It would be hard, indeed, to say what is; for he is everything that is chimerical. I can tell you that. His humour varies like the hues of a chameleon, and on no subject more than dietary. They say he sometimes takes a gormandising fit—seized with a sudden panic that his system is undermining—and eats rich meats every four hours, while his guests, perforce, must do the same. But I never had the luck to be here at these festive seasons; I suspect they are few and far between. He is on the starving method just now at any rate. But as to this dining project, perhaps, if you speak the butler fair, you may get some scraps or other to assuage the pangs of outraged nature. I might offer you a taste out of my private treasury (I mean the sandwich-box that is in my pocket); but I do not know how long I may have to subsist upon the contents myself. I may be kept here for a couple of days yet."

'We were nearing the hall door.

"What is the butler's name," I inquired.

"Mordaunt. And he is not a bad creature, only the leader's strings draw him rather tight; but speak him fair—speak him fair. Things go by the rule of contrary in this house. People are best entertained in the owner's absence; or, rather, when he is out of the way, they may possibly snatch a fearful joy in the matter of meat and drink, but, under his presidency, they are not entertained at all. You may depend upon that as a fact."

'I took the hint. I did speak Mr. Mordaunt fair. That is to say, besides dropping a civil word in his ear, I dropped a coin into his fat palm; and, after some preliminary skirmishing, such as consulting of clouds and calculation of distances to and from the fishing village, the time likely to be consumed there, &c., Herbert and I were set down to a pretty good repast—cold roast beef, hot cabbage, bread and cheese, and excellent mild ale. I could not help noting, however, that the covers were laid very warily, in a small back parlour, as if the whole affair were something out of the ordinary course of events, and not rashly to be spoken of. Indeed, it struck me that there was an air of secretness about the arrangements, as though the young surgeon and myself had been Government spies or returned convicts being feasted surreptitiously, in circumstances of imminent peril, which looks doubly droll in the retrospect.

"Ah! so much for the host being from home," exclaimed my friend. "What would Mr. Halliday say could he see you and me sitting here doing such capital trencher work. I never ate such a good dinner at the Grove—never! And I don't expect to do again in a hurry."

'We had barely finished our strange but most welcome meal, when the noise of wheels crunched on the gravel in front of the house; and the butler, rushing into the parlour, breathed out in an alarmed whisper—

"Gentlemen, master is come. I am very sorry, but you had best vacate this apartment. You can get into the library by the side door. It is as much as my place is worth. Do, gentlemen, oblige me. Come this way." We rose, and presently found ourselves in the library. And really, Kate, had it not been for the curiosity which impelled me from having seen the beginning to desire to see the end of this queer episode in my business experience, I should have literally vacated the premises then and there, henceforth and forever. But the novel phase of life upon which I had lighted seemed to promise some diversion, and I was unwilling to forego the affair.

"Bring those oysters into the house, but don't dare to open one of them till I am ready! How many doctors are here? is the lawyer come?" we heard a high-pitched disagreeable voice demanding impatiently of the servants in the hall.

"There he is!" quoth my pale-eyed, sandy-haired comrade. "Now, woe betide us if we put not all our quips and cranks into our pockets."

"The strangers are in the library, sir," Mordaunt informed his master in an obsequious tone. The door opened, and disclosed Mr. Halliday.

George had reached this point in his narrative when Rachel put her head into the room, announcing that visitors waited my presence in the drawing-room. George sprang up,

"Au revoir, Kate. I must be off to town. I shall give you the rest of my story to-night."

INNOVATIONS IN SCOTCH FORMS OF WORSHIP.

BY HERBERT GRAHAM.

THE subject of innovations in the forms of worship in use in the Established Church of Scotland, was lately brought before the General Assembly, by an overture from the Synod of Aberdeen. This overture was supported by Professors Pirie (Aberdeen) and Crawford (Edinburgh), who objected to the innovations for reasons which must appear to every one as rather shadowy than otherwise. The former thought that any innovations in the forms of worship would give rise to discord; while the latter objected to them solely on the ground that it was 'unwarrantable and inexpedient that established usages should be disturbed.' Both gentlemen concurred in the opinion that the innovations against which the overture was directed were 'in themselves matter of indifference.' Professor Crawford, indeed, went so far as to say that 'he had no prejudices against those postures or attitudes which the members of some congregations seemed to favour. He had no objection, in point of principle—whatever he might have on grounds of expediency—to the partial or occasional use of forms of prayer; though he preferred the old system of free prayer. And as to instrumental music, he confessed he never was able to see any good Scriptural grounds on which it could be objected to.' The subject was discussed at considerable length, and every opportunity was afforded for objections to the innovations being brought forward; but never was so lame a case made out as that in support of the overture from the Synod of Aberdeen. Not a single objection was stated which can bear the slightest investigation.

The innovations against which the overture was directed, and which have been either wholly or partially introduced into a number of Scotch churches, are—A recognised and established liturgy; kneeling during prayer; standing while singing; chanting the prose version of the Scriptures; and the use of instrumental music in the exercise of praise.

With reference to the second and third of these innovations, little or nothing need be said. Everybody knows that it is much easier to sing while in a standing posture than when sitting; and scarcely any one will deny that kneeling is the proper posture when engaging in prayer, as most expressive of perfect humility of soul, and reverence for the Supreme Being we address. The Bible itself teaches us the posture which we ought to assume in prayer. It must be humility of body as well as humility of soul; and the posture most expressive of humility and reverence is certainly not that at present recognised by the canons of the Scotch Established Church. But apart from this, and were it for no other reason, kneeling during prayer is preferable, because our attention is more apt to be attracted from the solemn service in which we are engaged by surrounding objects if we engage in that service in a standing posture. Whereas, by kneeling, surrounding objects are hidden from our view, and our attention is more likely to be given to the service. According to the existing practice, that posture is chosen for singing in which the voice has least scope; and for prayer that which is least expressive of humility and reverence, and in which we are most likely to have our attention diverted from our devotional exercises.

The use of a recognised and established liturgy is, we must confess, the most debateable innovation of the whole, as having too much the appearance of formality. But, after calm and unprejudiced reflection, we cannot see that even this is a very serious objection. Prayer, as we consider it, is the addressing of God in the language of the heart, confessing and asking forgiveness for sins committed, and soliciting the Divine help in everything we undertake. It is immaterial in what form of words the prayer is couched, for it is not the words themselves which constitute prayer. Words are but the expression of prayer. There may be prayer without words, and there may be words without prayer. The simple expression, 'Our Father,' &c. is not prayer. The words must be uttered in meekness and sincerity, and with a belief in their efficacy. At the same time, however, that it is immaterial in what form of words a prayer is couched, so that it is emphatically the heart's utterance, we must not forget the Being to whom that prayer is addressed—the King of Kings and Lord of Lords. No language, however beautiful, is too good for prayer. When we address an earthly monarch, we do so in the choicest terms; and, if we so respect the majesty of an earthly potentate, shall we not reverence in a far higher degree Him who is King above all kings—mightiest in the mightiest? Can there, then, be any objection to a recognised liturgy, which would be the work of the greatest divines in the Church? The language, doubtless, would be the most fitting in which to address our Maker, and it would be such as would rivet the attention of worshippers to a much greater extent than is often at present the case, when extemporaneous prayers are offered up in a careless tone, and couched, at times, in language calculated to shock the ear. The objection of formalism is, we think, as applicable to the present mode of prayer as it could be to the liturgical service, and indeed we consider it groundless as applied to either; for, however beautiful, however original and extemporaneous a prayer may be, it is not the prayer of him who does not in his heart repeat it with a fervent Amen! Jesus himself said—'When ye pray say, Our Father which art in Heaven,' &c. thus giving the form of prayer which is repeated by almost every Christian man, woman, and child; and does any one, who fervently, and with his whole heart, repeats the Lord's Prayer, accuse himself of formalism?

The two remaining innovations—chanting the prose version of the Scriptures, and the use of instrumental music—are scarcely open to a single weighty or valid objection. With all reverence be it asked, Is it not preferable to praise God by singing His word, as contained in the Old and New Testaments, rather than to praise Him in that language as pruned into metrical shape by men almost our contemporaries, as if the inspired book required to be twisted into rhyme before it could be made use of in the exercise of praise? The introduction of instrumental music would add to the euphony of the praise which we offer up. We are not of those who deem it necessary that praise be expressed; on the contrary, we maintain that praise in this respect resembles prayer, and may be offered up in the language of the heart. There is no instrument so well fitted for leading the Church psalmody as the organ, because there is none which can send forth music so solemn and sweet; and although not a single voice were uplifted, the praise would be as effectual, provided the melodious cadences of the instrument found a fervent repetition in the heart. But more than this, there is Scriptural authority for the use of instrumental music in the Church. This is not denied even by the opponents of those innovations. There are some people who deem the prevalence of discord an evidence of the sincerity with which praise is conducted, just as there are people who think that a clumsy, careless delivery on the part of a preacher is an evidence of his earnestness. We have no desire to be ranked among either of these deluded people; but we have a very great desire to see the forms of worship of the Established Church improved upon. It is little short of an absurdity to refrain from improving these forms simply because they were in existence among our forefathers. As well might we object to purify anything because it had been dirty for years. We have no fear of any discord which these innovations might introduce into the Church; and we think the statement of this objection on the part of Professor Pirie was only a weakening of the already weak case of which he was the supporter.

In the meantime, the matter is in the hands of a committee to consider the overture from the Synod of Aberdeen, 'in connection with the whole subject of the laws and usages of the Church, and the present practice of the congregations in regard to the administration of public worship throughout the Church; and to report to next General Assembly the result of any inquiry the committee may institute regarding these matters; and at the same time to report whether, in the opinion of the committee, any and what legislative measures on the part of the Church seem necessary or expedient in the circumstances.'

MEMORY.

HERR TEUFELSDRÜCKH, in 'Sartor Resartus,' describes two kinds of hats, which he thinks highly desirable—one to give the wearer the freedom of space, the other the freedom of time. Put on the space-annihilating hat, and you are anywhere. But more profitable and pleasurable than these, and vastly more to be desired, would be the freedom of memory. If one could forget just so much as displeases, and remember only what is pleasant, it would be a discovery and an acquisition more valuable than Teufelsdrückh's hat, or the chloroform metamorphosis. The misfortune and misery is that we forget what we want to remember, and remember most what we wish to forget, and the science of mnemonics thus far does not help us. Many a wretch is haunted and turned haggard by a remorseless past; and many other wretches have lost their years of toil because the past has become blurred, and swims in mists and darkness.

To those earnest after a full investigation of the constitution of memory, we refer to Abercrombie on 'The Intellectual Powers;' our purpose shall be to express, in this article, our views on the causes of its defective culture and use.

It is evident that scholars in all ages have had the greatest delight in the accumulation of learning; and this delight, so little attended to, yet so keenly pursued, is the secret spring and power of their memory. What we love we can remember, and what we love and understand is constantly present to the mind, especially when it is free to turn to the object of its love. On the other hand, it is equally clear, from the facts of the case, that the class which has no love for and perception of scientific and philosophic facts and principles, can have no very strong scientific or philosophic memory. The call, therefore, to participate in the sciences, where a love of learning does not exist, will be responded to by a dull and stupid acceptance of facts, and with a miserable memory for their induction and details. As memory lies at the basis of education, the question becomes important,—By what means the ninety-nine hundredths of the human family are to enjoy the benefits and blessings of the knowledge of natural truths, and how they may be enabled to gather up with delight and pleasure the multifarious particulars which give weight and consistency to the understanding of the sciences and arts, instead of taking a few generalities on trust from others, accompanied by much disagreeable and unprofitable exertion of memory? This is the question the diffusers of knowledge have not proposed to themselves, much less attempted to answer. The scientific world has a pleasure in its science, and therefore retains it in mind; the general public is attracted to other objects, and scientific facts are faintly apprehended, with whatever effort, and no sooner heard than they fade from the disc of memory. The promoters of education have a serious obstacle here, which requires their primary regard, namely, the adaptation of scientific, artistic, and philosophic knowledge to the rudimental intellect of the public. It is not to be thought, however, that the scientific memory is remarkable for strength and retentiveness. Putting out of sight the mathematical and mechanical sciences and their dependencies, it may fairly be asserted that the greater part of the other sciences is held by books and not by living memories. It is true that there are in Europe and America a few dozens of professors, who, by dint of perpetual repetition, have imprinted on their recollections immense stores of facts, which they can reproduce at pleasure, almost without an effort of thought. But, in these cases, the memory is too often developed at the expense of the active faculties; and besides, they are so rare and so easily enumerated, that they only prove by their single tall heads how many memories of smaller stature are sleeping an unknown sleep under the oblivious waters. We are obliged to conclude from our own experience, as well as from the observation of others, that in the noblest of the physical sciences — we mean physiology — the scientific memory is lethargic and oppressed; while the public memory refuses to hold even for a brief hour any considerable number of details of that important subject. The literary class is especially to be pitied for the awkward position which it occupies in relation to the sciences. With every motive to refresh the mind from the deeper fountains of Nature, and to cultivate a sincere amity with the votaries of all knowledge, the literary man, by his very education, by the refinement of his tastes, by his appreciation of beauty, by his practical grasp of the value of order, by the habit of appealing to the human heart, is incapacitated for entertaining dry, dull, and juiceless subjects, and consequently is for the most part singularly ignorant, and not seldom hostile to the prosecution, of the sciences. If there be a series in the art of forgetting, if oblivion can attain different velocities, then we should say that the man of letters, generally remarkable for studious habits and retentiveness of mind, has the shortest memory of all scientific particulars — that he forgets them with a rapidity and a power far surpassing that of other men.

It appears, then, that the experience which supplies the materials for all our knowledge is, from some cause, ill-adapted to the first faculty which is destined to receive it; that the memory refuses to retain the greater part of those facts which ought to nourish the intellect; and furthermore it is found that, in proportion as the facts are related to the living or organic kingdoms, in the same proportion they are indigestible, and their stay in the mind is short and unsatisfactory. What is the solution of the knotty difficulty? Is the common mind ill-constructed, or has it been wrenched or become diseased? Or, on the other hand, may we resort to so daring an explanation as to affirm that the particulars of the sciences and their literary presentation are not worthy food for the unsophisticated human powers? As to the fact itself, we believe the largest portion of every miscellaneous audience will bear us out. Who has not tried, with a painstaking almost amounting to martyrdom, to read, understand, and carry away the information contained in works on botany, zoology, organic chemistry, comparative and human physiology? Who has not tried to persuade himself or herself of their magnitude, interest, and value? And who has not miserably failed in the attempt? And though he commenced with a will strong as Hercules, yet after a brief space has he not slunk away from the distasteful duty, with his mind emptied of all motives for the prosecution of the enterprise? For, like a tired horse which has been once over-driven, or as the vulgar saying is, 'dead beaten,' on a particular road, the mind no sooner finds itself on a track, which suggests a parallel experience, than it becomes obstinate, restive, and immovably stationary, or only active in retracing its steps and quitting the compulsion of the journey.

We know of no more hopeless task than that of publishing and popularising the present sciences, until there is awakened in the understanding of the public a ready and spontaneous sympathy for the facts of science, and a clear perception of their relative use and practical value. There must be developed a love for, and delight in, the details and principles of science, else there must exist a deplorably deficient public memory. Those who live in the central glow and focus of Mechanics' Institutes may retain, for a longer or shorter period, a few of the details of the sciences, because they are 'rewarded' for such exertions of memory; but to expect the common people to be converted to botany, or zoology, or physiology, as those branches are at present taught, is as wild as to dream of the conversion of the Hindoos, as a nation, to the revived doctrines of Protestantism or Catholicism. We might indicate, without difficulty, a series of other unfortunate predicaments in the existing sciences; but it is quite sufficient to show that they are heterogeneous with the cultivation and practical exercise of memory, and that, by natural necessity, ordinary mortals find themselves thinking about something else when these dry specimens of knowledge are taught or discussed. And if the mind refuses to house or hold them — if they are dismissed from the very threshold — how can they ever be embodied in the human constitution, or partake of the deeper life of the affections, or give vigour and cosmopolitan power to the understanding? If they gave pleasure, or even pain, they would then be remembered by their effect; but, causing apathy, weariness, and sleep, it is no wonder that ordinary dreams should leave a more vivid impression, and enter more into the tissue and connections of the work-a-day world.

But the ready question which mounts to the lips is,—Where is the fault? Is the shortness of our memory to be charged to our stupidity, or to a wrong-conception of our rights and uses in relation to the sciences? If any of these suppositions be accepted, there is an end to further attempts at the diffusion of knowledge. We believe the main explanation is to be found elsewhere. We justify the baldness of our memories by alleging the baldness of the materials which are offered to them. Facts are, indeed, facts; but in Nature they occur in a certain order and simplicity, and out of that order and simplicity are fantastic and artificial; that simplistic order invests them with a beauty that is the highest object of sense, shorn of which their native sense is obliterated, and we cannot attend to them. Facts also take for granted principles, homogeneous with the principles of the human mind; and if these are ignored or disregarded, the soul and motive of the science die. Now, the data of the sciences are labouring under this twofold disfranchisement, and this is the reason of that secret consciousness which we all feel of an inability to receive them, even at a time when the necessity for knowledge is greatest, and the thirst intense, and when duty, not less than interest, prompts us to seek instruction wherever it may be found. Before we close these superficial reflections on this weighty subject, we solicit attention for a brief moment to the ill effects which have arisen from the method of education in our public schools and seminaries. These effects may be shown in the ignorance and half-developed understandings of many who have received what is commonly enough called a first-class education. Learning has been pumped into them by a diurnal process, until they become top-heavy—vast accumulations of figures and facts heaped up in their memories; but no considerate attention having been given to the relation of these facts to uses, the memory, at the dictate of compulsion, is the conservator of dead knowledges, and the brain has become a scientific necropolis. Those who in their youth have had all the advantages of an eclectic, rich and varied culture, by stupidly weakening the faculty of reason, which gives the noblest material for instruction and delight in science, become our dullest men. Much complaint is made by those who are capable of discerning radical defects in our educational systems, that in the schools the memory is too exclusively cultivated, and educators say that the children learn mechanically or by rote. Let them be comforted, the young innocents are in no danger of a mnemonic plethora. Our opinion, expressed already most freely, is that the memory is sadly or fatally abused, by crowding upon it stores of propositions, predicates, and principles, which the understanding does not comprehend or the feeble heart sympathise with; and that is the reason of our defective and feeble scholarship, and of the want of coherency in our philosophic and scientific systems. Instead of attempts to strengthen the memory, to make it retain the record of a multitude of facts and fancies which are mainly unintelligible, let earnest heed be given to the elevation of the understanding, the opening of the perceptions, and the development of the affections, to clasp the beneficent ends and uses of knowledge; and then the memory will, through kindred sympathy with the heart and intellect, retain their image and impress.

There is a vulgar notion that a great memory draws its pabulum from the other faculties, and leaves them feeble. Sir William Hamilton effectually refutes this notion. Memory—or, rather, reproduction, which is the power of drawing from memory, out of which nothing is ever lost that once entered—depends, in part, on self-energy, and intellectual and spiritual life; and men of the first reasoning powers have had it in remarkable fulness. Leibnitz and Euler could repeat the whole of 'The Cæcid'—Seneca could recite the longest discourses—Cyrus name every soldier in his army—Lord Macaulay and Dr. Leyden could give the contents of a newspaper and an Act of Parliament after having once read them.

The experience of any one who watches the process of his own mind, will verify that, when the feelings are aglow with interest, and the intellect receptive and strong, the memory not only becomes retentive, but the more readily yields up its treasures. Then its whole province becomes alive and astir, and facts and images throng up out of it, without being called—showing that the very opposite of the common notion is true, and that memory, intellect, and spiritual life rise together into quickness and energy, or sink together into torpor and death—revealing, too, how the quickened consciousness, like a Witch of Endor, speaks the buried thoughts from their graves, and, rushing through the soul, makes all the sealed pages of our mental books open and burn with fire.

ANNABELLA-FRANCES PORTER.

SKETCH FROM MY VISITING-CASE BOOK.

'I SAY, Lee, by Jove! it won't do. She does not care for your intentions, that same young lady, though you have tried to obtain a smile from her for the last month. You see, man, she is quite respectable. That's a pretty little cottage where she stays—the garden in front, with its flowers—the rose twining over the doorway in full bloom—the arched roof—the paternal relatives unconscious of Cupid's dread artillery—the lovely creature—the only child, well-beloved and much admired;—and then you, the young gallant, attempting to take her heart by storm, make the grand general combination quite à la mode—poetical and romantic. Eh! But it won't do, I repeat. Why, now, say you are beat, and console yourself, as all disappointed lovers do, with the sage reflection that "there's as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it."'

'Well, Fairgrieve, perhaps I might have done this a month ago; but now her very pertness and sauciness provoke me to the contest. What do you think! The little minx fired up and became dignified, the other night, when I spoke to her. Very absurd this, was it not! There are various avenues, however, to the female heart, and though I must confess the path is not very plain at present, yet I could bet you a small trifle, old fellow, that before the summer ends she and I will be better acquainted. Give it up, do you say! Not if I know it.'

'Of course, I did not expect you would. Arthur Lee not succeed? Why, the whole mess would ring with it if you were beat. Arthur Lee experience defeat in the scaling of the female heart! The thing is preposterous. Yet, seriously speaking, I am afraid your handsome face won't be of so much service here. Nay, don't look so fierce; and though your intentions, I doubt not, are honourable, still she does not know that, and hence won't speak to you. However, if you are bent on going on, I wish you luck, for she is a deuced pretty girl; and, were you not already in the field, mayhap I would discard Polly and enter the lists.'

'Hinc illa lachryma! and those very sententious remarks from my very moral friend Harry Fairgrieve! Well, we will give it up this afternoon at all events. Yet, heigh-ho! my little nymph, you and I must know one another. 'Twould be a shame that such "A flower should bluish unseen,

And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

By-the-by, who is the author of that! Though I have quoted it scores of times, I am blessed if I know. My education and principles, I am afraid, have been sadly neglected. You have got your cigar-case, I see; hand me one, and let us have a turn along Princes-street. Eh!'

Such was the conversation of the young officers, as they sauntered along, after having followed, at a respectable distance, yet never losing sight of, 'the pretty girl' they spoke about, until she arrived at her home, as thoroughly romantic as Fairgrieve had described it to be. And, indeed, it was a very beautiful and sweet spot—'Rose Villa,' as it was called—and bright and clean was the brass plate on the gate, which showed it belonged to John Fairlie, Esq. A kind and pleasant man, too, was John Fairlie, Esq., retired now from business, to live here, with his wife and only daughter, on the competency he had fairly earned. Very proud, too, was he of his daughter Bella, with her light and happy ways, her merry laugh, her graceful figure, her pretty face, and bright blue eyes; all which made her—he was won't to say to his old friend Isaac Ridley, as they smoked their pipes together—'A perfect jewel, sir, I can assure you. I never contradict her in anything.'

To which the other would always reply, 'Yes, yes. I love her as much as you, John. She will make some young spark's heart ache yet.'

Yes, Bella Fairlie! not merely did your father and Isaac Ridley, and your bashful but not less devoted admirer Robert Willan, acknowledge your beauty, but you knew it and felt it yourself, when you went to a mirror and saw the reflection there. I am afraid, like a faithful biographer, I must admit that you knew it very well, and that you were not a little vain of those good looks of yours. And what young beauty of seven-teen is not? I am afraid I must also state that you liked to be admired, and that in the bottom of your heart you were not so terribly displeased, although you affected to be so, with the handsome young officer's marks of admiration. You were trained up to beware of deceit and flattering words; yet I am afraid you knew from whom all those rapturous billets-doux came, and that you were wont to sit and read them very diligently, and that you did not burn them at once, as you ought to have done. Perhaps those novels you read contributed to this, and made you like the mystery and romance. I am afraid Arthur Lee was right when he said there were many avenues to the female heart, and that he interpreted rightly in imagining flattery and perseverance was the way to yours. I am afraid all these things put together made you allow your dignity and propriety to be too easily compromised, when he spoke to you, exactly one month after the conversation I have mentioned. I am afraid you did not resist, as you ought to have done, his polished address; and that you should never have permitted yourself to speak to him at all. I know not how it was that your resolutions fled as you talked with one another. Perhaps there was something in the hour, in the place, and in the man that helped it all, and banished the recollection of the usage of society as to personal introduction which should have been yours.

It was the evening hour of a hot summer day; and at such a time how tuned the mind is to gentler feelings—how banished are all angry thoughts—how the breast swells and the heart flutters with that nameless sensation which bespeaks the advent of love! And the place, it was the Calton Hill; and the summer evening there, how gloriously grand it is! Beautiful then is the shade on the hills of Fife—quietly sleep the waters of the Forth. 'Tis a noble sight to see

'The stately ships go out and in
From their haven under the hill!'

while the 'lion couchant' of Arthur's Seat, seems bathed in purple radiance, to look down less gravely and grimly than at other times on 'my own romantic town.' And the man—ah! yes, as he sat there you recognised his power. There was a frank bonhomie about him—polished and artful was his conversation—low and winning was his voice—well did he describe to her what he had seen in other lands when he was abroad—how the sunset there differed from that they were admiring, and the intercourse so unlike that of this northern clime—how heart met heart, as 't were, spontaneously, and stiffness and formality were never seen! In truth, he possessed that nameless something to which the woman turns and clings as instinctively as the tendrils of the vine do to the props which bear their weight. We speak about love at first sight, as if it were reserved a peculiar privilege for men alone; but I often think there is a somewhat stronger feeling in the female breast, which runs riot at times with the position the woman holds in society, and breaks down all the barriers and fences which custom has reared. Usage and conventionalism may rightly endeavour to check this; but yet at times we can often discern that which has been so beautifully described in 'David Copperfield,' when, as Stearforth told his stories of shipwrecks and dangers, Emily fixed her eyes on him, and crept closer to the wall, as if to be away from Ham. And so it was here; and Bella Fairlie, poor child!—for she was but a child in this world's ways—gave him, almost before it was asked, that simple trusting heart of hers, with all its untold affections and deep and faithful love. Perhaps, O casuist! you will say this confession is subversive of all principle, and utterly alien to the stereotyped Hoyle-pattern of love-making. Well, it may be so. I have merely to detail facts, not to analyse reasons; but if I cared about contradicting the charge, I think it would not be difficult to show how the one occurs more frequently—ay, fifty per cent. more—than the other; I mean than those namby-pamby love conversations between Augustus George and Beatrice Alice, or whatever the names of the hero or the heroine may be.

And Arthur Lee, what meant he as he sat beside her on this the first night of their interview? Why had he so persistently attempted to become acquainted with her for the last two months? And now that he had succeeded in speaking to her, what was his object? What did he want? He, the accomplished gallant—he, the acknowledged lady-killer—the scion of an aristocratic house—the high-born, well-bred officer—why did he thus exert all his efforts to please on this untutored mind? I will do him the justice to say that he meant no harm, that it was as yet all a bit of lark and quiet chaff. He had been previously struck by her beauty, and now he still more admired her artless ways—her naïveté; and it flattered his vanity to see the liking she evidently had for him, and which, though not expressed in so many words, he soon discerned.

When he saw all this, he paused not to consider consequences. He thought it would be nice to have a small flirtation, pour passer le temps, and that her company and conversation would be rather agreeable than otherwise, after the etiquette of other ladies' society; and that it would be charming at times to have a quiet stroll with such 'a pretty and fascinating girl' as he owned Bella to be. More than that, he said to himself, as he looked at her as she sat beside him, in the flush of her maidenly beauty—'She is one with whom a fellow need not be ashamed to walk. Why, that girl of Fairgrieve's is nothing like her.'

And so he pooh-poohed her scruples as to meeting him; talked her over, until she thought there would be no harm in it at all; and, in the innocence of her heart, said she 'would take him up this night, this very night, to see her father; for he is a kind old man, and will be glad to see any one I like.' Arthur Lee, however, did not accede to this. Nor on this night, or ever afterwards, did he show any anxiety as to knowing her father; and, indeed, if the truth must be told, he was rather averse to seeing him—strove to impress Bella with the necessity of secrecy—and took care, on each succeeding evening he met her, to choose places for their walk where there might be the least possible chance of their ever encountering her parent. These walks—how very pleasant they were! How little did Bella see the diversity of rank between them! How firmly did she rely on everything he said; and loved him foolishly, fondly, with all the gushing affection the woman's heart can bestow!

And so the thing went on for two months; and then—But why should I further dwell on what, I dare say, most of those who read this, and who are acquainted, in ever so small a degree, with the world's ways, will have already anticipated? 'Tis somewhat sickening to detail the steps of a girl's ruin—to hear the same old story about parents' opposition, and worldly interest, requiring, in the meantime, a private marriage—the refusal at first, and then the separation talked of, which he who proposes it knows full well would but break the fond heart that is left—and the artful plan, at last accepted, of flight, concealment, and—and—ruin! I like not to dwell upon this; and I think I will best consult good taste, and the reader's approbation, if I merely say that they went away together—far away from her home and her parent's love—far away from Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Crags—from the old familiar walks and faces. And she is now with him in bright and golden Italy—the land she had read about in the story-books of her youth—the land of the poet and the painter—of sculpture and architecture—the land which, with its clear and sunny sky, she had told him she longed so much to see.

It is now six months since she came with him;—and is she happy! Portly priests and rubicund philanthropists may call public meetings, and make lengthened speeches, about homes for the destitute. Ladies—I honour their motives—may issue cards, superintend midnight parties, and fancy that sympathy, in the shape of butter and bread and tea and toast, will recall the wan and wearied wanderers who attend. Maiden aunts, as they instil the principles of the Ten Commandments, and the terrors of the law, to their young female class, may try another plan, and, shaking their gray, old curls, may point their thin and withered hand to one who fell. But oh! what a power for good there would be, far greater than anything else, could the picture but be hung round the young and tempted female heart of one who has left her home—who, seated amidst all the grandeur that wealth can supply—seated even where Bella Fairlie was at the time we write, with her eye resting on the sunset of Italy,—but who yet has the great big tear of shame stealing down her cheek—as now, after the first maddening love-dream is over, she finds that no marriage rite has ever sanctioned her love, and feels the immeasurable gulf that separates her from the purity of her youth. For, I daresay, I need scarcely again repeat that Arthur Lee never did intend to marry Bella Fairlie; that all the story about the justice he would yet do to her, and the position she would yet occupy, were mere salves to a wounded conscience. I daresay even he was sorry he had gone so far—anxious, it may be, about the girl's future; but then, marry her! that was quite a different thing—perfect nonsense—sheer madness even to think of committing such an act of folly! Why, after all, he had been no worse than others. The same thing is done regularly. Had not Jackson of the 30th, and Harris of the 60th, and fifty others he recollected, been as bad, if not worse, than he was? Had not Fairgrieve written a reply to some of the scruples he had expressed, stating he 'would be a confounded fool if he spent any more money upon her—that it was time he was thinking of returning home—adding various pieces of judicious worldly advice, and hinting that perhaps her friends would take Bella back, forgive and forget the past!' He reasoned thus with himself for a little, and gradually came to the resolution that, however much he had liked her, and did like her still, yet that it was but right and proper that this state of matters should cease—that he should free himself from the position in which he was placed—that justice both to himself and Bella required they should separate! And so this reasoning ended, as it ever will end, in the man's desertion and the girl's despair. With him to resolve was to act. Yet he did not abruptly terminate their intercourse, but cautiously and circumspectly put the ban of estrangement between them. Less passionate did he become in his declarations of attachment—cooler and colder in his conduct—talked much about friendship, and seldomer about love—till it chilled the blood, as it were, in her heart, and was harder, yea, very much harder, to bear than the thought of home, friends, or anything else. 'Tis very terrible to feel the affections of one you love with heart, body, and soul, flitting away from you; and, do what you will, you can never regain a love that even for a moment has ceased to be entirely and surely yours. It was chilling to the warm-hearted girl, who had sacrificed everything for him, to feel his affection ebbing away—to know that the old familiar caresses were returned with but a careless shrug, and daily to experience the fact that, for some reason or other, she was not in his eyes the Bella of old.

At length, on pretext of making a visit to a friend at Naples, he went away. He promised to return soon—yes, very soon; and as she clung around him, telling him how very lonely she would feel in this strange land without him, the better part of his nature seemed for the moment to rise within him, and he said:—

'My poor dear child, do not act thus. In a month at most I shall be back to you again, never more to be separated, I trust, in this world. You will find everything provided for you as if I were here. I will write often to you—yes, very often; and you must think of me in my absence as if I loved you, dear, as much as ever! You will think of me—will you not?'

Think of him! Yes, if that were possible, she thought of him in his absence more than she had ever done—thought of him during the dull, spiritless, wearisome days, for though the sun was bright and the sky was clear, there was no sunshine in her saddened heart—thought of him during the long sleepless nights—thought of him, prayed for him—thought at first of his happy, joyful return—thought of him, as she worked away so regularly and steadily at the nice little presents she would have ready for him, the slippers and the book-marks, and, whatever it might be, she took care, if possible, that the initials A. L. and B. F. should somewhere be seen—thought of him, with that intense, yearning longing, which the female heart can so deeply feel.

Days and weeks passed slowly on. The month expired on which he was to be back, and yet there came no letter—nothing to cheer her. No one to make a companion of, except those melancholy thoughts of hers; and, alas! they became still more melancholy and sad as time wore on. Was he ill? Was he dead? Why—why was this? Or, worse than aught else, at times, as stories she had read rose to her mind, there came the dawning of the dismal truth—the breaking in on her of the bleakest and blackest of sorrows—the sealing up, as it were, of the very springs of her existence, when there came the thought that, perhaps, the studied coldness previous to his departure, and now this long, long silence, were all parts of one plan, premeditated and intended—that, perhaps, this was desertion! Back did she fling the foul suggestion at first. Back, and away down, down, out of every corner of her heart—away down, till she thought it would never rise again and trouble her more—the awful, frightful thought, which, she said, would never be realised, so confident did she feel about his return—so certain that, whatever others might do, or had done, Arthur Lee, her own Arthur, would never—no, never, she said to herself, as she looked at the locket she wore round her neck, and kissed the image of him who was away. But time still wore on; and up came the suggestion again and again—black, hideous, and appalling as before, till it seemed as if she would grow mad under the suspense. Yet even the suspense, terrible as it was, was better than the awful truth that came at last, with the letter, the long looked-for letter, which stated—(I shall not repeat how the fact was varnished over)—the fact that circumstances prevented him from seeing her again—about his wishing still to be reckoned her friend—about his never forgetting her—and hoping that the cheque which he enclosed would be sufficient to carry her home again, if she wished it.

There is a strange peculiarity in this nature of ours. I have often seen the coldness and shivering, the depression and languor of commencing fever, followed by the bounding pulse, the hot skin, the parched lips, and the mad ravings of an unhinged mind. In medical nomenclature we call this the state of reaction—the assumption, we mean, of a new vital force, which has dethroned, and is to rule instead of that which previously swayed the frame. What is true of the body is in some cases as true of the mind. Here often we also see reaction—sometimes great and sometimes small. Call it by what terms you may—analyse the motives to which it owes its cause—account for it if you can on physical principles, ye philosophers and metaphysicians—search and see if you can give the explanation—for it is and ever will remain a fact, that of all the passions which influence and make havoc of the human frame, there is none half so violent or half so strong as the recoil and reaction of despised love. I speak not of that milk-and-water lackadaisical affection, which, by parlance and the fashion of the day, is sometimes designated love. Such a feeling does not merit the term. But I speak of the effect rejection has, in a case like this, on a heart that never knew another choice—on a nature that has given up all to be ever near him from whose affection the very life-blood seems to be drawn—of a love such as Bella Fairlie gave to Arthur Lee.

Was it for this she had left her home? Was it for this she had rejected warnings, braved reproach, and despised the world's talk! Was this to be the end of it all! Was she to be thrown off like a faded garment after it has served its master's ends! What was she now to do! Was she to steer her boat, as others had done, right merrily away into the ocean of shame, to drown regret and memory in excitement and drink! Was she to cozen her lips with the decoying smile! Was she to command attention by her beauty and become the woman of pleasure, the trafficker of vice! Nay, verily; such thoughts as these never entered her mind. It was but of him she thought—him who had done it all. But how changed had she become!

Tears and regrets were for ever gone; and there was now energy and resolve in their place. There was a fire—the fire of revenge—smouldering in her breast; and it but lacked time and opportunity to burst into an awful flame. Bad news never come alone; and she learned—from a casual acquaintance, to whom he had once introduced her, and who told her, perhaps with the view of furthering his own ends—that 'Arthur Lee (the butterfly that he was!) was now busy, in the southern capital, courting the only daughter and heiress of Signor Benoni. And, happy dog!' he added, with a careless laugh, 'I think that, as usual, he will succeed.'

This was to heap insult on wrong. These were the 'circumstances over which he had no control!' This, then, was the cause of his detention! The torch was now laid to the slumbering fire. Bitter was the cup she had had to drink before; and now, if it were possible, it was more bitter and terrible far when jealousy served to stimulate revenge. Wilder, sterner thoughts became her daily companions. She had something yet to live for. She would not die thus tamely. She would show to the world, and to him, what an injured girl could do. She, who used to look with pitying eyes on the meanest of God's creatures that had been injured, now seemed possessed with a fiend. Away with the false scruples that might bind her! Away with the laws of God and man! Away with everything which might intervene between her and the object of her desire! Crime it could not be. Nay, rather, it was justice to seek revenge on one who had broken every vow with her. There must be wrong for wrong—blood for blood! There must be death, and the means. Arsenic and antimony, given in the poisoned draught—she thought of these; but she heard there were antidotes for them. Antidotes! Bah! She must have something on which she could rely—something which would serve her purpose surely and well. She was in Italy; and there men soon rid themselves of a troublesome friend or an open foe. She must employ a weapon as effectual as theirs. So she gloated on the sharp stiletto. She loved to look at its polished blade. She was a weak woman; but she nerved her arm, and strengthened her muscles, to make the plunge swifter and surer.

After her resolve was taken, and her plans arranged, she reached her destination. Senora Benoni! She was known through all the town. She lived! Every one knew where she lived—in that large quaint old mansion, with the pleasant terraced garden to the back, that stretched down nearly to the bay. She learned that the young Englishman and she to whom he was considered as betrothed were wont to walk in the garden. It, then, was the place for her. She represented herself as a stranger—an admirer of the beautiful; and she heard there was no place, almost anywhere, which combined so well as this the perfection of nature with all that taste and wealth could supply. This, backed by a more tangible bribe, procured her admittance. The old man who allowed her to enter said,—

'She was free to walk over it all, on condition that she did not intrude herself on the sight of his young mistress; but, indeed,' he added with an arch smile, 'as the garden is large, there is not much danger of this, if you but keep away from that arbour which I show you; for in truth, senora, she loves to sit there better now than tend the flowers, as she used to do.'

Circumstances appeared to favour her design. The arbour he had mentioned would be the place for her. How well did the foliage behind screen her from view! Pleasant, grateful retreat! Fully an hour elapsed ere the two lovers entered the garden and neared the place of her concealment. They sat down, as she had expected, on the seat from whence the wide expanse of that loveliest of all lovely sights which Italy affords could easily be seen. Had they wished it, perhaps their ears might have caught at times the song—the song of that land of passion and of love—that ever and anon was borne towards them from the occupants of the gondolas as they studded the bay. But the two lovers—Arthur Lee and Laura Benoni—as they sat together, had a song of their own to sing—the song of mutual, reciprocated love. They spoke about many things. They spoke about the joys of the present and the hopes of the future—talking as only lovers talk, and in tones and language that it appears only profanity to attempt to repeat.

'Do you know,' she said all at once, 'caro mio, what I dreamed last night! No, I did not dream it. It was but a waking dream; for last night, as I was lying in my chamber all alone, there came a strange, wild thought into my head. I would not mention it to you, but you said you wished no secrets to be between us. Did you not! And I wondered, Arthur, if I was the only one you ever loved; if at any time you loved another; or if, O God! any one ever loved you as I do now!'

Arthur Lee! never did you look so handsome as now. Never was your face lighted up with such a glow of conscious triumph. Never did your eye appear so pure and true. Never was your voice so low and winning as when you made your reply, and told her again, as you had often told her before, of a love that was unbounded—of a love that as yet had never known a former choice—of an affection that through the future would never swerve from her, who had preferred him, the stranger, to others who sought her hand, and whom she knew better and longer. And you succeeded in your object. For Laura Benoni seemed to draw nearer to you, and to trust and love you better than before, as she said, 'I knew it was so. Yet I am so glad, so very glad, that suspicion or slander will never alarm me now. Who could hear you speak and not believe you? I trust you now just as truly as I have ever loved you.'

And, Bella, why, what is this? Why do you hesitate? Why does your arm fail to strike or your mind to boil with thoughts of revenge? You are very near already, but you can draw still nearer. They will never hear you. One step more and you will reach the goal. Arthur Lee has not forgotten you. You know he can't do that; but he has done worse. He has ignored your existence. He speaks as if he was as pure as the lisping babe,—and you know what he has done. Come nearer to him, therefore. Does not your hand bear the stiletto—the quick, sharp, and sure friend? Your arm, too, is strong now. And you black, beetle-browed man grinned behind his bushy beard, as he whispered to your inquiries,

'It is poisoned, senora. One little thrust—one little thrust this way, and human skill will in vain attempt to save your foe.'

Why, then, do you hesitate? Your fair fame is gone, and he is there who took it away. Courage, then, and action. Time is pressing. The gray dusk is gathering around, and Laura Benoni, your rival, is drawing her mantle around her, for the evening is getting cold. They will leave soon, and an opportunity like this may never again recur. Draw near, then, and complete the fostered and now almost realised scheme of revenge.

Philosophers tell us that the sea may be lashed into angry billows—that the storm may sweep along the rolling waters—that the waves may rear their crested heads—but that still, deep, deep down, further than human eye has ever reached or fathom ever gauged, there is a calm as profound as the slumbering lake may present after the evening's shower. What is true of the ocean and its laws may in kind represent that stranger, lawless, and more mysterious sea—the human heart. Passion, neglect, jealousy—a deep, irreparable wrong—everything that can break the spell of a woman's love had Bella Fairlie suffered. She had been roused to execute a rash, and one might almost say, had it been accomplished, justifiable deed; yet, down in the mine of her affections, secure from all the turmoil of the months that were past, lurked her love for Arthur Lee. False, deceitful, perjured, and liar as she knew he was—breaker of every oath that honour dictates or morality teaches—yet still, even now, as in former times, he was the Arthur Lee of her love, as she doubted not he also was of that proud Italian lady's. Hence, when the hour she had so much longed for had arrived, her will was powerless to raise her arm; and, had thousands been laid at her feet, she could not by one jarring word of hers have intruded a blot on his future life. There was a terrible binding fascination to her in the tones of that well-known voice, and the plans of that future which he had sketched were still to her the plans and wishes of Arthur Lee. She would not have foregone the luxury of hearing him speak, for she knew this would be the last time she would do so—that henceforth their ways in life would be far different—that his path would be one, it might be, of happiness; while, alas! hers would be one which would soon terminate in the grave. The funeral pile of her own hopes had been lit, and with their dissolution she knew would soon arrive that also of her life.

When the gray dusk was settling into night, the two lovers left the garden, and as she looked at her rival once again, she wondered not at his choice; for, Laura Benoni! thy form was fair. The sunset seldom lingers on a face as lovely as yours; the fire of youth, and beauty, and love brightens up your eye, and as you sit beside him you love, no wonder you are called 'la Bella' of the south! Yes, lady, you are passing fair, and life for you has been pleasant indeed; but not many months ago the sunset of a more northern land lingered on a form as fair as yours—golden ringlets rested where yours did lie—and eyes as bright and pure as the cloudless sky looked up to that man whom you think has never known a former love.

Away, away from the garden; and on the future you have sketched may sorrow never rest! May Time, the great discloser of events, never reveal how very near there was to you this evening, as you talked with him who is to be yours through life, one who felt a love with which yours can but ill compare, and who now, with bended knees, is praying for your welfare with a sincerity that will make them heard before high Heaven, for the sake of him who has thrown her lightly aside, as the school-boy does the butterfly after its wings are soiled and its beauty gone.

Five months after this scene in the garden, I was called in professionally to attend Bella Fairlie. The most superficial eye could then have detected that Death, the great destroyer, had marked her as his own. The face had lost its rounded contour, the figure its full and graceful outline. She appeared but the wreck of what I could have fancied her once to have been. I saw that human art would in vain attempt to stop the course of her malady; but I gave her something which might tend to relieve present suffering, and smoothe, if it could not arrest, the passage to the grave. There was little anxiety on her part to remain longer here; and when I learned her story, as I did when I became better acquainted with her, I did not wonder that, like a wearied traveller, she longed for rest. She told me she 'did not want to die in a foreign land, but thought that, ere she passed away, she would like to see, at a long, long distance though it might be, the home she had forsaken and the friends she had left; and that for this purpose she had come back to her native city.'

I remember, though many busy years have elapsed since then, the last visit I paid to her. For some days previously she had been gradually becoming weaker; and when I arrived, I found the change I had expected was coming on, and that the spirit was struggling to be free. The eye was bright, but it was lightened up only with the fire of dissolution. The face, usually so pale, was suffused with the hectic flush. The blood was bounding rapidly in its last circuits through the thin and fevered frame. The mind, too, was partially unhinged. At times the empire of reason was overthrown, and wandering, fitful thoughts showed its reign would soon for ever cease. But yet, whether delirious or not, the same all-absorbing feeling which had animated her through life remained dominant to the end. She recognised me when I entered, and, grasping my hand, exclaimed,

'Doctor! the end is coming now. This can't last long—can it! I am sinking fast—am I not! My mother! my good, kind mother!—did I tell you about her! The little cottage in which we lived is tenanted by others now. The old pictures are off the walls—the flowers, my flowers! are gone—and strange voices are heard where I used to sing. My mother! She is not dead! She is here! She has risen to come to this death-bed scene! Yonder! Don't you see her! Her face—it used to be so pale and mild; but, see, she frowns! Can that be the gentle mother I was wont to say my childhood's prayers to, long, long ago! Was there not a part in it which said "Lead us not into temptation"! She points to that, and says I have fallen. She wants me to curse him; but oh! no, no—I can't do that. My father! They said he went away to another land—they did not know where; and then they told me something about the daughter's shame. Aunts, with stern propriety depicted in their face—uncles, with averted looks, who speak about the disgrace to the Fairlie family—cousins, who in other days envied my beauty, now whisper "We knew it would bring her to this." Robert Willan asks me what I think now of "my gentleman lover"! All, all that I ever knew are crowded together here, and invite me to join with them in seeking God's vengeance on him who has done it all! But I can't do that. For,' she said, as she rose, with a wild and fearful energy, 'Hence! away! I tell you all. I was faithful to him in the days of happy, trusting innocence—faithful in the time of awful temptation; and I wish to die, faithful also in the hour of death.'

Then there was an interval of repose, and she awoke more calm and collected than she had previously been.

'Doctor,' she said, 'you have been very kind and friendly to me, and ere my tongue falters I would like to leave with you my last request. When a sunny, light-hearted child, there was a spot in Edinburgh where, in my young fancy, I liked to roam. You know the Lovers' Walk, with the tall hedge on either side, that bounds you in from the green fields of the meadows! Often, often, before I knew what it was to be loved, did my father take me up there on the Sabbath evenings, and he was wont to sit on the first seat you see after you have reached the cemetery, while I gathered bouquets of the daisies and cowslips that grew in plenty around. And often, also, after I knew Arthur, did we go to that favourite spot, and he told me then, so kindly and lovingly, what he would like our future to be. And now I wish to be buried there. The last of the money he gave me you will find within that old portfolio. I have long kept it a treasure sacred to this end. It will be enough. And on the stone that marks the spot place my name and age, and at the bottom—"Faithful even in death." The Christian, as he passes it by, will think it means I was faithful to my God; the eye of strange curiosity will deem it too humble for notice; and few will care to inquire who the Bella was. Yet you will know that it marks the spot where lie the remains of a poor broken-hearted girl—once a patient of yours—who threw a sweet incense of devotion around what might otherwise have been an unhallowed love. And one word more. In the practice of your profession, you will see many faces, and become acquainted with some who do not require mere professional advice. You may meet

Arthur. Should you ever chance to do so, then speak to him about me; but oh! do not do so harshly. Call him not my destroyer. And if he come here, then take him to my grave, point to the inscription upon it, and tell him how and where I died; that the last words I ever uttered were blessings on his head; that, when I would have cursed him, the old love arose, and, like a good angel, banished angry feelings; that, for his sake, I prayed for even his wedded wife; and that—that I wished him well. Oh my God! could I but see him once again—only once.'

I could not remain longer with her then, but left, promising to return. When I arrived there early next morning, the friend's face with whom she was staying too evidently showed me that I might expect worse news of my patient; but I was scarcely prepared to find, when I entered the room, that she was attired in the habiliments of the grave, and that the spirit had for ever fled.'

'When did this occur!' was all I could say, so much and deeply was I moved.

'Last night, sir, two hours after you left, she called me to her side, and asked me to put my hand below the pillow and give her the picture. She looked long at it, sir—very, very long—and then, two or three minutes afterwards, passed quietly away. Poor, dear child, she has been early taken!'

She was buried within the cemetery, and near to the spot where she had desired to rest. I never saw him whom she died for, and, indeed, had I done so, I do not think I would have mentioned her name, as marriage vows were upon him now, and it was needless to recall the past. She lies there, I doubt not, unnoticed and uncared for. Yet often, when my hard day's work of professional duties was over, often in the summer evenings, did I steal away to visit her grave; and I never did so without feeling better thoughts arise within me, and manlier resolves for my own future conduct-in life.

MINNIE MINE!

ANOTHER silver string is broken

From the thrilling harp of life;

Another wild farewell is spoken

'Mid the world's clanging strife:

And our tears of bitter brine

Flow for thee, wee Minnie mine!

Another blighted bud is shaken

From the spreading human tree;

Another last long look is taken,

As thy mother turns from thee:

While my tears of bitter brine

Wet thy cheek, wee Minnie mine!

Another white-wing'd soul is soaring

Heavenward through the clouds of pain;

Another little grave is soaring

Earth's green bosom And in vain

Gush those tears of bitter brine—

God has call'd wee Minnie mine.

Another little voice is blending

With the angel choir above;

And other two poor hearts are rending

In the storm of grief and love:

Round thy dust our spirits twine,

Loth to part, wee Minnie mine!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'Let never maiden think, however fair,
She is not fairer in new clothes than old.'—Tennyson.

CHAPTER V.

THE following amazing epistle, by an unknown hand, has been elicited by the matter contained in my last chapter:—

'MR. GABRIEL GRAY,

SIR,—Have you no gratitude? How can you reconcile it with common decency to vituperate, in black print, the gentleman whose bread you eat? My belief is that you are one of those insolent fellows who entertain no respect for their superiors. I have, accordingly, put myself at charges for a postage-stamp to tell you that, were I Mr. M'Corkindale—whom, even by your own showing, I take to be an upright and respectable gentleman—I would set you about your business at an hour's notice; or, in other words, with barely time to pack up your abusive manuscripts, written probably on his time, and with his very pens, ink, and paper.

Allow me, further, to make you aware that the fingers of the man whom you sent, in such deplorably bad taste, into a whisky-shop, during the storm at poor M'Donald's funeral, have, I am informed, been ever since itching for a nose.—Yours disrespectfully,
CASTIGATOR.'

Is there any way I could get at the profile of this knight-errant? What a revenge to pillory the slant forehead of him in the glass cases of the photographers! The Aztec! Not to know that M'Corkindale is Brown! Not to perceive that he is Jones! To be ignorant of the fact that he is Robinson! The next thing that I should expect of him would be to ask Brown, Jones, and Robinson whether they did not feel insulted up to the point of pistols and twelve paces! No doubt they could tell him that M'Corkindale was no other than Jenkins; but what a web-footed biped not to make the discovery for himself! Here is a man to interpret an allegory! Castigator, forsooth! As well might an aspirant for public office thrust his head into a noose, and call himself hangman. Who but the insanest of castigators would commit the mistake of putting his own back under a cat-o'-nine-tails?

Does he ask—'Why not say Jenkins at once?' I answer, that a villainous wrong would thereby be done, as Jenkins is very M'Corkindale after all, and shall be so branded to posterity, if there is life in these pages. But what a head must this Castigator have for cap and bells to fancy me in peril of his wrath! What though I have painted him as with the very pencil of the unflattering sun? Behind the eys of his vast conceit, David M'Corkindale, Esq. of the Drums, is as safe from being taken personally by the beard as were any of Alexander's shaved soldiers. Were I to draw the portrait of a brilliant architect of his own fortune—a man of profound sagacity—one who never committed the folly of encouraging imposture with alms, or mitigating, with impolitic tenderness, the natural penalties of imprudence—a merchant with a sleepless business eye, and a Christian always prominent in his handsome pew—the world might be a little puzzled, but the worthy man himself might use his razor by that mirror! O most forlorn of castigators! flourishing a melancholy ideal horse-whip, like a whirl-brained master of the ring gone mad and under keepers!

Then, with regard to the funeral storm and whisky-shop business, was it not in the flat bumps of him to think of prying into the beautiful, secret meanings of that episode? Was there no decipherable pathos in it, as a hurriedly-snatched reminiscence of convivialities never to be revived? Spoke it not of the humour peeping out from the quaint corners of all mortal solemnities, like the grotesque gargoyles from the eaves of some lugubrious old cathedral? Besides, was there not the insinuated double apology of the impelling hurricane and the misleading hat, showing—if not to Castigator, surely to the next duller—the incomparable subtle logic reticent at the heart of all innate bias? Did not one, the immeasurably opposite of this anonymous, put his fool's jests like breaking sunlight into the crannies of a king's madness, making the ruin more infinitely impressive? Oh, I can fancy the kind of nose that should smell fingers moving hither and thither, in mazy-morris, as Macbeth saw daggers in the air!

But how often does it happen that things in themselves worthless produce inestimable results? When I saw how Mathew Waddel, with his incomparable instincts, enjoyed Castigator's lucubration, the sudden increase in its value was miraculous. It went up as the funds go up when Louis Napoleon surprises Europe into a millennial confidence and a calm pulse. Every additional chuckle gave it an impetus like a fresh bid in an auction-room. Rarely, indeed, have I seen Mathew in finer fooling. His imagination gyrated about it, like a cat about a mouse, or a bee about a globe of clover. The idea, however, which tickled him most was the hint that I was not sufficiently respectful to my 'superiors.' 'By the tub of Diogenes!' he ejaculated, 'I should like to see your superiors, Gabriel.' Shortly afterwards, as if struck with a new idea, he swept the ceiling with a long whistle—such a whistle as Swift, or Churchill, or Butler might have emitted, on finding their choicest sarcasms too feeble to express their blended wonder and scorn. This was followed by a loud chuckle of 'Your superiors!' as if these words contained a conspicuously self-evident, and monstrously exquisite joke. Then, as if compassing a large horizon with his eyes, he said, 'Lend me thy lantern, good cynic.' After a pause, he exclaimed, starting to his feet, 'But, Gabriel! don't, after all, blame the world if it takes you at your own measure. By the soul of King John's barons! if I had a tithe of your genius I would be satisfied with nothing but a front seat. I would speak up to the world as Cobbett spoke up to the Bishop—telling that right reverend prelate that he "had ten times his talent and a thousand times his industry." What can any one expect but to stand behind chairs, and do insufferable menial work, if he will insist on wearing plush and hiding his noble individuality in the sleek lay-figure of a serviceable monosyllabic entity, buttons and calves predominant?"

'Mathew,' I said, 'sit down, curb your superfluous eloquence, make up another tumbler, and fancy yourself a creature with long ears.'

While my friend did as he was desired, and laughed like one who had to do all the laughing himself, I proceeded in this wise:—'What merit is there in crying out "Excelsior" to a galley-slave? Any blockhead who ever mounted a stump could do that. But a still more topping folly would be that of the galley-slave falling to buffets with his oar. "Gregory, o' my word, we'll not carry coals"—a noble and heroic resolve, but with the stomach considerably knocked out of it by the alternative of no fire and nothing to cook. Ah, Mathew! if flying were easy, our shoemakers—unless they, too, became volatile—would have to walk on their own soles; the streets of traffic would be empty; and all the high free air pervaded and shaken by a darkness and confusion of wings. For the most part, we set out in life on certain defined rails, leading to predestined and inevitable stations; and divergence from these, except by the switches and turn-tables of fair opportunity, would be destruction. But don't fly to conclusions, like a thirsty traveller to the first wayside inn. Even for scraping together of the Queen's coin, I confess to the possession of faculties worth twenty M'Corkindales. But away backward forty years and more, when our two lives were shaped into a union, daily and close, yet infinitely divergent—I was proudly—yea, I dare speak it, Mathew, before high Heaven, grandly weighted, while he, the old sinner! had nothing to carry, from the first, but a stomach of very catholic dimensions, and a cloak—tropical, old friend—of a rigidly formal cut. Had I chosen like him to bend every faculty of my being to the one worldly end of gain—had I been base enough to yoke all my young enthusiasms to the car of the plethoric god of riches until its axles were on fire—had it been my cue to fill my very dreams and nightmares with sum-totals long enough to reach to the infernal depths,—can I doubt that I would long since have been exhibiting, at the table even of the Drums, a visage purpling like a sunset, glowing with many vintages, flushed as might become a victor in the battle of life, with his gold-shod gouty boots on the prostrate necks of intrinsically nobler heroes? But the mystery of the celestial orbs—the low fitful harmonies and great sublime silences of the surrounding fields, floods, and mountains—the fancies and adorations of that youthful love that is of all human passions at once the bashfullest and the bravest—the bewildering mythologies that so fill the dim or brilliant canvases of the past with bizarre or beautiful shapes—the wonderful regions of romance and fairy opened up by the glorious old minstrels of all lands that have an antiquity—and the appalling phenomenon of Death transfigured into an infinite beatitude by the splendours of Christ's revelation—all hung upon my mind, filled my thoughts, engaged my highest meditations, and imparted to my imagination something of the wings that made the fabled horse of the poets kick the farmer's dray to atoms, and shake its resplendent harness into music fit for the gods. What, at that time, was an additional sovereign in a stocking to a fresh image in the heart, or a new acquisition in the brain? No matter. Look down this pit-shaft, O worldlings! and scorn, if you dare, the poor miner at its base, who sees, even from his low dark level, high over all your heads—immeasurably above all your dreams—through all the mighty daylight of your blindness—the stars of God and his angels.'

'You're a great man, Gabriel, if you only knew it, you old fool, you!' said Mathew, with rounded eyes, and a voice almost breaking into foolishness. 'By St. Mungo! you deserve to be knocked down with your own three-legged stool. Man alive! had you been only in the pulpit, or on the stage! But I shall blow my nose like a congregation—I shall clap my hands like a theatre—that is, if you will persist in making a spendthrift of yourself on such a poor solitary auditor as I am. Nay more, I will drink to you in your very greatest character—[enter Barbara abruptly],—as the father of the belle of Portland-street!'

My poor child—tall and very pale—with the inspiration of a fine pride on her statuesque features, had hurried across the street to exhibit her new gift, and almost to kiss the donor. When our praises of her ladylike and comfortable appearance subsided, Barbara took our dear neighbour's hand, and, looking him sweetly in the face, said—'The poet Wordsworth tells of a little girl whose old cloak got entangled and completely destroyed in one of the wheels of a chaise, behind which she had been hanging to help her on her way to Durham. Her cries caused the vehicle to be stopped. She was then taken inside, and carried to the end of her journey. But finding her quite inconsolable for her loss, the traveller ordered a new cloak to be provided for her, saying—

"And let it be of duffil gray,
As warm a cloak as man can sell."

After which the poet only adds—

"Proud creature was she the next day,
The little orphan, Alice Fell."

Now, like Alice Fell, I am, I assure you, very proud of my new cloak. I know not why you should have selected me for such kindness.' A thin tear glistened on her cheek as she faltered these last words, and Mathew Waddel affectionately kissed it away, not caring to trust his voice. Never since she was a tiny child had I seen him use such a liberty, but it had the sanctity in it of a good man's benediction, and neither she nor I was offended.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

ALLITERATION.

ALLITERATION is one of the most frequent, and, when properly used, one of the most beautiful and impressive ornaments of poetry. Like almost everything else, it is liable to get into abuse, and instead of being, as it ought to be, one of the most effective 'handmaids of the muse,' it is apt to degenerate into a vulgar and unmeaning instrument of witless buffoonery. Its abuse, however, is no argument against its real utility and beauty; and we are not to discard it on account of its being occasionally used in the bombastical effusions of some sensational author.

'Alliteration' is one of those words the meaning of which the glib-tongued schoolboy is expected to have at his fingers' end, though possibly he may not have the most distant idea of their real bearing and signification. With Johnson for his prophet, and the 'Dictionary' for his rule of faith, he will perhaps tell us that 'Alliteration' is derived from the Latin litera a letter, and means a succession of words beginning with the same letter, or something to the same purpose. As to examples to bear out his meaning, he might reply in the appropriate language of Canning's 'Knife-grinder'—'God bless you! I've none to tell, sir.' Doctors differ, it is said, and lexicographers are not entirely at one as to the meaning of the word which graces the opening sentence of the present article. Some are sensible enough to allow that the syllables do not invariably commence with the same letter, but almost all hold that they at least commence with the same sound. The best definition of Alliteration we have met with is that given in the 'Popular Encyclopedia':—'Alliteration is a figure or embellishment of speech which consists in the repetition of the same consonants, or of syllables of the same sound, in one sentence.' It is not necessary that each syllable or each word should commence with the same sound. It is sufficient for the purposes of alliteration if the same or similar sounds are repeated, in such a manner as to strengthen the language and produce a pleasing harmony. One of the finest and most admired examples of alliteration is the celebrated line of Virgil:—

'Quadrupedante patrem sonitu quatit ungula campum.'

This line is justly admired by the best critics, as illustrating to the sense, in a very happy manner, the measured gallop of the haughty war-horse, as it thunders over the plain, all 'boden in feir of weir.' Yet this line, forming as it does one of the best examples of alliteration to be found in the whole range of literature, fails to bear out the lexicographical meaning, which speaks of every successive word as beginning with the same letter.

A necessary quality of alliteration is imitation, or what the French, with their usual facility of expression, have more happily denominated 'harmonie imitative.'

'Tis not enough no harshness gives offence—
The words must seem an echo to the sense.'—Pope.

The repetition of the same sound, or of letters having similar sounds, in such a manner as forcibly to illustrate to the sense the action of the subject, forms, perhaps, the highest species of alliteration. Instance the 'galloping' or cantering line of Virgil which has been given above. The same poet, in describing the rushing of the winds in the cave of Aeolus, makes use of our figure very effectively:—

'Hic vasto rex Aeolus antro
Luctantes ventos, tempestatesque sonoras
Imperio premit.'

Homer's lines, describing the ineffectual labours of Sisyphus, in his attempt to heave the 'huge round stone' up the steep sides of the 'high hill,' afford another instance of the effective use of alliterative harmony. To save our readers the trouble of digging into the mine of the 'Odyssey,' in order to disinter for themselves this precious morceau, we deem it right to give it here:—

'Haan ano otheke poti lophon, all'hote melloi,
Akron hyperbaleen, to' apostrepsake kratalls.
Antis speita pedonde, kulindeto laas anaides'

Speaking of this passage, Pope says:—'The very words and syllables are heavy, and, as it were, make resistance in the pronunciation, to express the heaviness of the stone, and the difficulty with which it is forced up the mountain.' The heavy, lumbering nature of the first two lines, and the easy, bounding flow of the third, express very forcibly the tremendous labour of Sisyphus, in attempting to push the stone up the hill, and the facility with which it bounds back and rolls down to the plain. Pope's translation of these celebrated lines is little inferior to the original, and may be given as another instance of imitative harmony:—

'With many a weary step, and many a groan,
Up the high hill he heaves a huge round stone;
The huge round stone, revolting with a bound,
Thunders, impetuous, down, and smokes along the ground.'

Spenser, in describing the 'warlike shield' of his hero, Prince Arthur, says that it was

'Hewn out of adamant rock with engines keen,
That point of spear it never piercen could;
No dint of direful sword divide the substance would.'

The continued recurrence of the fourth letter of the alphabet in the last line, reminds us of the successive 'dints' of the sword in the vain effort to hew to pieces the impregnable shield.

The following, from 'Tam o' Shanter,' is another good specimen of imitative harmony:—

'A thief new cuttit frae a rape;
Wi' his last gasp his gab did gape.'

The best proof of the poetical utility and value of our figure is to be found in the fact that it has been used more or less extensively by the 'whole range' of poets—ancient and modern, and, we may say, sacred and profane. It has added grace and dignity to the stately lines of Homer and Virgil; it has feathered and 'driven home' the poetic arrows of Shakspeare and Gay; it has played fast and loose with the volatile genius of French poesy; and has bestowed strong emphasis and redoubled force on the pens of Schlegel and Burger. It has lent its 'artful aid' to the poetry of almost every clime, and tinged the literature of almost every language. In modern times it seems to have taken more kindly to the Teutonic than to the Latin stock; but this partiality though general is not exclusive, and does not justify us in calling alliteration a Teutonic peculiarity.

We doubt not that it would well repay a little trouble to dig for alliterative 'beauties' in the mines of ancient and modern authors. The harvest would be prolific and the labour pleasant; and we recommend our readers to make the attempt. To give anything like a list of these 'beauties' would, on our part, be a task requiring far more space than we can command, and far more attention than the generality of readers would be inclined to bestow. Besides, the examples when placed one after another, 'in (anything but) linked sweetness long drawn out,' lose a great portion of the beauty they possess when taken in connection with the passages where they are found. Alliteration—used sparingly and to profit, and come upon, as it were, by accident—is by no means devoid of beauty; given in a long array of detached lines, strung together with no connecting link, 'like beads on a rope of sand,' it becomes 'trivial,' perhaps even 'ridiculous.' We shall therefore give only a very few examples of alliteration as used by the poets of Greece and Rome, and those of modern days, with perhaps a word or two regarding what is called burlesque alliteration. We may cull a flower here and there; we can promise nothing like a bouquet.

Alliteration among the Greek and Roman poets is, we are afraid, a subject of a nature too abstruse and learned to interest 'general readers.' Few of them could appreciate or even understand the finely modulated lines of Virgil or Homer; and a selection of Greek and Latin 'beauties' would be almost sufficient to secure for our article general want of attention, or something worse. An old gentleman of our acquaintance, totally innocent of 'classical' knowledge, takes the most intense delight in theological works, of which he possesses a considerable library. Long use having made him familiar with the classical quotations scattered throughout the recondite pages of Owen and Gurnall, he can detect at a glance to what language they belong. He has a kind of paternal affection for the strange characters: so much so, that had it been our intention to secure his approbation, we should give scores of Greek and Latin quotations. These quotations, however, would probably have quite a different effect on most of our readers; so we must be content, as some one says, 'to talk as little Greek as possible.' The celebrated passage of Homer, on Sisyphus and his stone, has already been given. The odes of Anacreon abound in alliterations. In his ode 'To the Ladies,' he says that nature has given to the fair sex

'Kallos
Ant' aspídon hapasón,
Ant' egcheón hapantón,' &c.

In one of his odes to Cupid, the same poet has the following alliterative lines:—

'Pítere, phéai, peirasómen;
Tode toxon, es tí moi nun,
Blabetai, bracheia,' &c.

But lest our readers should be surfeited with Greek quotations, we shall conclude this portion of our subject with the following couplet from Anacreon's 'Address to the Dove':—

'Erasmlé peleía,
Póthen, póthen,' &c.

which imitates indifferently well the wayward flight of the pigeon tribe.

We have already been indebted to the 'Mantuan bard' for alliterative examples. His 'celebrated line, expressing a cavalry charge,* has been criticised rather severely by Sir Walter's Triptolemus Yellowley, who infers, from the word putrem, that the horses had gone galloping over a newly-manured field. Virgil has many other alliterations. In some of the examples which we shall select, the effect is produced mainly by the nice selection of words and the skilful disposition of the dactyls and spondees. Such is the description of a prodigy:—

'Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum' or

'Illi inter sese magna vi brachia tollunt.'

In the following example, i is the letter operated upon:—

'Accipiant imineum imbrem rimisque fatiscunt.'

The lines written by Virgil on the folding doors of the amphitheatre may serve as another specimen of his alliterative powers. Virgil had written, incog. a couplet, containing an elegant compliment to the Emperor Augustus, 'the power that was,' the authorship of which was claimed by one Bathyllus, a Roman poetaster. Mortified at this, Virgil wrote the original lines, with the following addition:—

'Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores.
Sic vos non vobis —
Sic vos non vobis —
Sic vos non vobis —
Sic vos non vobis' —

Various attempts were made, but without success, to complete the verse, when Virgil completed it himself as follows:—

'Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves;
Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis boves;
Sic vos non vobis, mellificatis apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves.'

It will be seen that the alliteration was preserved throughout. We have already, we are afraid, exhausted the patience of our readers; and we have but a small space left for Horace or Ovid. Neither of these 'sons of song' is altogether unfit for being pressed into our service at present; but our partiality for Virgil can scarcely allow them breathing room. The shade of Horatius Flaccus must rest content with an extract:—

* Scott.

'Cum laurus, et ara Dianae,
Et properantis aquae, per amoenos ambitus agroa.'—Ars Poetica.

We promised to say a few words regarding the use of alliteration by poets of later times. Perhaps we ought to have confined our promise, as the song says, 'to our ain folk at hame.' A French example would be as dull, we doubt not, as a Latin one; and a German couplet as prosy to English ears as aught that 'Homer sung.' This, perhaps, 'the mair a pity,' as the 'beer-inspired' Germans have made a very extensive use of alliteration. The following may pass muster as specimens of French and German alliteration:—

'Four qui sont ces serpens, qui siffient sur vos têtes?'—Racine.
'Wo Liebe lebt und labt ist lieb das Leben.'

In the following sentences, we mean to confine our draughts solely to the 'well of English undefiled.' To commence with Chaucer is neither more nor less than our imperative duty, as it is only 'beginning at the right end.' The venerable 'Father of English poetry' has shown himself not altogether unsusceptible of the beauty of alliteration, as witness the lines in which he says that—

'Zephyrus, with his soté breath,
Inspired hath in every holt and heath
The tender croppets.'

He speaks also of 'knotty knarry barren trees of old,' of the suicide—'his herte's blood hath bathed all his hair,' and of 'Lycurge'—'a fewe fraknes on his face ysprent.' Archdeacon Barbour, the first of our Scottish poets, describing the character of the good Lord James, writes thus:—

'For he was of full fair effeir,
Large and luffand als was he,
And ours all things loved lawté.'

In Dunbar's 'Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins,' the following richly alliterative lines occur:—

'Then Ire came in with sturt and strife,
His hand was aye upon his knife,
He brandeist like a bear;
Boasters, braggarts, and bargainers,
After him passit in pairs,
All bodie in feir of weir.
Next in the dance followed Envy,
Filled full of feud and felony,
Hid malice and despite.'

Gawain Douglas, in his 'Palace of Honour,' says:—

'Innumerable folk I saw fluttering in feir,
Whilk perlish'd on the weltering wallis weir.'

Alliteration seems to have been rather popular with the poets of this age. Sir David Lindsay of the Mount addresses Falkland in the following alliterative strain:—

'Farewell, Falkland, the forteress of Fife!
Thy polite park, under the Lomond law,
Court men to come to thee; they stand great awe;
Seying thy burgh bene of all burrows bail,
Because in thee they never get guile all.'

Spenser, who was born about the time of Lindsay's death, makes a very frequent use of alliteration. Disraeli adduces the following examples:—

'In woods, in waves, in wars, she wents to dwell,
And will be found with peril and with pain.'

'He used to slug, to sleep, in slothful shade.'

'They cheerily chaunt, and rhymes at random fung,' &c.

Spenser tells us, also, that 'day discovers all dishonest ways.' Speaking of Una and the Lion, he writes:—

'Still, when she slept, he kept both watch and ward;
And, when she waked, he waited diligent.'

And Prince Arthur, in his address to Night, says that

'Light alike is loth'd of them and thee;
And all that lewdness loves do hate the light to see.'

It is pleasing to be able to adduce the name of England's greatest poet as a supporter (so to speak) of alliteration. Oberon says to Puck, that the 'imperial votaress' (Elizabeth) 'passéd on in maiden meditation, fancy free;' and he tells him that the juice of a certain herb 'will make or mán or woman madly doat' on the next living creature. The exiled Duke, in 'As You Like It,' speaks of the 'churlish chiding of the winter's wind.' Burns, the greatest of the Scottish, as Shakspeare is of the English, poets, has many alliterations. 'Lassie, wi' the lint-white locks;' 'Rantin', rovin' Robin;' 'Mang moors and mosses many, O;' 'In days when daisies deck the ground;' 'It's no in makin' muckle mair;' 'The parent pair their secret homage pay,' are a few of the examples that might be given. Gay's alliterative lines, 'Ruin seize thee, ruthless king;' 'Weave the warp and weave the woof,' and others, have acquired some celebrity.

In the poem of 'Christ's Kirk on the Green' occurs the following verse:—

'O a' the maidens mild as mead,
Was nane sae jimp as Gilly;
As ony rose her rude was red;
Her lire was like the lily.'

As an example from Scott, we give the following verse—a species of exorcism which bristles with alliteration:—

'St. Magnus control thee! that martyr of treason;
St. Ronan rebuke thee with rhyme and with reason!
By the mass of Saint Martin, the might of Saint Mary,
Begone, or thy weird shall be worse if thou tarry!
Begone to thy stone, for thy coffin is scant of thee;
The worm, thy playfellow, waits for the want of thee!
Phantom, fly hence! take the Cross for a token!
Hence pass till Hallowmass! My spell is spoken!'

When used for the purposes of satire or ridicule, alliteration becomes burlesque. Thus, Pope satirises

'Apt alliteration's artful aid,' and thus the figure is often used to point an epigram or sharpen the shafts of ridicule. The alliterative lines on the notorious Cardinal Wolsey are considered to be a very successful example of this kind of alliteration:—

'Begot by bishops, but by butchers bred,
How high his honour holds his haughty head.'

We forget where we met with the following instance, which, if we mistake not, was written by a young lady in ridicule of a neighbour's horticultural operations:—

'Let lovely lilies line Lee's lonely lane.'

Burlesque alliteration is made use of only by writers of humorous tendencies. In the 'Baby's Debut,' written by the clever brothers Smith, in imitation of Wordsworth, Nancy Lake ties a bit of string to

'His peg-top peg,

And bang with might and main,'

and

'Molly mopped it with a mop,
And brushed it with a broom.'

When we classify some of Burns's alliterations among the burlesque specimens, we trust we will not be deemed wanting in respect to the memory of the great bard. Tam o' Shanter's better-half told him well—

'Thou was a skellum—

A blethering, blustering, drunken bhellum.'

Burns addresses one of his acquaintances as

'Rough, rude, ready-witted Rankin;'

and in the tale of 'The Twa Dogs,' he calls

'The ploughman's oolzie

A rhymin', rantin', rovin' billie.'

The latter alliteration, by the way, is one not unfrequently repeated, in a different order, throughout Burns's poems. In the 'Beggars' Litany,' the famous system of Halifax law is alluded to in the following alliterative manner:—

'From Hell, Hull, and Halifax
Good Lord! deliver us.'

Many attempts at burlesque alliteration are of a very wishy-washy nature, as the following example will testify:—

'Waxed weary with wasting, wet Wednesday wanes away,
Dim darkness dispelling, down drops distinct day,
The travelling tinkler to town trips along,
Still solemnly singing some singular song!'

We have hitherto spoken only of alliteration as used in poetry, because we consider that poetry is its true sphere. Alliterative prose can scarcely be anything but prosy alliteration or miserable bombast. Yet many writers seem to have a fancy for this kind of alliteration, and instances occur too often to be altogether the result of chance. High-sounding alliterative phrases may captivate the vulgar, but must certainly prove offensive to good taste. We can forgive an ardent and amorous admirer who addresses his adorable and angelic Amelia Ann in an alliterative epistle, which concludes by modestly asking an answer, and assuring amiable Amelia Ann that her ardent amorist will ever be —, &c. &c. But when newspaper editors, whose professed aim is to 'instruct and elevate the minds of the people,' fill up their leading articles with trash of this description, they forfeit all claim on our regard. We have read more than one leader intended, doubtless, to be spicy and telling, the alliterative flippancy of which was quite cloying to the mental appetite. We had the curiosity on one occasion to scrutinise one of these clever pieces, which appeared in a Dundee newspaper, and which contained alliterative phrases in every second line!

Novelists generally contrive to christen their characters with alliterative names. 'Meg Merrilees,' 'Clement Cleveland,' 'Timothy Tugmutton,' are examples. Authors—particularly those who intend to create a sensation by their works—treat them in a similar manner. This custom of giving alliterative titles to books and other publications was very much in vogue at an earlier period in British literature, but seems now to have fallen into disrepute. Still the acute philosopher Punch feels himself constrained now and then to bestow a lash on 'sensation authors' and their alliterative trumpeting. At one time books, even on religious subjects, rejoiced in alliterative titles; and bibliomaniacs still speak of the 'Hiveful of Honey,' the 'Handful of Honeysuckles,' the 'Seven Sobs of a Sorrowful Soul for Sin,' &c.

There is, however, one form of alliterative prose to which the objections urged above are not applicable. We refer to the use of alliteration in proverbs. Many of the most telling and oft-quoted examples of proverbial wisdom are couched in alliterative language. Out of numberless examples that might be given, are the following:—'A tale never tines in the telling; 'Better buy than borrow; 'Wilful waste makes woful want; 'Gude gear's no to be gapped; 'Lo'e me little and lo'e me lang; 'Mastery maws the meadows down; 'Money makes the mare to go,' &c.

We shall conclude our remarks on alliteration by observing that many of the examples which we have given above were probably the result of accident. But this observation applies equally to any other figure or embellishment in literature. Some of the most famous expressions and some of the happiest thoughts to be met with in the whole range of literature are known to have been in some degree accidental; but their beauty or value is not in the least impaired on this account. E. R.

LORD DUNDREARY.

BY THE EDITOR.

MR. SOTHERN'S Lord Dundreary is the most remarkable theatrical success of our time. After keeping London in a state of exhilaration for nearly four hundred nights, it is now circulating laughter and winning golden recompense in Scotland and the provinces. We are old enough to remember when Edmund Kean was earning his £50 or £100 a-night by his magnificent tragic impersonations. The furor created by Jenny Lind, whose young fearless voice went up to unwonted altitudes of song, must be fresh in the recollection of even the younger portion of our readers. Many instances occur to us, besides, of more patient and perilous crushing at the theatre doors than any overcrowding which we have recently witnessed. But for a steady and continuous run, or rather persistent gathering tide of popularity, the career of Mr. Sothern in his one celebrated character is, so far as we can remember, without any parallel in our British dramatic annals.

Never, perhaps, was there so great and profitable a reputation achieved in any department of art with such conspicuously slender materials, and with so little apparent labour. As a general rule, the triumphs of genius in painting, in poetry, in fiction, and on the stage, have been as much due to downright hard work as to any access of the divine afflatus. The stage, in particular, has demanded prodigious physical exertion, as well as long and laborious training of the higher faculties. Even when the terrible upward struggle has been passed, and the height of consummate accomplishment and capacity serenely reached, look at the expenditure of brain-work and muscular effort in every successive representation! From Edmund Kean—nay from Betterton and Garrick—down to Macready, Kean the younger, and Robson, how has the soul of the great actor been fired into glowing enthusiasms, and torn with conflicting emotions, at every fresh exhibition of his skill! Some one tells of having witnessed the exquisite Malibran plunge her beautiful lips into a mug of porter, after one of her tremendous scenes; and who will aver that the mug of porter, thus immortalised in histrionic memorabilia, was not earned by superlative abandon and exhaustion? Neither did Cerito nor Taglioni, we dare avouch, win her Terpsychorean laurels and reward without severe nightly toil. But, with Mr. Sothorn, a certain easy indifference and absolute non-exertion constitute the very essence of his effectiveness. Lord Dundreary is too much favoured by fortune to need, and too little favoured by nature to desire, anything in the shape of actual work. His lucky delineator has only to lounge, to dawdle, to luxuriate through his scenes, with scarcely even the trouble of a sneeze; and in this royally easy way has he made, at least, one manager's fortune and his own. His puzzled stares, his unmeaning chuckles, his little idiotic hops and skips, may each be roughly appraised, through a tolerably long performance, at—say, half-a-sovereign a-piece! Never surely, in this world, was the mimicry of lordly incompetence so productive.

We profess ourselves of those who believe that no great and continuous measure of success can be attained, in any walk of life, without some—nay, without much merit. To an age suffering from over-excitement, and somewhat used-up and blasé, Lord Dundreary presents the charm of a new sensation. Fancy a village 'natural'—the sport and mock of thoughtless children—born and educated as a nobleman—not naturally unhandsome or ill-favoured—irresistibly set up by his tailor, and with head, whiskers, and mustache of glossy artificial jet—and you have something hitherto unknown to the drama—the Lord Dundreary, in fact, at which people stare and laugh, and are apt, on subsequent reflection, to be not a little angry with themselves for positively applauding. Lord Dundreary, as etched by Tom Taylor, the author, and filled in and elaborated by Mr. Sothorn, the actor, is, in short, a novelty. It is, however, a funny novelty, and, on the whole, singularly perfect of its kind. We have had many fops and fools on the stage of the incomparable Malvolio type. But it was a new idea to present—in connection with something of the ease, polish, and dandyism of high life—so curious and unique a specimen of absolute unadulterated noodleism. Lord Dundreary stutters in his speech and in his gait. He is comically, as poor Ophelia is pathetically, insane. His blunderings, his nebulous and delusive attempts at logic, his solemn mnemonic confusions, his readiness to pronounce everybody else lunatic, his silly laugh and stammer, and numerous other little inanities and mannerisms, are all indicative of an imperfect organization. Yet he has sense enough to perceive the absurdity of his own illogical conclusions. It is a mistake to call such a character a pure invention—unlike anything ever seen in nature. Our asylums for the insane contain lower types of humanity than even Lord Dundreary. The gradations from the supreme ruling intellects of the world down to the lower levels of idiocy are infinite; and Lord Dundreary is simply farther down the scale than is usually seen in Great Britain, except under benevolent custodianship. But everyone has encountered men of sorry, uncertain, and perplexed capacity—idiotic almost—yet capable of such vague imitation, and imperfect enactment of the sanities, as to fill indifferently various positions in life in which little intellect is required. Lord Dundreary is, therefore, entirely natural. The character is a creation, but only as any character in fiction is such. His lordship's peculiarities are not in the least affected. None of his eccentricities are assumed. It is their simple naturalness, coupled with a seeming idiotic consciousness of profundity, which constitute their humour. We may never have met with so thorough an aristocratic goose as Lord Dundreary; but neither may we ever have met with so inimitable a compound of rheumatism and conceit as that prince of antique beaux, Lord Ogleby. Nay, we question whether, in actual life, we ever knew one person precisely and in all particulars like any other person. For all purposes of art it is enough that we discover craieemblance, without desiderating identity; and that Lord Dundreary is just such a lord as might have existed, and as we can easily suppose to exist, in cases little paraded by friends, is the key to his general and golden acceptance as a piece of life-like stage portraiture.

But art may be genuine, so far as it goes, and yet not be high art. Cockneydom is easily moved to merriment; any unmeaning phrase may become witty to it through sheer iteration; a little innocent chaff shakes all its myriad sides with laughter; and Lord Dundreary has taken, tickled, and fascinated its fancy, until a certain degree of humour has become associated with the very name, and until the term Dundrearyism threatens to take permanent root in the English tongue. The rage for Lord Dundreary argues, we fear, rather a degenerate condition of the public taste. When we remember the masterpieces of our greater histrians—the 'Othello' of Kean, the 'Virginian' of Macready, the 'Lord Ogleby' of Faren, the 'William' of T. P. Cooke, the 'Country Squire' of W. H. Murray, the 'Monsieur Jacques' of Morris Barnett, the 'Daddy Hardacre' of Robson, and a host of others—the continuousness of the Dundreary crowds does not strike us as a spectacle, on the part of the public, indicative of any very lofty standards or grand ideals. But we claim no exceptional superiority. On the contrary, we have gone and enjoyed ourselves with the rest. Nor have we attempted to delude our conscience with any secret protest. The character, let us confess at once, is decidedly odd and abundantly entertaining. It suffices for idle laughter. But the laughter over, nothing is left. We cannot assign to Lord Dundreary any lofty place among our better dramatic memories. He addresses no high faculty; he stirs no generous feeling; he inculcates no useful lesson. The facile mirth of the performance leaves no darling echo in the heart. Nor is it without an emotion of chagrin, not to say humiliation, that we behold the profuse multitude running after this strange Dundreary idol, until it flushes and burns with the glittering prestige of the world's dross; while on all sides, genius is struggling and perishing, consumed by the fire of its own divine impulses, in the solitude of its defeated dreams.

What, we wonder, will be the next new thing to be a theatrical world's wonder? In the strain to attract the favour and win the support of the public, there is perpetual danger of talent being tempted to rush in where genius fears to tread. The result may be some dramatic monstrosity, having no resemblance to anything in creation. Such productions, however, can be only for a day. Those works which have survived all the caprices of taste, and defied all the tyrannies of fashion, are ever in harmony with what is purest, noblest, and best in the human soul. If Shakspeare 'holds the mirror up to nature' in its foibles, sins, and crimes, as well as in its pathetic affections and sacrificial heroisms, it is because laughable or fearful warnings as well as touching and brilliant examples are needed. In other words, that which the great true heart of humanity will alone take to itself as a possession forever, must, in its main tendencies, be calculated to purify and ennoble it; and it is from an instinctive appreciation of this truth that all the strivings of great minds, in all ages, have been, even through toil, loss, and suffering, upward—through all obstacles, upward—save when accidentally degraded and corrupted by malign, though happily ephemeral, influences.

The final unerring test of Mr. Sothorn's merit as an actor—that which will rescue him from the mere dubious position of a single-speech Hamilton—will be his appearance in some other and sufficiently different character. We remember, some twenty years ago, giving a certain performer credit for admirable fidelity of conception and execution in the Cousin Modus of Sheridan Knowles, until we discovered that he was Cousin Modus in everything he played! Now, what if Mr. Sothorn cannot help his amusing Dundreary peculiarities, and would be Dundreary were he to attempt Mercutio or Macbeth? If he is only himself he cannot be an artist, and his great reputation must, in the end, collapse like an overblown bubble. Let him therefore—he has money enough—induce Tom Taylor, or some other successful playwright, to enable him to vary his rôle, and justify his matchless and highly lucrative renown by some new and equally vivid creation.

EVENTIDE.

WHAT golden splendour, beauty, peace, and balm
Comes with the sunny tranquillity of eve!
Earth seems a benediction to receive.
How still and stately stands the eternal palm,
Beneath whose pendant boughs of glossy green
Mingle in sportive mass the dancing midges!
Noiseless, amid the silence of the scene,
Browse the white flocks upon the slanting ridges.
Sweet peace! that reigns where garish day hath been,
That soothes the wearied frame and sadden'd heart,
May naught unholy dare to intervene
To mar the bliss those joys of earth impart—
Sweet foretaste of the golden age to come,
When hate, and strife, and anger shall be dumb.

Above all times and seasons here below,
Beauty, enthroned, rules the evening hour:
In cool recess and tassell'd woodbine bower
She reigns, enrobed in golden checker'd glow;
O'er ocean's ancient, ripple-dimpled face
Her scintillating light divinely gleams,
And with a charming and a radiant grace
She smiles upon the brooklets and the streams;
Her luminous feet in sober glory pace
Rich fertile scenes, round lowly cottage homes:
Mid clouds of roses in the west we trace
Her lambent pathway, as each eve she roams
Heaven's dim empurpled heights, to curtain round
The setting sun with shadowy clouds, gold bound.

The voice of melody floats round about
Each flowery region and green pastoral haunt:
It is the birds—sweet worshippers—that chant
Their vesper hymns. The linnets' notes ring out
From leafy lime and sycamore halls of green;
The goldfinch and the thrush respond, amid
The network of the maple's trembling screen;
And from the hawthorn, where the robin's hid,
Gush dulcet strains; the blackbird, perch'd between
The spreading branches of the shady beech,
Enlivens with his tune the gladsome scene;
A host of others loud respond to each,
From regal oaks and stately pines, like fanes,
Till earth is drown'd in showers of melting strains.

The sun is sinking into ocean's breast,
Like Pharaoh's glory into Egypt's sea,
And curving ripple, cliff, and upland lea
Beam in the glory of the lustrous west;
The clouds, like heath-flush'd mountains, grandly gleam
From lakes, all thickly flagg'd with leaves of blue—
From plains, that like bright star-stoned levels beam,
All saturated with the morning dew;
Anon they change, and like a witching dream
Of eastern grand romance, appears the whole,
Another magic scene; and now they seem
To form the promised heaven of the soul—
Now like fierce mounts, with red flames rolling out,
And scarlet lava streaming round about.

Swan-like, along the sea's gold-freckled blue,
The heavy-laden fishing-boat glides home;
Track'd by a lengthening line of purest foam,
That sparkles in the beam with silvery hue.
Bright beams her rudder in day's parting glow;
Her sails, like golden pennants, lightly play
With viewless winds, as still they come and go;
As proudly through the deep she makes her way—
Her fairy form quick mirror'd, clear, below—
Looking like some wing'd phantom of the sea,
With spray upon her prow as white as snow.
High o'erhead soars the fleet-wing'd sea-gull, free—
The welcome harbinger of land and life,
In calmy tides or when the storm grows rife.

Glistens, like pearls and gold, the sunny strand;
Sweet roll the ripples over silken weeds—
O'er humming shells and pebbles like amber beads,
Cool zephyrs skim the sparkling waters bland;
Then toll the pale harebells that gem the ground—
That from the beach recedes in bloom along,
And through the clust'ring rosebays softly sound.
Hark how the heavens are ringing with a song!
It is the lark, for sky-hid altar bound,
Before the beauty-clouding close of day,
To pour his madrigal God's feet around.
Meet worship this. Man! get thee, too, and pray:
The gold plumes of the setting sun may ne'er
Expand again in beauty on thee here.

On castle turrets, and on cottage walls—
On mountain peak, and pine of sombre green—
Grandly, throughout each sylvan rural scene,
The mellow'd, fading sunlight softly falls;
It lingers 'mong the hazels in the dell—
Through city homes of rich and poor it flows;
It glads, like Freedom's smile, the captive's cell,
And through stain'd gothic pane in beauty glows;
It gildeth ivied trunk and lily bell,
And glitters goldenly on rill and stream;
It cheers the sinking heart with gladsome spell—
Awakes, like death, the soul's elysian dream—
And, like a smile prophetic of the blest,
Lights the green mounds of weary hearts at rest!

Earth, sea, and sky are sweetly blending now
In one vast glory of all-minding dyes;
The sacred star of eve, with loving eyes,
Gemmeth the heaven's deep cerulean brow,
And silvers with its rays the reeds, and brooks
Low whispering to the osiers as they pass.
Mild, star-like eyes now close in violet nooks,
And shadows lengthen thwart the silken grass;
High overhead the last, lone, truant rooks
Wing to the dark'ning woods beyond their way;
And now the beauteous, golden cistus looks
Its farewell to the calm, departing day:—
A dreamy joy—a pleasant, soothing glow,
In silent streams down from the heavens flow.

The tired milk-bearing kine leave mead and nook,
And lowing to the grange their steps retrace;
The ploughman, with his honest, sunbrown'd face,
Leads forth his jaded horses to the brook,
Humming his favourite ditty as he goes;
And down the shady lane the children run
To where the cooling, crystal water flows,
Then eager every little clamouring one—
As smiling Hodge, good-natured fellow, knows—
To get astride the tame old horses' backs;
They're mounted now—and how each round cheek glows
With triumph as the flourish'd whip-cord cracks,
And youth and horse pass through the old farm gate
More proudly than a cavalcade of state.

The village lovers keep their trysts—and meet
Where hawthorn sprays and fragrant eglantine,
Like their own heart-strings, fondly intertwine—
To pass the twilight hour in converse sweet;
And with his basket fill'd with silver trout,
The patient angler lingers along the stream;
The fleet-wing'd swift keeps flitting round about,
Like darting apparition in a dream;
The little playful children fret and pout
To think that they must 'off to bed' so soon,
When older heads are gossiping without,
And when the nightingale's delightful tune
Is ringing from the thick laburnum boughs,
And the young colt just new turn'd out to browse.

Within her august dome, the placid moon
Comes smiling forth the spouseless Queen of Heaven,
Silvering the dim and silent hues of even;

The drowsy hum of bee and beeble's tune
Grow silent 'mong the limes and herbage blades;
The lark is nestling 'mong the ripening wheat;
From earth and sky day's glowing splendour fades;
The owl peers from her ivied, lone retreat;
Brown tints succeed eve's golden chequer'd shades,
And wood, and mount, and vale in gloom recede;
Loved twilight's dreamy quietude pervades
The shadowy glen, and grange, and lonely mead.
Ye dull, corroding cares of earth, away!
And visions bright be mine with fall of day.

Oh! would that it could last—this charming eve!
But no! 'tis meet that it should fade away;
Better this fitful change of night and day;
Bless'd alternations, tending to relieve
The weary heart's monotony below.
We cannot—must not look for heaven here;
The glories that around us come and go
Are but reflexes of a brighter sphere;
Seasons must roll, flowers fade, yet bud and blow—
The greenwood harmony softly sink and swell—
And light still follow shade—seas ebb and flow—
Yea all things here are order'd wise and well:—
Then love, nor trust much, be that beauty thine
Whose home is in the spirit land divine!

CHAPTER IV.

OLD CHIPPS SEES A GLARE IN THE SKY.

WE must now return to the village of Dubdub, and to the night of the great storm recorded in the opening of our story—to old Chipps on his perilous eminence on the chimney of his rickety old house; and to the yellow parchment riding on the whirlwind above him, and occasionally ducking down, with tantalising effect, within an inch of his nose.

The reflection which passed through old Chipps' mind, after a pause, was to the effect that, if he ventured to launch himself out upon the immense vacancy which surrounded him, he would run a great chance of either being dashed to pieces on the rocks, or carried out to sea and drowned.

The reflection was natural, and proved that the despair which had overcome him at the loss of the parchment had not been able to reduce him to the condition of a lunatic.

It had driven him to the verge of lunacy, however, as his presence on such a perilous eminence amply testified. He determined to descend, and watch the yellow parchment from the second-floor window. The vivid flashing of the lightning kept it in sight.

He descended to the second floor window, and strapping himself to the bed-post, in order to provide against the contingency of being carried off by the wind, strained his eyes upwards. He had not long remained in that position when a lurid glare in the sky attracted his attention, and the sound of cannon came booming on his ear, borne shorewards by the gusts of wind which had been sporting themselves with the water far out at sea, and had obligingly conveyed the message to all whom it concerned on dry land.

'Holy Abraham! 'tis a ship on fire,' said old Chippe, rubbing his hands. 'Mein Gott! what spoil there will be sunk in that hungry restless monster the ocean! By the beard of my father! 'tis a shame. Had it been merely a wreck, there would have been a chance of spoil. Curse the wind and rain! By the fires of Gehenna, how it blazes! I can almost hear the crackling of the wood from this distance. How many infidels will be feasted upon to-morrow by the fishes! Ah! it does one's heart good. Holy prophet! that was a blast, and no mistake. Look at that yellow parchment. O mein Gott! if I only had it, how I could enjoy this glorious sight! A ship on fire—it warms my heart. He, he!'

Old Chippe rubbed his hands, and chuckled with glee. His mirth was soon, however, changed to a wild howl of agony, as he saw the yellow parchment disappear again into the darkness. To secure the rope tighter to the bed-post and swing himself down was the work of an instant.

He is on the ground—the parchment is almost within his grasp.

With another wild shriek, he follows it out into the darkness. The chase has begun in earnest. The parchment seduces him seawards.

Seawards!

Gracious powers!

CHAPTER V.

THE MARQUIS APPEARS AT LAST, AND MEETS AN OLD FRIEND.

It so happened that, on the same night of the great storm, there had assembled in the bar parlour of the Duke of Dishwater's Arms a goodly company of the inhabitants of Dubdub, who found themselves at last, to the delight of the landlord, unable to venture out.

The effects of an anticipated prolonging of their conviviality was somewhat different upon each. The landlord, unlike the ordinary run of Bonifaces, was a slim, wiry little man, with twinkling black eyes, a large hook nose, and a bullet-shaped head, ornamented on the top by a layer of scrubby black hair, which looked as if it had been put on in the manner of thatch upon a house-top, or like a perpetual fly-blister stuck on his bald skull, with the sticky side out. He was seated in a huge leather arm-chair at the top of the table, a steaming bowl of punch by his side, and a long clay pipe in his mouth. He vomited forth clouds of smoke every now and then, and as the atmosphere became thick around him, he faintly repelled it by waving his hand backwards and forwards. Around the table were seated the parlour company, the members of which we shall notice as they take part in the conversation. The room was lighted with gas; and if it had not been so densely filled with smoke, a spectator could not fail to have remarked its exceeding snug and comfortable appearance.

'It's my opinion, gentlemen,' said a gruff voice from the table, as a blast of wind made the shutters rattle, 'it's my opinion, not to put it too strong, that the most judicious proceeding on the part of the present company, married and single, would be to make up their minds to have a reg'lar night of it here, in the present parlour of the Duke of Dishwater's Arms, as the elements outside seem to have made up their minds to go in for a reg'lar bust of it, and keep the ground to themselves; and, speaking mildly, I should have a high respect for the moral and fizzical courage of the hardy individual who would venture out on such a night. What I say then, friends all, is, fill your glasses, and appoint a chairman.'

The voice proceeded from a pimple-nosed, red-faced, watery-eyed, flabby-cheeked, scant-whiskered spirit at the north-west corner of the table, who, after uttering these sentiments, refreshed himself with a drain from his tumbler of punch; and, requesting the waiter, in a firm, authoritative voice, to fetch him a light, settled himself comfortably in his chair, and looked as if his night was fairly commenced, and no power on earth would prevent him from enjoying it in his own manner and to the very best advantage. This personage's name was Troff; his occupation was that of a leather-merchant; and the particular hallucination which attended him throughout life was, that everybody in general laboured and groaned under a chronic modesty and bashfulness, and that he, Troff, was the person instituted by nature to encourage, draw out, and otherwise pat on the back, everybody who had the supreme felicity to make up a unit of the party of which he, of course, formed the great figure.

'And now that that's settled, gentlemen,' continued Troff, without waiting for any dissent which might have been made to his proposition, 'and now that matter's settled, my friend Philip [Philip was the waiter's name, and it was a point with the great Troff to make a general recognition of everybody around him by the word friend, which had the effect of putting everybody in general on a delightful state of equality with each other, thereby preserving the sort of republic which he had formed, with himself as the great president] my friend Philip will take the orders from the gentlemen, after which I have not the slightest doubt but that my friend Fiff—whom I observe opposite me, and whose health I have great pleasure in drinking—will favour us with a recitation of his stanzas on the untimely death of a favourite terrier, unfortunately killed by the falling of a sand-bag out of a balloon. The present company, whose very good health I am happy to drink collectively, may not be aware that our young friend, Mr. Fiff, has lately had significant evidence of the partiality with which he is regarded by the Muses [the most of the company found themselves next day instituting secret inquiries as to the social position and standing of the Muses, whom they looked upon as a recent addition to the gentry of the county, and considered Fiff in luck in consequence]—a fact which I take a little credit in, having been the first to recognise, which I should not have done thus publicly were I not satisfied of the universal correctness of my judgment in matters of that sort.'

And here we must give the great Troff credit for some amount of perspicuity; for, whereas the general opinion of the Dubdubites, with regard to the condition of Mr. Fiff, who occupied an irresponsible position in the gas-office, induced to the belief that he was gradually getting too great a regard for ardent spirits, and would ultimately lose his situation through it,—the great Troff warmly criticised Fiff's conduct, and arrived at the conclusion that he had recently taken to writing poetry; which conclusion, on Fiff being privately sounded, turned out correct. We are inclined to think, however (and this qualifies the degree of credit which should be awarded to Mr. Troff for his discovery), that any individual with ordinary intelligence, and a knowledge of the private deportment of our great poets, might have made a shrewd guess at the state of matters with Mr. Fiff. It is notorious to all lovers of literature, that before a young man can be a poet, it is necessary to ingratiate himself with the Muses; as, without their valuable assistance, any attempts could only be characterised by competent judges as little short of evidences of lunacy on the part of the perpetrator. It is also no less notorious that the Muses, in matters of this sort, are inclined to be peculiar, and eccentric, and fickle, and to exact a great many attentions from their devotees;—we have only to mention the name of Byron in connection with collars, or Wordsworth in connection with Blucher boots.

'Gentlemen,' continued Troff, as a slight commotion occurred at the foot of the table, 'I think I heard a voice uttering words to the effect that a chairman had not been elected. Would my friend, the party who uttered that sentiment, receive the assurance of my profound regret at my unparliamentary proceeding, in making a motion before a chairman had been assigned; and would the company please to consider the motion withdrawn till that point has been settled?'

Chorus of voices all round the table—'Troff in the chair! Keep the chair yourself!'

'And now that everything is smooth,' continued Mr. Troff with calm dignity, 'we will hear Mr. Fiff's lines. Silence, please, for Mr. Fiff's stanzas.'

Mr. Fiff, a pale, cadaverous-looking youth, who had evidently taken too much drink, and who might have had a cleaner shirt on without running the risk of being considered extravagant, having been occupied during the last five minutes in disarranging his hair as much as possible, was about to rise, when the same party who had found fault with the non-appointment of a chairman, remarked in a very loud and decided voice, that perhaps his friend, the chairman, would please to name a vice before going on with the convi-vialities, as, according to standard authorities on such matters, a vice was indispensable. This was a bold proceeding on the part of the individual at the foot of the table; and the company, who peered through the smoke (some of whom had no particular affection for the great Troff, who was secretly talked about among the dissatisfied as a humbug and an impostor), considered it a remarkably bold proceeding for a little slim-made, sandy-haired, gray-eyed man, dressed in a black frock-coat, and with one thumb stuck in the arm-hole of his waistcoat, and the other hand flirting occasionally through his scanty sandy locks, which were spread over his little head lithe and long and yellow, in the manner of straw. He smiled did this little man, and winked knowingly at a farrier who was mechanically polishing his lips with the sleeve of his coat, in blank amazement at the intrepidity of the strange little man—for he was a stranger.

There was nothing very courageous merely in suggesting a chairman for a convivial meeting; but to the Dubdubites there was something very courageous in the fact of the little man smiling when Troff frowned, and winking when Troff attempted to asphyxiate him by a look.

'Ha!' said Troff at last, 'it was you who spoke, my friend, was it? You suggest a vice-chairman, do you? Ha! Would you have the complaisance to aver your reasons for wishing a vice-chairman? Would you also suggest a party who might, in your opinion, fill it to your satisfaction; and, when you're about it, [Troff looked as if this would be the only chance which he, the little man, would be able to have of ever opening his lips again in the present company, and attempted to throw a suggestion into his eye, recommending him to make the best of it] would you also be kind enough to let myself and my very good friends and neighbours here (whose healths I have again the honour of drinking) know who you are, what your business is, and the superior social or mental condition which gives you the privilege of putting your oar in—putting your oar in, I say, when it isn't by any means necessary to the smooth-sailing of the craft that you should have an oar at all?'

Troff sat down, and gazed with a sort of supercilious defiance at the little figure nearly opposite.

The little man's eyes twinkled; he stuck his thumb further into the waistcoat-hole, twiddled his fore-fingers, and rubbing up the wisps of his hair again, said, with a smile playing about his lips,

'I only recommended a vice-chairman for the reason I stated before, namely, universal custom. Being a stranger here, I have no selection, and beg to assure you that I meant no offence in the suggestion; which apology I hope you will consider in the light of pulling my oar out again.'

Troff's stern expression relaxed, the farrier took another sip at his beer, and after solemnly wiping his mouth with his sleeve, solemnly said, 'Good again!' and looked approvingly on the little man, who pulled out a case, took out a cigar, lighted it, and leaned back on his chair. 'Suppose now,' continued Troff,

'suppose that our friend takes upon himself the office of vice. He made the proposition.'

'That I shall do with pleasure; and beg to second the motion made by the chairman, that Mr. Fiff should now recite his lines.'

'Good again!' said the farrier, solemnly.

Troff nodded encouragingly to him, and Fiff rose up and was about to speak, when he suddenly recollected that he had left the words of his poem at home, and, would the company accept a recitation!

Mr. Troff, as the mouthpiece of the company, would be glad to have the recitation. Troff was reckoning, however, without all his hosts.

The farrier, who was a moral man in the strictest sense of the word, objected to a recitation; and, in stating his objections in these words—'No; I'll have no play-ranting; we wont have that; that wont rub; something else.' He crossed his mouth with his sleeve, and looked at Troff through an opaque glaze which had gathered in his eyes within the last hour.

'Parkins, you're drunk! Hold your tongue.'

The little man looked at Parkins with some degree of interest; and Parkins looked at Troff, and said, 'You're another! And, what's more, you're a humbug! And——me if I doant raise your rent; singe me if I doant!'

The little man seized a layer of hair and rolled it round his little finger, puffing his cigar rapidly, and infusing a malicious twinkle into his eyes.

'You'll raise my rent, ha! Who the dence are you, and when did you become my landlord?' said Troff, with supreme disdain.

'I am your landlord, and that's sufficient; and what's more, I'll turn you out. I wont have a stuck-up leather-merchant, who tries with fine words to ride over better men than himself, and men with more money, about my property. So you'll clear out, take notice. The property's mine. I bought it from the Marquis of Pennywhistle. Now, then, call me drunk again, and I'll throw this ale about you—now!'

'And who's the Marquis of Pennywhistle when he's at home?' said the little man, evidently making the question for the purpose of preventing further words between the farrier and Troff.

'Who is the Marquis of Pennywhistle? Don't you know?' said the farrier, with a look of calm astonishment.

'I do not. Who is he?'

A figure glided out from the shade of the bar—a tall figure dressed in a short shooting-jacket—a figure with a handsome face, and a deep scar over the left eye, a hunting-whip in his hand, and great leather riding-boots on his legs—a figure who blinked maudlingly about in the gas-light, evidently drunk, and with a look of supercilious contempt on the handsome face.

'I am the Marquis of Pennywhistle. Is there anybody here gainsays it? Who's got anything to say to me?'

A rattling at the shutter, a crashing of glass, and an apparition remotely in the likeness of a man staggered into the room, and before the astonished company could interpose, rushed on the tall figure who had just spoken.

'I have something to say to you at last.'

The riding-whip was wrenched out of the tall figure's hand.

The butt end descended on his head with a hollow sound.

He gave a horrible cry, and fell to the ground.

The short figure was about to repeat the blow when another vault was made through the window, and another figure leaped into the room.

In an instant it had sprung upon the assailant of the Marquis.

'Fool!'

'Devil! you have robbed me of my revenge. Let me kill him.'

'Ass! imbecile!'

In an instant Duferny and Vavazour (the escaped convicts) were struggling wildly on the floor, over the prostrate form of the Marquis.

CHAPTER I.

THE printer's imp had just carried off the leading article I had been working at all the evening, and I had come to the conclusion that I had nothing to do; and a blissful conclusion it was, too; for during the last fortnight I had been slaving early and late, as only a hack-writer can slave. Indeed, it was so blissful that it was some time before I could realise it. However, when I did become satisfied that such was the case, I speedily set-to to make myself as comfortable as circumstances would permit, during the two hours that wanted to my usual bed-time. I threw aside my pen, looked up my paper in the desk, and put that into the darkest corner of my little room; resolved that, if putting things out of sight were best calculated to put them out of mind, I should not leave any available means untried for the attainment of that desirable end.

'Ah!' said I, stirring the fire into a cheering blaze, seating myself in the only chair in the room, and placing my feet on the fender, 'now for a glorious spell of dreamy, forgetful listlessness, during which my thoughts may rush after one another in a wild-goose chase, and play at hide-and-seek among the recesses of my relieved brain.

Write, write, write

Till my head and my wrist are aching;

Write, write, write

Till my hand and my pen are quaking—

Paper, and ink, and pen;

Pen, and ink, and paper—

Till each burning thought has burn'd itself out,

As well as the flickering taper!

'O all ye bards who are making for the pinnacle of Parnassus! is there not one among ye who will deign to publish to the world the sorrows of the hack-writer, even as Hood did those of the needlewoman? But hold! I have actually spent a quarter of an hour in vain regrets. Away, gloomy thoughts!

It seemed as if my exorcism had taken effect, for I became gradually lulled into a state of calm, dreamy unconsciousness. But it was not long ere I was rudely roused from my ecstatic enjoyment by the rattling sound of footsteps on the stairs; and, presently, my door was thrown open by my younger brother.

'Now, Hal!' burst hurriedly from his lips, 'pray leave off that horrid writing, and—Halloa!' continued he, with surprise, and in a more subdued tone, 'what evil spirit has possessed you to cause you to sit before the fire in this way? Have you become a maniac this evening; or have you been mad these six years—which is more likely—and but just recovered?'

'Whichever way it is,' said I, 'be so good as to shut the door and come near the fire. Don't be afraid of me. If I am mad, it is a very harmless insanity.'

I gave my chair up to him, perched myself on my writing-stool, and looked at him by the blaze of the fire. There was some uneasiness in his manner.

'Well, John, what's the matter?'

'Have you heard—but of course you haven't. You are pent up in this close prison from one week's end to another, without seeing any face but that of the printer's boy.'

'Take pity on me then, John, and relieve my mind at once. What is it?'

'Why, old Uncle Goldworthy has just arrived in London. He has made his fortune in Australia, by dint of hard work; and intends to make up for it, by enjoying himself in Old England for the rest of his life.'

'He has brought his daughter with him, has he not?'

'Yes, I believe so—at least, I know he has,' responded John, looking very confused, and endeavouring to concentrate all his attention upon the fire.

'Have you seen her?'

'Yes. Niceish girl; but not so pretty as'—

'But pretty enough for you,' interrupted I. 'You must think me blind not to be able to see that; and I wish you success, with all my heart, John.'

'Ah!' said John, 'it's all very well to talk of success; but it is hardly likely that Uncle Goldworthy will give his daughter to a poor fellow like me. He seemed good-natured enough this morning, it is true; but I am afraid his good-nature will not extend so far as that.'

'Hope on, hope ever, John,' said I.

'I will, Hal,' said John. And he went away.

'There you are again, stuck on that high stool, and scratching away with that spluttering quill, as if for your bare life. How like a frenzied oracle you look, with your puckering beetle-brows and distended nostrils! Mad, hopelessly mad!'

Such was the compliment wherewith my brother chose to greet me one evening, about a week after his visit to my sanctum as related above.

'Do let me finish this article for the Daily Surprise, as I am expecting the printer's devil to be here in ten minutes' time, and it is but half done.'

It was late in the evening; but John waited very patiently for him, and began examining a very fanciful portrait of Joseph Addison, of Spectator celebrity. Presently the imp referred to made his appearance; but, by that time, I had finished my article, which that functionary bore away in triumph. As I had now done for the night (and it was near midnight), I drew my stool closer to the fire; and, for the first time, I observed that my brother's face was actually beaming with triumph and delight.

'Well, John,' exclaimed I, 'when are you to be married?'

'Oh, in six months' time. Uncle Goldworthy is infinitely kinder and more considerate than I expected. He even intends buying us a small house in the suburbs, within three miles of our office. What do you think of that?'

'But how did you succeed with'—

'Miss Goldworthy? Why, after my declaration, she confessed, or as much as confessed, that she fell in love with me the instant she saw me.'

'Ah, I see. You were evidently meant for each other. Permit me to congratulate you on the course of your true love having run very smooth. You must have me for a groomsman. I'll manage to make a holiday for once.'

'Thank you, Hal. You must forgive me for calling upon you so late in the evening, as my brain has been so completely turned of late that I have lost all notion of time, and forget that there is such a machine as a clock. So, good-night.'

CHAPTER II.

The six months had rolled quietly and uneventfully away. The small house in the suburbs had already been bought by Uncle Goldworthy, and the day arrived on which John and Miss Goldworthy were to take possession of it as a married couple.

I dressed myself carefully, put on the wedding-gloves sent me the day before, and went to join the party at Mr. Goldworthy's house. It was a glorious morning, and the sun set my eyes a-blinking and winking; for, shut up in that miserable second floor, what light could I catch but twilight? The sun never shone through my window,—for the very good reason that it faced the north. But to return.

The whole house was lively and busy. Uncle Goldworthy joked, the bride blushed, the party laughed; John blushed and laughed too; the servants giggled, the dog barked, and sometimes howled, by way of a change. At length the hour arrived when the party were to proceed to the church of St. Benedict, and off we went accordingly.

The company were assembled in the pretty little drawing-room that formed part of John's new home. From the window could be seen bright green meadows, ripe and ready for the mowers, while the hay-makers were already at work in one field, turning the hay, and tossing its fragrance right into our gladdened nostrils. The cuckoo breathed its farewell notes, the swallow greeted the fly with a 'how-d'ye-do' and a snap, the awakened summer fly crept out of his winter quarters, and paid long and protracted visits to the sugar-basin and the cream-jug. In fact, spring, like an old maid, was quietly and quickly fading away, while young and rosy summer was making her toilette by the side of whispering and fanning trees and mirror-like brooks and streams, that lay in the lap of her mother, that gay old dame—Nature.

One of the bridesmaids had been gazing on the scene before us in an ecstasy of delight. She was cousin to the bride, and the prettiest in the whole company. Her merry round face was set off by a profusion of rich light-brown hair, and her laughing hazel eyes were kept very much in the shade by those provokingly long lashes, which seemed to strive to hide them as effectually as they could from my admiring gaze.

I soon managed to engage her in a lively and earnest conversation on literature; for I discovered that she knew almost as much about it, and appreciated it as much, as myself, and I was perfectly charmed with the originality as well as the modesty of her remarks. I soon contented myself with listening only, but as soon as she saw that I had left the active part of the discussion to herself, she ceased; upon which we went to a painting on the other side of the room, to which I had called her attention. It was a small painting, and a charming one; and I was glad to find that my new friend agreed with me there also. In the foreground was a startled rabbit; who, with one ear erect, and one paw upraised, seemed debating within itself whether or no it must leave that tempting sowthistle under its nose uncropped. Further back was given the cause of its alarm; a boy, probably a truant, swinging himself on the bough of a tree with all his might, and hallooing with glee—forgetful of the slenderness of the bough, which threatened every moment to snap, and bring the youngster to untimely grief. From that we got into a quiet talk on painting in general; and my fair companion began telling me of a certain Professor Singsong, who maintained that painting was not to be compared with music—that music was divine, and painting was not; and that there would be (as a grand clincher to the argument) plenty of music in heaven, but no painting.

'And why should we not have pictures in heaven just as much as music?' exclaimed she. 'One is quite as ennobling and refining as the other. Music is the pleasure of the ear and painting is the pleasure of the eye, and both influence the soul. Then is the bliss of the soul to come through the ear only, and not through the eye? I do not believe that, Professor Singsong, though you do manage your arguments very cleverly.' She stopped, her face glowing with enthusiasm.

'Do you paint, may I ask?' inquired I.

'Yes.'

'Ah,' thought I to myself, 'she is an enthusiast in the art, I can see.' And I fell in love with her all the more for that; for I thoroughly sympathised with her.

It would be tedious to the very courteous reader to go through all the discussions of that (to me) eventful afternoon; suffice it to say, that we got on so well together that both of us thought neither of us could agree so well with any one else; and were so pleased with each other's intercourse that we were sorry when the time came to part that evening, and finally made an appointment to meet again for another interesting discussion at the church of St. Benedict.

My wife and I sit quietly, industriously, and happily, in a pleasant room of our house, which is situate in the town of Exton. She is at her easel at one end of the room; at the other end I sit at my editorial table, superintending the production of the 'Exton Magazine, a Journal of Fact, Fiction, Fashion, and Fancywork;' the last two divisions are edited by my very industrious and talented wife. To think us happy will be a natural and a true inference—happy in our work, and enough of it to make it often a pleasure to have NOTHING TO DO.

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

I MAY have met smiling with many,
But even then thought I of thee;
And thy face is the fairest of any
That ever was seen by me.

Oh, stately yet musical beauty!
Oh, brow clothed with living light!
Oh, eyes all'd with the sun of duty
That shall guide thy life aright!

And oft in the solemn splendour
Of heaven's glittering stars,
When the past makes my heart grow tender
And beat loudly 'gainst its bars,
Those eyes rise more clearly before me,
Replete with a light divine;
And a passion of grief comes o'er me
That thy path may not be mine.

I think of thee waking and sleeping;
O'er every dream reignest thou;
I think of thee sometimes with weeping:
Joy sometimes flushes my brow.
I'm sad and I'm glad that I met thee—
Pain mingled with sweetest sweet;
Nor can I, if I would, forget thee
Till my heart shall cease to beat.

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE G. SIMPSON.

April 4, 1836.

LAST night George took up the thread of his narrative touching the Grove. He began:—

'I shall not soon forget the absurd, serio-comic appearance Mr. Halliday presented when I saw him for the first time. Though the afternoon was bright and warm, he was wrapped up nearly to the eyes. Indeed, the bulk of his clothes was so tremendously in excess of the size of his person, that he was literally buried in coats and mufflers, so that I wondered he could either move or breathe. He is perhaps without exception the smallest man I ever beheld; and his physique, though in a manner grotesque, has nothing interesting about it, but is altogether unprepossessing. Lean and angular in figure, his features are small, sharp, and pinched; light colourless hair, partly gray, and resembling withered grass; reddish ferret eyes, with an expression of snappish irritability; sallow complexion and thin lips, which he has a way of compressing tightly when thought is at work. Voilà ce petit gentil homme! who, entering with the shuffling gait and fussy importance of wealthy invalidism, confronted young Herbert and myself in the library of his own house. He was attended by the butler, and a rosy-cheeked lad (Thomas by name) the very antithesis of his master in health and good humour. I subsequently learned that one of the fancies of this malade imaginaire was a detestation of female attendants—there was not one about the place—while he had a craze for the services of athletic youths, as if contact with the lusty bloom of their spring might infuse new vigour into his decaying age. Of course I moved forward a step or two to greet him as he came in. I might have saved myself the trouble; he took no sort of notice of either of us. His whole mind was concentrated on self; and with an impatient wave of the hand to me, as though I had been some large blue-bottle fly, buzzing in mid air and threatening to light on his face, he wriggled his poor small body, with its heavy fortification of garments, into an easy chair, piping forth as he did so, in an exhausted treble, "My drops, Mordaunt! My drops—I am going fast—I am done!"

'He motioned feebly towards the mantelpiece, while Thomas disengaged him of a portion of his outward habiliments. He had spoken as if life were well nigh extinct. I could see, however, that he watched the butler jealously from out those keen diminutive eyes; for upon his taking up a particular phial, and giving the red mixture a preparatory shake, the patient cried out sharply,

"Not that! Do ye want to poison me? The brown one, Mordaunt. Twenty drops—quick, quick, or I shall faint."

'The suitable dose of the proper drug being duly administered, Mr. Halliday lay back in a state of utter collapse, during which, strange to say, the doctor never stirred from the post he had assumed at the window; and when I turned to whisper to him hurriedly, "Had you not better look to your charge?" guess my astonishment at observing that gentleman actually holding his pocket handkerchief to his mouth to stifle his laughter! He positively could not answer me one syllable for fear of exposure; and sooth to say, Kate, remembering what he had told me before, and the fantastic scene I had just witnessed, I was fain to relax into a smile myself. Noting this, he grew grave, as by a strong effort, and was about to say something, when Thomas, who had been standing respectfully behind the easy chair, peeped stealthily over the back of it, and formally announced to the company, sotto voce,

"Master's noddin'."

"Sleeping, is he?" cried our merry doctor, in a loudish whisper, "then I can tell you he's likely to sleep a good while; and we may all go to sleep too, for there's no chance of any business being done this night"—(looking at me).

'Here was an announcement! I had travelled post haste a full day's journey to make out the will of a man who was non est inventus for many hours after I arrived; and who, after all, had fallen asleep as soon as I set eyes upon him!

"Is he weak through illness?" I asked; "or is it to-day's fatigue?"

"Well, sir," responded he of the rosy cheeks, "master has gone through as much this day as would have tired many a strong man, let alone a poor sapless trunk like his. The way he ran about them oysters, first to the fishers' cottages, and then down on the shore among the boats—picking and choosing, tasting, talking, and scolding. It was really something extraordinary. No wonder he's wearied. I was wearied myself, just looking at him. No, no; I warrant he'll be in no haste to waken."

'And this was the manner in which your time was frittered away, George? I broke in. "How provoking! And when did he open his "ferret eyes" again, as you call them?"

'He slept so long,' George continued, 'that the others dropped off one by one, leaving me sitting alone with the invalid in the twilight. Herbert had gone out to smoke a cigar; and the servants were looking in, from time to time, at the door, which stood slightly ajar, watching the moment when he should stir once more. It was tedious work enough for me. But, by-and-by, I fell into a reverie about home and about you, my darling! and our baby, and a number of things very pleasant to remember. And so the stars came out, and I was still sitting gazing on the dim outline of the flat country, when I was startled by a curious spasmodic noise—something between a cough, a grunt, and a protracted snore—proceeding from the great arm-chair; and, the next moment, the shrill voice sent forth its complaint:

“Hilloa! Thomas! Mordaunt! Where are ye? Is nobody beside me? Have ye all left me here to die?”

“I rose and pulled the bell-rope quickly. So doing, I had to come pretty close to the speaker. The peppery eyes were instantly fixed on my face.

“Who are you?” he inquired, in alarm. “What, ho! Thieves! robbers! This is too cruel, to leave me here to be mur—”

“Pray be calm, my dear sir,” I began; “you are quite safe. I am the lawyer—Weston—whom you sent for.”

“He fetched a long sigh of relief. “Oh! you are only the lawyer, are you? It is well; though, indeed, for that matter, lawyers are a sort of thieves, too, in their way. But I hear you are less of a rogue than most of them.”

“Just then the servants came running into the room and flew to their master, who speedily overwhelmed them with a host of foolish railings and trifling orders, ending with, “Now, help me to the dining-room, and bring the oysters—not on the shells, mind ye; but in the shells. These are what I need to renovate me. Come along, Mr. Weston. You must take some, too—opened on the spot, sir, and ate as soon as opened.”

“Thus talking, and leaning on the butler's arm, the quaint little oddity of a man shambled out as he had shambled into the library several hours before. Such was my first interview with my new client.

“I will not attempt a minute description of the oyster scene,” George went on, “which was sufficiently ludicrous. Mr. Halliday, as master of ceremonies, occupied a high chair at the end of a long table, the favourite fish being placed in a tub in the centre. Mordaunt and Thomas busily plied their scallop knives; while I, the solitary guest, was expected literally to keep time with my host, and swallow oyster for oyster in turn with him! What had become of Herbert? I understood afterwards that he had skulked out of the way, having a mortal antipathy to the crustaceous animal. Now, though it is quite true, as you know, Kate, that I do like the bearded anomale, I don't care for a surfeit at any time. And therefore, as I saw very plainly I had rather an unreasonable companion to deal with, I was prepared to make a stand at the commencement. Mr. Halliday went on—

“Eat, sir; eat, and purify your blood. Eat, and promote the free flow of the bile, without which no man living will be long a living man in the proper acceptation. Commend me to oysters, sir, as the best food for every mortal being—young or old, fat or lean, sickly or healthy, at all hours too, whether breakfast, dinner, or supper. I tell you, Mr. Weston, I regard oysters as in all human probability the only medium by which my present distressing symptoms may be alleviated. And what is good to remove disease may be equally good to ward it off. Ergo, eat, sir; eat while the opportunity lasts. For I consider it my duty to press such nourishment upon you; and it is not every day we light upon such a barrel.”

“This was awful. Yet I was not so sorely put to it as I had feared. Mr. Halliday's talk was considerably bigger than his appetite; and I was not sorry when, after a while, the rather inelegant stock-in-trade was removed by his commands to the cellar, there to be held in readiness for future use.

“Seizing the opportunity of the servants' withdrawal, I ventured at length to remind him that I was then at the Grove by his desire, and waited to know his pleasure in sending for me. Hereupon his features—which had worn, I cannot say a more pleasant, but only a less disagreeable expression while the feast had been in progress—resumed their full severity.

“To-morrow, Mr. Weston—not till to-morrow. If you knew, sir, the excruciating pains which come and go continually through this poor fleshly tabernacle of mine, you would deem my life next to a miracle. Besides, how can digestion proceed when business is on hand? Impossible! I may feel better to-morrow; and if so, I will not have the matter entered upon at all just now. What's the hurry, I should like to know? Can a man not live comfortably for a little without the chance of his death being constantly thrust upon him? I may be ill or well, but surely I am the best judge of when my testament should be written out. Were it not that I detest my lawful heirs (two abominable old maids that are wearying for my decease), I scarce think I should make a settlement at all.”

“I was about to reply, when Herbert sauntered in.

“How are you now, Mr. Halliday? Have you enjoyed your oysters?”

“Yes, immensely; and you are a fool not to have taken some along with us. How can you expect to thrive, sir, in this world, if you undervalue one of its chief blessings? Dr. Bellingham knows better. He practises as well as preaches. By-the-by, was he here to-day? Why is he not here to-night? An able man—a very able man; has an excellent appreciation of oysters, and a capital eater of them, too! Mr. Weston is a middling hand at the game, but nothing to him. Perhaps he may come yet? And what has become of Ridley and the rest of them?”

“It is growing late, sir; Dr. Bellingham will not be here now. We should rather be thinking of bed.”

“I'm not sleepy,” answered the patient, which was not wonderful, considering his long dose in the easy chair. “I am going out for a stroll. One doesn't need to be a doctor to know that a walk is beneficial after supper. Mr. Weston, you have had oysters, you ought to walk.”

“Now, to tell you the truth, Kate, Mr. Weston would rather have had a glass of something warm and pungent. But as Herbert had formerly told me this was not to be so much as named at the Grove—its owner being, at this juncture, of the strictest sect of abstainers; and the ale we had got at dinner being a fair piece of smuggling on the part of the major domo; and as, moreover, the complaints of an unreasonable hypochondriac were less in my way than that of the young medico, I waived my right to accompany him, and suggested that the chambermaid might show me to my apartment.

"Chambermaid!" echoed mine host briskly, "there's no such character in this house. The male being confessedly the nobler animal, has exclusive possession here. Once let a woman into the private concerns of life, and where would peace and order be? Above all, where would health be? My coffin would have been filled long ago if women had had the management. But I need not dwell on the subject to you, Mr. Weston. Lawyers know right well that women are their best friends, which says very little for both parties. But why should we, who are not lawyers, harbour enemies under our roof? No, no. Mordaunt will show you your room. And since you have a wife at home (as they tell me), be thankful, sir, if she has not already brought your head into some vile noose, as you may be sure she will ere you have done with her."

"I smiled, and retired with the butler; not, however, till I had remarked a certain furtive flash of merriment in the doctor's face, which, as usual, he seemed afraid would find inopportune explosion, so had recourse once more to the handkerchief. I was really thankful when at last I got into a nice airy bed, though awfully hard, none other being wholesome according to Mr. Halliday's creed, where I slept soundly till eight a.m. next day.

"At breakfast, my host was much more complainant than I had yet found him, though I was grieved in spirit to perceive how scant was the fare presented—thin dry toast and rather washy tea being all that the present code allowed. Spare entertainment, Kate. How I longed for a good slice of that corned beef that we had the other morning! Herbert and I exchanged woful glances, while our host kept up a running commentary:—

"Strong tea destroys the nerves. Bread should be cut thin, and made crisp by the action of a smart fire. A light meal like this is commendable, and does nobody any harm."

"I trow not, nor any good either."

Poor George! I was really vexed to think of his enforced abstinence. I even fancied he had grown thinner upon it, and told him as much. He laughed, and wound up his story.

"Seeing that Mr. Halliday was better, or at least called himself better (which was all the same to me, as I had yet to learn wherein either his sickness or his convalescence consisted); and seeing, too, that the drawing out of the will seemed as far off as ever, I took leave of him very amicably, his last words being these:

"I hope you will come again, Mr. Weston, when I write for you. I like you, for two reasons; first, because you have not bored me with business questions, as men of your profession are so apt to do; and, second, because you have shown a relish for oysters, which is certainly a bond of union between us. Take a few before you go, I advise. You may not have them again; the season will soon be over."

"I declined, at the expense of a passing frown from the small sallow face. My ally, the doctor, gave me a convoy to the end of the avenue.

"Your gaiety has relieved the tedium of my stay here," I said, "and I thank you."

"We shook hands cordially as he replied,

"Isn't he a dainty old soul! See how needful is my sandwich box. Though why I am here at all, unless that I am Dr. Bellingham's assistant, and he is a favourite; or what good I am doing, except to learn patience, is rather a riddle to myself."

"But what is the matter with him?" I asked. "Is his disorder serious? Is it likely to end fatally; or is it all chimera together?"

"His complaints are chiefly neuralgic; and every symptom is more or less aggravated by the particular humour he is pleased to indulge. Then he cries for doctors, yet seldom follows their advice for more than a few hours at one time. His fancy is his doctor; but he throws the blame of every mistake upon our shoulders."

"And has he much property to make a will about?"

"Well, I have heard it variously estimated at from £10,000 to £40,000, but which of these is nearest the truth I cannot say. One fact is obvious. He owes his importance to his guineas, as he owes also the felicity of my attendance on him."

"We are alike there," I said; and so we parted.

"After an hour's brisk walk, I reached the village of Ludhope, when I took up the mail and came rattling home at a royal rate. "But O, my darling!" exclaimed George in conclusion, "of all strange things in this world, it appears the strangest to me that any man should willingly ignore the blessings of marriage—the calm full enjoyment of household ties—and talk of sweet, kind womanhood otherwise than as the best as well as the fairest portion of creation. [Now that was a very pretty speech of my husband's, and I think deserves to be recorded.] What a melancholy picture is a poor solitary hypochondriac! As for the 'noose' into which, by Mr. Halliday's account, you are yet one day destined to bring my head, you have got my heart so completely into your meshes already, and so great is the confidence engendered thereby, it were little wonder though the head should follow. But you will never lead me into mischief, Kate; you will be my good angel now and always—will you not?"

I made him no answer. But I believe that he espied a quiet tear or two hanging on my eyelids. For just then he started up; and, throwing his arms round me, kissed away the foolish drops.

Mem.—How thankful ought I to feel that all men are not like this Mr. Halliday—peevish, selfish, and useless; and that my lot in life has been linked with one who is so generous, devoted, and true! If I only knew that no scar would remain on Charlotte's eyebrow from that fearful accident—and who that woman is with the furred mantle—and that all is right with Mr. Grey—and what is to become of the fine, high-spirited boy at Nice, I should be perfectly happy. Ah! that envious if! It is so apt to intrude upon us, with its impertinent suggestions, when we ought to be most deeply satisfied. But I will not let it interfere with my contentment. That would be little in keeping with my allotted part of a good angel. Good angels never murmur. They do not bring shadows, like the sombre twilight; rather they scatter them, like the cheerful dawn. George and I must be thoroughly and trustingly happy. Ours must be the blue-eyed Goddess of Hope, to bask ever on in the enchantment of her smile, and to catch the waving of her golden hair.

HOW A WEDDING CAME OUT OF A BURIAL.

CHAPTER I.

THERE is very seldom a wedding in the parish of St. Milgith's, and very seldom a burial. Not that by any means the people of St. Milgith's do not marry or do not die. Like the rest of the world, they do both. But for many centuries St. Milgith's was a mere hamlet of the great parish of Hollingham; the people of St. Milgith's went to Hollingham church to be married; and the rector of Hollingham took all the wedding fees of St. Milgith's and other hamlets hereabouts. The folk of this country hold fast to all traditional practices; and though they may now be married here by me if they choose, they prefer to stand at the altar at which their parents and grandparents and most remote ancestors usually stood. So it is that I have but few weddings; and, therefore, those which I have make a distinct and memorable mark in the quiet course of my years. My burials are a little more frequent.

My first wedding grew out of my first burial. If I had not buried Mrs. Large, so far as I can see, I should never have married Portia Goodman. In the country, where there is so little to see, we learn to see very much in that little. Our events are so few and so distant from one another, that we have time to look at them, and dwell on them well, and make a great deal more of them than town's people make of theirs.

I have spoken two names, and I must now show what sort of person claimed each name. First, then, for Portia Goodman. She was the daughter of John Goodman, a man of indefinable position and of nearly indefinable character. Some said he was a gentleman, some said he was a secret tradesman in some suspicious trade; some said he was wealthy, some said he was almost a beggar; some said he was the very pattern of honesty, some said he was an undoubted thief and at; some said that he was killing himself with over-hard work, others said that he was the idlest fellow in the country; some said that he was a very learned and clever man, others said that he was 'a natural.'

What was he? 'It was your duty as parish-priest,' says the reader, 'to know the man. What did you find him?' Well, I tried very hard to know him, but he was particularly shy of knowing me. If I called, he was either not up or not at home. If I pounced upon him in the road or in his garden, he turned the talk at all times upon the crops or the weather.

Once only was I able, in any measure, to draw him out and make him communicative. I saw him in the road opposite his house, standing beside some immense logs of wood. He began to half-drag, half-carry these up the long narrow pathway which led to his door. He was a spare, thin, consumptive-looking man; and he appeared to be worn and tired by the labour. I took up some of the smaller pieces, and helped him to carry the larger pieces, until we had stowed them all on one side of the door. He neither thanked me nor spoke in any way until the work was over; then he asked me to go in and sit down by the fire. I gladly entered.

I never saw such a singular interior. He had been in the parish three years before my time, and I had heard that the house was built under his personal overlooking, and that he had worked at the building himself. It was very long and low, having only one floor, which was divided into two large rooms. 'This is my room,' said he; 'that,' pointing to a closed door, 'is Portia's.'

His own room was apparently kitchen, sitting-room, bed-room, and library. There was no flooring. The rough, clayey earth was uneven beneath our feet; and he stood against the fire, striking the ground with his heel, and raising up the earth in a small, dry dust—as if he was anxious that I should take notice of the want of boards. The walls were unplastered brick and mortar. They were lined all round with unplanned deal shelves; which were covered with books, alternated with cooking utensils, candlesticks, pieces of broken looking-glass, blacking bottles, sides of bacon, candles, piles of writing-paper, newspapers, plaster of Paris, reductions of the Laocoon and other antique statues, and a few busts. I glanced at the shelf nearest to me, and saw that it contained some good editions of the Greek and Roman classics, and stray volumes of French 'Memoires,' chiefly of the First Revolution era. The room contained a large table and two wooden chairs. It had no other furniture. As I was looking at these, Mr. Goodman, without a word, went up to the further corner, drew aside a curtain, and I saw a bed. He then came back to the fire, put one chair to me, and sat down himself upon the other. The fire was made of wood, laid upon dog-irons, on a large and irregular-shaped paving-stone. We sat for some time, looking silently into the fire. I almost forgot that he was opposite me; and I began to lose myself in guesses about his childhood and training, his original occupation, his wife, and the source and extent of his income. At last I was startled by his voice.

'Parson!' said he.

'Yes.'

'Simplicity, parson. Nobody comes into my house but the simple. I saw that you were not altogether wanting in what I denominate simplicitas. You began, without circumlocutory politenesses, to assist me in conveying hitherwards my fuel. The last guest who sat on that chair—and he sat there a biennium ago—was Lee the gipsy—poor Lee the gipsy, who was incarcerated in jail for what they call poaching. I undertook the advocacy of the man; but our laws—your laws—have got so far out of simplicity and first principles, that I could not be heard.'

'Indeed!' I said, to fill the interval, for here he had paused and shut his eyes.

'Yes,' he began again, 'Sim-plici-tas—simplicity, the true rule of private life: simplicity, that is republicanism, the true rule of political and public life: simplicity, the true rule of religious life. I once thought of joining the Quakers, but I found they were not simple enough. Lengthened experience has taught me, parson, that for any individual to be really simple, he must be really an individual. Now, I have been for seven years the only man of my religion; this is my church, and I am my own parson. If anybody else were to join my religion, I should try and leave it.'

The wild and lost look of his eyes, as he fixed them upon me after this speech, showed me that he was a man quite out of the sphere of reason or dispute, so I merely said,—

'I see that your daughter is not of your religion. She comes regularly to church, and teaches in our school.'

'Yes; I should send her if she did not come. It is her religion. I named her Portia from Cato's Portia, Brutus' Portia. It is her Christian name. It is not a Christian name. Now, parson, you may as well go home. Your hands are very dirty. It is with my fuel. You shall wash them with my water. Come, let us go into Portia's room, and wash our hands.'

He showed me into a room exactly the same in size as his own, but in appearance the very opposite. It was boarded and carpeted; the walls were papered with a plain pattern; the furniture was ordinarily good; everything in it was good, neat, plain, and clean.

Portia arose from a little work-table as we entered. She shook hands with me, and left her father and me alone. She was a cheerful, happy-faced girl, who seemed always to have a smile both in her eyes and her mouth. Neither in feature nor in character could I ever see in her the least likeness to her father. A portrait of her mother hanging over the mantelpiece, to which Mr. Goodman silently pointed, showed me that she was entirely her mother's child.

As soon as we had washed our hands, Goodman took me by the arm, and said, 'Vale, parson, Vale. I think I am pleased with you; but do not come again until I invite you.'

I never saw Mr. Goodman again. Every Sunday, however, after service, and as often as I met Portia in the week, I inquired after her father. Formerly she had been shy of speaking of him; but now that I had been in their home and had seen him as he was, she seemed to feel free to talk confidentially about him; and, piece by piece, I learned the secret of their history and position.

He was the son of a wealthy English merchant and of a French lady whose father had died in the first wars of the French Revolution. He succeeded to his father's business in partnership with his elder brother. He married very early; but after a year or two of wedded life his wife died, leaving him with an only daughter. He had been eccentric from his boyhood; but, after his wife's death, his eccentricity became troublesome and confusing to the business, and an arrangement was made by which his brother bought his share in it. From this time until he came to St. Milgith's, he gave himself up to travelling and to the education of his daughter. To everyone but her he appeared occasionally lunatic; and his relatives, more than once, seriously debated on the propriety of confining him. His daughter, however, was on each occasion the test and proof of his sanity. She had had no other teacher, and the effect of his training upon her showed itself in quite an unusual soberness, moderation, and good sense.

His daughter had only once suffered personally from his eccentricity. But that suffering was very deep and lasting, and often rose again in great vigour, from the ground of her naturally joyous and hopeful character, under which it lay entombed. *Three years they had lived at Paris; and there, in a wild republican club to which Mr. Goodman was admitted, he one night made the acquaintance of a young English medical student. He was so pleased with him that he often took him to his lodgings. Love grew up rapidly between the two young English persons. Portia, who knew nothing of young men, was charmed with his enthusiasm for science and politics. He, sick of the class of womankind with which too many medical students in Paris become acquainted, was smitten down by the freshness and purity of his young countrywoman. With her father's fullest sanction, and almost at his invitation, they engaged themselves to one another.

After six months of happy communion, the acquaintance was suddenly broken. Mr. Goodman started off one evening to his friend's lodging, and found him seated at table with some ten or twelve young fellows of his own age, and as many young women, whose characters were by no means above suspicion. A most luxurious supper was spread upon the table.

This was plea enough for Mr. Goodman, the stern and simple. He forbade the young doctor of the future to come near him or his daughter again. He went straight to his daughter, told her his will, and began to help her to pack up their luggage. Before light the next morning they started for England; and, after a few weeks of privacy in London, he left Portia with their land, and began to build his singular house. A month or two after its very incomplete completion, he fetched his daughter, and they had now lived there together, with little change, for nearly five years.

CHAPTER II.

I have said that I never saw Mr. Goodman again.

About six months after my visit, I began to miss Portia Goodman from church and school. At first I took no notice of it; but after she had been absent two Sundays, I began to fear that either she or her father had been taken seriously ill: so the first thing I did on the Monday morning was to call at their house. I knocked with my knuckles: there was no knocker—no bell. A stout woman of about sixty years opened the door.

'How is Mr. Goodman?' I asked.

'Oh! come in, sir,' said she. 'You are the clergyman!'

'Yes,' I answered. 'How are Mr. and Miss Goodman?'

'Come and sit down, sir.' She led me up to a seat by the fire—the very place where I had sat at my former visit. I saw at a glance that the whole character of the room was changed. The rude native flooring still remained, indeed; but a handsome piece of thick carpet was laid over it at one end of the room, by the fireplace, and the chair in which I sat down was a comfortable stuffed elbow-chair. The shelves were arranged in the greatest order. It was evident that the reign of Mr. Goodman and simplicity were for a time over.

'Is Mr. Goodman unwell?' I asked again.

'Well, sir,' answered the stout lady, 'I am sure I do not know. I haven't seen or heard of him these ten days.'

'Has he gone away, then?'

'Well, sir, I must tell you, first, that I am—I mean, I was—Miss Portia's nurse. It was ten days ago, as I said, I was sitting in the parlour with my daughter, at Bethnal Green. My son-in-law was just putting up the last shutter—they keep a pork-and-tripe shop, and they make the best and wholesomest sausages as ever I tasted—when in rushed my old master, Mr. Goodman.'

'Ah, nurse!' says he, 'here you are! And this is your son's wife, I suppose?'

'Not exactly, sir,' I replied. 'But the young man putting up the shutters is my girl's husband.'

'Now, nurse,' he said, very flurried, and not sitting down, though my daughter said, 'Pray, sir, be seated.'

'Now, nurse, the cab is at the door; and I want you to go off to the Great Northern Station, and take the eleven o'clock train down to St. Milgith's. You must live with my Portia for six months; and,' says he, knowing me to be reasonable in my charges these twenty years, 'I will pay you whatever you ask.'

'It's impossible, sir,' says my daughter. 'Mother has such falling fits,' and so I have, 'that I dare not leave her long by herself.'

'Not so impossible, child,' I says, 'for Miss Portia knows me near as well as you.' Moreover, I recollected that, though Mr. Goodman is always somehow odd, he always pays anybody, and especially me, like a gentleman. 'Not so impossible to go, sir; but I can't go to-night, sir; for what things have I ready? But my son-in-law will take me off in the horse and cart to-morrow morning.'

'Mr. Goodman has gone out for six months, then, I suppose?' said I, not wishing for the whole history of her packing up, and her farewell to tripe and sausages and Bethnal Green.

'Yes, sir, he was odder than customary, as I thought. He told me he would telegraph that night to his daughter that I was coming the next morning, and that he was on the way to America. Then he said a long piece out of a play, as my son-in-law supposed, about the little profits of an idle king. To which my daughter's husband replied that there was little profits for an idle pork-butcher. Then, without sitting down for an instant, he jumped into the cab, and went off, nobody knows where.'

Mrs. Large was interrupted by the entry of Miss Portia Goodman. She looked very pale and anxious. She told me that her father had been strangely excited for the last month, and had declared aloud many times in the day the 'Ulysses' of our Poet Laureate; and had applied the fireside regrets and world-wide longings of the king of Ithaca to himself. He had also written and talked a great deal about the rotten republics of the west, and wished he could see his duty clear to go out and restore the pure and simple idea of republicanism to the nations of South America. At last he went up, as he told her, to London, with a bundle of books, writings, and clothing. 'Until I received the telegram, and saw Mrs. Large,' said Portia, 'I expected him back in a day or two.'

Mrs. Large and Miss Portia lived together in great quietness for six or seven months. Portia's elastic disposition, together with her lifelong experience of her father's extraordinary doings, prevented her from being so deeply affected by his departure as some daughters would have been. Had he done anything tenfold as flighty, she would have simply called it an eccentricity; and she was comforted by her firm assurance that he was perfectly competent to prove his sanity to any person, in any circumstances, if the proof were called for. My own fears were for his total loss of reason,—'if,' as I said to myself, 'he has not totally lost it already.'

During these six or seven months, the house underwent a decided transformation. Every time I visited it, I saw an increase of comfort about it, and a gradual assimilation of its interior to the ordinary interiors of middle-class houses. A little kitchen was run up at the side of the house. The simple room of Mr. Goodman was boarded and carpeted, and somewhat spoiled of its squareness by the formation out of it of a kind of hall, to keep away the rush of cold air which used to enter in with every opening of the door. The ladies also indulged themselves with a little maid-servant.

At the end of some months, however, poor Miss Goodman found that her father's departure was only one in the series of her troubles. Mrs. Large looked as if she suffered from excess of health; but she was continually unwell. Throughout the hot weather she was unequal to the walk from Miss Goodman's house to the church.

One morning Portia came up to the parsonage, pale and flurried. 'I wish, sir,' she said, 'you would kindly come over and see Mrs. Large. She is so ill.'

I returned with the young lady. When we arrived,

Mrs. Large was lying upon the bed, dressed, and speechless. I was frightened at her look; and hurrying up to the bedside, took her hand. It was cold.

'I am afraid,' I said, 'it is all over. The poor old lady must have died whilst you were on your way to my house.'

CHAPTER III.

We could not leave the poor girl in the sepulchre which her own house had now become. 'The child had better stay here,' said my mother, 'until we have communicated with her uncle or acquaintances in London.' Poor Portia very gladly accepted our invitation to a few days' stay in the parsonage.

Mrs. Large died on the Monday; and, having seen her daughter and son-in-law, for whom I at once telegraphed, Friday was arranged by me for the day of burial.

It was, as I have said already, my first burial at St. Milgith's. At five minutes to three on the Friday afternoon, I put on my cassock, surplice, and stole, and went into the church. It was a cold, windy day, about the end of autumn. The funeral was to come at three. On rising up from my knees, I went to one of the windows on the north side of the church; and, leaning there, looked upon the road along which the procession would come. I could see to the distance of about a quarter of a mile; for, so far, the road was straight, but beyond that distance a sudden angle hid the rest of the way—very nearly a mile, to the house where Mrs. Large had died. Only the sexton, besides myself, was in the church. It was a melancholy sound for me—for the first time to hear, in my little church, the tolling of the funeral bell. Sadder still when I remembered that the poor woman had died so suddenly, and so far from her own kin. Close beside me was the seat where she had sat down, only a few Sundays before—astonishing our village women with her fresh London finery; and now her body was to be carried in, passing unconsciously up the aisle along which she had lately walked with so much dignity and self-consciousness. 'I could not bear the thought of death,' I said to myself, 'if I could not believe the words of the Apostle, that as in Adam all die, equally so in Christ all shall be made alive. How thankful I am to be the minister of a source of such high faith and infinite hope as this burial office!'

I had just opened the book at the burial service, when I noticed that the bell had ceased tolling for a longer interval than before. I looked out upon the road; but, although nearly half-an-hour beyond the time, the funeral procession was not even in sight.

'Sir!'

I turned, and the sexton was standing beside me.

'If you please, sir, will you come and look at the grave! I want to show you something.'

I looked out again upon the road, saw that the funeral was still not in sight, and then followed the sexton into the church-yard. The grave was at the south-east corner, close to the wall. At the head of the grave next to that newly dug, stood a large and clumsy cross, made not of stone or wood, but of stucco, and one of its arms almost stretched over the new grave.'

'Please, sir,' said the sexton, 'this cross is quite broke, and I wanted to tell you not to touch it as you stand here; for if you do, I think it will break off.'

'It looks as if it would,' I said. And thanking him, I went back into the church.

As soon as I looked out of the window, I saw the funeral procession in the distance. I walked out, and met it at the gate of the church-yard. When we returned to the church, I saw that my mother had brought in Portia. They neither of them, however, followed the corpse to the grave.

Having taken good heed to the sexton's direction, I left the cross as safe as I found it. My mother and Portia were sitting in the church when I came back from the burial. 'Do you not think,' I whispered to my mother, 'that Portia would like to give one look at the coffin!'

The poor girl heard me, and cried, 'Oh yes, sir.' She rose up directly, and we went with her as far as the porch, and standing there awaited her return. Suddenly my conscience smote me. 'I have forgotten to give her warning about that headstone.'

I ran out, and saw the fruit of my heedlessness. The poor girl was being lifted up by two men. She was stunned and unconscious. The cross was broken at the stem. In her eagerness, she had leaned upon it as a support the moment she got to the grave; the action of leaning forward had precipitated her into the grave. She had been thrown upon her head and her right elbow.

'Her arm is broken, poor lass,' said one.

'It's only fright, sir,' said another. 'She'll soon come too.'

'Fright, indeed,' cried a woman. 'I think you'd be frightened to fall into a new-dug grave. She will na be a live body this day next year, poor thing.'

CHAPTER IV.

'My dear,' said my mother, when I got into the house, 'you must drive down to Hollingham for Dr. Stacey. The poor girl is now sensible; but she is in most excruciating pain, and I am afraid that it is quite true that her arm is broken.'

Like an obedient son, I went out at once, harnessed my pony, and drove down to Hollingham—some three miles from St. Milgith's—at that reckless speed with which I, like many other born Londoners, astonish country charioteers. Every cart I met was drawn as nearly into the hedge as it would go, and every driver turned his head after me with gaping and stolid astonishment. I found that Dr. Stacey had gone out; but the boy told me that Mr. Soames, the doctor's assistant, was in the surgery.

Mr. Soames immediately came out. He asked me if my mother was unwell; for she is the only person who ever wants the doctor in my household.

'No,' I said; 'a young lady staying with us has had a very bad accident; we fear that her arm is broken.' As we were riding back, I detailed all the circumstances to him. My mother met us at the parsonage door, and took up the surgeon to the patient's room, while I sat down in my study to write my day's budget of letters.

I was startled in the midst of a troublesome epistle by the entry of Mr. Soames. His whole manner was peculiarly changed. He looked nervous and greatly agitated; and, without speaking a word, he dropped into the chair nearest the door. It was hardly a surgeon's expression which showed itself in the young man's face. I was used to Stacey's professional look of sympathy with pain; but his assistant appeared more like the patient than the physician.

'Well,' I said, putting down my pen, 'what do you think of her? How is she?'

'Not so well as she would have been, I fear, if I had not come. You ought never to have brought me.'

'How!' I cried. I began to fear that he had made some fatal surgical mistake. 'Have you injured her then?'

'Not her body. I have set her arm. The accident is less dangerous than you supposed. It is her mind that I have hurt.'

'You speak mysteries, Mr. Soames.'

'If you were to go upstairs now she would not know you.'

'Do you mean that she has lost her reason? Can she have her father's—her father's disease?'

'God forbid!' he said, most solemnly. The tone and look with which he spoke struck me, and I asked,

'Do you know her father? I thought he never allowed a doctor to come near himself or her.'

'He did once allow me to come. It is my fault that he has allowed no other.'

'No,' I replied; 'it was his principle. He thought them, or professed to think them, unnecessary. But—you knew them!'

'She knew me in a moment,' said he. 'Why did you not tell me who your patient was?'

'How could I guess,' I asked, 'that you were that person whom I must now say you are? You are that medical student of whom I have heard?'

'Yes.'

'Whom they knew in Paris?'

'Yes.'

'And you were engaged to Miss Goodman?'

'Sir, I am engaged to her. I cannot think of an engagement—a betrothal—being broken, unless both persons break it. I have never broken it. I am sure she cannot have broken it.' Then, after a moment's pause, he added, with a glance at me which I could not mistake, 'Perhaps she has, and —'

'You need not fear,' said I, smiling in spite of myself; 'I know not of any one to whom she is engaged.'

I spoke to the poor fellow such words of sympathy and encouragement as both my office bid me, and the simple truth allowed me to speak. He grasped my hands on leaving, saying, at the same time, 'I dare not come again to see her; at all events until I hear she is better, and is willing to see me. I will ask Dr. Stacey to visit her. I will send up in a few hours to ask how she is—how her mind is, I mean—if you will kindly send me word.'

'Well, good-bye,' I said. 'I have no fear about her mind. Whether she is still holding sacred her engagement with you, you must come and discover for yourself.'

I am glad to say that both sufferers recovered their health in body and mind. The doctor healed the patient's arm, and the patient healed the doctor's heart. Without waiting for the sanction of the eccentric father, my mother and I agreed that I might give Portia away, by right of my large fatherhood over the whole parish as its priest; and we were fortunately seconded in this, after we had agreed upon it, by the arrival in St. Milgith's of Portia's uncle. Thus, as far as the chain of causes show, Portia would not have been married had not Mrs. Large been buried. Thus, too, my first wedding at St. Milgith's grew, in a curious manner, out of my first funeral.

ON DISSIPATED MEN OF GENIUS.

BY THE EDITOR.

IN order to prevent mistake, we desire, at the outset of this paper, to make it apparent, even to the duller reader, that we have an utter detestation of drunkenness. An inebriate person is to us an unspeakably disgusting object. When we think of the pawned household effects; the scarcity of food, bedding, and fuel; and the thousand frantic quarrels and breaking hearts under the miserable roof-trees of the habitually besotted, we dare even go the length of confessing that, were we ambitious of oratorical distinction and renown, we should feel strongly tempted to select, like Mr. Gough, the teetotal in preference to any other platform. Its themes—branching, with terrible directness and rapidity, into the outer lawless verge of all vices and crimes—are the most touching and tragic that our modern civilization supplies. What room do they afford for hilarious foreground groups, for harrowing background pictures, for vehement and soul-moving appeals on the basis of these hideous social antitheses? How easy, by the due touching of alternate chords, to melt the heart to pathos or inflame it to indignation! But our Demosthenic aspirations are modest. Nature, we fear, never moulded us for conspicuous philanthropic warfare. Yet we must add, emphatically, that, in the humble matter of our personal self-government, we should deem it a duty to abstain totally from all alcoholic beverages, did we not consider it, on the whole, a higher virtue to be judiciously temperate in their use.

Now, from these broadly honest asseverations and confessions, it will, we hope, be clear to any one not wilfully blind, that we stand respectfully qualified for admission into all but the extreme fore-front and ultra-fanatical British temperance ranks. Thus intrenched, then, in a position quite above reasonable suspicion, will we be thought to act inconsistently if we solicit a tear, a pardon, and an alms for dissipated and downfallen men of genius? It has been our good—or perhaps we should say our bad—fortune to be acquainted with many such. Some of them we have seen die—almost before our eyes—the wildest, the terriblest, the saddest of alcoholic deaths. With dismal forebodings—which we have tried now and then, as occasion offered, to frame into useful lessons and warnings—have we marked the wretched, unnerved, tremulous, restless-eyed horror of the one awful want, and the splendid temporary relief resulting from the delusive draught—the draught delusive because inducing a more deadly reaction. Yet, somehow or other, we never knew a dissipated man of genius who was not, in sundry social respects, loveable. The light that 'led astray' has, in fact, been evermore 'light from heaven.' Who has not heard, again and again, the significant expression, 'Poor fellow! he was only too good-hearted.' A genial disposition, an amiable good nature, a rare capacity to shine in society, are the delightful demons that impel their brilliant victims to over-indulgence and ruin. In such cases, if it is human to blame, it is angelic to pity, and god-like to forgive. Take the singer, the poet, or the artist. How society feasts and flatters him! If he is cold, selfish, and calculating, he resists solicitation, and lives to be rich and honoured. But if, on the other hand, he is kindly, facile, and fond of good fellowship, he is ready for all exhilarating companionships, and eventually dies poor and despised. Society is thus at once the tempter and the avenger; and who can tell how cruelly its blows may sometimes fall on hearts whose very softness is their curse?

We are aware, of course, that sympathy for dissipated men of genius is neither very frequent nor very popular. Our fiercely industrial, coldly utilitarian, and meanly money-worshipping age, is under a tyranny of hard-headed, flinty-hearted politico-economical maxims. According to a certain school of modern philosophers, any attempt to avert or mitigate the natural penalties of imprudence, or of any other form of misconduct, is an unwarrantable interference with the immutable laws of Providence. Yet, as well might it be said that it is wrong to give surgical aid or nursing consolation to any one who stumbles and is hurt, on the ground that the suffering endured in that case is no more than the punishment due to a rash disregard of the inevitable law of gravitation! True, God has given us feeling hearts as well as logical heads; but it so happens that, for the present, the logical heads are mightily in the ascendant. Men of genius should not be above making money. If they are poor, and especially if they are drunken, they have themselves to blame. They must just suffer the consequences. Therefore, the said men of genius—at least when they begin to wax fiery-eyed and seedy—are on all hands vituperated and shunned. Their amour propre is continually wounded. Going down in the social scale, every one gives them a kick to help them down. Soared and angry with the world, they scathe it with their immortal scorn; and, clutching at the maddening cup, find themselves suddenly translated into a world of sweet and beatific dreams. The drink that has been their bane in prosperous hours thus becomes their ready refuge in hours of despondency and hopelessness. It makes life endurable to them, until death comes at the last, grandly and with triumphal songs—the final emancipator of all who are irretrievably unhappy, and not the least so of all who have undoubtedly of their own weak will fallen, but who, being down, have been trampled on by society with its myriad remorseless heels.

There is a Scottish air well known, and often sung, which can scarcely be listened to without tears. It is a strain of the truest and purest inspiration. Innumerable hearts have been touched by it into emotions of tenderness. Its composer was first a star in admiring circles; then a convivialist, flattered into self-neglect, and cheered onward to his destruction; and, finally, a degraded drunkard and shameless waif and outcast. God helps those who help themselves. This wretched creature of originally fine clay had not helped himself, and he consequently appeared in the end as if altogether God-forgotten. He had brought his misery upon himself—therefore he deserved to suffer—therefore he was permitted to suffer. The business men and the wary calculators saw wherein he had erred, and were quick to tell him of his folly. But death found him unbefriended. On all sides wealth was squandered in gross gratifications and vulgar displays, but not even a poor modicum of comfort fell to the share of the poor composer of '———.' Yet that genuine heart-gush of melody will continue to be a joy to the world long after the wise and stern contemnors of its hapless author—who looked well to their own interests, and especially well to the interests of their heirs—and who were altogether great and important personages in their day and generation—are forgotten beneath their marble tombs.

In connection with this subject, the cases of Edgar Allan Poe and Hartley Coleridge naturally occur. The former was as inveterate and irreclaimable a drunkard as George Morland, the unrivalled painter of English stables and farm-yards. But he was something worse. In spite of his ingeniously constructive intellect and extraordinary ear for the rhythmical arrangement of words, he appears to have been guilty of such heartlessness and ingratitude, especially towards his amiable benefactor, Mr. Allan, as to render him a psychological enigma. But poor Hartley Coleridge, like most men of his fine and sensitive stamp who have fallen victims to the allurements of social intercourse, was nobody's enemy save his own. Could it be wrong to alleviate the last sufferings of men like these—men who, whatever may have been their failings, still ministered to the higher and more enduring enjoyments of mankind? Why should not compassion and help follow them even when pursuing their true divinity into false and fatal paths? The defences at one time put forward for the errors of Byron and Burns provoked much righteous denial of the claims of genius to despise the moralities of life. A reaction was thus engendered of uncompromising sternness towards the frailties of brilliant-minded men, until the world, in its desire to be severely virtuous, forgot to be even moderately Christian. The safe course is to avoid either extreme. Inebriety is a flagrant sin, and is, in one sense, aggravated when it involves the waste or the destruction of noble and beautiful gifts. On the other hand, our men of shining intellect are peculiarly exposed to temptation; besides being more liable, perhaps, from the very sensitiveness of their nature, to those heart-aches and depressions which impel to the use of stimulants. When, therefore, society has drunk the fresh bright wine of their lives, and are casting off what remains as the mere worthless lees, there is room surely for some little exercise of that greatest of Christian virtues—charity. Few of us, we apprehend, are much better than our neighbours, no matter how diversified may be our positions in life. To some, however, ample means have been given—perhaps through a parsimonious ancestry—perhaps through unscrupulous clutching and saving—perhaps through the accident of a fortunate run of business—perhaps through the timely help, at some critical juncture, of wealthy and generous relations—perhaps through some mere casual windfall, implying not one particle of personal merit or exertion. To these the teaching and the preaching of all nations and ages have assigned certain lofty duties—duties which, in the doing, have the sweetness and the recompense of Heaven's best benediction—and not the least sacred of which is kindness towards those wofully erring unfortunates who, though themselves utterly impoverished, have made the world eternally their debtor by contributing to its diviner needs.

A D R E A M.

How strange and eventful is life in dreamland! How like sometimes, and at other times how very unlike that of the common work-a-day world! In it even the most monotonous or unpoetical kind of existence may receive a tinge of romance unequalled in all the wide domain of Faëry. The fancy, freed from the control of the will, flies off for a frolic, and, strange to say, it generally chooses night for its holiday;—generally, we might almost have said always, for though there are such things as day-dreams, yet the imagination is never so free and untrammelled in its wanderings as at night.

Who shall define the boundaries of dreamland?

'That wild weird clime, that lieth sublime,
Out of space—out of time;'

or shall we rather say throughout the whole of both, for whither has not the fancy taken its flight? It has gone down into the regions of horror and darkness, and anon soared afar into the realms of light and love. How often has it glided sadly away back into the past—to the old familiar scenes of youth, and conjured up the features of the loved and lost; and how often, again, has it swept with daring wing away into the future!

What pleasures have been enjoyed, and what pains suffered in a few seconds of dream-life! Every one old enough to have a memory, carries about in it some souvenir of dreamland, and his life is in a greater or less degree influenced by his visits there. We hope, though, that no one will ever allow himself to become a victim to this influence, like Bulwer's poor 'dreaming enthusiast,' who donned his nightcap, and plunged into dream-life as others put on their hats and go forth to their daily toil. 'I seek no joy,' said he, 'in this world; I form no ties; I feast not, nor love, nor make merry; there [in dreamland] have I found all that the world denied me; there have I realised the yearning and aspiration within me, there have I coined the untold poetry into the felt—the seen!' Poor fool!—yet to be pitied; for surely his was no gross, but a sweet and lovable nature, though all unfit for dealing with the rough realities of life.

Reader! do you know the High-street of Glasgow? If you do, I need not—if you don't, I dare not—attempt to describe to you the poor half-fed, half-clad creatures, who sit with their baskets bridging the gutters, selling herrin', sybobs, &c. Well, no later than yesterday, as I was going up the street to H—n's,* I chanced to hear one of them say to another—and in tones, too, betokening all a woman's heart, albeit touched with a woman's vanity—'I dreamed I was at a grand merridge, an' I thoct I had on a pair o' fine white satin slippers.' A grand marriage and satin slippers for thee! thought I. Poor creature! surely that was indeed a dream. Ah! ye youthful fair ones—rich and poor—I know you all; and is it not a dream of white satin slippers, and a grand marriage, with every one of you?

And this brings me to think of thee, my dear F—, and the last night I spent with thee, when we sat in my little chambre au troisième, and thou didst write on the fly-leaf of my 'Pensées' a verse, beginning 'La vie est un rêve,' adding, by way of superscription, 'En souvenir de celui qui aimerait se nommer votre ami F— H—.' En souvenir of thee, my dear F—! I shall keep it as long as I live. It is even now before me; for I have taken it forth once more from its shrine in my old travelling-case. There it lies—a cherished and fit memorial of thee—mystical, melancholy, yet warm and impulsive; half French, half German, like thy native Alsace. There it lies, and at sight of it the past is so vividly recalled that I feel as it were an inward struggling to reach thee and renew the old times. My heart beats against its prison bars, as though it fain would burst them, to find communion with thine; and the eyes of fancy strain wide to catch if possible a clearer sight of thee. But, like Prometheus to the rock, the spirit is chained to this clog of clay, and all the ardent longings, sweet affections—thwarted and disappointed—turn back upon the panting heart, and gnaw like very vultures.

'La vie est un rêve!' Ah! mon ami, mon pauvre ami, why—when scarce two dozen summer suns had shone upon thee—why didst thou look so sadly on life? Why should it so soon appear to thee—a dream? Hadst thou so early borne the baptism of fire? Would that I could wipe it from thy brow! Thou knowest I tried it. Now, if good wishes and kind regards can reach thee, may this gentle breeze (or the post—for thou mayest one day read this) bear away to thee, the best and kindest of 'le numero quatre.'

* A bookseller, whose name has been as 'a household word' with all Glasgow collegians for the last quarter of a century.

Alas! to how many is life nothing better than a dream! We do not mean here to refer to those of the Bishop Berkeley or Hume school, but to all self-seekers, all whose motto may be set down in the words of a knowing old mynheer, 'Eash man for myshelf.' And to these, paradoxical though it seem, may we not add all of the wide-awake school? Is it not to them also a dream? Ah! they think themselves far-seeing, though we doubt if their range of vision ever extends much past their pockets; they think they can out-distance most of their neighbours, but—and it is worth remembering—there are cases where 'the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.'

If you just glance for a moment over the whole range of literature, sacred and profane, from the Bible down to the little penny 'Book of Fate, or Dreamer's Oracle,' you will be able to form some idea of the important part dreams play in our little world. And at the very keystone of this mighty arch, spanning from the past to the present, you find the wonderful book by the wondrous dreamer of Bedford.

Not only do dreams penetrate into our literature, but they invade also the domains of science and the arts. One of the most effective pictures we ever saw was 'A Dream,' by that most spirituel of French painters, Leon Cogniet. A noble steed, with a sleeping maiden gently pillowed on its back, was madly careering down through the clouds, while the lightnings flashed their fiery bolts athwart its course. Even the cold substantial marble has been made to embody the 'airy nothing' of a dream, as witness Monti's well-known most exquisite piece of sculpture, 'The Sleep of Sorrow and the Dream of Joy.'

But let us leave the subject of dreams and dreamers in general, and come to one dream and one dreamer in particular. I was far away—in a strange land, amongst strangers. After about two years' exile, without seeing a 'kent face,' and not having even the most distant expectation of such an event, I accidentally met an old fellow-student, who had come to stay for a short time within a few miles of where I was located. Talk of Freemasonry and its bond of brotherhood! What is that to the tie which knit us together in that far-off land—a tie made doubly strong, too, by that spirit of clanship so railed against in north-country folks? Ah! cosmopolitan may be a fine-sounding word to some ears, but to us there always seems to be something both homeless and heartless in it. We hold that the man who loves kith and kin best, is the man who will have the warmest heart to the world at large.

It might have been lowness of spirits, home-sickness, or—shall I say it?—well, something more substantial, if not more real, that sent my fancy away on such a strange flight that night; but, 'in the spirit or the flesh, I dreamed' that I and my newly-found comrade were both disembodied. Whether this was lucky or unlucky, according to the funny little 'oracle' aforementioned, matters not. As if by mutual consent, we met on the top of a huge rock, commanding a view of a beautiful and extensive vale. I say we; for, though our ponderous corporeal impersonations were not there, still, I felt instinctively that we were, and had no perception that aught of the ego or the sum was wanting in either case. It was the gloamin'; all was calm and serene—still as the Sabbath on a slumbering sea. Sadly and silently we met. No uttered greeting passed between us—only our 'eyes looked love to eyes that spake again,' and our hands met with that firm and hearty pressure so dumbly eloquent of sympathy. Language was unneeded; for, strange to say, each seemed to know the other's thoughts and feelings as well as his own. We had met to take flight together to our native land—to visit the 'near and dear' ones there. Side by side, and hand in hand, we stood on the summit of the rock; together we rose lightly upwards into the dim blue air. No motion, nor even an expressed wish, was necessary on our parts. Simply the thought arose in the mind, and forthwith the thing was done. Serenely and calmly, higher and still higher we were borne; and then away over field and forest, mountain and moor—over great noisy cities, lit up with the glare of ten thousand lamps, and peaceful little hamlets, wrapped in sleep and the silence of night.

Thus we sped on, o'er land and sea, till we were far away out on the trackless deep. And oh! what a soothing and holy influence seemed to pass over us, when, looking down, we beheld the infinite ethereal vault, with its myriad gems, mirrored in the calm and glassy waters! Before—behind—on either side, there was no trace of earth. The sky above met the mimic sky below. All around us the stars were twinkling merrily. It seemed as if we had left the world behind, and set out on 'a journey through space.' Far down, on the waveless, mirror sea, a stately ship, her sails all set, lay cradled as by enchantment. She appeared as if suspended in the ether:—

'A glorious phantom of the deep,
Risen up to meet the moon.
Oh! ne'er did sky and water blend
In such a holy sleep,
Or bathe in brighter quietude
A roamer of the deep.
So far the peaceful soul of heaven
Hath settled on the sea;
It seems as if this weight of calm
Were from eternity.
Is she a vision wild and bright,
That sails amid the still moonlight
At the dreaming soul's command?
A vessel borne by magic gales—
All rigged with gossamery sails,
And bound for fairyland!'

'Twas changed. Dark mountain masses of cloud came hurling up over the sky. The sea no longer lay like a mirror. Sudden and awful as the lightning's flash, with its attendant thunder-peal, came the sweep of the hurricane and the wild boom of the tempest. Above—below—all was fury and confusion; but as for us, the storm affected us not. Rain, hail, the lightning's fiery tongue passed harmless by. The fiercest blast did not so much as sway the curling love-lock on my comrade's brow. The goodly ship, that erewhile seemed to lie 'as idly as a painted ship upon a painted ocean,' was now tossed about on the great heaving seething billows, the mere sport of wind and water. In vain the seamen strove—in vain the voice of command was heard ever and anon pealing above the hoarse roar of the storm. Wave after wave broke over the doomed ship—one wild crash, and it was engulfed. Some struggling forms might be seen for a moment wrestling with the waves—shriek followed shriek as one by one disappeared—and then all was still!

Reader! have you ever allowed your thoughts to wander at will in some fair pharisaical Utopia, or indulged in some sweet sentimental day-dream till you fancied yourself far removed above the low and grovelling ways of earth, into an atmosphere of calm serenity and holiness? Have you? And in the very midst of this self-satisfied soul-take-thine-ease state, has not some rude blast of passion, trouble, or temptation, sweeping over the sea of life—ruffling its placid surface—dispelled the illusion, and recalled to your mind the unwelcome fact that you were still 'of the earth, earthy'?

Soon the sea was left behind, and we drew near to a large city—a modern Babel. Louder and louder grew the drowsy hum of the toiling millions in this human hive. What a sight to look down on, with its thousands of wide and brilliant streets and dark and narrow lanes, with the great living flood seething in and out, backwards and forwards, through them! See its busy markets; its deserted fane; its flaring hell-mouths, dealing out delirium and death; its benevolent societies dispensing medicine, food, and clothes! See its cosy bright firesides—around which all the heart's fairest flowers both bud and bloom; and its gaudy theatres, where, instead of these sweet blossoms of nature, you have presented to you the stiff and starchy mockeries of the fleuriste; where, alike in tragedy and comedy, poor humanity is burlesqued! See, in this gorgeous apartment, Sir Rubicund Dives and his friends seated around the table, while the jest and the bottle pass round together, the one growing light with the other; and then, if your eye is not dazzled, cast a passing glance into that dark chilly corner, where crouches poor LAZARUS—homeless and friendless, faint with hunger, and shivering with cold! The tears come welling up into his eyes, and trickle down his thin pale cheeks, and he has not strength to wipe them away. A little more cold, a little more hunger, and he shall be beyond the reach of both.

Here, in the centre of a beautiful garden, lit up with gay coloured lamps, is a large circular space, from out the dazzling glare of which come the sounds of music and revelry. There the flying feet of giddy crowds are whirling through the mazes of the dance. Barely beyond reach of the noise from this scene of gaiety, in a dimly-lighted room, in a retired street, might be heard the half-stifled sobs of a group of sorrowing ones gathered round a bedside. Ah! a familiar voice is about to be hushed for ever; eyes, that erst beamed responsive and lovingly to theirs, are to be closed to-night, and ne'er shall look upon the morrow; then

'Oh for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!'

Death is busy, especially in the dark lanes and foul alleys, but—alas for human pomp and power!—he stays not always there. Belgravia! beware and prepare! To-morrow the grim unbidden guest may step into thy gayest circle, and lay his icy hand upon the truest, warmest heart.

But there, treading lightly and briskly along that street, go two young men. The merry ring of their voices bespeaks an exuberance of pleasure in their breasts. Whither away, ye happy ones! Ah! there they go. What a lot of white kids that shopman puts up for them, passing meanwhile many a lively joke! Out they come and away again, merry and light. Where next? Here it is—Coach-office. In they go. Six carriages—wedding party—Tuesday, 8 o'clock. Pleasant business—soon over—then out and away again, merry and light as before. Joy, much joy, go with them! But who are these who have just entered as the others left, and why are they so sad? Hush! they order carriages too, and one of them large and magnificent, with great clusters of raven plumes nodding over it. No wonder they are sad. It is not easy soon to forget a father or a mother, a sister or a brother.

Thus it is with life. Gleam and gloom, roses and thorns, sunshine and shower! While some go to a wedding, others wend their way to a funeral. Others! Nay, all,

'Hopeful or hopeless, loving, loved,
Old, young, or grave or gay;
We all go to a funeral,
And none may bide away.
The brightest eye must lose its light,
The warmest heart grow cold,
The fairest form must feed the worm
And wither in the mould.'

Leaving far behind the city, with its sins and sorrows, we sped away o'er the fragrant meadows. Oh! how fair and peaceful did they seem, calmly slumbering in the silver moonlight—the evening breeze gently crooning a lullaby as it glided through the trees! Suddenly, from among the myriad twinkling gems o'erhead, shot one; and with a gentle hush, like the faint echo of a sigh, seemed to vanish in the darkness just beneath us. Its momentary pale blue gleam sufficed to reveal that sin and sorrow were even here—here, in such a sweet spot, on such a lovely night. Even here came feebly pulsing up into the holy moon.

light the low murmurings of anguish—such, too, as the heart can feel but once, that painless woe that for a time seems to change this warm sentient frame into a frozen mass, drying up even the fount of tears, and fixing the icy eyeballs staring into vacancy. Looking down in the direction whence the sounds came, we could distinguish, cowering on a sweet little grassy plot, a female form. Her bonnet lay beside her, her hands on her lap were clutched convulsively—the taper fingers intertwining in rigid agony. Her shoulders were drawn up, her chin rested on her breast, and her face—oh that face with its cold tearless eyes, fathomless in their depth of woe!—at sight of it even the very angel of consolation would have been struck dumb. By her side stood—but why say more? ‘’tis but the old, old story;’ and the stream as it rippled past seemed to sob in sympathy with the poor sorrowing one. The very willows that grew near drooped their heads and wept, whilst the wind soughed through them with a low, mournful wail. Even the little church, beneath whose roof, perhaps, she had in infancy been dedicated to the Lord, seemed to bring its drop of balm, as with its long stony finger it pointed to the sky. All nature seemed to breathe tender accents of sympathy—ay, even of hope—although the day was now so far spent.

With a tear for humanity, and praying that a better time might soon come, we left the spot. The hills and dales of our native land appeared. Soon we were gliding over them and gazing down fondly on each hallowed spot. Here we saw the ruins of some lordly mansion of long ago, there the lowly cot in which was born one of earth's truly great ones; on this side the wide battle-field now waving with grain, on that the moss-grown martyr's stone in the dreary moorland. Behind, the ivy-mantled walls of some grand old abbey; before, the little village kirk, with its auld kirk-yard—

‘Where the weary, weary rest,
Wi’ the green turf on their breast;
And the ashes o’ the blest

Flower the auld kirk-yard.
The light of many a hearth,
Its music and its mirth,
Sleep in the deep, dark earth
Of the auld kirk-yard.

Oh! many a tale it bath,
The auld kirk-yard,
Of life's crooked, thorny path
To the auld kirk-yard;—
Strifes to the world unknown,
Reveal'd to God alone—
Hid by the tribute stone
In the auld kirk-yard.’

Touched with a ‘most sweet sadness,’ we sped on our airy way. Brighter scenes were coming into view. Beneath us lay the benty hills, on which we had roamed from morn till eve of many a long long summer's day. Happy, happy time; for then the burden on our shoulders was light—then we knew little of the cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches. Then how merrily we could carol back to the whanps, as they poured forth their rich, maellifuous trill—a very shower of music—on our heads. Buoyant and free we felt, as the lapwings that came swooping over our heads, or the moorfowl that flew whirling and chattering away when we disturbed their solitude. There are the little mountain burns in which we have fished and ‘guddled’ so oft. There, where the great whinstone dyke crops out of the hillside, is the spot where, years ago, in our happy student days, three of us laid aside our rods and sat down to lunch. The noontide sun was bright and scorching, and both fish and fishers felt not quite up to the exertion—at least, I can answer for the latter. Out came the sandwiches, the cakes and cheese, &c., all nicely done up for us by a fair hand before we started in the morning. Our caps were reverently doffed for a moment, whilst a blessing was asked. Call it formality; sneer, if you will, at three frolicsome young fellows, on a hillside, baring their heads to ask a blessing on their mid-day ‘piece.’ No matter; that is not one of the things that will leave a sting behind. The remembrance of that and the like, done ‘decently and in order,’ will never cause a sigh, unless for the reason that they belong to the bright, bright days gone by. Happy is he in whose memory there is treasured up good store of the innocent joys of youth. Our simple meal finished, and washed down with a draught from the burn, one—perhaps the most philosophically inclined—of our party was soon busy blowing little curling clouds of smoke up into the air. Whether from sympathy with his meditative turn, or from the narcotic influence of his ‘weed,’ or because the weather was too hot and we were too happy for the ‘crack’ to be very brisk, I cannot say, but it soon became desultory and of a decidedly dreamy cast. Just entering as we were into manhood, we naturally began to speculate on the great future that lay before us, and wondered how we would feel if sixty years thence we should all meet again on that spot. Sixty years—pahaw! it was a boyish dream. Could old men of eighty ever manage to climb over so many miles of hills to reach that spot, were it ever so dear? Sixty years! we will all most likely have gone on our last journey long ere then. As to the great future we thought of, years of it have passed; one of its precious augenblick gems—all that mortal may possess at once—is now in our grasp; but, whither has fled its greatness? Alas! we have ceased even to dream of it. Our cheeks are too hollow, and Time has driven his ploughshare too often across our brow, even till at length he has overturned the little star of hope that once beamed brightly there; and it now lies buried in the furrows.

But, sorrow aside, revenons à nos moutons! As we approached the low grounds, the eery chirp of the partridge broke the stillness of the night. There, away to the left, lay my comrade's native vale, with its beautiful river, like a broad band of liquid silver winding through the fragrant meadows. There we could see the village and the humble cot that to him was—home. He must away to it, and I still to the north. One long firm pressure of the hand, while our eyes met

‘As the stars mingle their light
In silence and in love,’ and we parted. Nearer and nearer I drew to the well-known haunts of youth; and, as I swept over them, I felt my heart glow within me at the sight. Oh! surely there is something in kin and country after all! I felt as if I had a possession in every field and forest, mountain and valley, and as if I could clasp them all as a bride to my bosom. Thoughts of home came thronging upon me, and I wondered if they missed me there. Soon I was among them, albeit my presence was unseen and unfelt. It was the hour of family worship. The reading was just finished. The good old 'gray-haired sire,' unable to kneel with the rest, stood beside the table, supporting himself by it, while he poured forth his earnest petition to the Great All-Father on high. In tremulous, heart-stirring tones did the voice of supplication come from his lips. Nor were I and the others who had wandered to far-off shores forgot. Forgot!—oh, why will the words seem so cold and meaningless? Did the thrilling frame, the uplifted head, the quivering lip, and the tear trickling down a father's cheek—did a mother's half-suppressed sob, and the quickened breathing of my sisters—speak of forgetfulness, whilst the prayer was breathed for all the loved ones near or far distant—that God would be a God and a Guide to us; and that, when earth's weary wayfaring was o'er, he would bring us all together at last—'a family in heaven'? Oh! how my heart yearned towards them; how I longed to embrace them, and to cry out, in the fulness of my soul, 'God bless you all with his own richest and most effectual blessing, now and for ever!'

'Twas changed. Silently, as the breath of a newborn zephyr, I had entered a small chamber. The presiding genius, 'a rare and radiant maiden,' soon appeared. Taking a book and a small morocco case from a drawer, she placed her little lamp on the table, and sat down quietly beside it. Ah! well did I know that book—it was the Bible I gave her, some eighteen months before, as a parting gift; and well did I know that little case, for it contained—but no matter. Methought her lip seemed more ruddy and full, and her eye sparkled with a clearer light, as she unclasped it, and gazed long and lovingly on the face portrayed within. Her bosom began to heave, and a faint flush suffused her cheeks, as, with upturned face, she gently raised her hand. I knew she was praying, and—for me! Reader! do you know what it is to be prayed for? Do you know one who thus, in the very depth and purity of her love, prays for you? If you do, you know one of the most touching joys of earth. If you do—take her, oh! take her. You may never find another heart that will beat so truly in unison with your own. Take her, oh! take her; and may the best blessings be showered on you both, richly! May your path through life be pleasant, and your burdens light; and, as you near the end, going down into the Valley of the Shadow, may your hopes for eternity grow brighter and brighter!

Oh! how long and how lovingly I gazed on that fair face; and when those lips, half unconsciously, breathed out the 'Amen,' how fondly did I yearn to stoop and print a kiss upon her brow, and bless her!

I awoke. I was still in a strange land, among strangers. The bright visions of home and love had faded. My dream had passed away; but the remembrance of it, and the soul-strengthening thoughts which it brought, remain even yet—ay, and ever will. I look back upon it as upon an actual experience; and feel that, whatever other lessons learned in Life's great school may have helped to make me wiser or better, it, too, has contributed in some measure towards that end.

IN THE TWILIGHT.

There's a drowsy haze of twilight
Hanging o'er the mellow west,
And the sun is slowly sinking
O'er the city's spire crest;
And the tawny waves of labour
Are subsiding on her breast.

Hush'd is the crash of engines
And the busy whirl of wheels;
There's a sweetness in the moment
Which the mellow twilight seals;
And through the pent-up streetways
A rich breath of freedom steals.

High above the busy pathway—
All unheeded and alone,
Shaping strange and wayward fancies
'Neath these cheerless walls of stone—
I sit wrapp'd, and fondly dreaming,
In a kingdom of my own.

There are footsteps down beneath me—
There are voices in the air—
And pale cheeks are ever passing,
Rim'd with gladness or with care;
But my soul, with calm unheeding,
Is a-roaming elsewhere.

I am thinking, sadly thinking,
Of the dear ones pass'd away—
Of the broken chords of music
Which fill'd youth's glad roundelay—
Of the strings of earthly friendships
That are breaking every day.

They are fitting, ever fitting—
Passing from us one by one,
Even like swift and radiant sun-blinds
O'er a heaven bleak and dun;
And our hearts are ever mourning
Past affection's fallen sun.

There's a sadness in our bosoms—
There's a darkness all the year,
That the hope and sunny impulse
Of bright summer cannot clear,
In that cold and vacant corner,
Which their presence-used to cheer.

They have gone! But oh! they're with us
Every footstep of our way—
In the vigils of the midnight—
In the raptures of the day;
Checking all our wand'ring footsteps
Ere they turn to go astray.

And I ponder in the twilight,
'Mid the sadness of my room;
While a host of radiant phantoms
O'er my senses seem to loom;
Speaking words of holy cheering
Through the cold and dark'ning gloom.

Thus bright beams of hope and gladness
Through my doubts and fears are driven;
Like the winged sunbeams bursting
Through the morning sadness river;
For the broken harp of friendship
Shall be strung again in heaven!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'True courage is not the brutal force
Of vulgar heroes, but the firm resolve
Of virtue and of reason.'—Whitehead.

CHAPTER VI.

A SENSATION was created yesterday in the office of Messrs. M'Corkindale & Co. by a visit from two of my daughters—Barbara and Sophia. John Dallas glanced at the former, and reddened to the temples; while Joe, the young hopeful of the firm, with easy nonchalance, asked if the ladies would not step round and be seated? They had merely come, however, on some slight errand to me, and politely declined the invitation.

The moment they were gone, Dallas declared that Miss Barbara, in particular, was 'a stunner,' whereupon Joe bantered him into a pearly display of teeth, and a look of sheepishness not usual with a youth so accustomed to female society. Some farther chaffing ensued, in the midst of which Peter Macnab woke up from the study of his latest chess problem, and chuckled in compliment to the supposed humour of the dialogue.

For myself, I was in no jesting mood. Barbara had struck me as looking too infinitely beautiful for health. It would appear that Joe had been similarly impressed, for he gave vent to a hope that she was 'quite strong.' Startled by this remark, it may be that a film of moisture floated over my eyes. At all events, Joe saw fit to change the subject by a reference to what he called 'the great fight for the championship.'

I uttered an exclamation of disgust; but Joe asserted that it was the national event of the day. On this and most other matters, however, I can trace his perverse sentiments entirely to his indifferent training. Old Mr. M'Corkindale himself is a Liberal in politics, but only by reason of his natural imperiousness. Owing to the inborn hauteur of his disposition, he is unable to endure anybody above him—or below him. Therefore is he a Liberal—the old hunk! But Joe has gone clean over to Conservatism. Strange as it may appear, the more popular creed, as exemplified by his governor in many a bygone kick, cuff, and refusal of pocket-money for cigars, has not impressed his memory favourably.

Joe considers it constitutional to stand up for everything that is old—provided it is not grey-haired, or wrinkled, or magotty. The good old custom of prize-fighting has accordingly filled the large mouth of him with panegyric. He thinks Tom Sayers the greatest man the country has produced since the Duke of Wellington. His private opinion is that Tom could even have smashed the Duke. As a member of the West-end Rifles—not particularly ambitious of conquest, except in the ball-room—Joe feels personally safer since the display of Anglo-Saxon prowess in the bit of beaten and bloody meadow near Farnborough station. His impression is—and he's a knowing sort of fellow—that Louis Napoleon will pause, and meditate himself into a flannel gown and slippers, before he sets hostile foot upon a shore which has Tom Sayers and men of his brawn and bravery to defend it. His reading of history, and observation of current facts, have filled him with the belief that if an occasional Frenchman could be induced to 'pull shirt off' in the ring—observe the beautiful technicality of the Fancy!—the effect would be to save this kingdom an enormous annual outlay in standing armies. Heenan, the long-armed Yankee Hercules, whose father and mother were from Donnybrook, or some other part of Ireland where shillelahs are grown, was enabled to make a good and protracted resistance. But Joe would like to calculate, by a stop-watch, the number of seconds that Tom would take to shut up the 'goggles' of a Zouave!

Nothing would have delighted Joe more than to be present at the great fight for the belt. He is 'blow'd' if he would have grudged twenty pounds for that privilege, had he only known. But Joe is not exactly the thing of iron he supposes. If I might form conclusions from so much as I know exists of the blubber and fatty part in his disposition, I should say that the first 'round' would have knocked the stomach out of him like a cross-sea off the Mull of Galloway. However, he has quite pluck enough to subscribe to the Sayers testimonial. By all that's manly, he will be one of the testifiers. He thinks the said testimonial should be national, like that awarded a number of years ago to Hudson the Railway King. 'Let a war ensue—above all, let an invasion come, and then,' he exclaims, 'we shall know how to value our heroes!' It is Joe's notion that our very Cobdens and Brights would a deuced deal prefer to cower behind Tom, in the hour of national extremity, than to seek shelter for themselves and their cotton-mills behind a Palmerston, a Russell, or a Gladstone, with all their fine talk, mob-rule Reform Bills, and cowardly communitistic budgets. 'With what consistency,' he asks, 'can we give dukedoms and field-marshal's batons to our foremost fighting men, and yet pass over the unparalleled merits of the English holder of the belt?' All this he can only account for by remembering that we are fallen upon an age 'of Radicalism, shopkeeping, and dyspepsia.' These and other similar noble sentiments he has since addressed, with five shillings in postage-stamps, to the referee of Bell's Life, besides giving them forth, in a lisping apathetic style, across the double-desk at which we sit facing each other like the two kings of Brentford, until I have felt so combative, so moved by his appeals, so full of the old Adam, in spite of my mature locks, as to have difficulty in keeping down an impulse to brain him with the ruler, or offer him a taste of the ink-stand, after the pious manner of Martin Luther when confronting the arch-fiend.

Oh, my masters!—under which title I include all worthy men, not M'Corkindales—you might rake among the ashes of all controversies since the flood, without finding a position so mischievously false as that taken up by a number of philosophic blockheads in reference to the late and shockingly deliberate mutual assault, dire struggle for homicide, or, as it is designated, 'grand fight for the championship.' As for poor Joe—Heaven help him!—he is to be excused on the ground of the little that nature has done for him in the higher intellectual regions. What could be expected from a youth who believes Punch to be the greatest thing emanating from the British press, and sets the late Douglas Jerrold on a loftier pedestal than John Milton? Strange, that with all his appreciation of a joke, he does not perceive that one—to me so exquisite! After such incomparable fooling, I can fancy Joe taking up cudgels for any absurdity. But that men with ordinary heads on their shoulders should approve of prize-fighting as encouraging fair play; as a manly mode of settling disputes; and as a useful means of keeping up the national stamina, is an astonishment, an enigma, and a scandal. In states of sheer barbarity the strongest holds his own and wins. The weak have then no alternative but to endure the wrongs which the powerful are wicked enough to inflict. It is, however, of the very essence of civilization to disarm individual passion, and clothe in invincible armour the principles of eternal justice. A strong nation has a thousand guarantees that it will not abuse its strength. But if pugilism is to be sanctioned and applauded, what safety is there from continual coarse outrage on the part of any bully of the slums? Courage is about the very lowest quality which humanity can exhibit when without lofty motive. To defend the helpless, to rescue the suffering, or to bear aloft the standard of the national honour in the very jaws of death, is to exhibit the sublime spectacle of noble and generous impulse triumphant over slavish fear. But standing up semi-nude, before an excited and savage mass of betting and mercenary blackguardism, to pummel and be pummeled—without a quarrel, and without a cause—for mere vulgar gain—oh, infamous! Had such been a legitimate occupation for men, they would have had claws and fangs, and been otherwise wholly bestial. Courage, forsooth! Who ever heard of a prize-fighter performing any sublime act of heroism? National stamina, quotha! When did ever any noted bruiser live to a great age? Cease your insufferable nonsense, O ye egregious Joe M'Corkindales of the model metropolitan press! I know what kind of ring the P. R. is. It is a human, or inhuman, Maelstrom that sucks down many a goodly craft into unspeakable depths and regions of utter hopelessness. (Hear, hear, from my neighbour over the way.) 'I tell you, Mathew,' I exclaimed, making the table ring, 'in such testing crises as make even women brave, your great prize-fighter would indubitably prove your arrant coward.' (Cheers from the one voice.)

Further, every true hero is an object physically beautiful to contemplate. A Greenwich pensioner, with one eye and a timber pin, is beautifuller, through the power and splendour of patriotic association, than a Buchanan-street exquisite under heavy obligations to his tailor. The empty sleeve of a Nelson or a Raglan was a sight for an artist or a poet. It was eloquent of noble achievement, and of the sacrifices which have built up and consecrated our supreme national grandeurs. Sabre cuts and gunshot wounds are the honourable insignia of Right manfully enforced, and Freedom triumphantly defended. A soldier's scars are more to be prized than his medals, for the reason that they tell prouder tales of valour and victory. The smiles and the applause of beauty have ever been the gerdon of the warrior, even when freest and sickliest from the blood and dust of conflict. Innocence feels confiding and safe where bravery is unmistakable. But fancy the countenance of Heenan, after its two hours' battering—gashed, swollen, bloody, discoloured, shapeless—shooting ingebriate glances of conscious ugliness through clotted and pulpy undulations of pounded flesh—in every respect, indeed, hyperbolically unbeautiful! Ah, ye discriminating fair ones!—deserved by none but the brave—believe a venerable book-keeper when he tells you that a prize-fighter's face—bridge of the nose usually much dilapidated—is not in the least prettily adapted for lockets, or for other dreams matrimonial than those of brutality and murder! (A pean of approval, with toddy-spoon accompaniment obligato.)

The fights of the gladiators in the Roman circus were defended not merely by the Joe M'Corkindales of the capital, but by grave and eminent citizens—nay, by Cicero himself—as engendering and maintaining among the people a fearless martial spirit and a valorous contempt of death. Heavens! as if Greece had not led the way in warlike achievement without any such education in butchery! As for the poor gladiators themselves—slaves, malefactors, or hirelings fighting for bare life to amuse the populace—what lesson could they give in courage to a great nation, except when headed by a Spartacus, and preferring destruction on their masters to mutual and aimless carnage? What deaths could be more ignoble than those of the ordinary gladiators, unless when, as at the rejoicings for the victories of the Emperor Probus, they killed their keepers, broke from their confinement, and perished, not servilely in the applauding amphitheatre, but amid blood and vengeance in the terrified streets of Rome? For true courage, commend me, not to the unfortunate wretches condemned to a public game of murder for the common sport, but to the Asiatic monk, Telemachus, who dashed into the arena to separate the combatants, and suffered martyrdom at the hands of the mad rabble through that brave and immortal protest. For my own part, I confess to some enjoyment of the late great fight, when Heenan, blind as an Andabata, and enraged like a tortured bull, struck out right and left in the closing mêlée—knocking down and blackening the eyes of all who came within range of his monstrous fists. Could he only have put his mark on the 'goggles' of the whole huge crowd—crowd worthy of a Roman circus or a Spanish plaza de toros—and sent every man and miscreant of them back to London, per special train, with that visible infamy upon them, I might then have fancied that something of the spirit of Spartacus lurked in the bosom of 'the Benicia Boy'; that the Samson—if I may borrow, and degrade with a vulgar pun, a couple of lines from the 'Samson Agonistes' of Milton—that the Samson, with his eyes out,

'And over-labour'd at their public will,
To make them sport with blind activity.'

knew how to avenge himself upon the Philistines.

'Let the name of Gabriel Gray,' says good Mathew Waddel, 'be renowned in the Fancy. Bellow it, ye hoarse speech-criers! as ye pursue your roaring vocation in pairs! Gabriel, my noble old soul! I appoint myself referee. Let the London and Liverpool Stock Exchanges send in their money, and Joe M'Corkindale his postage-stamps. Unhesitatingly I award you the belt. You have beaten both "the Benicia Boy" and Sayers.'

'Clean and for ever out of the field, let all good men pray,' I modestly and earnestly added.

(To be continued forthrightly.)

WILLIAM LENNIE, THE GRAMMARIAN.

THE history of the past may be read in the progress of the present. From the earliest development of mind over matter, the innate and original principle in man gradually surmounted opposing difficulties, and proved the possessor to be the master—the ruling spirit. He began his researches at the dawn of time, and he continues his inquiries to the present hour. Nothing daunts him. Onward, onward he proceeds. Metals, minerals, air, earth, water, mountains to their summit, and mines to their lowest depth, with all their innumerable products, are reduced under his potent agency, and made subservient to his practical will. Art rides forth in her chariot of peace, and spreads yellow sheaves of plenty to the inhabitants of every clime; while science opens up new fields of enterprise in every department of industry; and man—enlightened, educated man—subdues the whole, guides the whole, and by his power of intellect converts the whole into streams of ever flowing good.

In the process of multiplied investigations necessary to explore the vast resources which the Almighty Creator had laid up in the storehouse of the world, records were indispensable. These records required to be written, and writing required to be invented, learned, and taught. The impress of thought was conveyed to the legible page, and the lesson was communicated from father to son, from man to man, and from age to age. In every step thus made—the teacher, the tutor—the help was demanded, for knowledge is far from being intuitive. Originally, the parent was the teacher. No other instructor was allowed. Generally, the limit of knowledge was bounded by the father's attainments. Some soaring minds, however, would not always be so restrained. They would break through the prescribed bounds, and study and teach with such acceptance and success as to leave their predecessors far behind. Such richly gifted persons, however, were rare. All progress depended chiefly on parental instruction, until at last, in almost seeming despair, both parent and child gave up the task; and for centuries learning was confined within the walls of monasteries, and the teacher subjected to the servile control of a usurping and despotic ecclesiastical power. Stinted growth of mind, lack of understanding, deficiency of application, and total misconception of almost everything around them, were the ruinous consequences. At this blighted and languishing period, learning was despised; teachers were few; ignorance and indifference reigned supreme; no one cared for his fellow; all were sunk in the slough of despond, and were descending deeper and deeper into the mire. But, in the prevailing gloom, a merciful Providence, through the instrumentality of one man, created an engine—the type-printing press—which ultimately was to unite man to man and earth to heaven. The press, like a ladder reaching to ethereal heights, was first planted in Germany in 1438, in England in 1474, in Scotland in 1507, and in Glasgow in 1630; and by its aid thousands, who must otherwise have grovelled in barbarism, are enabled to ascend into the clear sunshine of truth, and discover their duty to God and their obligations to their fellow-men. The whole face of nature is changed. The standard height of man is reached, and fresh recruits are daily enrolled. The enemy is met. The battle is not doubtful. Victory will be achieved, and ignorance rolled away as a dark cloud. Truly and justly has the poet exclaimed,—

'To thee, O Press! let despots quail,
Oppressors crouch, and tyrants rail,
And own thy righteous sway;
On thy predestinated course,
Religion's handmaid! virtue's nurse!
Hold thy appointed way.

'Till every soul the "light within"
Chase every form of grief and sin
From every heart's recess;
Thy goal is reach'd, thy race is run—
The cause of God, the rights of man,
Shall crown the Press! the Press!

In proportion as the Press spreads abroad her invigorating and soothing influences, so does her handmaid, Learning, in all her branches, humanise mankind. Teachers were in demand; schools were originated; arts and sciences were developed; and each was appreciated. In 1534 the celebrated Scotchman, John Erskine of Dun, induced a learned Frenchman to come to Scotland from Paris to teach Greek. No native teacher could be found qualified to meet the prevailing want, and a foreign importation became therefore indispensable. At the town of Montrose the first classical school in Scotland was opened, and the cravings for intellectual food which had begun to be felt were to a certain extent satisfied. Students arrived from various quarters, and joined the classes. A new era was commenced. The press lived. Sheet after sheet was cast off, and the aspiration was everywhere verified:—

'Hail, noble Art! by which the world,
Though long in barbarisms hurld,
Sees blooming learning swift arise,
And science wafted to the skies!'

Scotland was blessed. A seed was sown. The seedlings soon appeared; and by the year 1560 teachers were planted in each parish as part of the Protestant establishment of the country. Education became general, and schools have so multiplied since, that they are almost innumerable. New methods of teaching and additional branches of study have increased in an equal proportion; and the schools may now be divided into two great classes—those aided by Government grants or private bequests, and those sustained by their own self-reliant resources. Of the latter class was the seminary presided over by the subject of these reminiscences—the late William Lennie.

This gentleman was a native of Perthshire; and, at the lonely village of Craigend, near the fair city of Perth, he began his career as a teacher. His previous training had depended entirely on himself. His possession of an English dictionary was an eventful epoch in his life, as he made this book his ceaseless study, till he had entirely mastered its contents. Resolute, bold, enthusiastic, he entered the field of public teaching, at the beginning of the present century, when he was comparatively a young man. He not only cultivated the resources within his reach, but he aspired to a still more important sphere of action. After a few years' teaching in the country, he removed to Edinburgh, where a wider range of studies and of prospects dawned upon him. He opened a school at the south side of the city; and, although he was nearly friendless and penniless, he showed himself endowed with qualities fitted to achieve victory in the arduous battle of life. In short, he held tenaciously to his purpose. His grand study continued to be the English language, and how to convey a knowledge of it to others. No difficulty deterred and no reproach disheartened him. In his school he was firm, prompt, and decisive, yet always conciliatory; and the various friendships which he contrived to form in the Scottish capital assisted still farther in extending his connection, so that, within a few years, the number of his pupils became very considerable.

Mr. Lennie's second class-room was at Nicolson-square, but his model rooms were at 10 Nicolson-street. At the latter he was known as one of the first English teachers in the city, and his class-rooms became crowded with active, lively pupils. Method and order were vigorously enforced, and absolute control insensibly maintained. No relaxation of rule, no trifling with an offence, no rewards for good conduct—such was Mr. Lennie's system. He never gave examination school prizes. Boys and girls were taught in the same class—the teacher maintaining that the roughness of the one was smoothed down by the gentle sweetness of the other. A feeling akin to affection grew up between Mr. Lennie and most of his pupils, and remained with both a bond of intimacy through life. He kept a yearly record of every one of them, and he noted his or her history. His house was open to them at all seasons, and he sympathised with their joys and their sorrows. He was partial to them, and seldom saw their failings but with a parent's eye. His own books were the texts on which he dwelt; and his system, as exhibited in them, he studied to engraft on the mind of every one of his pupils. 'Slow and steady' was his motto with each; and special reference was constantly made to the lessons already taught. On the first day of October during every year which Mr. Lennie taught, he formed a new or junior class; and only those who appeared on muster-day were enrolled. No others could enter during the session.

Within the precincts of Mr. Lennie's class-rooms no stranger was permitted to enter. He admitted no judge to approve or disapprove of his method of teaching or of its school effects. He felt he was under no committee, no directory, no supervision. He was master, and he would allow no one to dictate to him. No one fully knew his particular method of instruction—no, not even his assistants. In fact, it was peculiarly his own. The person who desired to adopt it would require to have had similar sympathies and similar tact. Mr. Lennie taught English by the powers or sounds of the letters—not by their names; and he insisted that even his highest class should adhere to this rule. Any newly enrolled pupil had to begin at the beginning. No step could be made in advance without the first being known, and hence parents studiously avoided the consequences of not sending their youthful charge to begin at the beginning with the class on quarter-day.

The internal arrangements of the class-rooms at 10 Nicolson-street were in strict harmony with the course of moral training adopted by the teacher. The forms were fastened to the floor, and the second or inner row was circular. They were low and neatly fitted up, all rounded at the corners; while every kind of ingenuity was exercised with a view to add to the health, comfort, and improvement of the pupils. No noise, no confusion, no murmuring. The children left the school-room in regular order, and, forming one unbroken line during the descent of three stairs, they retained their places as if under military discipline.

Thus lived and thus taught, in the capital of Scotland, for upwards of thirty years, the far-famed and estimable William Lennie. As a man, his honour and honesty were never questioned; and as a teacher of youth his example and his success have exercised a wide influence. He was a pioneer—he opened a way for others to follow. He formed a link of that great chain of education which is destined to encircle the world, and to direct its scattered and growing powers; and one desire should pervade the mind of his professional successors—to take up the course he left unfinished. Mr. Lennie was not perfect. No human model is so. Perfection belongs only to One, and that One is Divine. Yet the imperfect can teach, and the unlearned can learn; and the facts, and rules, and hints given in the school-books of Mr. Lennie are worthy of patient examination and of extensive practice.

Mr. Lennie did not continue to teach to the end of his life, though he superintended his own publications to the last. His Grammar and Key develop his system of teaching more than any other of his works; and the instructions in them are invaluable, especially to teachers. Subsequently to the year 1816, country schoolmasters attended Mr. Lennie's morning class at six o'clock, and received his practical hints, which were prized and well treasured. Many of these teachers came from great distances, and passed their vacations under his training; and by them, as a class, more than by his junior pupils, his system was appreciated and extended. When Mr. Lennie retired from his old field of labour, he committed his charge to an assistant; and, ultimately, his pupils were disposed hither and thither, and the school at No. 10 Nicolson-street was finally closed. That day was one of the saddest in Mr. Lennie's life, when he saw his school-rooms dismantled, the school flag exposed (this flag was to invite the pupils to return from play), and the rooms left unfurnished. The happiest associations of his life were there. He remembered them in connection with his more buoyant years; and, from the separated mass of materials, he carefully selected certain mementoes for preservation.

This excellent preceptor of youth died on the morning of the 20th July 1852, at his house, St. Andrew-square, Edinburgh, after a painful and lingering illness, in the 70th year of his age. His body was interred in ground paid for by himself two months before his decease, within the Grange Cemetery; and on the mural front of sandstone, overlooking his grave, may be observed a slab of granite, with a brief inscription, in which he is described as 'WILLIAM LENNIE, THE GRAMMARIAN.' The memorial is plain, simple, and touching, and speaks with peculiar pathos to his surviving acquaintances and friends.

Of the numerous and efficient body of teachers in this island, few secure from their calling independent means. The majority scarcely attain even a bare competency. As authors of school-books, however, they are sometimes more successful, and in this department few have ever achieved such triumphs as the subject of this brief memoir. Mr. Lennie had scarcely commenced teaching in Edinburgh when he began to publish his celebrated school series—he supplying the trade, and the trade supplying the public. Year after year produced new editions of his 'A B C,' parts I. and II., of his 'Child's Ladder,' of his 'Sequel,' and of his 'Grammar;' and such was the demand that, of his 'Grammar' alone, at his death, no fewer than 50,000 copies were sold yearly—an amount of success unparalleled in the history of school-books. The Grammar, though now in other hands, is at present in its fifty-third edition, and retains all its originality of plan and simplicity of arrangement, with its sufficiently copious list of examples on each given rule. Of our author's other school-books, one quotation from one of his introductions may suffice to show the spirit and tendency of them:—'These books lead the child step by step, from the simplest element to the next above it—with progressive exercises on each—through all the stages or principles of pronunciation, so that the child finds himself taught before he feels the difficulty of learning.' Hence their general acceptance throughout the country; and so great was the estimate put upon the copyright of Mr. Lennie's Grammar and other school-books, that the purchasers readily paid the high sum of £4,500 for it. No sooner was the death of Mr. Lennie known, than competitors for the honour of publishing his works flowed in from various quarters in England; and if a trial of strength had been submitted to, the price might have risen to a still higher figure. But preference was given to the enterprising firm of Oliver & Boyd, Edinburgh, who became the publishers—a preference, we may add, most creditable to all concerned.

To most of the public charities of the day Mr. Lennie was a generous contributor; and shortly before his death he gave a donation of £200 to the Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh. The most noted proof, however, of his benevolence was the noble provision which he made in behalf of aged widows and others, by means of a grant in perpetuity of £200 annuities, to be paid in sums of ten pounds to each. Many a heart has cause to rejoice in the gift, and to bless the memory of the donor; while his trustees are made the happy medium of verifying the words of inspiration, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' Next perhaps in interest and importance among his acts of benevolence was the founding of bursaries to assist the classical education of young men attending the Edinburgh University. An equal amount (£200 a-year) is to be disbursed to them as to the widows, only in £12 divisions—the Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh being the custodiers of the funds. In October 1859, was issued the first invitation for parties to come forward, and in the following month four young men were selected to enjoy the boon. The selection is for four years, and the conditions are most liberal. In addition to this assistance rendered to education, the teacher of Craigend School—where Mr. Lennie first taught—is to receive a continual annuity of ten pounds. Mr. Lennie left at his death two estates, one named Auchenvesh, in Dumfriesshire, and the other Ballochnech, of six hundred acres, in Stirlingshire, and both are of increasing value; so that the 'Lennie Bursaries' and the 'Lennie Widow Fund' are amply secured.

Although never married, Mr. Lennie was eminently social in his habits, and his conversational powers were considerable. He was full of anecdote, and he applied his resources with admirable adroitness. His wise sayings, and his strong common-sense advices, were always valuable. Indeed, no one could be long in his presence without reaping benefit. He was uniformly punctual to time and faithful to promise. His word could be relied on. He was particularly attached to his profession, and proud of his method of instruction. The rules of pronunciation, systematically arranged and copiously exemplified, he considered unique and invaluable. The 'Child's Ladder' was one of his most prized performances; and at one time, when his system as therein unfolded appeared to be plagiarised, he appealed to the Court of Session for redress. He pled his own cause. Strong in the conviction of the justice of his case, he erred in not employing counsel. The Court did not sustain his appeal, the evidence being held inconclusive; and he retired from the scene, bearing well his disappointment and having the sympathy of his friends.

Mr. Lennie's particular views on education, and his discriminating knowledge of youthful character, would require many pages to explain and illustrate. Their merits cannot be sufficiently brought out in a single paper. This brief sketch, however, may possibly induce some one more competent to undertake the task. The example which he set of honourable perseverance in a good cause, cannot be made known too widely. It shows how much may be achieved during the short span of a single life, and how great may be the reward reserved for those who apply themselves, heart and soul, to the duties allotted to them by Providence. A TALE OF VIRTUE AND VILLANY, TRIAL AND TRIUMPH,
DESPAIR AND DEATH.

BOOK FIRST.—PART FIRST.

CHAPTER VI. BLOOD!

THE sun rose gloriously on the morning after the great storm, and the sun smiled fully on the devastated village of Dubdub, as if in good-humoured enjoyment of the freaks which its friends, the elements, had been indulging in the night previous. About the first thing which the sun did on that morning was to dart down upon Chippe's buildings, and stream into Chippe's rooms, where it discovered old Chippe in his bed-room, kicking and writhing about on the floor in demoniac delight. The fact is, old Chippe had discovered that the parchment which had been blown away by the wind was not the original paper, which gave him the power of turning the rich and haughty Marquis of Pennywhistle out of the estates, and restoring the stately Kornopeon Castle and demesnes to the true heir. He had returned to his room in the gray of the morning, after a fruitless chase, and was about to blow out his brains, when his eye lighted on a yellow paper protruding from the box. Great therefore was his joy when he discovered that the document which he had been hunting after during the night, and which had nearly cost him his life, was only an old receipt for some mason-work which had been done in his father's time, and that the original document was still in his possession. 'And now,' soliloquised old Chippe, 'now this plebeian Adonis shall be brought to my terms. This very day shall I have my answer; this very day shall he decide between the hand of my daughter Evangeline and penury and a prison. Fool that he is, to think that I am to be trifled with—I that raised him from the base position of a pot-boy to take a place among the aristocracy of the land! Does he think, because I am old and frail, and tottering on my legs—does he think, mein Gott, that he is to play the modern Frankenstein with me! No, by the remembrance of my departed wife, Imogene, he shall not do it. I fashioned him—I shaped him; and, by the beard of my father, he shall obey me, or I'll kick him off the pedestal, and shatter him to pieces. I am the sculptor, and he is my work—my work for years, for I plotted this for years. I have sworn by the fires of Gehenna that Evangeline shall be indulged in the slightest whim. When a child, she fell in love with this fair-haired fool, and years have only strengthened her passion; years, also, have served to increase his antipathy to the thought of a union with her. And is there no selfish motive at the bottom of this? Nothing for myself? Nothing, Grandes Dieux! everything. Revenge! On what? On him—on that once pampered aristocrat, now rotting in his grave—I have sworn an oath that the great wrong which he did to my sister shall be avenged on his own child, and she is within my power; she is drudging—great fates! drudging—as a low scullery-maid in a low London tavern; kicked about and ill-treated by a brute! I wish he could rise out of his grave to see her. It would do my heart good. It would make this blood of mine, now so weak and thin, dance through my body like quicksilver. And what was this great wrong, forsooth? may yet be asked by many if my purpose should fail. What, indeed? I must leave a record behind that the world may judge between us.'

This terrible old man, with a frenzied eagerness, drew his box into the shady corner of the room, seized upon a ream of paper, and, with nervous energy, began to write.

Previous to commencing, however, he ransacked his box, and produced two mouldy sea biscuits, a bottle, and a small piece of cocoa-nut shell. The bottle contained brandy.

He ate, and drank, and wrote.

Little recked the hoary old sinner that his end was at hand—that he was eating his last morsel—that the same sun which was streaming in upon him, and lighting up the paper, and drying up the ink on the words as they were penned—little recked he, we say, that the same sun was warming two half-naked figures in the garret above him; and that, in soliloquising in the manner he had done, and aloud, he had pronounced his own doom.

Slowly the shadows began to creep into the room, and monotonously sounded the pen as it glided over the paper. The bed which stood in the corner seemed to stretch out its posts, like huge arms, to clutch the old man. The darkness plunged into the bed, and made it look like a huge well, waiting eagerly till the figure in the corner had finished, to drag him down to perdition. The rickety old press creaked and threw open its doors by some invisible power, as if yawning in heart-weariness at the time he had cumbered the earth, and protesting that it should not last longer than to-night. A close, damp odour crawled down the chimney, and a black vapour swept into the room and hovered over his head. The odour forced itself into his mouth, and up his nostrils, and into his ears, and into the pores of his skin, and impregnated all his body. The vapour struggled madly with the small remaining patchwork of sun, and chased it out of the room, as if to say, 'Out, spy! Begone! My master, Death, commands you. Out, I say. I am the spirit which waits upon murder. Let my master's work be done to-night; and look back on the morrow, to show his handiwork to the babbling gossips of the village. Away! Linger awhile, if you like, on the village green, where idiotic rustics trip on the sward; lend a brighter tinge to the golden locks of the village beauty, in order that she may twine herself closer round the heart of the mad swain, Roger, whom she loves not, and who is slowly consuming inwardly with the pangs of unrequited love; linger, in golden flashes, among the rich luxuriance of her hair, till the proud lord of the manor—there, under the shade of the elm trees, looking at her with hungering eyes—finally makes up his mind to pluck this fair flower, and wear it till its purity is faded, and till it is time to cast it forth a weed among kindred weeds on the heart of the great city, the modern Babylon! Away from this—for there is murder to be done—away down to the village church; let your last rays rest upon the square panes of the great window; embrace them till they throw a glory on the altar and on the slight girlish figure at the organ, sending up strains of celestial music to enter heaven with the fragrance from a thousand fields of rye, and corn, and wheat; flash on them, till travellers in distant countries, in canal-boats, in coaches, in gigs, in farm-carts, on horseback—till lovers in shady English lanes, breathing out vows of devotion, which will be broken within the year—till decrepit old men and women, taking their last look of earth from the open window of their sick room; all are struck for the moment into a state of maudlin sentimentality, and think, poor fools! that God's glory is beaming on them from the distance, and that this earth is not so much Gehenna as they fancied. Away! I say. Thou art a shadow—a mock reality—which vain fools worship. Darkness is only practical. Then the real business of the world commences. Sneak! babbler! coward! traitor! spy! dost thou think, because thou makest a show of virtue, that there shall be no more villany in the world? Dost thou think that thou shalt scorch up all the subjects of my master, the Devil? Out upon thee for an ass! I, Darkness, am as much a power as thou. Thou must succumb to my sway; and I tell thee, when thy worshippers are sunk in slumber, hating thee secretly for the base work which thou shalt wake them to on the morrow, I have my true devotees, who love me always, and whom I never betray. Under my cloak, murders, robberies, burglaries, seditions, schisms are plotted; under my cloak they are committed; and it is I who screen them. To my protection they must return, and do so disinterestedly. They love me because their deeds are evil, and I love them for the sake of my master, the Devil. Out again, I say, for he has work to do, and his agents are waiting thy departure. Death! I tell thee, death! murder! begone!

And the old man wrote on till the shadows had gathered so thickly that the room was all shadow, the writing on the paper no longer visible, and darkness triumphant—covering up and embracing him in its clutches, like a horrid foreboding of the everlasting darkness in which he would soon be plunged.

The sword was swaying above his head, and the thread was distending and growing feebler every moment. His task was not finished, however. His destiny was not quite worked out. He groped again in the old cupboard, and found a candle and a rusty old tin watering-can.

He lighted the candle, stuck it in the spout of the watering-can, and recommenced his task. The light cast weird shadows over the furniture. The tattered curtains of the bed took the form of demons, and grinned and mouthed fearfully at the slight bony figure in the corner. He chuckled several times, as his pen glided rapidly over the paper. It was a fearful chuckle, and came from his throat like a death-rattle. The old man was recording a murder which he had committed.

He wrote on.

Meantime, two glazed-eyed, hollow-cheeked, starved-lipped figures crouched in the garret above him; and, glueing their lack-lustre eyes to the floor—his roof—watched him—watched him, with death in their faces—death! They spoke in hollow, husky tones, and plotted murder—Duferry and Vavazour, the escaped convicts. Starving, bleeding, parched with thirst, covered with horrible sores which they had received in the burning ship—the sores aggravated by the salt water—and their rags flapping their skinny sides with the slightest motion of the breeze which came in at the skylight window.

Le Kokt At Vert had been put to sea improperly virtualled—the crew had mutinied, and, maddened with brandy, set fire to the ship. In the ship there were some good men who might have been spared; but only these two escaped. A common purpose united them for the present; but the strongest passion in each of their hearts was hate of the other. They were starving, and there was gold within their reach.

They would have it.

'When he has finished, we will descend,' said Va-vaviour. 'There is a trap door at this end, which allows one to alight on the bed.'

'We have no weapon,' said Duferny; 'and we are both weak from hunger and thirst.'

'And whose fault is that, imbecile?' said Vavazour. 'What a devil's prank it was to rush through the window of the hotel after that friend of yours! Your affection could surely have kept a little. Had you been patient, we might have obtained food and disguises, and been able to leave this place without the job which can't be avoided now.'

'Cease your patter, then, in the fiend's name, and let us to business. There is gold in that box—we must kill that hoary old sinner. How is it to be done? I would slit his throat in a moment, but we have no knife.'

'Dash his brains out on the hearth!'

'Guillotine him!' said Vavazour.

'How?'

'You hold his body, with his head in the box. The box is iron—his neck will be between the lid and the side. I shall squeeze it down, and his head will fall, lopped off into the box.'

'Ha! ingenious but difficult.'

'Mort de ma vie! it's quite simple. I could do it alone.'

Duferny grinned fiendishly at Vavazour; and the expression in his fierce grey eyes was that he should like to experiment on him, and might, possibly, before long.

The old man still continued to grimace horribly, as he went on with the narrative.

The ground was strewn with the sheets which he had just written.

He laid down his pen, heaved a long sigh, squatted down on the floor, and proceeded to pick up the papers which he had written, to page them, and string them together.

The sand-glass was nearly run out. His destiny was accomplished, and his executioners were slowly descending through the trap-door.

Murder in their famished eyes, they look like two starved wolves preparing to tear to pieces some unfortunate traveller asleep in the snow.

The last page has been put in its place, the manuscript is rolled up neatly, tied with a string, and labelled 'The Narrative of Abinadab Ephraim Chippa.'

Duferny and Vavazour are in the bed.

Stay! the old man has opened his box, and is fingering gold. There is a secret spring at the bottom of the box which opens into the floor. He raises another lid—more gold! He is up to the elbow in gold. He takes a handful out, and gazes at the pieces with hungry eyes—gazes at them, till his face looks as if gilded by a brass candlestick, and his jaundiced eyes start in their sockets, and threaten to leap out and burrow among the shining metal which they love so well.

Poor fool! the last grains in the sands of thy existence can now be numbered; the flame of thy life burns feebly on the wick, and waits only for the final flicker to fade into vacancy, and leave thy body soulless, inanimate, dead—a charred wick which will soon crumble into dust—a poor feast for the worms, who will nibble for fleshy succulence, and wriggle in apoplectic fury when they find their mistake. As useless will thy soulless trunk be to them for nourishment, as a squeezed orange, which has lain in the sun for a year, is to the fevered invalid who pants for some cooling beverage to assuage the fiery crispness of his throat.

A horrible cry escapes from the wretched old miser. It is stifled for a moment by a hand which clutches his throat. It is the hand of Vavazour, and he feels as if he were grasping figs—the flesh is bloodless and yielding.

'Silence, old man!'

Chippa makes an effort, and gurgles out 'Mercy, mercy! I killed him, I confess; but the provocation was strong. Mercy, mercy! Do not look upon me with that wild expression. There is death in thy eyes. Oh! let me live. I cannot die yet. I have a great purpose to fulfil. Let me live, and you shall have all my wealth. There is gold for you in the box. Take it all, but spare my life.'

'Silence, old man! for thy hour is come; thy grave is ready; it yawns for thee, and is weary of waiting. It would close its jaw, for the night wind howls over it, and the village cats burrow in its bosom, and feast upon the worms who wait for thy arrival. The hour is come for thee to die. On thy own confession thou hast shed the blood of a man. I am his avenger, and I swear that thou shalt not escape.'

Another figure stepped out of the gloom and caught the old man by the arms, pinioned them, and laid him like a bundle upon the top of his box. It was Duferny, and he looked—with his grinning white teeth, hook nose, swarthy face, and black mustache—like Satan trussing a victim to carry him down to hell.

He made hideous grimaces at the prostrate figure on the box, as if to crush out his life with the sheer force of terror.

The box bore a fearful analogy to a coffin, and the old man writhed about in terror, his teeth chattering, his limbs quivering, and his eyes rolling wildly about.

Duferny and Vavazour looked in each other's eyes.

'Who is to do it?' said Vavazour.

'Cast lots.'

'No, by heaven; we shall both have a hand in it. If I swing for it, you swing; if you swing, I swing.'

'Agreed!' said Duferny. 'Our hands are dyed too deep in blood to quake at the idea of snuffing out the small remaining spark which lingers in that old husk.'

'The means?' said Vavazour. 'How is it to be done?'

Old Chippa made a feeble effort to shriek.

'Ha!' said Vavazour, 'the cork-screw!'

'The cork-screw!' echoed Duferny, with fearful meaning.

To be continued forthrightly.

CULTURE AND GENIUS.

WHATEVER commands ingress or exit anywhere in the world of matter or of mind is a key. There is a key to everything, and everything opens to him that has the key. We account our souls as chambers—deep, wide, and inaccessible, save to whomsoever we choose to suffer to come in.

The whole range of human thought and experience is a kingdom; and, from the bunch of keys hanging at the girdle of the soul, culture and genius are the most potent in opening the doorway leading into the temple of science and knowledge. Culture is the most refined key to success—social honour—to the fashion, the parliament, and the club; and genius is culture's powerful ally, when she acts as the friend of goodness, purity, nobleness, and immortal truth. The first is hierarch, and the latter is the chief butler of the vessels that minister to more than mortal hunger and thirst. Culture has a kingdom, and genius has a royal rule therein. Like the scribe Jesus talked with in Jerusalem, genius is not far from the kingdom. To occupy ourselves in unfolding the latent elements and abilities of our nature, or even in cherishing higher conceptions of our being, is no mean or unprofitable exertion of our powers; for, as human creatures, culture is to us the all-inclusive, sufficient, and saving thing. It is the primary motive that answers to the dignity of the human part of our nature, though it may not answer to 'the chief end of our life.' In regard to this chief end of life, culture plays only a secondary part, and genius serves merely to give more brilliant and effective expression to it. We propose to say not a word on what we let God do for us, which involves a religious process; but mainly to stir reflection upon what we do for ourselves alone—which, as will be seen, implies a process of culture. The action of genius and the process of culture do not hinder, but open the way to higher wisdom, and to a truer development of our worthier and spiritual nature. Man is not a being of isolated faculties; but his nature is composite, and demands specific culture and care to each specific class of powers. The human part of man's being must be accosted by a higher power than his animal and sensual nature inherits into, before he can command the seat which he is made to dignify and fill. In regard to our faculties, and their variety and education, we must render unto each its legitimate measure of training and development. It goes hard with us to describe either the scope or nature of the culture which a human being needs, and of the origin and constitution of that strange thing called genius. Nor can we say where these two, culture and genius, confine themselves. We will, however, attempt an analysis of their nature and end, leaving for another occasion the wider and more wondrous subject, viz.—the relations that exist between culture, genius, and inspiration.

Culture is the generic term for the opening of the perceptions of the intellect for a right understanding of the relation of facts and principles in science, philosophy, art, and life, and the awakening in the merely sensual mind a love of the beautiful and useful, with an educated capacity to give fit form and colour, in words, art, and acts, to the perceptions of its intellect and imagination. Man is first born into the sensual plane of life, with little love for order, beauty, and knowledge; but, by education and the refinement of culture, he may be elevated successively to the rational and spiritual planes of humanity.

Culture acts as the opener of the blind eyes and the unstopper of the deaf ears, and as the John the Baptist in the highways of the intellect, preparing the way of a higher advent of truth by making crooked things straight, and the rough places plain. The broadest culture should be sought, therefore, as affording the basis for the reception and adequate outworking of the inspirations of thought that visit us in the heat and passion of genius. In every man there slumbers a spirit of genius, and a time arrives when Providence would give the imprisoned faculties liberty; but the lack of culture is the barrier to liberation and emancipation, and a dead check to reputation or glory. There arrives an hour in the experience of a man's life when a proffered liberation is made to his faculties; when a guardian stands near to throw open the gates of the dungeon, and to lead him from the narrow cell of uncultivated and barbaric nature to the unchartered landscape of nature and God. It is sad to behold the numbers, the internal faculties of whose minds are such as to fit them to receive the most select and beautiful inspirations, drilled and chafed, goaded to madness, or rendered almost torpid by the sordid exactions, the wretched associations, which are always connected with poverty. Often youthful spirits fit to associate as pupils with Schiller or Shakspeare, to comprehend the abstract thought of Plato and Seneca, to penetrate the occult wisdom of Bacon, or wander in the celestial spaces with Newton, are condemned to the companionship of servile men, and to the service of a low and sensualised occupation.

Intellect, by the sordid associations and base examples of ordinary society, whether at home or abroad, is both carnalised and brutalised, till, buried in the sensual and corporeal nature, it forgets that there are other knowledges and adornments than those which pertain to the flesh. None but those who have passed through in some measure this ordeal know how bitter it is, or can fathom the agony which comes with the knowledge that there is a beauty and a poetry—a world of art and loveliness, where manhood lives in its noblest powers, and womanhood blooms in her most ideal charmfulness, and that from this world we are shut out by a barrier seemingly but of thin air, yet really almost impalpable as that which separated Dives and Lazarus.

Now, the first healthy struggle which the soul makes, as it begins to realise in youth that man is more than a mere semblance, is to grasp at the means by which it will attain conditions of true culture, and be redeemed from the pollutions and despotisms of the senses into the wide domains of intellect and imagination. It is natural for the soul thus awakened to crave an existence insphered amid the imperishable treasures of arts and belles-lettres—the breathing human miracles of culture and civilization. The desire for refinement does not originate in self-conceit, and is not born of a base pride; it is not to be confounded with the passion which goads on the youth, who seeks to get along in the world, with a craving to be found in the companionship of those who rank higher in the regard of wealth and station.

When, however, the soul receives visitations of high and sacred truths, or bright and beautiful thoughts, and becomes the life of the understanding; when the intellect masters the lore of the world's gifted sages—the heart's analysts—the man is in a condition, if receptive of culture, to carry out the thoughts of art, poetry, science, and philosophy, into the stately glories of art and into the stater majesty of epic song and tragic history. Without the capacity to comprehend profound truths in their harmonious relations, the culture put upon a man is unripe; devoid of love for the principles of nature, the culture attained to express them is inverted.

There can be no intellectual liberty, or genuine and spacious culture, in the large and lofty sense in which we use the terms liberty and culture, till the truths which serve as the basis of the culture and refinement of our nature have become to us oracles and friends. That which prevents us from having the noblest literatures is the moral weakness of the educated class. Did those who detect in themselves the germ of the wondrous flower of authorship seek first the spiritual ends of use, and hold their varied faculties, quickened and perfected through culture, as pure and sacred vessels to the highest illumination, literature itself would become an exponent of the grandeur and immensity of the splendidly renovated intellect, and of the ever-varying youthfulness and beauty of the poetic muse.

Grand and stately is the imperial tread of Charles Dickens in his 'Bleak House' and 'David Copperfield;' but he is like a river that, burying itself among the sands, marks its sinuous pathway only by a scanty water-course. Had Charles Dickens attained a higher and more quickened subjective culture, he would have been ere now the Titian novelist; and, greater than the fabled sculptor, have transfused the lifeless marble of his art with the glow and warmth of infinite beauty. 'Don Juan' exhibits another instance of a subversive culture, yet resplendent as the morning with the radiance of the poetic faculty. But Byron, if he had been the angel in heart through the sublime use of the same lyrical faculty, would worthily have vindicated his poet's mission as the hierophant of the Infinite Mystery.

The primal necessity for successful authorship in novels, dramatic art, poetry, and literature, is moral perception and ripened heart goodness. The art to picture out a lovely face, or to shape in marble the image of love, great and strong; or beautifully to trace that magic scroll from whence the flood of song, with crested waves of melody, flows out from heaven—for all these there is requisite a quality and condition of spirit akin to greatness, nobleness, and harmony. Would a man be painter, sculptor, harmonist, poet? would he be a Shakspeare, with lips by every angel kissed? or Dante, with his calm golden brow? or Spenser, by his Una led in glory? or grand Beethoven, with his sun-crowned head resting on his floating barge of song? Raphael or De Vinci, in their unearthly robes of light and sapphire crowns?—then he must be sweet and virginal, and have states of manliness of heart and mind combined. Armed with genius and noble feelings internally, and externally with culture, the author seizes upon the souls of his readers or observers, and draws them from the grasp of dead blind animalism to a higher being. The poet, the dramatist, the writer of prose fiction, and the literary man, are all dependent for real success upon the exercise of the qualities of nobleness and purity. The association of moral depravity with beauty and culture is much to be deplored; and more to be dreaded in its effects on the world, infinitely more than the alliance of impurity with visible squalor and degradation. The veiled vice, that perfumes its locks with odours, and wreaths its brows with garlands, and sings its lay of passion with mellifluous voice, to the soft breathing of the lute, ensnares a thousand victims where undisguised it gains but one. How sad becomes the heart when it perceives and encounters the subtle depravity that exhales from the sphere of polite literature, which breathes its virus through the saloons of cultivated society! What horror comes upon us, for instance, when we penetrate to the inner life of the brilliant writers of fiction and poetry, when we learn that the magnificent intellectualism of Goethe and Poe conceal hearts ever torpid to the worthiest and best!

We have written largely of the necessity of having the inward life noble and erect, as affording the direction and intensity to all the powers of imagination and reason. The subject demands at least a brief statement of the correlative, viz. that the highest and broadest culture should be earnestly acquired as the platform upon which the ideal and inspirational forces may be dramatised; and this is most effectually done in the right choice and use of words—in the use of the stores and treasures of language. Philology amply provides for all movements of imagination and heart. Words are both weapons and warriors. Without a knowledge of the tongue, the fire that quickens and calls out the latent ideas of the spirit burns to a ruinous waste. So far from the mere rush of ideas supplying words, as a rule it rouses up the intellect to search in the recesses of the memory for every phrase of the vocabulary. All the verbal resources of language are therefore requisite to the man who hopes in a large measure to profit by an influx of thought. All truth, of whatever quality and degree, inflows into the receptive faculties of the mind, and there embodies itself in the draperies of that diction which has become the habit or which results from the education of the man. Words are more than sheaths of ideas; they are the steel blade itself which the trenchant will draws and wields for the battle. It is true that a spirited flow of thought refines and elevates our diction; but it does this by imparting fine taste—the nice discrimination to select from the materials which culture has supplied. In order to give a thought practical efficacy and forcefulness, not only a knowledge of the words which men use, but of the peculiar and best method of constructing those words into literature is requisite. Many mighty authors are already dead to the race through a hard, or involved, or obscure method of expression. Others, by means of the charm inwrought into the glowing and fervent letter-press, are current a thousand years hence as well as to-day. Style is worthy of cultivation, for the self-evident reason that, without it the grandest thoughts might as well be entombed in a forgotten language. Without culture in style, words, and the use of language, inspiration itself is narrowed, obscured, and shorn of its power. Although thoughts grow up in the mind we know not how, yet it is our business to determine how and in what manner we shall embody them, and express them to others.

We must now briefly give a word on genius, or that power which gives intensity to culture, and dignifies it with genuine lustre and heavenly fire. Our first effort must be to explain what we mean by genius. It is a fine, noble arrangement, and quickening of the faculties—a certain power of creativity and receptiveness—by means of which the spirit is peculiarly adapted to receive the highest truths, whether of a mundane or ultra-mundane source; to couch those truths in their happiest language; to convey them to others by most fitting symbols; and to apply them to artistic, dramatic, and industrial uses. Let us confess at once that many a witching way genius can turn her wondrously plastic hand. She shows delicacy like that of the little barrel that winds up our watches; and wit and humour to draw forth the keen, gay response—like the tiny teeth of steel that ring out a sharp and merry tune; or grandeur of composition, to represent, as with Day of Judgment music from some wondrous well-set orchestra, the tragic course of the stormy passions of the human mind. She can, on a sudden, transfigure around us what is of earth earthy, and fetch down to us her bright, overshadowing cloud, so that we shall wish for tabernacles to abide in under it, though neither Moses, nor Elias, nor Christ is there. Shakspeare—another name for an imagination so peerless and under his control, that he could make it by turns light or lightning, just as he pleased—has been, by one modern admirer, called a genius lacking divinity, because he chooses to turn the world to mere sport, as of fire-works. Burns—the child of human misery—the tuneful child of sorrow—the prophet of honesty—the high priest of Caledonian nobleness—who learned in suffering what he taught in song—was a true type of genius. Goethe, that magician who spun the many-coloured web of 'Faust,' was eminently a man of genius. And the untempered eulogy which is oftentimes bestowed on them, is only an indication how royally men may carry their talents, with their sins and follies in the rear. There is more than one clef in the great scale of genius. As one star differeth from another star in glory in the heavens above us, so there is a great variety into which men inherit who are gifted with genius. But in height and depth, if not in breadth also, the man of genius excels the ordinary literary and cultured man, for the genius ascends the Olympus, whereas the man of mere culture is of the earth earthy. In Homer, in Dante, in Milton, in Tennyson, genius exists, for

'Up to the hills they lift their eyes.'

It is not specifically our purpose to show how far genius is still divorced from devotion, how far the chambers of the imagery, spacious and handsome as they may be, are filled with forms undivine, or to what extent any of our finest word-artists in their splendid pages disallow religion. Certainly, if we rely on any merely literary superiority, or boast of the peerless first of men for our imitation, the most brilliant thinkers are without the sanction of what is called the 'divine.'

To all the genius of the age let us cling. It is the hope of deliverance from bondage. It is the romance of real life in a money-loving age and land. Imperfect as are its tempers and instruments, it is the vision of better times, without which the people would perish. Genius is the first sweetest fruit on the tree of life, and from the root of divinity it receives the life which shall preserve it against the shock of tyranny or the despotism of bigotry. . . . GEORGE B. PORTEOUS.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS OF SCOTLAND.

THE condition of the Scottish agricultural labourer has of late engaged a considerable share of the public attention. The bothy system, especially, has been much commented on, and has been as strongly supported as it has been unsparingly condemned. As is usual in cases of importance, schemers without number have come forward, each with his own favourite plan; and co-operation being thus prevented, the question is still allowed to remain in statu quo. The general feeling of the public upon the subject is, we apprehend, that as nothing better can be obtained, it must of necessity be allowed to retain its place. But while the bothy is still maintained as a necessary evil, many laudable efforts have been made to render it less objectionable and better suited to the progressive spirit of the age. In the districts where the system obtains, old bothies have been demolished, and others erected upon an improved plan; and in these new bothies the system reaches its perfection. A bothy, on the new plan, contains, in addition to the kitchen, or cooking apartment, a small bed-room for each of the men. In some instances a woman is kept to do the cooking and cleaning, but in general the young men prefer to cook for themselves. Under the new arrangements, those who feel inclined to devote any of their spare time to mental improvement, can obtain an opportunity of doing so; and the literary ploughman, although at present a rara avis, may soon become as common as the literary mechanic. Hitherto, if a ploughman, that is, a bothy man, wished to write a letter to his father or his sweetheart, he could do so only by the light of the common fire, and amid the scoffing and jeering of his companions. If he attempted to read, he was treated in the same manner. In short, he was beset with as many difficulties in his road to learning as Cobbett himself. Now, however, the case is entirely different. Seated in his own room, with naught to disturb him, he may revel in the beauties of Burns, and indite love-letters ad libitum. Instances, although not numerous, are not wanting of bothy men who have already taken advantage of the improved state of matters to apply themselves to the cultivation of their minds. Books are purchased which no ploughman had before ever dreamed of buying; the 'penny press' is extensively patronised; and, occasionally, a stray number of the Miscellany finds its way to the bothy man's library. This is a healthy state of matters; but 'pity 'tis 'tis not a very common one.'

Few indeed of the Scotch agricultural labourers are entirely destitute of education, if the term can be applied to their 'small smattering' of school lore. All, or nearly all, are able to read pretty correctly; the great majority can write 'after a sort;' and most of them have obtained a slight knowledge of arithmetic. In spelling they are generally very deficient. In this the phonetic principle is their only rule. Every word is spelt as it sounds; and had they been accustomed to speak English instead of Scotch, the ploughmen's letters might have supplied a very great desideratum — 'The Frenchman's Guide to English Pronunciation.' Rude and unsatisfactory as the educational condition of the Scotch ploughboy may appear to some, it is perhaps more satisfactory than might be expected from his limited opportunities. In his boyhood, he attends school during the winter months; and whatever he does learn is learned only to be forgotten in summer. This system continues till he reaches his eleventh or twelfth year; he is then 'fee'd' or engaged for a year with some farmer. When about sixteen, he takes another winter's schooling as a 'finish aff,' and then turns his back on schools and schoolmasters for ever. This being the case, the marvel is, not that he has retained so little, but that he has retained so much. His educational acquirements may be summed up in the following manner. He has sufficient skill in penmanship and composition to be able to write a letter intelligible to a fellow-ploughman; in reading, to be able to decipher a friend's letter, or spell over a passage in the weekly newspaper; and in arithmetic, to be able to see that his tailor does not cheat him.

But, after all, we are sorry to think education is at a discount among the ploughmen. They are perfectly satisfied with their meagre attainments; and, having no apparent use, they have no desire for intellectual improvement. 'We're brawly as we are,' is, in fact, the ploughman's version of the well-known lines—

'Where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise.'

'Dead air' said an intelligent ploughman with whom we have conversed upon this subject, 'we hae' as muckle learnin' as sair's oor purpose. We'll no get a bigger fee although we're gude counters, so mair learnin' wad do's nae gude. Na, na, we're brawly as we are for learnin'.'

It is in a great measure to the listlessness of the ploughmen themselves that the failure of so many benevolent attempts to educate them is to be attributed. On coming home after fourteen hours of hard labour, hungry and wet perhaps, the ploughman has no heart to set to work again. His benumbed fingers are unable to hold the pen; he is tired and dispirited; and, if a married man, he hastens to refresh his jaded body, and bury his cares, in sleep. In these circumstances, a ploughman, perhaps not without reason, considers it little short of an insult to advise him to prosecute his education.

A few years ago, a benevolent nobleman set on foot a number of evening classes, for the education of the ploughmen upon the estate. A teacher went once a-week to every bothy, and instructed the men in reading, writing, and arithmetic. The plan was much liked by the ploughmen at first, but gradually they began to consider that one evening a-week was one too much, and that by attending the classes they were reducing themselves to the level of 'schule-laddies.' Their impatience at last got the better of their respect for the teacher and the landlord, and after much grumbling and debating they hit upon a plan, which they conceived would put an end to the weary lessons. One evening, as the unsuspecting teacher was entering the bothy as usual, a pitcher of water communicating by a string with the latch of the door, was dashed on his devoted head! Having determined to take no notice of the trick, he commenced teaching, but the bothymen that evening were intractable. Supper was ready, and they would have their stomachs filled before turning their attention to mental provender. That evening a fat hare — obtained, we hope, without contravention of the game-laws — was to be served. The potatoes were cooked; but what was to be done with the hare for they had only one pot, and that was filled with potatoes. In this dilemma one of the men produced a blanket, into which the potatoes were tossed, and the pot being now cleared, the hare was done up in first-rate style. The supper concluded with an obstinate but bloodless battle between one set of the bothymen and another, in which boiled potatoes were the missiles used. They were unsuccessful after all; for the teacher persevered, and there was nothing for the bothymen but to submit.

But evening classes for ploughmen, although good enough in themselves, do not command our unreserved approval. It is as true of ploughmen, as of any other class of men, that youth is the time for education. We do not mean education in the higher sense, which can only be obtained with the 'years of discretion,' and after much intercourse with the world. Indeed, it would be scarcely less absurd to hope for this kind of education in youth than to hope elementary education to manhood. If education is neglected in the boy, we may depend upon it it will not be cared for by the man.

So long as things continue to go on as they do, it is absurd to hope that ploughmen will ever obtain aught but the merest sprinkling of education in youth. Ignorant and illiterate in boyhood, they will be ignorant and illiterate in manhood; and so they will remain to the end of the chapter. Evening classes can do but little. Young men of twenty cannot be managed in the same way as boys of ten. The desire of excelling, the disgrace of being defeated, and the fear of punishment—all of which act so powerfully on the latter—are lost to the former. Poor fellows! the majority of them have no desire to learn—no heart for it, as they say themselves; and where there is no will it is impossible to force a way. It is well known that in Scotland the school fees are almost nominal, yet the ploughmen are unable to bear the cost of a decent education for their children. So long as this is the case, education can never be said to be within the reach of all; and although education were to be given free, we are not sure that the ploughmen would allow their children to get the benefit. The high price which their children's labour obtains is a great temptation to the ploughmen to sacrifice their education for a few pounds or shillings. Compulsory education has never found great favour in our country. We must confess to sharing, in some degree, the general feelings of the country upon the subject. At the same time, we are decidedly of opinion that farmers ought to be prevented from engaging as agricultural labourers children below a certain age—say twelve or thirteen. Parents would then be obliged to send their children to school or keep them at home idle; and it is not difficult to see which alternative would be generally adopted.

So much—not too much, we hope—for education among the ploughmen. A few words regarding the ploughmen themselves may not be unacceptable. In the first place, to use a clerical phrase, we would observe that the married ploughman is a being essentially different from the bachelor ploughman. The former, with few exceptions, is a dull fellow, without spirit, and but little superior, intellectually, to his favourite pair of horses. The cares of his family harass his soul; the tailor's unpaid bill is continually before his eyes; the shoemaker's threat haunts him day and night; and, continually baffled in his vain endeavours to make both ends meet, he resolves in despair to throw up the attempt; for ploughmen are proverbially an improvident class. They act largely upon credit, and when one tradesman refuses it they go to another. The young unmarried ploughman, on the other hand, is a merry, cheerful fellow; but careless, it must be admitted, and improvident. Having no person dependent on him, like the married ploughman, he has none of the cares and perplexities to which the latter is a prey. His 'sair-won penny fee' amply suffices to keep up his credit with the tradesman; and the surplus, if any, goes to purchase ribbons for his sweetheart, or is deposited with his mother; for Jocky wants neither gallantry nor filial gratitude. He has a place in his affections both for his 'lass' and for his 'auld mither.' But although a devoted lover, he is by no means a constant one. It must be recollected that 'bonnie Jocky, blithe and gay,' who 'kissed young Jenny, making hay,' was a true representative of this class, inasmuch as he was 'a wag that never would wed,' although he had long 'followed his lass.' This means, we apprehend, that Jocky was rather a fickle lover, and one who was not easily secured; and not that he was one of those who delay marriage till they have arrived at a pretty ripe age. Jenny's being described as young, is a sufficient guarantee for her 'sweetheart's' youth.

Our great national poet, himself a ploughman, has given a true picture of the young ploughboy in the verse—

'Our auld guidman delights to view
His sheep and kye thrive bonnie, O;
But I'm as blithe that hauds his plough,
An' has nae care but Nannie, O!

and in the preceding verse—

'My riches a' 's my penny fee,
An' I mean guide it cannie, O;
But warld's gear ne'er troubles me,
My thoughts are o' my Nannie, O.

Jocky's filial gratitude has been recorded in a song entitled 'The Ploughman,' which affirms that

'His mother's blessing 's on his head,
That tents her weel—the ploughman.'

We have alluded to the difference between the married and the unmarried ploughman. The difference is so marked and essential that we are reminded of the great salmon question, and are led to ask, 'Is the young bothyman really a ploughman?' Can 'bonnie Jocky, blithe and gay,' young and handsome, free from care, and devoting all his thoughts to his 'Nannie,' be the same kind of a being as the old 'mairit man,' sullen and desponding, tired by the labours of the field, and wearied with family cares? And will our favourite Jocky become through time the old wearied 'mairit man,' upon whom he now passes his jokes? Will he leave his blytheness and his gaiety, his youth and sprightliness, for the cares and perplexities of a ploughman's married life? He will, and that too early. The effects of the change will not at first be very easily perceived. For a considerable time after his marriage, he may maintain the appearance of a 'bonnie Jocky, blithe and gay,' but the transition is going on, slowly it may be, but surely; and, ten to one, a few short years will find our young Jocky a care-harassed married man.

Our young unmarried ploughboy, as we have already remarked, is of an amorous, but, at the same time, of a fickle disposition; and it requires no small skill in angling on the part of Nannie or Jeanie to secure the lover. The country lass must take care not to offend the jealousy of her fastidious lover by 'taking up' with any other than himself. She must be off with the old love, if she intends to take up with a new. The fickle swain, perhaps, may have a dozen of sweethearts in the course of a year; he may forsake them one after another, for any cause or for no cause whatever. There are, of course, exceptions; but, as we are writing of a class, we cannot take these exceptions into account.

We are inclined to think that the period of his courtship is the happiest part of the ploughman's life. He is still a 'bonnie Jocky, blithe and gay.' In addition to the sweets of single blessedness, he enjoys, in anticipation, the bliss of married life. His hopes rise higher, his happiness increases, as the distance of the 'appointed day' grows less and less. His happiness and his hopes reach the highest summit on the wedding-day. Then, doubtless, the bride and bridegroom imagine they have attained the highest point of human felicity. We are not altogether sure that they are mistaken; for at no future period of their lives can they have many opportunities of forgetting the business and cares of prosaic life. But 'prosaic life,' with all its problems to be solved, with the ends of that interminable string to be brought together, soon steps in upon the young people, and scattering their brightest hopes, commits sad havoc upon their happiness. The transition from 'Jockeyhood' to the old 'mairit man,' with his troubles and cares, commences. Sometimes it takes years and years to complete the change; sometimes a few months suffice. In all cases, or nearly all, for there are exceptions, the transition takes place—slowly proceeding in some cases, rapidly in others.

The young ploughboys themselves seem to have some idea of the troubles of married life. In one of their favourite ballads, the domestic contentions and petty annoyances considered to be incidental to the married state are described. Every circumstance of the most trifling nature begets a battle—

'Will liked brose, and Kate loved tea,
Which first began the disaster, O—and in consequence of the disagreement between their 'loves and likings,' Kate has recourse to

'Pats an' pans, an' stools an' chairs,
Which roun' Will's lugs did thunder, O'

The mention of the ploughboy's ballads leads us to recollect that ballad-making is an essential part of the ploughboy's character. His songs, with the exception of a select few by Burns and other authors, are all his own. Not that we would say that every ploughboy is his own ballad-maker, but that the songs most in favour with the ploughmen, are generally composed by ploughmen. There are, in fact, a few good rhymers among the ploughmen, whose productions are not unknown to rustic fame. The ars poetica is to them a thing unknown, yet are their 'rustic rhymes' guided by some of its rules. Their productions, which for the most part may be classified with the effusions of Anacreon, or his Irish successor, Moore, are never committed to paper, and consequently have neither to 'meet the eye' nor stand the criticisms of literary men. The applause of his fellow-labourers is the highest honour to which the rustic poet seeks to aspire.

One of the component parts of the ploughboy's character, indeed of every Scotchman's character, is an extreme love of ballads and music. Seldom, indeed, can a young, sprightly ploughboy—our ideal Jocky—ever be found without being engaged at the shrine of St. Cecilia. He walks forth to his labour in the morning, whistling a cheerful tune, or humming to himself the love story of Jocky and Jenny; he enlivens the most disagreeable parts of his daily routine with a merry song. His music is simple and unaffected in style, uncorrupted by the appoggiaturas, or any other turas of genteel music, and is performed without the aid of bones and burned cork. The simple in music is always the most beautiful; and there are not wanting those who prefer the ploughman's simple and unaffected lays, his 'joyous burst of song,' to the grander and more magnificent strains of Mozart or Handel. A lover of poetry, the ploughboy is a reverer of poets, and especially of Burns. In the eyes of the simple and untutored rustic, the great ploughman-poet becomes a kind of demi-god, whose equal never existed among men, and whose like shall ne'er be looked upon again.

An ingenious writer compares the ploughman to the sailor, and instances many points of resemblance in the daily labour of each. The one dimovet glebam aratro unco; the other ploughs with his good ship the roaring main. Jocky is no less fondly attached to a particular pair of horses than Jack is to a disabled cannon or a spliced mast. Instances of sailors who have spent the greater part of their lives on board the same ship are 'placed in apposition' with cases of farm-servants who have wrought from boyhood to old age on the same farm; and the affection of the sailor towards the lieutenant or captain is considered identical with the attachment of the ploughman to his master. The ideal of a sailor is a manly, blunt, kind-hearted fellow, who knows not care, and defies death—gallant, yet rough in his gallantry—concealing a benevolent disposition under the false colours of a swaggering and apparently semi-brutal carriage. The ploughman Jocky, as described above, is a being of a similar disposition, whose swaggering 'comes out' only on the occasion of a fair or holiday—as Jack's does when he finds himself the object of a landman's gaze. Jack and Jocky are both animated by a spirit of devoted gallantry to the female sex—the former having no other care but 'the girl he adores'; the latter devoting his whole mind to 'Nannie, O!'

We do not intend to enlarge further upon the subject;—probably the reader's patience is by this time exhausted. The subject is important, and deserves the attention of abler pens than ours, for the Scotch agricultural labourers, are, in general, well worthy of their 'country's pride.' E. R.

NOT ALONE.

['At this moment, the extraordinary beauty of a small moss in fructification caught my eye. . . . Can that Belag who planted, watered, and brought to perfection a thing which appears of so small importance, look with unconcern upon the situation and sufferings of creatures formed after His own image? Surely not! I started up; and, disregarding both hunger and fatigue, travelled forwards, assured that relief was at hand; and I was not disappointed.'—Mungo Park's Travels.]

PARK, in a lonely region—not alone—

Not'all abandon'd, nor allow'd to die
Before the time—might lead your homely,
Ye good men preaching hope, to them who groan!
Park had appeal'd to Him upon the Throne;
And lo! created by the Power on high
To deck the ground and charm the wandering eye.
Bloom'd on the traveller a flower new-blown,
Reviving hope and joy! In hope abound,
Ye faithful! ye who read an equal care
To feed the raven and array the flower;
To fill gaunt hunger on the barren ground;
To ripen time, and the full hour prepare
For Him who will not fail to pluck the hour!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

May 17, 1836.

A LETTER came to-night from Aunt Aubrey, which I am wearying to show to George. He has gone to dine with Mr. Locke, and cannot be home for an hour or two yet. So I must just wait. What a curious half-pleasant, half-painful state that waiting often is! I mean when we are anxious to communicate any important news to another, and that other is not at hand to hear it. At first we feel vexed and disappointed; then we get vaguely excited. We cannot settle down to our ordinary occupations. We find ourselves by turns sitting with our eyes fixed on vacancy, pondering the one theme of interest, and by turns pacing the apartment in a confused, irregular way, as if the restlessness of the body (induced by that of the mind) might have power to hasten the march of time. Whether the tidings be grave or gay, the longing is equally intense to reveal them to our chosen friend. It is nature's pleading for that reciprocity of thought and feeling which is a necessity of our humanity. But let me read the letter once more. After speaking of other matters of purely home interest, my aunt goes on to say:—

'You will be sorry, yet scarcely surprised, to know that poor Mrs. Falconer, about whom I formerly told you, is dead. I saw her many times after that first interview, and got really attached to her, as well from her sweet gentle ways as from her sinking health and desolate position. I regretted much being unable to elicit little more of her history than the meagre outline you have heard already. The only new incidents I gleaned were these:—That the young lady's maiden name was Marion Brown; that, by a sudden reverse of fortune in her father's family, she had been early compelled to seek a livelihood as a governess; and that while engaged in this capacity she had been addressed by Mr. Falconer, a gentleman of birth and estate fully equal to her own. I am inclined to the opinion that her marriage was not sanctioned by his relatives; and considering the view taken of these matters by the generality of persons, this is not improbable. The girl was maintaining herself honourably by her industry; and this no doubt was an unpardonable offence, for which her many good qualities of head and heart would by no means make amends. Truly, my dear Katherine, the world is as much out of joint now as it was in the days of Hamlet. Witness how sterling worth with frugal means has no chance of its just measure, when weighed against the shallow pretence of adventitious prosperity. Nevertheless the wedding took place; and for a brief season the young pair appear to have been happy in each other's love. But here comes the knot, the gap in the narrative, which I can neither unravel nor supply. A change supervened upon the bright early days. The small cloud on the horizon grew and brought others in its train, till at length fell the deep black shadow that hurried on the crisis. What this might be I cannot even surmise. At all events, it was the shattering of their hopes, the lightning stroke that desolated the little garden, the resistless simoom that hastened to complete the withering work which the previous storm had begun. Thus was the threatened disease of the young wife and mother first confirmed, and then gradually borne along to a fatal consummation.

'I had been in the habit of seeing Mrs. Falconer every day for the last two months, sometimes in the presence of Madame Dufresne. On these occasions the talk was invariably on ordinary domestic topics, and never on personal matters. Madame being of rather a taciturn disposition at any rate, I did not wonder at this; and though I several times took the opportunity, when alone with her, of recurring to the condition of the poor invalid, the information I received was meagre in the extreme. I hoped that in the end, however, her tongue would be loosened. All this while the dying woman was gaining upon my regard. The inclination to murmur at her lot, which had casually betrayed itself, softened down by degrees, and then seemed altogether to give way. Her sense and discretion, her sweetness and gentleness, became hallowed, as it were, by her near and yet nearer approach to the border land; and, while the outward frame was slowly and surely losing every vestige of the full bloom and rounded outline befitting her years, the inner spirit was being expanded and glorified so as to meet—even on this side the grave—the required proportions of angelic natures. She told me that in her girlhood her temper had inclined to pride and violence; but of these I saw not a trace. One thing I discovered—that poetry was with her not a mere sentiment but a passion; and I found that she was in the habit of repeating aloud many favourite passages, to beguile the tedium of her confinement. Not a few of these loose fragments I half suspected were her own composition, since, upon my inquiring one day as to their authorship (for, at my request, she would often pursue the elocutionary practice in my presence), a deep blush suffused her cheek, as she answered, falteringly:—

“Oh! the writer of these is totally unknown. They are just private things—manuscripts; but somehow I love to speak them aloud—it relieves my heart.”

'About a fortnight ago, I was ascending the long staircase, to visit my feeble charge, when my ear was arrested by a voice, rich and clear as a music spell, rehearsing some verses with even more energy and abandon than I had ever heard from her before. (Katherine! this is another instance out of many in which I have noted that when that disease we call consumption has reached a certain stage, the speech may be strong and fine of tone, while the clay tenement is fast breaking up to ruin.) The words died on her lips as I entered. She was sitting up in bed, her hands crossed on the snowy bosom of her night-dress, an exquisite lustre in her eyes, and a general elevation around her whole countenance and bearing. The morning light streamed into the chamber, like a presage of happier days. She welcomed me with a smile, in its sincerity ineffably sweet; and when I approached, and said "Marion, how has the night gone with you?" her reply took me quite at unawares.

"O madame! I am far, far better in health, in hope, in all life-like feelings, than I have been for many a weary day. I have not slept much during the past night, but I have done more—I seem to have made an advance in strength and vitality within a few hours as marked as it is unaccountable. Do you think it possible, dear Mrs. Aubrey, that I am still going to recover—to get well again—to return to my country—to see my husband?" She stopped. "I have dreamed that such things might yet be. O! dear, kind, good friend! say that the dream is not false—not impracticable. You do not know what a weight I seem to have thrown off—how bright and alert I feel! I am going to rise from bed. I am going out into the garden. I have work to do yet in this world, and I must prepare for it. Is it not so? Do you not see that I am entirely a different creature to-day from what you have ever known me?"

As she appealed to me thus, an unearthly glow overspread her face, and she gazed with such tender longing of expectancy in those large blue eyes, as I pray I may behold never again in a human countenance in circumstances so sad. Believe me, Katherine, mine was at that moment such bitterness of heart that utterance was fairly denied me; and, while I took the semi-transparent hand in mine, I was forced to turn away my head to hide the gathering tears. How could I bid God speed earthward, lifeward, to the attenuated mortal form, when I knew by palpable sign and seal that the body must quickly descend to the dust, whence it was taken, while the spirit was manifestly on the heavenward wing?

"You do not speak to me," she said at length, anxiously. "You do not hail the bow of promise, as I do. Yet I see it clearly, clearly—in open vision. I am not as I was. I have thrown off the burden that has oppressed me many sorrowful months. Speak to me; reassure me. Oh! say that I shall soon be well?"

I was completely melted; and, as I threw my arms round the emaciated girl, I could only murmur faintly in her ear some very soothing words, that came only too readily from my heart—fervid words, strung by pity unfeigned for her great and most mournful delusion. As I held her in my embrace, a sudden reaction came upon her. The temporary excitement, with its train of fictitious impressions, vanished; and the mind, starting, fell down in an instant from the empyrean of fancy to the cold level of fact. She broke into sobbing, potent and irrepressible. She was wild now in her grief, and refused to be comforted. "She was too young to die. Oh, that she had never been born!" Wishful to divert the current of her ideas, I spoke of the poetry I had heard her repeating as I came in, and asked her the subject of it. She gave no heed to my question, but continued weeping—only more quietly, like a child; till, at last, composure fell once more upon her soul; when, turning to me, she said, sweetly—

"Forgive me, madame, if I have pained you. I am weak and foolish. Sleep forsook me, and I fell a prey this night to my wandering fancies. Then memory came to my aid, and I beguiled my watch with the rehearsal of a favourite piece, whose lesson my heated imagination made me apply to my own case. Alas! I see now it is not for such as I, whose day is nearly done."

Thinking that the trifling task might interest without fatiguing her, I suggested that she should make me a pencil copy of the lines in question;—adding, by way of encouragement, that I shared her taste for the Muse more warmly than an old woman like myself might be supposed to do. She seemed pleased with the proposal, and smiled faintly.

"All my little papers are there," she said, pointing to a square box that stood in a corner. "But this poem is not among them. I will do what you wish."

Just then I caught the flash of two bright black eyes peeping in at the door. "Entrez, mignon," cried the mother, whose quick ear had discerned the small step on the stair. The boy flew to the bed; and, holding up his rosy mouth for a kiss—"Ah, ma chère maman! pourquoi pleurez-vous encore?" This was tenderly spoken; then more briskly—"Qu'il fait beau ce matin! Le soleil est brillant. The garden is lovely! You will soon be well now, ma pauvre maman! Dites moi que oui." She stooped to him silently, while he clung about her neck. He looked lovingly into her face with his pure child soul, whilst a world of earnest sadness lay mirrored in her sapphire orbs. O Katherine! was it not a piteous sight—the more as she who was so soon to depart was so amiable in her desolate grief; and he who was to remain behind was so young and helpless, and so fervent in his filial affection?

On the afternoon of the same day, Louis brought me a folded paper. When he came forward, he looked as bright and happy as if no cloud hung over his fortunes. All his original spirit glittered from his jetty eyes. Whenever I see him thus, I give him his military honours.

"Well, mon capitaine, how goes the troop?"

"Ah, fort bien, madame. We are to have une grande bataille demain à midi, les Français contre les Espagnols. Qu'en pensez-vous? Voulez-vous venir au champ?" (I have now seen a great deal of this boy, and have got quite attached to him. His capacity is quick, his disposition generous and high, his whole nature noble and true. I am well pleased to believe that he, too, is attached to me in turn.)

"Vous aimez voir la guerre, n'est ce pas?" he went on. "Chere madame, venez je vous prie."

"I nodded and smiled. "Je viendrai." He thanked me with a flashing glance. And then, reverting to his errand—"My mamma sent you this," laying the MS. in my lap; "and now I must run away to her again, for she is all alone, ma pauvre maman!" The eyelids drooped suddenly. I rose, and taking him by the hand, led him into my chambre à coucher. Then opening my bureau, I took therefrom a very large and fine eagle's feather.

"Prenez la! this is the true badge of a soldier. Fix it in your cap, mon capitaine, and victory is sure." Another flash of grateful intelligence, and so out of the room with a bound! When he was gone, I examined the paper he had left with me. It contained a poem, doubtless the one of which I had requested a copy, written out with a pencil in a delicate Italian hand. I sat down in the window recess, and read as follows. It bore the title

WHAT THE MORNING SAID TO ME.

But three hours since the bell of midnight toll'd,
And 'neath her mantle darkness hid the world;
Now the sweet day-dawn, like a tender maid,
From her far casement, 'mid the fading stars,
Peeps bashful down upon the quiet earth,
As she would say, 'I'll, musing, pause awhile
Ere from my face I raise the downy veil,
And shake my golden tresses to the breeze.'

O pale, pure spirit! on this grassy bank,
Where nameless flowers weep gently all night long,
I'll lay my head, and list in meekest mood
What words thou'lt speak unto my waiting soul.

How solemn our brief life! which less we hold
Than life holds us by thousand mystic chains
So exquisitely wrought, the longest term
Of men most studious is too short and dim
To sift the threads and track their subtle work.

Life's morn is solemn!—though he knows it not
The fair bright boy, so bashful yet so bold,
Who fires and dares, or droops and melts by turns;
For on that misty and far-stretching road
Whereon his small foot stands, he hath begun
A journey, peril-fraught, shall never end.

And noon is solemn! when stern duty's trump
Her banner'd legions summons to the field,
And each, with its own fitting weapon met,
Demands to be confronted and o'ercome.

Evening is solemn! when the growing shades,
Slow stealing on the mind's horizon, throw
The lingering light far back upon the past—
The weary present darkening to decay.

More solemn still is night! when work is done,
And with closed eyes man lays him in the earth,
And the stars shine on his forgotten grave.

Yet comes a day when other morn than Time's—
Eternity's—shall rise upon the world!
Here thoughts tremendous overflowed the sense,
Till all else flies in swift and scared eclipse.

O flowers! whose innocent tears give meek reproo
To these dry lids, should now be gushing fast,
O'er years whose harvest shows so scant and weak.

O moon! that wanest from the flushing sky,
As thou to higher spheres would'st bear thy glory,
I would the lesson of this summer morn
Might sink like dew into my thirsting heart,
That, when the night of death falls on my dust,
My loosen'd soul might taste th' ethereal dawn.

The sun is up! Behold the mountain tops!
'Come forth to labour,' cries the gathering light;
'Still may good seed be scatter'd by thy hand—
Still ere day's close, some mallow sheaves be bound!'

God speaks in morning's voice—"Go forth, go forth!"

'Alas, alas! poor Marion Falconer! She will never more go forth—as she seemed to hope at that bright interval—to any work of this life. Even while I write, her fair form lies in the marble embrace, waiting its consignment to the grave on the morrow. She died last night, and made no further sign—I mean in respect to her own history. Once or twice I fancied that something hung about her heart which her lips would fain reveal, and I gave her all the encouragement to confidence I could; for, sooth to say, Katherine, considering the peculiar circumstances of the case—the forlorn condition of the dying wife and mother, the studied avoidance, or else the real ignorance of the subject shown by my landlady (a hard sort of woman, yet her only available relative); and, though last not least, the extreme attachment I had formed for the orphan Louis, I felt it almost a duty to seek to possess myself of some more certain data than I had yet found. None such, however, were vouchsafed. She never told me the cause of her husband's absence, nor where he was. Reserved all along, she continued so to the last. "She died with the same spell of mystery o'er her." And when I begged Madame Dufresne, this very day, to state to me, as a friend, whatever she knew of Mr. Falconer, she answered rather drily,

"Indeed, Madame Aubrey, I know little more than yourself. Marion was one who always kept her own counsel. She had a great deal of pride—false pride I called it—and I forbore to question her. I have heard that her husband was foolish, easy-tempered, and given to gambling. I believe he sailed for Australia or some distant colony shortly before his wife came to Nice. He knew her relations had emigrated thither some time before. At any rate, he left her well nigh penniless; and in their extremity I invited her and the boy to my house."

"Did she never get letters from Mr. Falconer?"

"At rare times she did get a letter. About three months since she received one with an English postmark, which I had good cause to believe was from her husband; and over that letter she hung weeping for days, as if her heart would break."

"But if he had gone abroad, how did he write from England?"

"There is the difficulty. She would tell me nothing about it. False, false pride! and see the end of it!"

"Do you think that she preserved that letter?"

"I fear me no; she regularly destroyed her correspondence, small as it was. But whatever manuscripts she possessed you are welcome to take. I have too much to do to find leisure soon to examine them, and don't expect to be wiser if I did. So there is the whole truth of it; and I only wish we knew what to do with the child, now Marion is gone." Thus calmly and selfishly this woman wound up her argument.

'Now, my dear Katherine, I have to add a little bit of brighter colour to this sad picture. I have proposed to my landlord and landlady that my favourite, Louis, should accompany me home to Woodburn when I leave this place, which I mean very shortly to do, promising that he shall be suitably educated and retained by me till claimed by his nearest connexions; and to this the couple have agreed; so that when you and dear George see me once more beside you, I shall have this engaging young stranger to introduce to your better acquaintance.

'Meantime, you will be glad to learn that my health is decidedly improved.—Your affectionate

'M. AUBREY.'

'P. S.—Nothing can be more touching than the grief of Louis. Intense and uncontrollable, in correspondence with his character, it bursts forth ever and anon with a violence that refuses to be pacified. By-and-by comes a gleam of the old spirit; when, by a strong effort, the tears are manfully brushed aside, and he essays to erect the soldier's front. I have been talking to him a long while this morning, and find that the cream of his consolation lies in the prospect of going with me to Scotland—his mother's country.

"And will your home be mine too?" he inquired, nestling closer to my side, with the sweet earnestness which only childhood knows. "And shall we cross the sea, the big blue sea, together? Ah, c'est charmant! c'est magnifique!" A pause—then an instantaneous revulsion. "But I shall be far far away then from ma pauvre maman! O dear, dear, kind lady, take me where she is gone!" So feeling alternates—now a whirlwind—now a calm—now a thunder-shower—now a glitter of sunlight. One thing I know, Katherine, you will be sure to love this boy.

Love the boy! Of course I shall. Do I not love him already? How I weary for George to tell him the news! I cannot work, or read, or do anything till he come. Oh, here is another P. S. to the letter I had not noticed before.

'Within an hour of her departure, Mrs. F. beckoned me to approach her bed.

"I meant," she whispered faintly, "to have told you—all my story—it is not much. When my husband's difficulties began, he hoped to retrieve himself. When they increased, he thought to satisfy his creditors with promises of payment—on his probable accession—to valuable property. But this prospect—was blighted—he grew desperate—he sent me and the child away—he sailed to Australia." Here she paused utterly exhausted.

"And where is your husband now? Did he come back?" I returned in an earnest whisper. She caught my voice—she understood my question; albeit her soul was verging closer—closer to the silent land.

"Yes! He is —." She fell back totally prostrate, and never opened her lips more. Mr. Falconer, then, is in Britain. This is one point gained. Let us hope that other facts may in turn transpire to help us to weave the chain to completeness.'

(To be continued fortnightly.)

UP THE MISSISSIPPI TO NEW-ORLEANS.

PART IV.

THE visitor to New-Orleans will have a most ample opportunity of studying, in its various phases, that institution which darkens the fair name of freedom, which stains American honour, and makes Britain blush for her Transatlantic cousins.

My rambling sketches would be sadly incomplete did I not touch, however lightly, on such a subject—a subject fraught with the deepest interest to the moral welfare of our race, and the wellbeing of millions of those whom we call 'men and brethren.'

To those who know of slavery only by name—who know of plantations only by engraving—who think of every slave as a Cassy, and every master as a Legree—who in their youth gloated over the 'White Slave' till their eyelids closed, and in their dreams heard the clank of Uncle Tom's chains—my remarks will seem vapid and prosaic in the extreme. But let me ask my readers how many of them have ever thought of slavery apart from that romantic form in which it is presented to their view, and how many of them could realise to themselves what slavery really is, when stripped of all the disguised attire in which it is shown them? Do I then mean to say that they have a better or a worse view of that institution? That is difficult to answer; but I would venture to affirm that they are popularly presented with a false view.

The 'slave question' is a most alluring one, and to the writer on the Southern States of America supplies a most fertile field on which to exercise the cacotheca scribendi. I shall not go far to gratify this passion, which of late years has assumed the form of a periodic mania; but shall content myself with a glance at the slave as he is in his adopted home, under the reign of 'King Cotton' and his satellites.

On a lovely day towards the close of last year—when readers of the Miscellany were doubtless shivering under the keen blasts of November, and creeping near their winter's fire—I left behind me the city of New-Orleans, with its swarming troops, its eternal roll of kettle-drums, and its martial law; and, duly provided with a 'pass' from the Provost-Marshal, joined a riding party, to visit a sugar plantation some miles up the river. A ride of an hour and a-half along the banks of the Mississippi, and through the village of Carrollton, brought us to the estate, to visit which we had previously had a most pressing invitation. Unfortunately, we found on our arrival that our host was suffering from an attack of measles—an affection which at that time was rather prevalent among the adult and even aged portion of the community. He was carefully attended and nursed by a bright mulatto woman, of prepossessing appearance and most affable manner, who welcomed us to the house of her master with all the polish of an accomplished and most polite hostess. By her attentive demeanour and obvious anxiety on behalf of her patient, it was easy to perceive that, although a slave, she held a high position in the household. She was, in fact, mistress of the house, and a more hospitable one I have rarely met with.

The illness of our host did not preclude us from having every freedom of his house and grounds; so, after taking 'drinks' all round, according to the custom of the country, and seeing our horses tied up and cared for, we set off on an exploring expedition through the plantation.

It was the 'grinding' season—the season when the whole operation of sugar-making is in 'full blast,' as it is commonly expressed;—and if we want to have a full view of the whole process, and see the negro at work in its various stages, we must begin in the field and trace the sugar from the cane on to the 'hogshead.'

And firstly, the slightest notice of sugar-cane, the saccharum officinarum of the botanist, which contains in its juice the 'cane sugar' of the chemists. It consists of a long-jointed bamboo-looking stem, varying in height from six to twenty feet, with a diameter at the base of from two to six inches. Its upper half or three-fourths are coated by the sheathing portions of long, narrow leaves, which, after encircling the stem, become 'reclinate' in graceful curves. That variety which more peculiarly suits the soil of Louisiana, called the 'striped cane'—although not yielding so much sugar as several West Indian varieties—excels all others in majestic and graceful appearance. To those at home, who have no opportunity of seeing the larger plants of the indigenous class (except the stunted and dwarfed specimens of our hot-houses), a field of tall, well-foliaged sugar-cane lends a peculiar charm to a botanical eye. Few, indeed, with a love of nature, can view this class of vegetation, for the first time, without a feeling of pity that nature has denied to her otherwise favoured land those graceful arborescent forms which demand for their existence more genial zephyrs than Albion can give. I speak from a lingering remembrance of the delight I felt when, for the first time, I rode along avenues of palm-trees in Madeira.

In the field we found gangs of slaves of both sexes, and of every shade of colour—for the word 'slave' by no means implies a black man—employed cutting down the cane close to the earth, with a small hatchet, and stripping it of the long leaves in which it is encircled. The cane is left upon the ground until picked up by other gangs. These were mostly the younger portion of the little colony, who, under the directions of a white overseer, picked the cane up and placed it in long square waggons, drawn by mules, in which it was carted to the sugarhouse. This constitutes the field-work in the 'grinding season,' and is by no means a particularly laborious operation—although I should distinctly wish it to be understood that I use the term 'laborious' in a relative rather than absolute sense. It did not appear heavier work than the gathering in of the majority of 'crops;' and, indeed, seemed to me less so than the harvest-work in our own country, nor does it continue longer. Before sugar is ready to be cut, the weather has generally become comparatively cool; and a late crop may even remain in the ground until the appearance of frost demands its removal. The temperature of the day on which I speak did not average higher than an English summer. The rays of the sun were by no means powerful, and even from them the tall 'brake' affords shelter for the greater part of the day.

Having rambled about the fields for some hours, we visited the sugarhouse—a two-story brick building—where the operations of crushing the cane, evaporating the juice, crystallization, bleaching, and packing goes on. All these operations are performed by negroes, under the supervision of white overseers. I conversed with several of the men and women at work, and found them by no means void of intelligence. Some of them, indeed, could give a graphic and almost scientific account of the particular operations in which they were engaged. Each one seemed thoroughly to understand his own department; and everything seemed to go along as smoothly as in any such establishment where white labourers are employed. I had a long and amusing gossip with an old negro woman—one of those old 'mammies' found nearly on every plantation, who, by a sort of right, do nothing but talk to strangers and take care of the babies. She had evidently gone hors de lui même on the subject of the war as leading to emancipation; and spoke highly of the 'Yankees,' as being angels who were to lead her 'out of the land of bondage into paradise.'

At one o'clock all hands came in from the fields to dinner, which was being cooked by one of their number in a cabin or outhouse used as the kitchen. Here, from a large copper, the cook served out to some representative of each family the allowance of pork for the whole, along with some baked hominy. This allowance is carried to the individual cabins, and served out as the family dinner, to which is generally added private additions of potatoes and other vegetables, and occasionally fish or poultry. During the meal, I visited several cabins, and conversed freely with the inmates, who seemed in no way backward or wanting in courtesy to strangers. I must confess, however, that the interior of their cabins was not such as individuals with the slightest energy in contributing to their own personal comfort would desire; and I speak of improvements entirely within their own reach. The families were for the most part squatted on the floor, and ate the meal out of a common dish, in a manner at once the most primitive and disgusting compared with the refinements of modern 'dining.' The interior of the walls were either of rough wood or coated with dingy whitewash. In one or two corners of the rooms were partitions of wood screening a low trundle bed; in others, however, no such partitions existed. Some cabins of this kind seemed to contain a dozen or more adult slaves of both sexes, where life among them must be of the most promiscuous kind. The female population appeared to want all knowledge of domestic comfort, even that of cleanliness. Cleanliness and some love of order, with the smallest encouragement on the part of their master, were alone required to make their cabins all that could be desired as comfortable homes by a labouring class. But with the slave there is, alas! that sad want of energy—that total apathy and indifference to anything higher than a mere animal existence—that, however kind a master he may possess, or however willing the latter may be to improve his condition, he finds he is too poorly repaid for his smallest exertions, either in gratitude or in the consolation of beholding a real amelioration of his serf's condition. Around each cabin there was a separate patch of ground allotted to the use of its occupants, in which they might raise poultry, keep a pig, or grow vegetables. Some of those plots were well cultivated, and repaid their owners well; but the majority of them, I fear, lay waste or were converted into slop pools, on the margins of which the young Ethiops built their mud-castles and launched their boats.

It was late in the afternoon when we returned to our host's, where, with true Southern hospitality, an excellent dinner was provided us. After doing ample justice to our meal, and having drunk the speedy return of our host's health, we remounted horse, and as the shades of night were closing over 'the Crescent city,' we were fast clattering through its well-paved streets, pleased with our day's excursion, and well satisfied with our practical insight of negro life. Such a visit as this—and many opportunities I have had of witnessing slavery in many forms—leads me to moralise.

I have been upbraided for having ever placed my feet under the 'prandial mahogany' of a 'slave-driver;' and have received many a scolding from a radical abolitionist friend in Britain for having thus added to the 'groans and tears' of my poor black brother. I must candidly say that nowhere do I ever expect to meet kinder, warmer-hearted, or more chivalric gentlemen than those who in Britain are branded by the name of slave-drivers; and I trust that every cook in Britain groans and weeps as little as those smiling ebony faces I have seen dish up crab-salad in New-Orleans.

But let me at once say, in distinct tones, that I am an abolitionist—that I would gladly see all men free. I hold that no man has a right to trample on another man—no right to hold another man a slave; but I cannot be blind to the fact that the social institution of slavery, from the false light in which it has been popularly presented, has produced false impressions of its nature and false ideas of its cure. I was reared with a wholesome dread of a slave-driver, and a morbid pity for his servant; and of all the rhymes I learned in the Sunday-school, none clings to my remembrance like that which taught me to thank God that 'I was not born a little slave,

To labour in the sun;
And wish I was but in my grave,
And all my labour done.'

Emancipate the slaves by all means; but will the 'labour in the sun' decrease? Give freedom to the slave, I pray; but will there be one soul less on earth who wishes that he was 'but in his grave'?

No. Slavery cannot alone be dealt with in the light of labour and reward, master and servant, or white and black. I fear it will do but little towards increasing reward, will certainly not do away with servants, nor change the colour of the negro race.

I wonder if our Times' correspondent, who prates in 'My Diary—North and South' about 'involuntary servitude'—which he seems to consider, par excellence, a true definition of slavery—ever visited any of our collieries or large iron-works in Scotland or in the north of England, and, in the latter, has seen that operation termed 'puddling;' or if, while tearing across the Atlantic in the Arabia, he thought of visiting that vessel's stoke-hole, where, in a temperature far exceeding that on any plantation, sturdy sons of the Saxon race are plying their vocation, to minister to his and his fellow-travellers' wants. It is true that these men have their freedom. If they do not like the firm of Smith & Brown, they may perhaps be allowed to 'puddle' at the still hotter blasts of Jones & Co.; or, if the stokers do not like the Arabia, they can enter Her Majesty's navy, where a munificent Government provides additional pay for work in the tropics. But do these actually better their condition? Is it not too true that nine-tenths of our labouring classes are not only born to 'involuntary servitude,' but remain so for life? Nor are they the worse on that account.

It is the moral condition of the negro race which we must seek to elevate, rather than by hoping that with his emancipation and reduction of labour he himself will take a higher stand in the social scale; and that the morale of the negro is capable of elevation, no one will dispute who has at all mixed with the race.* This great work of regeneration is, I believe, to be commenced and carried out in his native African home, and among the free negroes in North America—who, I regret to say, have yet to learn the advantages which freedom gives.

The total abolishment of American slavery can only be accomplished slowly, and certainly not in less than one generation; and, superadded to its abolishment, there must necessarily be a binding obligation on the States to support and educate their adopted children, until enabled to fight their battles in the great struggle of life.

R. N.

* Michelet, in his classical work upon 'Woman,' which every student of the sex should read, beautifully expresses that part which woman will take in the elevation and improvement of the negro race, if only acted upon by the great softening passion which rules her heart. At the risk of being thought pedantic, I transcribe the original, rather than lose an atom of its sentiment by translation:—

'Qu'on l'aime et elle fera tout, elle apprendra tout. C'est la femme d'abord qu'il faut élever dans cette race, et, par la force de l'amour elle élèvera l'homme et l'enfant. Bien entendu, une éducation tout opposée à la nôtre. Cultives d'abord ce qu'elle a tellement, le sens du rythme (danse, musique, &c.), et par les arts du dessin, menez-la à la lecture, aux sciences et aux arts agricoles. Elle raffolera de la nature dès qu'on la leur enseignera.

'Quand elles connaîtront vraiment la terre (si belle, si bonne, si femme) elles en tomberont amoureuses, et bien plus énergiquement qu'on ne l'attend du climat, elles s'entremettront du mariage entre la terre et l'homme.'

A LONG VACATION RAMBLE.

It was a summer of surpassing beauty. One of those old-fashioned sultry summers, such as our grandmothers love to describe that joyous season to have been in the glad times of their youth, but which have become so rare in the days of their degenerate descendants, whose reminiscences will be, alas! of summers when a bright coal fire was a necessity in the dog days, and a glimpse of sunshine an event to be chronicled. It was, I say, one of those glorious seasons when the inhabitants of our humid island had rejoiced under the influence of a sunshine as prolonged as it was unusual, that I found myself, towards the end of August, still seated in my gloomy chambers in the Temple, and, with all the stoicism I could muster, attempting to feel indifferent to the magnificent weather, which, with its subdued temperature and clear autumnal feeling, was making intending tourists' hearts beat high, and all mortals acknowledge that 'life is indeed a boon, and the enjoyment of nature an intensifying of it.'

Yet to me the brilliant summer and breezy autumn had alike brought nothing but toil and confinement; for, engrossed in the all-absorbing study of the law (which promises success to the hard-working only), I had continued to read far into the long vacation, and had seen with a sorrowing heart the occupants of the adjoining chambers take their departure for their annual holiday—some to wander over the Continent, others to join yachting parties at Cowes, and the greater number to rejoin their family circle in the country. But the ambition of in time winning a silk gown, or perchance the ermine (for of what impossibilities will not sanguine youth dream) were prizes too great for a man destitute of fortune to neglect the chance of securing. So I worked on till my head became such a chaos of indigested matter that I could scarcely tell whether it was the 'Liberty of the subject' or the 'Occupancy of land,' the intricacies of which I was vainly striving to impress on my mind. How long I would have persevered in this attempt to make the physical yield to the mental I know not, had not my Oxford career, with its disastrous termination, come to my recollection—when, from overtaking my powers of study, I had narrowly escaped one of those terrible illnesses which have brought many a man to an early grave, and in my case had extinguished all hope of academic distinction. Sensations similar to those I then experienced now warned me not only to pause in time, but also to apply the remedy which on that occasion had been attended with such beneficial results, viz. pedestrian exercise. This resolution was not a little strengthened by the brilliant sunshine which, penetrating the denseness of a London atmosphere, lighted up the apartment where, a prey to despondency, I sat poring over my dusty volumes, and by its brightness causing such an indescribable longing after the breezy down and the luxurious freedom of mind and limb, as to be irresistible. Yes! I would cast 'Coke on Littleton' and 'Blackstone' to the winds—give my poor muddled brains a reprieve, through the medium of a tour in the Highlands of Scotland,—while, at the same time, I gratified my love of the picturesque by visiting some of those scenes to which the pencils of Turner and Landseer have given a world-wide reputation. The preparations for my journey were soon completed—a knapsack, well filled with such garments as the roughness of the route rendered necessary, the best map I could procure, with sketch-book and diary, were speedily put together, and with these I started for the Euston Station, determined to fly through England as rapidly as an express train could carry me.

Seventeen years have elapsed since this my first visit to Scotland—years that have told more for the advancement of the country than all those which preceded them since the Union. It was indeed to it a memorable period—one of those epochs from which the advance or decay of a nation is to be dated. Free trade had just been made law, and as is usual in a transition state, had from its first working overwhelmed the inhabitants of so poor a country with the fear that, with their sterile soil and ungenial climate, they would be totally unable to compete with the rich grain districts of the Continent. But with a strength of purpose that did honour to their strong northern natures, no sooner had free trade become part of the constitution of their land, than they roused themselves from the dream of inactivity, which for generations had bound them to a system become unworthy of the age in which they lived, and adopting all the means which science and improved machinery gave them, entered the lists with the great corn marts of the Black and Baltic Seas. In all directions along the course of my journey, I was struck with the active endeavours being made for the reclamation of land, under difficulties of tillage that would have appalled an English labourer; and even morasses which, a few years before, only afforded shelter to the snipe, the lapwing, and the plover, to be now, owing to the system of tile-draining, beginning to yield superior crops. Were Dr. Johnson, thought I, now to revisit the scenes of his wanderings, he would, indeed, find his presage fully verified,—'That things were so fast changing in Scotland, that a Scotchman of the following century could hardly realise the times of his grandfather.' Desirous of seeing the impulsive, fitful, dreamy, and inactive Celt in his native adornment, I carefully avoided the busy haunts of man, striking out at once into remote districts, where, from the absence of that intercourse with the world which destroys all individuality, I expected to see the national character more fully developed. In this way, I penetrated into nooks and corners where the feet of the tourist has rarely trodden. I have sat by the peat fire and partaken of the proffered potato and draught of water (their sole food) in sheilings so wretched that the humblest mechanic would recoil from the thought of such a shelter for his head. I have listened to tales of suffering consequent on the inclemency of a climate which made their labour profitless, and their old age one of beggary; and having sounded the depths of their romantic natures, I found, even among the most commonplace and homely, such a well-spring of home affections, passionate devotion to their country, and hatred of tyranny, as must ever secure for them a high place in civilised life. Must I sully this fair character and say that there is a sad obverse side to the picture? Alas! truth compels me to admit that the habit of intemperance into which a large majority of the peasantry have fallen, is painful to witness—extreme intelligence and superiority of intellect being no guard against this debasing vice, which time and a better acquaintance with the higher enjoyments of life can alone cure. I little imagined, then, that a dark cloud hovered over the heads of those much enduring people, and that in a few short weeks, through the entire failure of their chief support—the potato—they would be rendered so utterly destitute and famine-stricken, that their cry of suffering would resound throughout the length and breadth of the land, and inaugurate such a system of charity as had never before been known in any Christian land. This year of 1846, which commenced with such apparent brightness and prosperity, was destined to close amidst harrowing scenes of sickness and scarcity; but was, in God's good providence, to usher in a new and bright era to the whole Celtic race.

It was on the beautiful evening of a particularly sultry day, about the middle of September, that I found myself seated on the banks of a magnificent salt-water lake which adorns the western coast of Ross-shire; the heat of the sun, as it poured down its rays between the lofty mountains of that romantic district, had, during my day's walk, brought on acute headache; but, regardless of all suffering, I pressed on, cheered by the hope that ere night closed, my fatigue would be recompensed by a nearer view of the dark and mysterious isle of Skye, to which I was hastening—the pointed tops of whose misty mountains I could just see dimly looming in the far distance. I found, however, that I had over-estimated my strength in pursuing my journey so long, and that illness was gaining so rapidly upon me, that to proceed any further that night would be impossible; and while an anxiety, which I in vain strove to silence, as to how I would pass the night (the district being apparently destitute of even the humblest dwelling), large drops of rain began to descend, in that measured regularity which portends a heavy fall—the distant peals of thunder and rapidly darkening horizon giving undeniable evidence of a coming storm. Thoughts not the most enlivening passed in close succession through my mind, in which the probability of being noticed in the next local newspaper as 'a stranger found dead among the mountains by some shepherds,' seemed at that moment the most likely death to be anticipated. Overcome with pain and fatigue, I sat still and watched, panic-struck, the course of the storm, as in all its fury it burst around me. Nearer and nearer rolled the thunder, till in one terrific peal it seemed to rend the heavens over my devoted head; the rain, as it descended in perfect sheets, flattening the small trees to the ground and beating the tiny foliage of the graceful birch into the muddy soil beneath; while the swollen mountain streams thundered down their rocky beds with the crashing noise of cataracts. A storm among the mountains must be seen to be imagined, and is even to the strongest nerved very appalling. The awful solitude and gloomy grandeur of the scene—the thunder, which, like constant discharges of the loudest artillery reverberating through the depths and hollows of the mountains, and dying away in long muttering moans, while the forked lightning making visible the desolation reigning around, conveys to the mind a fearful picture of the Divine wrath. In the midst of this war of the elements, I was roused from the apathy into which the misery of my situation had thrown me, by the sharp, querulous bark of a dog, which, judging from the sound, came from no great distance. Where there are dogs there are men, thought I; and I started to my feet, determined to make a bold effort for the preservation of that life which we do not value till we are about to lose it. Groping my way in the dark towards the direction whence the sound proceeded, I discovered, with great difficulty, a sheep track, which, following for several hundred yards along the course of a stream, and scrambling over masses of rock and heather (the latter of such a height that walking through it was well nigh impossible), I found that the barking proceeded from a comfortable farm-house, which, with its homestead, lay hid from view by an amphitheatre of hills. A bright light gleamed cheerfully from the ground floor; and, taking it as a beacon of safety in the awful darkness prevailing, I took courage, and, pushing forwards, gained the door of the house; and, in the supplicating voice which the emergency of my situation invested me with, entreated shelter for the night. While the servant was debating with herself the propriety of admitting, at such an hour, so questionable looking a person as my travel-worn dress, now dripping wet, bespoke me to be, the unusual sound of an English accent brought the master of the house to the door. I do not know if, in the darkness, he penetrated the disguise of 'a shocking bad hat' and dusty coat; but I think if my countenance were visible, he must have observed my look of surprise at finding a person of so imposing an appearance in such a locality, and occupying so humble a dwelling. In height he must nearly have approached six feet—possessing a singularly intelligent and animated face, which was improved by a head of patriarchal whiteness. I could be at no loss to discover his profession. The courtesy of his manners, and the cordial welcome which he accorded to a stranger, at once proclaimed him a soldier of the old school. In a shorter time than I take to relate it, I found myself seated by a huge peat fire, which, in primitive simplicity, burned on the hearthstone—my soaking coat cast off, and its place supplied by a garment of my host's, the cut and form of which would not have added celebrity to the name of a London tailor. After administering a tumbler of that most superlative of compounds, 'toddy,' my kind entertainer recommended my speedy adjournment to bed, which the old woman who acted as housekeeper had had warned and made comfortable for me; and if the refreshing sleep he had enjoyed during his Scottish tour, at Fort-Augustus, could never be effaced from Dr. Johnson's memory, how much greater reason had I to remember, with feelings of thankfulness and gratitude, this my first night's sojourn among the wild mountains of the Western Highlands of Scotland! The mid-day sun was shining brightly into my bed-room the following morning, when I awoke to a consciousness of where I was, and what had been the events of the previous day. My host had proved a more skilful physician than if he had belonged to that learned body. All headache and pain were completely gone; and nothing but a feeling of extreme fatigue and languor (for which a few days' rest was prescribed) remained to tell of my pedestrian feat—which, my host informed me, was greater than I could have imagined possible—the extraordinary elasticity of the mountain air making me at the time unconscious of the fatigue I was undergoing. In visiting some of the beautiful scenery of the neighbourhood—cascades, small lakes hidden among the mountains, and spots which had become famous as scenes of legendary story,—a week had slipped away ere I thought of proceeding on my travels—my kind host continually projecting some new excursion which would detain me still longer. And, in truth, I had little desire to leave so pleasant and congenial a companion. He had seen much service during our most memorable military period. Had followed 'the Duke' through his Peninsular campaign, from victory to victory, till his crowning laurel was won at Waterloo; and the opportunities which those stirring times afforded him, of becoming intimately acquainted with individuals whom history will hand down to posterity, as the deliverers of their country, were made ample use of by him—his conversation abounding with anecdotes illustrative of their characters, and the brilliant actions in which they had borne so conspicuous a part. The secluded life of a sheep farmer, in which he had chosen to pass his declining years, had not rendered him indifferent to all the objects in the far-off world which he left behind him when he retired from his profession. In the literary as well as the political world, he was thoroughly conversant with the subjects of the day; and there were few men rising to eminence, either at the bar or in the senate, whose name and career he was not perfectly familiar with. A large and constant supply of newspapers, periodicals, and works of general information, making this hermit of the mountains more a man of the age than many whose lives are passed within the magic circle of London society. Seated one evening over our tumblers of toddy (the invariable winding up of our social supper), while the fir logs and peats burning on the hearth sent such a blaze of light into the room as would have cheered the heart of the most sullen misanthrope, the conversation turned on mesmerism, clairvoyance, and the various phases of spiritualism which at that time was occupying so much of the attention of even the gravest thinkers. 'There is no country in the world,' said I, 'where I should so readily expect to have opinions favourable to supernatural agency so strongly confirmed as in the Highlands of Scotland—where we Saxons are led to believe that, amongst our Celtic brothers, belief in second-sight holds an influence over the mind which the boasted schoolmaster cannot even displace.' 'Twenty years ago, I should have said that such an opinion was not without foundation,' was his reply. 'But what changes have twenty years not effected in Scotland! Those with whom superstition was then almost a religion, are now scattered over the globe. The back woods of America, and the trackless wilds of Australia, have opened their arms to those who, in the hopeless despair of poverty, clung to a belief which promised them something better than they were then enduring. In those left behind, constant intercourse with England has obliterated much of the national character. Old customs, deep-rooted prejudices, and popular superstitions have faded away. As the catechist of Islay said, "When tea came into use, ghosts went out;" and education has done much to eradicate ideas which the natural features of the country tended to foster in the breasts of an imaginative people. The race of Taischters, or second-sight seers, are, I believe, extinct. None of them at least have come across my path, although I have heard of wonderful revelations made by them of coming events. Dreams, however, seem fully to occupy the place left void in the minds of the Highlanders, who consider them the certain means by which the depths of futurity are to be sounded. No work is entered on which has been preceded by an unfavourable dream; and the fishermen would, indeed, think he was tempting Providence if, in defiance of such a warning, he launched his boat on the mighty waters. But who is there,' said the old man, his eye brightening with his subject, 'who is there amongst us who has not felt the influence of a dream? We may strive to disregard its power, and dismiss it with the hope and belief that it owed its creation to an over-excited state of the mind, a disordered condition of body, or any other cause by which we may satisfy ourselves for the unaccountable impression it has made; but, even in the most sceptical, a feeling of hope or fear (whichever it may tend to excite) will force itself on the mind, investing the future with events, which, stripped of those alleviating circumstances so mercifully sent to prepare us for any great change in our condition, we involuntarily shrink from contemplating. I have lived too long amid camps, and seen too much of the realities of life, to be either an enthusiastic or imaginative person; but a dream which I had at an early period of my life, and which materially affected my future prospects, certainly had the effect of shaking my incredulity in such revelations. I shall relate it for your amusement, and leave you to draw what conclusions you choose.

'My father belonged to a class of men that was very numerous during the eighteenth century, but which, for many years back, has entirely disappeared from the Highlands. From his father he inherited what, from its extent, would be considered a good estate; but as sheep-farming and grouse-shooting (those mines of wealth to Highland lairds) were then unknown, and it consisted entirely of hill ground, it would have yielded a poor livelihood had it not been for the number of black cattle which it enabled him to raise; and to these he added, by purchasing the small stocks of the neighbouring tenantry, who, unable to dispose of them in any other way, were satisfied with whatever he gave for them, taking on himself the risk and expense of driving them to the Southern markets. No man could have been better fitted by nature for the life of a drover than my father. Of an iron constitution, active, fearless, daring, with the hearty, jovial disposition which makes light of difficulties, to him the long march over bleak mountain paths, nights passed on the wide heath, with no shelter from the pitiless storm save that afforded by his plaid, was, from the excitement it induced, one of happiness. Amply did he think himself compensated for his fatigue when his journey was completed, by his meeting with companions whom similarity of occupation had made friends; and it was when surrounded by these, and seated in the deep ingle of an old English hostelry, while a bright fire burned on the hearth, and a mug of home-brewed foamed on the board, that he loved to make his Saxon friends stare by relating either some feat of daring performed by his hardy countrymen in the chase, or some marvellous tale of second sight, which left his listeners in wonder and dread of that dark mysterious land lying beyond the Tweed.

'Till considerably advanced in years, my father continued this life of adventure with unabated eagerness, and, generally speaking, with profit. His name became so well known for the superiority of his cattle that, in the southern markets, they commanded the highest prices; and with money earned with so much toil and fatigue, he was not only able to supply his family with articles of luxury, at that time scarcely known in the Highlands, but to lay up a small patrimony for his two sons, who had both in early life entered the military service of their country, and gone abroad with their regiments. But a life of such constant exposure to a damp, variable climate had not been without its effect on the athletic form of the drover. He was attacked by violent rheumatism, which completely crippled him, and kept him almost entirely a prisoner to the house. Often had my mother's gentle voice been raised in entreaty that he would depute to others those journeys, the result of which had told so severely on his constitution; but strong-willed and determined, he resisted her persuasions, insisting that, deprived of the pleasure of meeting old friends, life would be stripped of its chief happiness. Necessity, however, has no choice; and under the disappointment of being obliged to remain at home and lead a sedentary life, his temper, always warm, became irritable in the extreme; and it was evident to all around him that he would not long survive the loss of the stimulant on which he so much depended for happiness. It was, fortunately, at this period that my regiment was ordered to England, and I returned to the paternal roof—a visit which in some measure filled up the blank which want of employment created in the mind of my father; but it was not seated at the fireside that I could find pleasure or enjoyment. Ardently attached to the sports of my country, I was ever to be found either stalking the deer among the wild fastnesses which surrounded our mountain home; or, accompanied by a solitary attendant guiding a small skiff, in which, in pursuit of wild fowl, I explored the rocky shores of the mainland. Occupied with such amusements, weeks and months slipped away unheeded, leaving me totally ignorant of the manner in which the old man managed his affairs, which he still continued to do without assistance, purchasing as in his early years the cattle of the tenantry around him, who were thankful to receive any sum in hand which would enable them to meet the rent-day with confidence. My father's youth having been entirely given to active life, he had completely neglected the necessary duty of keeping his books, or in any way accounting for money paid or received. And now that the burden of suffering and years had begun to weigh heavily upon him, it was not to be expected he would devote himself to an occupation which had at all times been distasteful to his restless, roving disposition. Engrossed with other matters, he quite overlooked the state of his health, which his family observed began to fail rapidly, as is commonly the case with those who have enjoyed a long exemption from illness; but they were not prepared for the shock that awaited them. While sitting at dinner, surrounded by a circle of friends, he was seized with paralysis, which deprived him at once of speech; and during the two days he survived, he was unconscious of what was passing around him. Immediately after his funeral, I commenced a strict investigation of his affairs, and was distressed to find the irregularity with which his money matters had been managed—scarcely any receipts for money paid were extant, and the very few I found were buried amidst a heap of old letters and consigned to the keeping of a lumber garret. His indolent, unbusiness-like habits were well known to his neighbours, and they now seemed determined to profit by them. For days, the house was besieged by claimants for sums of money, which they said had been owing to them for years back; and as I had nothing to show to the contrary, I was obliged, justly or unjustly, to satisfy their demands. Fortunately, these were generally of small amount; and having settled them, and placed my mother in a position which would afford her every comfort in my absence, I was preparing to rejoin my regiment, when a claim was made which I was ill-prepared to meet. A person of much apparent respectability in the district had for many years sold large numbers of cattle to my father, and although maintaining an appearance of cordiality towards him, it was well known that beneath it there lurked a strong feeling of jealousy. His prosperity and success in life had made Macrae not only his enemy while he lived, but, with a persistence worthy of a better cause, he now transferred his dislike to his family—the inheritors of his name and property. Scarcely had the grave closed over my father, than he sent to demand the instant payment of a thousand pounds (a claim against which I had unfortunately no written proof), intimating at the same time that, in the event of the demand not being immediately complied with, legal proceedings would, without loss of time, be commenced.

'The only excuse he could offer for such unfeeling conduct was that he had frequently sued my father for the money, but that he had always deferred its payment on the plea that his money was so invested that, without incurring great loss, he could not raise it; and there seemed to be so much plausibility and apparent truthfulness in this statement, that any feeling of doubt which might have arisen in my mind as to the justice of the demand was fast breaking away, when it occurred to my mother that on more than one occasion, when my father had indulged more freely than usual in after-dinner convivialities, she had heard him say "Thank God! I am done with Angus Macrae now; but if I had not got his bond for the money, I could not have rested in my grave!" Convinced from this that the old man would not have made an assertion which he could not substantiate, I recommenced a still stricter search after the missing document. From the roof of the house to its foundation, every corner was ransacked. Part of the flooring in his room was even raised, under the impression that, for greater security, he might have placed it there, but still without result; and none of his servants or intimate acquaintances could remember ever having heard him say positively that he had paid the money. With your English ideas of money, I can imagine your being amused at my feeling so acutely the loss of a thousand pounds; but you must remember that at that time a thousand pounds was equal to three or even four times its present value; besides which, Highland property was then of so little value that to lay a debt of that amount upon it was almost equivalent to losing it altogether—a hard struggle to a man devoted to his home. At length the evening arrived previous to the day on which payment was to be made. I retired to rest, greatly worried and distressed in mind at what I felt to be the inevitable fate awaiting me on the morrow. After a few hours spent in wakeful anxiety, I fell into an uneasy sleep, during which the figure of my father, holding back in his hand the curtains of my bed (which he had just pulled aside), appeared before me. "Alistair!" said he, "you have been much in my thoughts of late. I have seen what trouble you have been in from my carelessness when with you. Did not I always tell you what a rogue Angus Macrae is, and how anxious he has been to bring about our downfall? But this time the Powers above have conspired to defeat his wicked purposes. The money he is pursuing you for was paid to him, by me, many years ago; but, as he knew me to be a careless fellow, he thought I would not keep the discharge. Providence is, however, always just, and has frustrated his projects against the fatherless and widow. In the pocket of an Edinburgh almanack of the year 1746—which is lying, with some other old books, on the floor in the lumber-garret—you will find the black-hearted villain's discharge for the whole amount." When he had ceased speaking, he dropped the curtain and disappeared—leaving me in doubt as to the reality of the vision, or whether I had not been holding converse with the living instead of the dead—so vivid was the scene that had just passed as to the manner and appearance of my departed parent. Roused to a state of acute sensibility, I sprung to my feet, determined to test, by ocular demonstration, the communication just made to me; and, lighting a candle, I hurried up-stairs to the garret, where, hid'en beneath a heap of rubbish, I discovered the identical volume so minutely described in my vision. I instantly seized it, tore asunder the cord which held the boards together; when, to my unutterable surprise and delight, the missing document, the loss of which had caused me so much anxiety and distress, lay before me!

'You now know, my friend,' said I, 'why I am not sceptical as to such revelations. That God does not now employ the agency of dreams, as in the Jewish and early Christian ages, is, I think, no reason for supposing that in our own time they may not occasionally be sent as warning and guiding voices; and are not always, as Shakspeare says, "The children of an idle brain, begot of nothing but vain phantasy."' "

THE PUNSTERS OF THE SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES.

PUNNING is said to have been one of the literary vices of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Doubtless the itch for punning continued to manifest itself in the productions of the authors of a later generation; but we do not find it was carried out to such an extent as it used to be among the writers of the earlier ages of English literature. Literary punsters there are at the present day—plenty of them; but their facetiousness is exhibited only in ludicrous pieces, seldom or never in 'high-wrought' passionate effusions. With the literary celebrities of the reigns of Elizabeth and the Stuarts, the case was widely different. With them it was considered no fault—perhaps rather the contrary—for a hero to vent his praises or spit out his maledictions in a series of 'biting' puns. Taste has, in this respect, greatly changed since the days of Shakspeare and Donne; and many of the pieces, of the former author particularly, are now condemned, solely on account of phrases for which, probably, they were in former ages highly esteemed. In justice to these authors, we ought not to condemn vices of this description so severely as we should were they to be found under similar circumstances in the writings of modern authors.

If punning is to be lashed, Shakspeare will certainly prove the greatest offender under the rod. The immortal dramatist has been rather too severely handled by his critic, Dr. Johnson, for his facetious faults. 'A quibble,' says Johnson, 'is to Shakspeare what luminous vapours are to the traveller; he follows it at all adventures; it is sure to lead him out of his way, and sure to engulf him in the mire. . . . Whatever be the dignity or profundity of his disquisitions, whether he be enlarging knowledge or exalting affection, whether he be amusing attention with incidents or enchaining it in suspense, let but a quibble spring up before him, and he leaves his work unfinished. A quibble is the golden apple for which he will always turn aside from his career or stoop from his elevation. A quibble, poor and barren as it is, gave him such delight that he was content to purchase it by the sacrifice of reason, propriety, and truth. A quibble was to him the fatal Cleopatra for which he lost the world, and was content to lose it.' This is criticism in all its severity; but, like many of Johnson's sayings, it has 'overhot the mark.' Why, who, after reading such a criticism, would go to Shakspeare with the expectation of finding any pure, unadulterated exhibition of passion or character? Who, that knows not the exaggerated nature of the criticism, could, after reading it, regard Shakspeare as aught else than a poor pitiful quibbler? Johnson's exhibition of Shakspeare as a quibbler reminds us of the character given by some one of his dog—it was so enamoured with trifles that it would turn aside, even when at the fox's tail, to look for a rat!

To deny that the charge brought against Shakspeare by his great biographer is but too well founded, would be equally useless and vain. The evil is not one of Johnson's own creation, but is certainly exaggerated by him in his criticism. There are instances in which Shakspeare's 'quibbling,' as Johnson calls it, is not only excusable but even admirable, showing how deep was his knowledge of human nature. A passage from the tragedy of 'Macbeth' has been given as an instance of that love for quibbling which induced Shakspeare to mar some of his noblest passages by the introduction of a pun. The passage we refer to is that in which Lady Macbeth, after rebuking her lord as 'infirm of purpose,' endeavours, by an ill-timed joke, to stifle the remains of that which once was conscience, as well as to remove the fears or scruples of her less bloody-minded husband:—

Lady.—Infirm of purpose!

Give me the daggers. The sleeping and the dead
Are but as pictures—'tis the eye of childhood
That fears a painted devil. If he do bleed,
I'll gild the faces of the grooms withal;
For it must seem their guilt.

This passage, like most others of Shakspeare's writings, is true to nature; for, how often do we find a guilty mind, like that of Lady Macbeth, diverting the current of its most dangerous thoughts by a joke, more or less felicitous, on the subject to which its attention is directed!

There is another ground on which some of the Shakspearian puns may be defended. The 'chief end' of a pun is to quibble with the signification of a word; but this it can only do by the help of pronunciation. To render a pun felicitous, there must be a wide distinction in meaning, coupled with a very great similarity—amounting almost to an absolute identity—of pronunciation in the words brought forward. We can thus perceive at a glance the pronunciation of many doubtful words, by comparing them with others of which the pronunciation is regarded as fixed, and with which they are brought into contrast by a pun. An example from Sir John Falstaff will illustrate what we have been saying on this point. Prince Henry and his companion, Poins, having demanded Falstaff's reason for saying he observed that 'these men' were dressed 'in Kendal green,' when 'it was so dark, Hal, that thou couldst not see thy hand,' Sir John replies—

Give you a reason on compulsion! If raisins were as plentiful as blackberries, I would give no man a reason—upon compulsion.

It is here apparent that the word raisin was, in Shakspeare's time, pronounced like reason; and this pronunciation is still adopted by many eminent authorities, including Kenrick and Walker. Again, the word Rome, respecting the proper pronunciation of which considerable diversity of opinion exists, is 'paltered with' by Shakspeare in a similar manner. In the tragedy of 'Julius Caesar,' act i. scene 2, Cæsius says—

Now is it Rome indeed, and room enough
When there is in it but one only man.

Those who maintain that Room is the true pronunciation, have Shakspeare on their side in this instance; but, unfortunately, their opponents can boast a similar advantage, in the following extract from the first part of 'Henry VI.' act iii. scene 1:—

Gloster.—Thou art reverent

Toughing thy spiritual function, not thy life.

Winchester.—This Rome shall remedy.

Glo.—Room thither, then.

Perhaps Johnson might take this as an instance of Shakspeare's sacrificing reason—or, at least, consistency—for a quibble.

This view of the subject, although it confers additional value on some of Shakspeare's puns, cannot, if punning be considered a vice, extenuate Shakspeare's fault in indulging in them—unless, indeed, we can suppose that his quibbles were written to give future ages a key to the pronunciation of the sixteenth century.

Of all Shakspeare's characters, the fat knight, Sir John Falstaff, is by far the most brilliant punster. His wit can be rightly appreciated only in a perusal of the plays in which he sustains a part.* In the meantime, a few examples may be given of the worthy knight's facetiousness. With regard to the two justices, Silence and Shallow, Sir John observes—

Good Master Silence, it well befits you should be of the poor.

I do see the bottom of Justice Shallow. . . . I saw it, and told John of Gaunt he beat his own name; for you might have trussed him (Shallow) and all his apparel into an eel-skin.

'Ancient Pistol' comes in for a share of Sir John's witticisms, as in the following example:—

No more, Pistol; I would not have you go off here. Discharge yourself of our company, Pistol.

Again, on Pistol bringing him the news of the death of Henry IV., and the accession of his 'tender lambkin,' Sir John assures him—

Pistol, I will double-charge thee with dignities.

At the battle of Shrewsbury, Falstaff's tender recollection of the taverns of Eastcheap finds expression thus:—

Though I could scape shot-free at London, I fear shot here. Here's no scoring but upon the pate.

* First and second parts of 'Henry IV.' and 'The Merry Wives of Windsor.'

Falstaff's wit was of that kind which no dangers could subdue. In the heat of the conflict, he uttered his puns and jests with as much spirit as ever he did when taking his ease in his inn. Speaking of his rade mecum—a bottle of sack—he observes—

Ay, Hal; 'tis hot, 'tis hot; there's that will sack a city.
P. Hen.—What, is't a time to jest and dally now?

He threatens Hotspur very facetiously:—

Well, if Percy be alive, I'll pierce him.

The Prince, after his conflict with Hotspur, seeing Falstaff on the ground, and concluding him to be dead, thus laments his loss:—

Death hath not struck so fat a deer to-day,
Though many dearer in this bloody fray.

Falstaff, rising slowly, justifies his stratagem:—

'Blood, 'twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termagant Scot had paid me scot and lot, too.

As another specimen of Sir John Falstaff's humour, we extract the following from the 'Merry Wives of Windsor':—

Mrs. Quickly.—Marry, sir! I come to your worship from Mistress Ford.

Fal.—Mistress Ford! I have had ford enough; I was thrown into the ford; I have my belly-full of ford.

The three parts of 'Henry VI.' are remarkably prolific in this kind of wit; and this circumstance possibly contributed to induce Johnson to declare in favour of their authenticity. In the first scene of the second part, the assembled lords criticise the conduct of the Duke of Suffolk, in causing the Duchies of Anjou and Maine to be delivered over to Queen Margaret's father. The Duke of York expresses his dissatisfaction by a pun upon Suffolk's name:—

York.—For Suffolk's duke, may he be suffocate
That dims the honour of this warlike isle.

The Earl of Warwick is equally felicitous on the name of one of the provinces:—

Salisbury.—Then let's make haste away, and look unto the main.

War.—Unto the main! O, father, Maine is lost;

That Maine, why by main force Warwick did win,
And would have kept, so long as breath did last:
Maine chance, father, you meant; but I meant Maine;
Which I will win from France, or else be slain.

On the same word Jack Cade makes a pun, which is naturally not nearly so happy as Warwick:—

Dick.—And, furthermore, we'll have the Lord Gay's head for selling the dukedom of Maine.

Cade.—And good reason, for thereby is England maimed, and slain to go with a staff, but that my puissance holds it up.

Richard III. with all his faults sometimes attempted a pun. His mother, the Duchess of York, cursing him for his crimes, asks bitterly—

What comfortable hour canst thou name
That ever graced me in thy company?

Richard undutifully replies—

Faith, none but Humphrey Hour, that call'd your Grace
To breakfast once, forth of my company.
If I be so disgraced in your sight,
Let me march on and not offend you, madam.
Strike up the drum.

We must conclude our extracts from Shakspeare with the following from the 'Tempest':—

Ferdinand.—I do beseech you
(Chiefly that I might set it in my prayers)
What is your name?

Miranda.—Miranda: O my father,
I have broke your heart to say so.

Ferdinand.—Admired Miranda!
Indeed, the top of admiration; worth
What's dearest to the world.

The 'immortal bard of Avon' has appropriated so much of our space, that we will be compelled to treat the other 'witty wags' of his age in a more summary but less satisfactory manner. The love of quibbling is a fault censurable in all the writers of this age as well as in Shakspeare; but their witticisms, as a rule, are as inferior to Shakspeare's

'As moonlight unto sunlight, as water unto wine.'

The celebrated author of 'Paradise Lost' has not left us without a specimen of his powers in this department of literature. Milton's poetry, being of a higher and more dignified cast than that of Shakspeare, admits still less of anything like a quibble being introduced. Milton has avoided this fault so much that even in his lighter pieces he is seldom guilty of a pun. But what he has left is sufficient proof that, if he abstained from punning, it was from any cause but want of ability. The admirably witty epitaphs which have made old Hobson* 'an immortal carrier,' are his only pieces that can lay claim to be called facetious. A few extracts from one of them will contrast not unfavourably with the Shaksperian quibbles we have already given:—

Rest, that gives all men life, gave him his death,
And too much breathing put him out of breath;
Nor were it contradiction to affirm
Too long vacation hasten'd on his term.

Nay, quoth he, on his swooning bed outstretch'd,
If I may not carry, sure I'll ne'er be fetch'd.

Ease was his chief disease; and to judge right,
He died for heaviness that his cart went tight.

He had his fate
Link'd to the mutual flowing of the seas;
Yet, strange to think, his reign was his increase.

The metaphysical Dr. Donne, whom Johnson calls 'the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet, of our nation,' has many sly puns. A few of these, taken from his 'Fourth Satire,' may be reproduced here:—

'At Westminster,'

Said I, 'the man that keeps the Abbey tombs,
And for his price doth, with whoever comes,
Of all our Harrys and our Edwards talk—
From king to king; and all their kin can walk.
Your ears shall hear nought but kings—your eyes meet
Kings only;—the way to it is King-street.'

But the hour
Of mercy now was come. He tries to bring
Me to pay a fine to 'scape his torturing,
And says, 'Sir, can you spare me?' I said, 'Willingly.'

* The University carrier.

'Nay, sir, can you spare* me a crown?'

But now he's gone, thanks to his needy want
And the prerogative of my crown.

John Marston, a writer contemporary with Shakspeare, makes the following attempt in one of his comedies:—

To conclude, 'tis
Most certain they must needs both live well and Die well, since most commonly they live in Clerkenwell and die in Bridewell.

One of the most brilliant punsters of the sixteenth century was Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor during the reign of Henry VIII., and celebrated as the author of the fanciful work 'Utopia.' More found a strange pleasure in exercising his wit upon the many unfortunate victims whom the bigoted zeal of Henry so often brought before him. His conduct in many of these judicial cases is certainly liable to reprehension, both in regard to the unseemly levity he sometimes displayed, and the relentless severity with which he treated the unhappy prisoners, but which is more excusable considering the nature of his sovereign. The following instance is related of More's allowing his appreciation of wit to get the better of his persecuting spirit:—A heretic, named Silver, was brought before Sir Thomas on one occasion to stand his trial. On hearing his name, More exclaimed, 'Silver, you must be tried by fire.' 'Ah, my lord,' said the culprit, who observed his opportunity, 'so please you, quick-silver cannot abide the fire.' The Lord Chancellor rewarded his wit by at once setting him at liberty!

As one instance more of sixteenth century wit, exercised in the usual bigoted spirit of religious persecution, the execution of Friar Forrest, in the reign of Henry VIII., may be related. Forrest was the confessor of Henry's queen, Catherine, and was accused of the usual crime of 'heresy,' and about the time of his execution a Welsh idol, known by the not very euphonious name of Darvel Gatherén, was brought to London. The Welsh had a legend regarding it that it would one day rise and fire a whole forest. It was regarded as an 'excellent good joke,' that this image should be hewn down and used as fuel when the Friar was, according to sentence, burned; thus fulfilling the prophecy by firing a whole forest! A few doggerel lines, by some London author, explained to the mob the production and its fulfilment.

Shakspeare—if we may be allowed to introduce him again—affords an instance of this same paltering with prophecy. The Duke of Suffolk, whom we have already had cause to mention, on being banished from the Court, falls into the hands of pirates. Suffolk, pleading for safety, says—

Look on my George, I am a gentleman;
Rate me at what thou wilt, thou shalt be paid.
Walt.—And so am I. My name is Walter Whitmore.
How now? Why start'st thou? What, doth death affright?
Suf.—Thy name affrights me, in whose sound is death.
A cunning man did calculate my birth,

* Falstaff says—'Oh give me the spare man, and spare me the great ones.'

And told me that by Water I should die:
Yet let not this make thee be bloody-minded:
Thy name is Gualtier being rightly sounded.

With this, for the present, we must conclude our subject—ending with Shakspeare as with Shakspeare we began. Having thus, as the old song says, left 'aff' where we began, all that remains for us is to take about us the 'auld cloak' of silence, which we do with the hope that our readers have experienced some slight amusement from the 'Punsters of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries.' KILLED.

BY THE EDITOR.

FANCY a bosom to death's violence bared,
Through no proud vision of a world's acclaim:
Ye brave! who burn to win a popular name!
Lo! death, in shape a maniac, suddenly dared,
For neither martyr's crown nor hero's fame!

Kill'd! kill'd! Ah me! it is a little word;
But little motes are blinding to the eyes—
A little poison, and a giant dies—
A little puncture with a slender sword,
And dead the life that reaches to the skies.
Word, framed for utterance in a frenzied shriek,
Or for low breathing in a tremulous wall,
Telling, alas! enough—when more might fall
With equal force to blanch the listener's cheek,
At thought of other cheeks supremely pale.
Oh! murderous breath, that startles like a blow!
How has it stamp'd a horror on my brain
Of a black night—a crash of train on train—
A whirling agony of helpless woe—
And a long, sickly pang of utter pain!

Kill'd! I have heard the word like one who keeps
Hope at his heart 'gainst overmastering fears,
Till, when the smothering smoke of battle clears,
He sees his brother 'mid the mounded heaps,
But sees him dimly through a mist of tears.
O'er brow, and eye, and lip in thought I bend;—
Yet when I try the homely lines to trace,
Confusions harrow me of time and place,
And luminous living features brightly blend
With the pale beauty of the death-struck face.

He was my playmate in long summers past—
Summers that came more grandly from the east—
That spread o'er all the fields a richer feast—
That on the hills a brighter glory cast—
And all their wealth of sunshine he increased.

Oh for the heart to feel, the head to plan,
The wit that made him everybody's guest!
I only wear the image in my breast—
Now of a living, breathing, genial man—
Now of a mangled form for burial dress'd.
Why lived he not to list the healing songs
Of those whose stay he was in clouded days—
Who, when affliction came in viler ways,
Years'd for his eloquent voice to speak the wrongs
That would have edged with fire his fiercest phrase!

No answer breaks 'mid sorrow of eclipse!
Mute is the generous tongue, and dark the eye!
There lives no record of his dying cry;—
But penitent Death preserved upon his lip:
A smile for such as love his memory!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'—'Tis bitter cold;
And I am sick at heart.'—Shakspeare.

CHAPTER VII.

FOR several months past, I have been at feud with the east wind. I am naturally as little susceptible of chill as a Laplander in his furs; yet, during all this backward season, I have felt that particular wind (what can it mean?) stab me like an enemy. Every time I have heard Barbara cough, I have trembled lest fearfully, on the dry ragged wings of it, should be borne some desolating message of Fate. It may be that such nipping air is felt, like tic or toothache, to be of endless duration while it lasts. The warm breeze from the west may, while enjoyed, be as little valued as health. How apt are we to forget our blessings at all times! Perhaps on that very account we need occasional chastening, by way, as it were, of moral alternative—to break, so to speak, the sensuous apathy of our life-dream. However this may be, I have measured the east wind all this withering winter and spring, by silent, fitful agonies. There is an aim, as I fancy, in every wind under the skies, even when puzzling the vanes and smiting the smoke with panic; and the aim of that perfidious one from the orient has been—if I dare make bold to interpret the purposes of the wicked—to blow influenza and death into every house.

Funerals begin to fascinate me. I pry into the mourning-coaches, and crowd my memory with a phantasmagoria of anguished faces. Every breadth of crape I encounter in the streets startles and saddens me like an elegy. Oh, if a sweeter wind—a friendly wind—such a wind as lovers' sighs are made of, would but come soothingly and healingly from the bland Atlantic, laden with soft accordant mixture of precious balms, like harmony too fine to be audible, from the lovely summer isles! Hush, hush my fears! My plumper half has no fears. For her own part, she resists the east wind, and its myriad imperceptible arrows, like a magnificent railway buffer.

'Ah Jean!' said I, 'I do not like Barbara's cough.'

But my giantess—squat and firm like a shut telescope—laughed and replied that our child's sickness was caused only by a little love-affair, and that it would soon pass away, 'for,' as she argued, 'girls don't die of love now-a-days.'

'If I thought she suffered from any such cause,' I exclaimed, 'I would hunt that fellow Edward Imrie to the ends of the earth.'

'Him!' cried Jean. 'What is he but a poor clerk, like some other folk—begging your pardon? He is no more worth hunting than a cat. I warned her to have nothing to say to him.'

I'm a caitiff and deserve cudgelling, if she did not become tall as she said this, and, indeed, as she always did when the blood of the Chisholms was touched to its Celtic altitudes.

'If you would only,' Jean added, 'cultivate a little ambition—make money like other men—and get the girls into good society, there would soon be no more of their dwinings.'

'Very good,' I said, simply naming, at the same time, a party whose ambition and extravagance had outrun his honesty; but she did not see the satire, or at least the terrible compression of it. So I brushed my hat—a bare but well-preserved article—adjusted it on my white head—drew on my gloves, which my eldest daughter, Jessie, whom I call 'the worker,' had neatly darned on the previous night—and sallied down stairs and out to the pavement. Mr. Waddel's servant, Susan—a red-armed, good-natured, rather slatternly lump of femininity with a double chin—was polishing the bell-handle opposite, and as I looked across the street inquiringly, she motioned—though not with particular elegance of pantomime—that her master was off to town. Accordingly, I paced leisurely down Portland-street alone, muttering to myself—'Very good!' and resolving to be greatly honest, if I must needs be unfortunately poor.

The Suspension Bridge is always groggy in a stiff wind. At all events, both for steadiness and economy, I prefer the solid arches and the broad flags. It was a morning to take one by the nose. The raw pincers of it were on that facial promontory I could feel. Yet the sunshine was bright, and I took the west side of Glasgow Bridge—a uniform custom with me during the travelling season—in order that I might look down upon the steam-boats. They were lying three abreast, with their decks as clean as a Glasgow eating-house counter of the olden time, with its gelatinous cow-heel and green parsley; while in one or two of them a couple of men were busy burnishing the brasses. New-rigged and smartened up for the May-day, there they were, huddled together like a fresh bevy of bridesmaids. Leaning my tall, spare person on the balustrade, I saw one vessel next the quay, with gangway placed, steam impatient, and hour of starting obviously at hand. The throng was spilled into it. Children were carried and old people assisted down the paddle-box. Carpet-bags, beds, bundles, boxes, chairs, a perambulator, a fascis of fire-irons, a sprawling complication of tubs and broom-handles, and, in the classic language of the auctioneers, 'a variety of miscellaneous articles,' became heaped about the funnel. Numerous interesting groups were clustered on the quarter-deck, chatting, finding seats, clutching at unruly children, squaring accounts with polemical porters, waving adieus to loiterers on the quay, or bending moodily over one or other of the morning newspapers. Two or three of the fussy, puffy, inconsiderate, miscalculating, ill-regulated, always-too-late class of individuals were got on board with difficulty. The ropes were loosened, the captain was at his post, the man at the wheel was alert, the babbling steam was suddenly silenced for grave duty, and away the steamer extricated itself with a slow, fine glide, beautiful to witness. I followed it with my eye as I saw it thread the harbour miraculously, neither crashing into any tall ship lying cross-wise, nor running down the ferry-boats plying leisurely before its bows. Gradually it diminished in size, and rounded away out of sight. Not with the eye, but with the fancy I followed it still. The river widened to the exhilarated passengers. Their eyes drank the sunshine in its natural freshness. Its splendour was on the widening waters, and on the hills. Dumbarton rock stood up as rugged and picturesque as when the eyes of the imprisoned Wallace stared from its cleft summit. The salt smell of the sea dilated every nostril, and expanded every chest. Behold it at length crossing a broad expanse, with white sails here and there, in exact artistic position for effect! Now, it creeps into a quiet siding—a calm loch sheltered from the arrows of the east wind—with the mountains very near. Then, oh! the ecstatic landing—the glossy pebbles, the slippery sea-weed, the soft fine grass, the level winding shore-road, the white cottages ornaed, and the kisses of welcome at the little painted gates! Ah me! my poor Barbara! looking dully, this bright morning, to the other side of Portland-street (how dingy beside these visions!) at fat, slatternly, double-chinned Susan languidly polishing the bell-handle!

As I entered the countinghouse, Mr. M'Corkindale exhibited his face—extravagantly painted with colours at from 60s. to 80s. a dozen—and looked his watch like a man who had been robbed. I—not a young man now, nor yet an unfaithful servant—had stolen some fifteen minutes of sorry salt-watering on the Bridge, and my high-minded millionaire felt apparently a menace of commercial wreck from that larceny. His sense of loss immeasurably exceeded my consciousness of guilt, and I hugged the thought of a possibly divine compensation for our so different conditions, in the fret which I knew he endured. Oh, I know what I would do if I had gold! It should go to buy health for Barbara, even if health lay at the bottom of all the spas of Europe. For her sake I would evade and baffle the east wind with it in chariots of fire. It should conquer an earl's love for her, if such medicament should alone chance to suffice. Neither would I begrudge my aspiring Jean her gorgeous upholsteries—her mansion overlooking the Park—her things of calf and plush—and her other material magnificences. But from that secret depth of my soul, reserved for the purest thoughts and the grandest resolves, I devoutly pray my Maker to keep riches far from me, if they should make me false to a single natural taste, a single old friendship, a single generous instinct, a single tender sentiment, a single independent feeling. Rather any struggle of poverty, than any luxury of fortune, if the latter should serve to transmute my honest self, not into a beautifully benignant and sublimely simple Mathew Waddel, but into a huge, bloated, ludicrously pompous, essentially mean, and profoundly despised David M'Corkindale, Esq. of the Drums!

Still that erie, weary east wind assailing me on my way homeward. I could have snuffed it like a war-horse but for the chill with which it went to my heart like a Toledo blade. Barbara greeted me with her familiar smile—needed to round out her poor cheeks now a little—and declared herself quite able to take tea at Mr. Waddel's. We had all been invited thither; but Jean and I judged three of the girls enough—leaving Jessie the industrious, and Isabella the quiet, in charge of the mansion—which word I use because some one I know, and with whom I have shared my riches, rather likes it. Thanks to our dear friend, Barbara was muffled up like a Duchess en route for the opera! Her mamma, with a flaming head-dress in a napkin, supported her on one side; and Sophia, always tender-hearted, on the other. Kate took my own arm gleefully, and thus martialled, we crossed the street in a rapid manner, leaving the cheated east wind to go plaining to the house-tops. The countenance of Mathew radiated with welcome. Where to place Barbara for warmth he did not know, and exhibited such anxiety on that point that a noisy young minister—Mr. Gills—suggested it should be under our worthy host's waistcoat. But the fire, the gas, the tea-urn—Mrs. Gabriel Gray presiding with immense effect—and the carefully-closed crimson curtains, rendered every corner alike safe. With the enemy so completely excluded, or scattering his arrows for other victims, Barbara brightened into superb and glorious loveliness. Her eye gathered an amazing lustre from her cheek, and I could see that she struck in all hearts an admiration intensified into a worship. I never so felt the power of fine features to exert power. Mr. Gills 'ha-ha'd' his best and loudest, and by his obstreperous activity in handing about the cookies and the tea-cups, appeared to be ambitious of inspiring a kindred regard. Out of an old spinnet, wanting the additional key, I doubt whether an angel from heaven could have extracted much music; but Barbara made the most of it, and sung, at a later hour, with sparkling scintilli, and looks like lance-thrusts over her shoulder at dear old Mathew himself—who presented one delighted chuckle from his boots upward—though scarcely, after all, knowing whether to laugh or cry—the following quizzical stave:—

Oh why am I so young, good sir?
Or why art thou so old?
I like thy honest tongue, good sir!
I like—I like thy gold.
Oh why should there between us be
Full forty years or more!

I never can make up to thee—
Thou art so far before.
Thy house is very neat, good sir!
No fault with it I find;
Thy books are quite a treat, good sir!
And all thy ways are kind.
But marry thee I never may—
No, no, I never can;
For all the girls would laugh, and say,
'How does your dear old man!'
In spring we never tire, good sir!
To climb the breezy hills;
In winter, by the fire, good sir!
We sit and nurse our ills.
Then seek not thou with youth to match,
Forgetting thou art old;
For, seeking a young maid to catch,
Thou may'st but catch a cold.
Yet coldness in this heart, good sir!
I hope thou'lt never trace;
I would not bid thee part, good sir!
I like—I like thy face.
What pity there should 'tween us be
Full forty years or more!
Oh fain would I make up to thee—
Thou'rt not so far before!

Mr. Gills led the chorus of approval; but an ear quick for flattery could catch Mathew's voice in the question—"Who will say, after this, that genius is not hereditary?"

It was only, however, after Susan—wonderfully polished up for the occasion—had brought in a tray with some tripe and potted-head, that the tongues of the party got fairly loose. With the toddy which followed, the conversation waxed uproarious—Mr. Gills generously attempting to save anybody else from talking, and little lively Kate giggling immoderately at everything he said. It was an evening of such mirth as would perhaps greatly have shocked the punctilious and pedantic circles of the west-end; but Barbara began to look exhausted, and Sophia alarmed. The colour of our poor invalid went and came, and her striving to be cheerful was, to my secret fears, a very climax of pathos. Mathew declared he had never seen me so flat; but even from amidst that scene of amiable hilarity my mind was taking strange lonely flights up through the starry silences; and, at every lull, I was thinking wistfully of the east wind, and of the flowers which were blighted by its breath on many a late-made grave.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

THE LARBERT IMBECILE INSTITUTION.

WHEN Ralph Waldo Emerson made a summer tour, some few years ago, over Britain, he expressed a special wonderment at the vast number of our charitable institutions supported by private benevolence. And such was a Christian trait well calculated to interest and impress the American philosopher. Our national philanthropy, so broad and boundless, is spontaneous. It savours nothing of compulsion. The 'bountith,' wherever met, stands forth as a free-will offering of public sympathy. True, it may be, that

'We live to view
Crimes which no former ages ever knew';

but, in a multitude of heaven-born matters, we have a thoroughly practical manifestation of the reign of Christ—decided evidences that the world is in the sure way of progression. And not least of the divine gratulatives are the munificent doles of the thriving classes to the aid of the destitute and imbecile. In ordinary times the supply is, we believe, fully adequate to the demand. Hospitals for the sick; houses of refuge for the outcast; asylums for the insane; and homes of comfort for the poor, are thickly set over the whole length and breadth of the land. It would puzzle us to say which of these noble institutions is most creditable to the heart and purse of the nation. Here we feel just as Paris must have felt when it was required of him to present the most beauteous of the goddesses with the apple. All, in fact, are best. And if British philanthropy is at all in fault, it is in its haste—its tendency to ride rough-shod over prudence to the rescue of the multitude ready to perish. The fact need not be minced, that charity is oftentimes dispensed where it would be better withheld. There are thousands who live but to outrage the laws of God and man. Work they hate with sluggard-repugnance; and will be slothful and, as a matter of course, vicious, as long as the hand of a mistaken benevolence ministers to their necessities and lusts. Who are not familiar with the bloated-face mendicants that infest our highways and markets—stumping out some arm or leg misfortune, expecting that the 'case' exhibited will have the effect of making the tender-hearted and charitable 'stump down'? Several writers, including Tom Hood and Henry Mayhew, have drawn to the life the vagabond fraternity. Vigorous, graphic, and characteristic are their portraiture. They have carefully studied the existence, active and passive, of the community they seek to portray—hence the great success of their sketches: just as Peter Hesse and Horace Vernet excelled the more as battle-painters from having in early life served as soldiers.

But in a very different position from either the destitute or criminal class stand those poor unfortunates, the imbecile. To borrow a simile from Catullus, neither can the feeble-minded be allowed to waste on the heedless atmosphere their passing life, like the poor flower which has been cast upon the arid furrow by the cold ploughshare. Not in the whole human drama is there a story so overwhelmingly pathetic. True, all have their crosses to bear—their thorns in the flesh—

'Greater fleas have little fleas
Upon their legs to bite 'em;
And little fleas have lesser fleas;
And so ad infinitum.'

But what plan, touch of consolation, or mortal hope, in that pitifullest of privations—the want of reason? The affliction is one of those mysterious dispensations of Providence that cannot well be understood. We care not to pry into the secrets of His omniscience. And what explanation, under the circumstances, could be more to the point than the reply made by the deaf and dumb lad to the reverend examiner's question—'How it was that God had denied him the common blessings of hearing and speech?' 'Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight.' We are well aware that certain physical causes have been frequently advanced as lying at the root of imbecility. These we hold not to discuss here. Enough for us at present that the feeble-minded are numerous in our midst; and the thing that remains to be done is the formation of some national receptacle in which these helpless ones may be educated into strength, and properly cared for. There are, however, several such training-schools already in existence throughout Europe and the United States of America. To begin at home—the proverbial birth-place of true charity—Dundee wears the crown of the Baldovan Institution, which was erected in 1855 by Sir John and Lady Jane Ogilvy. In Colchester there is an asylum for idiots, under the able management of Mr. Millard. In Hamburg, one Herr Goethe has wrought since 1823 with great success among the so-called 'objects' of that locality. Goggenbühl's labours, too, in improving the cretins of Switzerland, are well known; together with the encouraging results effected at the institution for idiots near Paris; and also by Dr. Howe in America. Facts thus go to prove that it verges itself upon imbecility to say that such children, as a general rule, are wholly destitute of mind. Paralytic, physically and mentally, their case may be helpless enough; but not always hopeless. The divine spark is there—densely clouded, no doubt; yet, under the asylum culture of a zealous and efficient superintendent, it may be developed into a more vigorous and utilitarian state. Surely this possible, and indeed probable, prize is worth an effort, no matter how prolonged and severe.

But what of the subject of our paper—the Larbert Imbecile Institution? As yet, only one wing of the building has been completed. A second portion, however—planned as superior accommodation for pupils belonging to the upper classes, together with a house for the superintendent—is in a somewhat forward state. These two divisions, according to estimate, will cost close upon £4,000. With respect to the architecture of the asylum, we need be brief. Shut your ears just for one moment, Mr. Pilkington. Really the building, so far as it has gone, is slightly grotesque, displaying no uniform style, or rather exhibiting an immense combination of styles. It is, however, even now an imposing institution—massive, yet wearing nothing of the prison's frown. The site is splendid. No happier locality could have been chosen. The ground feued, which extends to five acres, is situated at Muirhall, about a quarter of a mile north from the Larbert station of the Scottish Central Railway. Interesting and picturesque is the surrounding scenery. Look from whatever window you may, and the eye is feasted with a magnificent expanse of landscape; and that filled, too, not only with agricultural but mechanical industry. As respects the portion of the asylum already finished, and now partially occupied, nothing that could possibly add to the health and comfort of the children has been omitted. In this, the north wing, capable of accommodating thirty pupils, there is an excellent school-room, and other apartments, to be hereafter arranged into workshops, gymnasiums, &c. The dormitories are fine spacious halls, well lighted, and perfect, we should say, in ventilation. Then, connected with the house there are also various bath-rooms, and a capital stretch of floor for play when the weather prevents romping out of doors. But only eight pupils have, as yet, been received into the asylum, and the general opening cannot take place for at least two months. We must therefore wait patiently for the results of the training operations. The institution and its inmates are, however, in the best of hands. Few perhaps in this country are so eminently qualified for the superintendence of such an establishment as Dr. and Mrs. Brodie. Both parties, apart altogether from professional skill, have had considerable experience in the mental and moral training of the imbecile; and their sympathies, above all, seem thoroughly absorbed in the improvement and elevation of that hapless class of beings. The beneficent work, demanding so much patience and self-denial, is far from new to them. Previous to removing to Larbert, they had, for upwards of nine years, devoted their lives in a similar sphere, near Edinburgh, and with results that offered the strongest hope and encouragement for the future. One young woman, presently under their charge, has proved so trainable that she now acts in the house as a domestic servant, and receives the ordinary 'fee' for her labour. Other two are on the fair road of taking the position of good sempstresses. But these, be it noted, are not regular idiots whom it is impossible to educate, but imbeciles simply, who are rather in a state of fatuity than insanity—their intellects not being out of balance so much as sadly deficient in grasp and power. Their position, in one sense, is not unlike that of the poor emaciated and inane victim of some sore epidemic. Hence the great importance of having such little unfortunates placed early under proper medical skill, before the constitutional weakness, wherever it may lie, has got anything like firmly grounded. In the Larbert Institution, the following objects will be aimed at:—1st, The improvement of the general health, by physical training, exercise, bathing, and all other suitable appliances. 2d, The awakening, regulation, and development of the mental powers by those means, peculiarly adapted to this class, which have already been found so effective in similar institutions. 3d, The employment of those educational resources which have been systematically developed in connection with infant training, with so much modification and extension as may be necessary to meet the peculiarities of the pupils. 4th, In the cases of the more advanced pupils, the providing of some suitable occupation, giving healthy employment—at once agreeable and profitable—to all their powers; especially keeping in view such occupations as may fit the pupils for future usefulness and intercourse with society.'

Still, some time must elapse before it is possible for Dr. Brodie to make any definite arrangement as regards the trade-departments of the house. The invigoration of the physical constitution is undoubtedly the first and principal thing claiming attention—the foundation upon which the mental faculties, in their development, are to be built. This primal work, the accomplished superintendent, we know, is fully alive to; and healthful recreation and exercise will be none the worse, for the interests of all concerned, of existing at the outset without any positive workshops either for tailoring, shoemaking, or glazing. Music, happily, is one of the great enjoyments of the feeble-minded, and a branch of education for which they almost universally display considerable aptitude. Let us refer here to an entertainment which we recently saw enjoyed by the insane inmates of the Barnhill Poorhouse, near Glasgow. Now the lunatic are no longer chained, and scourged, and chilled to death in cold, damp cells. The programme of the evening consisted of readings by Miss Aitken; songs by Misses Kirk, Osborne, &c.; and several dances in which those friends destitute of the light of reason heartily engaged. And perhaps it may interest many to know how the patients deported themselves under the influence of the music and the terpsichorean excitement. Let the reader then imagine an audience of 300 lunatics assembled together for festal mirth—some seated as onlookers—while others, with the utmost glee, tripped it airily through the winding mazes of the dance. The women especially entered into the pleasures of the strathspeys and reels with great spirit; nor was there a single case over the whole night which called for official attendance. During the concert the greatest of order prevailed. Indeed, many of the men listened, as we thought, with a melancholy interest to such songs as 'Sweet Afton' and 'My Hielan' hills.'

But now, setting aside the subject of our article, let us say a word with respect to its object. Heaven, we are told, helps those who help themselves. The imbecile, however, are powerless so to act; and what adds to the earnestness of our present importunities, is just the fact of their total incapacity of self-help. To the benevolent and Christian public, we make the appeal; and the claims of the poor idiot upon the philanthropic commonwealth need not be further urged:—

'Spurn him not, the blemish'd part
Had better be the head than heart.'

According to a statement made recently by that reformer-king, the Rev. Dr. Arnott, there are in Scotland about 2,240 imbeciles, and of these some 600 are of an age suitable for being admitted into educational institutions. Hence the loud call for having the public mind aroused to make some ample provision for the training and improvement of invalid youth. The money wanted to carry out to completion the Larbert Asylum will surely be forthcoming.

Such a deserving and laudable project will not, cannot die for lack of support. Already close upon £2,000 have been contributed, by way of donations to the building fund; but the estimated cost of the entire Institution is £10,000. Here, then, is work for those 'blessed evangelists,' the ladies. What they have done hitherto, they can do again. On last Christmas week, no further gone, the Edinburgh Ladies' Auxiliary Committee held a bazaar in aid of the scheme, from which they realised the handsome sum of £860. By-and-by, may we not gratefully anticipate a repetition of such a splendid gift? When the Romans were at one time hard pressed by a foreign enemy, the ladies of the empire, we are told, voluntarily contributed all their rings and jewellery, to assist Government under the public exigence. That was a heroic display of patriotism and self-denial. But battle-fields are not in any way necessary for the production of heroes and heroines. Social life, with its thousand vicissitudes, breaches, and duties, can boast of the highest of all chivalry.

Just a parting word more. The Larbert Imbecile Institution will doubtless do its work admirably; and fresh subscriptions are only wanting that the asylum may be increased both in size and importance.

ROBERT GILLESPIE.

A NEW-YEAR'S TALE.

THE town of Trimmington is, as everybody knows well, pleasantly situated on the banks of the Trimming, in Midlandshire; and is not quite so busy a place now as it was fifteen years ago. At that time it was in something after the dawn—say the forenoon—of greatness. The great Land's End & Cape Wrath Junction Railway had got so far and no farther, when the railway crash brought all these unfinished undertakings to a stand-still; and Trimmington was changed, all at once, from a large village to at least a town, which might one day, and that not a very distant one, be a city. Trains came flying into it from the south, with a whistle and an unpleasant odour of the smoking brakes; and poured hundreds of passengers and tons of luggage on the long platforms of one side of the station; while other trains absorbed the hundreds of passengers and tons of luggage on the equally long platforms on the other side; and with a whistle, and the heavy stentorian puffing of the engine, bore them off towards Land's-End, quickening into a rattling pace as they disappeared in the distance, flying along the left bank of the placid Trimming. 'Royal Mails,' and 'Expresses,' and 'Locomotives,' and 'Engineers,' for long distances and short—with two, three, or four horses—with coachmen and guards to go with them, and troops of hostlers and stable-boys to attend to them on their arrival and departure, were continually coming and going, bringing the hundreds of passengers and tons of luggage from Cape Wrath and thereaway; and bearing away to the same northern regions the corresponding hundreds and tons that had come from Land's End. Besides this, all through the night, the whistles came frequent from huge goods trains, rolling ponderously in and out of the ten acres or so that were under iron, and called the goods station, round which great barn-looking sheds had painted on them, in mammoth characters, 'Picklin & Co.' or 'Chapford & Bone,' as they belonged to one or other of these great agents of transportation. In connection with these, hundreds of laden wains, with groaning axles, streamed along the roads that led out of Trimmington—chiefly, of course, on those that went in the direction of Cape Wrath—bearing the products of Cornwall, and, at certain seasons, new potatoes from the Scilly Isles, to the inhabitants of the Hyperborean regions; and bringing oil, and whalebone, and sealskins, and oatmeal, and salt herrings to the southern people. All this great tide of commerce, at the light of which the learned political economists and philanthropists of the day smiled and shed tears—Ja-Kooz yeharuvu, as the Premier said, in his classical oration on the glories of Trimmington, pronounced at the laying the foundation-stone of 'The Land's End and Cape Wrath Railway Company's Mechanics' Institute'—did not pass through that charming town without leaving other symptoms of its transit than the whistles, and dust, and 'ta-ra-ra' of the guard's horn. The Blue Lion had put up a new wing and a new front; and three of the largest houses in the town knocked into one, with newly painted window frames, and new muslin curtains inside the windows, bore in gold letters, on a brilliantly blue signboard, that went the whole length of the nine first-floor windows, and just above them, 'Scratchpole's Railway Hotel,' with elegant flourishes in sweetly flowing curves at either end, in which were snugly ensconced some short sentences, such as 'Wines, Spirits, and Ales,' 'Posting in all its departments,' while a green coach-ladder standing by the door had 'Scratchpole's Ry. H.' in black letters with outline shadows, on each side of it. Besides these establishments, there were numerous minor houses of entertainment—from 'Railway Refreshment-rooms, well-aired beds, Foreign and British spirits and ales, iced lemonade, and ginger beer,' to 'The Magpie, licensed to sell beer, and to be drunk on the premises—good beds.' These, however, from the aristocratic 'Lion' to the humble 'Magpie,' were all doomed to descend yet one step in the scale of hostelric rank, for, along one side of the station rose a forest of tall poles—erst the slender denizens of some overcrowded corner of a Norwegian pinewood—and up among them was hourly growing a vast structure, with numerous cells and long branching passages, and broad stone staircases, the 'Grand Royal Land's End and Cape Wrath Hotel,' building by the directors, to be furnished by the London house of Snailaley & Grigg, and opened at Lady-day by M. Blanderini. All around the town there were similar, but comparatively tiny scaffold forests, where the bankers, merchants, manufacturers, railway officials, &c. &c. of Trimmington were having for their habitation numerous suburban edifices, fitted with all the luxuries that were called for by the usages of modern society, the spirit of the age, and the civilization produced by the transit of oil, whalebone, sealskins, oatmeal, salt herrings; the products of Cornwall; and new potatoes from the Scilly Isles. The market-place, however, was where the greatest change was to be found. Save in one house, no common brick showed its red and vulgar face—all was Portland and paint. The Midlandshire County Bank, the Trimmington & Midlandshire Town and County Bank, and the offices of the Land's End & Cape Wrath Union Banking Co. were as gay and as grand as best medium stone-colour—pilasters, columns, cornices, abaci, ogives, crockets, mullions, tracery, and anything and everything else in the dictionary of architecture could make them. The Weighhouse, which was built by the Lord of Trimmington (temp. Richard I.), had been restored by Pewgynne; a design, by the same Gothic architect, for a Town Hall to match was in the possession of the mayor, having been ordered and paid for by the mayor, aldermen, and councillors of the burgh—the lords of Trimmington (temp. Victoria). The Parish Church remained to all external appearance the same, but internally you beheld the new painted windows of the chancel, where very brown-skinned saints and martyrs and all the apostles, in two rows, were represented as sitting in niches of debased Gothic architecture, clad in gorgeous green or crimson table-covers with gold brocade borders, or in rich printed druggets; while all the window round the niches was filled in with elegant and varied patterns in the floor-cloth style; the whole executed by an artist (?) in the neighbourhood of Cape Wrath. There were chapels of ease and dissenting meeting-houses, in all styles of architecture, from a Roman temple to a miniature Strasbourg Cathedral; and there were parsons, more numerous and more various than the 'sheepfolds,' to be met with at all times and everywhere, but notably in the station refreshment-rooms. Such and so flourishing was Trimmington in 1848. Happy are we to say that we have not to chronicle its decline; but in course of time, when railway matters got better—that is, when the original shareholders who paid for the lines were ruined and got rid of, and they became the property of another lot, who got them on easier terms—the Great Land's End & Cape Wrath Junction Railway went on to its destination, and Trimmington no longer flourished. Even now house rent is cheaper there than in most places in England. Nobody in it remains unchanged but the rector in his surplices, and the saints, martyrs, and apostles in their classical attire. The station hotel has long been closed to the wayfarer, and after standing for a year or two empty, with broken windows, was sold cheap for a jute mill; the 'Blue Lion,' after looking very blue for a time, cut off his wing, and is now going on favourably; 'Scratchpole's' has retired into the former triple privacy of private life; the Portland of the market-place lacks paint; the weighhouse looks as sad as no doubt it looked when John usurped the throne; and the very plan of the new town-hall has gone no one knows whither.

It was getting on to Christmas in '48, when Thomas Augustus Tracy, Esq. one of the employes in the railway office, with one pound a-week and four holidays a-year, found himself very much in love. Though he had red hair, he had not a susceptible heart, and yet he did not feel himself astonished at being in such a predicament—one pound a-week was not much to marry on, especially as Mr. Tracy was a gentleman, and Miss Angela Jemima Bottram was a lady; and the four holidays, though they took nothing off his salary, put nothing on to it—yet Mr. Tracy did not seem to feel that it would be imprudent to marry under the circumstances. Accordingly, Mr. Tracy, when he found himself in love, went regularly in for love, and loved and was loving to the utmost of his lavish or lovable capacity. He met Miss Bottram whenever he could get a chance, walked with her on a Sunday, if she could get the opportunity of walking out—nominally with her chosen friend, Miss Scrimpton—and, in short, to use the language of lovers, 'kept company with her reg'lar.' Besides all this, he poured the tale of his passions and his hopes and his fears into the confidential ear of Miss Scrimpton, till her very ear-rings must have tired of it, though she didn't; for what girl—I beg her pardon, what young lady—would not listen to such music even longer than she would if it were addressed to herself; for she has not to blush, nor answer protestation with protestation, but can amuse herself at her ease, and torment both parties or comfort them as maybe—a recreation that gratifies the finest feline propensities of the female heart.

'La! now Angy,' she would say to Miss Bottram, 'he does love you so, and talk such nonsense about you, you can't think. You should be kinder to him than you are, for, even although he has red hair, I think he's good-hearted.'

Poor Miss Angy, who fancied herself deeply smitten with her adorer, and would have done anything to please him, would cry at this, and say to her friend, 'I'm—sure—Eliza—r—Anne—I never—did—anything—to vex him—that I—know of.' 'Well, dear,' the confidante would reply, 'I know you mean to be kind; but you have naturally a very disagreeable manner, especially at times, and I know he often feels what you say to him. I only warn you, dearest, for your own good, for you know he might be off some day in a pet like Miss Pack's young man.'

She touched up Mr. Tracy, on the other hand, about his personal appearance and his dress, to both of which she said Miss Bottram decidedly objected, though she admired his character and his devotion. Mr. Tracy appeared greatly affected by these announcements, though he afterwards, in his retirement, used to swear at poor Miss B. as 'devilish hard to please.' Still, he spent more money than he should have spent on hair-pommade, waistcoats, and a new set of studs.

The people of Trimmington, in the height of their prosperity, were not, sad to say, exempt from the ordinary lot of mankind. They ate better than most people—taking an average over the whole world; they drank better than most people, and perhaps more, for the corporation gave dinners; but they died just the same as everybody else. The increase of the population, then, produced one great result—an increase in the funerals. The plumes of feathers went more about the streets, with all their accompaniments; the rector's wife was better off for rich black silk dresses than ever; the sexton kept a couple of subs, and devoted himself to getting fat, 'so,' as he facetiously remarked, 'to give them plenty to do when they had his grave to dig;' but nobody profited so much by it as Messrs. Bottram & Stead, auctioneers and undertakers. We have said that one house in the market-place still showed a red brick front, blushing at its own appearance. This was the house of Mr. Bottram, upstairs, and the premises of Messrs. Bottram & Stead on the ground-floor. A few years before they had been carpenters and undertakers, or, more correctly speaking, coffin-makers, as there was little more undertaking in Trimmington in those days than that branch of the profession. As business increased, and civilization required more expensive interment, and allowed better profits on it, they gradually advanced from the workshop in a back street to the house in the market-place—from 'undertakers and carpenters' to 'auctioneers and undertakers.' Mr. Bottram was a tall, bony, gaunt, solemn man, who had made the funeral department, and who looked grief and spoke sorrow in the premises—though it was said that in his own house upstairs he looked and spoke quite differently, and made over the grief and sorrow to his wife and daughter, who were alike in every respect but age—dark, hollow-cheeked, slightly deformed, and generally timid and weak-minded. Mr. Stead was a cheerful man, full of humour, short and stout and fair-haired. In early times, he used to whistle over the coffins, as he put 'the furniture' on; but he now joked at auctions, and looked after the carriage department. He lived with a cheerful wife and a lot of rosy romping children, in the same street where the workshop used to be.

It would not, upon the whole, then, have been so imprudent as it seemed at first sight, were Mr. Tracy to manage to make Miss Bottram Mrs. Thomas Augustus. She was an only child. Her father was rich. Although her mother was an heiress, she had only had £200—that he knew; and although it set up Bottram, who was the son of a beer-shop-keeper, and began his fortunes, yet his father was only a baker. Now, wealthy people and great people—for in such places as Trimmington to be wealthy is to be great—as the Bottrams were, Mr. Tracy, with his pound a-week and four holidays per annum, thought himself quite a match for them; for his father had been what he called a physician—alias, a general practitioner, or surgeon-of-all-work—and his mother, who was still alive, was a clergyman's daughter, an uncommon distinction, to judge by his pride in it. As he used to say to himself, 'If old B. has tin, I have blood; and, damme, if I don't think that a fair bargain.' So he anointed his head to subdue its fire, and became more than ever genteel, and prepossessing in his manners.

It was within a day or so of Christmas, when the course of true love met with a hitch. In Cornwall, near Land's End, the captain of Wheale Misfortune Trehearne would have said that there was a fault in the lode; what they would have said at Cape Wrath we cannot repeat, for they would have said it in Gaelic. An official letter came to 'Mr. T. A. Tracy,' bearing the seal of the G. L. E. & C. W. J. R. Co., and informed him, on his reading it, that after Christmas-day his services were to be transferred to the head-quarters of the said railway company, at an advance of salary of two shillings per week, and with one week's holiday per annum. Gratifying as this intelligence was to Mr. Tracy, it removed him far from the abode of his Angela Jemima—far from his hopes of a snug house and a good allowance from old B., and an easy berth in Messrs. B. & S.'s establishment—for the head-quarters of the company were at Wolverbury, in Southlandshire, about half-way down the existing line, the whole of a hundred miles and more from Trimmington. It was a serious matter; so he wrote a note to his friend, Bob Brown, and despatched it forthwith. It was but a line or two:—'Dear Bob, —Come to my den as soon as you get away from your office, for I want to see you special. Here's a precious go. Yours, Tat.' Mr. Tracy provided a pint of old Tom, and two ounces of shag, and two clean pipes for 'the big talk,' as he called it; and with these adjuncts the momentous question, 'What was to be done?' was duly considered. Mr. Brown was a man of action, and had a strong legislative turn, so he decreed for his friend as follows:—'Now, Tat, look here. This is it, and no mistake. To-morrow's about the last day you have; so to-morrow you ask leave for two hours in the afternoon—seeing that you have such short notice of removal they can't refuse you,—and then you must array yourself in your most gorgeous apparel, and in armour of proof, and having rubbed your face, till it shines yellow, with the largest brass candlestick you can borrow, go off at once to old Bottram, and propose. State your noble—at least, your as-good-as-noble—birth, your professional advancement, the certainty of your being—if you remain with the company—very shortly chairman of the G. L. E. & C. W. R. Co.; and if you do not, the use you could be of to him in a business so congenial to your feelings as his; and that, while you consider yourself as upon the whole getting the worst side of the bargain, still you don't mind marrying his daughter, if he will come down handsome. That's what's to be done, and you must do it. Remember, Tat, "faint heart never won fair lady."'

In compliance with this authoritative advice, Tat next afternoon was taking his way to Mrs. Bottram's, pomatumed to a rich auburn, and arrayed in the utmost magnificence of his wardrobe, bearing not the sceptre of a Homeric monarch, but a short cane, about 18 inches long, with a silver top. His hat was broad in the brim, his satin cravat fell in ample folds, and was secured by a monstrous breast-pin, representing an eagle's claw, holding an orb of fire crystallised into a huge carbuncle;—nobody could tell that the pin was not gold, and the glowing crystal only paste.

We have said that Bottram & Stead's was the only house in the market-place that still remained undecorated in its native brick. Mr. Stead had often tried to get the firm to put on a face more in accordance with the taste of the period, but Mr. Bottram was inexorable. It would not suit the business; it was all very well for Mr. Stead to talk, but he did not understand the susceptibilities of the bereaved; nothing would be more harassing to the feelings of their customers than gay and cheerful-looking premises. His ideas on the subject had lately been somewhat shaken, it is true, by the advent of an opposition firm—that of Diggins & Naylor, from London—who, unable to get premises in the market-place, had set up in Market-street, the next best locality, in a house as gay with varied ornament as plaster could make it, and had yet contrived to get on the right side of a good many—too many, indeed—of the afflicted and forlorn. Bottram & Stead's windows were as smoky as the walls that encased them. In one, two miniature coffin-lids, studded with brass nails and gilt scutcheons were suspended on each side of a sable shield bearing in or the legend 'Funeral Undertaking in all its branches;' while in the other, a similar shield bore 'Bottram & Stead, Auctioneers and sworn Valuers.' Beneath there were dirty brown wire-gauze blinds, and above glimpses of the dingy interior of the premises.

When Mr. Tracy approached, Mr. Bottram, with his hands in his breeches-pocket, was looking out at the door. Tat looked up at the first-floor windows for a glance of his Angela; but that inspiration was denied him. There was no one to be seen. He felt undismayed, but yet not altogether comfortable. He had that undefinable feeling that accompanies the bravest men on marching into action—that fluttering and sinking of the heart without which courage is headstrong rashness, and confidence insolent presumption. He was not an utter stranger to Mr. Bottram, having sometimes met him in society, at the tea-parties of the higher officials of the railways; so he accosted him boldly, bearing in mind Bob's final caution of the night before.

'Good morning, sir,' he said.

'Good morning, Mr. Tracy,' said Mr. B., making way for him when he saw his intention of entering. 'I hope, sir, that no unfortunate event has occasioned the honour of this visit. Should it, alas! be so, permit me to say, Mr. Tracy, that I sympathise with you very deeply. In such distressing changes in our relations with the world, it is our duty, Mr. Tracy, to submit ourselves to the dispensation with hope and resignation.'

This speech was not dictated by the idea that Mr.

snatched the card from Bottram, and read it. 'It's Diggins & Naylor, and not a bad joke neither.' 'Wish you were dead'—to bury you of course. 'New-year's morning! Ha! ha! ha!'

Bottram pushed Mr. Stead into the back shop, out of the way of the outraged captain, and shut the door.

'Excuse me, Captain Mordaunt, but I am sincerely grieved to wait—to be waited on by you on such an unpleasant errand. I assure you that my feelings are harrowed, as they have never before been on a similar, on any, occasion. In such trials as these, which surround our lives, we must always trust—I beg your pardon—we must—I really don't know what we must do. I can only say, sir, that I am as sorry for what has happened as you can be; and if there's anything I can do in the way of my business to oblige you, you may rely, Captain Mordaunt, on my best attention, and more than usual moderation in our charges.'

The Captain, whose temper was nearly as soon down as up, was pacified when he began to comprehend that the affair was a practical joke, not at his, but at Bottram & Stead's expense, and was rather tickled than otherwise at Bottram's idea of satisfaction.

'No; damn it all, Bottram! I hope you'll have nothing to offer me in that line for many a long day; but if I were you, I would thrash Diggins & Naylor, or whoever else did it, to within an inch of their lives.' So saying he departed.

Soon other visitors, though none of them so furious as the Captain, entered, and had to be pacified and sent away. Then notes dropped in, countermmanding orders; and the thing got wind in the town, and a crowd began to gather round the door, shouting 'Bottram & Stead wish you were dead!' The police dispersed the crowd; and an advertisement in the Trimmington paper, and a handbill offering a reward for such information as would lead to the conviction of the offender, put Bottram & Stead to rights with the world, or would have done so had it not been repeated that Stead said that it was Diggins & Naylor. This was too good a chance to be lost, so the newcomers prosecuted the old-established house for defamation, and got heavy damages.

Even yet, occasionally, in the comparatively quiet streets of Trimmington, some mischievous urchin will cry out, at the sight of Bottram—now retired from business—or of Stead—who carries on the firm with his eldest son—'Bottram & Stead wish you were dead!' at which Bottram scowls gloomily, and Stead turns round laughing, and says 'I wish you were;' but to this day nobody has ever found out who perpetrated the practical joke. A TALE OF VIRTUE AND VILLANY, TRIAL AND TRIUMPH,
DESPAIR AND DEATH.

BOOK FIRST.—PART SECOND.

CHAPTER VII. THE SUN KISSES CARRION.

THERE was no mistake about it. When the sun returned on the morrow, it found old Chipps lying stark and dead on the floor, impaled to the boarding by the corkscrew. It did not find the murderers, Duferny and Vavazour, however. It followed them elsewhere. We shall refrain from doing so in the meantime, in order to introduce another character to our readers, who is of infinite importance in this story of virtue and villany, trial and triumph, despair and death.

Up to this point we have allowed the reader to remain in ignorance of the peculiar relationship between Chipps and Pennywhistle. It shall be explained fully at that stage of the story where we introduce the narrative of Abinidab Ephram Chipps.

The house of this eccentric and villanous old miser was divided into two parts. We have seen his own squalid room, and we have witnessed the horrible tragedy enacted therein. We shall now enter the apartments of Evangeline, on the east wing of the second floor. This Evangeline is the daughter of the murdered man lying up-stairs; and aha, poor lady! is sitting at breakfast—or, rather, nibbling gingerly at the toasted cheese and devilled kidneys, broiled bones and fried pigs' ears, which grace the table, occasionally washing it all down with half-pint draughts of an invalid concoction, consisting of Jamaica rum, Irish whiaky, London porter, and Scotch ale, boiled together, and sweetened with molasses. Evangeline is delicate, and tea and coffee excite her nerves.

'Here, Wowfer!' said Evangeline to the footman in attendance, 'put that pot on the fire. I like my mixture red 'ot. Oh dear!'

Wowfer, the footman, put the kettle of liquor on the fire; and when it had got to a boiling pitch, poured out a tumblerful. Evangeline drank it eagerly, with great appearance of relish, and laying it down, cut a slice off one of the pig's ears, and said 'Wowfer, I wonder how dad is!'

'Couldn't take it upon myself to say,' said Wowfer, turning over the leaves of the book.

'What a queer old dad it is, to be sure, Wowfer!'

'It isn't for the likes of me, miss, to hanimadvert on the hactions of my missis' par, though hi am in a manner drorn hout to it; no, miss, I've mixed too much in 'igh society to know better nor that. I should think so, really.'

'Well, but Wowfer,' said Evangeline—flirting with a 'devil,' and at last eating it—'you can't deny that it was a rum start of him to make such a row because I proposed to ride over to Croaswich races, just to see who came in first for the Pennywhistle Cup. I've a good mind to go yet. I could get Bobster, the groom, to saddle Maid Marian, and follow me on Black Diamond. We would be there in a twinkling, and the first race does not commence till two o'clock.'

'It's my opinion, miss,' answered Wowfer, 'that your principal reason for wishing to get to Croaswich races is to see the Marquis; and I may make bold to say that sich also is your par's opinion, and that be objects to a hinterview in the meantime. You're both young and innoerent, and 'ot tempered. You know 'ow the Marquis swears, and 'ow you quarrelled with 'im on that account; and you know, also, there's some rumpus between him and your par, and that things in general aint in sich a state to warrant has immediate haliiance.'

'Oh, Wowfer!' said Evangeline, 'if I was only certain that it would take place sooner or later, how happy I should be! Isn't he a handsome fellow? And think of the glory of being a marchioness!'

Evangeline shut her eyes, and revelled in imagination on a picture of love and ambition.

'Yes, he's rather a 'ansome feller,' said Wowfer; 'and it's rather a henviable position to belong to the haristocracy of the land; but you must know, miss, that your par's immensely wealthy, and that the young feller 'as a great deal to be thankful to 'im, for you know that he was a lost hair; and you know that it was your par 'as got 'im his titles and estates. You know the condition was that he should hally 'imself to you in a connoobial connection; and you know that now wen he is in the position in his 'ome—is 'eart's first 'ome—he has put off the fulfilment of the promise, and that both yourself and your par is naterally cut up about it.'

'I do, Wowfer; I do,' said Evangeline, with the tears in her eyes. 'It's cruel of him—very cruel. I am afraid he seeks a more brilliant alliance—that although his heart may be mine (as he has sworn a hundred times), his hand will be another's. He seeks an alliance among the nobility.'

'Do you know, miss,' said Wowfer, with a strong appearance of mystery, looking round the room as if he had a dim suspicion of somebody lurking under the furniture, and sinking his voice to a whisper, 'do you know, miss, that I have my suspicions?'

'No,' said Evangeline. 'You don't mean to say so?'

'I have said so,' said Wowfer, compressing his lips.

'Indeed!' continued his mistress. 'Suspensions of what?'

'Of your lover, Pennywistle.'

'What about him?'

'Ha!'

'What, Wowfer? Tell me—your indulgent and ill-used mistress.'

'I've a suspicion, then, that he is not the real heir at all.'

'Goodness gracious!'

'My father warn't a Bloomsbury beadle for nothink,' continued Wowfer. 'He couldn't hoooccupy that position thirty year without 'aving a nateral sagacity for prying hout mystery, could he?'

'Certainly not,' answered Evangeline.

'Well, young lady, he couldn't possess a nateral sagacity without leaving some of it to his children.'

'Not a doubt of it. But go on, Wowfer.'

'I flatter myself that of all our family, I was his favourite; and I flatter myself that I inherited more of that nateral sagacity than hall my brothers and sisters together, put in a pot and biled hup.'

'I should think so too.'

'I've mixed a good deal in first-class society. I've served in noble families, where there were secrets worth knowing—sich families as it's 'ard to say whether the young master, with the coarse hands and hugly face, who is in the abit of coming 'ome drunk hevery night, smelling of cigars, and chucking the servant gals hunder the chin, is the young master at all; whether he 'asn't been exchanged at birth; and whether the poetical boy, in buttons—who cleans the knives and answers the door—with the large black heyes (dreadfully like the young lady up stairs) and the delicate blue-veined fingers, is the true heir. Where it's 'ard to say whether the master (maybe a Member of Parliament, or a Lord or a Dook) hasn't been married privately to his washawooman's niece; privately caused her to be pizen; and all the time the young man—a bricklayer—as he heggered on to pizen her, didn't do it at all, she being a relation of his, but quietly took her out of the way for a time, having a grudge against the Dook, or the Lord, or the Member of Parliament's father for a ruinin' of his aunt; and when the young man—the bricklayer—as the Dook, or the Lord, or the Member of Parliament had got transported for summut as he had also heggered 'im on to—returns, w'y the 'ole affair is blowed, and it is diskivered that the drunken hold charwoman as 'ad been in the 'abit of meeting my Lord, or the Dook, or the Member of Parliament privately in the wash-house, and flarin' hup like forked lightning', is nothing more or less than 'is wife, and that my lady hupstairs, wot kerried so 'igh a 'ead, and belonged to the nobility, is no more 'is wife than the cat's meat man is huncle to the Princess Mary of Cambridge! These are the sort of mysteries wot we Lunding suvnts halways keeps a heye on, and they are as plenty as blackberries, I can tell you; not that I 'ave hever come across a thing of the kind myself, but I 'as my suspicion habout certing people of quality. I know wot's wot. I 'avent read the Lunding Journal for nothing, nor the Farthing Flambeau of Fiction, nor Four Times a Fortnight, nor those periodicals wot blow the gaff on those things; but all this ere is hirreverent to the present question. I 'ave, as I stated (and hi am not speaking permiskusly, I can asshaw you), I 'ave a suspicion that Pennywistle haint a marquis at all. Fact is, I 'ad a younger brother—not a full brother, mark you!—my mother foolishly 'aving married again, on my fawther's demising, a certing John Krunkle ('orrid name and orrid man—died at last by kick of a 'oss), and with this Krunkle was brought into hour famly circle his son, halso John by name. This John, junior, was hoooccupied hin a bone-biler's as a scraper, that is soraping the small rags or flutterings of meat that hadere to the bones. As this youth, then, was in some way connected with hour family, it beoved me as the heldest to look hafter 'im, and try to get 'im out of 'is degraded position, and establish 'im in a genteel family w're 'is morals would be hall right, and w're his calves would 'ave a chance of developin themselves by proper nourishment (in which case, I need not mention, a brilliant footcoore was before 'im through my family conneockahun). At a great sacrifice of my dignity, I went and saw this bone-biler, represented the case, and told him I wanted the boy. He informed me, 'owever, that he

'ad a year's engagement, and that he would not part with 'im till the time was hup. It seems that my 'arf brother having been himproperly fed, before 'is father was lucky enough to attract the attention of my mother, 'ad a 'appy nack of cleaning the bones quickly, and filling 'is stomach beside—a great had-vantage hover well-fed boys, I asshaw you. I could not quarrel with 'im on that account; and so Krunkle, junior, remained, and hi wisited 'is guv'nor occasionally, jest to make sure that he was behavin' hall right—for I wasn't going to put 'im into society hunless certain that he was thoroughly respectable in hevery sense of the word. Well, as hi was a sayin', in my perihodical visits to this bone-biler's, I was rayther took by another young scraper, rather holder than Krunkle, junior—white-'aired, Vellington-nosed, and with a slight squint. I have traced this resemblance; and blessed if I don't think—

'What, Wowfer? What, in Heaven's name?'

Wowfer, however, like Hamlet when about to explain the ghost affair to his friends, Horatio and Marcellus, suddenly thought he had gone far enough, and, taking all things into consideration, that he had better keep his own counsel in the meantime; so he answered,

'Blessed if I don't think that it was that there young feller with the squint, the light 'air, and the Vellington nose as heggod on Krunkle, junior, to steal the spoons in his first sitivation, and bring 'imself and me, wot recommended 'im, into discredit.'

'There is something more in this than natural,' thought Evangeline, prudently refraining, however, from questioning Wowfer any more on the subject.

Evangeline was well aware that Pennywhistle had been discovered by her father in some low occupation, unbefitting his aristocratic parentage; but suspicions of the genuineness of his claim to the title had never entered her head till now.

Alas! the suspicions were soon to be confirmed.

'And how has your brother been getting on since, Wowfer?' said Evangeline, evasively.

'Went hall to the bad. Loafed about town after he was liberated from prison. I gave 'im a fit out and money to proceed to Ameriky with. Spent the money, pawned the clothes, and hultimately got transported.'

'Heigh-ho!' sighed Evangeline. 'I wonder if dad is coming to see me this morning. I am determined to hold out. I wont go up to his dirty room; and if he thinks so, he is mistaken.

'Give me that book, Wowfer. I will read. Clear away the things; and tell my maid, Wicketts, to come hither.'

Evangeline lay down on the sofa, and opening the book read the following interesting story.

'THE STORY OF FLAPP FUNGUS FLIPPERTY AND FLIPPERTY FUNGUS FLAPP.

'A TRADITION OF THE SPORTING WORLD.

'On a sultry evening in the month of December, two commercial travellers might have been seen by the waiter (or any person entering their bed-room in the Horned Wolf) engaged industriously shaving their heads by the strong light of the sun, which entered at the second-floor window; and, bestowing a passing glance at the somnolent figures of our heroes, exited by the door. The eldest of the travellers, who was considerably younger than his companion, was the first to break the silence into six parts, and immediately throwing the fragments over the window, burst into tears. His remains were carefully picked up by his companion, who deposited them in a leather carpet-bag, and retiring himself into the inside of the bag, locked it on the outside, and hung the key on a jet of water which leaped up through the floor. After they had occupied themselves in this manner for about a month or six weeks, a stern scowl was seen to pass over the face of the youngest by a large crowd of Japanese ambassadors, who were sitting on the railings outside, swallowing oysters, and aiming the shells at a haggard figure standing on a school-boy's slata. The figure was a five, and there is every reason to believe (considering the circumstances of the case) that if any passing wayfarer had been at the trouble of walking up and adding a six, the combined figures would have represented fifty-six. As no one was disinterested enough to do so, an athletic agricultural labourer in the twinkling of an eye seized the scowl from the youngest of the travellers, and reciting the first six books of Euclid, walked quietly off—making the deserted streets ring with the sound of his breathing, and the immense crowds, who rendered the way almost impassable, to vanish in affright; and, like the baseless fabric of a vision, leave not a rap behind them to pay the expenses which is usual in such cases.

'Any schoolboy, with the slightest pretensions to intellect, as the intelligent reader is aware, would have divined at once that the two travellers could be no others than the eminent personages—Flipperty Fungus Flapp, and his cherished companion in legs, Flapp Fungus Flipperty. It is not necessary, however, for the development of our story, that we should explain to the intelligent reader the phenomenon of the activity of the will amid motive influence; and we need hardly mention that such an intention never for a moment entered into our head. We shall accordingly take up the thread of our narrative, in

'CHAPTER II.

'With the intention of bringing up their son for the bar, the parents of Flapp Fungus Flipperty apprenticed him, early in life, to a tavern-keeper in the Euston-road—where his genius for collecting old coins from the till, and consuming large quantities of ardent spirits, developed themselves so quickly, that it was not long till the attention of Government was directed to his commendable efforts, and he was accordingly induced to appear at the position which his parents coveted so strongly for him, viz. the bar of his country. His debut there was of so promising a nature, that he immediately received an official appointment at Millbank Palace, where he spent five years of his life acquiring the art of oakum manufacturing, and receiving the best muscular training which the Government of this or any other country could afford. His daily exercise on the mill had the effect of bracing the muscles of his legs to such a degree, that he embraced an opportunity, at the expiry of three years, and knowing the value at which his services were held by the Government, and the affectionate efforts which would be made to induce him to remain, he quietly gave them leg-bail for his re-appearance, and was seen no more.

"Flapp Fungus Flipperty has sloped," said the warder of the Tower.

"You don't say so," said the junior warder; and both, with the tears swimming in their eyes, divested themselves of part of their habiliments, and putting themselves into a pugilistic attitude, commenced a tour of the provinces in a round of their favourite characters.

CHAPTER III.

'The great race was to come off at the Green Man, Hackney Wick.

'We have mentioned that Flapp Fungus Flipperty, after his escape, had entered himself as a racing man; but we did not mention that he had prudently changed his name to Flipp Flapp Flop. Such was the case; and his opponent was no other than the celebrated Flipperty Fungus Flapp.

'We did not mention that the latter gentleman was the eldest son of the warder of the Tower. Such was the case, however. He did not expect that his rival was no other than the escaped prisoner, Flapp Fungus Flipperty.

'All the sporting world were there; and all the sporting world pinned their faith on Flipperty Fungus Flapp, and treated the attempt of Flipp Flapp Flop to race against him as the extreme height of absurdity.

'The two men are at the scratch.

'They are off!

'All the sporting world who had pinned their faith on Flapperty Fungus Flapp soon discover their mistake, and tremble for the cash which they have laid on him.

'Flipp Flapp Flop is soon discovered to be the best man.

'The race is hotly contested, however.

'They are at the second last lap.

'Flipperty Fungus Flapp is in despair, and lost in amazement.

"There is only one man that can beat me in Europe, and that man has been exercised three years on the mill. That man is Flapp Fungus Flipperty. Great heavens! Flipp Flapp Flop is no other than Flapp Fungus Flipperty. There is a hundred pounds offered for his capture. I must catch him and gain the money. Those are his legs which I see before me. I'll swear it."

As soon as Flipperty Fungus Flapp makes this discovery he cannot help shouting out, as he hears his opponent, "Ah ha! I know you now. You are not Flipp Flapp Flop, but Flapp Fungus Flipperty. I'll catch you yet." He puts on a spurt.

'Flipp Flapp Flop hears the dreaded accents of the son of the warder of the Tower. The tread-mill and oakum-picking rise up before his eyes. He feels his legs giving way. By the time he makes another round of the lap he will be caught. He makes up his mind on the instant, and, to the astonishment of all the sporting world, vaults over the wicket, through the bar of the Green Man (to the astonishment of the landlord, landlady, and the customers at the bar), and out into the fields in the direction of Bow.

'With a yell of baffled rage, and to the further astonishment of all the sporting world, Flipperty Fungus Flapp follows him.

'They can be seen vanishing in the distance. The sporting world look curiously at each other, and put the query, "Wot's hup, in the name of all that's rummy?"

'That question was never answered, and never will be answered till the crack of doom.

'Neither Flapp Fungus Flipperty nor Flipperty Fungus Flapp were ever again seen in the flesh.

'Once a year, however, about midnight, the inhabitants of Hackney Wick are startled by loud yells and shrieks, and the dull pattering of feet on the high road. When the windows are opened, and the inhabitants look out, they see two transparent figures dashing past in a halo of blue fire—the pursuer and the pursued.

'The figures are the ghosts of Flapp Fungus Flipperty and Flipperty Fungus Flapp alias Flipp Flapp Flop.'

Evangeline was moved to tears at this pathetic story. Her heart was softened to her father through its influence. She shut the book, rose, and proceeded up stairs. 'I shall go up and see dad,' she said.

Alas! poor lady.

She traversed a corridor which led to her father's part of the building, and reached the stair which conducted to his room. The door was shut. With a strange presentiment of evil she opened it and passed in. She ran against a figure, which was evidently trying to pass out. She knew by the shock that it could not be her father. It might be a thief. Evangeline was a woman of strong nerves. She slammed the door, and stood face to face with the intruder.

'Alfred! you here!'

'Evangeline! Great heavens!'

It was the Marquis of Pennywhistle who confronted her. There was a gash of blood on his face. There was blood on his hands. He had neither coat nor vest on. His shirt collar was unbuttoned; his face was pale and haggard; his eyes stood in their sockets; the clammy sweat was on his brow; his lips were blue, and his teeth chattered like a person in extreme cold. His left hand clutched a parchment, which he tried to conceal in his breast on Evangeline's appearance. He was unsuccessful.

'Let me pass, Evangeline,' said the Marquis.

Evangeline saw that she was more than a match for the scared owl-like-looking figure. She drew herself up to her full height, and with a flash of contempt and scorn on her face said, ironically,

'No, most noble the Marquis of Pennywhistle, you shall not pass. Give me that paper which you hold in your left hand.'

The Marquis obeyed mechanically.

'What do you here? There is blood upon you! Where is my father? Great God!' (a horrible fear crept into Evangeline's blood, and nearly froze her with terror) 'you have not murdered him? Say you have not murdered him, and I will forgive all you have done to me.'

The Marquis spoke not, and seemed rooted to the ground. Pale as death he stood before her, but spoke not. By a horrid impulse, which he could not account for himself, he turned round and pointed to the corner of the room. Evangeline threw open the shutter, and the sun kissed the carrion flesh of old Chippe, who lay in a clotted pool of blood on the floor.

Still the Marquis spoke not.

Evangeline was petrified for a moment; only for a moment, however. She loved her father, and she had her father's temperament.

Vengeance!

The Marquis, now fully awakened to the sickening danger of his situation, was about to fly.

Fool! She was a maniac in her rage.

'No,' she shrieked out hoarsely. 'No, Marquis of Pennywhistle, you don't go. Ha, ha! I see your handywork, and it behoves me to avenge it.'

She flew upon him like a tigress, tearing and biting at him like a mad wolf, and shrieking at the top of her husky voice, 'Murder! murder! help! help! help! My father lies dead on the floor, and his murderer is here.'

She still struggled, and bit and tore him. She was an avenging fury; and her shrieks startled the echoes of the streets of Dubdub. In a few minutes, a crowd dashed into the room, headed by Wowfer the footman and Wicketts the maid.

'Murder! I tell you, fools! idiots! dolts! Murder! but I will revenge it. Don't take him from me. I'll revenge his death. Who has a better right than his daughter? Murder! murder!'

Pennywhistle was like a rat in the clutches of a ferret; but in a minute he was forcibly released by the crowd.

'I give him in charge, for the murder of my father,' said Evangeline; 'and I will follow to see that he is properly secured. Look! that's his work. Oh my head and my heart! they will break.'

The crowd looked, and saw Chippe impaled to the boarding by the corkscrew, and a red, gaping wound all round his neck. They tried to lift him, and his head rolled on the floor!

Evangeline, with a sound like lead, fell beside the trunk. She had fainted away.

Pennywhistle spoke not a word; and he was dragged off to prison, on a charge of murder.

(END OF BOOK THE FIRST.)

THE SURPRISE.

I sought my lady in a pleasant garden
Where I had left her but an hour before;
I sought her that she might grant me sweet pardon
For words of mine that wounded her full sore:

For words that my heart with a wild love laden
Had prompted me to whisper in her ears—
That plunged in cruel blushes the coy maiden,
And drew from those bright eyes a flood of tears.

I hop'd and fear'd, I wish'd, believed, and doubted:
Oh how I loved her!—could she love me so?
Now I was woeful, now my glad heart flouted
At all forebodings of the sad word No.

An hour ago I had from her been driven

By the mute eloquence of streaming eyes:

I came again that I might be forgiven,

To hear my doom, or bear away my prize!

And thus I found her: in an arbour hid

And serenaded by the amorous trees;

Her raven hair hung loosely ringleted,

And play'd on her white throat with every breeze.

Her eyes were cast down as in serious thought,

While on her lips a faint smile seem'd to play;

Her cheeks, tinged with a blush those musings brought,

Upheld two tear-drops that like twin-pears lay!

She held a volume in her lily hands;

And while I gazed, she read in gentle tone,

As one who reads and fully understands,

Because the thoughts are echoes of his own.

She saw nor heard me, and I listen'd long

To this sweet tale—the tale of her own heart,

Whose plaintive cadences—such power hath song—

Caused sympathetic tears again to start.

Once did I hear her murmuring my name,

And then another page she softly read;

My heart was burning with a stifled flame,

As thus her thoughts unconsciously she said.

It was a story of a love-sick girl

Sighing in absence of her heart's own chosen:

Her father was a rough, unfeeling churl,

Whose heart unto her lover's suit was frozen.

And she bewail'd this lover all the day

In those sweet numbers that my love was reading:

Oh how my fears and doubtings fled away,

As for me thus I heard her own voice pleading!

The lady of the tale oft draped her woe

In all the flowery figures of the East;

And sure my lady's tones, so soft and low,

Of this hid meaning told me not the least.

'Oh,' thus she sang, and thus my lady spake,

'He whom I love is as the sun to me:

He is not here, and now my heart will break,

And when he comes I shall no longer be!

'When he is by, all things are fair and bright

With all the love that issues from his eyes;

When he is gone, I dwell in darkest night—

I do not live—I breathe, and breathe but sighs!'

And then my lady sigh'd in sympathy.

Oh sweet, sweet sigh that told so sweet a tale!

And then she turn'd her lustrous looks—on me,

The while her conscious cheeks grew guilty pale.

But I was happy; and my arms I flung

Around her, scorning all my former fears;

And while to me half-fearfully she clung,

I kiss'd away the yet remaining tears.

And thus excused myself—'Dear love of mine!

As but this morn the sun from off this rose

Kiss'd the soft dew so soon as he did shine,

So suffer me—and your tale fitly close!'

Then tremblingly she raised her gracious eyes,

And perfect pardon I saw beaming there.

Oh, I shall ever bless the sweet surprise

That shov'd and gave to me a heart so fair!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

May 18, 1836.

WHEN George read Aunt Anbrey's letter last night, he was not nearly so excited about it as I had expected. He only said—'Poor Mrs. Falconer! It is well she found so kind a friend in her need. And I daresay the boy is a nice little fellow enough, and will be a great amusement to her.'

With this he passed on to another matter, in which his mind was far more concerned. It seems that Mr. Locke was considerably surprised when he heard that my money (I mean Mr. Grey's money) had been lying all this while at mere bank interest, and has suggested an excellent investment for it. So George has been laying the whole case before me, 'to get my consent,' as he says, 'to the measure.' I told him I should like to act as he thought best; though I could not help adding, (feeling, as I do—shall I call it?—prejudiced against his partner,) 'Only be very sure, George, that Mr. Locke's advice is good and true. For somehow, though I daresay he is very superior, I should not like to trust him overmuch.' He smiled in a way I never saw him do before, and the language of that smile was as plain to me as if he had spoken the words,—You do not in the least understand Mr. Locke. He has an intellect and a knowledge, of whose extraordinary metal your woman's wit can form no conception. That man could govern a nation, and do his work nobly, and carry himself erect and strong, as though he bore but a feather's weight. Oh a most rare capacity! And yet here is a weak girl that doubts his ability to execute a small commission! After the smile, came the following, in good audible tones:—

'My own dear little Kate! there are far cleverer men in the world than are dreamed of in your philosophy, and my partner is one of them. So, with your approval, my love, we shall take his advice about this money.'

'Stay, George!' I cried, roused by some secret impulse for which I could in nowise account. 'Is there no chance we may require the money quickly, in an unforeseen emergency? And then—if it were not available? You know it came to me in rather a singular manner; and I can't help looking upon it even yet more in the light of trust funds than as really and indisputably my own. Circumstances may transpire that would cause me much misery if I could not lay my hand upon that money at a short notice. I might want it in a moment, if anything happened. You can guess what I mean. Now, George, do not laugh at me. But say you will wait just a little while before you make this proposed investment. For, since the idea has struck me, I scarce think I should sleep at night, George, if I knew that the funds were beyond my reach.'

Here I paused. I had been speaking very earnestly, and I felt that my husband had been closely following the track of my hypothesis. He did not laugh. His kind nature forbade him to ignore my feelings. He took my hand:—

'I see, darling, the old fancy is strong upon your heart just at present. But it will pass away. Till then, I shall do nothing in this matter. You are a sweet soul, Kate—though you are a shade too imaginative for this working world. After all, it is a failing that leans to virtue's side. I detest your altogether practical women. They are no better than cabbages. But you are a rose, Kate—a delightful fragrant rose, half-blown, and minus the thorns.'

'But what of Mr. Halliday's noose, George, into which I am yet to bring your head?'

'Oh! that is his pleasant bit of fiction,' quoth he. 'If you will have your notions, others may have theirs too.'

'And pray, George, what may be your particular private fancy about anything in the future time?'

'Very ancient and fish-like fancies are mine; very old fashioned and commonplace,' he answered. 'One romancer in the house is quite enough. So, go on dreaming, Kate; but do not ask me to dream along with you, for my talent does not lie that way.'

And so ended our little parley.

Mem.—Most persons overrate their own qualities. George decidedly errs the other way. How can he call his ideas commonplace, when he has such an entire appreciation of poetry, for instance? And as to romance, I am sure his overweening admiration of that dry discordant Mr. Locke is the most romantic thing possible. Now, none but imaginative minds ever set up these idols of perfection; therefore, George's notions cannot be 'fish-like,' but quick and sparkling; and so he under-estimates himself entirely. But as for this hero-worship of his partner, I do feel inclined to cry out, 'Take any shape but that!' while I pray earnestly he may never be led into any mischief thereby. I must say Mr. Locke puzzles me. And though, at times, my suspicions of him appear hardly fair, yet I cannot quite throw them off. Again I fall a-thinking.

I can never understand the right which some people assume to be disagreeable, and how readily the right seems conceded to them in certain quarters. We have all met with persons so blunt in manner and repulsive of aspect, that our first impulse was to turn away from them in distaste. Their looks were hard and cold, their words few and stern, and their only talent appeared to lie in saying offensive things. Instinctively we shrank from their contact; the world was wide, and the influence of companionship was much. Why should we pluck the sour unripe fruit, when the sweet and mellow was within our reach? So we have argued, and do argue truly, as often as our path is crossed by any of these bears of society,—when lo! some ingenious friend, to whom we confide our opinion, arrests us by the startling intelligence that the persons in question are of remarkable sincerity and real worth—that there are sterling qualities hid beneath that rough exterior, that their shrewdness is marvellous, that their integrity is unimpeachable, that they never utter a syllable except what may be firmly trusted—that a smooth bearing may be all very pleasant, but surely gold is preferable to tinsel; with a great deal more to the same purpose. Now, while it may be all quite correct (and we are glad to hear it) that these unmannerly people are immensely better than they seem, is it therefore defensible that, pluming themselves on their secret excellence, they should be therefore licensed to expose a harsh and forbidding surface to the outer world? Because there are well-bred rogues and sleek-tongued hypocrites abroad, must honesty take refuge in unblushing rudeness? Nay, further, must we be expected to regard virtue as tenfold more estimable when exhibited under a shaggy rather than a silken coat? I confess myself at a loss to perceive the justice of the argument. And yet, what is George doing by his partner but this very thing? I can only hope that as the external offensiveness is so apparent, the supposed good qualities may for certain lie hidden underneath.

July 4, 1836.

George set off this morning on a second summons to the Grove. The letter was from the butler, who stated that his master was very low, and moaning incessantly; that he 'must die now, and no will made out!' Taking warning by his last visit, and fearful lest the starvation system might be still in vogue at Mr. Halliday's, I took the precaution to pop a cold roast fowl, cut into nice handy bits, along with some-boiled bacon, into George's bag, not saying a word to him about it, however, till he was just going to start, when I whispered him gaily, 'You shall not want for supper this time, George.' I expected, of course, that my words would be quite enigmatical, and that I should have enjoyed his surprise thereat. But he only smiled, and glanced at his valise, as if he knew the whole matter already!

How is it that I never can play off any innocent little ruse upon my husband, but that everything I do or intend is patent to him ere I have given him even a hint of it? He was not in the room when I stored away that provender for his behoof, neither did he open his bag afterwards. And yet he answered me, quite alily, 'Thank you, Kate. A rare good angel, indeed—considerate for the body as well as the soul.' No wonder people say that women cannot keep secrets. For no woman can get hold of a secret to keep, with these lords of creation perpetually watching over us with their lynx eyes. For my part, though I should like exceedingly to have un petit mystere, just to lead my husband into a delightful astonishment, I do not see how I could possibly manage it. He would divine the whole plot from the commencement, and be quite au fait to the dénouement before I knew it myself. So my poor secret would turn out only a wretched bungle.

Every day I am looking for Aunt Aubrey home, and most impatient I feel to see her child-companion. I know she will not be long at Woodburn ere she finds her way hither. Hark! the door-bell rings—the post-boy is always peremptory. How slow and cool these servants are!

Enter Grace with a letter, which she hands to me primly on a tiny salver. I take it up quietly and decorously, though I perceive at a glance that it comes from my aunt, and my heart is palpitating at double-quick time. I open it hastily. Yes; she—they are arrived, slightly fatigued with the journey, but that is all; and she begs of George and me to come over to Woodburn as soon as possible. She has got 'something very pretty to show us.' No doubt she means the boy. Shall I go at once, or wait for George? Who knows how long that may be? Mr. Halliday is so whimsical—time and place have no consideration in aught relating to him. George may return immediately, or not for a week. I cannot delay. I will start off to-morrow morning, and take Charlotte with me. If my husband comes in my absence, he can follow us. Dear, sweet Charlotte! she is looking so beautiful, my aunt will be enchanted with her.

Mem.—I have heard say, that as a picture without shadows, so were a life without crosses. As with a character, so with a landscape—contrasts are needful to bring out the salient points. The sunshine flooding the valley is rendered tenfold more brilliant for the deep shade of the mountain falling on the lake; and the smile that sparkles in the eye to-day, shows a thousand times lovelier for the tear that dimmed it yesterday. Why do I write in this strain just at present? Because my whole heart is steeped in thankfulness that the evil I so much dreaded is now, to all appearance, being warded off. One cloud that was dark on my soul is gone, and the light breaks forth with redoubled splendour. Our excellent Dr. Armstrong has told me this very evening, he believes most decidedly that no permanent mark will remain on Charlotte's eyebrow from that distressing accident in April last. Indeed, it is hardly perceptible even now, except on close observation; and this assurance, coupled with the glad news of our aunt's safe arrival (and with that delightful boy!), has made all my pulses tingle in a way they never could have done but for the previous discipline.

July 6, 1836.

I have just returned from Woodburn. What an interesting visit! Mrs. Aubrey having caught the sound of wheels, and guessing who might be her visitor, was standing in the porch when the carriage drove up, and by her side the stranger youth. On my alighting, with all convenient speed, to meet her, she held out her arms with an unaffected cordiality that had no affinity with the world's stereotyped proprieties; and when she did release me from her embrace in her own benign and graceful fashion, I lost no time in giving the same kind welcome to the bright child who stood there, the silent witness of our greeting. Without uttering a syllable, I made haste to strain him at once to my mother's heart. What an eye the boy has! and what a mine of quick intelligence and earnest feeling scintillates forth in his whole bearing!

Meanwhile, Martha had lifted her charge very daintily out of the vehicle; and while my aunt was making Charlotte's acquaintance with kisses, and was carrying her off in triumph from the maid into the house, I followed them, taking Louis by the hand. He looked radiantly happy, though slightly surprised. I said to him, gaily—

'You do not know me, but I know you, and I am right glad to see you here, mon cher.' His glance flashed up to mine; he had been looking on the ground before, with a touch of modest confusion that immensely became him.

'Oh! but I think I know you too,' he answered, with a sort of subdued exhilaration. 'You are Madame Weston, are you not?' I nodded. 'Oh! then, I know you.'

'We are old friends,' I rejoined; 'for I have loved you a long while, mon capitaine.'

Thus talking, we entered the dining-room, where the most beautiful scene of all remained to be performed. I saw that the boy's attention had been greatly arrested by the appearance of my baby. Now, though she is not particularly shy of strangers—thanks to Martha's judicious treatment—(by-the-by, her excessive devotion both to me and the child ever since that dreadful day are beyond all praise, and has fairly won my heart, whence I conclude that kindness is the great attraction of a servant to a mistress)—yet, she did begin to rebel just a little at my aunt's caresses, and to look beseechingly at me and at her nurse, and also with open gaze, yet by no means frightened, at Louis. Seeing this, he made bold to approach her, and by that silent freemasonry best understood by those who practise it most—the fresh guileless flowers of our humanity—his hand playfully extended, and the sweet smile that accompanied it were not long of eliciting an impulsive response. Charlotte actually held out her hands to him, and laughed and chattered in his face! Indeed, it was as fairly a case of love at first sight as could be put on record. And when the climax came, I never wished so much for the painter's art, that so I might have fixed the picture on the ready canvas. Within a quarter of an hour of their self-introduction (as I must call it), behold mon capitaine in his new rôle of la bonne exemplaire, seated on a low ottoman, holding my pet on his knees as firmly and safely, and yet as gently and fondly, as any old gouvernante in the three kingdoms! It was just about as pretty a sight as we could see in this prosy world. There was my own darling, with her superb blue orbs and silken hair of the angel gold, twisting and twining her waxen fingers among the raven curls of her boy keeper, while he seemed literally to feast his ardent nature in the proud consciousness of her preference. The sounds which testified to Charlotte's gladness could never find a local habitation upon paper, any more than I could set down the notes of the wild bird in the wood, or the music murmurs of the summer sea. Louis drew the small golden head devoutly to his breast, and kissed the downy wavelets with a tender meaning in every lineament of his russet countenance, while he apostrophised his charge in some such quaint words as these:—

'Ah! mais c'est une belle tête, bien aimée. There is nothing so pretty in Nice as you, mon enfant—no, not in all France! Dites moi vraiment, will you be my sister, ma tourterelle, and let me love you à jamais'

Charlotte's reply to this appeal was characteristic of young ladies of her age and idiosyncrasy—she gave a joyous bounce on her guardian's knee (the possibly injurious effects of which action he adroitly parried), and then with a ringing laugh tweaked his nose, and screamed hilarious defiance. My aunt looked alternately at me and at the children. Her soft gray eyes spoke volumes of calm satisfaction. She beckoned me apart, and whispered me significantly:—

'Katherine, your baby girl is a very jewel, but I think I have matched her with my soldier boy.'

I did not speak—my heart was busy. How different was the condition of Louis from that of Charlotte!—he, motherless, perhaps fatherless too, or worse; she, with parents devoted to her well-being, a lovely bud of promise in a well-watered garden.

Oh, beautiful childhood! as the stars are to the firmament, as the flowers are to the earth, so are your light and fragrance to the hearts that rear and tend you. The wisdom of ages has no grander boast than to return to your untutored simplicity. A childlike spirit is the highest type of man; it is the key of entrance into the better land.

A thought has just struck me;—can it possibly account for my Charlotte's taking so readily to this boy? I have discovered in him a striking resemblance to the portrait of young Stephen Grey, which I took from the oak chest. Now, my darling has been long familiar with this portrait. Might she not fancy Louis to be the original? For my part, I deem the likeness unmistakable. My aunt comes to-morrow. I shall hear her impression of it.

July 8, 1836.

George is come home, and still no settlement made. Mr. Halliday found himself better; and he and my husband continue good friends, notwithstanding his many cross ways. It seems the old gentleman grows more chatty on acquaintance, and takes amazing interest in the story of little Louis, whom George chanced to mention. Mr. Halliday wishes him to be brought to the Grove, that he may see him. Will anything come of this, and what?

Our aunt and her protégé are here; and I have shown her the water-colour drawing of Stephen Grey 'at the age of seven years.'

The moment she set eyes upon it, she exclaimed, 'Katherine! how did you come by this portrait of my boy?'

Then it is no mere fancy of mine—and there is really a close similarity between the two. This sets me a-thinking.

LITERARY CRITICISM.

BY HERBERT GRAHAM.

'Give me your severest remarks. . . . Every coof (block-head) may say a thing is capital, beautiful, &c.; but I'd rather have the candid criticism of a man of taste than the incense of ten thousand fools.'—Tannahill

THERE can be little or no doubt that criticism, when fair and unbiassed, has a genial and purifying influence upon literature. Doubtless every author has a high opinion of his own productions, but it is not the author's opinion which decides their fate. The literary taste of the public is to a very great extent ruled by the praise or dispraise of the press. The power of which the press is thus possessed is very high. That it is wielded on the whole with a pretty even-handed justice is undeniable, but it is by no means so perfect as it might and ought to be. Various reasons could perhaps be stated for the misdirection of this power on the part of the public journals, but there is no reason which can serve as an excuse, however weighty or plausible it may seem. The profession of literature, in all its branches, has a sacred office to fulfil, and by no means the least important or the least influential branch of the profession is that of the critic. He is possessed of the power, if he has the inclination, to praise or condemn, irrespective of the real merits of the work upon which he sits in judgment. But harshness upon his part is a wanton exercise of his power, for though it may be his duty at times to pronounce an unfavourable criticism, it is not, and never can be, his duty to do this in a harsh and unfeeling spirit. I am well aware that the critic's task is one very trying to the temper; but the man who has not a perfect control over himself is not the proper person to direct or influence the public taste. The display of temper on the part of a critic is a sure sign that, however competent he may be to form an authoritative opinion, he is not a person competent to express that opinion, in the pages of a journal which is looked up to as a guide and director in matters of public importance. It is perfectly possible to condemn a work without a display of harshness. An opinion the reverse of favourable may be expressed in such a manner that even the most fastidious in this respect must fail to take offence; but when the critic pours out the full venom of his sting, regardless of everything but condemnation, and the desire to show up every little fault of the author whose work he reviews, he is guilty of an abuse of the great trust which is committed to him—an abuse which, in its turn, cannot be too severely censured. Although a volume may be very weak and trashy, this should not be permitted to call forth the ire of the reviewer. If bad, it is unnecessary that the critic should be venomous, for 'bad books die rapidly enough without the executioner.' By all means let him condemn; but let his condemnation be so expressed that it will bear on its surface the marks of 'candid criticism,' uninfluenced by any mean desire, and not the marks of bitter malevolence.

But it is not alone of unnecessary harshness that literary criticism stands accused. There is another, although perhaps not so condemnable a fault of which it is sometimes guilty. The office of the critic is often abused in the holding up as worthy of all praise books which in themselves are weak and frivolous, but which, through friendship with the author, connection with the firm by which it is published, or some other cause, the critic considers himself in a manner bound to praise. True criticism should be uninfluenced by any motive other than a desire to express an unbiassed opinion of the merits or demerits of the works reviewed; and when the critic steps aside from this, in how ever so small a degree, he is abusing the power of which he is possessed. It matters not whether the critic praise or condemn, if his review be not the expression of a fair and unbiassed opinion, formed from a careful perusal of the work under notice, it is a misdirection of truth and candour, and is deserving of severe reprobation. There can be no excuse that the failure to favour a book published by a firm with which the critic is connected, or with the author of which he is on terms of friendship, would be productive of serious consequences to the reviewer, for these considerations must sink into insignificance before the calls of duty; and the man who is under this influence is not the person upon whom should be conferred the critic's power. But even were it otherwise, if no other alternative is open to him, it is easy to abstain from reviewing a work, an unfavourable criticism of which would entail upon the critic consequences of a serious nature. It is truly a pitiful and contemptible spirit which prompts a man, harshly and unfeelingly to condemn a work because it is published by a firm which is a rival of his employers; and it is equally pitiful and contemptible when the critic lauds a work because it is published by his employers. And yet instances of this kind are by no means uncommon. Many of the leading journals and magazines are connected with publishing firms, and it is remarkable that almost the whole of the publications of these firms, brought under review in the pages of their respective journals and magazines, are praised in scarcely measured terms.

By the proprietors of many public journals the criticism of current literature is deemed rather an unimportant department; and, holding such an opinion, they do not pay very particular attention to the persons by whom and the manner in which their reviews are written. I am aware that this statement has little or no application to the leading and most influential journals and magazines. But, then, all journals and magazines are not leading ones, although they each, to some extent, direct the taste of their respective readers. Everybody does not read the Times, or the Daily News, or the Saturday Review, or Blackwood; but almost everybody reads a paper or periodical of some kind or other, and newspapers and periodicals now-a-days, even of very slightly elevated pretensions, do not altogether neglect criticising the current literature. New books are reviewed in nearly all of them, with more or less ability. But even among many of the higher class newspapers and periodicals, that attention is not always given to literary criticism which the subject demands. In many newspapers and periodicals, the reviewer's task is performed by a single individual, or at most two or three, who unhesitatingly undertake the criticism of books on all subjects—science, art, history, poetry, fiction, &c. It is really amusing to read some of these criticisms. To-day Jones, the solitary hack—whose education was of the most meagre description, and confined solely to the three elementary branches—is drawing over the coals Flibbertygibbet Howlaway, the eminent sensation novelist, for his latest production, entitled 'The Midnight Prowler; or the Resuscitated Regicide.' Next week he will pick holes in 'The History of Man during the pre-Adamite Ages,' if such a work should be issued from the press. He it was who criticised, inter alia, 'Darwin's Hypothesis,' 'Essays and Reviews,' and the Bishop of Natal's 'Pentateuch,' for the especial delectation of the worthy people of Muttonhole, who read the Weekly Thunderbolt. And, after all, why not? Is there not many a Jones among the superfine reviewers and Saturday slashers, who hesitate not to criticise volumes which they have never read, or which, if they have read, they have failed to understand? There is a mystery in these things; but it is not the first time that slashing criticisms have appeared in leading journals, the writer of which has read only as much of the books he reviewed as would suffice for a quotation or two. Such doings as these it is which bring criticism into contempt. Much better would it be if the book were never reviewed at all, than that it should be reviewed by a person possessed of no knowledge whatever of the subject with which it deals. The criticism may appear to display a considerable amount of learning upon the part of its author; but this only to people who themselves know nothing of the subject treated of in the work reviewed. To others the reviewer's ignorance will be apparent; consequently, the character of the paper in which the criticism appears will suffer. As to the practice—which is said to be rather common than otherwise—of reviewing books which the critic has never read, the man who can so lower himself in his own estimation as to be guilty of its commission, and the newspaper proprietors and editors who are aware of this, and continue to employ such men, are alike unworthy even of contempt.

There is still another cause for the misdirection of criticism which is perhaps more influential than any other—political bias. But the other day I read two criticisms of a number of the 'Quarterly Review,' which, as almost everybody knows, is a Tory organ. One of these criticisms appeared in a leading Tory, and the other in a leading Whig journal. In the former, almost every article was highly praised; while in the latter, with, if I remember aright, only two exceptions, every article was cut up in a style worthy even of the Saturday Slasher. I had not read the articles myself; but it was quite apparent that political bias had dictated one or other or both of the criticisms. What in the Tory journal was highly praised was in the Whig journal condemned as worthless trash. Each of these journals pretends to excellence in all departments, that of literary criticism included; and each of them, when political bias is not at work, has really, on the whole, very able criticisms. But as it was a Tory organ which was under review, doubtless the Tory reviewer considered it his duty to proclaim its excellence; while the Whig reviewer, actuated likewise by a sense of duty, considered himself bound to 'cut up' in really beautiful style. Both criticisms displayed first-rate ability; but it was apparent that the author of one or other or both of them was blinded to the real merits of the work by political prejudice. This is but one instance out of many which could be cited. Take the literary production of any man of eminence in the political world, and you will find that in almost every instance the criticisms upon it are favourable or the reverse, according to the shade of political opinion held by the respective reviewers, or rather by the journals in the pages of which the criticisms appear. Doubtless it may be said that each must stick to his party, but I do not think that this is a valid reason. Literary criticism should be above all party influences whatever; and if it is to hold that place in letters to which it is fully entitled, it must be fair and candid—resting its judgment solely upon the books themselves, and not upon the party connections of the author. It is not the author but the book which it is the reviewer's duty to criticise. The book, and the book alone, is what he has to deal with.

Literary criticism is often spoken of sneeringly; and, when a book is condemned, it is said that the critic should himself try his hand at the authorship of a work similar to that which he reviews, and he would then be better able to form an opinion on its real merits. This I consider to be only so much gammon; for authors are not, and never have been, by any means the most able critics. True, cases might be cited in which authors have made good critics; but these cases, I fear, are vastly in the minority, and are only exceptions to the general rule. I do not think that Mr. Wilkie Collins would write a very fair criticism of Miss M. E. Braddon's 'Lady Audley's Secret,' or that Miss Braddon would be the proper person from whom to ask a review of Mr. Collins' 'Woman in White.' Nor would any man in his senses ever dream of delegating to Mr. Falconer the task of criticising Mr. Boucicault's sensation dramas, or vice versa. It would only be 'setting hawks to pike out hawks' een.' Jeffrey was an admirable critic of poetry, &c. but I doubt very much if he could have written 'Childe Harold,' or any of the other great works which he so ably reviewed.

True literary criticism ought to be above toadyism, and every influence whatever—political or otherwise. Unless the critic can and does set himself down to his task with an unprejudiced mind, and can perform his work without permitting his temper to be ruffled to even the slightest extent, he is unworthy to discharge the duty which he undertakes. He may write a very brilliant and attractive essay, abounding with flashes of wit and sarcasm; he may be capable of causing an author to dance with delight, or to shiver in his shoes; he may be a man whose slightest word of applause will raise, or whose condemnation will freeze, the author's fame; but unless his task be executed in every case with candour and truthfulness, and in a spirit of the utmost fairness—allowing no prejudice or passion to cloud his judgment, but executing his task with calmness and firmness, whether it be to praise or to censure,—unless he can do this, he undoubtedly cannot be considered as a man fitted to discharge the duties of a critic, as these duties should be discharged.

MILITARY ARCHITECTURE IN BRITAIN.

ON observing an article of manufacture, we are naturally led to investigate its origin, from what rude materials it has been formed, and the steps by which it has reached the excellence in which we now find it.

This feeling, with regard to Military Architecture, is fraught with something more than mere curiosity. By our attention to the history of this art, we shall discover how we have been able to surpass other nations both in the arts of peace and war. It will enable us to comprehend the real social and political state of our forefathers—wherein the greater security of the Norman invaders rested above that of the Roman, Saxon, or Dane.

When near some one of the many remains of the great military buildings of olden time, we cannot help recalling before our imagination the appearance of the Castle, when in its original glory—conjuring up, from the very dust beneath our feet, the godless baron and his armed retainers, the spiked portcullis hanging midway in the air—and feeling that fighting was far more noble when foe met foe, hand to hand, with short swords—when strength of arm and bravery were more accounted than mathematical correctness, attended, as it now is, with exterminating slaughter.

Early British cities are described by Cæsar as simply thick woods, fortified by a ditch and rampart surrounding them, or by merely enclosing the city by a wooden wall formed of the trunks of trees. These latter were merely temporary, and not calculated for a prolonged residence.

The earliest castles were formed of earth or unhewn stones, upon the sides of hills, and were but small, and of little comparative strength. The Romans built a few castles upon the coast most liable to the attacks of the Saxon barbarians. They built their castles, or rather fortified cities or towns, with a wall formed of earth or stones, and occasionally brick cemented with mortar, enclosing a square area of several acres. They placed towers upon the walls at certain distances, to protect them. The space enclosed by the walls was occupied by the houses and other buildings of the inhabitants.

There appear to have been two forms of British castles; one on a hill with terraces—upon the summit a hollow surrounded by loose stones, surmounted with a round or square fort; the other consisting of a mound of earth on a hill, surrounded by a stone wall, with the stones composing it grouted together, i. e. with the cement run in, in a fluid state.

Among British castles or forts, those which have created the most controversy—which must have been of some importance from their superior strength and durability—are those called 'vitrified.' They exist in Scotland, and were formerly supposed to be extinct volcanoes. They are situated upon small hills. The materials used were stones reduced by heat into a species of coarse glass, which ran together in a mass, forming a wall strong and lasting in a high degree. Thus was Castle Hill of Finhaven, in Angus, and many others in Scotland.

Asser, the biographer of Alfred, states that the king caused a castle to be built at Athelnay, near Boroughbridge, in Somersetshire, which served as a retreat for himself and his nobles from the power of the Danish invaders. This is a hill with terraces, at the base of which flows the river Tone. Edgar's Tower at Corfe, the keeps at Sturminster and Coningsburgh, afford some good examples of Saxon fortification. The last belonged to Harold. It had a high and circular tower, strengthened with six large square buttresses. The portal is placed a great height from the ground, and is approached by stone steps rising in a steep ascent from the front.

The Danish forts, like the British, were placed on steep conical hills, and were circular. The earth from the first ditch was thrown into the centre, and formed a mound; below this were placed a succession of terraces, with ditch and bank, to the base of the hill. Some of their castles were built with stone and lime—the ascent to these was by a spiral path up the side of the hill, protected on the exterior by a bank of earth. The centre of the fort being most secure, was used for hiding their women, children, money, and other valuables.

At the conquest, William finding what an easy prey the kingdom had become for want of castles, determined it should no longer lack in that respect for the future. A style of fortification was now introduced, hitherto unknown in England, which, during the Norman occupation, at least secured her from apprehension on that score. The system now introduced caused these strongholds to be so multiplied in number that, by Stephen's time, there were upwards of eleven hundred baronial castles in England.

The Normans showed a more manifest superiority over their Saxon predecessors, in the design and execution of their military, than they did in their ecclesiastical, architecture. They chose, like the Saxons, as the best site for their keeps, a hill, or artificial mound, near a river, or with an artificial moat formed round it—imagining that no place could be secure unless surrounded with water. Along the sea-coast, also, the highest and steepest rocks and the abruptest headlands, were selected for their castles. They converted promontories into islands where practicable, by digging a wide canal, as at the famous castle of Loch-Leven. One great improvement in the new over the old method was in increasing the size and thickness of the towers; the next in making the staircase run sideways up the wall of the castle, thus considerably adding to its strength. The walls were of a uniform thickness from the base to the top. The earliest Norman arrangement was called the 'Gundulf' keep, after the founder of the castle at Rochester. It was surrounded by a moat, crossed by a drawbridge. The entrance was defended by two portcullises and three strong gates, one half-way up the staircase. The Norman tower was three stories in height. The ground floor was the dungeon, the first storey for the reception of stores, &c., the second a common room, and in the highest the family lived during war.

A little previous to the ascent of the royal line of Plantagenet to the throne, a further improvement was made in the defensive powers of the yalls, to counteract the method of attack. The efforts of early military architects, as well as of modern military engineers, have been devoted to increase and perfect the means of defence. The usual method in which the siege was carried on was by mining. This was commenced immediately upon crossing the ditch or moat, after filling it with wood, straw, and rubbish, and reaching to the foot of the wall. The sappers and miners were protected from the efforts of the besieged by their comrades holding large shields over them while the engines and battering-rams were at the same time doing their work. The engines, which were called battering-catapults, shot large stones, bars of iron, &c. against the walls. The battering-rams consisted of large beams of wood, strongly bound with iron, having an iron head at the end, sometimes moulded in the shape of a ram's head, and suspended upon a framework of wood, with chains. This framework was roofed, to protect the assailants beneath; who, by drawing the beam away from the wall of the castle, by ropes attached to the ram, let it swing with tremendous force back against it, shattering the stonework, and, by constant repetition, soon causing a breach. This was filled by the besiegers with bags of earth. It was therefore found necessary greatly to increase the thickness and strength of the lower part of the castle wall. It was composed of two solid walls of stone, with grouting poured between. Hitherto, castles were not used for constant residence, but only resorted to during war. About the reign of Cœur de

Lion, however, they began to be used as dwellings by the barons; and, for this purpose, it was necessary to add the requisite appendages of a mansion—such as halls, kitchens, stables, &c. Barbicans were also added. They were forts or watch-towers, placed outside the ditch—on a high stone wall, at the entrance of the drawbridge—to give notice of the approach of danger, and to render the drawbridge more difficult to be crossed. A little later, Edward I., in building the castles of Conway and Carnarvon, added towers and turrets, not only to the angles, but also along the walls surrounding the keep. They had been added to the corners of castles previous to this, as early as the reign of Stephen. A tower obscure and secure was erected for the accommodation of ladies in time of danger.

This was the general arrangement of castles of this period; variations were frequently made, but the following was the usual character:—On the inside of the moat was the castle wall, within this wall was another moat and wall similar to the exterior; the space between the exterior and interior walls was called a 'ballium.' Within the inner ballium was the keep, or palace. It was a square building with small windows and 'machicolated,' that is, embattled walls; beneath it were the dungeons used as prisons, on the inside of the walls of the ballia were flat-roofed houses for the garrison. The embrasures of the embattlements served as passages of communication to a gallery of wood overhanging the wall, called 'hoards.' The hoards were erected during war; from them the besieged hurled javelins or stones upon the assailants beneath. At the angles of the ballia walls square towers were built, about three stories high. Square towers being found to leave one side exposed to the enemy, which was not commanded from any part of the castle, round towers were suggested; but still these were found imperfect for the same reason, though in a less degree; the square tower was again built, but placed diagonally with the angle facing the enemy—the form repeated in the modern Redan; this was perfect, it being commanded by both flanks in a cross fire. The example of Edward III., who changed Windsor Castle from a fortress into a royal palace, was soon followed by his barons. The rude castle became henceforth the luxurious castellated mansion. Keeps began to give place to palaces. The towers were not built so strong; the turrets were increased in number, and the embattlements retained merely for the sake of ornament. A fine specimen of this style exists at Hurst-Monceaux, in Sussex; it was built by Lord Darce, treasurer to Henry of Windsor. It was in some part destroyed, when unroofed in 1777; but what remains amply shows what it was in its pristine state. It is a good specimen of the character of these mansions. The gatehouse has two turrets, and was furnished with a portcullis, which was drawn up by a windlass above the gateway. There were, within the walls, a chapel or church, a hall, stables, staircase, &c. The whole building is square, and built entirely of brick. During the Tudor dynasty, the castle was entirely lost, and naught but the house remained.

Immediately on the invention of cannon, in Edward

III.'s reign, we observe the decline of castle building, it being found, by experience, that banks of earth are better calculated to resist cannon than stone walls. After some time, the walls were made low, and banks of earth thrown against them. In former days, the architect of the church was architect of the castle also; but in modern times military architecture is no longer known—the art of Fortification having become Military Engineering.

It is impossible, at the present time, to fix the date of the early castles with any degree of certainty. Many have been so repeatedly demolished, rebuilt, or altered, that the original character is quite effaced.

JOHN BURHAM SAFFORD.

A LITTLE CHAFF ON PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

'Il volto sciolto, gli pensieri stretti.'

INTRODUCTION.

'There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.'

It is as well to confess at once that I hate proverbs, partly because—sitting at the feet of Miss Edgeworth, fed on the 'Purple Jar' and 'Waste Not, Want Not'—every lesson ended in one of these sententious inflections, driving the moral into our poor little brains with a shock little inferior to that now exploded trial of our childhood, the matutinal shower-bath—partly because, pushing through life with this potted wisdom rankling in my mind, I have found it selfish to the last degree, and as deceptive as those concentrated lozenges which are presumed to contain an unlimited amount of nourishment.

Moreover, proverbs being such cheap wisdom, are not allowed to rest still in their graves, content with whatever success they may have had in their day, but are continually parading their plum-coloured coats and short-waisted dresses in the midst of our modest Tweeds and more decorous crinolines, where they are readily accepted by many who seek to escape the trouble of thinking for themselves. Those who are willing to accept these formulae, should not forget that their applicability is limited, as we may see, if we apply them to well-known cases. If, for example, when the Princess whom the Cid was unfortunate enough to marry, complained of his constant absence, he, instead of stopping at home till she was fairly tired of him, had remembered that 'A spaniel, a wife, and a walnut tree—the more you beat them the better they'll be,' it may be doubted if his character would stand so high as it does; nor can we picture to ourselves Bayard, when he released the widow's daughter, muttering 'Cattiva donna guardate a buona non Fidar niente.'

However much men may be fascinated by the diction and seeming aptness of proverbs, I feel some hope that the fairer portion of my readers will be on my side, since it may be noticed that where proverbs are most popular women are least trusted and respected; while not a few of them refer to the supposed inferiority or treachery of the female mind. Thus, in the East, where mental education is at so low a point, every boy in the street is full of proverbs; but his sententious gravity will be speedily upset if you affect to detect any remains of the harem in his manner; and, if you doubt his word, he will exclaim 'What! am I a woman that I should lie?' Spanish and Italian proverbs also teem with sarcasms on women.

But setting aside a certain respect for weakness and beauty which one has somehow imbibed, it may also be objected that the wisdom of proverbs is, for the most part, essentially worldly and short-sighted; none more so than that 'vanitas vanitatis' with which we are so constantly rebuked. From the use to which these words are put, one would suppose the creation a mistake; or rather that man in his fall had dragged down the universe—a conclusion from which we must all dissent. We are told that the philosopher's thirst for knowledge, the statesman's aspirations for his country, the artist's appreciation of the beauties of nature, the anxiety of parents for the welfare of their children, are all vanity. To such minds a splendid sunset is only a mockery of succeeding darkness—the dawn but a prelude to a day of sin; yet it is surely more consonant with our Christian profession to suppose that these hopes and fears, these gorgeous spectacles, were given us not to be despised, but, by disclosing our own impotence, to bring us to the footstool of the Almighty.

I suspect, too, that many of these sayings were produced with an amount of labour and self-conceit which gives one but a poor opinion of the authors—much as Diogenes went about with a lantern, not really to find an honest man, but that some one might ask the reason of his strange proceeding; and would have met a just rebuke had he been suffered to pass without remark. Many, on the other hand, have been the sayings of keen, uneducated people, which have survived from generation to generation, till they have lost their original significance, and acquired a wider and different meaning, just as 'Feed a cold and starve a fever' is often quoted as an injunction instead of a warning; while, happily, the idea of starvation in either case is exploded.

I hope, by these remarks, to excuse myself, in some degree, in the eyes of proverb worshippers for using their idols so lightly; and can only hope that their pity for my incapacity for appreciating such precious things may mitigate their wrath at my impertinence.

OLD BIRDS ARE NOT TO BE CAUGHT WITH CHAFF.

It is difficult to determine whether we should most bewail or rejoice at the absurdity propounded in these words. If they were true, human nature would be a degree more perfect, I suppose; but then life would be full of seriousness, like that of Dr. Brown's dog. One is tempted to wonder if the author of this proverb was ever asked the name of his hatter; if his poor feet and little temper were ever the object of tender solicitude; how far he was impervious to the man who slept in the next room, for fear of waking himself by snoring so loud; and to the absent lady who did not discover that she had posted herself instead of her letter, till asked by the astonished postmaster whether she was single or not. Who on earth can have propounded such an idea? Is it meant for truth, or only to pretend, as children say? If we suppose it to be a serious proposition, unless the author was pre-historic, it can only have emanated from the greatest self-conceit; for nothing is more certain than that, from time out of mind, 'old birds' have been caught with chaff; and the only individual recorded to have escaped, stuffed his ears with wax—a proceeding more prudent than dignified.

Did not Omphale set chaff for Hercules? Judith braid her hair for Holophernes? Is Delilah the only one who has bound her Samson? and do you think the Queen of Shebah did not make Solomon pay for that little joke of the glass floor (which made her lift her dress and show her ankles, thinking it was water) before she went home?

In our day, too, we have Napoleon III. half Solomon, half charlatan—supposed to be like Irving, an angel on one side, a devil on the other—a man of iron will and silent determination. Yet, they say his soul is vexed by the little lady who worked the telegraph on the 4th December, and wont give up her Pope. Was there not a great lady—a lady, though she boxed people's ears and swore in imitation of her papa—who spread chaff in all directions; and, taking old and young in her traps, cut their heads off if they got too near the bait? I think young Raleigh showed considerable self-control in not acting up to those pretty lines—

'He fears his fate too much,
Or his desert is small,
Who dares not put it to the touch
And win or lose it all.'

A very pretty bit of chaff, was it not, from a queen to a young soldier? Quite enough to have cost him his head, and us potatoes and tobacco. In those days, however, kings and queens had all this sort of thing to themselves; for we find James's council deliberating on the royal problem, 'Why a fish introduced into a basin filled with water to the brim will not cause it to overflow?' The council found it rather a tough question, till a gentleman from the North, whose wits had not yet been dulled by coarse English beef, suddenly exclaimed—'Eh! my lairds, I'm no that sure of the premisses.' In this case, however, it is not at all clear that His Majesty's joke was intentional.

It would seem that this peculiar bait, to be most effectual, requires as a rule to be offered to one of the opposite sex, and is generally most successful in female hands; for we may be sure the lion, had he had the choice, would sooner have been doctored and tamed by Una than Androcles, whatever may have been the merits of that distinguished slave. There really seems no limit to the credulity of mankind.

One has grown accustomed to see merchants cheated by bubble houses, hotel-keepers plundered by gentlemanly young men, but it was rather startling to find our leading pawnbroker a victim of misplaced confidence. One would have thought, if any one was free from the failing of over-much faith, it was the pawnbroker; yet this distinguished individual bought a large quantity of wine, which turned out to be water. The plan was ingenious. A bladder of wine was placed against the spigot-hole of the cask, and the rest filled with water—the pressure of which on the bladder caused the wine to flow when required, in the most natural way in the world. Sic transit gloria mundi; thus fell the prince of pawnbrokers. Now, supposing for a moment we old birds were to stuff our ears with wax, and, putting on our best spectacles, became proof against this rose-coloured deception, it may be questioned whether we should be any the happier for the change. I am very much afraid we should become as inconvenient to each other as those 'Enfants terribles,' whom Mr. Leech's pencil brings so forcibly before us. Indeed, this is so truly felt, that a wise man will never see an insult if he can help it, any more than a counsel will admit the possibility of the jury giving a verdict against his client. 'Where ignorance is bliss, 'twere folly to be wise,' so, if we cannot always profess ignorance, let us at least accept what little compliments and attentions come in our way without too close inquiry into their sincerity.

It is curious to look back and see how men have, time out of mind, fallen into exactly the same traps, led, as a rule, by four leading passions—love, vanity, the desire of power and wealth, and a craving for superhuman intercourse. The results of the two latter are probably the most varied and the least known. The two sciences to which we owe so much of our boasted knowledge and so many of our great achievements—mathematics and chemistry—were at their birth surrounded by a mass of error and superstition which we pride ourselves much on having cleared away, although without these adjuncts they would soon have languished or have remained entirely in the hands of rich men; but though few were willing to patronise science in the abstract, many were fascinated with the idea of astrology and the transmutation of metals. Thus the alchymist and astrologer were provided with the means of making those researches which have led to the discovery of such important facts. It was not unusual for the alchymist to combine demonology with chemistry; but while the search for the absolute—the root or seed of nature—led them deeply into natural philosophy, and has conferred on us the greatest benefits, demonology has not only been of no service to us—though it has caused infinite bloodshed and cruelty—but remains precisely in statu quo—rather retrograding than otherwise; since, with superior knowledge at his command, Mr. Home can do no more than a moderate Asiatic conjuror.

The history of the alchymists is a strange mixture of self-denial, self-deception, and imposture—much exaggerated by the superstitions of those among whom they lived; for it is probable that they themselves did not seriously lay claim to half the powers with which they found themselves invested. Let us take, for example, Albertus Magnus, an industrious, thick-headed Dominican student; with whose perseverance the blessed Virgin was so pleased that she appeared to him one day, and gave him the choice of excelling in philosophy or divinity. Now, this was very foolish on her part, for he chose the former; which she granted, after many tears. Albertus and Thomas Aquinas, his pupil, spent their lives in study, refusing many offers of promotion, for fear their labours should be interfered with. Among other things, they made an iron man to wait on them; and, with greater imprudence than might have been expected from such wise men, endowed him with the power of speech, which, uncontrolled by reason, soon made him so intolerable, that Aquinas, in a fit of anger, knocked him down and broke him—for which he received a severe lecture on self-control from his colleague. It must be confessed, however, that this story looks very like the invention of some studious monk, as a hint to a talkative neighbour.

These wise men do not seem to have been exceptions to the rule we have laid down of the power of chaff in the hands of women; and in this they may well be excused, since the great Merlin himself fell a victim to the wicked Vivien. But it is only fair to mention that to a lady we owe the services of Raymond Luli, grand seneschal to James the First of Aragon, both as alchemist and missionary. Raymond, though a married man, of highly religious ideas, had an unfortunate knack of falling in love with other men's wives; and, amongst others, made love to Ambrosia di Castella. Watching beneath her window one night when the wind blew aside her scarf, he was so struck with the charms disclosed that he sent her some verses on the subject. She, however, sent for him, and quelled his passion by showing him that the bosom he so eulogised was the seat of a fearful disorder. Thereupon Raymond, having divided his property among his wife and children, set out to convert the Mussulmans; but, as his plan was to commence by cursing their Prophet, he was speedily turned out of Tunis, and took to alchemy and controversial divinity. Unable to settle down, however, after getting into hot water with the Pope, he returned to Africa; and was stoned to death by the Mussulmans—freely cursing Mahomet during the operation.

Whatever may have been the idiosyncracies of the alchemists, we may rest assured that their contributions to science have been most important, even though some, like the Marechal de Rays, took to murdering little children by way of relaxation. Many sacrificed family, position, and fortune to their infatuation, little knowing that what they considered the refuse of their information was to be the foundation of future science. In the same way, very probably, the goldmakers of our day are in a sense self-deluded, and gain but little by their labours in comparison with the benefits their wealth confers on others.

But while the love of gain has showered many blessings upon posterity, where are we to find the results of the desire for superhuman intercourse? We read with surprise of Queen Elizabeth, herself such an adept at deception, visiting Dr. Dee, and accepting from him a bit of silver made from a brass warming-pan. With a certain amount of respect we sift the doctrines of the Rosicrucians; we picture to ourselves the impostures of St. Germain, and admire the calm brain which could accurately describe conversations with Richard I. or Henry VIII.; we see Cagliostro—a thief at Palermo, a swindler in Westminster Hall—spreading joy among the sick of Strasbourg, or bewildering the French Court, 'where there was hardly a fine lady in Paris who would not sup with the shade of Lucretius in the apartments of Cagliostro—a military officer who would not dispute on the art of war with Cæsar, Hannibal, or Alexander—nor an advocate or councillor who would not argue points of law with the ghost of Cicero' ('Biog. Con.')—finally ending his days under the Roman Inquisition; and we cannot but feel how their glory has faded. The mantle has fallen upon Mr. Home and a wigmaker in a lane off Holborn. O Lucifer! star of the morning, how art thou fallen? Still truth will assert itself—'old birds' will be caught with chaff. Only a few years since, a gentleman advertised a powder for producing perch in any pond, and received many hundred applications for it! Though the spirits will no longer face the light, they will still touch us in the dark; and we, who laugh at, or more generally are ignorant of, past deceptions—we who measure our Bibles, inch by inch, by our own little standard—who, rather than seem feeling, pretend to be so much more hard-hearted than we are—who all write in the Saturday, or some equally clever publication—take spirit-rapping to our hearts and converse on Planchette with our friends in Hades; our Secretaries of State are the victims of their nerves; and Members of Parliament have their private ghosts.

THE LEGEND OF THE MILL. A SCOTCH STORY.

THERE are few of our readers who have not at least heard tell of the fertile and beautiful Carse of Gowrie, and many of them are doubtless acquainted with its beauties. Renowned in ancient times for productive soil and attractive scenery, its chief glory at the present day rests on its agricultural system—the most advanced, perhaps, that prevails in any portion of the United Kingdom. The agriculturists of the Carse of Gowrie, while always the first to adopt the new inventions applicable to their art, are also among the last to throw aside the instruments of a former generation. Thus the agriculture of the Carse embraces at once the best parts of the old systems, and the cheapest parts of the new. Thus we can enjoy the spectacle, nowhere else to be seen, of the ponderous steam-plough puffing and straining on one field; while on the next a pair of stout and sturdy 'owsen,' such as our forefathers used to possess, drag lazily along a handsome bran-new 'brake' of harrows. But while the Gowrie agriculture of to-day, although wonderfully improved, is not changed beyond recognition, the rural classes of the same district have all but entirely shaken off their former character. Some persons there are whom the cares and troubles of seventy summers 'have made old men of'; and in them the remembrance of the past exists as a smouldering fire, all but extinguished in the march of modern improvement, but breaking out occasionally into something like a flame. The tales and legends which these venerables used to hear with reverence in the days of their youth, are now disregarded by the young hopefuls of a later generation. The fate of 'Wallace wight' no longer draws tears from the simple rustics—the career of 'Bruce the brave' no longer excites their admiration. No; much as it is to be regretted, the story of Scotland's independence is now unhonoured, and all but unknown, in the family circles where, fifty or a hundred years ago, it was the unfailing subject of conversation. The superstitious tales, which the aged loved to tell and the young trembled to hear, have likewise been forgotten. A few there are which are still remembered, and occasionally told; but they are no longer told with the same effect, or heard with the same attention. One of these is 'The Legend of the Mill'—a superstitious story, supposed to have some foundation on fact; but its incidents are probably too much exaggerated by tradition to allow us to repose anything but a very limited credence in the tale.

The traveller who pursues his journey through a certain locality in the Carse of Gowrie, which need not be more particularly described, may pause awhile to look upon the ruins of an old meal mill, heaped in quiet confusion by the side of the turnpike road. Visions of the olden time may glance through the mind of the imaginative pilgrim who contemplates these ruins—the miserable remains of what was once a busy and important institution.

'A merry place it was in days of yore;
But something ails it now;—the place is cursed.'

The good-humoured miller—for all millers are good-humoured—is no longer to be heard chiding his knaves or haggling with his customers. The busy mill-wheel rests; and the honest miller sleeps well in the old church-yard, where his 'headstane,' carved with rude but reverend hands, is still to be seen. The schoolboys no longer clamour for groats, as they used to do in days of yore; and the heavy-heeled ploughman no longer tumbles out the sacks plethoric with the golden grain. The silvery stream still tumbles over the wretched remains of the once stout water-wheel—now reduced to a miserable skeleton of rusty iron; and a portion of the water finds its way into the mill through an opening of the wall, and crawls along the damp, rotten floor, in a way that would have broken Habbie Simpson's heart.

But it was not always thus. The mill of Braehead was once famous for the strength of its meal—there was no adulteration in those days; and Habbie Simpson, the open-hearted miller, was as fine a specimen of his kind as one would wish to meet on a spring holiday. Rustic tradition is not generally very careful in the mechanical matter of dates; and therefore we cannot, with any degree of certainty, tell the exact portion of the eighteenth century during which Habbie Simpson tenanted the mill. It must have been somewhere in the first quarter of the century; for the venerable patriarch of four-score informs us that it just 'ta'en his grandfather to mind o' Habbie Simpson.' The miller of Braehead had no 'dainty flame and dangerous.' As the French dauphin said of his horse—his mill was his mistress. Habbie had, at the time of which we write, two assistants, or, as they were commonly called, mill-knaves—young men whom Hab loved as his own sons. Daw or David Miller and Harry Headrigg—such were the names of Habbie's mill-knaves—performed the greatest part of the business, and Habbie himself had little else to do than look on. And when the day's work was over, and the noisy wheel permitted the gushing burn to pursue its course without interruption—when the village youth led up their sports on the smooth village green, none were then so active as the two young millers. It gladdened the honest miller's heart to take a step or two across the way on a summer evening, and see how his two knaves conquered the whole rustic band in all the simple and unpretending but manly sports that ruled the hour. And when a riot arose, as riots often do even in the country, Daw Miller and Harry Headrigg were always to be found arrayed on the same side, and each seemed to care for the other's safety far more than for his own. The young men, in fact, lived in the bonds of the most sincere friendship; and, without seeming to know it, were to each other all in all. Habbie Simpson said 'they were like twa brithers, they 'greed sae weel.' Old dames compared them to David and Jonathan; the minister spoke of Damon and Pythias; and the schoolmaster, of Orestes and Pylades. In the meantime, Habbie and his knaves lived at peace with themselves and with all the world, 'happy as the day was lang.'

But an event occurred which ruffled the serenity of the life at Braehead. This was the death of poor Habbie, who, as the tombstone erected to his memory by his 'devoted servants' testifies, departed this life in the '60th year of his age.' The tombstone is unfortunately without date—the figures having probably been obliterated. Habbie left all his wealth, amounting to three hundred pounds, to his knaves, to be divided equally between them; to them also he bequeathed the good-will, as it would be called, of his trade; and, conjuring them with his last breath to preserve their friendship through life, the good man died. After their beloved master had been conveyed to his last earthly resting-place, the life of the two millers settled down into its usual serene but laborious character. Men said that the mutual attachment of the millers of Braehead would now be greater than ever, strengthened as it was by chains of gold. And such, to all outward appearance, seemed to be the case. Daw Miller, the elder of the two young men, took the management of the business so far as it related to buying and selling; and to this he devoted himself with a money-making energy that augured well, as the neighbours thought, for his future prosperity. But as his ambition, or perhaps his avarice, increased, his friendship diminished. Harry, whose province it was to superintend the working of the mill, was of a less avaricious disposition than his friend, and would have been perfectly contented with his mill and his little money, without straining his energies to get more. He was surprised and vexed to find that mere money had supplanted him in his friend's estimation; while Miller, on the other hand, regarded him as a fool for being contented with little when he might have more. He began to consider that his partnership with Harry was to be as profitable to his companion as to himself; while he—so he thought—was the great money-maker of the firm. He even went so far as to regret that Harry had received any share of his master's legacy; and—facilis descensus Avernus—he determined somehow or other to wrest his friend's portion to himself.

It was a few weeks after this wicked resolution had taken possession of Daw Miller's mind, that he concluded that infamous compact with the great enemy which was the cause of all his future glory and prosperity. Tradition points out, as the spot where the treaty was confirmed, a long strip of desolate moor through which Miller passed, on his return home from a market-town, one dark night in winter. The advantages on the miller's side of the fence were said to be riches and honour, and success in all his undertakings. Not long after the bargain was concluded, Miller had some occasion to go to an old attic belonging to the mill, but which was scarcely ever used. In one corner of the room stood a large oaken chest, the lid of which was so constructed that, on being allowed to fall, it locked of itself. Daw paid no attention to this chest, for with it the business on which he had come had probably nothing to do. He was startled, however, to hear a heavy groan proceeding apparently from the interior of the chest, and a faint voice, which he distinguished as that of his friend and partner, calling for help. Daw Miller's better nature would have led him at once to open the chest, and deliver the unfortunate occupant from the horrible death that awaited him. He had actually his hand on the lid for this purpose, when an unearthly visage, the owner of which he had, alas! too much cause to remember, appeared opposite to his own; a huge cloven foot stamped upon the floor, and a fiendish voice whispered in his ear—'Begone, fool!

begone!' Fear and self-interest immediately induced the misguided man to withdraw and leave his friend to his dreadful fate. Foreseeing the suspicions which a discovery of Harry's body might entail upon him, he locked the door of the cock-loft, and carried off the key, or, as the 'rustic rhyme' expresses it,

'The door was lockt,
The key in his pocket'

Burying the key in a corner of his garden, to prevent its discovery, Miller waited in great anxiety till the news of Harry's disappearance should be made known. The alarm was less likely to rise suddenly, as no one had seen the unfortunate man in the neighbourhood of the room that was now his prison. The last person with whom he had been seen in company was a stranger of respectable appearance, and in whom he appeared to be greatly interested. As the story is sometimes told, this stranger induced the young miller to go with him to the garret; and there, appearing in his proper form, which was that of the redoubtable 'Auld Cloutie,' he pushed him into the chest, and kept him there. On the news of Harry's disappearance being made known, inquiries were made concerning the stranger, but he was nowhere to be seen or heard of. A diligent search was made through all parts of the mill; every hole and corner was investigated; the mill-pond was emptied, the lair was searched, but all in vain. One part of the building alone was undisturbed, and that was the attic. The influence of Satan over the minds of the men was said afterwards to have been the cause of this strange overlook. Daw Miller, on receiving the news of the death of his partner, was frantic with grief, and wept and lamented like a person distracted. But during the whole week, while the search after the missing body was being carried on, he endured the most terrible agony of mind. He was unable to 'sleep o' nights,' and when he did fall into a troubled slumber, it was only to start up again in terror and fear. Those who witnessed this strange conduct, charitably imputed it to overstrained grief for his friend's loss; and it was only in the light of future events that they read in these demonstrations the troubles of a guilty soul.

But the blast blew over, and Daw Miller had the satisfaction of escaping with his character unscathed. He was overwhelmed with consternation, when, on turning up the ground where the key had been deposited, no such key was to be seen. What had become of it? was a question which, after all his attempts, he was still unable to answer; and he was compelled to rest satisfied with the hope that it had not fallen into mortal hands. And now commenced the prosperous career of the miller of Braehead—a career which the 'kintra side' could not by any stretch of charity reconcile with the idea of fair and natural dealing. Pretending that Habbie Simpson's legacy was only a few pounds, Miller commenced his career by defrauding the relatives of his deceased friend of their just share. Not many years after Headrigg's disappearance, his surviving partner joined to the occupation of a miller that of a farmer; and in the course of half-a-dozen years he could boast the best and largest farm in the Carse of Gowrie. So far his neighbours and friends rejoiced in Miller's success, and so far their surprise was confined within legitimate bounds. Even when farm after farm was 'let' to David Miller, until he became the tenant of an entire lairdship, no ugly doubts were raised as to the manner in which the money was obtained. But when from a farmer he became a proprietor, and reached to that highest of Scotch distinctions—the position of a laird; when he built a mansion, the like of which was not to be seen in the whole country; when he associated with lords, and shook hands on equal terms with knights and esquires, public opinion could brook it no longer. The old women who had known him in former times as the young, happy, and handsome mill-knave of Braehead, and who feared him now as the wealthy and powerful laird of that ilk, hesitated not to affirm that such unbounded prosperity was supernatural in its origin, and would be so in its end. The mark of the beast was stamped on Laird Miller's forehead, now ploughed with deep wrinkles—on his unhappy-looking countenance, which in early youth beamed with intelligence and joy. His former companions, who had witnessed with surprise the development of his strange career, contrasted the laird, wretched and miserable as he appeared, amid all his wealth and grandeur, with themselves, strong and healthy, and for the most part contented with their honest poverty. They marked the settled gloom that rested on his brow, when his hat was lifted in acknowledgment of their salutations; and they agreed that there was certainly some cause for the surmises of the grandams of an unholy league with some wicked power.

The life which the laird led did not tend to relieve these suspicions. The mill of Braehead, which, with the exception of the memorable garret, had been thoroughly repaired, was now entirely shut up; the miller, to whom it had been let, having been obliged to depart at a day's notice. It was remarked that those who quarrelled with Laird Miller were sure to be overtaken by some cruel disaster. The laird of Longacres, who, at a meeting of gentlemen, taunted Miller with his lowly origin, fell over a precipice, on his way home, and was killed. A country baronet who threatened to horse-whip him was found dead in his bed next morning. Other instances of the same nature abound in the story, but need not be reproduced here. A constant succession of balls and entertainments was kept up at the mansion-house, superior in wealth and refinement to anything of the same kind that had ever been seen between Perth and Dundee. The rural gentry, always ready to despise things plebeian, forgot, in the wealth and splendour of Braehead House, the mean birth of him who was the owner. Dowagers laid traps to ensnare the laird into marriage; but, for some unaccountable reason, he could never be prevailed upon to engage. In the midst of all this splendour and gaiety, Laird Miller was not a happy man. The phantom of the injured friend of his youth was said to haunt him continually, sleeping or waking; and he rushed into his splendid career of wealth and pleasure, in the vain hope of drowning the remembrance of his guilt. And, as the tale goes, terrified at the prospect of settling accounts with his infernal master—whose day of reckoning was believed to be at hand—he was often heard to argue with himself as to the reality of the bargain and the certainty of its being completed. Often, it is said, he would start up,

'At the silent, solemn hour,
When night and morning meet,' and draw the sword which he had always at his side, and fight for hours with some invisible foe. At other times he would alarm the domestics by fearful cries; which, it is alleged, were often accompanied by still more terrific exclamations in a supernatural voice.

Such, according to the popular account, was the life of Laird Miller; and such it continued to be for a considerable number of years. But his eventful career was now drawing to a close. About eleven o'clock one stormy winter's night, the minister of the parish was awakened out of bed, by a message from the 'big house' of Braehead, requiring his presence there immediately. Such a message would, at any time, have been received by the worthy man with extreme suspicion; and coming at such an unseasonable hour, it was far from being welcome. Besides, the stories which were set afloat concerning the laird had reached the good man's ears; and, to tell the truth, he cared not to trust his person in the presence of the laird at such a solemn hour. But his wife—with all a woman's curiosity to know the secret of Laird Miller's life, which she expected he would divulge—compelled her lord to take the road, telling him to trust in his own priestly character for safety. Sore against his will, the minister accompanied the servant to the 'big house,' where the laird's butler, or confidential servant, was anxiously expecting his coming. This individual immediately conducted the clergyman into a large apartment, splendidly furnished, and lighted up with numerous lamps. Chairs of the most costly manufacture were set round a table of the same quality, as if in expectation of a large body of guests. The bewildered clergyman, dazzled with the splendid display, stood for some minutes in mute amazement, and was only recalled to his senses by the voice of the laird, cursing him for his 'black-coat stupidity;' and calling upon the butler to give Mr. Thingumbob a chair.

'Not there!' shouted the laird, as the minister proceeded to take possession of a vacant chair near the bottom of the table—'not there!' Don't ye see that chair's occupied? Or do you want to sit on a ghost's knees?'

The astonished preacher turned round and round on hearing this strange announcement, and the consternation depicted on every feature of his face seemed to afford the laird the utmost diversion.

His loud cachinnation was re-echoed by a terrible, hollow burst of laughter, which seemed to shake the very walls of the room—and which certainly shook the minister, as report says, 'like a shock o' apoplexy.' The unfortunate divine was obliged to stand at the bottom of the hall, without the power of motion or of speech; while the invisible revelers made merry over his consternation in bursts of fiendish laughter. In vain the reverend man essayed to move his limbs—his knees knocking together seemed to be the only motion of which he was capable. In vain he attempted to stop his ears or to withdraw his eyes from the supernatural banquet. Wine, or, as the clergyman suspected, blood, was poured out of rich vessels by bloodless hands; glasses were raised as if of their own accord, and horrible toasts were proposed and fiendish speeches were spoken, in a tone that made his very flesh creep, by some invisible spokesmen. Glancing to the chair which the laird occupied at the head of the table, the minister observed that the face of the wretched man was twisted into a conformation at once fascinating and dreadful. His eyes were fixed upon a cock, which had hitherto been perched motionless upon a large beam extending across the roof of the house, but which now began to bestir itself. This was observed by one of the invisibles, who exclaimed in a sepulchral tone,—'The cock is about to crow; our banquet is at an end. One carouse more to the safe passage of the laird to our infernal domains. And here comes our master to claim his prey!'

At this moment the lamps began to grow dimmer and dimmer, until they reached that supernatural blue which, according to report, universally accompanies some extraordinary or supernatural event. The sounds of revelry ceased, and a still more horrible silence took their place. After a few seconds, which to the perplexed divine seemed as many hours, a slight murmur of applause or welcome was raised, and the veritable arch-enemy himself made his appearance. The clergyman had just raised his eyes to the terrible apparition, when he observed something falling from the roof to the table, and breaking some of the costly dishes in its fall.

'The key of the attic!' said a supernatural voice. 'The hour is come! The cock will crow in an instant, and we must be off. Laird! are you ready?'

The last words were scarcely uttered, when the cock, flapping its wings, sung out its shrill clarion. The dim, blue, uncertain light which had hitherto prevailed now sunk into total darkness. The laird, uttering a shrill, heart-rending cry, which seemed to pierce the hard vaulted roof, fell, as the clergyman supposed, prostrate on the ground. The cock, after fluttering for a second or two on its perch, flew to the other end of the room, and was never again seen. Another burst of fiendish laughter then arose, which grew gradually fainter and fainter, and at last died out in a fiendish unnatural giggle. Overcome by the extraordinary circumstances of which he had been a witness, the minister sunk stupefied on the floor. On recovering, he found himself in the laird's dining hall; the servants were fluttering hither and thither with lights, shrieking hysterically; and the butler was bathing the minister's forehead, which had been cut by his fall. Laird Miller was found lying on the floor quite dead, wearing even in death the horrible aspect that had struck the clergyman with so much consternation.

A few days after these events, the pastor of the parish, accompanied by a few of the principal inhabitants, paid a visit to the old 'attic,' the door of which readily opened to the mysterious key. The remains of the unfortunate Harry Headrigg were found in the corn-chest, and were afterwards decently interred. The clergyman could never during his life be prevailed upon to relate the incidents of his mysterious visit to the 'big house,' but it is said that he gave a full account of the whole affair when on his death-bed to his son. The circuitous route by which the story reached the public must have contributed much of the exaggerated matter that is to be found in the 'Legend of the Mill.'

E. R.

THE KELPIE'S SONG.

WHEN dies the sun in the golden west,
And heaven conceals its azure breast,
And nature sinks into dreamy rest,
I awake.

I spring in delight from my watery bed,
And shake the pearly drops from my head
Which the mountain's hoary summit bred Yesterday.

My tresses float on the silvery waves
Of the stream that my brawny bosom laves,
As it chants to the echoing rocks and caves
That it leaves.

I dive in the depths of the crystal pool,
And gather the pebbles so smooth and cool,
While the sparkling trout submit to my rule,
And obey.

I bask in the moon's pale silvery ray,
And list to the night-jar's monotonous lay,
And I mock the owl as she seeks her prey
By the night.

I pluck the ivy that clings to the bank,
And sip the dew from the spear-grass rank,
And twine in my hair the bulrush, dank
With the dew.

I dance on the torrent's spray and foam,
And shriek at the midnight's starry dome,
And scare the lone wand'rer to his home
By my voice.

(Chorus of Kelpies.)

Ha! ha! ha! Who so merry as we—
The kelpies who float on the streamlet free,
And dance in the moonlight's silvery sea?
Ha! ha! ha!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure—
Sweet is pleasure after pain.'—Dryden.

CHAPTER VIII.

EARLY in the present week, I found myself in a state of unusual despondency. There was a depression at my heart which I did not seek to laugh or chat away, knowing how real were the causes of it. Several household accounts were daily pressed, like insults and humiliations, on my attention—good Lord! as if they could ever be absent from my mind!—while my salary was actually overdrawn. Simultaneously with this, my attached spouse—once upon a time extensively known as the lovely little Jean Chisholm—quite a fairy thing, but now, as regards shortness and rotundity, very oval or egg-shaped in her fine contour—had been taunting me, above her wont, in reference to my stagnant position in life. The ambitious bundle that she was!—how often had I promised to roll her up-hill some day! Ever, too, as the sun rose over the chimney-tops—the same sun that was shedding health and blessing on many a sweet country-place, and on shores where white-limbed children were making themselves cool and pretty anklets of the silver brine—he peeped into our windows, with mottled beams, like a diurnal summons to paper up our windows and be away—away from Portland-street; down which street, with all its attractions, the summer had come despairingly, scarcely finding a spot where she might plant a green footprint, or distribute the sorry largess of a few sickly blooms—away from the arid heart of the city—the city, with all her energies languid, and thirsty groups, like pilgrims of the desert, about her wells—away, away anywhere—wherever streams were pure, and breezes fresh, and verdure bright, and flowers beautiful, and skies cerulean, and God's glorious mornings jubilant with the minstrelsy of birds! Not for my entire self I cared, nor for any portion of me that was selfish; but only for that part of myself—limited as a passing pulse, immeasurable as eternity—included in the father's heart of me. Barbara looked so like an earthly maiden growing daily, before my eyes, into a heavenly angel, that I would fain have made her follow the summer into her greenest and serenest haunts, in order that she might thereby be wiled into a more abiding love of earth; in order, too, that the summer might, through fascination of so fair a votary, restrain the invisible wings of her with playful, entrapping garlands, and adorn her statuesque face with some of the blushing insignia arrayed upon her gorgeous palette for the cheeks of the roses of June! Yet how could I so far bribe the gracious year, while the grocer, as I passed, was looking unsweet amidst his saccharine hogsheads; and the butcher glaring at me as if he would incontinently kill? Oh the powerlessness of poverty! Why should hands as feeble as infancy exist in connection with any giant heart audibly throbbing? Situated as I was, all the mighty sunshine came to me through inexorable iron bars; and I groaned inwardly, and struggled vainly, like some sinewy conqueror in chains.

Jean—bless her affectionateness!—had a poor stomach for privation. I have heard of many a wife whose countenance was a cheering lamp and a bright home-fire to her husband in the night and winter of adversity; but, were I to be guided by my own experience, I should say that every such story must be a myth. Yet let me do my aspiring affinity justice. Prosperity, say the philosophers, is difficult to be borne; but that Jean could have borne any amount of that article was demonstrated in various unmistakable ways. Her genius for high life admitted, in fact, of no concealment; yet was she never a lady's maid, or any vulgar thing of that sort, O most suspicious reader! The fullest cup that ever commended itself to mortal lips she could have uplifted with at least the self-possession—if not now, nor these many years, with the slim grace—of a Ganymede. How, then, should she be denied all chance of exhibiting her quality? Wronged comforter of my bosom! how was it that she could get no higher up in the world than Portland-street? I dare frankly confess her not of the aptest configuration for getting through a stile; yet how, of all streets in Glasgow, came she to stick fast in that thoroughfare of the social mediocrities? Ah! she knows me for a 'poor snool,' that has been doing base drudgeries for old M'Corkindale these forty years good, unmindful or incompetent to storm the serene Crescents for her sake! Besides, if she had married Mr. So-and-so—or if Mr. So-and-so had married her, which is my way of putting it—might she not have been up among the topmost blossoms? Softly, Mrs. Slyboots! have you no corner in your memory for the more than half-dozen of your old sweethearts—for Jean, prior to my generous rescue of her, was as notorious a flirt as ever wagged hoops—who have long since gone down to pitiful abyasses, crashing with ominous thunder through the rotten commercial branches? Yet for all her gibling, I should be oddly oblivious of many a hot mustard blister, and reeking basin of gruel, if I was not free to own that Jean must, in some corner or other of her heart, have all along cherished a secret regard even for her gray-headed tormentor.

No matter; I was still moodily despondent, like one who has met some sad misfortune, or supped, with inordinate Cambrian voracity, upon toasted cheese of the quality of gutta-percha. I felt like some poor devil of an Exchequer Chancellor, in the face of a staggering deficit, and at his wit's end for some new article to tax. Two courses were before me—either to retrench my expenditure or to increase my income. No sooner, however, did I hint at the former than Jean became hysterical—dared me to point out wherein she had been extravagant, and boldly charged me with a design to starve, impair the health, and ultimately murder the girls, who, as regarded clothing, were already such frights as to be unfit to appear in society.

'Shame on you, Gabriel! I know you would like to see your poor wi-wife in rags!'

'My dear Jean!'

'Don't "my dear Jean" me!'

'Not, then, until your paroxysm is over; but I fear we are living slightly beyond our means.'

'Then you must just increase your means; for I'm sure I can't save a halfpenny, with Po-ope's eye at fourteen pence a-pound.'

This last touch was like the pathetic opening of a sluice. I accordingly insinuated, 'Sylph of my juvenile fancy!'

'Bosh!'

'You are entirely right. There is nothing like increasing one's means. Late as it is in life, I shall begin business on my own account. You have several rich friends—the M'Grubbers, for instance—who will no doubt furnish me with ample capital.'

'What!' exclaimed my impulsive one, with a flash which dried her eyes, 'would you demean yourself before my friends? You shall do nothing of the kind.'

Alas for my two courses!—both, it is true, before me, but neither in the least open. Oh, to soar upwards, and look down upon the ground-plan of my life's labyrinth! Oh, the horror of closed vistas, double-locked gates, and, on all sides, gorgon faces of discouragement and denial! Oh, poor doomed household gods! Oh, weary and bungled life!

Therefore was I very despondent. What to me was the Reform Bill, or Paper-duty Repeal, or claret at two shillings per bottle, or Joe M'Corkindale—though I confess to something generous about the wretch preparing to make himself a gray unit in the huge military sum total in honour of the Queen's birthday? Great powers! I was in debt—surely the miserablist condition under heaven, next nearest to crime! As for the amount, suffice it that it was too large for me to pay, and too small for me to compromise. True, I was perfectly solvent—that is, I had household effects more than sufficient to stand against any sum I owed; but, ay me! my masters! that any chair I might choose to sit on, in my own house, should be virtually the property of the man who supplied the bread! Some foolish reader—for that I have some three or four readers with web-feet I know from their diverse quacking—may think that my simplest way would be to demand a rise of salary on the score of long service. Heaven! be with him! he knows no more of David M'Corkindale, Esq. of the Drums, than an owl! The latter is liberal only in politics; and, on the politico-economical principle of supply and demand, could demonstrate to me or any one, in a gruff, apoplectic hurricane of three minutes, that £200 per annum was my full worth in the clerical market. This, to say truth, he has done more than once; for, under the instigation of strong need, I have been far from backward of appeal. Well-a-day! I fear that at my time of life—and in no position to encounter fresh chances—there is, there can be, nothing for it but to pinch, and scheme, and keep my shoulder to the wheel, and struggle on and on, and smooth down the fiery pinions of my consolers, and hope for fortunate marriages for my daughters, and dream of rich anonymous uncles turning up, ghost-like, in far-away California, to send shocks of joy into their next of kin; and perhaps get deeper and deeper into the mire, and bear my own unfathomable mortification and the world's liberal scorn as I best may, at the last, should all unhappily not end well.

But Barbara—my tall! my beautiful! How could I feel the invisible messengers to be about her, paling and spiritualising her for her celestial bridal, and not hold her in my arms, and entice her with the fairest glories of the world, and adjure her by all the depths, and by all the agonies of our love, to stay? Was our lot no longer fallen upon hard mechanic days, that the angels should be coming down as of old, through the skies, parting the soft clouds of it with the breezes from their bright wings, to make silent and awful selection of the loveliest daughters of men? Ay me! my poor, my patient, my splendid one! so pitiful—so above pity! Should I have wished her less fair—nearer to the base earth—and with more of its dust and stains, in order that she might be spared, if only for a little while? For all my five darlings I had perhaps an equal affection. How, then, did I discover in Barbara's grace a sweetness and an inspiration so far beyond any of the rest? How was it, but from a secret fear that the love, measured out for a life, was under dutiful obligation to crowd itself into a very little space! Yet even while the glow and palor of her saintly features took all cheerfulness from my heart, like the tender fascination of a flower marked out by its very loveliness for decay, I wooed the nursing summer for ally, heard sweet whispers of confidence in every zephyr, and dreamed and trusted that the freshness of all verdure, and the exhalations of all herbs, and the whole ineffable munificence of the leafy season, were divinely medicinal to such as prematurely drooped. Again, however, arose the question—could such influences operate in Portland-street? Yet Bothwell, Bridge-of-Allan, Bute were all beyond the reach of the poor bookkeeper, even for his dying child. I will not swear that there was not, at that moment, a tear in these old eyes. Ay me! to think of it! not without some play of Heaven's finer lightning about my brain—yet helpless, waxing old, tortured with regrets of a life misshapen and wasted, and this cool sweet night of May with a most heavy and grieved heart!

Such was my mood, attributable to causes which I have explained, but of which Jean had a theory of her own. For several nights past, except when my cronie was with me, I had foregone my usual rummer. My domestic moiety, observing me something dull, asserted that this would never do. She, accordingly, by dint of great energy, and as she would take a babe by the nose to compel it to swallow its medicine, had the table jingling and steaming in a moment. My little device for keeping down the grocer's bill was rendered in this way a failure. But while I looked about me irresolute, an overwhelming excuse for compliance presented itself, in the person of Mr. Waddel. His ruddy, well-preserved countenance was overspread with irrepressible glee to the roots of his white hair.

'Where's Barbara?' he exclaimed. 'I bring good news. Aha! my friends!'

'Do tell me what it is,' cried Kate, who had just entered.

'No, I wont, you spunky! What have you done with the sugar tongs? You have surely been all thinking of your sweethearts? Why, I want a toddy lalle!'

'What has occurred?' I asked. 'Has Garibaldi smashed the Neapolitans?'

'Now, just let me be comfortable before I utter a word—I declare the kettle has not been quarter full. Never mind. 'Twill do—I shall prefer it stiff to-night. Good news, my friends!—good news! But I must have Barbara present before I begin to unfold.'

'I think it will turn out a hoax,' said Kate.

'Then you think a thumper,' responded Mr. Waddel.

But the door opened, and Barbara entered, smiling a kind of watery smile, and spreading a little silence. She coughed a severe cough; but said her cold was better, 'now that the east winds were gone.'

Sophia placed a couple of pillows for her in our old easy-chair.

'No, no—I do not need them,' she said; but she nevertheless reclined her slim figure upon them, with a kind of languid ease and obvious feeling of comfort.

'And so, Sophia tells me you have brought good news, Mr. Waddel. But when did you ever bring any other?'

'Ah! but,' said Mathew, opening a small pocket-book, 'when did I ever bring any like that?'

With this he stretched out, and displayed like a flag of victory, a note for one hundred pounds! 'There,' he added, placing it in my hands, 'accept of it, my friend, as a trifling instalment of what I owe you.'

'Owe me! How?'

'Gabriel Gray!' he proceeded, 'Sir! I have feasted any time these forty years on the riches of that indifferent intellect of yours, of which you have unfortunately made so little.'

'But—'

'Be quiet for a moment, will you? you old intolerable! I have this day had a considerable windfall from abroad,—and who should share it if not you? Besides, I have just been presented with a handsome partnership by Simpkins Brothers. Why, man, it will yield me five or six hundreds a-year at the least!'

'My dear sir—'

'There you are off again, you ridiculous Demosthenes! can't I have one brief harangue to myself? Now, Barbara, my dear! we must all be off somewhere to enjoy ourselves—to the country—to the coast—where you will, ladies!'

'I hope to some fashionable place,' interjected Jean.

'I hope to some place where we may grow vegetables and keep hens,' said Jessie.

'I hope to some place where one may wear what one likes,' said Isabella.

'I hope to some place where the air is mild,' said Sophia.

'I hope to some place where we shall have donkeys to ride upon,' cried Kate, clapping her hands.

'Oh, I should so like to climb a mountain on a donkey!' exclaimed Barbara, laughing; and Sophia laughed too; and, as if to see poor Barbara pleased and jocular, we all laughed in turn and together, until our very eyes ran over.

'Mathew Waddel!' I said, 'I accept, in the meantime, this gift, knowing it to be kindly meant. I likewise congratulate you on your sudden prosperity. At the same time I am not without some misgivings. In a few months you will have your mansion in the west-end, your new circle of friends, your little recollection of Portland-street!'

'Never!' cried Mathew, in a rage.

'Don't tell me,' I exclaimed, sceptically. 'I know human nature. The modern upholsteries will have you in their trap, like the biggest rat extant.'

But Mathew, shivering his glass for emphasis, vociferated that I erred in my throat, by Jupiter! And Barbara, though knowing me to be the soul of truth, believed that, in that instance, I erred.

Good news!—memorable night!—Kate dancing to all the chairs for partners! At length sleep fell softly upon our eyelids—Sophia only starting at times wakefully and watchfully, as I knew—while all our pillows were happy, and haunted by delicious dreams.

CURIOUS EPITAPHS.

WHEREVER we find that the literary products of a nation have been preserved at all, there is certain to be found among these specimens of their epitaphs. Instances of this could be cited from Egyptian sarcophagi; ancient Greece, besides others, gives one prominent example in the column erected to the memory of the heroes who fell at Thermopylæ; and Rome has, from the Catacombs, given up many which are now treasured in various antiquarian and archæological collections. In none of these, however, nor in those of any nation save our own, do we find the peculiar elements of point and humour which so remarkably characterise those of our country. Humour, of a kind, seems to go hand in hand with grief; and it is a fact that men in all ages have indulged their humour in this way. It is not less true, however, that attempts to shew a real feeling of sadness for the Departed frequently produce, through their extreme simplicity and quaintness of composition, a similar effect to those in which a sarcastic humour has been employed. There are monuments of expressive beauty and design, well worthy the interest they excite, where pathos is not always the result attained; for, although many are certainly imposing—and perhaps the best artistic services have been employed—yet their inscriptions are frequently devoid of this effect altogether, evoking not the slightest throb of sympathy from the ordinary visitor, and provoke only a smile of contempt at the ostentatious parade of almost unattainable virtue and goodness. While speaking thus, and giving the following selections, we would not by any means wish to throw even a shade of ridicule upon the solemn feelings of regret which the severance of the dearest ties of relationship and friendship call forth in the hearts of those left behind to mourn their loss. It is too true, that 'Leaves have their time to fall,

And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all,
Thou hast off seasons for thine own, O Death!

Many bear the evidence that breaking hearts truly regret the bereavement the epitaphs record, but conceits of thought and eccentricities of expression, as well as a desire to hit off some harmless peculiarity in the deceased, are the basis of a number of curious inscriptions; and, from the many which are to be found, we have selected a few for the entertainment of our readers.

The following quaint verse appears on the tombstone erected by Ebenezer Erakine over the grave of his wife, Alison Turpie, 'who departed to glory after having born ten children, which lye interred with her':—

'The law brought forth her precepts ten,
And then dissolved in grace;
This saint ten children bore, and then
In glory took her place.'

The next is one upon a man who was too poor to be buried with his relations in the church:—

'Here lies I at the chancel door;
Here I lie because I'm poor.
The further in the more to pay;
Here I lie as warm as they.'

A churchyard in Hertfordshire contains the next, which, in its quaintness, shews some depth of meaning:—

'That which a being was, what is itt show;
That being which it was, it is not now;
To be what 'tis—is not to be, you see;
That which now is not, shall a being be.'

The monument over the grave of the architect of the Exchange of Newcastle, has this:—

'Here lies Robert Trollop,
Who made yon stones to roll up.
When Death took his soul up,
His body filled this hole up.'

The next is on some toper, who had an unquenchable spark in his throat:—

'Dead drunk, here Ellerton doth lie;
Dead as he is, he still is dry;
So of him it may well be said,
Here he, but not his think, is laid.'

The effects of drinking, but of a different nature, gives another instance:—

'Here lies I and my three daughters,
Killed by a drinking of Chaltenham waters;
If we had stuck to Espoon salts,
We'd not be lying in these here vaults.'

In Plumstead churchyard, the following is inscribed over the grave of one John Harris, dated 1829:—

'My anvil's worn, my forge decayed,
My body in the dust is laid,
My coal is burn'd, my iron's run,
My last nail's drove, my work is done.'

The next is inscribed over a linen-drawer:—

'Cottons and cambrics all adieu!
And muslins, too, farewell!
Plain, striped, and figured, old and new,
Three-quarters, yard, or ell.
By nail and yard I've measured ye,
As customers inclined;
The churchyard now has measured me,
And nails my coffin bind.'

In 'Seven Oaks' churchyard is the following:—

'Grim Death took me without any warning,
I was well at night, and dead at nine in the morning.'

Here is another, equally brief:—

'Tis my request,
My bones may rest,
Without molest,
Within this chest.'

In the old churchyard of Durness, there is a quaint inscription, which runs thus:—

'Donald M'Murrough here lies low,
Ill to his friend, waur to his foe,
True to his chief in wiew and woo.'

We don't vouch for the authenticity of the next one as having ever been really used as an epitaph, though it might have been originally written as such:—

'David Macpherson
Was a very remarkable person;
He stood six feet two
Without his shoe,
And he was slew
At Waterloo.'

There are many which bear a sarcastic feeling of apparent regret, which can be easily interpreted; these occur more especially in the case of the marital relationship, as in the following instance:—

'My wife lies here beneath,
Alas! from me she's flown;
She was so good that Death
Would have her for his own.'

One widow, who did not honour her deceased lord more than ordinarily, added a postscript of her own to the epitaph which had been prepared for her husband:—

'To follow you I'm not content,
Until I know which way you went.'

Mrs. W——, the widow of a celebrated musician, had inscribed on his monument:—'He is gone where only his music can be excelled.' The widow of a pyrotechnist saw this, and had inscribed on her husband's monument:—'He is gone where only his fireworks can be excelled.'

In connection with this confusion of ideas, we give the two following. The first runs thus:—'Hier lys Alexander Peter, present town-treasurer of Arbroath, who died the 19th January, 1630.' The other is from the churchyard of Tain:—'Sacred to the memory of Henrietta Grant, spouse of Robert Ross, plasterer, Tain, who departed this life on the 10th Dec. 1839, and also of their daughter. This stone was erected by her affectionate husband.' Whose husband is here meant?

Attempts are made frequently to make the cause of death appear in the epitaph, and occasionally succeeds, with ludicrous effect. This appears in the churchyard of Acton:—

'Here lies the bones of Richard Lawton,
Whose death, alas, was strangely brought on;
Trying one day his corns to mow off,
The razor slipped, and cut his toe off.
His toe, or rather what it grew to,
An inflammation quickly flew to,
Which took, alas, to mortifying,
And was the cause of Richard's dying.'

The next is quite as circumstantial:—

'Here lies interred a man o' micht,
His name was Malcolm Downie,
He lost his life as market micht,
By fa'in aff his pownde.'

Another of the same:—

'Here lies the body of poor Charles Lamb,
Killed by a tree that fell slap-bang.'

In Calstock churchyard, Cornwall, is to be found the following:—

'Twas by a fall I caught my death;
No man can tell his time or breath;
I might have died as soon as then,
If I had had physician men.'

The next was written to the memory of a young woman who was accidentally drowned, while drawing water:—

'Nigh to the river Ouse, in York's fair city,
Unto this pretty maid Death showed no pity;
As soon as she'd her pail with water filled,
Came sudden Death, and life, like water, spilled.'

The following is inscribed on the grave of a smuggler, in a country churchyard. He was shot by an exciseman:—

'Here I lie,
Shot by the X's.'

A difficulty in the rhyming powers of the composer of one of this nature, was most strangely obviated in his attempt to make the cause of death rhyme with the name of the deceased:—

'Here lies Richard Dunn,
Who was killed by a gun;
His name was Pryme,
But that wouldn't rhyme.'

There is certainly no means of knowing how much ill-health or how many deaths the fogs of London may have caused, but of one unfortunate Frenchman we have certain knowledge, since his friends have erected in Kensal Green Cemetery a monument with this significant line upon it:—

'Suffocated in a London fog.'

Brevity is said to be the soul of wit, and we may say that something of this appears in the one last given; but briefer epitaphs than the following two could hardly be obtained, considering the meanings attached. Over the grave of the tragedian, Burbage, these two words are inscribed—apt enough for one on whom the curtain has fallen after playing many parts on the mimic stage:—

'Exit Burbage.'

The other is in a churchyard at Amsterdam, and equals in brevity that of Burbage. Upon a white marble monument appears:—

'Effen uyt.'

Two Flemish words meaning Exactly. Closely beneath, there is represented a pair of old-fashioned slippers. This tombstone has a curious story attached to it, of an old man who had got the idea into his head that he would live a certain number of years and no longer. Being tolerably well off in the world, and being likewise a little selfish, he was desirous of enjoying what he had of this world's gear himself; and he so portioned off his goods that his fortune and his stated term of life would both expire at once. Strange as it may seem, he actually did die at the time he had computed; and at the end had so exhausted his estate that, after paying all debts, there was nothing left but the old pair of slippers here represented.

In Mr. Booth's recently published work on 'Epigrams,' he gives the following, though he does not state the locality of the churchyard in which it is to be found:—

'Thorpe's Corpse.'

Another, remarkable in its brevity likewise, conveys the truth that however rich and powerful men may be, perfect happiness is not to be found upon earth, for upon the tombstone of Count Tessin we find the suggestive words inscribed—

'Happy at last.'

We conclude with the following singularly beautiful epitaph, reminding us of the poems of Ossian. It is a translation from one, in Gaelic, in a parish church of Argyleshire:—

'Lo! she lies here in the dust, and her memory fills me with grief; silent is the tongue of Melody, and the hand of Elegance is now at rest. No more shall the poor give thee his blessing, nor shall the naked be warmed with the fleece of thy flock; the tear shalt thou not wipe away from the eye of the wretched. Where now, O feeble! is thy wonted help? No more, my Fair! shall we meet thee in the social hall; no more shall we sit at thy hospitable board. Gone for ever is the sound of mirth; the kind, the candid, the meek is now no more. Who can express our grief? Flow, ye tears of woe!'

A LITTLE CHAFF ON PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

THE EARLY BIRD GETS THE WORM.

In the first place, it is not at all certain that he does; and whether he does or not, I must acknowledge a strong prejudice against him. He gives me the idea of one who tries to overreach his neighbours, who would sit up all night rather than not be before you at his breakfast—a sort of feathered Fasco eternally circumventing you in things great and small; so much so, that he seems nearly related to those wakeful birds who take such care of us and our money on race-courses—pert familiar birds who, with a wink and a pat on the back, are always ready to put you up to a good thing; and it is not easy to get rid of a feeling of sharp practice, implied if not inculcated.

But does the early bird get the worm? No doubt he enjoys the sunrise, and has quiet flirtations in the early dawn, thinking all the time how sharp and wide-awake he is; still, I suspect the more mature bird who, ignoring the fascinations of the little wrens, looks out warm and comfortable from his hole in the wall, or the snug fork of a tree, sees a good deal more of what passes round him, and not only gets more fun for his money, but is apt to pick up the worm while others are billing and cooing, and admiring the beauties of nature. On the whole, these very smart men do not last—the pace is too great—the anxiety to be forever first too wearing; like Mr. Toots, they suddenly go out of flower, thus saving us from that dreadfully high pressure which prevails across the Atlantic.

Of course, all must depend upon what the worm is. If it be a strictly personal object, such as the attainment of wealth, position, or the like, without regard to the welfare of our neighbours or our own souls, doubtless the early bird should have it all his own way; but if it has any connection with self-respect, and a volume not so often read as quoted, commend me to the later bird, who is not in such a desperate hurry to take the lead.

It happens, much to the annoyance of my friends, that I have an unfortunate love of low society, and spend much of my time among people whose acquaintance is much sought by members of the police force. Among them, traits of character are more strongly developed. A domestic quarrel generally ends in blows; and the good father, though sparing the rod, kicks his child down stairs. The passions have more swing, and concealment of family griefs is undreamed of; therefore, when we want to see our pet theories carried out to their full extent, we must dive below our own neatly lacquered level, and look at humanity untrammelled by the laws of society. Now, I believe, of all early birds the thief and costermonger may be considered the earliest. They work harder than most men for their living—are more or less at war with the rest of mankind—have abilities far above the average; and both, in spite of and partly as a consequence of their excessive acuteness, lead a life of misery and vice.

I hope the days when it was supposed that cheating was bred in the blood have passed away for ever. It is true that to reclaim one of these nomads seems to be a task beyond our strength; like the poor coster-girl whom a gentleman took into his house in time of great distress, they pine for the freedom of the street life. (She, poor child, decamped as soon as that poor man's blessing—sprats—came in.) Still, no one who has been among these lost tribes can fail to remark their many good points. How they help one another in trouble! how faithful the women are to their quasi husbands! with what curious eyes they watch the example we set them, and, it is to be feared, reason from it not unjustly, that they are no worse than their neighbours! Patient and enduring themselves, they see us early and late endeavouring to overreach each other, and we wonder that they think it fair to prey upon us. To each other they are for the most part honest enough. The costermonger often gives a meal on credit to the poor—they do not cheat him, nor he them; but when he comes to the more respectable parts of the town, then comes the tug of war. The thrifty housewife must have everything at half its value; and if some of the plums are stone I am not sure that the game was so very unfair.

Oh, the sin and ruin which this precept has led to! The overstrained brain—the false step just as the object seemed so nearly attained—and then the fall into an abyss of misery, leaving a desolate hearth and the honest heads we loved bowed down with shame!

Even suppose we do get the worm, how often does it come up to our expectations? How often does it repay the cost? A young man starts in business with little or no capital beyond this—love of early rising. By some means he commands credit, and goes on year after year grasping at all that comes in his way. He keeps strictly within the law, using it sometimes hardly, but never going beyond it. At last he makes a fortune. Do you think it repays him for those restless nights, when any hour might bring ruin and disgrace—when all depended on a telegraph being in order, or the speed of a ship? Depend upon it, some accident will always remind him of the small trader on whom he was so hard—of the widow he turned from his door; and many an act which seemed all right at the time will dwell like a ghost in his thoughts.

With women, position is generally the favourite object. What labour they will go through! what insults they will smile at! With some, no sacrifice of domestic comfort or self-respect is too great, provided they can keep up a certain nominal position in society. Nothing will make them believe that the public are not deceived by their efforts, and would respect them much more if they laid aside these flimsy pretences. They must give certain dinners, and be at certain places, at the correct times and seasons, or life is a burden too great to be endured.

I remember a severe lesson being administered to a lady of this class by her husband. A friend of his who knew them to be very poor, declined an invitation to lunch rather than cause the lady any trouble or annoyance. The more he declined the more she pressed the invitation—tempting him with various dishes, till she came to cold fowl and tongue, when the unfortunate husband, who had not seen such a thing in his house for years, could stand it no longer, and burst out—‘My dear Jane, you know very well we have not a thing but bacon and eggs in the house.’ Let us hope his friend carried him safe out of harm’s way.

To this phase of the female character, in a lower rank of life, we are indebted for the never-failing supply of ‘pretty horsebreakers,’ who have lately, with questionable taste, been brought prominently to public notice. Let us in justice acknowledge that it is nonsense to pretend they have sunk from the higher ranks of life; on the contrary, the source of evil is a heated imagination fostered by those who call themselves the friends of the poor, and are not ashamed to pander to their morbid tastes, combined with a desire for dress and luxury beyond their means. Here, too, lies the difficulty of reformation. We can neither produce a mental revolution in a moment nor afford to bring them from their course of sin; and so we offer a cold, cheerless room, with the simplest fare and honesty for salt, in the place of a round of luxury and dissipation. Unfortunately, both honesty and salt are acquired tastes.

In political life, we have abandoned ‘the early bird.’ Lord Elgin would probably not think himself justified in showing a false copy of a treaty to a native prince, and inducing him to sign the real—as a great ruler of India is said to have done. On the contrary, we are rather accused of being duped in our negotiations with Continental Courts; but if such is the case, better so than to seek to overreach them in turn. Let us be first, if we can; but, above all, let us be honest.

There is a class of early birds on which we have not yet touched, which seems to me to be much on the increase—blasé young men and fast young ladies. Among young people there really seems to be an attempt to change the characteristics of the sexes. Young men loll about feebly, and affably allow young ladies to make conversation for them—gently intimating approval of any expression which approaches more nearly than usual the rubicon of propriety. When I was young—though perhaps we were no better than the present generation—we at least concealed our morbid tastes; and entered the society of ladies as a purifying atmosphere to which we were fortunate in obtaining admission—taking it as a compliment when we could overcome the reserve with which we were at first received. We chose our topics of conversation with care. If our world was evil, we at least kept it veiled from their eyes; and any weak points we discovered we seldom betrayed to our dearest friends.

Now all is changed. We no longer respect a lady because she is a woman; but some few women because they are ladies. Our behaviour in their company is like Jones at the opera abroad, as compared with Jones at Covent Garden—we pretend to think their purity affected; just as we pretend to be free-thinkers, and watch for any accidental expression which may be converted into a scandal for our smoking-room.

So it has gradually come to pass that young ladies, finding at length that men disregard their little wiles, come trembling to the threshold of our lives—stand pale and hesitating for a time—then, from some sudden impulse, draw aside the curtain, and, ‘like fools, rush in where angels fear to tread.’ Then, like the sons of God when they loved the daughters of man, they exchange their divinity for a tainted notoriety—their glory fades for ever; and men reward them with their contempt.

After all, both parties have deceived themselves utterly. The blasé youths have no idea of the real character and feelings of the girls of whom they speak so lightly; they have not the penetration to see that all that is most objectionable is only assumed to please them—that ladies, unfortunately, choose to lower themselves to their level; and nine times out of ten they glory in fancied conquests, and gloat over imaginary vice. On the other hand, surely fast young ladies are not aware of the estimation in which they are held even by fast men; they do not dream of the penalty they pay for a little popularity; they forget that they can never use the fearful weapons of those with whom they try to compete; and gradually, as step by step they discover their mistake, they sink into heartless misanthropy or gloomy religion.

I may be old-fashioned and wrong, but I confess I would sooner see more steadiness of purpose, and less pressing forward for the sake of being first. At any rate, I hope none whom I love may ever be tempted to believe that the early bird really gets the worm.

‘VANITAS VANITATIS.’

This is the slave all are called upon to carry in our triumphant cars—the memento mori from which we are never to part—the text from which philosophy has preached from the earliest ages. It survived many buffets from Master Luther and his friends; and since then, every now and then, some bold churchman has ventured to lay it aside; but, even now, how few there are who dare boldly to declare that life, with all its stains and blemishes, is beautiful, or remind us that He who made the world saw that it was good! Certainly if this contempt for mundane things be a condition of orthodoxy, I for one am out of the pale; for I am by no means prepared to acknowledge life to be all vanity. That there is an ultimate end and object set before us, as compared with which every worldly pleasure is insignificant, is of course not only true, but the great truth; but surely it is almost as profane to lose sight of the blessings which surround us, when gazing up to heaven, as to allow present cares to impede our exertions to obtain future happiness.

Of all the gifts with which we are endowed, none come more frequently under the lash of these bitter words than the power of enjoying beauty in its various forms, though its good results are more varied than at first sight appears. Dear reader, if ever you would soften your heart towards your neighbour, go in softly, and see your enemy asleep. Even as David looked upon Saul, and stayed the hand of Abiahai, so will you say to your evil spirit, 'Destroy him not, for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed, and be guiltless?' In sleep, as in death, there is a beauty and solemnity for which we cannot account. Perhaps it is that the sleeper seems to have entirely abandoned his individuality. His soul seems far away, and we cannot help thinking he is in some way specially under Divine protection. From whatever cause it may arise, it is a fact that only great wickedness dare break through the majesty of sleep. Children have always a certain kind of beauty, but in sleep this becomes intensified to a wonderful degree. When we look on their little faces sleeping so calmly and profoundly, their little limbs thrown about in such careless ease, we cannot but acknowledge the poetic truth of the baby hymn:—

'I have four corners to my bed;
I have four angels round my head—
One to watch, and two to pray,
With one to guard me night and day.'

Is this all vanity? Am I wicked because, watching a sleeping child, I lose sight of the little sinner? Must it be all gall and wormwood—all dust and ashes?

Many years ago, a poor woman was found, by the Monks of St. Bernard, with a little baby frozen to her breast; she herself was nearly naked, and the child had all her clothes wrapped round it. The morgue of the St. Bernard is never empty; but day by day, through these long years, who can say what sermons this little child in its peaceful sleep, has preached to the passers-by? Depend upon it, years after all human beauty had faded from the mother's face, long after the little form had shrunk almost to nothing, many a man, after seeing that dead mother nursing her dead child, has gone home blessing God for the self-devotion of women, and spoken so kindly to his wife, that she thought he must be ill.

Women have the peculiar advantage of a double beauty—the palpable beauty of form which we can analyse, and a singular grace quite independent of the body, in which the soul seems to shine out, surrounding them with a power of attraction which we acknowledge almost against our will. Often, in London, when I see a beautiful woman—an 'early bird' who is kind enough to take me under his patronage when I go to town, makes minced meat of her reputation in a few words. Do you think I turn away my eyes and cry 'Vanitas vanitatis'? Not at all. The temple may be desecrated, but it is still beautiful. I do not indeed care to look too close, to see the broken altar and the idols in the sanctuary; the exterior is pleasing, and I admire and thank the Architect for his work, without dreaming that I shall sink in His estimation for noticing a beautiful ruin.

At the great Exhibition last year, to which my friend was kind enough to escort me, I could not help contrasting the actual beauties who walked up and down the nave, and seemed to challenge criticism, with others whose faces derived their beauty entirely from the interest they took in all around them, and thought the comparison greatly in favour of the latter—though I am bound to say this idea of mine did not at all meet with the approval of my guide; indeed, my bad taste in this and other matters of fashion had already put his friendship to a severe test, when an incident occurred which nearly overcame his fortitude. A part of the Exhibition in which I took great delight was the inconvenient little court in which the mechanical figures were exhibited. There, in deference to my age and childlikeness, we passed a good deal of our time, watching anxious mothers launching their children into the crowd to get a peep at automata, and stately elder brothers in jackets escorting their little sisters.

One day when we were thus employed, there sprang out of the crowd a little radiant face, surrounded by a queer antediluvian bonnet, evidently a wanderer from some remote village. Alas! the bright face soon clouded over—a moment or two of bewilderment, and the little thing burst into tears. In vain we tried to comfort her; all our endeavours were met by a cry for 'Rachie.' 'Who on earth was Rachie? Was it a man—or a woman? Had it a great broad brimmed hat or a prehistoric bonnet? Above all, how were we to find this unknown being? Of course, in our despair we did the most foolish thing possible, and dragged about our little charge in all directions, crying piteously, till the poor thing could walk no longer. Now, for a gentleman who is in the habit of wearing white waistcoats, mauve gloves and ties, and resplendent boots, to walk about the Exhibition with an old fellow dressed in tweed and a blue and white bird's-eye handkerchief, though unpleasant, looked respectable. Doubtless my early friend spoke of me to his acquaintances as an eccentric millionaire, or a leading member of the Peace Society; but when to this was added a child in blue-spotted frock, a bright red shawl, and a bonnet resembling in shape a section of a stone chimney, the position was certainly trying, and I fully expected my guide to drive into the crowd, leaving me alone with my Perdita in clogs. At last, however, the brilliant idea occurred to him that as no one could see the child, no one was likely to claim her, and, as a corollary, that one of us must exhibit it to the public. For a moment he hesitated (human nature is but weak). The next saw our little trouville nearly six feet in the air, perched on his broad shoulders.

The effect was magical; the novelty of the position brought a smile to the tearful face, and the little arms clung confidently round his neck. I don't think he had ever seen a child's face so near in his life, and am by no means sure that his lips did not find their way into the antediluvian bonnet. Do you think he thought then of the fine ladies we passed? Did he remember that those dirty little boots were ruining his white waistcoat? Not a bit of it. All he knew was that somehow his heart was softened towards the child, one touch of nature had blown away all his affectation; and I really think he was almost sorry when a rustic elder sister claimed our charge. Should I have cried 'Vanitas, vanitatis'? At all events I did not do so, and we walked about in silence for some time, while he pretended to be busied in endeavouring to re-arrange his dress—feeling, I think, rather ashamed of his weakness.

We are very apt to misjudge these young swells, I fancy, and to form the same sort of opinion of them as they profess to have formed of all women out of their own family. It is not long since, for example, there was a great cry for reformation in the army. Its officers were supposed to have greatly deteriorated, or at all events to be much behind the age in point of education and professional ability; while the life they led was a mixture of inane idleness and objectionable luxury. The Guards were spoken of as a show corps of dissipated patricians. When a base seducer was required for a novel he was chosen from their ranks; and every bagman quoted Sir Charles Napier's dictum, that an officer's baggage should consist of 'a shirt, a towel, and a piece of soap'—a tooth-brush being apparently considered an effeminate luxury.

No sooner, however, did the prospect of war appear, than the purple couch, the roses, and falerian were laid aside; in a moment the roué abandoned his intrigues, and beardless youths changed into grave, determined men. Few sights, indeed, could be more impressive to a Londoner than that march of the Guards through town in the grey morning. It was grand to see the firm bearing of those men, at last called upon to show their worth (no one doubted them now), and touching to hear the exclamations of the women as some very young officer passed—his mother's tears hardly dry upon his cheeks, looking as grave and calm as Sir Dugald Dalgetty. Now that our heroes have come home, you seldom hear them talk of the matter; but do you think they enjoyed their campaign? Do you think that night after night, sitting in those cold trenches, with death stalking round them, keeping themselves awake by watching the shells flying through the darkness, they never thought of London, with its purple and fine linen, or regretted that jolly careless life; never longed for the home where mother and sisters, who believed them to be the best men in the world, sat nearly heart-broken, praying almost against hope for their safe return?

I once talked on the subject to a 'brave sabreur,' who is kind enough sometimes to make use of my house as a hunting-box, and whom my housekeeper looks upon as the incarnation of manly beauty, bravery, and iniquity. 'Well,' he said, 'it is all very fine to talk of the excitement. I was not there many months, but I can assure you the trench-work was no joke. There we sat all night, listening to the sound of the bullets and shells flying about in all directions, taking the names of killed and wounded and afraid to go to sleep for fear of a sortie. I confess I did not see the fun of it. You never felt safe for a minute, and when daylight came, and a fellow was as stiff as a post, there was a long walk, not over safe, with a report to write at the end of it. I hated it then, and now it's over, I funk it. You need not steer at my hero. When that brave aid-de-camp, forgetting everything but his fixed idea that cavalry could go through anything, cried 'There are your orders, sir, and there is the enemy!' and dashed at the Russians, he was by his side. Now he is a C. B., his breast is covered with medals, and he talks as if the exertion were rather too much for him. I should not like to think that this self-denial—all the sufferings of those abroad, and the tears of those at home, were in vain.

Again, we often see great acts of self-devotion and presence of mind, which carry their own reward so obviously that their intrinsic worth must be acknowledged, even at the price of allowing that there is still some good in the world. Thus, when a man goes out in a life-boat, his chance of reward is very small as compared to the improbability of his safe return; yet we never hear of a crew being wanted in such cases. A more remarkable case occurred so lately that it must be in the recollection of all my readers. The driver of a pilot engine went to sleep, and in that condition passed another driver, who was standing cleaning his engine. This man was aware that his comrade was rushing unconsciously to meet an express train. He immediately gave chase, caught up and sprang on to the runaway engine, and brought it on to a siding just as the express rushed past. I suppose most of us have forgotten this man's name, as we have that of the woman who, during the great fire at New-Brunswick, which burned miles and miles of forest, lay down in such a manner over her child that it was taken alive from under her charred remains—no one will give him a Victoria Cross—no one presents him with addresses; but I think if you were to ask him, you would find he would not give up the consciousness of having done that brave action for all the rewards it is in our power to give.

If 'Vanitas vanitatis' is to be our guide, only two courses seem to be open to us—to lead a life of stern asceticism, shutting our eyes to the faded beauty of the world, blindly passing over all the good that is left, and fixing our thoughts in self-righteous contemplation of the evil for which I can find no authority; or throwing away the scabbard, to dash wildly into the strife for enjoyment, each seizing what he covets, regardless of his neighbour. 'Every man for himself, and not God for us all.' 'Eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die.' I do not think either modes of life are pleasant to think of, or in any degree consonant with the teaching of Him who said that 'Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like the lilies of the field.' Though everything is not right and perfect in the world, I cannot help thinking that if we took half the pleasure in seeking out good things that we do in the search for evil, we should find ourselves better men, and discover much hidden treasure which we tread daily under foot. We should live more in charity with our neighbours, and see that it did not lie in the power of man, by his wickedness, utterly to destroy the perfect work of God.

HUGH MACDONALD, 'RAMBLER' AND POET.*

BY THE EDITOR.

IN the west of Scotland there lived and died, not long ago, a homely, genial, bright-souled, nature-loving man, named Hugh Macdonald. Keen and clinging in his sympathies, he was warmly attached to the country, and still more to the locality, of his birth. To Englishmen he was a sturdy Scotchman; to Scotchmen he was a thorough Glasgow man; while to Glasgow men he stood up stoutly for Bridgeton, the suburb where, in April 1817, he was born, and where, in March 1860, he died. Had he emigrated to Canada or Australia, Macdonald would have lilted songs in his native Doric, headed St. Andrew's Societies and Burns' Clubs; and perhaps selected, as his special nightly companions, some little knot of the sons of St. Mungo with whom to discourse of the beauties of the Clyde, the Kelvin, and the Cart, and of the spring and summer blooms of Cathkin, Castlemilk, and Carmyle.

But it is difficult to imagine any turn of fortune strong enough to have transplanted such a man to any other clime. Hugh Macdonald was rooted, in all his deepest affections, to the Scottish soil. The scenes where he had played in boyhood, and the friends among whom he had all his life lived, made up his world. He cared little for anything beyond. In one sense, indeed, he was as diligent a traveller as ever grasped oaken staff. But, as a general rule, his journeys were only to the extent that his own feet could carry him, and that the daylight, with occasional supplement of moon or stars, might suffice to light him home. Yet he saw more than many who travelled farther. His pedestrian excursions included all that was beautiful, curious, or memorable within a radius of ten or twelve miles of his 'ain hearth-stane.' He was like a student who, confining himself to a single branch of study, attains to a rare degree of proficiency. If his range was limited, the ground he explored was mastered in all its details. His 'Rambles round Glasgow' were historical, legendary, antiquarian, topographical, botanical, poetical; and so much did he gather from the past and glean from the present, concerning the localities he visited, that his graphic pen-and-ink sketches possessed a certain air and charm of novelty, even for those to whom the scenes described had long been familiar.

The work we have mentioned formed the basis of a considerable local reputation. Hugh Macdonald had been a working man—he was now a professed litterateur, in connection with one or other of the Glasgow newspapers. His merits were generally recognised as peculiar—almost unique. Worshipping Burns, delighting in Tannahill, and admiring Professor Wilson—with whom he had a memorable interview on one occasion—he was yet no man's follower. He had carved out a field for himself. Pedestrians bought his book, that they might be guided to the most interesting spots—persons of a botanical turn of mind bought it, that they might be directed to the haunts of the loveliest wild flowers—the gentry around Glasgow bought it, that they might learn the traditions of the houses in which they dwelt, or of the ivy-grown ruins of which they were the proud possessors. But what endeared the 'Rambles' to mere fireside readers, was the spirit of kindness, the poetical warmth of heart, and the tone of simple humanity by which they were pervaded. The author was not an abstraction. He was continually present, as it were, in the flesh, grasping the reader by the hand—telling him his old-world stories face to face—endeavouring to communicate to him his own intense love of bird or flower—pointing his attention, triumphantly, to some glorious burst of landscape—or sharing with him his 'cakes and ale' in some little wayside hostelry. It was impossible to read the 'Rambles' without loving the Rambler. This love was confirmed and increased on actual personal acquaintance. Hugh Macdonald was felt to be a man worth knowing. No one was disappointed in him. He was precisely what his writings showed him to be—a pleasant, unaffected, outspoken, homely Scotchman, who knew all about natural history—was intimately conversant with Scottish ballad literature and antiquities—sung a good song—maintained his own opinions sturdily, yet without offence—was companionable, almost to a fault—and seldom the first to 'part good company.' No man in his station ever contracted more numerous or stronger friendships.

Macdonald's second work was entitled 'Days at the Coast.' It was an extension of the 'Rambles,' with the occasional partial aid of rail or steamer, to the shores and mountains of the magnificent Frith of Clyde. In early life he had sung—

'Let others love the tangled Forest,
Or mountain-shadow'd Spey;
The Don, the Dee, wake others' glee,
Fair Tweed, or queenly Tay;
From all their charms of wood or wild,
I ever turn with pride
To where the golden apple gleams,
On thy green banks, sweet Clyde!'

This love for his native river had deepened with his years; and the time had now come when he was to unroll its picturesque splendour, and grand historical memories, in a series of sketches, as genuine and delightful as those of a more local kind, which had previously rendered him a celebrity among his neighbours and throughout the west of Scotland generally. The same deep-seated love of nature was everywhere apparent—the same profound sympathy with suffering in every shape—the same delighted relish for interesting tradition, or illustrative snatch of song. Our author's literary fame was increasing, and the circle of his personal friends and admirers was widening, when he was prematurely cut off in the forty-third year of his age. Seldom has any man of like position and opportunities been more lamented. Glasgow's much-loved Rambler was dead, and if it be true that, when the poet dies, the sorrow of the city should have been followed by the diffusion of a visible gloom throughout all the secluded holms and beautiful straths of Clydesdale.

'All nature mourns her worshipper.'

Readers at a distance, who have perhaps never heard of Hugh Macdonald before, may already have guessed that he was not merely a descriptive writer of high excellence, but a poet in the truest sense. Poetry of the loftiest kind he never attempted. But poetry of the truest kind he often tried and achieved. He sang and wrote out of the fulness of his own heart, and therefore he sang and wrote truly and effectively. Unlike many minor minstrels, his imagination never aimed at soaring higher than the strength of its wing would safely warrant. Could anything be finer in their way than the following stanzas of 'Wee Annie o' Auchineden'?

'A gowden dream thou art to me,
From shades of earth and evil free;
An angel form of love and glee,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

I never saw thy winsome face,
Thy bairnly beauty row'd in grace;
Yet thou art with me every place,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

Where flick'ring beams beneath the trees
Flit playful in the summer breeze,
The eye of fancy ever sees
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

Thy mither's cheek was wet and pale,
And aft in sighs her words wad fall,
When in mine ear she breathed thy tale,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

That low sweet voice through many a year,
If life is mine, shall haunt my ear,
Which pictured thee with smile and tear,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

Low was thy hame upon the moor,
'Mang dark brown heaths and mountains hoar;
Thou wert a sunbeam at the door,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

But the auld folk shook their heads to see
Sic wisdom lent to a bairn like thee;
'Lang here, they sigh'd, 'ye wadna be.'
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

And thou wert ta'en frae this world o' tears,
Unstain'd by the sorrow or sin of years;
Thy voice is now in the angel's ears,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

The primrose glints on the spring's return,
The merle sings blithe to the dancin' burn;
But there's ae sweet flower we aye shall mourn,
Wee Annie o' Auchineden.

Or take the following, in which pawky Scotch humour, homely description, and parental tenderness are exquisitely blended:—

'A wee, wee man, wi' an unco' din,
Cam to our belid yestreen,
And siccan a rippet the body rais'd
As seldom was heard or seen;

He wanted claes, he wanted shoon,
And something to weest his mou';
And aye he spurr'd wi' his tiny feet,
And blink'd wi' his e'en o' blue.

His face, which nane had seen before,
Thrill'd strangely through ilk min',
Wi' gowden dreams frae mem'ry's store,
Of loved anes lost langsyne.
A faither's brow, a mither's e'en,
A brither's dimpled chin,
Were mingled a' on that sweet face,
Fresh sent frae a hand aboon.

Oh! soon ilka heart grew grit wi' love,
And draps o' joy were seen
To trinkle fast o'er channell'd cheeks,
Where streams o' wae had been.
A welcome blithe we gie'd the chiel,
To share our lowly ha';
And we row'd him warm in fleecy duds,
And linen like Januar snaw.

Our guidman has a way o' his ain,
His word maun aye be law—
Frae Candlemas to blithe Yule e'en
He rules baith grit and sma';
But the howdle reig'n'd yestreen, I trow,
And swagger'd baith but and ben—
Even the big arm-chair was push'd agee
Frae the cozie chimley en'.

The guidman snooved about the house,
Aye runnin' in some ane's way,
And aft he glanced at the wee thing's face,
On the auld wife's lap that lay;
His breast grew grit wi' love and pride,
While the bairn was hush'd asleep,
And a gush o' blessings frae his heart
Came welling, warm and deep.

I canna boast o' gowd, quoth he,
My wealth's a willing arm,
Yet health, and strength, and wark be mine,
And wha shall bode thee harm?
To fill thy wee bit caup and cog,
And gie thee claes and lair,
Wi' joy and sweet content I'll strive
Through poortith, toll, and care.

There's joy within the simmer woods,
When wee birds chip the shell,
When firstling roses tint wi' bloom
The lip of sunlit dell;
But sweeter than the nestling bird,
Or rosebud on the lea,
Is yon wee smiling gift of love
Unto a parent's e'e.'

As a sample of Macdonald's songs, we have room only for 'The waeftu' want o' siller':—

'Oh, the waeftu' want o' siller,
Oh, the weary want o' siller,
I've seen baith love and friendship flee
Before the waeftu' want o' siller!

When fortune deign'd to smile on me,
My love was true, my friends were many;
But poortith's frown sune garr'd them flee—
I'm shunn'd as though I werena cannie.
Oh, the waeftu', &c.

My purse was light, my heart was sair,
Thinks I, my lassie's smiles will cheer me;
But, sune's she saw my coat aye bare,
The fickle jaud scorn'd to come near me.
Oh, the waeftu', &c.

Thinks I, though love has scorn'd me so,
Blithe friendship's sure to use me better;

But soon I found that friendship too,
Like love, required a golden fetter.
Oh, the woe'st', &c.

Wae worth the friends that Fortune brings,
Wae worth the love that poornith frightens;
But dearer far than wealth o' kings,
The flame that dark misfortune brightens,
Oh, the woe'st', &c.

We are glad that the poems and songs of Hugh Macdonald have been collected into a volume and given to the world, accompanied by a memoir of the gifted and amiable author. The memoir, we believe, is from the friendly hand of Mr. W. W. Scott, now of Falkirk; and tells, in a style which Macdonald himself would have appreciated, nearly all that need be known of his uneventful though not uninteresting life. One or two pieces might, perhaps, have been omitted with advantage—such as one landing Mr. Fergus O'Connor, and which Macdonald, in his later years, would hardly have wished to see reprinted; and another, disparaging the Rev. George Gilfillan, of Dundee—a man who, on the whole, has deserved well of the minor poets of Scotland. The insertion, too, of 'The Bluidy Stair' is a mistake. That powerful ballad, although quoted by Macdonald in his 'Days at the Coast,' was written by one Mackay—a teacher, we believe, in Bute, but of whose life and death we regret that we are unable to supply any particulars. The poems of Macdonald, however, were left loosely scattered through newspapers and periodicals, or cunningly imbedded in his prose writings, not always with a distinct clue to the author. Under these circumstances, some errors were possibly unavoidable; and we can only, therefore, congratulate Mr. Scott on the generally satisfactory completion of his difficult labour of love.

ST. HELENA.

THE island of St. Helena is situate in latitude 15° 15' S., and longitude 5° 46' W. It is 10½ miles long by 6½ broad, with an area of 30,300 acres, and a population of upwards of 5000 souls—nearly half of whom are whites. This island is the touching-point for homeward-bound Indiamen—who call here for water—and has an excellent harbour, to which numerous ships put in during stress of weather.

On a clear day, St. Helena may be seen at a distance of fifty miles out to sea, when it is so indistinct as to present the appearance of a cloud on the horizon. On a nearer approach, however, its vast rocky sides, rising perpendicularly from the sea to an immense height, and the apparent sterility of its surface, with here and there a few patches of verdure, give it a very uninviting aspect. Sailing more to the westward, however, 'High Knoll'—the Castle—is perceived (situate on one of the highest peaks of the island); and, still farther on, the land becomes lower towards the coast, and James Town, with its fine harbour and shipping, comes into view. This town is situated between two barren ranges of rocky hills, of some 700 feet in height, which form a small valley; and it is thus so enconcealed, that it cannot be seen from an approaching vessel until the latter is quite abreast of it.

The surf in the harbour, caused by the waves beating against the rocks, makes a deafening noise; and the white spray continually flying about forms a fine spectacle. Great care and promptitude are necessary in landing from the boats, as these latter are continually rising and falling; so that the traveller has to watch his opportunity in leaping on shore at the proper moment, otherwise he is liable to meet with an accident by falling into the water.

The valley in which James Town lies runs from west to east, where it is partially blocked up by a small hill. To the front, and on each side of this valley, are batteries, which command the entrance to the harbour, and at a short distance from the landing-place is a gate leading into the town. The houses in the immediate vicinity of the harbour, with the exception of a few more inland, appear to be the best on the island; and the finest buildings in the town are the Church, the Civil and Military Officers' quarters, and Storrow's Hotel. The Customhouse is situated behind the church, as also are several other offices, together with the waggon stand; and to the rear of these again are the meat and fruit markets. The main road is fronted by Stebbin's bazaar, which, together with Gibb's and Robbin's storehouses, form the principal shops, the others being very inferior. The road now branches off into two parts, that on the left hand, after leading to the road to Longwood, terminates abruptly near a few dirty little cottages or huts. The road to the right, which runs through the lower part of the town, has by far the best houses in its vicinity, among which may be classed the quarters and barracks occupied by a detachment of the St. Helena Regiment. These latter habitations are kept very neat and clean, and, though not very grand in appearance, afford a pleasing contrast to the dark and dingy cottages of the Creole population, which are situated behind the Blacksmith's garden—a garden surrounded by a high wall, accessible only by means of steps, and cultivated by the soldiers. Further on towards the end of the valley, where it gradually slopes upwards, are a few small cottages, with fruit and vegetable gardens, &c. attached to them. In this place the Baptist and Catholic Chapels are situated, together with two cemeteries on the southern part or side of the hill.

Behind this again, at a slight elevation above James Town, is Briars, a small rising village, towards the south-east of which is the house inhabited by Napoleon when he first landed on the island; this is called the Pavilion. In rear of this are four hills, averaging from some 800 to 1100 feet or thereabouts in height above the level of the sea. Behind Storrow's Hotel, on the south side of the vale, is the wooden ladder, termed Jacob's, leading to the summit of Ladder-Hill. This ladder is said to consist of 700 steps, which, it is truly a labour to ascend; a carriage-road leads to the top of this hill, where there is a small gate guarded by a few soldiers. No road can be made in a straight line for any length, owing to the hilly country, consequently this as well as the other roads are rather circuitous. The headquarters of the regiment is stationed on the top of Ladder-Hill.

Following a small footpath, which leads from the summit of the hill, the pedestrian passes out into the country, and then by two or three other little valleys on the western side of the island. Keeping here as close as possible to the sea-side, the rifle practice-ground is reached. Cartridge-papers thickly scattered over the ground, at the distance of some 900 yards from the target, plainly attest to the practice, if not to the skill, of the regiment of the island.

Travelling upwards and more inland, the carriage road from Ladder-Hill is reached. This rounds High-Knoll on the south side, at an ascent of between 1100 and 1300 feet. High-Knoll is a round mound or hill of lava (plainly attesting to the original volcanic nature of the island), covered over with a slight layer of earth. Fir trees, forming a small plantation, grow on its sides towards the summit—thus enlivening this the bleakest part of the island. A few cottages are scattered here and there on the road-side; but they are quite rude and uninviting to the spectator, and appear to be about the worst in the island. Several meagre fowls, belonging to the poor cottagers, are also seen hereabouts, picking up their scanty subsistence. On the top of High-Knoll is a small fort or castle, which is garrisoned by a detachment of the Royal Artillery. Inside this fort is a prison, so dark as to require a light to see the interior; and on the top is the signal and watch-tower of the island.

The Governor of St. Helena resides at High-Knoll during the hot season, as it is considered the coolest part of the island. To the west of this is Francis Peak, on which is the cricketing ground. From this, Diana's Peak—towering nearly 2000 feet above the level of the sea—is seen; and behind this, again, are the curious pillars known as 'Lot's Wife and Children.' Near the Government House, which is situated towards the south-east of the island, a small town of some importance has sprung up. The houses which compose it are above the ordinary level; and the pleasing effect is heightened by the picturesque little Baptist Chapel and the lonely burial-ground attached to it. The road now, over hill and dale, runs towards the north-west of the island. Farm-houses are met with at intervals, with flocks of sheep, goats, cows, horses, and donkeys; but these are generally few and far between.

The road to Longwood (the house inhabited by Napoleon at the time of his death) ascends the northern side of Diana's Peak, almost immediately after passing Gibb's store, and at the commencement of the northern branch of the main road. It ascends, at a moderate elevation parallel to the valley, almost to its end, but here branches off into three parts. One returns eastward to the valley; another leads to Briars; and the third is a continuation of the mountain road. Of the four hills mentioned elsewhere, one is almost directly east of High-Knoll, and is the hill chosen for the site of Government House, &c.; the second is almost south-east of James Town; a greater part of the third is to its east; while the fourth is in the direct line of the road to Longwood. As the summit of the hill to the north of the town (which has an elevation of 700 feet) has not yet been gained, the road a little further on takes a westerly direction, then again easterly, and, after a short circuit, ascends the fourth hill. Here is a stone on the roadside, intimating that the place is 1184 feet above the level of the sea.

From this spot, the ascent is more gradual and less wearisome. The barren lands are left behind, and as one ascends the country teems with grass and fir trees; willows are also met with, but they are rather scarce.

On the top of the fourth hill is a pretty white house, which was inhabited by Napoleon after he left the Pavilion; and, close at hand, near a hut inhabited by an English settler, is a large iron gun, which formerly used to be fired whenever the Emperor left his house, in order to warn his guards of his exit; but this piece of ordnance is now old and rusty, and has consequently been condemned.

The trees now cluster rather thickly together, and the eye is charmed by the beautiful landscape to the south. The western side of the road (now running directly south) is lined with firs, thickly crowded with leaves.

Far off to the east, is Longwood, where the great Napoleon breathed his last; and further still, beyond it, as far as the eye can reach, is the mighty ocean, bearing on its surface ships of all nations in full sail, many of them laden with the wealth of the East. Beneath is a long wide vale, without a single tree on its sides, though it lacks not the charm which waving meadows of green grass bestow; and towards its farthest extremity, amid cypress and willow trees, by the gentle running spring, and beneath the wide blue canopy of heaven, is the tomb of the greatest warrior of modern times. Surrounding the grave is a wooden enclosure about 30 yards in width, at a small gate leading into which a sentry is usually on guard. A board is fixed on the gate on which is engraved a request that travellers should respect the tomb of Napoleon. Here is also a sentinel's box; in which a book is kept for visitors to inscribe their names. Within the enclosure are sixteen cypresses and two willow-trees; and beneath these latter, surmounted by a large oblong stone-block, and surrounded by a plain iron railing, is the tomb which once contained the remains of the mighty dead.

A few small geraniums grow around the stone; and to the west of the enclosure, and only some three or four yards from the railing which surrounds the grave, is the small spring above referred to, from which Napoleon used to obtain his water, and which was his favourite place of resort.

To the north are a few heliotropes and blue-bells;

and to the south two small cottages, now in disuse, though formerly the residences of the officers and men who guarded the tomb while the Emperor's body was interred there.

Longwood is situated on a slight elevation, and is entered by a gate on the southern side. A long gravelly path, lined with a single row of evergreens (suggestive of the period through which Napoleon's name will be remembered), leads to and around the last dwelling-place of the hero of Austerlitz.

It is a single-storied wooden house, painted light-drab on the outside, and fancifully papered within, having green Venetian shutters, &c.

The rooms are small and of a moderate height—neat, clean, and boarded. A billiard-table in the billiard-room, a marble bust, and a looking-glass (enclosed by a low iron paling) in the room in which the Emperor died, and another mirror in his drawing-room, are the only articles of furniture left behind by his 'veteran soldiers and adoring subjects.'

A corporal and four private soldiers now guard the place. At a farm-house a short distance off in the vale, breakfast and dinner are provided for the visitor—though at a heavy expense—by a worthy dame, yclept Mother Shirley. Having now described the chief objects of interest throughout the island, we may say a few words about the climate, &c. This is at all times most temperate. The hottest season—embracing the months of January, February, and March—is almost as cool as the Indian winter, and much cooler even in some of the more elevated situations. The rains descend in June, July, and August. When the fall of rain is scant, the supply of water naturally decreases, and the springs on the western hills, which supply the island with water, nearly dry up.

The chief vegetable and fruit productions of St. Helena consist of cabbages, carrots, peaches, pears, and plantains; and the principal, if not the only, trees in the place are firs, cypresses, and willows. Among the flowers, those most frequently met with are heliotropes, blue-bells, and lilies. Parrots and canaries are found wild on the island. The latter are very numerous, and are sold at 12 annas, or 1s.6d. each. Horses and asses are the chief beasts of burden; cows, sheep, and poultry are less numerous. The only animals to be found in a wild state are foxes, hares, and rabbits. White ants, which it is supposed have found their way into the island from the ships, are very numerous, and voraciously attack everything within their reach. Mosquitoes—a small species of fly—swarm everywhere, and are a great pest. The traveller, however, must expect to meet with these little torments in every tropical country. Every possible coin is current in St. Helena, from the Spanish doubloon to the Indian mohur; and the homeward-bound traveller has here an instance of his approach to the mother country in the numerous beggars who frequent the island. The hire of conveyances is very heavy, £3 being the charge for a two-horse carriage—containing four seats—for a day, and half that sum for a single-horse carriage, capable of holding only two persons. Rocks here and there jut out on the carriage road, threatening destruction to the vehicles and their inmates, but accidents seldom occur.

There are eight clergymen of all denominations and one bishop on the island.

The people are of a mixed character, and appear to be friendly and well-disposed—many being Creoles, who are said to be the descendants of slaves—the island having been, many years ago, a depôt for this revolting trade.

The hire of labourers is two shillings per diem; but they are forced to work very hard, from morning till night; and, in consequence of the high price of provisions, this sum barely suffices for their wants. Milk is sold at 4d. and mutton at 1s. per pound; and bread is very expensive.

Though the island consists rather of a succession of hills and dales than otherwise, yet many spots are very pretty; and, while the traveller might weary of a long stay, yet a short sojourn on this 'spot on the ocean' would not only be beneficial to health, but pleasing and novel, and specially interesting, associated, as it must ever be, with the name of Napoleon the Great.

WILLIE BELL.

Mr heart's as blithesome as a bird
That sings aside its liltin' nest,
And ilka thing I meet outby
Wi' loving soul seems richly bless'd;
To think that I should live to be
The happy bride o' Willie Bell!
Oh! love's a serious thing to thole;
It maistly puts me past mysel'
Wi' thochts too sweet for tongue to tell.

I mind when we were at the schule
How Willie held a wark w' me;
His counthie ways and kindlie words
Aye show'd him maik; nor mannerlie;
'Mang a' the lads nane took my pairt
Sae like a man as Willie Bell;
But when we chanced to be our lanes
He look'd as blate's I did mysel'—
What for should love be sweet to tell?

When mither died, the neighbors a'
Tried how they best might comfort gie;
But nane could wheelst the greetin' heart
Till Willie Bell cam' ben to me.
'Ye'll leave this dowlie house,' he said,
'And come yer ways across the fell,
And ere the lammies leave the ewes
Ye'll be the wife o' Willie Bell.'
I hadna strength to hand mysel'.

Then frae the fullness o' my heart
I gied consent, and grat for pride;
'Oh wae could think to lightlie love
And sic a laddie by her side?
The greetin' Willie gave to me
Soon garr'd my heart come till its sel',
And syne, as we stepp'd out the road,
Ilk thing that kepp'd us on the fell
Seem'd blessing me and Willie Bell.

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

July 17, 1836.

MR. HALLIDAY is dead. And by his will (which George arrived just in time to prepare) he has left our little Louis heir to his whole property. He had seen the boy only twice, but knew his story—that is to say, all we knew of it; and so he took his resolution on the instant. This is surely the acme of whimsicality! George says that Mr. Halliday's aversion to womankind generally, and to his own lawful heiresses in particular—taken in conjunction with his unstable temper and unsocial habits—had paved the way for the singular consummation. At any rate, the thing is done. And here is this poor little stranger made suddenly rich, by what seems the merest accident in the world! But, as chance forms no part of my creed, I look deeper for the meaning. My husband says that, by proper management, Mr. Halliday's estate may realise somewhere about £20,000. Weston & Locke are the accredited agents and trustees for the future possessor during his minority; and George, moreover, is named, by the testator, as the special guardian of the boy—that is, even supposing that his father is alive, and should at any time be discovered. Now, all this is strange exceedingly to my mind, and has given me some new views of human nature and life's contingencies, such as I never dreamed of before. Aunt Aubrey, as may well be supposed, is unwilling to part with Louis; and George sees no necessity that she should. So it is settled to allow him to remain at Woodburn in the meantime—only, that he shall come over to us one whole day, at least, in every week, and as much oftener as circumstances make it expedient. Our good aunt is enchanted at the unexpected turn of affairs; and to-day George and she have been discussing the propriety of engaging a tutor for Louis, preparatory to sending him to an academy, in the ensuing autumn. While all this is going on, I am rather fretted by a simple casualty, for which nobody is to blame. It appears that Mrs. Aubrey left the greater part of her luggage behind her at Nice, to be forwarded by a more direct route than she herself took on her return home. Among this luggage is the box containing Marion Falconer's papers, which I am eager to have examined. And as some little time must still elapse ere these packages arrive, my patience is sorely put to it, and the tenter-hooks are stretching tighter and tighter every day. George laughs, and says, 'Here is a romance for you now, Kate, in real earnest. So make the best of it, I beg of you; for you may never have the luck to meet with another, and I know that this is worth a small fortune to you. Twist it, therefore, and turn it in all possible lights; and feed on it, my love! and luxuriate on its curious ingredients. It is indeed a dainty dish, and not often served up in this prosy world.' I laugh, too; but intend, literally, to follow his advice.

Meanwhile, Master Falconer is fast acquiring familiarity with me and my household—whereast I rejoice—running as naturally to the nursery as soon as he comes; and showing, in a thousand boyish ways, such demonstrative affection for Charlotte as is truly edifying to all beholders.

August 1, 1836.

This morning George set off on a tour to the Continent. He has been much fagged of late with business worries, and looking so pale and thin that I am glad he is gone. He has no companions with him, and rather enjoys the idea of possessing perfect independence of action while studying new peoples and untried scenes. He is going down through the centre of France, by Lyons, to Marseilles; thence to Genoa, Milan, and Venice—thus exploring the greater part of northern Italy. I am to have frequent letters from my husband during his absence, which will extend over several weeks. But I shall have very rare opportunities of writing to him. However, there is little chance of my requiring to do so for any special purpose, so I am content to hold on the even tenor of my way. But oh! I shall miss George terribly. The house does not look the same to me already. There is a dreary vacancy in the rooms that somehow oppresses my spirit. And as I sit gazing out into the little garden, with its store of sweet flowers that seemed yesterday so freshly beautiful, they appear far less bright in colour this evening, and drooping sadly on their stalks. Now fancy begins to work. He is gone; and how many perils by field and flood may he not encounter ere I behold him again! I believe it is awfully rough work that crossing of the Channel. Then I wonder are these French diligences perfectly safe? And everybody knows that Italy is infested with banditti. And there is the malaria, too! But that is at Rome, and George does not intend going so far. Well, men can be very bold and foolhardy, as if their lives were of small account in their own eyes. Ah! but do they never think of the other lives that would be darkened, and the other eyes that would be dimmed, and the other hearts that would be broken, if aught of injury or cruel wrong were to cross their path? I do not like to dwell upon these things.

There is the green gate, too, by which I have so often watched George enter. It is just now about his old hour for coming home to dinner, when the well-known key in the latch was ever a cheering signal. How long may it be before that door opens to receive him once more! How still the air is! Hark! there is a step coming along behind the fence—a slow, creeping, irresolute step. It stops—goes on—stops again—goes on—a pause; then the bell at the gate is rung—not readily and sharply, but with a certain indecision, as of some one weighing the pros and cons of so doing. The servants heed not; the ring is repeated with a trifle more energy, and on the summons being answered, a female figure appears standing in the doorway. After a brief parley, she is admitted, and as she follows Rachel up to the house, I catch a glance of her face, and am enchained thereby. Yes, it is the same! I would know her among a thousand! It is the identical woman—she of the sinister aspect, and wearing the furred mantle of old, but in different attire to-day—whose secret conferences with my husband have so often moved my curiosity! What can she want now—and with me? For no doubt she has been informed that George is from home.

'If you please, ma'am, here is a person wishes to see you. I inquired her name, but she says she will tell you herself. She is in the dining-room.'

Spite of myself, I was conscious of a sudden glow on my cheek at this announcement.

'Did you not say your master was from home?'

'Yes, ma'am; but she said it made no difference—you were quite the same.'

'Very well,' Rachel withdrew, and I rose to go to my guest. I felt vaguely excited as I laid hold of the door-handle. Was I about to receive any very startling revelation? I entered the room, assuming a look of indifference which I did not by any means feel, for my knees trembled and my breathing was quick. The stranger was standing with her back to the light; but there was no mistaking the contour of the figure—tall and angular; and the eyes, with their doubtful expression—half bold, half cunning—that darted at me as I approached. Coming forward to meet me,

'You are Mrs. Weston, I know,' she began, in the dry, disagreeable voice I remembered having heard once before—that winter day, in my husband's chambers. 'And though it is Mr. Weston I came to seek—as I hear he is gone away, and to remain some time—I must just tell my tale to you, who, indeed, are the most fitting of the two to hear it, after all.'

I made no answer, but stood observing her, while a vague notion stole across my mind that somehow I ought not to listen to 'her tale.' It seemed almost like a breach of good faith to George to allow myself to be thus enticed into her confidence. Yet, I must confess, curiosity did tug a little at my heart, too.

'May I request to be informed of your name,' I asked, in a dignified manner, 'ere I stay to know your errand?'

'I will tell you that most readily by-and-by,' she answered, while a slight derisive smile curled her lip; 'but you had better hear my story first, for it very nearly concerns you.' My feeble barrier of self-imposed rectitude was broken down upon this. I motioned the woman to a chair, and seated myself full in front of her.

'I need scarce tell you, Mrs. Weston,' she commenced, 'that there are a-many things done in this world of which right-minded people cannot approve, and of which aggrieved people must sooner or later take occasion to complain.' Her eyes were cast down, as she spoke, with a constrained humility which sat but awkwardly upon her. 'Another fact,' she proceeded, 'probably known to you also, is that most of those unjust transactions have to do with money; and it is where that is concerned that honest dealing is so rare.'

She looked hard at me as she spoke; but quickly perceiving I was at a loss to comprehend her meaning, she resumed—

'Do you think it is fair in a man to ignore his own child—his own only son—and make over all his gold to one who is not a drop's blood to him? Answer me that.'

My cheek must have blanched at the question, for it struck home to my inmost soul.

'Do you think it is right for strangers and aliens to take the bread from the children's mouth—to hold and to hoard, for their selfish ends, when those to whom the inheritance should have descended are miserable and despised, and wanting the barest necessities?'

'Hold, woman—hold!' I cried out. 'What do you mean by coming thus to taunt me in my own house? Who are you? and what do you know of my private matters?'

'O Mrs. Weston! Madam!' she exclaimed, instantly changing her tone from one of hardy defiance to a species of apologetic whine, 'have pity on a dejected creature, pleading for a sorely injured husband, deprived of his lawful heritage by the unreasonable prejudices of a parent—bereaved of the just rights of his home and kindred by calumny and caprice, and acts of designing meddlers. Oh dear, dear me! to think how some people are crushed, and others are raised on their ruins!'

The light that had been gradually breaking upon my mind now flashed forth, making me nervously excited and perturbed. I rose, and going close to my visitor, 'Tell me your name,' I demanded, decisively, 'ere another word is exchanged between us. I will not hear you speak on any other terms. Leave my house if you refuse to satisfy me on this point.' She fumbled in her pocket for a few minutes, and finally drew therefrom a little piece of crumpled and dirty cardboard; and, handing it to me, looked up into my face with a strange mixture of cunning, servility, and low-bred assumption in her eye—very pitiful and very painful to behold. She watched me keenly while I read the words on that card. They were few; but oh, how significant! I started. The blood rushed to my cheeks, my temples, my neck. 'MRS. GRAY, 6 Holme-street,' written in a large loose hand, stood legibly before me. I was astounded—troubled—pained. I felt almost like some guilty thing, as the letters danced confusedly before my sight. 'Tell me,' I said earnestly, vehemently, 'is this your name? Are you that Mrs. Grey whose husband is the son of the late Mr. Grey of The Grove? Tell me at once, and tell me truly.' How anxiously I scanned her countenance while I spoke, none but myself can know. Interest, intense, absorbing, had taken entire possession of me, and I actually held my breath to catch her reply to my question. She did not hesitate, nor flinch in the least from my steady gaze.

'Yes, I am Mrs. Grey, of course; or why should I be here?'

'But you have seen Mr. Weston many times. Did you not lay all this before him?'

'Oh yes, ma'am, and a great deal more; but he always said the money was yours; he could not interfere, and he would not touch it.' I pondered an instant. These words tallied exactly with the spirit in which George had always viewed the matter when at any time I made allusion to it.

'And where is Mr. Grey? What is his mode of life? Are you in poverty? Have you any children? What can I do for you?' I put all these queries to her in a heap, for I was agitated now, and distressed almost beyond endurance.

'My poor husband is bedridden, ma'am, with many ailments. We have three helpless children, and our sole support is from the work of my own hands—sewing—'

'Stop!' I cried, fairly subdued by the cruel picture thus presented to my mind. 'Stop! I cannot bear it any longer. Why, why was I kept in ignorance of this story of your husband's needs—of his misery—of all your great affliction? I have some money in the house—it is not much, but it may relieve present necessity. I shall bring it to you in a moment.' She gave a deep-drawn sigh, ending in a moan—which sounded strangely discordant, as if expressive of a too long deferred requital of injury; and, regarding me with a glance in which the rueful was oddly blent with the vindictive, suffered me to leave the room without a word.

I ran up-stairs; and hastily unlocking my desk, took therefrom a bunch of notes (about £50) which George had given me the previous night, to save the probable necessity of my applying to the bank in his absence. With these I flew back to the dining-room, and thrusting them into her hand,

'Come again to-morrow,' I said, hurriedly; 'and bring with you the papers—the evidences, I mean—that will satisfy me—that will satisfy everybody—that your husband is the very Stephen Grey whose father I knew—that his claim is imperative; so that it now becomes my duty— Yet, stay'—I stopped, hesitatingly, to consider a moment. 'Perhaps it will be better that I—that we—send to your home, rather than you should come again to mine. Yes; I will set about righting this affair immediately. I will have justice done to Mr. Grey. I will not rest'— Here she interrupted me. She had taken the money greedily, and pushed it out of sight into the recess of her capacious pocket. Her hard features had relaxed at sight of it.

'Oh that I had seen you sooner!' she exclaimed. 'You would not have allowed us to suffer as we have done. The proofs you speak of are all ready.'

'Go home now, then,' I said, soothingly; 'and be assured you will shortly hear further from me.'

She clutched at her dress—the part beneath which she had secreted the notes, and drawing her shawl close about her with her other hand, made me a short curtsy and hurried away. No thanks—no gratitude—no gladness—nothing but an unmannerly acceptance of a mere mite of what she appeared to consider a debt, long long due.

The whole scene had passed so rapidly, it seemed more like a dream than a real incident. When the woman was gone, and the clash of the gate closing in the wall had died on my ear, I remained standing in the middle of the apartment like one bewildered. All at once it rushed upon me that when I had formerly put the inquiry to George he had told me distinctly regarding this strange visitor that she was not Mr. Grey's wife. Could she be an impostor? That would soon be tested; she did not shrink from the necessary investigation. And though she were, what had I done? Nothing so very dreadful after all—only given away an inconsiderable sum, which I could scarce be blamed for giving under the circumstances. And to-morrow I would take advice, the best advice, on what remained to be done, and act accordingly. Thus arguing, my discomposure, which had been great, gradually subsided, and I felt relieved by the reflection that I was now about to do tardy justice to one whom I had most unwillingly wronged.

I will send for Dr. Armstrong. In George's absence there is nobody I would sooner consult in a matter of importance. If reparation is requisite, it must be instant and complete.

THE DISMEMBERMENT OF POLAND.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

THE result of the various reformatations, scientific discoveries, and the diffusion of knowledge throughout the European continent, was in particular a greater amount of freedom, and a larger concession of political rights to the new third class—the people—who had in former ages been held of little account; the nobility and the commercial class being all that were held of any consideration by the ruling powers. This process had obtained throughout all the European countries, with the exception of Russia, which had hardly attained to the distinction of a European Power till it acquired a share of Poland; while Poland again might, even at the end of the seventeenth century, be said to be utterly devoid of that particular part of a nation—a People. In all other countries, the trade had fallen to the share of the people, but in Poland there were only the nobility and the serfs or agricultural labourers, bought and sold with the land which they cultivated; while an alien class, the Jews, carried on the commerce of the country, and they, though settled and tolerated in Poland for many generations, were still looked upon as strangers, and could not, if they had cared to do so, employ their wealth and energies for the advancement and good of the general community, as similar trading classes were allowed to do in other lands. Thus there were in Poland but two classes—masters and slaves,—and these masters being all nobles, they all intrigued for the possession of the crown, which was elective, and consequently every vacancy brought with it all the horrors of civil war. With these two serious faults in their internal organization, the Poles had yet another, equally productive of evil; for their National Diet was so absurdly constituted that, whatever matters came before them, there must needs be a unanimous decision. One vote, the opposition of any single member, being sufficient to annul any decision which a majority might arrive at, or to prevent any measure from passing into a law. This system prevailed also in the local assemblies, and with them not unfrequently was resorted to, the barbarous mode of the majority putting to the sword their opponents—sharp wit being at a discount where sharp swords could be used. With all their patriotic ardour, the Polish nobles clung to this mode of government in spite of their frequent civil wars, and the consequent devastation of the country, from the fact that under this constitution every one had a chance of being king; and yet this kingship was but a barren honour in everything but name, since, if his majesty chose to assert his authority in any way, he was certain to be opposed by the nobles in office under him, and who, for money, could easily procure a mercenary army of serfs and aliens for this purpose. Such a government, ever involved in internal discord, could not but be looked upon with dissatisfaction by the neighbouring powers, and rendered it but too tempting a prey to such ambitious neighbours as the Empress Catherine and Frederick the Great. Besides, being without any regularly organised army of its own, it was hardly possible that it could defend itself against other countries possessing large standing armies, under the potent control of one vigorous mental energy; and the turbulent nobles had been frequently warned of the necessity of a reform in this matter. But, ever confident of their own strength—in one particular element of martial prowess they might well be so, for they could, when united among themselves, bring into the field about 150,000 horse, and these probably the finest cavalry in Europe—they cared not for these warnings, and were doomed to find that the new modes of warfare had rendered this element of strength of less account than formerly, and that without the aid of organised infantry they could not hope to maintain their ground. Thus, through the effects of her own internal dissensions and discords, arose principally the circumstances which led to the fall of Poland, and her ultimate disappearance as a distinct nation from the map of Europe. Of the three powers who appropriated this unhappy and divided country, Prussia was once in a state of vassalage to it; Russia once saw its capital and throne possessed by the Poles; whilst Austria, about a century before, was indebted to Poland for the preservation of its capital and almost for its very existence, when Sobieski rolled back from Europe the tide of Mahomedan invasion.

The dismemberment of Poland—a political crime of so unusual and unnatural a nature—had been, long before 1772, a subject of secret consultation with different monarchs. Once, during the wars of Gustavus Adolphus, between Sweden, Austria, and Prussia (1658)—Gustavus asserting the right of the Powers to divide among themselves a country which was at once the cause and the theatre of war; but this secret treaty was discovered and defeated by a variety of circumstances, in which the ability of Poland to avert this intention was but of minor importance. Again it was a subject of discussion when Peter the Great defeated Charles XII. of Sweden at Pultowa; and thus becoming the arbiter of Poland, displaced the puppet-king of Charles XII. and put a creature of his own upon the throne of Poland—one who was held in contempt by the Poles, and was supposed to favour the idea of the dismemberment of the country. It was not to be that time, however, and the country remained in its old anarchical state. The Czars were now the real rulers of Poland, and the future elections of its kings was but a mockery—the neighbouring powers taking good care that none should occupy the throne but such as they might control; and thus Poland, which might have been one of the greatest powers of Europe, became, through her own evil policy, little better than a dependency of the adjoining states.

The year 1772 was destined to see the wished-for dismemberment take place—the impatience of Prussia urging Catherine, who had just nominated her quondam lover, Stanislaus, to the throne of Poland, to take extreme measures to produce this result; although she would probably have been contented with the power and control she then had over the country, and was at this time disposed to defer the appropriation of any part of it, although it was a purpose she had always some time or other intended to carry out. Great disturbances took place in consequence of the 'election,' and Russian troops being marched into the country to quell these, it was impossible for Prussia and Austria, whose dominions lay so close, to look on with indifference; consequently Frederick of Prussia marched his army across the Polish frontiers to aid in the election of Catherine's nominee, with the secret understanding that a due reward would be forthcoming for his services. Scarcely had the election been completed, when a controversy arose between the Roman Catholics and the Dissidents—

the latter term including the Protestants as well as the adherents of the Greek Church. Russia and Prussia designedly aided the latter party, and the Diet was consequently obliged to grant many concessions to them; and these concessions were accompanied by others giving to Russia such powers over the affairs of Poland as virtually to destroy all Polish nationality. The nobility were of course the only parties in the country who organised themselves, and tried to stem the current of events. They formed an Anti-Russian league; but their loose hordes of cavalry were everywhere defeated by the disciplined troops of Russia. The mass of the population evidently cared little, and had grown indifferent in great measure as to who were their masters, as in any case they would be but slaves.

With the armies of the three powers at work on the Polish frontiers, matters rapidly approached a crisis; and Austria, without informing the others, seized the little province of Zips, while Prussia, following this example, advanced a body of troops to the banks of the Dniester. The Turks, who had been aiding the Polish confederates, now began to sink under the war with Russia, appealed to Austria and Prussia to intercede for them, and consequently withdrew from the struggle on behalf of Poland. The confederates, with Turkish aid, had up to this time struggled hard for their independence; but as the occupation of the country had been effected, and with certain knowledge that a secret treaty of partition had been concluded, the confederacy broke up, and an end was put to all resistance, which had hitherto been maintained at a frightful sacrifice of human life.

Catherine, seeing that she could neither rule through her nominee nor appropriate any part of the Polish territory without allowing the other two powers to have a slice likewise, now agreed to a scheme of dismemberment which had been devised more by Frederick than herself. One reason for Frederick's anxiety for the fulfilment of this scheme, apart from his greedy ambition, was that war had been verging between Russia and Austria for some time, in relation to certain conquests made by Russia of Turkish provinces; and that as Prussia could hardly fail of being drawn in on one side or the other, the partition was proposed to heal up the smouldering difficulties of the parties, and prevent the contingency of war.

The contracting parties now began the work of dismemberment—the only trouble being as to what should be their respective shares. Russia and Prussia soon agreed; Austria was more hesitating, less on account of conscience than from the habitual slowness of that court. When at last arrived at a concord, they issued manifestoes to the other powers of Europe, specifying the territories they had appropriated, and their reasons for so doing—Prussia and Austria asserting some obsolete claims upon certain portions of Poland; while Russia boldly stated that the trouble and expense incurred by her in keeping the Poles in order, could only be compensated for by a cession of territory. All three agreed in stating, however, that the anarchy which had prevailed in Poland had reduced it to a deplorable state, and they wished to adopt measures for restoring tranquillity and order; and further, that having taken so much they would take no more, but that their joint endeavours would be to restore to the remaining part of Poland the prosperity of former days. They took care, however, while guaranteeing the integrity of the country in its now reduced state, to introduce such changes in its constitution as should prevent it from attempting to recover what had been lost. Thus the powers which had been chiefly instrumental for many years in filling Europe with war and bloodshed, now preached peace, and invited the natives of the land whose territory they had stolen to put up their swords, and co-operate with them in restoring quietness and order in the country!

The appropriated part divided at this time amounted to about a third of Poland, and included some of its richest provinces. The helpless king, Stanislaus, too feeble to offer any resistance, could do nothing to hinder the appropriation but address protests and prayers to the other Governments of Europe; but none of them at that time showed any sympathy, and remained shamefully passive. The partitioning powers assembled the Diet at Warsaw to ratify all that had been done; and the members were told plainly that all who opposed their wishes would be considered an enemy of his country and of them; threatening, also, that if any opposition was offered, they would proceed to take possession of the whole of the country. Some of the Diet were venal—others were convinced that all resistance was useless; and they therefore ratified the partition in September 1772. The king was left without the shadow of authority, the whole power being vested in an Executive Council of thirty-six lay and ecclesiastical members. Yet there still remained an enthusiastic band, who were bitter against the outrage to their nation. But these were soon dispersed, and their property confiscated. Numbers became wanderers and outcasts, and many fled to America, where they were to be found fighting, on behalf of the colonists, in the War of Independence.

CHAPTER II.

The influence which the French Revolution was supposed to have upon the Polish nation, and the favour with which they regarded the revolutionary government, led to the partition which took place in 1793; but this was nothing more than a good excuse for the three powers, who were evidently determined gradually to appropriate the whole country. For many years previously, disputes had been rife in the Diet regarding making the crown hereditary, and other necessary reforms in the constitution of the country, more in harmony with the wants and ideas of the time, and in this task they were engaged when the French Revolution broke out. As these reforms were much more moderate in their character than those of France, there were rejoicings in many parts of Europe on their account, and hopes of a yet bright future being in store for Poland. Prussia, in exchange for the much-coveted cities of Thorn and Dantzic offered to give them aid in their reforms should the other powers interfere; but this the Diet at once refusing, Prussia apparently agreed to the reforms they wished to effect, but very soon betrayed the promise. The succession was offered to the Elector of Saxony, who agreed to accept, on condition that more power was given to the king and less to the Diet; but this was refused, as was also the request that the new constitution should be modified, more in accordance with those of Russia and Prussia, and less with that of France. Catherine, annoyed that the Poles should thus seek new alliances unfriendly to her, and with the pretext also that the new constitution was inimical to her interests, prepared to march into Poland; and knowing that Frederick was disappointed in not obtaining the two coveted towns, drew him into the plot—each to aid the other, and each to share in the spoil. Several recreant nobles of the Diet, opposed to the new reforms, had also besought Catherine to come to their aid; and ostensibly, and as if by their request, 10,000 Russians marched towards the Polish capital. Again was there a campaign, with varied success; and it was at this time that Kosciusko—with 4,000 men against 16,000 Russians—held Dubjenka for five days, although he had only twenty-four hours to fortify it. In spite of the most heroic resistance, the hearts of the patriots sank when they learned that Austria had permitted another Russian army to enter Poland through Galicia, thereby exposing their two flanks. At the beginning of the year, Frederick seized Thorn and Dantzic, giving as his reasons for so doing the disrespectful conduct of the Poles to his ally, the Empress Catherine, and the necessity of repressing the growth of republican and revolutionary ideas, as dangerous to the safety and good order of his empire. Stanislaus had now to annul the new constitution, undo all the reforms of the Diet, and allow Russian troops to occupy Warsaw and other important posts; but he was fully convinced that these concessions would not satisfy the rapacity of the plunderers. Catherine soon announced her intention of taking, along with Prussia, another part of Poland; and issued manifestoes, charging the Poles with ingratitude towards their best friends—Russia, Prussia, and Austria; concluding with the assertion, that they were convinced that only by uniting with their respective states those parts of Poland which bordered their territories, could they avoid the results of that discord which prevailed there, and the effects of those revolutionary opinions which had begun to show themselves among the Poles. Austria, at this time, took nothing; and as the other powers of Europe were expending all their energies in the war with the French Republic, they were not in a position to interfere. The Diet—having appealed, protested, and entreated in vain—were obliged to ratify the partitioning decree;—and the armies of Russia and Prussia still lay round and within the country, ready to repress any movement of the people. These proceedings threw a shade over the reputation of kings at a time when it needed particularly to be unsullied; and a share of this fell upon all who were known to be attached to governments and thrones. They gave, likewise, a greater degree of intensity to the ardour of the French Republicans; shewing them, that the same powers who had just stolen the greater part of Poland, would entertain no scruples in doing the same for France, should the fortunes of war give them the opportunity.

Two years more, and the curtain rises on the third act of this great national drama; and during that time the exiled patriots were not idle—keeping up a continual correspondence with their friends in Poland, and concerting plans for an insurrection. An order given by the Empress Catherine for the reduction of the Polish army by 15,000 men, roused the patriots to action ere their plans were fully ripe, and at an inauspicious time. The Polish troops were much scattered about the country, and were watched closely by large bodies of Russian soldiery; but the patriots relied more upon the widely-spread secret societies than upon this handful of Polish troops. The puppet-king, Stanislaus, however, despaired of success at this time; and, afraid that this premature attempt would lead to his total dethronement, gave information regarding the proceedings of the confederates and the societies to the Russian Minister, who thereupon ordered the patriot leaders to quit the country. The disbanded and embittered Polish soldiers marched to Craow, defeating several bodies of the enemy on their way, and in that city raised the standard of revolt. Kosciusko joined them here, and though he brought no troops with him, the magic of his name brought numbers of enthusiastic men to join the confederates. Elected Dictator, he imposed a tax to procure funds, and called upon all Poles to join his standard; he next proceeded to emancipate the serfs, but this measure came too late, for, since the revolt had already begun, they could not at once be converted into earnest patriots, and did not understand or appreciate the liberty which been given to them. Only those serfs who belonged to the patriot nobles fought well and bravely, the others remained deaf to the proclamation, and, plunged in ignorance as they were, continued in subjection to their lords and masters.

The first engagement of any note took place at a village between Craow and Warsaw, where Kosciusko, with an army of 4,000, mostly armed with scythes, encountered and defeated an army of 12,000 Russians—killing 3,000, and taking many prisoners and eleven cannon. This gave great hopes to the cause; and the Polish garrison of Warsaw attacked the Russians stationed there, gained possession of the magazine, distributed the arms among the people; and, after a struggle of two days and nights, drove the Russians out of the town, with a loss of 4,000 men. Kosciusko now had an army of about 26,000 men—soon after increased to about 40,000 troops, volunteers, and armed peasants; and with these he continued the struggle—each side having its share of reverses and successes—till the Dictator, having committed the blunder of dividing his forces, was everywhere defeated in detail, and Cracow was retaken, after a brief siege, by the Russians. Austria had as yet taken no part in the struggle; but now an army of that country occupied Little Poland, and met with little or no opposition in so doing. The Russians and Prussians, unitedly about 90,000, now advanced to Warsaw, which had been hastily fortified by the patriots. While the allies were so engaged, the Poles in the most recently annexed provinces of Prussia flew to arms, and endeavoured to drive the Prussian armies out of the country. The news of this, forced Frederick to retire from the siege of Warsaw, and abandon his sick and wounded. The insurrection had now become general; and, with the exception of a few towns, the whole of Great Poland was in the hands of the confederates. Their prestige had been lost, however, in Lithuania; and Suvaroff, with another Russian army, advanced rapidly upon Warsaw, and drove the Poles before him. With that portion of the patriot army which still remained with him, Kosciusko advanced to meet Suvaroff at Maciejowice—the Russians being as three to one of the Poles, both in men and artillery. The Russian army suffered severely; but no generalship or strategy being shown by the Poles, they were defeated; and Kosciusko himself, being severely wounded, fell from his horse, uttering the words—'Finis Polonia,' and was taken prisoner, along with many other Poles of distinction. This victory effected the junction of the two Russian armies, who now marched upon Warsaw, where the dispirited remnant of the patriot armies made their final stand. On the 4th of November, an assault took place; and for four hours the iron hail rained on the devoted town of Praga—a suburb of Warsaw, and only separated from it by a bridge over the Vistula. The assaulting columns at last gained an entrance; and thereupon followed a most atrocious massacre. Twelve thousand inhabitants, of both sexes and all ages, and 8,000 Polish soldiers, perished either in defending the place, or were helplessly butchered after it was taken. While the streets were ruining with blood and heaped with dead, the Russians set fire to the town, and in a few hours it was reduced to ashes. The authorities of Warsaw, struck with terror, capitulated, and Suvaroff took possession on the 6th November 1795. The Poles everywhere laid down their arms. Many were executed or banished; some were forced to take service in the Russian army; and others fled to France, and entered the armies of the Republic. The name of Poland was now blotted out from the map of Europe, although its independence had been gone long before—the three Powers resolving to appropriate the whole country, govern it by their own laws, and treat it as conquered territory. The king signed a formal abdication, accepted a pension from the co-partitioners, and finished his dishonourable career in 1798.

At various times after this the Poles had hopes of a reconstruction of their kingdom. When the 'Peace of Tilait' was signed by France and Russia, Prussia was stripped of nearly half of her territories, and the forfeited parts mostly coincided with those portions of ancient Poland which had been appropriated in the partitions of 1772, 1793, and 1795. This reconstruction of so much of Poland was intended by the Emperor Napoleon as an act of gratitude for the long and splendid services of the Polish exiles as soldiers in the French armies. The Poles, however, were disappointed in Napoleon allying himself with Russia, seeing that the great disposer of crowns and kingdoms had taken one province of Poland from Prussia and given it to Russia; but they accepted and were grateful for the Duchy of Warsaw, as this instalment of their rights was termed. The king of Saxony, to whom Napoleon gave the sovereignty of the Duchy, was denuded of it at the Congress of Vienna, and Russia claimed it; but the representatives of Britain, France, and Austria protested against this, and were anxious that Poland should be restored in all its integrity. Britain and France both urged the justice of this, and Austria was apparently willing to give up her spoil, if the other partitioners would do likewise. Russia and Prussia would not yield, and Napoleon's escape from Elba brought the affairs of the Congress to a hasty and unsatisfactory conclusion; and there was founded the paltry 'Kingdom of Poland,' in extent about one-sixth of the original kingdom, to be possessed by the emperors of Russia for ever as an appendage of their empire. The history of this paltry kingdom was very brief; for, although there had been granted a constitutional government, differing entirely from that of Russia, many changes were gradually introduced of a despotic and tyrannous nature, which, in 1830, created an insurrection. The Poles renounced their allegiance to Russia, and set up a provisional government under Czartoriaki. Soon after, Russian armies invaded Poland, and though the Poles shewed their accustomed valour, the campaign was brought to a close after seven months' hard fighting, and the country lay once more at the mercy of Nicholas. He then declared it to have forfeited its independence, and incorporated it without distinction into the general body of the Russian empire.

What may be the result of the present struggle of the Poles to regain their independence it would be hard to tell; and though it is said that Austria is likely to act with France on behalf of Poland, yet there is no good reason for supposing she will ever favour the restoration of independence to Poland, unless clearly convinced that she would gain by being just. Had Poland been subjugated by any one power, there might have been some hope, but the three are under bonds to each other to prevent her ever knowing the pleasure of a restoration. Of all the spoilers of Poland, Austria was the meanest; for her government affected to have a conscience, and avowed that it did wrong knowingly, and this meanness she will consistently maintain. As France and England have nothing in the shape of territory to bribe her with, they must reward her with the property of others, or see her hold on to what she stole in former times; and it is idle to expect that Austria will ever give up her share of Poland without being recompensed, as she keeps as tight a grasp on what she takes as a wolf ever did with its teeth at the expense of animated mutton. It is to be hoped, however, that the Polish question will be brought soon to a bearing one way or other; but on these matters it is idle to conjecture—they must be left to time and the good Providence of the Great Ruler of all the earth. D.

A LITTLE CHAFF ON PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

A BIRD IN THE HAND IS WORTH TWO IN THE BUSH.

I cannot help suspecting that this proverb was invented by one of those precocious early birds of whom we have spoken, endowed with that insatiable love of acquisition for its own sake which is characteristic of the race; of acquisition regardless of results, grasping at everything, mixing gold and dross in a confused mass, and glorying in the size of the heap; for it may well be doubted whether, setting aside this acquisitiveness to which we are all more or less slaves, the pleasure we derive from the free bird is not infinitely greater than any we can force or cajole from the prisoner when he is at our mercy. As the lark refuses to sing till drawn by a few blades of grass to think of former joys, so the chief value of our birds in the hand is lost from the moment we hold them fast, only to be revived when, glancing back, we surround them with the remembrance of past hopes and desires.

Without admitting, as some will insist, that all our apples turn to dust, all our gold pieces to dead leaves, it must be acknowledged that after a certain age the results of our labours seldom come up to our expectations. In youth this is not the case; and the charm lies in the novelty of each acquisition. The first play, the first doll, the first ball, give an unalloyed pleasure which can never be reproduced; the next doll may be more beautiful, but never so dear as our old broken-nosed friend; and we soon begin to criticise the actors both on the stage and in the ball-room. No one who has read it will forget 'My First Play,' in the admirable essays of Elia, and those who have not done so have yet a charming book to read. Little by little our taste becomes vitiated; and we sigh for new pleasures, new worlds to conquer—very likely searching blindly about, quite ignoring the one great object which has been so mercifully set before us, on which we may centre all our ambition, and rest assured that all our dreams of its glory and happiness will be far surpassed.

It were needless to drag the reader through a series of cases in which birds in the hand have refused to sing. Perhaps it would be hardly fair to ask old Goldsworthy how far his £20,000 a-year repays him for a long course of years spent in miserable anxiety. We will not insult our friend Brown, by inquiring how far Mrs. Brown has fulfilled his prenuptial expectations. As I said before, I do not belong to the 'Vanitas vanitatis' school of philosophy, and only glance at these possible disappointments in defence of birds in the bush, to whom we are indebted for so much pleasure, which we forget the moment we have caught them. We cut open the goose, and abuse it for laying no more eggs.

The true misfortune is, that as we grow older we are apt to lose the pleasures of anticipation. We have been so often disappointed, that we dare not look forward. In some secret chamber we still build our castles in the air, but almost against our will; and, at any rate, take care that no sound of the mallet and chisel is heard by our neighbours. And so, year by year, we cease striving for little gain, and find ourselves more and more in the position of spectators.

I am by no means sure, however, that we may not derive as much pleasure from the world around us in this position, as we did when we were actors in the scenes we see before us; and are much reconciled, by this idea, to that passive behaviour in society which age and infirmity impose on us. If, on the one hand, I find young ladies engaged for what I hear they call 'fast dances' (sweet Deborah Fine! you could never have brought your pretty lips to talk of fast dances)—a state of things which has long reached its climax, so far as I am concerned; on the other, it is cheering to find one's self the receptacle of little confidences—the burial-place of transitory sorrows; and I question very much whether these peeps behind the curtain—this admission to the outer porch of the female mind—does not more than compensate for the gray hairs of the faded Anacreon—soothing the mind though uncomplimentary to the looks. Into the outer porch, I say; because the arcanum is only to be entered by the priestess herself, who probably finds it in a state of considerable confusion—indeed, none of us could quite bear to enter hand-in-hand with our dearest friend, and even to do so alone is surely a day of humiliation. To our lovers, our wives, our children, one little door is shut—one inner chamber kept sacred.

In speaking of this privilege of old age, two things must be premised—that, at one time, we have risen like the early bird, and having caught the foolish worm, have carried it writhing in our beaks to our lady love, presently to be devoured with as little thanks as some of us have received for a broken heart; for, if lookers on see most of the game, it can only be those who know the rules, and we must be quite determined to accept the true position of age—for there is no fool like an old fool. A donkey once found its way into a flower-garden, and was so pleased with what he saw, that the foolish beast began to bray; so the gardener came and drove him out with many blows and hard words. Not less unfortunate will be the position of the man who, being admitted to the privileges of old age among women, is deluded into forgetting its conditions. Woe to him, I say, for every woman's tongue will be against him, and he will soon find himself elevated to a moral pillory.

I was led to think of these things some nights ago, because I knew of a little Niobe left lamenting at home, while I was sent in her place to a ball, in full war paint, so that the question naturally occurred, which of us was the best off?

Of course the first point in her favour was that she had a grievance. Whether ladies enjoy this great luxury of life to the full extent that we do, may be doubted, at all events they are denied the pleasure of decanting in public on the subject, which forms so great an item in a man's life, and renders him such a bore to his friends; still, we may suppose ladies keep these little hobbies in a private stable, and sometimes trot them out in that after-dinner council from which Englishmen are so rigorously excluded. Youth has also the great advantage of enjoying the luxury of sorrow at the lowest possible price. Do you remember how we nursed our little griefs and deadly feuds? how dear they were to us, even though a jacket deprived us of the female panacea—'a good cry?' My Niobe doubtless fondled her disappointment till she fell asleep to dream of fairy balls, and came down to breakfast as fresh as a daisy. As we get older and more fretful, our disgust is only carried away in the doctor's carriage, and is apt to appropriate a cell in the arcana of which we spoke above, from whence its cries sometimes burst forth, making themselves heard in strange discord with our smooth sayings. So, youth, can have its grievance, nurse it and put it to bed, while we are obliged to step aside when we see an annoyance, taking off our hats as we do to a magpie, and hoping it may not come our way.

We must also take into consideration the great advantages of an ideal ball over a real one; the grace, splendour, and brilliancy of the imagination as compared with composite candles, cross-purposes, and ruined dresses. It really seems like comparing a fairy tale with a history of England. Surely, too, it is more satisfactory to think of Niobe dreaming happily of the ball than driving eight or ten miles in the gray dawn of a winter's morning, cold, dilapidated, and sleepy. This advantage would have been denied to me, for I should probably have gone to sleep directly after dinner, and have had neither grievance nor ball—real or ideal. As it was, we both had one, though hers was by far the best—commencing with her first sleep, lighted and peopled, like the last scene of a pantomime, with actors whose entire business is to look pretty, no right or wrong, no care or trouble, the whole stage thrown open, and no penalty to pay. I fear the same could hardly be said of mine.

Not that I would be supposed to have that love of horrors which seems to take people to parties with no other view than that of finding out everybody's skeleton; which thinks every smile hides the key of a Bluebeard's closet—a mania only to be compared to that of George Selwyn, who, in spite of the most refined taste, never missed an execution if he could help it, and went to Paris to see a man broken on the wheel, when the Tormentor (whose life, by the way, has lately been published by the last 'hereditary headsmen') was kind enough to put him in a front place, crying 'Place, messieurs, pour un amateur!' I do not think this vulturelike spirit comes with old age; but rather a selfish desire to be rid of one's own troubles for a time, and enjoy ourselves by proxy with those who are still happy. Even those who seem to delight in the sufferings of others are often much misjudged; and poor George Selwyn not only fell in love for which he got no thanks, but adopted his false love's daughter; for which those who had hitherto only thought him cruel, immediately decided that he was foolish—which we all know to be a more serious crime. Pawnbrokers are considered the tyrants of the poor, draining their life-blood and oppressing them in every way; though, in point of fact, they are their great stand by in time of need;—while without the much-abused costermonger, the poor of large towns would be left without many little luxuries.

On the whole, it can hardly be denied that the pleasures of anticipation and speculation exceed those we derive from the accomplishment of our wishes; and it is fortunate for us that it should be so, always provided we do not allow the faculty of hope to become dormant, and take pains to centre our speculations on the only object whose worth we cannot exaggerate. This is shown to an extraordinary degree among the very poor. Shut out from almost all the enjoyments of life, more by want of sound rudimentary education than actual want, the unimaginative sink to a deplorable state of sensualism; but when once hope has been aroused, nothing can exceed the cheerfulness with which they work for a worldly object, or be more touching than their visions of a future state.

YOU MAY BRING A HORSE TO THE WATER, BUT CANNOT MAKE HIM DRINK.

There was certainly a time when this was true, now 'Nous avons changée tout cela.' In those happy days, the stream of science ran in a regular channel—those who wished came to its banks, drank as much as they wanted, and were allowed to depart in peace. Each man brought his pitcher, and took what he chose. At present, it seems as though the fountain had overflowed, and we stand struggling in the midst of an inundation. By a fate hardly less severe than that of Tanfals, we must keep drinking or be drowned; and instead of being steeped in ignorance, we run great risk of being sunk in science.

For my own part, I confess it seems a great hardship to be thus forced to drink so much that I care little about. Nor can I find a spot where I can be free from this infliction. Even in my own house, my friends declare my mutton to be too fibrous, my potatoes wanting in starch, my pepper is composed of shop sweepings, my snuff is a compound of sand and glass, pickles are slow poison, my bread is made of potatoes, bones, and alum diluted in the most unpleasant manner, and milk is a compound too fearful to think of. Everything, in short, contains some fatal element. Why am I to learn all this? In happier times we knew we had a peck of dirt to eat somehow or other, and we ate it in peace; now, every grain is pointed out to us, and however much we may dislike the idea, we must be either deliberately dirty, or run some risk of starvation.

There was a time, too, when books of science, of philosophy, or divinity, had each their appropriate title and decorous dress, just as their authors affected a certain style in accordance with their professions; when one would no more have thought of meeting divinity in purple and gold, than a D.D. without a shovel hat and black cane, and when its introduction into a novel was unheard of. It is true that the heroes and heroines of those days spotted volumes of high-flown morality, unknown in the modern novel; but they never meddled with doctrinal points, and we accepted their rather dreary discourses as a proper compliment to those who considered novels an abomination. We thought, then, that a novel should be a pleasant relaxation from the realities of life, giving a reasonable amount of excitement, just sufficient to draw our thoughts from graver subjects, without calling for any great intellectual effort. A friend of mine, who worked day and night in the dirtiest dens of London, told me his greatest luxury was to lie for half-an-hour on the sofa, reading a good trashy novel. Poor fellow, if he could rise from that dismal old cemetery, where he has lain many a day now, I wonder what he would think of our learned histories! Do you know I am sadly afraid he would take to 'Sword and Gown,' and be very fond of its hero!

Another peculiarity of our novels is the prominence given to two very different subjects—the trials of childhood and those of matrimony. It may seem strange at first that the taste for such opposite subjects should be coincident, but a little observation reveals the cause. The fact is, we are apt to think of an ideal childhood, and to forget the state of things which reigns in the modern nursery. A new king has arisen—one who knows not Joseph, under whose rule childhood is bound hand and foot, and so bent and distorted by its burden of knowledge, that it is difficult to remember its former light-hearted beauty. As we gaze on those sad little faces we feel that they must indeed have trials to record, and can hardly wonder that the novelist chooses them as the new medium for questionable ethics. Where are now the jolly little children who laughed at all our old jokes, and grew so grave over our ghost stories? Where are the queer little figures that squatted absorbed over the mud pie till carried off suspended by the petticoats in the hand of an irate nurse—those children who played and talked nonsense with us to their hearts' content! Alas! we have dragged them to the water, and forced them to drink till the smile of innocence is gone; and we of the old school have to pick our words carefully for fear of laying ourselves open to their contempt. They have tasted of the tree of knowledge, and clamour to take their places as men and women; and, indeed, many succeed in doing so, looking upon parents as a useless encumbrance to be borne with resignation. No wonder, then, our authors leave the old track of adult life, and favour us with the manners and customs of these infant prodigies. With regard to 'divorce court literature,' as it has been happily termed, I see with great pleasure that both the Saturday and London Reviews have thought the growing evil worthy of their notice. Surely it is enough that our newspapers are hardly fit for the drawing-room table!—perhaps it is good for us to have the misery and wickedness of the world kept before our eyes;—but to dilate on this, to enlist our sympathies with fictitious sin, to bring the heroine to the very brink of evil, and depict scenes of which we hardly care to speak in a lady's presence, is wilfully to sow corruption far and wide, and tamper with the purity we affect to admire. I confess it would please me better, had Deborah Dove and I come together, to have seen our girls reading the 'Brothers Grimm' or 'Robinson Crusoe,' than these very talented descriptions of questionable society. But then it is so easy to make a fascinating heroine of a bad woman—her life is so much more full of adventure, her admirers can speak so freely, and introduce us to so many dubious characters; and, after all, we can always write a preface to say our book is intended as a warning, not as an example. Besides, these books sell so well, particularly if the reviewer warns the public that it contains improper matter; and we must all live even at the expense of our fellow-creatures!

Another great grievance is the way in which we are compelled to swallow a dose of popular science when we least expect it. You think you are going to amuse yourself for a few spare minutes, and before you know what you are about, the nasty powder reveals itself in the deceitful jam, and with a wry face the dose is swallowed. If, for example, I take up the Coruhill to enjoy half-an-hour with Mr. Trollope, or admire Mr. Millais' woodcuts, it seems to me rather hard to be met by fearful diagrams of nerves or infusoria. I know that nerves are a great infliction, from which I have long endeavoured to escape, and find it rather hard to have my enemy paraded before me and petted and praised to my face.

There was a dreadful article, too—a most ill-judged one—on incipient insanity, the signs of which seem so closely allied to those of vitality, that it really seemed as if we must all be drifting to this wretched end. Let us hope the strictures this article met with at the time of its publication may induce the editor to spare us any similar inflictions in future; for it must have made many people uncomfortable, and have done much more harm than good.

A short time since, this mania for superficial knowledge was directed to aquatic monsters. Tadpoles formed a subject for conversation; the price of eels rose considerably in the market; and all the pets of our school-days reappeared under wonderful names, till one could hardly move without putting one's foot into an impromptu aquarium. This was bad enough; but surely it was rather severe of Mr. Kingsley to inflict on us an aquatic romance—a scientific fairy tale!

How far all this popular science may be correct, I am not competent to judge; but have a misgiving that, among really learned men, it takes rank with 'A Million of Facts,' and similar publications.

Never were horses made to drink in a more barefaced manner than at the Exhibition of 1862. The world was ransacked for curiosities, the kingdoms of the earth were spread out before us, and in some shape or other we were forced to drink or be swamped. It was in vain to struggle; everyone was bent on explaining all they knew, and a good deal more; and the only plan was to resign yourself to your fate, till your friends left you panting and bewildered to the tender mercies of Mr. Morris, fortunate if you escaped the blandishments of Mons. Veillard and his noble chargée d'affaires. While I believe the general public derived but little scientific information from 'The World's Fair'—though doubtless to science and manufacture the boon was inestimable—it would be difficult to calculate the benefits many have derived from the splendour and beauty of the Exhibition. What a sight it was to see the crowds streaming from end to end—the gorgeous colouring—the statues and jewels—the eager faces and individual idiosyncracies! How pleasant to see the meeting of friends after years of separation, and the favoured partner unexpectedly appear at the very spot where those pretty girls were to wait for some friends—to listen to the unsophisticated remarks of country folks—to see the persons piloting their school children to the most interesting spots, and hear those splendid organs sending forth volumes of harmony, like the morning stars shouting for joy!

Of course it is quite wrong to say so in these practical days, but I cannot help thinking that we greatly undervalue the gift of the sense of beauty; and that, to many who understood nothing of the educational value of the Exhibition, the sight was a revelation of an unknown world, which lies treasured up in hearts yet innocent of the value of popular science.

CATTIVA DONNA GUARDATE, A BUONA NON FIDAR NIENTE.

"I've seen the adumbra tree in flower, white plumage on the crow,
And fishes' footsteps on the deep have traced through ebb and flow."

If man it is who thus asserts, his words you may believe;
But all that woman says distrust—she speaks but to deceive.

—Poem of 'Lirr', Ceylonese.

It may be difficult to determine how men have become imbued with the secret feeling of distrust which influences so greatly their intercourse with women; but it is certain that, after a few early love passages, we seldom allow ourselves to speak quite unreservedly to our most intimate female friends, and keep always at hand an impenetrable shield of small-talk for the benefit of strangers. Married men, I understand, are all exempt from this weakness, and make a practice of concealing nothing from their wives—consulting them, on the contrary, in all matters requiring secrecy and discretion; but, then, wives are always too much devoted to their husbands to betray them; so, if the secret does creep out, no doubt the foolish husband has been the culprit. Some men, doubtless having regard to the pitiable fate of the great Captain Busby, are in actual bodily fear of being seized by some enterprising maiden and married offhand—a fear which we may perhaps be inclined to think not entirely groundless, when we consider the great rapidity of the present generation of young ladies, and the languor with which we ourselves are afflicted; but this will not account for a phenomenon which has survived from generation to generation, and I am afraid there must be some little foundation for so general a feeling.

There is a story, in an old book, of a woman's weakness having been the cause of great misfortunes to mankind; and the same volume contains more than one narrative of the same nature, to which I should feel tempted to allude, but that their authenticity is so much questioned just now, that I am not sure they would be considered as of much value, though I think, in more ignorant times, they had something to do with the matter. At any rate, it is strange that the same stories and same feeling should be found under various forms amongst all the nations of the earth.

Whether from traditional prejudice or modern experience, there can be no doubt that, while we profess a considerable amount of gallantry, and talk a good deal of the beauty of the female character, we share, with our ancestors, an uncomfortable feeling that the fascinations of the fair sex are by no means to be enjoyed without danger; and generally think it necessary to keep on the defensive. It is to be remarked that the revolution which has taken place in our relative positions does not seem to have affected this phenomenon. Some years ago—when it was the fashion for ladies to look upon us as beings whose course of life, both as to profession and recreation, might be parallel to but never in the same line as their own—one can well imagine a diffident man looking with distrust on those with whom he seemed to have nothing in common; but now that things are so changed—when ladies challenge competition in shooting and riding, and claim familiarity with our more questionable amusements—it might be presumed that distrust would be abandoned, and similarity of pursuits lead to mutual confidence. Unfortunately, however, such is not the case; for the more ladies seek to assimilate themselves to us in language and pursuit, the more we suspect some hidden danger. They seem to us like decoy birds, pretending to be wild to deprive us of our freedom; and we expect every moment to see the net fall over us.

The fact is, the bargain is not fair. All our secrets are laid bare—spies are out in all directions, to discover the nakedness of the land; but a magic cordon is drawn round the enemy's country. The region within this line must obviously be good, bad, or a vacuum. In the two latter cases, it must be admitted that modern female tactics are correct, and the distrust with which they are met judicious; but if we are called upon to believe all within is purity and perfection, surely it is hard to deprive us of a glimpse of this happy land. In France, it is understood that a woman has only a nominal existence until she is married; and men address their conversation to married women, with whom they can feel at ease. With us, however, while young ladies are allowed to acquire or affect a perfect knowledge of our thoughts and habits, a man is expected to fall in love without the least notion of the real value of his idol. Gold, silver, and ashes are all hidden under a veil—sometimes of propriety, sometimes of impropriety; and so, not liking the risk, we cry—'Cattiva donna guardate, a buona non fidar niente.'

Many causes have tended to produce this result. Amongst others, the great stress men have laid on the practical has rendered women unwilling to show the enthusiasm from which they derive so much enjoyment of life, and produced the 'practical' young ladies of whom we have heard lately. This enthusiasm, however, is a pledge of faith, and we have so little faith ourselves that we like to enjoy it by proxy, and look upon a woman without it as little better than ourselves. Indeed, I am by no means sure that the gushing young lady, though a formidable undertaking, is not more popular than the present race of stoics.

It is proverbial that men who work their brains much, as a rule, marry women who are considered inferior to them in intellect, but who are probably highly fitted for their position of helpmates to their husbands, since they afford them the relaxation so necessary to an overstrained mind. Forced themselves to weigh every word and thought, it is refreshing to listen to ideas which, if not always correct, are at least conceived in perfect good faith. Perhaps ladies might take a hint from this, that men dislike being talked up to, and enter their society rather in search of something more genuine than to see themselves reflected.

We must, however, admit our own share in the misfortune which threatens us. While we quietly pocketed the pleasures of ladies' society, we chose to twit them constantly with mental and physical inferiority, till at last they have taken us at our word, and king Starch tries to eat us up.

Without being sufficiently Utopian to look for an era of perfect peace between the sexes, surely we may hope for a mitigation of the present state of things, and picture to ourselves a happy time, when ladies will allow us at least a glimpse of their real thoughts beyond those which, for conscience' sake, occasionally come to the surface on religious subjects in a dry, half-defiant tone, as if such things were, of course, objects of scorn to us of the weaker sex.

(To be concluded in our next.)

WATER—ITS ELEMENTS AND PROPERTIES.

'Water, water everywhere.'—Coleridge.

THE quantity of water present in our globe's crust, suspended in our atmosphere, and filling up the tissues of animals and vegetables, is prodigious. Even the hardest and most compact minerals, when pulverised and heated, give off a notable quantity. There is no substance on our globe more universally or abundantly diffused. We find it washing the South Pole in smoking oceans, and girdling the North with craggy battlements of ice and eternal snows. We find it seething in the sunless grottoes of the great deep, where the intrusive plummet is baffled in its soundings to measure the fathoms down of its green lair. We find it, in its cloudy chariots, sailing before the wind, high above earth and sea—betimes ranging its particles, in radiant-coloured ranks, across the arch of heaven, in presence of the august sun. Around, above, below—within, without—in vegetables, animals, and minerals—whether solid, liquid, or gaseous—water is present, apportioned to the pervasive nature of the substance with which it is in combination.

Generally speaking, people are in the habit of terming the ocean 'the watery element.' But water, chemically considered, is not an element but a compound. An elementary substance is a portion of matter which cannot be decomposed—which the Almighty has created and which man cannot destroy. Though he may so change its aspect and modify its energies, by combination with another substance, that it cannot be recognised; yet it is still there—like the hand that made it—unchangeable and indestructible. By the most severe chemical tests, you may divide, subdivide, re-subdivide—boil, burn, wash, filter, dry, melt, freeze, grind, press, wring, wriggle, and torture, in every conceivable way, in order to transmute or destroy it; but all is in vain. It will leap from the fiery ordeal unscathed, its native vigour unimpaired, and its individuality intact. And if the operator be not thoroughly intimate with its manner of doing business, it may probably blind, poison, or burn him—or at least frighten him so that he may be glad to allow it to escape by the window, or take himself, very quickly, to the side of the door farthest from it.

The number of simple or elementary bodies at present in the category of chemistry is 62 (with the exception of three recently discovered), and most of these are so minutely diffused that they may scarcely be said to exist. Indeed, for the present at least, we are justified in concluding that about a dozen constitute the bulk of our globe's crust, including also the vast oceans of atmospheric air which clothe our earth on every part like a mantle, and that a few thousand tons may be considered an adequate set off for the remaining fifty; besides, it is somewhat remarkable that there is only one element which is fluid at ordinary temperatures (mercury), all the others being either gases or solids.

Elementary bodies are rarely found pure in nature, and certainly never abundantly, for this very obvious reason, that, excepting iron, copper, sulphur, and a few others, they are of little utility to man; and what is remarkable, those that are necessary for the furtherance of civilization are apparently in illimitable quantities, besides being so subtle, so intense, so ungovernable, and so liable among themselves to form poisonous and explosive compounds, that they are manageable alone by the Almighty; and it does not require any great stretch of fancy to imagine the time when the elementary constituents of our earth and atmosphere were isolated; but to see this we must look into the awful magazines of the universe—the storehouses of the Omnipotent—where there may be countless millions of elementary bodies differing from any belonging to our earth, and out of which space may have been illuminated; and these may be governed by perfect laws accruing from their conflicting natures; and we can fancy the great Creator taking from harmonious chaos so much of this element, and a given quantity of that. Comprehending their peculiar natures and affinities, He weighs, as it were, 'the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance.' The very act of rushing to each other's embrace is the operation of a benevolent law, and that of being again separated by the same inexplicable principle, a wise and wonderful theory. We cannot tell what an element is, but only what it is not. The chemist may make compounds, but cannot make elements. Human wisdom is here at a stand-still. The elements are God's menials; and in the depths of His divine knowledge has he blended their fierce natures into harmless, harmonious, beautiful, and useful compounds, rendering what would otherwise have been resistless and appalling instruments of destruction and death, docile and pleasant principles of beauty and life. On the other hand, a compound is a combination of two or more elements, and the resulting substance is always entirely different from the originals. Elementary gaseous bodies combine with those of solids, and liquids with both. Compounds compound, and all with that beautiful nicety of combining proportion, upon which the operator can, with such certainty, determine the results of an analysis, being termed in chemistry 'the laws of affinity,' and involving the most difficult but most important principles of this wonderful science.

To show, for example, how the elements are compounded and recomposed, let us take down the little molecule of combustible matter which is attached to the point of the tiny splinter of wood termed a lucifer-match, and which, on the application of friction, ignites with explosion; and we find it to contain phosphorus, chlorine, oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, potassium, and lead. Or, if we take the compounds used by the manufacturer, we have red lead or litharge, chlorate of potash, and glue—the phosphorus being used in a free state. How wonderful—how amazing, when we look around our globe, and contemplate the different degrees in matter of colour, smell, taste, density, and other innumerable characteristics possessed both by elements and compounds; and generally varying in their transitions through the solid, liquid, and gaseous forms! But how much more wonderful—how vastly more amazing—when we consider that all the apparent varieties of matter which we behold stretched before us in a wide landscape, or large commercial city—from the hyssop of the wall to the cedar of Lebanon—from a molehill to a mountain—from a tiny spring of water to the vast ocean—from the little silvery minnow to the huge wallowing whale—from the minute scintillating diamond to the far-flashing glaciers of Mont Blanc—from the little brown field-mouse to the ponderous half-intellectual elephant—from the white pebble that paves the sea-beach to the granite ribs of our planet—from the brief-lived ephemera to the majestic eagle—from the glowworm to the boa-constrictor—and from the lowest species of animal organism (of which the oyster is a type) up to reasoning and immortal man;—all these—all between these—all matter is composed of a few of those mysterious agents—those inexplicable creations of Omnipotence, about whose origin we cannot even hope ever to know anything! And it is simply owing to the different combined proportion of these elements, which compose all the compounds of matter, that such compounds are produced—the same elements forming an opaque solid, and crystalline fluid—a delicious fragrance, and intolerable effluvia—a nutritive food, and deadly poison; according to the proportions in which they are combined.

Water, then, is a compound; and the most beautiful, wonderful, and abundant which the Almighty has mingled and measured into our planet. Being generated by the companionization of two of the most fierce and intense elements—which, in an isolated condition, are under all circumstances gases—how strange that the combination of two absolute gaseous bodies should result in a fluid—should doff their ethereal armour, and blend their intense natures into bland and limpid water! But the most commonplace objects, which surround us day by day, are very oracles of mystery and wisdom; and, in unsyllabled yet sublime eloquence, are continually solliciting us to look beyond their mere effects, to their great First Cause, who 'Lives through all life—extends through all extent—

Spreads, undivided—operates, unspent.'

What diversified forms of beauty and sublimity water assumes! We observe it in the crystalline dewdrop, seated on the fragrant bosom of a crimson rosebud—in the purling rill, glimmering down the valley like a string of silver—in the millions of snowflakes, spotlessly pure, floating noiselessly through the atmosphere, like swandown; and, microscopically examined, resembling tiny necklaces composed of minute pearls—in the rushing rain, leaping from the leaky clouds and gyrating among the folds of the wind—in the rolling river, sweeping majestically through arches of blowing verdure—in the hanging cataract, bright with quivering sunbeams—in the rock-framed lake, mirroring the stars in its bosom like pearls—in the ponderous green-rooted icebergs, enthroned in lonely majesty on the dim deep, with their flowerless verandahs and silent porches, turreted, arched, corniced, and festooned with all the fantastic picturesque frostwork of winter, like massive cathedrals of glass—or, lastly, in its native home, that immense storehouse of caloric, the ocean, whose restless billows are ever rolling in the sun, and whose tidal flux and reflux is the operation of a benevolent law, which modifies the extremes of heat and cold throughout our globe.

JOHN DOUGALL.

AN APOCALYPSIS.

'Verum ego non tamen illis legem ponam, quam legem vobis mee proprie mentis exponam: quam qui probaverit, teneat: cui non placuerit, abjectat.'—Petrarch, de vita solitaria lib. 7. tract IV. c. 4.

Closer and nearer still, Annie! closer and nearer still!
See, the twilight sky grows grayer, and the twilight air grows chill,
And the firwood lies as black as death in the shadow of the hill.

It is the holy time of earth, and softly everywhere
The baptism of the gentle dew hallows the scented air,
And the lilies stoop their stately heads as if they bent in prayer;
Straight up above thro' a jagged cleft is a belt of intensest blue,
An angel's path, besprinkled with a bashful star or two;
And we are alone in the garden—alone, love—I and you.

Closer and nearer yet, Annie! closer and nearer yet!
My hair is fleck'd with gray, darling! yours is black as jet;
My face is somewhat sadly stern—the lines are firm and set;
While yours is fresh as a rosebud, with the dew of morning wet;
And your heart is full and joyous as the May-day song of birds;
Yet your trustful eyes have said, and your low-whisper'd words,
That you love me, darling—love me! tho' sad and worn and gray;
And the old church chimes to-morrow morn ring out our marriage-day!

Let us sit down here, Annie—here under the bee-loved lime,
While I tell an old, old story—told for the thousandth time.

Many a day ago, Annie, by the gray, hungry sea,
There was an ivied cottage under a sycamore tree,
With a dainty-latticed porch and a quaint old pointed roof;
And I saw it—and all in it—through a veil of fairy-wool.
To idle eyes 'twas but a cottage by the old brown sea-strand;
But to me it was hallowed with the light of the Eifland,
For a potent witch lived in it—a lady, young and fair,
With the starlight prison'd in her eyes, and the sunbeams in her hair.

Why linger! we were much together (nay, darling, do not start);
I loved her—yes, yes, Annie! I loved her with all my heart!
I was faint with the thirst of love—like Moor, mirage-begull'd;
It was many a day long since, love! and my heart was foolish and wild—

Many a day long since, Annie! when you were but a child.

She was older by two summers, but her light and joyous tone
Made the years that had flown o'er her seem less than were my own;

For I was always somewhat sad, and though the brow be smooth,

The ink of thought will overvell in part the bloom of youth.
And we were much together; and she knew of my love,
For a thousand things can speak, though the shy lips will not move.

And many a nameless token seem'd confirmation plain,
That if I dared to dream of her my dreaming was not vain.
Yes, love! I thought—woe's me! I thought that I was loved again!

Closer, darling! closer to me. What did the lady care,
So that her pride might be fed fat, what sorrow I should bear?
She play'd with my heart as the wind with the tangles of your hair;

But I lay lapp'd in my love-hull'd sleep—in my Dilliah dream—
Holding yesterday as naught, to-morrow of small esteem,
So that to-day the sky was bright over love's summier stream!

But I awoke one day, darling! and it was in this wise—
The scene has many a time since then sprung up before my eyes—

At the summer eventide, as wont, I went to be with her,
And the cottage was alive with a murmur and a stir;
At the door stood little Helen, the lady's blue-eyed sister;
We were great friends—the child and I—and bending down I kiss'd her.

'That's two to-day,' she slap'd—'one from Frank and one from you;

I shall be rich in kisses soon; come into the parlour—do.

They're all in there—Frank and them all.' I pass'd into the room,
And through my heart there shot a chill, and over my eyes a gloom;
And the sunshine lost its glory, and the summer lost its bloom.

This was her sailor-lover—abroad for many a day.
They had been troth-plighted, Annie! before he went away;
Yet, with this bond upon her, the coquette's black, hollow heart
Could feign the blush and smile of love with a cool, accursed art—

Could lure the trusting soul o'er a false and fatal track,
And wake a music in my breast she ne'er could echo back.
And she was to be his bride, love! ere many days were o'er—
For it was not long at a time that he could stay ashore.
The very eve before he came, under the starlight cool,
We walk'd in the whispering oak-shade, and my soul of souls was full

With a passionate adoration and a fond and credulous trust;
Hope's upward-pointing wings dream'd naught of the defiling dust;

Soft-voiced was the lady and gracious. We parted with a kiss;
But not a word of the morrow's comer—never a word of this!
I sat there, marble-maak'd in face that not a line could swerve,
With a lazy lip-smile, and a chain upon each quivering nerve.
I bade the bridegroom welcome gay, with some faint touch of ruth—

I praised the lady's beauty—I praised her faith and truth;
I chatter'd with a careless scorn, and home the words were driven

In that bland tone which cannot be resented—nor forgiven;
And, to the devil in my heart, it was enjoyment rich
To catch her half-appealing look, and the quick convulsive twitch

That writhed in the corners of her mouth—in all her will's despite.

I do regret it. Gentleness is ever truest might.

I was wont to leave them with 'Good night': 'Good-bye' I bade them now.

Smiling, and scoffing, and shaking hands, with an ice-cold, ice-smooth brow,

Forth from the disenchanting land I pass'd into the night,
Where the cold broad sea lay moaning in the wan and ghostly light.

My heart was all benumb'd, in a transient, pulseless sleep,
Like the crutching lion's pause ere he takes his deadly leap—
Voiceless and hush'd, and numb'd, and still, as it could never wake—

Still! ay, as earth is still, till the crashing thunders break.

The loss of accustom'd wealth, and the view of present death,
Will cramp and load the stifled breast till it draw a 'bated breath';
Yet still the true heart's dauntless will has power within itself
To front the shadowy terror, and to scorn the vanish'd self.
Friends part and perish, Annie! and the heart is stricken sore,
Yet the empty fountain fills, and the void is void no more;
But when faith is smote to death, and the once all-cloudless sky
Grows murky with the lethal gloom of the incarnate lie,
Then a vague and shapeless fear has birth, and a gnawing doubt springs up,

And each heart's spring is made deadly by deceit's envenom'd cup.

When earth hath lost this primal truth Heaven only can redeem.
I have no memory of that night, save as a hideous dream
Of lossings, and groanings, and tears, and sights and sounds of dread,

And fierce repinings, and mad prayers that I were with the dead;
And a horror of the darkness and its visions of affright—
Till the day broke in sunshine, and then I cursed the light.

Yet though nigh wounded unto death, with many an aching scar,
My soul came forth victorious from the torturing heart-war;
For the burning love that had been my very life of life,
Was thrown in the deadly wrestle of that terrible night's strife,
And cast aside and spurn'd by the indomitable will.
But tho' the venom'd shaft was drawn, the wound kept rankling still.

The winds rave out their strength and lull, and the mad waves rest again;

But the tall ship's thick-ribb'd timbers, and her costly stuff and men

No more shall find the haven, where the watchers watch in vain.

A chaos of chafed and shapeless shreds, it strews the watery way—

Like a veil of horror drawn 'twixt the sea and the conscious day.

Haggard, and wan, and leaden-eyed—even of hope forlorn—
And hope is long and loth to leave the heart in which 'tis born—

I left the place so woful now—an Eden but of late—
Borne up by the sustaining strength of that diabolical hate
That dares to take the doubtful odds and match itself with Fate.

The days went by, the weary days—a long and laggard train;
With little respite from my woe—small healing of my pain;

For I sought the healing in myself—in myself I placed the trust;

But vain the hope; and vain the help sought from the son of dust.

I found his loudliest-vaunted goods but tawdry, himself ill;
Till, from the grim valley of death, I look'd up to the hills
Whence the aid cometh; and it came, and the long war was o'er;
Then peace fell on the vexing thoughts and balm on the aching sore.

And not alone the inner life was sooth'd and harmonised;
But earth resumed the pristine bloom that once emparadis'd;
And a new sense of beauty, and music, and delight

Stirr'd through my soul, like the first breathings of the young spring's might;

And the rapture of happy tears could visit the long-stern eye.
As they greeted the voice and view of waters, and fields, and skies.

In my heart upsprung the flower of love, and blossom'd fair anew;

And a fresh hope nursed it, and baptised it with its holiest dew—

For, in the flush of the flower-time, darling! I met with you.

The outward grace of form and face, and your pure soul's dear worth,

Are blended like the promised bridal of the heavens and earth,
Where heaven stoops lovingly to earth and earth soars up to heaven.

'Have I forgiven the lady?'

Yes; as I hope to be forgiven.

The perfect love that casts out fear casts out all hatred too.

If I bore hate to aught on earth I could not so love you.
To be most just and wisest, Heaven doth not seek alone,

But wills and works so that our souls shall be constrain'd to own
That it is most just and wisest. Our path is mercy-strew'd!

The clouds that move our peevish gall to such repinings vain
Are treasure-houses to upstore the soft and gracious rain;

And the chill that falls at evening, when the sultry day is thro',
Solaces all the heat-faint earth with the softness-breathing dew.

Look up to the heavens, Annie! The cloud's embattled host,
Where is it now? On the far verge of the horizon lost;

And the broad unwrinkled brow of the calm old solemn night—
With its ineffable depth, and serenity, and might—

Is soften'd into tenderness by the young moon's light;
And the stars smile down their blessing on the happy, dreaming flowers,

And brightest of all is the lover's star—be the fair omen ours!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'This folio of four pages, happy work!
Which not even critics criticise—that holds
Inquisitive Attention, while I read,
Fast bound in chains of silence, while the fair,
Though eloquent themselves, yet fear to break;
What is it but a map of busy life,
Its fluctuations, and its vast concerns?'—Cowper.

CHAPTER XI.

READER!—How comical to say 'Courteous reader' to perhaps the greatest churl that ever knit brows! so, therefore, simply Reader!—whether with a face to make the roses blow, or to turn the milk sour, is nothing to the purpose—let me interrogate you, as a man and a Christian, have you ever inhaled nitrous oxide or protoxide of nitrogen, vulgarly known as laughing-gas? If not, your indifferent person, and countenance not highly beautiful, may possibly have been accepted during some insane shimmer of a bewildered moon, by the one only fascinating girl existing at that moment among all the races of mankind; and blessing your good fortune at having been born about the same epoch of time, you may have rushed to your apartment, and there and then—unseen by any wide-staring eyes of the world—jumped over chairs and sofas, like a rehearsing harlequin with all the tickets for his benefit sold. Acknowledge no such ecstatic experience, and I shall confess myself gravelled for illustration level to your capacity—unless, indeed, you have been a cripple, taken Holloway's pills, and seen your crutches go into the air magically, as if your infirmity had all at once detonated and blown up. Except to my one friend, I was now—oh! the unspeakable joy of it!—out of debt. I should have written the words in italics—in capitals—in gold. What a sensation of health! what a prospect of longevity! There were India-rubber balls in my shoes. My heels were feathered like Mercury's. Talk not to me of Elysium. Every inch, and all the divine colours, and all the unspeakable glow of it, were in my blood. The baker, the butcher, and the grocer made my passage to town oleaginous with their gracious looks. They ceased to be supremely ill-looking. On the contrary, their faces expanded into quite a beneficent, amiably-beaming, delightful tea-party expression. The milkman's bell, too, no longer tolled a little dolorous toll, but assumed a cheery tinkle of its own. All the unnatural winds and rains that had been battering our lean and wasted summer, from Sunday to Sunday, did not in the least disturb my equanimity. Under every villainous assault of foul weather, I could look out and exclaim, like some poet of the serene Lakes, A beautiful and azure-skied world, O my masters!

My heart enlarged like a Howard's. In particular, I hoped that my five girls had boots impervious to wet; that they were tidily and handsomely gloved; and that they sighed not vainly for any nice ribbon compassable by my present affluence. Not Shakspeare, but Colman the younger, or some such third-rate interpreter, it must have been, that exclaimed, 'Fathers have flinty hearts!' Lear's, Brabantio's, my own, were tender enough, God wot. Yet! in this very week, in the newspapers—those marvellous modern kaleidoscopes of what humanity daily does and suffers—one story of a young Irishwoman returned from seven years' transportation, and ascribing her deliberate crime for that end to her father maltreating and strapping her to a bedpost! and another story of a girl destroying herself by jumping out of a window at Plymouth, under terror of her father's wrath!

'Can such things be,
And overcome us, like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder!'

Here are the domestic tyrannies directly charged with impelling to crime and suicide! Yet I should like to know what kind of damsel Sydney Keelan, who stole the cows, was, before I utterly condemn the poor gardener, her father. Her own account of herself does not lead me to suppose that she abounded in those qualities likely to engage and secure, with strong tendrils, the parental affections and tenderesses. She was dissatisfied with her schoolmistress—was tempted to pilfer 'some trifling things' from a Mrs. Boyd, with whom she resided—in another situation she grew tired of needlework—and landing, naturally enough for one so unstable, in the work-house, she, in company with three others, not finding emigration easy, resolved to perpetrate some striking illegality, in order to get abroad at their country's expense. Window-breaking having failed, they tried cattle-stealing, and succeeded. Not worth retaining at home, they were sent as far as Hobart Town. Miss Keelan there procured an engagement; but her master 'acting tyrannically towards her,' she quarrelled with him and was imprisoned. On her liberation, she again got employment, and her new master—a shopkeeper—promised to marry her—we hope with his eyes open—but she quarrelled with him in turn, and with a like result. It would thus appear that neither the harsh words of cruelty nor the tender words of courtship could subdue the much-wronged Keelan; and now, at the age of twenty-eight, she is back once more in Ireland, lecturing—à la Lola Montez—on the 'horrors of transportation.' What! not satisfied even with that? Was ever creature so unreasonable? Taking her own narrative, indeed, I should judge her to be a specimen for Mr. Ravey; and yet she would throw the blame of her wild, rebellious life on her poor old father and the bedpost! Ah Keelan!

woman of genius as I think!—did not one, to whom you owed something, pause now and then amidst his flowers and cabbages, a quarter of a century ago, and wonder what he could make of a certain little wilful despoiler of his blooms and borders, the colour and temper of whose eyes, if I saw you, I could perhaps guess? Then, with regard to the unfortunate Mary Anne Luke at Plymouth, were not her own errors and passionateness quite as much at fault as her wretched father's chastisement? The coroner has pronounced that the latter acted with 'undue severity.' Of course he did. But was not she herself bringing discredit on the house of a perhaps upright though stern man? May not the beating which she, a girl of eighteen, had unhappily received on refusing to afford certain explanations, have arisen from the rashness and impolicy of a possibly just and high-principled anger? She had before threatened to take poison if her misconduct was disclosed to her father, and who knows but that her frenzied and fatal rush up stairs, and out at window, beyond where vengeance, or blame, or shame could overtake her, resulted, in part at least, from sin, remorse, and the bewildered vision of a Nemesis of her own creation in the person of a sire that was implacable? The yelling crowd at Guildhall saw only a kind of brutal Brian de Bois-Guilbert, who had driven a heroic Rebecca, in the extremity of her fear, to take the awful plunge. But in men like Thomas Luke, all the feelings are sharply edged; and there is a perfect and most pitiful harmony in the rage of this Plymouth shoemaker at his erring daughter, being quenched utterly and forever in the bitterness of tears over his slaughtered child. Oh! were she alive again, how different! But out and alas! with all chances of atoning kindness, lost in the dismal caverns of the Nevermore! Retire, ye indignantly-execrating—but, let us hope, blindly-misjudging—multitude, and leave Virginus to his madness!

Well, well, man is after all a peculiar medley. I am odd myself, and as a proof confess it. Wherefore should I—erring mortal!—cling with bigotry to any opinion of to-day, seeing that it differs from that which I held yesterday, and may have the stomach knocked out of it to-morrow? Though not, like Michael Cassio, 'a great arithmetician'—only a passable one, arithmetic being my vocation—I think I could count back to the hours that found me a loud contemner of all newspapers. These humid ephemera seemed to me like so many heaps of rubbish, burying the magnificent old classics of our 'English undefiled.' I began to be afflicted with visions of no libraries extant—not even wooden Xenophons for a pretence—nothing in the way of literature but pyramids of wastepaper, densely blotted, soft as effete rage, prospectively untaxed, and fearfully accumulating. Yet here am I pering and pottering over the daily prints as keenly as any spectacled quidnunc, and recognising therein wonderful photograms, in series, of a strange and complex life-world! Genius I see there, too, doing base paraphrasing, and scattering its divine lights among a thousand ignoble vulgarities, even as the accommodating sun first fires the minarets, and is then content to lavish its immeasurable splendours among the lazar smells of Stamboul. No longer pedestaled on mighty quartos, behold the immortal clay mingling with the common dirt of humanity, and casting its visions of celestial beauty, and its dreams of eternal fame, under the wheels of the competitive Juggernaut of the hour—red with the blood of Heaven knows how many hearts! The haggard brows and the quivering fingers of the past night are nowhere. Enough for the great unscrupulous public that they have their morning meal of late intelligence and luminous comment, to be forgotten, perhaps, ere another twenty-four hours are over. Still, however, still—for such are the grand compensations which sometimes result from things evil—out of the universal scattering of such seeds, and the marvellous growths silently succeeding, the life of the nation flourishes—catches, by stray gleams, the infection of lofty impulse—and rises upward, in the main, to infinite and sublime issues. At all events, it is well to extract what good we can from newspapers, for they are the light craft—the new steam-fleet, so to speak—of literature, before which the huge slow-sailing hulks—treble-decked and majestic—the glory of every poetic archæologist—must ultimately be laid by to rot.

Tennyson, strangest and dreamiest of the roll of laureates, in that beautiful 'In Memoriam,' which is, according to my feeling of it, the master-strain of all his song, says—

'Never morning wore
To evening but some heart did break.'

Every newspaper—although setting forth only such few heartbreaks as burst through crime or accident to the social surface—illustrates this dreadfully sad truth. Occurrences which to us—to you and me, reader!—are mere 'melancholy events' and 'fatal accidents,' are elsewhere hideous tragedies that stagger the pulses and blast the life. Ay me! I fear we are selfish beings, and perhaps providentially so, as what heart could bear, from day to day, the sorrows of all the world borne hither in the trail of the steam-horse, or on the wings of the tamed lightning? Yet even the most indifferent newspaper-reader may so guard and preserve the fine surface of his sensitiveness, as to gather into the magic camera of his soul, warnings and teachings, and philosophies from the birth-caverns of all the winds. When I encounter a great man, I measure me by his stature in order that I may be humble or proud according as his or my inches predominate. The spectacle of one worse off than myself gives me reason for contentedness; and in this way I reap harvests of virtue wherever the ploughshare of suffering has driven its remorseless furrows. From Sydney Keelan—she of the masculine name, and, as I judge, character, and from the ill-starred Mary Anne Luke of Plymouth, and from bitter thinkings of their blamed, perhaps not blameless nor yet wholly blameworthy fathers—I turn to my own five beauties, and to myself with miraculous increase of tenderness. O fool! to be resolving, almost under solemnity of tears, that never one of all my five—'my handful' as I playfully call them—shall experience angry touch from me, pawkily knowing all the while how little likely I am to be provoked to that pitch! With such daughters there is no merit in my forbearance—none.

Perhaps, too—I will not deny it—the extremely delicate health of Barbara has had its subduing influence. Yet she bears up wonderfully, and last night charmed us all—Mr. Waddel in particular—by the arch sweetness with which she sung at her piano, though in the lowest and softest possible voice, a humorous little ditty of her own. It had been suggested by some talk of a pic-nic as soon as the weather should become settled. Here it is:—

Hey the day! and ho the day!
Of the town I'm sick, sick!
Blossoms are on the apple-spray,
But we will be fair as they
When we don our dresses gay,
All to have a pic-nic.

Hie you, haste you, every one
Here the smoke is thick, thick!
Let us to the open sun,
There to laugh, and leap, and run,
Till we're like to die with fun—
Screaming to our pic-nic!

Many eyes wide wakeful keep
While the clock plays tick, tick!—
Some to watch and some to weep,
Some to study problems deep,
Some to rather dream than sleep—
Thinking on the pic-nic!

Baskets we must have a store—
Many a roasted chick, chick—
Ham, and tongue, and brawn galore—
Bitter beer at least a score;
Mercy! what a mad uproar
Will be at our pic-nic!

Which is mutton? which is pork?
Pass your tumblers quick, quick!
Awkward sitting à la Turk!
Where's the mustard? Please, a fork!
That must be a rified cork!—
Oh a jolly pic-nic!

Not a tongue will be at rest!
Merry mills go click, click!
Every word will be a jest,
And to worst as well as best
Laughter will give double zest
At our roaring pic-nic.

Then hey the day! ho the day!
Of the town I'm sick, sick!
Blossoms are on the apple-spray,
But we will be bright as they
When we don our dresses gay,
All to have a pic-nic.

'All to have a pic-nic!' chimed in good old Mathew, without a note of music in his voice. 'All to have a pic-nic!' he continued roaring untunefully, and thumping the table; and so went on until in a fit of laughter he almost choked. It was glorious; but Barbara, though smiling and well pleased, looked as if the exertion had been too much for her; and I was a little unhappy in the midst of my great pride and happiness.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

A LITTLE CHAFF ON PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

ONE HALF OF THE WORLD DOES NOT KNOW HOW THE OTHER LIVES.

It is to be remarked, in everyday life, that when an individual has been held up to public ridicule or execration for some time, the company, apparently in condonation of the amusement afforded them by his condemnation, generally wind up with a peace-offering expressed in the acknowledgment of some minor virtues. We have now hit on a truism so indisputable, that I presume it will be claimed as a member of the proverbial family, though its title might be disputed. Let it be our peace-offering.

But if we know so little of our neighbours' affairs in a material point of view—if we ignore the influence their prosperity or adversity exercises over our own fortunes, it is certain we have still less appreciation of their inner life, to which we owe so much for good and for evil. We have all a certain number of friends, acquaintances, or dependants, in whose affairs we take more or less interest, however little we may show it, or even allow ourselves to believe; while most families contain some member who is utterly misunderstood, or at least isolated from the rest, and lives and dies unknown, unless, transplanted or vivified by some change of circumstances, they suddenly put out shoots in all directions, and astonish us with their unsuspected beauties.

These drooping plants may be divided into two classes, viz. those who are misunderstood by others, and those who misunderstand themselves, and consequently fancy they are depreciated by all around. In most cases, isolation arises from a mixture of these two causes.

What we call reserve or shyness is almost an invariable characteristic of the misunderstood; but it is by no means a test of the side on which the misunderstanding has arisen, nor is it necessarily the cause of it; for the mind which over-estimates itself will sink as easily into self-adoration when rebuffed, as the more humble will turn to self-depreciation. In both cases, a cloud of reserve falls over the best and deepest feelings, which forms the great difficulty against which we have to contend in arriving at a true estimate of our household pariahs. It often happens, for example, that, by some unusual or unexpected train of circumstances, the veil is lifted for a moment, we feel our hearts glow with admiration and self-reproach—we discover that we have much in common, much to admire which we cannot attain to, and we part unwillingly, resolving henceforth to be more just, looking forward to much pleasure and benefit in the exploration of this unknown land. Next time we meet, however, the cloud has again fallen, probably more closely wrapped, from a consciousness of self-betrayal, and uncertainty of the effect produced on us—a fear that holy things have been too lightly laid bare. Our new friend is gone, leaving us to wonder how we could ever have dreamed of taking this soulless statue to our hearts; and we turn away with sorrow, chilled by the first contact:—

'The smiles that from reflection came,
All, all have fled, and left her mind
A faded monument behind.'—T. M.

But what has so chilled us is too often not a statue but a snow-wrapped volcano, and the hidden flames retire only to make the inner fire more furious. This cold being, from whom we have recoiled, has probably looked forward to this meeting with hope and fear; hope, too often disappointed to be very strong, that its hidden thoughts have at last found sympathy—fear, lest the only result is to be another repulse—and, as we retire, thinking ourselves deceived or alighted, the poor heart sinks deep into its former reserve, sad and disheartened—

'I am ashamed: does not the statue rebuke me
For being more stone than it!'

A saying is often in the mouths of those who wish to escape their public duties, that 'Charity begins at home.' Who can tell how much sorrow and misery would be spared if charity did begin at home! Far from this being the case, however, charity is the most arrant vagabond on the face of the earth, flitting at one moment with a pretty face, feeding the next, with a gross appetite, alternately on the praises of the bystanders in the market-place and the half-resentful gratitude of its recipients in the cottage; but not to be found at home, unless strangers attack our relations, which we are apt to resent, more because they belong to us than for any other reason. It may at first sight seem unnatural, though it is not really so, that our tendency is to watch the defects of those with whom we live, noting each time our ideas jar, and to compare them with the virtues of strangers, of whose defects we have little opportunity of judging, forgetting that in so doing we apply a magnifier to all the worst qualities of the one and the best of the other. An admirable essay on this love of strangers is among 'Problems in Human Nature.' If I had the pleasure of knowing the author, I should recommend the 'Misunderstood' to her consideration.

If we seek the origin of this mental seclusion, we shall invariably find we are brought to the complicated home influences, though it is often difficult to point out the exact cause. It often happens that some one staying with a friend makes a great impression on us. We see great tact under trying circumstances; or discover, as we think, great originality, or ability of some sort. Perhaps the very next week you see this person at home, and every one is astonished at your opinion. The prophet is of no account in his own country—rather in the way than otherwise. His, or more often her, relations look upon her for a few days with a certain degree of curiosity, thinking it strange you should have made such a mistake; and you often end by becoming very much of the same opinion. This happens constantly in well-regulated families; but where there is disorder of any kind—where truth and feeling give way to cleverness—where smart words take the place of grave thoughts—how great is the fall!

When you find your Rachel fighting tooth and nail to hide her sorrow—when you find the gentle manner gone, the soft voice which charmed you dealing cutting blows right and left, or sacrificing all for the sake of a laugh—I would not have you turn away. If the shock is great to you, is it not great to her? Look around at her temptations. Can she buy admiration or peace at any other price (for, whatever we may profess, admiration and peace are our household gods)? Where is the quiet, watchful mother who should guard her? where the brothers and sisters who should support her? How very often they are all against her! Do not turn away, I say. It is likely enough that the sounds which offend you are as the cries of Rispah watching over the remains of her dead sons, and suffering none to approach.

This, which is perhaps the hardest case, meets with the least sympathy. As a rule, we accept that which is most obvious, and seeing only recklessness or sarcasm, are loth to believe in any hidden grief; while the utter isolation of one of our family must at least force us to think something is wrong, though we are generally careful to put the blame on the wrong shoulders. The argument is something of this sort. We all agree very well, our tastes are similar, our objects in life more or less the same, why must this one alone stand aloof? Must our sheaves bow down to him? our stars worship him? He can join us if he will; if not, let him struggle alone on his cheerless way, we have no time to turn aside into such cheerless paths. All this time we forget the many attempts to join our company which we have suppressed; the efforts to take delight in our pleasures, which we have sneered at with ill-concealed ridicule of those whose ways are not as our ways.

This state of suppression is naturally more apparent among women than among men; for the latter have this advantage, that a certain amount of brusquerie, often a successful shield for this complaint, is allowed them, and passes unnoticed, which in a woman would at once degrade. We should remember that though this manner mostly arises from a sense of inferiority, yet the inferiority is often only fancied, and the defiant tone is the result of constant suppression.

Again, there are many people of whose isolation we are hardly aware—those, I mean, who are cheerful enough outwardly, who join heartily in family hopes and fears, keeping their secret so well that it is long before we can trace the course of thought which runs through and guides their inner life. As there are some creepers which can only attain their full perfection in pairs, and planted singly will hang languidly round the support they should cling to, so in human nature there are many to whom full sympathy is so necessary that, when surrounded by those whose turn of mind is not the same, they are in fact as isolated and undeveloped as those who are the victims of actual suppression or neglect. There is much love, and many family ties for them to cling to; but the companion who can follow every step through life, and feel what they feel, is still wanting. Certainly these are worthy of all our compassion—taking up their cross daily, bearing it in silence and solitude, hidden in their hearts; a lot only the less hard because we feel that it comes not from any ill will on the part of those we live with, but is a trial sent us by Him who knows how great is the burden we have to carry, and will never give us more than we can bear.

Happy are they who can look upon it in this light. We must not, however, forget that, in the first place, it is not always easy to know if people are interested in us or not; for if we believe ourselves misunderstood, we are bound to remember that the converse is equally probable—that many loving thoughts are bestowed upon us, of which we are ignorant; and also that our duty is not to retire into ourselves, by which we hide all the best, and put forward the worst, features of our characters, but rather to endeavour to find out and increase what points of junction we can find in our companions. Many susceptible minds, living in isolation, have such a dread of being thought better than they are, that it seems quite a duty to them to bring forward what they consider the bad points the moment any sort of superiority has been recognised. The feeling is natural enough, but it is obnoxious to the charge of emanating rather from a pardonable pride than real humility.

Probably the most truly unfortunate are those, perhaps hardly a minority, who misunderstand themselves. It is well known that many great comic actors have to the last considered tragedy their strong point; and the advice given to a young author, 'Scratch out whatever you think particularly fine writing,' would not be a bad axiom to guide us through life; but this ill-directed vanity is none the less genuine, and leads too often to the most dangerous kind of isolation. We should deal very gently with this delusion, from which few of us are free. How often, when we see something in others we admire much, we adopt the peacock's feathers; and then, forgetting the incongruity of our costume, feel disgusted at those who will not praise in us what others gain so much credit for!

To those who feel there is one among them living in solitude, I would say deal very gently with such a one; thank God that you are spared this bitter trial; and beware lest by any means you increase the load. To those who feel themselves misunderstood, consider the matter carefully; see how far it has been your own fault—how far it is, indeed, the fact; and then, if the verdict be in your favour, fight on bravely—be sure your time will come, that you required this trial for some cause or other; and though you may not reap your reward here, many a word of yours has sunk deep where you least suspect, and you have done more good in your generation than you are aware of.

Of these erratic little essays, one was written to console Niobe for her disappointment, the rest followed at intervals, and are offered to the public with much diffidence. Niobe is seeking a home in the far East, and will perhaps find them in a hawk's box; but she will not be more surprised than the author to see them in print.

EARTH'S SONG AT NOONTIDE.

Come, loved Night!
Come from thy sapphire, starry-jewell'd hall!
On thy serenity, peace, love, and light—
Earth's thousand voices call.
Come, with sweet
Cool Zephyrus and cloud of silver gray;
Poor labour's sweated brow aches with the heat
Of the full noontide ray.
Bring sweet dews
To cool the urns of the thirsting flowers,
And renovate their glorious rainbow hues
Through night's refreshing hours.

Bring thy spell
Of sweet tranquillity from heaven down;
Still the perturbed spirit's passionate swell;
Banish each froward frown.
Angels come,
From your bless'd crystal fields of light on high;
Among earth's feeble children there be some
Full soon shall sink and die.
Hover nigh
The couch of infancy, and youth, and age;
Still the sick sufferer's sorrowful sigh—
The aching brow assuage.
Come, sweet Night!
With all thy golden imagery and thought—
Beauty, calm, and train of shadows light—
From thy spirit-region brought.
Nature grows
Exhausted with the din of garish day;
In the sunbeam the languid lily bows
Its head, like nun to pray.
The wild bee
Grows tired with his load of plunder'd sweets
'Mong flowers, since early sipping free,
He lags in the noontide heats.
The butterfly
Lazily wavers o'er the sun-scorch'd rose;
He likewise to his covert fain would hie
To drink night's cool repose.
The tired ox
Panteth to slake his thirst in shaded pool;
The goats upon the high sunbeaten rocks
Yearn for the dewfall cool.
Deep within
The leafy network of the coppice shade
The drowsy birds unconsciously begin
Their evening serenade.
The sea-star
And pearl'd shell-fish bask among the weeds,
Dreaming of cooling tides outroll'd afar
From shingle and thirsty reeds.
The earth longs
For the lorn nightingale's sweet roundelay—
For the shrill cricket's busy little songs,
And the glowworm's ray.
Weary hearts
Are waiting for thy soothing, stilly hour,
Longing until the light of day departs
From hill, and stream, and bower.
Bring them rest,
Tranquil, mellifluous, cool, and healing;
Subdue the pulses of the careworn breast,
And each discordant feeling.
Bring deep sleep
To steep the senses in forgetfulness;
On the pain'd lids of aching eyes that weep
Gently thy fingers press.
Bring glad dreams
To light the silent chambers of the brain,
Like flowers that strive in day's refulgent beams
After refreshing rain.
Silent Moon!
Arise in thy unclouded glory high;
Let thy delicious kiss, a welcome boon,
On lake and ocean lie!
Stars! arise
Sublimely in your everlasting light;
Ope the eternal splendour of your eyes!
O come, beloved Night!

CHARLES KENNEDY.

LE CHEVALIER DU RAYON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

'Oh, Charlie is my darling! the young Chevalier.'—Jacobite Song.

CHAPTER I.

'He is so handsome,' said Jemima Primrose to her sister, Miss Primrose, as they drove home one evening from Mrs. Walton's. 'Indeed, I do not think I almost ever saw a handsomer man; and then he has such a nice manner, and such a delightful foreign accent. But did you not notice, Jane, that he is much more like a German than a Frenchman—although it is French he speaks—and he isn't at all dark? and, you know, all Germans are fair—Kreutzner, and Hoffman, and old Mr. Wallenstein, the music-master, who used to come to Miss Banfield's, and all those that we know.'

'And did you not hear him say—at least he told me,' rejoined Miss Primrose—'that, although he had been educated in France, and lived mostly there, he was by birth a German?'

'Ah!' said Jemima. 'But does he not talk French beautifully? He really has such a nice voice. I was so sorry I could not properly understand what he said. Did you notice what a charming voice he has?'

'His charms seem to have made a most wonderful impression,' said Miss Primrose. 'If you continue to dilate upon them'—

'Dear me, Jane! I'm sure you needn't,' said Jemima. 'I'm sure I was merely talking of him as I would of any one.'

'Oh yes!' said Miss Primrose. 'You do not flatter yourself that he was at all marked in his attentions! Oh no!'

'Oh, as to that, I think I may perhaps flatter myself that he was a little so,' replied Jemima; 'and that, perhaps, is more than you can say.'

'Oh yes; to be sure it is,' said Miss Primrose. 'He took no notice of me, of course—not the slightest. He did not sit beside me nearly all the evening; he did not turn the leaves for me while I played the "Robin Red-Breast Waltz;" he did not take out his pocket-handkerchief when I sang "Tears of Love;" he did not—; but no matter. Oh no! he did not!'

As each bona fide performance of the subject of remark was enumerated, Jemima uttered an expressive 'Hem!' and, as her sister concluded, made a subdued remark, in which the words 'cross old thing' were distinctly audible.

'Oh yes!' exclaimed Miss Primrose. 'She's cross; she's old; she's a thing! Most amiable language! Most sisterly language! She is ugly, too, of course. She has no colour, as I have; her complexion is sallow, of course; her nose is—red.'

'That, my dear, is what Frank would have called a self-evident proposition.'

'What do you mean by that?' cried Miss Primrose. 'Jemima! I have borne your impertinence till I can bear it no longer. And I will bear it no longer. I will demand that papa gives me a sufficient allowance, and I will go and live somewhere by myself; I shall go and live with Aunt Virtue at Brighton. I will bear it no longer.'

'Go, then; go!' said Jemima. 'I'm sure we would all be well rid of you. Many a time Frank told you that; and I'm sure it was that, as much as anything else, made him go to India.'

'It is false!' cried Miss Primrose. 'How dare you—how dare you say such a thing?'

'Jane,' said Jemima, 'don't make a fool of yourself. I'm sure I said nothing—and if I did, I'm sorry; but I do hate that way you have of talking. I'm sure I want to be agreeable; and if you would leave me alone, you would have no reason to complain of me. But here we are at the square—let us say no more about it.'

'But I will say more about it!—I will say more about it!' cried Miss Primrose. 'Shall you insult me with impunity? Papa shall hear of it; mamma shall hear of it; Du Rayon, too, shall hear of it; all London shall hear of it! I have borne it too long—I will bear it no longer!'

'The old gal is going it. She's a rum un—she is,' said the footman to the coachman, as the carriage stopped, and he got down from behind. 'It's a little wet, ma'am,' he added, politely touching his hat as he opened the door; 'I'll get an umbrella from the house.'

'No, no, never mind,' said Miss Primrose. 'I wish you would stand to one side, and not in the way so.'

'Thank you, James,' said Jemima, as he handed her out. 'Do you know whether Sir John is within?'

'He is, I believe,' replied the footman. 'We drove him home from Mr. Smith's half-an-hour before we went for you.'

The house at which the carriage had stopped was that of Sir John Primrose, in Russell-square. Sir John Primrose was the senior partner of the firm of Primrose, Smith, & Co. Mark-lane. Miss Primrose and Jemima were his two daughters. The physical features of these young ladies may have been partially gathered from the dialogue which has just been recorded. To complete the picture, Miss Primrose—so far as external manifestations could furnish a clue to penetrate the obscurity which usually veils the period of a lady's birth, might have been about thirty-five years of age. She was rather tall and slight, though by no means graceful. Her complexion, as she herself had remarked, was somewhat sallow—the effect produced by the absence of colour being certainly not ameliorated by a ruddy spot which graced the extreme tip of her nose. Jemima might have been about two-and-twenty. She was shorter than her sister, but very neatly formed; and though not what could have been called decidedly pretty, there was a vivacity in her eye, and good nature in her mouth, which might have redeemed the plainest face; and although, on the present occasion, the light in the hall, as she entered the house, revealed an expression scarcely inviting, it was plainly but a passing cloud.

The young ladies went up stairs to the drawing-room—Miss Primrose with the purpose of lodging her complaint at head-quarters. Sir John sat before the fire, reading a West Indian newspaper; Lady Primrose lounged upon a couch reading a novel. Sir John was a little man, with a blue cravat in a great many folds rolled round his neck, a glass in his eye, and the side of his face screwed up around it; Lady Primrose was a portly dame, with rabbit teeth, white silvery hair, and rather a flushed appearance.

'Hallo, girls!' exclaimed Sir John, without raising his eyes from his newspaper, 'you've come home early, surely!'

'Oh yes, papa,' said Jemima.

'Who had you there, Jenny?' said Sir John.

'Oh! only a few old maids,' replied Miss Primrose, 'who did nothing but talk about the Continent—Cologne, and Mayence, and the Rhine, and all that stuff.'

'I suppose, Jenny, you don't reckon yourself in the category just specified?' said Sir John. 'It's time you did, if you don't. You aren't quite so young, Jenny, you know, as you were twenty years ago.'

'Sir John! is that a way in which to address your child?' exclaimed Lady Primrose. 'It is like—it is like—'

'Your husband, you would say, my dear. Polly, my dear, I speak for Jane's benefit. I don't wish to see her making a fool of herself, as she does. To hear her talking about old maids!'

'And whose fault is it that she is—that she is—what you say?' exclaimed Lady Primrose. 'Was it not you who interfered between her and Sir William Barton's son?'

'The drunken son of a drunken father,' said Sir John. 'His father was a baronet and a squire, no doubt; and his mother was an earl's daughter, no doubt; but then, my dear, I don't care the section of a tallow candle, a dozen to the pound, for the whole of the aristocracy strung in a bunch. The fellow didn't care a fig for her; and, indeed, Jenny (begging your pardon), I don't wonder at it. He didn't care a rush for her, not a pin-point. He wanted the few thousands—no matter how much more or less—which he believed he would get along with Jenny, and the few thousands more which were likely to be going when Jenny's father died. Now, Polly, I'll put it to you whether she isn't better here, in her father's house, with nothing to do but to amuse herself in any sort of way she pleases—from nursing a doll, if she likes, to running off to Gretna Green? And really, Jenny, if I thought you would be happy after it, I don't think I would be very angry even if you did do that. But is she not better, I say, than she would have been in that world's-end place in Dorsetshire, with half-a-dozen children—(say half-a-dozen; for the Primroses, you know, Polly! are rather a prolific family)—say half-a-dozen squalling children, and a drunken beast of a husband pitching brandy bottles at her head?'

'Sir John Primrose!' cried Lady Primrose, extending her arm dramatically, 'Do you see your child? Do you see her, as she weeps for him who won her young affections—for him to whom she blushing resigned the warm outpourings of her young heart; but who was separated by the cruelty of a base-hearted parent?'

'Bravo, Polly!' said Sir John; 'you'll be Poet Laureate yet, I don't doubt. Give us another yard of the same, and see that it's up to the sample. How many lines go to the yard? and what's the price per yard? Come now, Jenny! don't be silly. I'm sorry I said anything; but I'm sure it's not worth making a fuss about. If you mean to keep it up, you had better go to your own room. It isn't quite the most agreeable music in the world.'

Miss Primrose left the room.

'Poor child!' said Lady Primrose; 'she is so sensitive!'

'Fudge!' said Sir John. 'And, by the way, Polly, the child is getting rather big to be called so now. She has had long frocks for a good while now, you know, my dear. Well, Jemmy, come here and tell me whom all you saw at Mrs. Walton's.'

'Oh, nearly the same old set,' said Jemima. 'But,' she added, 'there was a very nice—a-a-very nice young gentleman there—a foreigner—Chevalier du Rayon. Mrs. Walton got acquainted with him through the Radfords—quite lately it was.'

'A foreigner!—very nice!—Um! Don't have anything to do with him, Jemmy. Chevalier sounds very grand; no doubt—bon pe wa parlez-vous foosh! Perhaps no more a foreigner than I am.'

'Yes,' exclaimed Lady Primrose, 'yes; here again, when your daughter may have an opportunity of—of bettering her condition in life, and making an advantageous settlement, you will come and put in your oar, and spoil all by your uncalled-for and unwarrantable interference.'

'Shove in your oar!' repeated Sir John, musingly. 'Um!—classic, no doubt. But, Polly, my dear, don't be quite so precipitate. The Chevalier has not yet, and possibly never may, manifest any of the intentions which you seem inclined to attribute to him. Chevalier! probably some clerk in a Bordeaux brandy-house.'

'Sir John,' said Lady Primrose, 'is that a way in which to speak of any gentleman, and a friend of your children? Why do you always allude to such things—such low things?'

'Low! did you say, my dear?' said Sir John. 'Do you allude to the clerk in the brandy-house? And what was I, at one time, but three degrees below that? And what are you but my wife, and the daughter of your father, my dear—your father, the —Um! Shall I specify your father's profession, my dear?'

'Sir!' cried Lady Primrose, 'I am astonished at you! Before my child! I am—Jemima! Jemima!—I'm—I'm—Water, Jemima! Wa—wa—ter! Oh!'

Jemima ran to her mother's assistance. Sir John, however, continued to peruse his newspaper, humming, the while, a bar of a popular air. But as Lady Primrose began to give utterance to the premonitory notes of a fit of hysterics, he rose, and carefully folding his paper, put it into his pocket, and marched out of the room.

The door had scarcely closed behind him, when Lady Primrose sat up, looked round, and dried her eyes. 'Was there ever such a man!—But, Jemima, what of the foreign gentleman?'

'Oh, mamma, he is so nice,' said Jemima. 'We asked him to call. I do not think he would think it strange. He met cousin Harry lately in Paris, and I thought you might like to hear about him; so he said he would be most happy. I think he will be to-morrow; for he said he was going down to Wiltshire the day after.'

'My dear,' said Lady Primrose, after a pause, 'you must do your best to make yourself agreeable. You know it would be very satisfactory to us all if anything did come of it! If it were not for your father;—but he is so low, and makes himself so disagreeable. We must try, my dear, and keep him in good humour.'

Sir John here stalked into the room again, and planted himself before the fire. 'Oh! ah! Well, you've got over it? Good for the spirits to let off the steam now and then. Now, now, Polly, don't begin again—there's a dear.'

'Sir John Primrose! you are, without exception—no, Jemima, I will speak—you are, without exception, the lowest, most disagreeable—most disagreeable man that crawls on the face of the earth!' No, you need not leave the room; I will go—I will—I will. Come, Jemima. O Jemima! Jemima! I—I—I—O-o-oh!'

CHAPTER II.

Next day, the Misses Primrose were most particular in their toilets. The little rupture of the previous evening had been forgotten. Miss Primrose had abandoned her intention of quitting the paternal roof; and Jemima, far from retaining any vindictive feelings, had given an unbiassed opinion regarding the relative advantages of orange and black in the matter of the shawl which Miss Primrose wished to throw over her shoulders, on account of the interesting cold which she discovered she had caught on the previous evening,—it being decided in favour of the black, that colour being considered the more suitable to Miss Primrose's complexion.

All the forenoon they sat impatiently in the drawing-room, in expectation of the Chevalier's promised call; Jemima knitting; Miss Primrose employed in developing the tail of a worsted representation of a somewhat rare species of the parouquet, exhibited eating berries from the hand of a dirty-looking savage, clad in the style of the Apollo Belvidere; Lady Primrose at her customary occupation, novel reading—the work on the present occasion being 'The Masked Marriage, or the Convict's Bride.' Every few minutes, Miss Primrose rose to look out at the window—now, it was to see if the day was likely to continue fine; now, it was to see if there was no indication of the approach of that dilatory milliner's girl, who was to have brought that wreath which she was to wear on Friday evening.

At length a loud ring resounded through the house. Shortly afterwards the footman ushered in Chevalier du Rayon. The Chevalier was a young man of twenty-six or twenty-seven, not much above the middle size, but rather handsome. Yes, on a second look—the lines of his figure—yes, he was very handsome. He had brown hair, and a small light beard. He wore white trousers, a short blue coat, and a pair of gilt spurs.

He bowed graciously as he entered the room, and shook hands most cordially with the two young ladies, who simpered in a most fascinating manner, and presented him to mamma.

'Je am very much happy of to make your acquaintance, madame,' said the Chevalier, with another bow; 'it is ze greatest pleasure I have experienced for one—one very much long time. It is indeed, let me to assure you, the greatest happiness I can know. Je am proud to know ze paternal—I should say ze maternal of your lovely two daughters; and you, madame, have reason to be proud of them.'

Lady Primrose bowed, and the Chevalier continued. 'Je was very happy to meet them at Madame Walton's last evening—Madame Walton is one very fine lady. I hope you continue to keep good health.'

'Oh yes, thank you; I am very well,' said Lady Primrose.

'It gives me great felicity,' said the Chevalier. 'Je am delighted to hear that ze parent stem of my lovely two primroses enjoys good health.'

'You are very kind,' said Lady Primrose.

'Kind! my dear madame,' said the Chevalier, with a most bewitching smile; 'I cannot express half ze feelings of regard which I have. I see, added the Chevalier again, that there is the strong family resemblance between yourself and them, Madame Primrose, especially more to Miss Jemima. She is very much like to yourself, madame, particularly in ze couleur de rose of ze cheek.'

'Do you think so?' said Lady Primrose, with a look of complacency. 'If you proceed in that strain, monsieur, I shall become quite vain. Jene's complexion has been very much admired.'

'And ze man who would not admire it,' said the Chevalier, 'would have ze small taste.'

'Really, monsieur, said Lady Primrose, if you continue to lavish your compliments so, I shall begin to get angry.' Lady Primrose, however, did not look at all angry.

'Forgive me, my dear madame,' said the Chevalier, in a penitential tone; 'I will endeavour to restrain ze feelings. But you will allow me just to repeat ze great pleasure I feel in making ze acquaintance of ze pride of Angleterre—the rulers of ze world—ze British matron.'

'Dear me, monsieur, this is worse than ever,' said Lady Primrose. 'How do you possibly make out that I, as a British matron, as you are pleased to call me, am one of the rulers of the world?'

'Why, my dear madame,' rejoined the Chevalier, 'it is plain—plain, to use a familiar representation—as ze nose on your countenance. At least, my dear madame, I beg pardon. I do not for one moment mean to hint that ze nose of you is plain—that is, plain looking—it is one most beautiful instance of ze ancient Roman; but ze thing is plain. The Englishman rule ze world; then the women rule ze men, as who does not know? then the Englishwoman rule ze Englishmen; ergo, ze Englishwoman, or ze British matron, as I remark, rule ze world. Zat is logic, my dear madame. But, my dear Mademoiselle Primrose, you do not speak. I hope you have not ze worse of your last evening's dissipation—what you call him?—entertainment?'

'Oh, thank you—no, not much,' replied Miss Primrose. 'I caught a little cold; but,' she added, faintly, 'I can scarcely say that I am ever well.'

'The heart,' said Lady Primrose—'the heart seldom recovers when once it has been blighted.'

The Chevalier placed his right hand on his left side; and, as if to indicate that he had experienced the truth of Lady Primrose's assertion, heaved a deep sigh.

'It is one very bad illness, ze affection of the heart,' he said; 'yes; it is one very painful affection. But, my dear mademoiselle, you may be assured zat you have the sympathy of me—ze sympathy of this my bosom. My dear mademoiselle, I can pity you from ze very bottom of mon heart.'

'And pity, you know, Chevalier, is said to be akin to love,' said Lady Primrose. 'He, he!'

'Bon—good—very good,' said the Chevalier. 'Ha, ha! It is one true—one very much true statement: pity is ze parent—ze mother of love. But mademoiselle have no need of the pity to be ze mother of love to her; she have attractions sufficient enough in her own person to be ze mother of love to herself. Few—most few gentleman could view ze beauty and sweetness of Miss Primrose, especially more as he is displayed in ze present—ze present—what you call him?—ze present tense, in ze bosom of ze family. Few could behold her without to entertain warmest emotions. No, I say, he could not see her without exclaiming, as it is only with ze difficulty zat I can refrain myself from exclaiming, in ze words of ze poet, 'My heart is thine! Wilt thou be mine?'

'A quotation, monsieur?' said Jemima. 'May I ask whom it is from?'

'Oh! it is one small translation of mine own from one of our poets. Je am ze great admirer of ze poets, most particular of your English poets. Ze beam in your eye, my dear mademoiselle, Miss Primrose, tells me zat you share ze feeling.'

'Oh yes,' said Miss Primrose; 'I admire Milton particularly. How beautiful his description of our first parents in the Garden of Eden!'

'Beautiful—beautiful—most beau-ti-ful! I read him when I was study your language in ze academie in Paris. The scenes in ze Garden are enough to make every gentleman—what you call him?—single bachelor, who is a man of feeling, to relinquish his wretchedness, and marry one wife. I know it had ze influence on me—at least, no—I do not mean as to ze marrying, but as to ze feeling—ze feeling, madame, that I would like to—to be—to do so!'

'And you have come—he, he, he!—you have come,' said Lady Primrose, 'to this country to do so?'

'How you know that, madame?' inquired the Chevalier, with a look of unmitigated astonishment. 'You are one prophet—one divineresse! You read ze mind as I read ze book. Well, madame, you know it now; and it is no use to me to deny it. I had heard so much of the great beauty of ze daughters of Angleterre, zat I thought it would be just ze place to go for me.'

'And you were disappointed, I daresay,' said Lady Primrose. 'People generally are with celebrated beauties. I suppose you found it in the general as it is in individual cases?'

'Disappointed! My dear madame,' exclaimed the Chevalier, 'they far exceeded my greatest expectation—far out-soared ze remotest flight of my imagination! To use ze words of one old heathen, whom we study in ze academie, Veni, vidi, vici—I have come, I have seen—I have not yet conquered, madame; but I will try, madame—I will try.'

'And I trust, monsieur, that you will be successful,' said Lady Primrose.

'Ten mille thanks, my dear madam, for ze words,' said the Chevalier; 'they will serve me to ze combat. I feel as if I do not care if all ze Englishmen were rivals to me. I feel ze valour of ze great Pepin le Bref. I will take ze heart in my hand. I will rush to ze combat, shouting ze watchword—Death or Victorie!'

'Really, monsieur, you are quite Quixotic,' said Jemima. 'Such valour at least deserves success.'

'Yes, mademoiselle; and I flatter myself that I shall be successful; at every event, ze courage I feel will go much to make me so. What is it that you think, Miss Mademoiselle Primrose? Zat is one most beautiful piece of workmanship you employ yourself upon. It is one most beautiful bird. What you call ze little gentleman in ze foreground?'

'I do not know,' said Miss Primrose, languidly. 'Probably one of the natives where the birds are found.'

'Mademoiselle is very industrious,' said the Chevalier.

'Far too much so, monsieur,' said Lady Primrose. 'I often tell her she injures her health by working so hard.'

'You ought not to do so,' said the Chevalier. 'Forgive me, my dear mademoiselle; but it is one sin in you to do so. Health is ze most valuable commodity in ze universe—without it, a man may have ze world and yet be miserable; with it, no man should repine, however great his misfortune, for he have still left one of ze greatest good of all. Is it not, at least, one much more important thing than any bird, however beautiful? than any native gentleman, however singulier? But you, my dear Mademoiselle Jemima, I am most glad to witness zat you do not injure your health. You are looking as rosy as ever—you are ze sweet little rose of Angleterre!

'O monsieur!' said Jemima, blushing slightly. 'Really you do me an honour I am far from deserving.'

'Or perhaps he is a prejudiced judge!' said Lady Primrose. 'He, he, he!'

'It is just possible that I may be,' rejoined the Chevalier; 'ze brightness of Mademoiselle Jemima is sufficient enough to dazzle ze eyes of any gentleman who comes within ze influence of her beams. She is like ze sun—it is too much for the eye of any gentleman to look upon.'

'And I fear, monsieur,' said Jemima, 'that that is rather too much for the sun to credit.'

'Not one bit—not one portion of an atom,' said the Chevalier. 'I cannot express half ze feelings of admiration which I feel. It is a very pretty weather,' he added, after a pause.

'Yes, it is indeed,' said Lady Primrose. 'How do you like the climate of this country?'

'Bon—very much—good. I admire it to adoration—it is so mild, and not too great heat. I do not think I will like ze climate of la belle France so well again.'

'Oh, I think the climate of France is delightful; though the English summer is said to surpass any other. Do you purpose remaining long in England?'

'One—two weeks will be the extreme of my stay,' replied the Chevalier. 'I have already stayed longer than I have originally intended.'

'Then, I fear,' said Lady Primrose, 'you will not be able to accomplish at least one of the objects of your tour. He, he, he, he!'

'How you mean, madame? Oh, you—ha, ha!—you mean ze—ah! But no, madame, I do not lose sight of him; but, you know, one man will do so much of ze—what you call him?—of ze love in one week, as ze other will do in one—two year. I am one of ze week ones. I will, in three days, overthrow all ze ramparts, and, rushing in, I will demand ze reward in ze permission to lead her to ze altar. I will, however, take one week to look round. It is short time enough; but I can take no more; for, as I was remark, private affair, with regard to my estate on ze frontier, will in two weeks call me to Paris.'

'Oh, by-the-way,' said Lady Primrose, after another pause in the conversation, 'Jemima was saying that you met a young friend of mine, Harry Seaman, in Paris.'

'Oh yes, madame, I had ze happiness of to meet him. He is one very fine young man; and I was very much gratify to learn, in my conversation with mademoiselle last evening, that you were ze aunt to him. Indeed, now zat it comes to my recollection, I heard him to speak of you in terms of ze greatest honour. I am pained to say, however, that I did not altogether make ze effort to cultivate ze acquaintance of him zat I would have done, if I had known that I was as soon to meet with ze friends of his, whom I trust will allow of me to call them my friends.'

'I hope Harry was not in the way of falling into evil company,' said Lady Primrose. 'Harry was always gayer than I would have wished.'

'Oh no, my dear madame,' replied the Chevalier; 'he was quiet as one priest, whose wife—I intend to say, whose mother—was dead.'

'I am very glad to hear it. Young men like Harry, left at an early age with a considerable fortune, are apt, sometimes, to spend it in ways they should not.'

'Yes, that was ze way of me,' said the Chevalier; 'but I saw zat it would not do, and I am now so quiet as anything. I sold off all ze horses, except one little one, and one mule; and I do not care what ze people say—though, to be sure, there is but few people on ze estate; it is being away on ze frontier, where I have one pretty little chateau. But I would not care if there was people, for people will talk whatever you do; but I would ride on my little mule any day in front of ze Tuileries.'

'I admire your independence, monsieur,' said Lady Primrose; 'but, talking of horses, Jemima usually goes out for a ride before dinner—I suppose you would have no objections to accompany her?'

'O mamma! I did not intend going to-day,' said Jemima. 'It looks as if it were going to rain; and I am sure it would be no pleasure to Monsieur du Rayon.'

'Pleasure, ma chère!' exclaimed the Chevalier—'the greatest pleasure in ze whole of my life. I will be transported, my dear mademoiselle, to accompany you.'

'I will go, mamma, if Jemima does not care about it,' said Miss Primrose.

'No, my dear; Jemima shall go.'

Lady Primrose rose, rang the bell, and ordered the horses.

'I shall go too,' said Miss Primrose.

'No, my dear; you will stay. You know we have those things to get ready for the bazaar. Jemima, my dear, prepare yourself.'

In obedience to mamma, Jemima rose—Miss Primrose casting a look of import after her retreating figure. She, however, said nothing; but applied herself to her work with such vigour that a full eighth of a square inch of the parrot was speedily developed.

For some time, the conversation languished. The Chevalier had hazarded several remarks—for his command of ideas and power of associating them were above mediocrity; but the ladies not seeming inclined to follow them up, he had relapsed into silence.

Soon, however, Jemima returned, arrayed in riding costume. The footman announcing that the horses were in waiting, the Chevalier rose, and bade Lady Primrose and Miss Jane a courteous adieu; having, after a careful reference to his note-book to ascertain any engagements he might previously have made, accepted an invitation to remain to dinner on his return.

BIRTH-DAYS AND OTHER DAYS.

I WAS visiting the other day at the house of a kind lady—who sometimes takes compassion on a poor motherless young man, and entertains him with choice music and friendly talk—when her two little girls came into the room. The fair young creatures were presently at my side—the younger beginning to prattle away at a fine rate, but withal so musically, that I thought no bird in the spring sunshine could pipe it better. All the time, however, her elder sister was content to stand quietly beside my chair, in a demure, nunlike attitude—the very expression of the contrast between her disposition and that of her companion. I could not help being struck with the difference—the one so full of vivacity, the other so grave; the one frolicsome as a kitten, the other graceful and stately as a swan; the youngest the light air and allegro of life, the other an elegant pathetic andante, which soothes and allays the trouble of the heart, and discloses, in its placid harmonies, some touches of a heavenly counterpoint. On this occasion, the difference between the two, which I had already noticed, was further exemplified. While I was endeavouring to amuse them with one of those old wise-foolish stories which somehow cling to my memory, little Mischief took an opportunity to steal my pocket-handkerchief, and pin my coat lappets to the ottoman on which I was sitting. But La Penserosa, whose hand I had taken, fixed her eyes on my face all the time I was talking; and, when I arrived at the grand conclusion—the drop-scene and final blue-fire of the matter—so gently and innocently returned the involuntary pressure I had given to her hand, that a sudden thrill of affection shot into my heart, and waked up there a prayer for her happiness, and a hope that I might always be near to protect her innocence.

'Why, my dear,' cried I, 'how fine you look! What means this fresh clean muslin frock, of extra starch and smartness, this broad, blue gala ribbon, this coral necklace and bright snooded hair?'

'It is my birth-day,' she replied softly. 'I am ten to-day.' And the little maid, walking to the table in all the consciousness of her added dignity, brought me her birth-day presents—books, a needle-case, an embroidered pen-wiper, and a work-box. She went on to tell me how that morning she had lain awake in bed, thinking of what presents she should like to be made her; and how, at breakfast-time, mamma and papa, big brother, and little Mischief, seemed as if they had divined her wishes, and had resolved to gratify them. Moreover, she was going that afternoon to have a party of her young friends, and nurse was coming to make the tea. Nor would it surprise her if she sat up till ten o'clock, for mamma said she was growing a great girl now, and must learn to keep her eyes open at night like older people. And in this manner the fair creature entertained me, and with more of such sweet childish talk—the pure expression of a heart full of hope and innocence—amused me during my visit, and sent me away with thoughts both sad and pleasant.

Birth-days! joyful yet mysterious eras in our young lives, when we wake up to a new feeling of this world and our position in it; when, as we cut this new notch upon the staff of Time, a vague sense of the strangeness of our mortal being—a vague wish to know why we are here, and whence we came—mingled with an added respect for ourselves, and our joy at having risen a step in the ranks of men! Across the sensations of those days the cross lights of Past and Future fell in blended rays. For youth was Janus-faced; and, while he gave a backward look upon his childish hours, sent more eager glances into the coming years of manhood. Then the butterfly stirred in the chrysalis, too often, alas! imagining a splendour lay hidden in its narrow sheath—a fragrant flower-like career was folded in the golden gauze of its wings; but never dreaming of the cold, dark days, the wintry rains, the parching frore and frost which, if they kill not, rub away the sparkling wing-dust, and turn the gaudy insect into gray and hum-drum moths. But, O golden lads and lasses! who would wish that ye should think so? Who does not rejoice that ye cannot? Hope never fails you; your anticipations never run short; the stream at the fountain head is fresh and vigorous; there is no dearth in the land. The life of God is young in your hearts; the June month of Time has set the emerald earth in one shining sun-ring of light; and your lives are rejoicing with the first buds of the roses, the two-part song of the cuckoo, and the green golden meadows, ankle-deep in daisies and the red flowers of the clover.

When the hot hours of summer are ended, and the great year-pulse, throbbing so full and fiercely in the dog-days, begins to beat, calmly and equably, in the milder heart of autumn; when, on still afternoons, the landscape, along its winding valleys or on its shining uplands, is dotted here and there with shocks of golden grain; when no wind stirs in the warm air, but high in heaven the great white clouds look solemnly at the setting sun, and then those frets and folds of fleecy texture, those bars and barriers of the great tower of the sky, begin to burn all hues like molten metal; at that time of the year when, according to Jewish Rabbins, the earth was created and man was made inheritor, by life and not by death, of the rich bounties, the regal affluence, of the world's first and most fruitful prime; in fact, and without any more periphrasis, in September, season of mellow fruitfulness, of misty mornings followed by shining days ending in the most glorious of sunsets, which, in their turn, are succeeded by blue golden nights—nights when moon and planets wheel nearer to the earth, and shine across the meadow lawns, or draw their stealthy rays along the ripples of tree-shaded brooks, and somehow seem to bring the mystery of the heart's sweetest, saddest, longing before the eyes—in September—and I write the word with something of a filial emotion—in September—but pardon me, O reader! this interminably long sentence, this lane that seems to have no turning, this highway of utterance, on which I have paid the toll of neither colon nor full stop. I was simply about to observe that in September I was born. Let me ask thee, have not the influences of the month wherein thou wast born stolen with thy being? I will not say inclined thee to be a very German in the matter of a long-winded, unstoppered, rabbit-run of a sentence, like the above—but as thus: Art thou not fickle as April, promiseful as May, benignant as June, hot-tempered and thunderous as July, bountiful as August, cold as January, dark as November, blustering like March? Wast thou born in December? Then, for His sake at whose birth was heard, beneath the winter-forgetful skies, that heavenly chant of 'Peace on earth, good will to man,' thou too shouldst be a man, as the Latin Vulgate hath it, bonæ voluntatis. Or has October, the rich October, the merry-visaged, nut-brown faced October, the garner-month of our annual fruitfulness, dowered thee with the generous charitable heart, the affluent sympathy and brotherly kindness, the scholar's store of ripe and useful learning? Why should these questions be deemed fanciful? Man is subject to the skyey influences. Milton's vein flowed freest in the autumn. 'Twas the birth-time of his soul. I'll hold to the notion:—No sunbeam falls, no cloud casts a shadow, no dew exhales, no drop of rain descends, but works some change, fulfils some mission. Our birth-days do verily affect us; and the photograph of our souls, which Time sets in his album of memories, records the influence of our first and fatal sunbeam.

It was fair time in our town when I was born. I came into the world to the rattle of toys, the shoutings of showmen, the roar of wild beasts, the jokes of merry Andrew, the connubial quarrels of Punch, the ringing of bells, and the sale of gingerbread. My earliest recollections of birth-day feastings somehow smell of saw-dust, lions, severed cocoa-nuts, the varnish of toy-fiddles, and the new patent of wooden trumpets. What glory was it to rise early on that Thursday morning, say at five, or the gray fabulosity of half-past four, and away to the distant market-place to see the uncarting of onions! Onions! The onions of a world drew up in rank and file and dense thick column upon that merry battle-field. All kinds were there, brown and yellow—Strasbourg, Portugal, and Deptford, red Spanish, white Spanish, and silver-skinned, in ropes, What do I say? ropes! In cables. I think I see them now, and the sturdy carters shouting and swearing as they staggered along under hamper-loads of those natural Chinese-balls. What a litter of straw, men, women, boys, horses, and onions! What a hurly-burly of efforts to stack the globular vegetables in long lines and angles all over the market-place, till one walked in a mass of onions, a labyrinth of onions, and thread a thousand new courts and alleys within the bulbous architecture! 'Twas a rare scene, not to be forgotten. Not to be forgotten, also—what then in boyish carelessness I little noticed but what must have insensibly impressed my young imagination—the fading of the last star of dawn, and the red flush in the morning sky behind that silent lofty church-spire, which so calmly and grandly looked down upon the five hundredth rehearsal of the busy scene.

Then back to my home along the as yet but half-awakened streets. How long, bald, and ghastly always appeared those rows of closed shops, tall houses, and silent manufactories! Few people were yet astir on those early autumn mornings. At times I would pass by the blue-coated policeman pacing silently along on the outer edge of the pavement—or sober-looking artizan on the way to his workshop—or, at rare intervals, some wretched, dissipated-looking being, with bloodshot eyes, sallow face, and night-crumples collar, stealing back to the home which he was disgracing. At the corners of the streets stood old men or women vending saloop, so dear to sweeps, so charmingly celebrated by Elia! I could almost fancy the sweet, half-sickly odour which escaped from the raised lids of the bright tin cans, in which the fragrant lymph lay hidden, was floating past me now. Oh dies percarissimi! oh mornings of my youthful birth-days, never shall you dawn again! Shall I, in a month's time, take the mail train and travel all night to be on the old spot as of yore? The old aurora of those days will never dance forth from those shining skies again! Shall I think of rising at five o'clock or four (hours of solemnity yet dedicate to the blanket of midnight!) to handle a string of Spanish onions and feel the eyes of memory water at their pungent reminiscences? Ah no! that page is turned; its history, once so long and vivid, fills but a leaf in the memorandum-book of the past. It makes me sigh to read that short-hand of our recollections, and to know that we have felt, loved, and endured so much, to come to this complexion at last, if not of dull indifference, yet of brief regret.

As we grow older, we insensibly treat our birth-days with ever-growing disrespect. The sun shines, the rain falls, the hours pass away, much the same as on other days. Those vague sensations of delight at having passed another mile-stone on the road of life gradually fade away. Instead of looking forward, we begin to count backward. Or we forget the number of our years in the cares and business of our lives; and as for repeating the old gratulations of our birth-days, we must first ask counsel of a wry face and a disappointed spirit. No. We have left ourselves and our hopes behind us, and probably think with some pity and scorn of both. We would not if we could restore or realise the childish fancies. Non sumus quales eramus. That door is shut and locked and the key taken away. Only by a strong effort of the imagination, following the dim guidance of memory, are we enabled to go back into that deserted room, and view again the golden dusty couches, the tables spread with empty relics of youth's feast, the shining landscapes dimly twinkling through the cobwebbed windows. But where is the chief figure? Where is the gallant guest, who lifted the bowl and trolled the song; and, as he plucked the freshest, sweetest roses, of the moment, still sighed ungratefully for the bowers and glades of some future paradise? What! is this thoughtful face, this unromantic figure, this sober eye and care-lined forehead, the modern presentment of that gallant gentleman? Where are the garlands and the graces of the past? How much has he realised of the beautiful fancies of his youth, his liberal hopes, his generous anticipations, his splendid endeavours? With what large outline and sunny colours did he paint upon the cloudy canvas of the future! Tell me, thou man of toil and moil, pale drudge of mammon—battler against the sternest foes of life's happiness, a bad education and misdirected aims—do you never wonder at the contrast between the gray neutral tints of your present lives, and the glorious colours of the days gone by? Do you not remember how, on your birth-days, you seemed to see in clearer outline, the graceful noble shapes which your future life was to assume? And so pure were the unbodied visions, that even the stuff of which they were made, lost all the grossness which now you know is so apt to cleave to it. You dreamed of wealth; but it was wealth to be enjoyed by a liberal heart, and dispensed by a liberal hand—wealth without its meanness, pomposity, and pride. You dreamed of love—a glorious flower whose aroma was chastity, whose bloom was the beauty of an eternal sunlight. You dreamed of friendship—whose concomitants were noble emulation, and, sprung from generous rivalry, unembittered renown. And now? Oh, you are happy indeed if you can eat your bread in peace, and lie down at night fearing and owing no man. You are happy, if, before you go out to your daily business, you can kiss the brows of a child, and carry with you into the world a softening recollection of its innocence. You are happy if, once or twice in half-a-dozen years, you can clasp the hand of some old and well-tried friend, and say, We two have been young together, and the past is dearer to us than the present.

Yet, if we cease to commemorate the anniversaries of our entrance into this world, we still have other birth-days—nobler birth-days—the birth-days of our soul. So, to the old martyr was assigned a day of remembrance, a sacred season of travail and birth-pangs, a natalitia when, in the throes of flame and torture, his immortal being struggled into happiness.

There is a natalitia in the life of most—a day on which our souls leaped forward into a higher, purer consciousness of life and its duties. At some mortal conjuncture of our fortunes, we, like Elijah, have gone out into the desert and heard the thunders, seen the lightning, felt the earthquake. Dreadful has been the darkness and convulsion of the heart. Yet, as these passed away, has come the still small voice, the monitor of a higher life than yet we have led, the warning instinct growing up into a conviction of an ineffably glorious destiny hidden in the capability of our souls. And if we have listened to that voice and believed that instinct, how glorious is the after recollection, how blissful that anniversary in the calendar of fate! Henceforth there has been a perceptible ascension in the progress of our minds and hearts. More surely and constantly the better has overcome the worse. With larger views and more spiritual insight have we considered the forms and meaning of life. The Eternal has been developed through the Temporal. The shadow of the Unseen has fallen upon and sanctified the Seen. Led by the hand of meditation, guided by the light of the Divine love, we have entered into the realities of things, the inner circle of truth in being and wisdom, in possessing of which this world and its appearances is but an outer ring. At times there may be melancholy, but it is the sadness of the immortal spirit pining for its home. There may be doubt, eclipse, and fall; but these are now become transitory and contrastive. For he who, on the day when the long pain and travail of his soul drew to an especial decision, drew from the agony the birth of a higher, truer existence—he who, when the air darkened, the sky lowered, the winds fell, and the whole earth was hushed in expecting adoration, heard and obeyed the voice of God—this man hath a power in himself to subject the world and its passions, and even the miseries and follies of his own conduct, to the demands of his growing, strengthening faith; to turn them into ministers of his sacred life, and from their evil educe his constant good.

Alas! there are other days—to be commemorated with an abased, remorseful spirit—of quite a different hue and texture. Hours when a shameful defeat passed upon our virtue; when our self-denial, that had endured for months, and even years, was broken down in an instant; when the flood, that had been so long and carefully dammed up, overpassed its bounds, and, with one long avalanche of opportunity, carried away the last defences of our moral strength. The day on which we told that first great lie, that, first great conscious falsehood—not the mere scum of the child's cowardice or the youth's boastfulness, but a black, malignant, hideous lie—a foul, fetid, upwelling stream of Stygian filth—an inspiration from the pit—a falsehood against which we staked our fullest inward knowledge of the truth, and threw away the stake! The day on which we wronged the trusting heart and broke the bending reed—when we laughed at the most sacred of obligations, and cast the cruellest darts of sorrow and separation at those whom love had made defenceless. Miserable days—unworthy days—when we wrought another furrow on a father's brow, and salted the already bitter tears within a mother's eyes! Saddest days, too, when it became our turn to suffer—when the darts of death, striking down the loved and desired, left their venomous rankle in our hearts. Days when, in the lifting of a dead hand and at the sight of closed eyes, comfort and hope fell, dying or despairing. Days when the earth shook beneath our feet, and the heavens above were wrapped in impenetrable gloom. Days of sickening anticipation of farther disastrous change, of miseries yet to be outdone, of hopeless outlook on the whole future of our lives. Days dark and deadly, in good sooth, when the gathered venom of fortune's spite, or our own ill conduct, dispelled its dreadful poison into our veins, and paralysed the very heart of our desire to live. Days of thankfulness; of miraculously-escaped dangers; of awful griefs just tasted and for ever left; days of sorrow which, like electric clouds, hung threatening above our heads, yet mercifully forbore to strike. Such days as we never forget. In quiet hours we think of them, and tremble. Then the past fleets back upon us, the dreadful scorpion-ring of circumstances again surrounds us with its torturing flame. Once more our hearts seem to stop, the pulses of life refuse to beat; fearfulness and trembling come upon us; we are overwhelmed by a dreadful horror. There is a passage in Thackeray's 'Virginians' which bears on this. An old married man, speaking of the agony of a forced separation, in the days of his courtship, from the woman whom he loved, records the repetition of it 'even far on into the days of his wedded life. Here is the passage, and a very beautiful one too:—

'Who is this opens the door? I see her sweet face. It was like our little Mary's when we thought she would die of the fever. There was even a smile upon her lips. She comes up and kisses me. "Good bye, dear George!" she says. Great Heaven! An old man sitting in this room, with my wife's work-box opposite, and she but five minutes away! My eyes grow so dim and full that I can't see the book before me. I am three-and-twenty years old again. I go through every stage of that agony. I once had it sitting in my own post-chaise, with my wife actually by my side. . . . My wife comes in. She has been serving out tea and tobacco to some of her pensioners. "What is it makes you look so angry, papa?" she says. "My love," I say, "it is the 18th of April." A pang of pain shoots across her face, followed by a tender smile. She has undergone the martyrdom, and, in the midst of the pang, comes a halo of forgiveness.'

I declare these random remarks have grown over mournful. Let us think of some days of not quite so dismal a complexion. The day, for instance, when we first declared our first love—when our knees knocked together, our tongue stammered, our heart^s beat so fast that darkness ran over our eyes, giddiness swam through our head, and how we got through the matter at all will never be known, for such things are pitied and unrecorded both by gods and men. Another day for instance: the day when we first put on a tail-coat, or fell into a green brook, or sat down on a wasp's nest; the day when you broke your arm, or the knees of your friend's favourite hunter; the day, madam, when you had that back tooth out, and how you did scream; the day, sir, when you came out Senior Wrangler or Wooden Spoon; the day when your bank broke, or your wife ran away; when you were horse-whipped in the market-place of your native town, or made your first public speech and a fool of yourself besides; the day or the night, which! when you first got tipsy, and was immoderately noisy and ridiculous; the next day when you came down stairs with a splitting headache, and dropped your eyes at the sight of your calm grave mother and sisters; the day when you were married; the day when you were sentenced to be hanged; the day when you got your reprieve; the day when your wife —

AFTER HARVEST.

In seed-time, when the hinds were thrang,
And days were raxin' sweet to see,
My heart was ta'en in true love's name,
And kindness kept me company;
How weel we labour'd down the day
That love the gloamin' hour might claim,
And how I slighted a' besides,
When he made mention o' my name.

When bees are sair'd wi' sippin' sweets,
The flourish hasna lang to blaw;
When frae the trees we pu' the fruit,
How soon the leaves begin to fa'!
When harvest yields great rowth o' grain,
The winter means to linger lang;
And still the keenest at the kirk
Is first to sing the wassome sang.

Oh! threesome rigs are hard to shear
For her whase heart nae hand may claim;
And lassies' gibes leave scars that bairn
When kindness downa mind her name.
Her harvest fee's no fit to meet
The debts that simmer left unpaid,
The coldest winter canna freeze
The drunlike water she maun wade.

The keenest blast that blows outby
Ne'er drives a stoon through lassie's heart,
Like what the sting o' scandal gies
When there is nane to tak' her pairt.
Spring may revive the wallan flowers,
And blighted trees again may bear;
But ahl! the heartsome spring of love
To slighted lassie comes nae mair!

[PRICE 1d.]

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

August 3, 1836.

WHEN Dr. Armstrong came, he at once suggested Mr. Locke as my fitting adviser in this affair of the Greys. Strange, I had never thought of him before; and as soon as he was named, I shrank from taking aid or counsel from him. No, no. None of these mercenary machines could answer my purpose. Would the Doctor do me an exceeding great favour? Would he go himself to 6 Holme-street, find out the family, make every needful inquiry, and bring away, if possible, some written tangible proof of the identity of the parties? And then— Here the Doctor broke in—'But, my dear Mrs. Weston, have you considered this matter with reference to yourself and those dear to you, as well as to strangers? I do not question your right to be generous; and generosity in this case may appear to you a positive duty. But the money which you hold so lightly, and seem so anxious to disburse, came to you in a perfectly legitimate and honourable fashion, and I would seriously recommend—'

'Dr. Armstrong, will you enact a friend's office? Will you do this errand for me?'

'I will.'

He is gone, and here I sit waiting his return. How unfortunate that woman did not come just one day sooner, or that George had only one day delayed his departure! Oh! what would I not give to have him beside me now, to open my whole heart to him, and talk with him but for an hour! I do not even know where a letter might find him. My aunt says, 'Katherine, do nothing decisive till your husband's return.' I am hardly prepared to promise as much. If the money is mine (as George has told me a thousand times), what should hinder me using it as I please? And surely the very best use I can make of it is to restore it to the rightful owner.

August 7.

At length there remains not the shadow of a doubt. The fact is settled beyond dispute, that the unfortunate pair residing at 6 Holme-street are the identical Stephen Grey and his wife who, through me, were deprived of the paternal inheritance.

Dr. Armstrong has done his work nobly, indefatigably, faultlessly. He has sifted the proof to the very foundation; and the certificates are now before me, both of the birth of S. Grey and of his marriage with Martha Bennet in the year 1829. Now, in so far as my recollection serves (and my memory was always rather a bright one), these facts tally exactly with what I have ever heard of this only son of Mr. Grey, of the Gröva. And (though I never chanced to hear her maiden name) as this Miss Bennet was of inferior birth, and her husband of rather idle and extravagant habits, the displeasure of the father and the poverty of the disinherited son are easily accounted for. The doctor saw the family, and conversed long with the husband and wife. He describes the former as a miserable invalid, the victim apparently of shattered health and remorseful conscience, consequent on his own reckless courses. The latter he judges to be a low-minded artful woman—fawning or bold by turns, as she deems may best suit her purposes. Yet, whatever these people may be, the incontrovertible truth remains. They are the very people by whom I have been haunted for years as possibly requiring the money which, after all, is scarcely mine. And finding that they do require it, they must have it restored to them immediately. Again, Dr. Armstrong says, 'I do not exactly see that you are bound to surrender what was fairly given to you even to another's hurt;' and Aunt Aubrey repeats, 'Katherine, you must do nothing decisive till George comes back.' What did he mean by saying that this woman was not Mr. Grey's wife? Ah! he has not taken pains to investigate the matter as we have done, or he could not have shut his eyes to the irrefragable evidence.

August 9.

Mrs. Grey has been here again, pouring into my ear the most woful tales, ending with the news of the threatened incarceration of her husband, for debts of considerable magnitude contracted long ago, when he had good reason to count on the reversion of his patrimony. I was so pained and grieved when she left me, after last night's visit, that I hardly closed my eyes in slumber, and feel much exhausted to-day in consequence. I have written to George at Milah, sooner, however, than he bade me address a letter to him there (for he cannot have yet reached that town); and when he does, days must elapse ere I can receive his answer. What can I do? Must I consult that odious Mr. Locke? I know him—a hard unfeeling man. He would not sanction my parting with sixpence. No, I will hold by Dr. Armstrong. He will understand my scruples. I will talk over the entire affair with him and my aunt. They must be convinced of the necessity of immediate reparation.

August 11.

Another visit from Mrs. Grey, with fresh tidings of calamity. I am vexed and agitated beyond endurance. After a long conference, I have fairly won over Mrs. Aubrey to my side; but the Doctor yet hesitates and halts between two opinions. What do I mean by dallying thus? Has not George said a thousand times that I am the entire mistress of that money—to do with it what, and how, and when I please? Why, then, should I not take up my independence, and act as reason and right feelings prompt? Yes. I will not consult any more, but direct what must be done.

August 14.

What a harassing time have the last few days been! Yet, now it is over, I do not in the least regret the step I have taken. Regret! I rejoice, I triumph over it. Dr. Armstrong has done my bidding from first to last, and my heart thanks him devoutly. Mr. Locke has been strictly excluded from all knowledge or participation in the business—the Doctor's own lawyer, Mr. Conyers, taking the management. The half of my legacy, that is to say £5,000, has been formally paid over to a Mr. Sidey, agent for Mr. Grey; and the other half I have promised shall be forthcoming in two months, thus giving ample time for George's return ere the close of the transaction. The interest of the whole sum, for the period it has been in my possession, I am contented to retain as my share of the estate of the deceased. So far the matter is decided; and now I shall breathe more freely, and expect to sleep soundly at nights—being no more haunted by the ghost of my involuntary injustice. Oh! how sweet is the reflection to the honest mind that, though we never can do either in measure or degree the thousandth part of what we should, we have at least sometimes tried to do the best we could! Our aspirations so far transcend our ability to compass them; we are so hedged in by custom, prejudice, and selfishness, no wonder though our life should seem a perpetual blunder to the eye of Omniscient purity. No wonder that the soul, wearied of its own imperfections, should cry out for larger capacities to cope with its lofty aims; that reason (so to speak) should anticipate revelation, with the sublime presentiment, the majestic foreshadowing of powers expanded for nobler work in higher worlds! And no wonder that, deeply stirred and unspeakably elevated by some such convictions, the poet should break out into his rapturous verse:—

'There is no death. What seems so is transition.
This life of mortal breath
Is but the suburb to that life elysian,
Whose portal we call death.'

Kate! Kate! what are you about? Have you got heroic and sentimental over a paltry self-sacrifice—the mere surrender of a little perishing gold for which you had no ostensible need? Ah! surely that virtue is at a low ebb which will pause and moralise over such trifles as these. Look up—look up at the glorious blue sky overhead, that shines alike on the evil and the good; and then down at the green sward, where the modest wild flowers are quietly drinking in the evening dews, and be thankful, Kate, and happy, and very humble withal.

August 17.

This morning came a letter from George, full of health and light spirits, and all the love of home and household which absence ever makes more tender. A letter with which I am perfectly satisfied, except the 'P. S.' which troubles me a little. It is this:—'If by any chance you should require legal advice in my absence, you will, of course, apply to Mr. Locke, and be entirely guided by his opinion.' This is a hard sentence for me either to forget or ignore. To what can he allude, save perhaps to this very matter which I have had all arranged without even his partner's knowledge of its existence! I can do nothing but wait till he hears from me at Milan, where two letters now lie for him. Dear kind George! surely he will not be angry with me? And, if he is, I shall be so forbearing, so fond, so devoted to his wishes in every other particular during all my future life, he will soon be moved to pity, and forgive me.

August 23.

Another letter from my husband to-day, which has made me very miserable. Oh! rash, rash, and blind that I was! I have been deceived, duped, pillaged by imposture and villany! That woman, whose coming originally was a plague to George, and a mystery to me, is indeed one Mrs. Grey—but not the right one—an artful, designing creature, who, having married the cousin of our Stephen Grey, and knowing all the story of my inheriting the property, first attempted to palm off a false identity upon my husband, and, on his discovering her treachery, assailed me purposely in his absence, and played off the same game, alas! too successfully. When George demanded of her where was the true Mr. Grey, she declared he was dead, and then had the effrontery to claim the estate, on the score of her husband being the next heir! The knowledge of all this wicked plotting has fairly paralysed me. Five thousand pounds gone to cheats, and the other five thousand pledged to be given to them; though now, of course, this pledge is nought, seeing the promise was founded in ignorance of the fraud. What can I do to retrieve my great error? I must summon Mr. Locke at once, ere more mischief is done. O poor weak, precipitate, unhappy Kate! that was wont to be called a good angel, how art thou fallen now!

September 5.

More disclosures, that strike me with surprise and abhorrence, Mr. Locke's scrutiny has brought to light. The wretched family (whose heavy pecuniary obligations turn out to have been a pure figment, the better to work upon my compassion) have taken the opportunity of the first instalment of £5,000 to decamp to America. No doubt they dreaded discovery by delay, while leaving that Mr. Sidey—their needy tool and confederate in wickedness—to receive the rest of the money, in the event of things going on smoothly till the specified time of payment. Mr. Locke says little, but evidently regards me as no better than a fool; and thinks, mayhap, that George has got cheaply off with the half, when he might have lost the whole £10,000, with such a simpleton of a wife. Indeed, I saw plainly that the notion of my ever abdicating my rights in favour even of the real son, he viewed as a high-flown absurdity not to be mentioned. Dr. Armstrong and my good aunt give me great consoltion. They are both equally willing to take part of the blame, if blame there be; yet assuredly none rests with them. Mr. Locke says:—'Mr. Weston proposed at one time to return home immediately, but I have told him this is quite unnecessary; so he means to continue his tour.' Perhaps it is better on the whole. But still, I bitterly bemoan my mistake, and wish, oh! how fervently, that George were here—that I might confess, and lament, and weep to him!

October 2.

George has now been away two months, and gone over a vast deal of ground. He surpassed his original intention, and went to Rome and Naples, principally by Mr. Locke's advice; and now writes me that he will certainly be at home by the middle of this month. He has never upbraided me, in any of his letters, for my part in this unfortunate business of the Greys; and I cannot think he will be very severe when we meet. But, then, his temper is so quick at any rate, I scarce know what to hope or fear.

Meanwhile, my aunt and I spend many hours daily in delightful companionship with the two sweetest children upon earth. And when I look at that noble-hearted boy playing the guardian so manfully to my lovely darling, I think if my George were safe beside us once more, and not very angry with me about the loss of that money, I would not exchange places with an empress, though she could count her gold by millions. Ah! that if again! Why must it be for ever intruding, with its sickening suggestions of doubt and discomfort? It is an ugly little word. Let me expunge it from my vocabulary henceforth.

October 17.

George arrived last night; and somehow, spite of all my endeavours to the contrary, when I heard the carriage stop at the gate, and caught the sound of his footsteps on the walk, it was with a strange medley of indefinite emotions that I ran hastily out to receive him. Was it fancy, or was there something—I am at a loss what to call it—something different in our meeting from all former occasions of his return from casual absences—something lying at our hearts, that, in spite of the kindest words of greeting, betrayed itself by a look or a tone? How subtle are the threads that compose our affections! and how rapidly the most trivial inequality in one of these threads mars the perfect beauty of the fabric! I felt as by a lightning gleam that there was a vague shadow, unspoken and unspeakable, hanging in mid air between my husband and myself, to which neither of us could or would allude at that moment. Oh! how this marred the pleasure which otherwise had been so exquisite, to behold him once again, with his handsome face bronzed somewhat by travel, and his rich brown hair clustering round his forehead in its old careless luxuriance! I knew what was in his mind—the secret dissatisfaction with myself, which would have burst forth long ago had opportunity been given, but which time and distance had softened, yet not obliterated. Shortly, the tone of his thoughts communicated itself to mine, and I was strangely happy, and at the same time strangely discomposed. The end of it was that I seized the moment that George was in close colloquy with Charlotte (enjoying her bewilderment at his presentation to her of a large doll with the customary stiff-curved flaxen hair and staring blue eyes), to dart from the room and give vent to my feelings in a flood of tears. I felt relieved after this; and was content to wait George's own time to speak of what we were both aware must come to be spoken of sooner or later.

(To be continued fortnightly.)

OUR HIRING FAIRS AND COUNTRY FOLKS.

In the course of a few weeks we shall again be in the heart and bustle of our rustic fêtes; and while they are yet at fully more than arm's distance, it may neither be ill-advised nor unprofitable to take time by the forelock and discuss their common character and tendency. Of late, hiring-fair conferences have become one of our regular institutions. Such roystering festal days have been pronounced a scandal to the age, in Babel riot and dissipation. But fair play to the jolly lads and buxom lasses of our secluded farmsteads. Their life is an altogether different one from that passed in the city or town—different in those social relationships which act so potently in forming the moral and intellectual tastes. None but the rustics themselves know the deep meaning of a fair-day; and, if they are to be amused, that entertainment must be of a congenial kind—such as their abnormal nature will heartily appreciate. It would simply be ridiculous to provide the same sort of soirée for the illiterate peasant that you would for the educated citizen. Their tastes are widely dissimilar. Excitement the former must have. A soirée musicale does not suit his uncultivated, undeveloped mind at all. Fine English he understands not, either in speech or song. Nor does any heinous fault rest with him that he has not the refinement to relish the brilliant oration and thrilling aria. He is happy enough over his own more primitive ballads and stories. They suit his 'case' exactly; and he laughs with the heartiest guffaws at the expression of their rough and tickling wit:—

'Your hearts they would beat,
And your ears they would tingle,
To hear the merry tales
Of the farmer's ingle.'

At the Falkirk Hiring Fair of May last, an attempt was made to put down the dancing, by the exhibition of Barker's panorama and a display of electric lights. But need we say that the whole affair proved a great failure? Strange that men who have travelled, seen, and learned so much, should be so pitifully ignorant of human nature! The hearts of the people, rich and poor, are, after all, composed of very much the same material; and those rustic folks, full as they are of animal spirits, can never be expected to sober down, on a fair-day, to witness the spectacular beauties of even so artistic a panorama. They see too much of such scenes first hand, and of an electricity grander than that of the platform, to be tricked into the comparative servitude of mere mimic performances. But what is really wrong in those Terpsichorean pleasures? No doubt the manhood of our lusty and rollicking country cousins might, in some other way, be better asserted. We seek not to dispute that point. Still, as the source of a gratifying excitement, dancing is the very thing wanted. Let satisfactory arrangements, therefore, be made for having such entertainments carried out decently, and with order. First-rate generalship, of course, would be requisite in the master of ceremonies—for on his tact must materially depend the success of the scheme.

Perhaps one of the strangest, not to say most irreverent, scenes ever enacted in a hiring fair, was witnessed at a late feeing market in Bathgate. It occurred when the revival spasm was at its height. Down through the hum and hubbub of the festal gathering went a band of so-called evangelists, singing 'Come to Jesus,' and 'Rest for the weary.' Conduct so unseemly and indiscreet, of course, only brought religion into ridicule. And need it be wondered at, though men aiming at so much, succeeded in doing so little? 'He that would be of service to mankind must first endeavour to resemble them.' The fair is no more the place for the sermon than the church the place for the fair. Folks so assembled are met for secular amusement. They do their best to enjoy themselves, casting everything like etiquette to the winds. And why should religion be at all introduced into such a company? What city clergyman, for instance, would think of going to any of those dance assemblies, held by the élite of the town, that he might there take the opportunity of extemporising upon the great necessity of flying at once to Christ? The preacher, we venture to say, would at once be expelled from the ball-room, and might be otherwise taught a memorable lesson of his imprudence—and very justly so. Everything in its place. Fairs are good enough institutions in their way; and what evils attend them, social reformers must just set themselves to eradicate. But let us take care to look at those 'roaring' flics with a sympathetic and healthy eyesight. Our country cousins! What hearty and jovial greetings they give and take! 'Each for the ither's weelfare kindly speers.' Most interesting, in its free and unaffected outcome of rustic love and jollity, is the gay and off-hand—or, as we should rather say, on-hand—deportment of the ruddy and heterogeneous crowd. Those stalwart lads and buxom lasses may be, possibly, too demonstrative in their affections; at least not over particular about the place where they practise their endearments. But great allowance must be made for their warm, hearty, and honest natures. And manners in the country are a shade different from those in the town. Were some of the city belles—modest Flora, for instance, who put the legs of her piano into pretty frilled trousers—present to see how their rustic cousins fare at 'harvest-homes,' how their feelings would be shocked! Rudeness to girls—to country girls!

'Tut! you know them not;

They like hard knocks, and to be won by force.'

And, beyond all question, a good deal too much is made of the festal revelry of our hiring fairs. People rollicking, ardent, and free, are not, from these dispositions, vicious. It is the general excitement of the holiday, for months so joyously looked forward to, that gets the better of them from top to toe. A fiddle, above all things, they cannot stand. Its music takes their heels, just as intoxicants take their head. And this leads us to make a passing reference to the 'feast of fat things' in which, on a fair-day, they so gustily indulge. In Falkirk, upwards of 10,000 pies are commonly consumed throughout the various refreshment-houses!—a quantity of mutton which might form a pyramid equalling, if not eclipsing, in size, the Egyptian structure built by the immortal Ch(e)ops! But thus granting the natural inclination of our country people to a sort of roaring mirth, we would just add,—Take the same number of young folks, full of health and heart, from any community, and better conduct might safely be defied. The scene presented by the home-coming of an excursion of artisans is not a whit better. Many, in both cases, conduct themselves with the most exemplary decorum; but there are always a few—and hear it, O heroes of the Genera gown! there will always be a few—who cannot use a holiday without abusing it.

Another objection urged against hiring-markets is the 'degradation' to which those in quest of 'fees' are subjected. But that is another mistake. Jock, at the feeing fair, is as good as his master. For one day, at least, he knows and acknowledges no superior. True; he is hired for his vigour of limb and strength of muscle. And why so? Just because he is engaged to work. It would not pay a farmer to 'fee' a shadow—a being so rickety that the very winds of heaven might, on some occasion, blow him to shivers. Still we grant that there is undoubtedly much connected with those rustic jubilees that might very advantageously be dispensed with. We cannot, however, as yet ask for the great and the remote. All reforms are works of time, and will not bear to be forced with locomotive push. Man, even in his best estate, is a stubborn animal.

We come now to look at the home life of the bucolic country folks. But we have little or nothing of the bothy system in the south of Scotland. The great body of our herds and ploughmen—and we refer particularly to the shires of Lanark, Linlithgow, and Stirling—have the freedom of the farmer's kitchen for their several meals, and the warm side of the 'roundabout' over the long and frosty nights of winter. And where bothies exist, they are not the 'Pandemoniums'—the dens of lust and obscenity—which we have heard others painted; neither are our farms, with a few exceptions, of such extensive character as to demand a separate building for those employed in their labour and cultivation. Yet, in the bothies of the north, there seems a crying need for some reform. The promiscuous life characteristic of the Elginshire and Banffshire hinds, cannot but be the cause of much immorality and vicious contamination. Something, therefore, must be done by way of protecting 'virtue struggling on the brink of vice;' and of guiding, safe into the harbour of true manhood and womanhood, those 'who darkling sail

Where stars, and ports, and pilots fall.'

But what of the farm-labourer's cot? As Burns said to Dugald Stewart, 'It's necessary to be a cottager to know what pure and tranquil pleasures often nestle below those lowly roofs.' Well does Macaulay make Fortune declaim, in that clever poem which he wrote shortly after his defeat at Edinburgh,—

'Of the fair brotherhood who share my grace,
I from thy natal-day pronounce thee free;
And if for some I keep a nobler place,
I keep for none a happier than for thee.'

Just look at the strong and stalwart husbandman. His easy and vigorous contour says forcibly that he is not in the habit of thinking deeply; that his occupation in life is more physical than intellectual; that he has little of his own in the world to care for, and that as regards the possessions of others, they are nothing to him. It is worth while to peep into his family cot when, on a winter's night, the group of merry youngsters, rosy and bright-eyed, each bearing the bucolic stamens of health, sit gossiping round the blazing hearth. Those 'bairns' must sing their song. Their hearts, which are full of music, must pour out the joyous merriment that is in them. Such firesides are circles of the truest happiness. Difficulties, no doubt, sometimes ruffle the placid current of their united life; but as 'the storm which shakes the boughs of the mountain pine gives strength to its roots,' so the little 'straits' which will occasionally disturb the comforts of the best regulated family, only tend to bind with a closer and firmer love-knot the hearts of the common household.

Nor could this article be in any sense complete without some reference to the intellectual character of the class of whom it treats. And here let it be noted, that the idea of an educated man or woman is now vastly different from that entertained even thirty years ago. A girl then was considered 'finished' if she could merely read and write; and a boy was thought well educated if he could but pen and calculate. Geography and grammar were held as only necessary for those who meant to take some profession. In the latter part of the last century, accounts among the rural peasantry were generally kept by means of incisions made on wood. And the blacksmith, if he had mended a spade, charged it by drawing as well as he could the figure of a spade, adding, at a short distance therefrom, six perpendicular lines, to signify sixpence. Or if he had repaired a plough, he sketched out that also in the same rude and rough style, annexing to it four curve lines, to denote four shillings. Education, however, has made great progress since those days; and even country people have of late given good evidence of a keen thirst for knowledge. From such enlightenment, shared in by young and old, superstition is gradually dying out. There are yet many who were born and bred in the very heart of witchcraft—in the midst of such notions as these:—When the dairymaid found her butter slow to rise, the local witch was thought to be at the bottom of the churn. When a horse got heated in the stable, Mole White, 'a wrinkled old hag with age grown double,' was suspected of having been on his back. Again, when a horse dropped down at the plough or in the cart, it was said he had been elfin shot. The aurora borealis, too, was thought the reflection of shoals of herrings coming round the north seas. And, connected with a certain 'witch-doctor' yet living, we heard told the following remedy which he, not so many years ago, prescribed:—A neighbour's cow having taken suddenly ill one night, he, the village 'vest,' was sent for. On his arrival, he simply ordered a rowan stick, mounted with a red string, to be tied to crummie's tail. Poor crummie, however, died in spite of all the enchantment. But such silly 'freets' are soon to be nowhere even in the most outlandish of rural districts. Intelligence is speedily doing its work, especially among the young, and those who, in boyhood or girlhood, have been favoured with the ordinary school-branches of education. Thus, with the many the pursuit of improvement has become the pursuit of pleasure.

ROBERT GILLESPIE.

OUR FIRE-SIDE PHILOSOPHER AT THE COAST.

WITH a rustle of rose trees and a flutter of fuchsia branches, you awake to a glare of light hitting on the green diamonds of your bed-room wall-paper, and to the long inarticulate moanings of the waves upon the distant shore. You draw aside the window-blind, peep out upon a fine semi-circular sweep of blue, bounded by a yellow breadth of sand—on which sit various picturesque groups of young ladies, laboriously sketching the opposite coast, with its lighthouse and undulations of pine; upon the long wooden pier striking out into the water, covered, at its extremity, with piles of herring-boxes awaiting shipment; and on the distant line of pale-blue hills, dreamily lying half-hid in the misty glare of the sun. You withdraw behind the window-blind, lazily get up the minutiae of a watering-place toilet (which is always unsatisfactory to a degree), and, the breakfast-bell giving due and welcome warning, you saunter into the room—where the young ladies are brilliant in summer cottons, Paterfamilias smothered in the Mining Journal, and the 'house-mother' diligently attending the digestive requirements of Charlie the Celt, with round head and eye of much impudent fun; of Harry the Saxon, with handsome shoulders and fair and honest face; of Jamie the philosopher, quiet and backward; and of Alick, who has arrived at that age which looks down with compassionate pity on the juvenility of younger brothers. After breakfast, you pass out into the garden; and, in an atmosphere of rose-perfume, and to the breezy motion of innumerable leaves, you dawdle the day over, until dinner arrives—until evening arrives—then night, and supper.

Now, I call that enjoyment. It is possible that by so doing I may hold myself up to the ridicule of certain quicksilver-blooded young persons; but I repeat it, and say that this method of spending one's time at the coast is that which, out of a given quantity of time, yields you the largest quantity of pleasure. Why should I buckle upon my back an unwieldy tin instrument, and, with this horrible engine of torture momentarily bumping my shoulder-blades, proceed to climb this or the other nameless mountain in search of certain insignificant weeds which one is inevitably doomed never to find? Why should I depart at daybreak, in the guise of an amateur Macadamiser; and thus, having made myself a spectacle for gods and men, tramp through disagreeable country-villages, to seek some dilapidated sandstone quarry, there to gather more ridiculously ugly objects than a child, with a penny box of colours, would delineate on the lid of a hand-box? Look you, good people! if this were the prospective pleasure I should meet with at the sea-side, infinitely should I prefer my own quiet dwelling in — square, where, seated at an open window, with a tumbler of Bass on the sill, and a pipe of oriental length between my finger and thumb, I should dream away the afternoon in looking at the bushes in middle of the square; and the winds and the wild waves should roar and spend their fury unheeded by me.

True, there are moments in life when we pause to measure the progress we have made, when we look back to the early landmarks of life, and count what we have acquired on the journey. Do I fear these moments? No. It may be this man's pleasure to collect an herbarium of carefully-ticketed weeds; it may be that man's delight to possess a store of geological treasures; it may be the other man's prevailing passion to have his rooms decorated with gaudy water-colour drawings done by his own hand. Well; these are good enough in their way, I admit. At the least they demonstrate that their various possessors have not been idle. And for me?—well, if you will have results, I may, for instance, point to my whiskers, which are the longest and silkiest in our club, and have become so only by the most strict and long-continued attention to dietary regulations. You ask after mental treasures acquired during these bygone years? Certainly, in physical science I have done nothing; but a habit of observation—of that kind of observation which draws out a mental catalogue of the dress, manners, and attitude of every man you meet—is surely something. 'The proper study of mankind is man.' So said one who ought to have known; though he himself was not, I grieve to say, the most brilliant specimen of the human race. The peculiar fascination of this study is, that it involves absolutely no labour, that your subjects are constantly before you, and that the instruction to be gained by it is almost surpassed by the amusement which it affords. I don't care about collecting specimens of natural history—that's the fact. I am junior partner in the firm of Brown, Keeley, Keeley, & Brown; and have not time for that sort of thing. And if I do sometimes envy the sun-burned faces, rough hands, and boisterous mirth of those lunatics who dash over the country in bands, returning home in the evening—but no; come hither unto me, thou voluminous panoply of self-content! until, armed and bound and swathed in thee more securely than ever Egyptian mummy was bandaged, I shall stretch my legs upon this garden-plot, and fill my pipe, and be happy.

Thus it is that on this cold gray morning, as I stand by the margin of this cold gray sea, I do hold myself a sacrifice on the altar of friendship. Alas! that I cannot say a 'smoking' sacrifice, for my tobacco-pouch is left at home, and there are no human beings visible but an ancient fisherman smelling of deep sea lines and mussels, and Paterfamilias, who only snuffs! It is but three o'clock—the sea lies motionless in a soft white vapour—the distant hills stand gloomily, wrapped in their night-vesture of purple; there is not a breath of wind to stir the drooping lime-trees of the village, that hang moodily and silently over the dew-damp hedges. But yonder, on the far gray surface of the water, are various specks of boats congregated together—filled, I dare say, with mites of human beings, and industriously engaged in procuring the miserable wherewithal to satisfy the claims of their own hunger, and to help to pay the rent of their houses. They, at least, have an excuse for being out at this untimely hour; but I—why should I be dragged from pleasant slumber to stand deserted and shivering on the margin of this gray sea? This is a pleasure party, forsooth! We are to go fishing this morning, and we are expected to feel happy, to declare that it is 'jolly,' and to think we are the luckiest people on the earth! I lay myself down in the stern of the boat, as Alick, and Charlie, and Harry, and Jamie seize the oars—and resign myself to my fate.

We arrive at our destination. With a plunge and a rush the anchor is dropped. The lines are supplied with large white fly-hooks (surely the fish who inhabit those waters must be insane to approach such instruments!) and now are we expected to saw the air at full arm-stretch, in the vain hope that some of those insane creatures will be sufficiently idiotic to attach themselves to the bits of bent iron. But suddenly we are saluted with a broadside of half-muttered oaths, and find we have drifted into the very centre of the orthodox fishermen, who naturally and energetically resent this encroachment on their lawful preserves. Our anchor has slipped; it has to be drawn up again, cast elsewhere, and twenty minutes have passed ere this is properly done. Pleasure!

We are settled at last. Let him who would weary his body and agitate his mind to catch a few oily herrings, which you could buy for a few pence on shore, do it! That shall not I. I shall dream the cold hours away, until the piscatorial frenzy has safely and surely departed from the mind of Paterfamilias.

What a beautiful morning! For awhile a silent battle was being waged between the gray above and the gray beneath, until a strange flutter of pink began to rise behind the purple mountains, widening and growing and gaining in strength—until the triumph of the morning is full and complete. Now uprises the golden-red rim of the sun over the violet mist—a lane of gold is opened on the sea, and all the ripples laugh in yellow light, with angular strokes of bright lilac for shadows; and as a bar of purple cloud lies before the sun, it dilates into purest crimson, and then the ripples become a brilliant rose-pink, and all the sea is a living mass of innumerable colours, lapping against each other, and blending into each other, and struggling for very supremacy of richness.

Flop goes a fish into the bottom of the boat, and Alick's face is radiant with triumph. . . . It is so cold! though the sun grows and brightens on the white line of houses that run along the shore, and smites upon a window here and there, that returns a red ray of glory from the soft green background of the hills. . . . Three at once! Well done, Harry, my boy! But please don't shout so loudly.

How wearily the hours pass! Every minute the colours grow richer or more faint along the sea-barrier of mountains. The pale-blue smoke is up-curling from the cottages—grateful intimation that the hour of breakfast is nigh at hand. In imagination I see the white coverlet spread—the bright china, and crystal, and spoons, and plates, in methodical neatness and brilliancy. Oh that this vile boat were labouring under a very load of herrings, or any other spawn of the sea, that so we might return unto the dwellings of men! How many hours have passed, Harry! We came out at three; now it is half-past seven. Paterfamilias! as you hope for a good appetite—as you hope never again to suffer the pangs of toothache, let us return. See how the sun lies softly on the bay—how the fuchsias and roses are glowing with colour by the porch—how even the babies are getting out for their morning airing, attended by Susan, and Jane, and Polly! I rise from my recumbent position, and find that the other boats have vanished like as many spectres. To your oars, then, boys! and if ever again you find me awake at three in the morning to go out on such another errand, I shall—I shall forfeit my after-dinner snooze for a month, and forswear eau-de-cologne! WATER—ITS ELEMENTS AND PROPERTIES.

'What though in other worlds the God be known,
'Tis ours to trace Him only in our own.'

ALTHOUGH we have said that water consists only of two aeriform or gaseous elements, we do not mean to assert that water, as found in nature, contains no other ingredients. Being a powerful solvent, and possessing a wide range of affinity, it is always impregnated, more or less, with extraneous matter, or with ingredients which are not its normal constituents, but are suspended in it mechanically, and exist in it as impurities.

For example, in rain water we have carbonic acid and ammonia, which the rain has absorbed from the atmosphere during its descent to the earth; where, facilitated by the carbonic acid which it carries in solution, it dissolves the lime, magnesia, oxides of iron, the silica or sand, and various phosphates, carbonates, sulphates, and nitrates, contained in the soil—rendering those fertilising substances capable of entering the minute capillary vessels of plants which they are intended to nourish; and, after trickling and filtering through the porous earth, it is collected in the rill and the river, still containing minute traces of these ingredients.

Again, spring water contains chloride of sodium or common salt, magnesia, and carbonate of lime—the latter substance causing the hardness of water. Some springs contain as much as 150 grains solid carbonate of lime per gallon.

Then there are waters highly charged with a gas called sulphuretted hydrogen. These are termed medicinal waters, from the fact of their exerting a favourable influence over various diseases. They have a most offensive taste and smell—indeed, that of rotten eggs, which yield the gas. A silver coin immersed in the water for a short time becomes blackened, in consequence of the sulphur having a greater affinity for the silver than the hydrogen. The black film, therefore, on the coin is sulphur and silver in combination; while the hydrogen, having lost its friend, and finding no other to incorporate with, makes its escape in an elementary condition. Sulphuretted hydrogen, if inhaled in an isolated state, is highly poisonous. The late Dr. Gregory of Edinburgh says that it has often caused fatal accidents in graves, when a neighbouring coffin, being perforated by the pickaxe, the gas rushes out, filling the grave, and striking down the gravedigger like lightning; and that a horse, whose head is in pure air while its body is enclosed in an atmosphere containing only 1-500th its volume of the gas, is soon killed by the gas absorbed through the skin.

A great deal has been said and written by the inhabitants of Glasgow against the authorities, for causing the removal of the various spring wells that were wont to refresh the population throughout the city; but, from certain chemical combinations ensuing in these reservoirs, they had become contaminated with a virulent poison, and their immediate removal was virtually an act of philanthropy, as the waters—filtering from grave-yards, streets, lanes, wynds, and various aggregations of night soil—are eminently impregnated with animal matters, an important constituent of which is nitrogen. These flow into the sewers, which are not long in communicating with any contiguous water at the same level; and, in a short time, the nitrogen absorbs a sufficiency of oxygen to form one of its oxides or acids, which, with the exception of its protoxide (NO or laughing-gas), are highly deleterious to life. Again, sea water holds an immense weight of various substances in solution, consisting of chlorides, bromides, iodides, sulphates, and carbonates.

Although the beautiful and useful metal, iodine, is not obtained by the manufacturer directly from sea water, yet there are doubtless large quantities held in solution by the ocean; because it is evident that marine plants, like those on land, thrive on the substances contained in the water which surrounds their roots; and, as a natural consequence, we expect the solid constituents of the plant to be the same; or nearly so, as those of the water, and vice versa. The manufacturer of iodine, therefore, begins with kelp, which is a concentrated residue of sea-weeds—these having assimilated into their tissues the mechanical constituents of the water during the process of growth; and, from a ton of drift-weed kelp—that is, kelp made from weeds washed ashore—the produce in iodine is but 12 pounds; while the kelp made from cut-weeds—that is, from weeds which have grown on the beach—only yields 2½ pounds per ton.

But the most abundant constituent of sea water is chloride of sodium (NaCl) or common salt. Enormous quantities of this substance are held in solution by the restless surges of the great deep. An inch of water from the superficial area of the Atlantic alone, contains as much salt as would freight all the vessels in the world. This is another convincing proof of Divine wisdom, because, had the ocean not been highly impregnated with salt, or even had that salt not been soluble in water, a very brief period would have sufficed to convert it into a gigantic cess-pool—a thousand times worse than any Styx ever imagined, contaminating every breeze, and charging every cloud, defiling every shore, and darkening every tide with thick pestilential vapours of disease and death. But no; the Almighty, in combining the two elementary bodies which form salt (chlorine and sodium), knew that, unless it were soluble in water, its antiseptic properties must remain inactive. It has been stated that sea water carries silver in solution, and that copper-fastened ships, after being long afloat and taken into dock for repairs, are found to have a thin layer or web of silver adhering to the copper on their bottoms. The writer, however, in investigating the affinities which exist between copper, silver, and sea water, has failed to discover any chemical action which would result as above. Any finely-divided silver, separated by long exposure to the atmosphere from some undiscovered argentiferous deposit, and which may reach the ocean through the agency of water, would be precipitated by the salt solution as a chloride; and as chloride of silver is insoluble in an excess of the precipitant, and also as silver has a greater affinity for chlorine than copper, we are rather inclined to doubt the truth of the above statement.

We believe there is no substance in nature more susceptible of being sophisticated than water. We have it of every colour, taste, and smell. Drugged with alcohol it forms whisky; drawn with tea, a solution of tannin; charged with carbonic acid, and mixed with sugar, gum, lemon, ginger, &c. it is christened with sparkling titles, which are not always indicative of the ingredients with which it has been transmogrified. Then, what an infinitude of aspects it assumes as cosmetics and medicines! But without enumerating any of these, we append the following table, showing the per centage of water in a variety of natural and artificial products:—

Brandy,	56 per cent.
Dunlop cheese,	30
Beer,	90
Hair,	9
Eggs,	74
Urine,	93
Milk,	87
Tea (dried leaves),	5
Blood,	79 to 83
Apples,	80
Fish,	80
Fowl,	76
Potatoes,	75
Turnips,	88 to 92
Soap,	40 to 60
Coal,	7
Manufactured tobacco,	80 to 50
Vinegar,	95
Sugar (cane),	5

It will be seen from the above that water is present to a greater extent in many substances than would at first be imagined; and, in short, there are few compounds which it will not carry in solution. But the primary pellucid beautiful fluid, devoid of all colour, taste, and smell, and free from all mechanical impurities, is composed of two substances only; and though these, in an isolated state, be fierce and fearful in their natures, yet, when mingled to water, they become harmless and kindly, docile and bland.

We will now consider the two elementary constituents of water—the first and most important of which is

OXYGEN.

From what we have previously stated regarding the universal distribution of water, we need scarcely inform the reader that this restless and imperial element has a domain over which it wields its viewless sceptre co-extensive with water; for it must be apparent that wherever there is the most minute trace of moisture, oxygen is present as a component part thereof.

This element is an absolute gas at all temperatures, or, in other words, there is no solid or liquid oxygen. It is permanently a gas, and cannot be condensed or frozen by the most intense cold, combined with the highest pressure that human appliances are capable of bringing to bear on it.

In most cases the acidity of fruit, milk, vinegar, acids, &c. is owing to the presence of oxygen. Fruit yields pectic acid; milk, lactic acid; and vinegar is simply a solution of acetic acid and water. Two of the principal acids in commerce contain a preponderating quantity; for example:—Nitric acid or aqua fortis (NO₃) a most intense solvent and poison, dissolving metals, such as iron, silver, and copper, as easily as water dissolves soap—contains five parts of oxygen, combined with one of nitrogen or azote. Then there is sulphuric acid or vitriol (SO₄), containing one part of sulphur, united with three of oxygen, and which, though greatly diluted with water, has intense acid properties. Again, oxygen is a powerful supporter of combustion. All artificial light and heat, such as that produced by coal, wood, gas, and oily matters, or, indeed, any material capable of burning, vivid or slow, burns only in virtue of the oxygen surrounding it. Oxygen, of itself, however, is incapable of ignition; for, although it supports combustion, it is not a combustible, but only enters into combination with the burning matter, forming carbonic acid and water, and it is during this incorporation that light and heat are evolved. Now, upon this principle, the reason must be obvious why blowing engines are attached to large iron furnaces, and also why the blacksmith and housewife use bellows, although most people are naturally of opinion that the temperature of the fire or furnace is heightened solely by the current of air passing through the burning mass, and not to any peculiar property of the air itself; but as the gases or volatile matters which escape by the chimney, even when the furnace is at a white heat and no appearance of smoke, are entirely different in their composition from those entering at the furnace mouth, it is evident that a chemical combination is at work in the furnace, between the atmospheric oxygen and the carboniferous constituents of the fuel, resulting as we have already stated. It is therefore plain that without ventilation—or, in other words, a supply of oxygen—combustion must cease; and, on the other hand, if a draught of air is made to pass through the burning materials by powerful artificial appliances, their combustion must be accelerated proportionately. This imminent characteristic of oxygen is ocularly demonstrated by putting a splinter of wood, with a single spark on its point, in a bottle containing the gas, when it momentarily bursts into a brilliant flame; and a fragment of phosphorous, in the same circumstances, emits a dazzling light, rivalling the intensity of the sun. When we observe, then, a bar of iron at white heat—a furnace glaring on the clouds of night—or a conflagration devouring the storehouses of commerce, as did the late fire in London,—and contemplate these phenomena from a scientific aspect, they become transformed into a grand and terrific display of the intense and extraordinary powers of oxygen. Unless this gas surrounds the most minute flame, no combustion will ensue. Although our globe was on fire, and the oxygen with which it is surrounded withdrawn, it would be instantly extinguished; and, on the other hand, did it please the Almighty slightly to disarrange the composition of the atmosphere, by withdrawing some of the nitrogen or adding more oxygen, many ingredients would become so inflammable that they would ignite spontaneously; while, whatever was already in a state of ignition would burn with such vigour, that a general conflagration would be inevitable.

NURSERY LITERATURE.

KNOWING, as we do, the immense importance of a name—despite Shakspeare's asseveration to the contrary—we are rather diffident in prefixing to the present article a title apparently as infantile as the above. Experienced readers, mayhap, will be prejudiced enough to look upon our production as designed especially for the perusal of the olive branches of their respective families, and consequently will regard it as unworthy of more than a passing glance from themselves. Those who argue in this manner will do us less than justice; for it is to them—we will not add the clerical phrase, 'and to them alone'—that these lines are addressed.

The trite observation, which speaks of the child being the father of the man, and the lines, equally trite, are much to the same purpose—

'Childhood shows the man,
As morning shows the day,'—

are not so absolutely and universally true as common consent has generally allowed them to be. It is almost unnecessary to appeal to the everyday experience of the reader for instances in which the character of the man is far from being consistent with what we have known of the boy or the youth. How many of these infant prodigies that astonish the world with the wonderful feats of their precocious genius become, at a more matured age, persons of very questionable ability, or degenerate into paragons of foolishness or imbecility! How few of the most distinguished alumni of our universities sustain, in their after-life, the reputation which they have obtained at Alma Mater for talent and industry! How many of those who, at school or college, were regarded as irretrievable dunces or incorrigible defaulters, have exhibited, in their intercourse with the world, immense talent and incorruptible virtue! How often has the 'good boy' of nine or ten been converted into 'the tame cheater' of fifty or sixty; and the shy retiring lad into the bold and martial 'swaggerer' of five-and-twenty!

But instances like these are to be regarded rather as the exception than the rule, and do not greatly invalidate the general accuracy of the very respectable adages above mentioned. We are much inclined to favour that mode of vaticination which predicts the character, moral and intellectual, of the future man, from the actions, likings, and dislikings of the boy, in the same way as Admiral Fitzroy promises good or bad weather from the favourable or unfavourable appearance of the sky at sunrise. Mistakes will, doubtless, occur in both cases; and we may see a wild youth shoot up into a good man, or a beautiful day after a threatening dawn. But assuming the general truth of the wise saws, which make 'the boy the father to the man,' it becomes a question of considerable interest and importance how this juvenile manhood is passed? Few persons there are who do not interest themselves in this question. Every one is anxious to know of the welfare—morally, physically, and intellectually—of the future members of the commonwealth; and every one seems to be impressed with the truth of the theory which holds, that as the boy is so shall the man be. The gentlemen of the medical profession confine their interest in boyhood merely to its physical health; the clergymen interest themselves only in the boy's spiritual welfare; and neither minister nor doctor will brook much interference with subjects which they deem peculiarly their own. We do not, in the meantime, intend to dispute the question with them, but will confine our observations to the other—that is, the intellectual—branch of the subject. We must not here intrude on the domains of the school-room, as we value our personal safety; our inquiries must be limited to that intellectual food imbibed by the child, independent of schools and schoolmasters, and to which we have ventured to give the name of 'Nursery Literature.'

We are somewhat at a loss to define the phrase 'Nursery Literature.' We have already limited it to that instruction which is not gained through the medium of a teacher, and which, consequently, is not regarded as 'lessons.' But it is a more difficult point to determine at what period a child begins to imbibe this nursery literature, and at what year the boy eschews it. According to our own ideas of the subject, nursery literature begins with the first story told by the nurse to the child, or the first song which she teaches it to hum. It ends, in different cases, at different ages; but, generally speaking, it may be said to be abandoned before the twelfth year. About that time, fact begins to attract the attention in a greater degree than before; and the juvenile mind, if properly constituted, aspires after intellectual food of a higher kind than mere nursery literature, or takes more pleasure in batting and bowling, riding and fishing, than in reading or hearing the 'pleasant little stories' which formerly interested it so much. By this time a boy ought to be able to appreciate the beauties of the 'myriad-minded' author of Waverley, of Shakespeare, or of Burns, or of such other authors as his circumstances may place within his reach. It is an unhealthy sign if he still looks back, although only with 'one last lingering look,' upon the regions from which he had emerged, or prefer a page of a fairy tale to a chapter of Ivanhoe.

It would be absurd to suppose that our subject included only the instruction obtained in a nursery; and, consequently, that it applies only to those fortunate children who are born, to use a common expression, 'with a silver spoon in the mouth.' If such were the case, nursery literature would lose (to us) half its value, and more than half its interest. The curious legendary tales with which, in Scotland at least, children of all ages used to be as familiar as with their 'parritch' and their spelling-book, will bear comparison, at any time, with the most elegant of the 'pretty little stories' which the 'good little boys and girls' of higher caste are accustomed to read. The strange and, to an English ear, uncouth rhymes which they learn from the mouths of the father or grandfather—and which, relating to deeds of ancient warriors celebrated in local tradition, are often of considerable value to the antiquary or the historian—must, in our humble opinion, operate far more in elevating the mind, than those stiff little hymns or those stupid little verses which 'better folk's bairns' usually learn. And if they are unable to make the children of the poor equal, in point of morality, to the children of the rich, it is because the influence is counteracted by the scenes of profligacy and immorality into which too often the former are thrown, at an early age, to support themselves.

It is needless to observe that the character of nursery literature—which, without dispute, exercises a powerful influence for good or bad on the juvenile mind—depends, in a very great degree, upon the character of the nurse. In poor men's homes, the nurse, in almost every case, is the mother; and, consequently, she entails upon herself a double responsibility. But, in the families of the wealthy, this is seldom the case; and the person who is chosen to watch over the infant scion of some noble house, is generally one of the menial servants. Quintilian, in his Institutes of Eloquence, lays great stress upon the character and qualifications of the nurse. 'First of all,' says he, 'nurses ought to be free from all impediment and impropriety of speech. Chrysippus wished every nurse to be a woman of sense; but, in all events, he was of opinion the best that could be had should be pitched upon, according to the circumstances of the parties. It is true, their morals ought to be the first consideration, but it is requisite that they should speak with propriety. Their speech is the first the child hears, and he lisps out an imitation of their words.' Quintilian, notwithstanding the trifling inconsistency which he so quaintly explains, is evidently correct in his estimate of a good nurse.

In reviewing nursery literature, the first thing that strikes us is the general nonsensical spirit which pervades it. This is, we are glad to say, less remarkable in the nursery literature of the poor than that of the rich; but even in the former, instances occur so frequently as to include it also within the scope of the general rule. This nonsense—which obtains largely in nursery rhymes, and in less striking proportions in fairy tales—seems to tickle the juvenile fancy amazingly; and, in fact, some very grave writers on education tell us that a child delights in nothing but nonsense, and that all attempts to make him learn sense will prove unavailing. Some even go so far as to maintain that he should learn nothing at all until he is seven years of age, in order that he may persevere with the greater vigour when he does begin. Quintilian combats this opinion, and calling Chrysippus once more to the rescue, says:—'They who, with Chrysippus, think that every moment of time ought to be employed, are more defensible in their opinion; for though he (Chrysippus) allowed the child to be three years in the nurse's hands, yet he thought that at that age the mind is susceptible of excellent instruction, even from women. . . . For it is certain that he must be employed in somewhat.

. . . . Let us not, therefore, lose even the most early hours of life; and the rather, because the rudiments of knowledge are acquired by memory only, which we possess in our earliest days—nay, it is then very tenacious." Yes, M. Fabius Quintilian! the memory is very tenacious in youth; and of nothing is it more tenacious than those nonsensical rhymes and stupid stories, which it imbibes 'even from women.' How well do we retain the memory of these ludicrous little pieces, when some of Shakspeare's best passages and some of Burns' noblest songs escape from our recollection! There, for an example, are the ridiculous lines commemorating the misfortune of

'Little Bo-peep, who lost her sheep,
And couldn't tell where to find them.'

We all remember this rhyme; and the mention of it brings back to our recollection the days of childhood, when we really compassionated poor little Bo-peep's unfortunate case, and appreciated the wisdom of the sapient advice—

'Leave them alone till they come home,
And they'll bring their tails behind them.'

Equally famous too, and equally well-remembered, is the curious story of the four-and-twenty blackbirds, which 'were baken in a pie.' Certainly, two dozen blackbirds singing in a pie must have been a 'dainty dish to set before a king.' The 'king in his chamber,' too busily employed in 'counting up' his money to attend to the dainty dish of blackbirds, inspires the 'young idea' with a suitable notion of the dignity and cares of royalty; while his royal consort, engaged in the more pleasing occupation of 'eating bread and honey,' drives young misses to distraction with envy. The rashness of Miss Muffet, too, and the danger she encountered, are well known:—

'Little Miss Muffet
Sat on a tuffet,
Eating of curds and whey;
There came a large spider
And sat down beside her,
And frighten'd Miss Muffet away!'

Singularly nonsensical are the lines which speak of 'riding a cock-horse to Banbury Cross, to see an old lady get on a white horse;' and very entertaining to young masters and misses is the idea they suggest.

But the nonsensical nursery rhymes are generally regarded as English in their origin as well as in their nature; and although they have now inundated the nurseries of Scotland, they have not yet reached the children of the poorer classes. These, too, have rhymes, which we have described as less childish than the

English, and giving less evidence of a predilection for nonsense on the part of the children. But, on 'cool reflection,' we begin to perceive that the nursery rhymes, as we may call them, of the Scottish poor are not so free from nonsense as we at first supposed. Among their rhymes is a Scotticised version of the lay of twenty-four blackbirds, altered and enlarged, so as to differ considerably from the original. Among the rhymes which we regard as peculiar to the common Scotch is one which used to be called 'The Brandy-hill,' and which, by way of comparison with the English verses of the same class, we venture to transcribe. We cannot, however, vouch for its accuracy, as it is taken entirely from memory, and, so far as we are aware, was never before in print:—

'As I gaed up the Brandy-hill,
I met my father wi' gude will—
He had jewels, he had rings,
He had mony fine things.
He had a hammer wantin' nails!
He had a cat an' ten tails!
Up Joek! doon Tam!
Blaw the bellows auld man!
Auld man's hairy coat,
Row't about the ferry-boat!
The ferry-boat's ower dear—
Ten pound in a year!
Half a cherry, half a cheese,
Half a bonny blue glass!
Blaw Willie Buck's horn!
A' his kye's among the corn.
Willie Buck had a coo,
They ca'd her Broo-brenty;
She fell ower the brig o' Perth,
And broke the covenant!'

This ridiculous medley vies in point of nonsense with the most silly productions of the English nursery muse. The last two lines might form the theme of very curious conjectures to Englishmen; and many of them would perhaps infer from them that 'Willie Buck's coo' had been guilty of some awful violation of the Solemn League and Covenant in her precipitous descent from the bridge of Perth.

But verses of this kind appear to have been too vain and childish for the steady gravity of the Scotch, and consequently are few in number compared with those of the English. The following verse, which explains and attempts to justify the superstitious affection which the Scotch children manifest for the robin, the lark, and the wren, may be produced here:—

'Robin, robin redbreast,
The lav'rock and the wren;
If you harry their nest
Ye'll never thrive again!'

This singular verse had a powerful effect upon the imagination of our school-fellows, and kept comparatively safe from depredation the nests of the three birds mentioned above. Indeed, in our experience of bird-nesting, we can recollect of only one case in which a robin's nest was destroyed; and the delinquent, for some days after the deed was discovered, was constantly saluted with the ominous lines, which threatened in future times the punishment of his sin.

The stories which form no inconsiderable part of nursery literature exhibit in many cases the same nonsensical spirit, except when they refer to religious subjects, and then the odour of their sanctity is quite overpowering. One writer, like the stern clergyman depicted in 'Jane Eyre,' delights in relating, in the 'easy narrative style,' the dreadful fate of John —, a wicked little boy, who was drowned after purloining an apple from his papa's orchard; or of Jane —, a naughty little girl, who didn't love her hymns, and died very suddenly. These productions are scarcely less objectionable than the hordes of stories of good little boys and girls, who are 'very, very good,' and who generally die very early. We all remember how Punch's Master Jacky advises his young companions not to be good boys, for all good boys die young! We cannot allow that this sensational kind of nursery literature does any good; and we should be very sorry to suppose that it does any harm. The children themselves, pretty good judges of what is agreeable to them, hate it thoroughly; and rush from it, to peruse with greater relish a humorous story or a fairy tale.

We are not aware of any strong objection that can be urged against the use of fairy tales in the nursery. The power of the good fairy is always a source of gratification to the young reader or listener; the strange supernatural agency which makes the 'Dishes with a wish come nigh,

And with a wish retire;

which transports the prince or the princess thousands of miles in the twinkling of an eye, excites unbounded wonder; and for a considerable time commands entire belief. The wonderful adventures of the redoubted Jack-the-Giant-killer—or, as he is sometimes denominated, Jack-the-Giant-queller—ought to be, and in fact are, known by every little boy above four years of age; and Cinderella, with her marvellously powerful godmother, and her marvellously wicked stepmother, has gained a fame which will endure so long as 'of makin' o' books, there is nae end.' The Scotch, in former times, used to be peculiarly prolific in this kind of nursery literature; but it was of a somewhat different nature from the fairy tales of old England. The superstitious element entered more largely into its character; the fairies were beings to be conciliated rather than loved; the brownies, kelpies, witches, ghaists, and bogies, struck fear into the juvenile heart, unaccompanied by the smallest shade of doubt. The stories had this advantage over the English fairy tales, that they were delivered orally, and under circumstances which increased their effect and insured their credence. On the dark, long, weary 'fore-nights' of winter, the family of the cottar would draw round the ingle, in their comfortable 'clay-bigin,' when some venerable patriarch or consequential grandam of three score and ten would relieve the dull monotony of the winter evening by repeating an old Scotch legend, replete with all the usual superstitious characters, and enforced generally by the asseveration that some remote ancestor of the family had taken part in the transactions recorded. The impassioned tones and gestures of the venerable speaker would lend authority to the tale, which the juveniles would 'devour with a greedy ear,' and treasure up for future use. It is much to be regretted that scenes like this are becoming every day more and more uncommon—that the fireside literature of Scotland, which is synonymous with its nursery literature, is no longer so rich in legendary lore as it used to be. But it is some satisfaction to know, that many of the most striking of these fireside legends have been rescued from oblivion by Scott, Galt, and other writers whose names are 'less known to fame.'

One other item in our recollections of fashionable nursery literature deserves to be noticed. The curious plates which accompany the plaintive lays of 'Bo-Peep' and 'Miss Muffet,' and the other delightfully ridiculous stories well known in the nursery, retain their place in the memory quite as long as the verses themselves. It is now a considerable time since we had the pleasure of reading the nursery tales we have mentioned, but we still retain a very vivid recollection of the woful appearance of poor Bo-Peep, when she found her flock was amissing, and of her dumbfounded aspect on beholding their wretched tails!

A novelty, as it may be called, has lately been introduced into nursery literature by a well-known lady in Edinburgh. It is called a 'picture letter;' and many of the words are written, not in common letters, but in pictures. Thus the author of the letter writes her name with the figure of a pussy placed before the words heriye Sinclair—the whole being designed to represent Catherine Sinclair! My dear is always written with the figure of a stag after the possessive pronoun; and other words are represented in a similar way. The whole letter looks very puzzling, and will probably be found a very useful exercise for youthful ingenuity.

Hitherto we have met with very little which we could absolutely condemn in nursery literature, and we wish that we could close the present notice with this remark. But we have been sorry to find, in some writers of nursery tales, a tendency to corrupt the youthful mind by wrong views of the different conditions of men. As Falstaff says, 'There's lime in the sack.' We can only afford room for one example. In a nursery tale of the usual nonsensical kind, called 'The Dog's Dinner Party,' one of the parties invited, named Mr. Common Bulldog, destroys the whole fun by his rude behaviour. He is the type, so the story says, of the common people; and his conduct gives occasion to the following strange announcement:—'That low-born may become wise and good; but that low-born and low-bred must never be admitted into good society!' Such is the mischievous moral by which the writer corrupts an otherwise highly amusing story. Aristocratic matrons may regard a sentence like this as the lump of sugar at the bottom of the tea-cup; but they should beware how they encourage a sentiment so pernicious in its tendencies. E. R.

CHAPTER VIII.

CHIPP'S NARRATIVE.—CHAPTER I.

'I, Abinadab Ephraim Chippa, solemnly declare that the following account of my connection with the Plantagenet Phipps, Marquis of Pennywhistle, is correct in every particular:—

'Plantagenet Phipps, Marquis of Pennywhistle, wronged me grossly, foully, there, where I had garnered up my heart; where either—et cetera—but enough of this. I see the paper through blinding sobs, and I must be calm. I, Abinadab Ephraim Chippa, incredible as the statement may appear, once loved—loved madly, passionately, fondly, tenderly. Who? Great Fates! Who? Ah!—SHE! She, who was ever fair and never proud. She, who wore a wreath of roses the night when first we met. We met—I, Abinadab Ephraim Chippa, and the lassie with the lint-white locks. She was a blacksmith's daughter—speak it out, O heart!—and dwelt beside the untrodden ways beside the Springs of Dove. Her bright smile haunts me still—haunts me, Abinadab Ephraim Chippa—haunts me, and sends the red blood gushing through my brains. I was a boy—a careless happy boy of nineteen, when first I saw sweet Alice. It was on a market day. I was returning from the market; and it was in a path by the river, overshadowed with trees, that I encountered her. I addressed her in the following words, "Where are you going to, my pretty maid?" Her back was towards me. I had a presentiment that she was pretty; but little dreamed I that she was of such transcendent loveliness. She turned, and my fate was sealed. I could not choose but love. I felt as if I was swallowing a red-hot brick, and as if some invisible force inside my head was drawing my hairs, one by one, into the recesses of my brain. It was a strange feeling, not altogether unpleasant. It seemed as if my legs were made of inflammable wood, and were being slowly consumed by the fiery element. She noticed my agitation; and, with maiden modesty, blushed scarlet—blushed till I thought she would have burst a blood-vessel. With the presentiment that such a contingency was not at all unlikely, if she went on blushing much longer, I knelt upon the green sward, and entreated her to dance with me a minuet de la cœur! She replied, in French, that nothing would give her greater pleasure; and, accordingly, we commenced. We finished, and I entreated to be allowed the felicity of seeing her home. She, smiling, blushed a sweet consent, and we walked on. It was in the glorious summer time—in the rosy time of the year; and it was about ten p.m. when I reached the stile which led to her father's home. He kept a little farm. I parted with her; and, when she touched my hand, I felt as if I could cheerfully have expired on the spot. She left me, giving me a look which said, plainer than words—you are not quite indifferent to me—nil desperandum. I turned, and pursued the road home, which retreated from me as I advanced. I had gone on about five yards, when I was sensible of a faint scream behind me. I turned, and Alice was in the middle of the meadow; and what, great heavens! there was bowling, bearing down upon her a mad bull—a monster bull, with huge rolling eyes, straining nostrils, which smelled the ground ever and anon, and a long hair-tipped spear-looking tail, which swept the air and massacred innocent insects by the hundred! Alice wore a red cloak, and I suppose the fury of the animal had been aroused by the sanguinary hue of the linsey-woolsey. She was overcome with terror, and clasped her pretty hands in agony, as if to beseech the animal to direct its attention to any passers which it might encounter on the roadside, for it was proceeding in that direction. Fifteen thousand different emotions struggled in my breast. There was the empress of my soul in the most imminent danger; death inevitable, unless the attention of the animal could be withdrawn. What was I to do? Death to her was death to me! I felt that my destiny was linked to hers. I felt that I could not exist without her. What was I to do? Should I at once rush over and fling myself between her and the bull? That was my only course. Stay! if I could get its attention directed to myself, and still give myself time to escape with a run—I would try it. I vaulted over the stile, and was in the park in less time than I take to narrate it. I shouted to her to throw off her cloak, and stare the bull steadily in the eyes. She heard my words, and, as she afterwards informed me, she recollected of an alleged potency which the mesmeric gaze of a man or woman has in arresting the progress of the most infuriate animals, and obeyed my second instruction. Her cloak fell off, and huddled close to her feet, as if in terror. She stood upright, clasped her hands behind her back, and awaited the approach of the animal. She had not long to wait. Onward came the bull, with the deliberate intention in its vile heart of goring that lovely form, and leaving it mangled and bleeding in the dry ditch which skirted the meadow. Onward it came, till within the influence of her lovely eyes. It stopped, and gazed at her with a sort of unholy terror. Thus they remained for about ten minutes. I knew that she could not stand much longer. I seized the bull by the tail, and immediately its attention was directed from Alice. She fled in the direction of the house for assistance. The assistance arrived too late—I was lying bleeding and senseless in the ditch.

'I remember no more till a month and a day, when I awoke one morning to discover that a lovely female was sitting sewing at my bedside. I tried to raise my head, and asked her for a drink of water. She screamed, and I knew that it was Alice.

'Thus commenced our courtship. The flame of love was kindled in each of our hearts, and we loved as two fresh young hearts only can love. The course of our true love ran smooth till that patrician villain came between us. My Alice had one weakness, and that was for dress. Pennywhistle knew that weakness; he admired her beauty as the wolf admires the lamb, and he commenced systematically to accomplish the work of her destruction.

'He accomplished her ruin, and I was miserable. I brooded over my misery till a settled purpose of dire revenge took possession of my heart. I sought the destroyer of my happiness.

'We met—'twas in a crowd. I, Abinadab Ephraim Chippe, and the destroyer of my peace met—'twas in a crowd, as I have mentioned before. I met him in the most appropriate place for a meeting such as ours.

'It was a London crowd. The sun was shining. Good heavens! the sun shone on him; but, with him, it embraced the social mud of London.

'It was one of the great morning carnivals of crime—the grand jubilee of the depraved. The moral scabs of the great city were festering in the sun, and under the shadow of their great temple—the black and dingy walls of Newgate. That was their Jugernaut, and they were there to see a victim offered up a sacrifice. St. Paul's might rise up stately and grand, and look down contemptuously or pitifully on the motley gathering; St. Sepulchre's might unite with it to gather them under their shadow, and purge them from their stains of blood. But they had a temple of their own. It ran to no great height. It had no golden-tipped spire cleaving the heavens, and flashing back the sun's rays from the brass ball—to enter heaven with intercession for its worshippers. It lay black, large, low, and sturdy. It was roomy, always well filled, and always receiving fresh devotees. It had a shadow of its own; and struggled sturdily, and conquered the shadows of the two rival temples which lay contiguous. The silver moon sometimes threw chaste, pitiful rays upon it; and darted an arrow of hope, through the slits in the walls, into the gloomy, dank, and slimy apartment of some poor devotee—as if to ask him to breathe a prayer of repentance, and it would, swift as thought, dart back with it to the gates of paradise. But there was a black spirit constantly on the watch, whose huge form covered up the temple, and cast its shadow, black and gloomy, over all. In the gray of the morning, the shadow might be seen dissolving into thin air. Its shape was like a man. It had wings, cloven feet, a Louis-Napoleonic nose; and the badge which it wore on its sleeve, wrought in letters of blue fire, was a bleeding throat, a knife, and a white-ribbed skeleton dangling from a scaffold.

'We met, I say, in this crowd. I had sought over Europe and America, and at last I found him. Since my return to London, I had attended every execution, in order to feast my eyes with the contortions of the dying wretches, and delude myself into the belief that it was him—my enemy, the perpetrator of my great wrong. I had attended so often, and looked so eagerly, that I now carry in the retina of my eye the picture of a scaffold, and a white cowed figure dangling from a beam. I can't get rid of it; and never will, till the white bellied worm eats through the lids, and feasts and wriggles in the pupils of my eyes.

'Ha! but it was worth my pains.

'I waited till the miserable wretch was strung off, and I followed him—I followed him to his plebeian residence in Bermondsey-square.

'I managed to bribe the servant to admit me in the dead of night.

'I crept up to his bed-room. I opened the door.

'I was face to face with him.

'He was cutting his toe nails with a razor.

'I sprang on him, and seized the razor out of his hands, and stood before him, with my great wrong looking out of my eyes.

'He knew the fate in store for him, and trembled.

'I flourished the razor.

BY THE LAKE.

WHERE the white water-lilies in their snow are blowing;

Where the lone streamlet murmurs into rest;

Where the dull shadows of the trees are going—

Are ever flowing o'er the lake's low breast;—

Where the cool winds, in summer evenings dying,

Ripple the golden glory of the tide;

Where the cool breezes, through drooping willows sighing,

Plays with the sedges by the lake's green side;—

Hither, my own one! would I have thee linger,

To watch the star of love burn in the west;

To see the beauty that the sunsets bring her,

Growing, dilating in her golden vest.

Or, when the twilight—palely, softly stealing—

Creeps o'er the meadows lying still and green;

Twin lustrous stars in yon blue vault revealing,

Whose equals only in thine eyes are seen;—

There would I have thee come, and sweetly squander

The luscious hours that prelude in the night;

While by the lake's side would we slowly wander,

Gazing in peace upon the fading light.

I would not, dear! in passion bend before thee—

A quieter happiness I'd bring my love;

The joy of heaven should softly tremble o'er thee,

And sit upon thy breast a snow-white dove.

Thy gentle eyes should beam in placid brightness—

Dear, gentle eyes! that only dream of me;

Thy gentle breast should beat in tender whiteness—

Like summer sunshine on a crystal sea.

I would not have thee, love! share fierce heart-burning,

Nor bear the tumult of a restless soul;

I would those dear, dear eyes to Heaven were turning,

In grateful thanks for Heaven's most bounteous dole;

And that we two should calmly go together,

Throughout the ebb and flow of life's long change—

Daring the brunt of many a winter's weather—

Meeting the sunshine and the varying range

Of times and seasons. Wherefore, dear one! harken

Unto this dall, beneath the twilight cold;

Where gentle sadness will our gladness chasten

With fond remembrance of the days of old.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'Oh! that fear,

When the heart longs to know what it is death to hear!'—Croly.

CHAPTER X.

Is my child, Barbara, really in love? and has she met with a disappointment to blight the roses in her face, and undermine—perhaps destroy her health? Her mamma—sixty at her last birth-day, and whose circumference is something to be proud of—the consummate full-blown flower of womanhood, and of the Chisholms, a family, be it marked, with ancestors—cannot understand how any such foolishness should be in this buying and selling world. She herself, with her long observation of character, and mature practical judgment, declares that she is unable to discover anything in the young man, Edward Imrie, but a fellow who would be likely to make a drudge of any woman he should marry, as somebody else had been made a drudge of, getting no thanks neither. Now, if Barbara could but be pushed into the M'Grubber circle—ah! there would be a chance! Why, with her good looks—although she should say it who shouldn't—she might have the West-end of Glasgow at her feet. Such is my incomparable Jean's plain, common-sense reasoning upon the matter—at which Barbara smiles, as if with a vague assent; while secretly, I can see, she presses her white graceful fingers to her heart.

Dear Barbara!—dearer infinitely for the apprehension, experienced but never told, with which I contemplate her exquisitely-outlined features daily! Were the youth Imrie a beggar in the street, and she in love with him—I would, I verily dare swear, sympathise with that irrational passion at her heart. She accordingly leans on me as if reading me affectionately inwards. Yet she whispers me no confession, and bears the burden of her mighty sorrow—whatever that may be—alone. Nay, when apparently most anxious to be companionable, I decry somehow about her a near darkness of solitude into which she steals ever and anon unawares. Surpassingly beautiful, no doubt, is the smile she wears whenever she emerges, serene and silverly, like the moon from a cloud. At such times she seems to discover in the eyes of all of us, though perhaps in mine most, a sadness which she tries to dissipate. She then gleams and lightens, as if fair in into the shady places of our hearts to dart swift sunshine. But, ay me! my masters! such faint moony mocking of the healthy day! It has that in it which is more melancholy than twilight, though bringing with it equally grateful dews. Strange that not her frequent thoughtful dreaminess, but rather her occasional luminous gaiety affects me to indiscreet tears, and teaches me the paternal hypocrisy of feigning sudden engagements across the street, or little casual errands into the next room!

Mathew Waddel—in some respects my chiefest other self, if Jean will allow me to say so—sees and understands it all. He flares up when I talk despondingly of Barbara, but his kindness for her increases and grows more demonstrative. Now, why should it, but that his words and deeds may possibly, as regards my uncomplaining sufferer, be, even disguisedly to himself, of the nature of farewells and benedictions? Yet I would not that his efforts to cheer me were less frenzied. When he swears, with towering impatience, that Barbara never looked better in her life, I feel gladdened if not convinced by his emphasis. I like a man who gives consolation dogmatically, as if he knew. Mathew is prepared to dispute with the very doctors. His mind is made up. He will not admit—any more than Jean—that Barbara is seriously ill.

Nor is she—perhaps. I build fond hopes on the uncertainty. Her cough may be only a slight cold—her pallor and flushings the result only of a temporary weakness. Or is it, as Jean suspects, though with wonder at the poverty of the object, that the poor girl is veritably in love? Ah Mathew! you and I are both well stricken in years now! A drooping eye and a rosy lip stir up no feverish pulses in our blood. With my strong-minded Jean, the passion of love—unless it be the love of riches—is a mere silliness which ought to be rebuked and punished. It is a rare thing indeed for age, in either sex, to enter into the feelings of youth. But my own recollections of my susceptible and sickly years are peculiarly vivid. A certain jimp-waisted damsel—who, by the way, would now leave a very visible footprint if dancing like a nymph upon the sand—held my heart in terrific bondage. And would it be consistent in me to blame my child for a fervour and depth of feeling which she may possibly, for aught I know, have inherited? Oh that I had it in my power to bear her away into strange lands, and wile her into the gradual forgetfulness of associations which may be too keen for her strength!

Sometimes in my helplessness I have turned to my special friend; but his sudden dawn of fortune dazzles my eyes. I would fain fancy him unchanged; but, ay me! the difficulty of it! Poverty is easily discoverable to those who know its signs. The thickest veil of pride keeps not the wind of observation from penetrating the threadbare garment—sending a brutal chill. But the worm may be busy at the heart of the flower, before the outward leaves are subdued to the humiliating betrayal of its slow work of murder. It is different with riches. Except in the case of the miser hiding and hushing his gold—hiding and hushing it in terror of the plunderer and the suppliant—wealth, no matter in what way acquired, is forward to show itself at once. Mere useful vulgarities—buttons, buckles, and the like—may be concealed; but ribbons, lace, jewels, luminous eyes, pearls in the mouth, and other fineries, are not for the dark. Riches, or at least what the world esteems such, are, in their very nature, demonstrative. Even the importunities to which the opulent are exposed are a flattery. They are thus certain to profit, in some sense, by display; and profit, real or fancied—to the purse or to the pride—is, I fear, the master motive-power of our frail race.

Ah! with what conscious superiority will a golden tongue wag, be it in the brassiest bell that ever drew pious stragglers along the sheep-tracks! How audible is the dull snuffle of the man of large acres, compared with the Jove's thunder of the orator of no estate! Friend, most blessedly favoured of fortune! take that reflection as an indelible treasure to thy memory, and from the moment thou openest thy mouth to speak, be suspicious of a sycophant in every listener! Yet, if true desert in Mr. Waddel was legitimately and honourably crowned, wherefore should he have hesitated to make proclamation of his prosperity in the highways? If the modesty of the good man was dumb, his purse was loud in spite of him. Blindness or deafness itself might have interpreted how it burst its clasps and vociferated. Mathew marched as to the blare of trumpets. His fame rippled about the neighbourhood in pleasant speeches; and if all this occurred suddenly and for the first time, who is there will express wonder? Was not El Dorado, from a like cause, made all at once immortal in geography? How few could have taken the world's map, and put his finger on California, prior to the sunlight falling upon its glittering sands! Mathew exhibited his new condition in the floss of his hat. There was Glenfield starch in his neck-tie and in his bearing. In the polished surface of his boots, the laureate of Day & Martin's once famous establishment might have descried the portrait of a genius and shaved. How the abundant sap disclosed itself in blossom and foliage! Mathew burgeoned. He was in the clasp of the dews and the sunshine. The April and May of worldly success had come upon him like a late spring; and, in spite of his wintry hairs, he exhibited the full-blown bravery of youth, even like any wrinkled and ridiculous old fop, sunning himself for admiration and an appetite on the broad flags.

Then, again, it was noticeable to me, and to all, that the apartments of my neighbour and friend brightened into a splendid sympathy with his improved condition. A rich man cannot any more than the sun wrap himself up in his own brightness. His glory, on the contrary, is diffusive, making vulgar things lustrous, and turning very tears to jewels. The old familiar table, still vibrating with the quaint wrangle, the good-humoured riot, the fierce convivial uproar of our two voices, reflected the pomp of decanters out of all keeping with their sundry antiquated surroundings. A golden clock, whereon was the effigy of a golden shepherdess—for Mathew had a saccharine tooth for feminine glitter—overlapped the mantelpiece by some dangerous inches, and told how the time of day went with its master. Instead of the cotton article that had taken the rain quietly, a glossy hemisphere of silk, with its longitudes marked in thin steel, tinkled to the shower at our chance meetings. The maid, Susan, looked plumper, and rosier, and grander than before, as if feeling entitled to the considerable space she occupied in the eyes of Willie the milkman, and of a certain stalwart rival of his in dark cerulean uniform. As I cast my eyes across the street diagonally and dreamily, the windows of Mathew's room were transfigured into unearthly brilliance, and through them I beheld marvellous sights, in the shape of shimmering and bewildering Pachtoluses, what time the sun glinted on their startled panes, as he drove his fiery team up the blue steep, noonward.

Mathew and I were, in short, no longer a match. The pegs of him had been screwed far above my humble concert-pitch. We were neither thirds, nor fifths, nor octaves, but jangling discords. Call it pride, or call it modesty, I felt myself instinctively cooling down from the warmth of our so perfect brotherhood. My height suffered in his presence, and I was loth to abate my inches. Yet penetrating through the new bright crust and costly disguises of him, there—in the true kernel of him—was my genuine cronic of old, with his rich thick chuckle and choke, and his heart as responsive to every real test as a bell!

Besides, I had good reason—ah! reason how unspeakably good!—to love Mathew Waddel's riches, even while standing in some awe of them. Their light was on Barbara's path, fondling every sickly flower there into something of healthy bloom. They gave substance to his great sympathy and kindness. There was no end of his toilette vinegars, and jellies, and little things that said much. Had he been in all else my foe, I should have looked upon my child, whose slow and patient decline he had soothed, and been powerless as infancy to retaliate. He had torn from me my very panoply of pride. But was he not my friend now as always? and if the aspen shadow of a fear intervened, was it aught else, on being analysed, than the shadow of a fear to lose him? Ah! we are strangely selfish. With such honey for the quick bees of the world to swarm about, how could I now hope to have him all and always to myself? Were not his kidnappers drugging him with lordly wines? I fancied more than once a desperate emphasis in the piano of the Old Reds, as if with a design to storm his acquaintance. The happy repose, the contented leisure, that had made our intercourse sweet, was worried out of him. What then? Was I, Gabriel Gray, to cease at length to be his oracle? Were the plaudits, and the laughs, and the encouragements of him to be carried to other tables? O Heaven! was this forty-year reader of me to scatter himself in future over a waste sea of miscellanies? But that Mathew was transformed, I should have brazened and bullied him for a worthy answer—yea, wrung from the inner soul of him such a response as must have rivetted, as with oaths, our life-long fidelity to friendship, and charmed from the very gods the applausive thunders of the skies. With familiarity frozen into respect, and haunted as I was with reflections as to how the soberest brains wax giddy from sudden elevation, I felt that I could not pound the right issue from him, as I might have done on the old level, with Gabriel Gray something towering. But would he prove stanch or fail? Would our old, old friendship be as a restraining ballast at his heart? or would he mount away from me like a painted balloon, grandly, and with an exulting flourish of flags, yet painfully and ludicrously dwarfing, to fade at last into utter nothingness to my reproving, affronted, though alas! utterly blank eyes? Upon this problem I mused and mused; and glancing at poor Barbara asleep, with Sophia sewing by her side, I felt my eyes moisten, as if from a secret misgiving that, somehow or other—through some dim presentiment of ill—the ground was not wholly secure beneath my feet.

LE CHEVALIER DU RAYON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER III.

IN a most elegant manner, the Chevalier assisted Jemima to mount; and, after three several attempts—the two first of which were foiled by the restiveness of the animal—having succeeded in mounting himself, they rode off, followed by a groom on a large thoroughbred—the Chevalier saluting the ladies at the window of Sir John's mansion, by carrying his hat for some distance elevated in the air to the full extent of his right arm.

'My dear beloved Miss Jemima!' said the Chevalier, breaking the silence which had prevailed during the first few minutes, 'there is not words to me to express the Alpine felicity which I feel in to be so near you as—Wo-o-o—ze nasty beast! He will not go right this animal at all; he is much restive.'

'I think you had better change with the groom,' said Jemima. 'John!'

'Oh no, my dear mademoiselle,' said the Chevalier. 'I think ze other one is just so bad. He will perhaps get more better as we go along one little bit. But even, mademoiselle,' he added, with a quiver in his voice, 'if he should leap and leap till he leap me over his head, and I come down on my head and break my neck, I would consider myself amply repaid by ze few happy moments I have had ze happiness to enjoy in your sweet company.'

'O monsieur, how you do talk!' said Jemima, putting her handkerchief up to her face.

'How I do talk! I may use ze strong language, but it is because I feel strong. I speak true—true as ze sun which shines in ze sky, although it is enshrouded in ze smoke—just as my heart is enshrouded in ze black smoke of despair. Ze ice is broke now, mademoiselle; and it is no use to me to hide ze feeling longer. O mademoiselle! if you but knew ze feelings which tear my bosom, you would feel ze pity to me; and if pity be ze mother of love, perhaps—oh ze blessed hope!—you might come to feel ze little spark of love begin to warm your little heart. But I fear—I fear zat it is too much ever to be true; but still, like ze sinking man to ze straw, I grasp to it as ze only hope; for, unless ze little arrow pierce your heart through ze medium of ze pity—pity to me, pity for ze misery of which you are the innocent cause—I feel that it can never do so at all. I cannot move you by ze tongue—for mine is but one poor instrument, especially more as it is employed in your language; and I have no attraction sufficient enough in my person to move ze sentiments. I am but one plain, ugly man!'

'I am sure you do not think so,' said Jemima.

'Then, if I do not, I am one fool—one idiot,' said the Chevalier, with a sudden change of manner. 'We will take ze—what you call him?—one inventory of ze individual, and then we shall see. He have ze brown hair—one very good colour; but then it is straight and bristly—bristly as the bristles on ze boar; ze beard is dark, but curly—curly as one head of ze ne-nigro; ze eyes are dark—they will do—what you call pass muster; then ze nose—well, he is not so bad—in fact, now that I notice him, too like your own sweet one, my dear mademoiselle, for me to make ze remark. Then ze figure is not so bad—but ze feet, ze feet—oh, ze feet—you will pardon ze mention of such humble organs—but ze feet is frightful—like one patriarchal instance of ze fish you call ze—what you call him?—ze floundair.'

'Now really, monsieur, I do believe you only mentioned them to draw attention to their particular smallness. And why, your inventory, as you call it, instead of being so very modest, as your general statement led me to suppose, displays, I think, an unusual amount of conceit.'

'My dear mademoiselle, you are too severe. It is only one confirmation that one thing may be very good in ze several parts, and yet very indifferent as ze whole. Ze human body is composed of so many limbs, and ze head, and ze arms, and ze feet; and then ze face have so many different features—ze eyes, and ze nose, and ze mouth, and ze eyebrows, and ze forehead, and even ze shape of ze head himself, that each may be very good in himself, and yet the whole be spoiled by ze want of what you call ze symmetry—ze misproportion of parts of ze whole. Now zat is ze way of me; I may have ze good nose, and mouth, and ze eyes, and ze chest, and ze feet—no not ze feet, but ze limbs; but no one but ze blind would say zat I was beautiful.'

'I am sure you do not think so, monsieur,' said Jemima. 'But do not some people say that it is all a matter of taste—that there is no such thing as intrinsic beauty; that it exists only in the eye of the beholder?'

'And that, my dear mademoiselle,' rejoined the Chevalier, 'is most true: it is all one matter of taste. One likes ze fair, another ze dark—one ze tall, one ze small—one ze fat, one ze skinny. There may be a prevailing taste (and it is different in different parts of ze world), but you will find no two ze same: it is different as ze variety in ze countenance, and zat is one good dispensation.'

'And what may your taste be, monsieur, if I might ask!'

'Mine! Ze beauty of expression; zat to me is the only true beauty. I have heard one eminent physician of mine acquaintance, ze Physician-in-ordinaire to ze Duchess of Orleans, say that ze air and ze exercise are ze best cosmetiques in ze world; and I will add one little corollary, that ze good sense and ze good nature are ze best and ze brightest beauty.'

'Then I suppose, monsieur,' said Jemima, 'that, from your theory of the beautiful, you consider that although you are such an extremely plain person, this only renders you not so agreeable to the general taste; it does not prevent you from appearing interesting in the eyes of some whom you have already seen, or may perhaps yet see.'

'Perhaps so, mademoiselle. But what is that to me,' he added, with a sigh, 'if it render me—if I appear as I am in ze eyes of one—ze only one whose opinion I value—in the opinion of her whom I have loved from the moment I beheld her,—one glance of whose eye made to crumble into dust all ze barriers which reason had raised to oppose ze entrance of a feeling which could enter but to blight—to blight by ze withering blast of unrequited love! Like ze drowning man, however, I grasp to ze straw of hope. Tell me, mademoiselle—oh! tell me, if I might dare to hope so much—do you consider me—am I?—Be quiet, you brute! H'm! I mean—He is a—ze most disagreeable animal'—

'I really do think you had better change with the groom,' said Jemima; 'the horse he has is much quieter.'

'Well, perhaps I might be so good,' said the Chevalier; 'but if I had ze time I would teach him to be better.'

They waited till the groom came up; and the Chevalier having exchanged horses with him, they proceeded on their ride. For some minutes, the Chevalier did not speak—the interruption to his peroration having caused him, apparently, to lose the thread of his ideas.

'I think you will find him a good deal quieter than the other,' said Jemima.

'Oh, thank you—yes—much,' answered the Chevalier. 'But, mademoiselle, I must speak—I may not have ze opportunity of to do so again—I may never see you no more. I must speak. If there is no hope, then I will crush it in my breast, if my heart should break in ze struggle; but if there is the faintest ray of ze hope, then—but oh, I feel it is too much ever to be! Tell me, my dear Jemima!—tell me, do you think you could ever come to—to regard me as—to—to?'—But the words died away on the Chevalier's lips.

Jemima said nothing. She bent down, and patted the neck of her horse.

'Oh! do not,' exclaimed the Chevalier—'do not keep me in this suspense! It is torture—it is ze madness.'

'Well, monsieur—indeed, I have seen so little of you, that—in fact—why, really, I—I—do not—I do not know what to say.'

'Then at least you do not regard me with disdain!' exclaimed the Chevalier. 'You feel that perhaps you might yet come to feel that—it is one most difficult subject to find ze words to express ze so delicate feeling—but might I venture to dare for one moment to hope that you might yet come to regard me with no unfavourable eye?'

'Perhaps I might,' murmured Jemima, with some hesitation.

'Oh ze happiness—ze joy of ze little words!' exclaimed the Chevalier. 'I feel as if I could go down on ze knees, and take your dear hand in mine, and bathe it with ze tears of delight.' I feel as if I could leap in ze air for joy. I call ze very stones of ze pavement to witness—'

'If you do not take care, monsieur,' interrupted Jemima, 'you will make a leap in the air more than you want, and an acquaintance with the stones of the pavement sooner than you wish. Look where you are going now—there is a carriage coming right down upon you!'

'Oh, ze—so there is!—there—zat is all right now. Ze joy, my dear beloved, zat the little words gave to me drew me out of myself, and made me to forget anything—almost even ze very consciousness of my existence. It is ze most happiest moment of my life; if it were not zat we are so public just now, I would make ze little request of you to put your hand upon my heart to feel how he beats—he go with ze high pressure; and it is not to be wondered, for he is high with ze pressure of joy and love.'

'But really, monsieur, you use such extravagant language that I really do not know whether you are serious or sincere in your protestations, or merely in jest. Pardon me, but I am almost inclined to think that it may be only the way in which gentlemen of your nation are accustomed to address every lady into whose society they may be thrown.'

'My dear mademoiselle,' said the Chevalier, 'I pardon you; but I would pardon no other who made ze statement. Every word I speak is from ze very interior of ze core of mon heart. I have never addressed any lady in ze language which I have now to you; for ze most good reason, I had never before ze feeling which prompts him. Indeed, I did not use to have any very much great respect for ze sex which has the honour to claim you; but your charms have dissolved ze mist which clouded my vision, and I now see zat they are indeed the fair sex, and that all ze beauty and sweetness is concentrated in the—in the lovely being I have now ze felicity to address.'

'Oh, monsieur!'

'And that is not ze half—not ze hundredth part of what I feel. I have often regretted that I not study your language more; but never more than in the present tense, for ze words do not come to express ze quarter—ze ten hundredth part of ze quarter of my feelings!

'But your using such language, on so short an acquaintance as we have had'—

'Ze short acquaintance! It is not too short, by one long time, for me to have fallen into ze love of you. One love grow in an hour—in one minute; another grow like ze friendship, by ze little and little. I am ze quick one; and, besides, it is not one short acquaintance to me. I have from long ago in my mind ze style of what I could love, and it have become long familiar to me; and when I see you, I say to myself Zat is ze realise of ze image in my mind. And then I fall, on the spot, right into ze pit; and when I recover from the shock, I feel as if I have loved you for years.'

'If I could but believe you sincere, monsieur'—

'Believe me sincere!' exclaimed the Chevalier.

'You see the sun—he shines in ze sky; but it is not more true than that you shine in my heart—though it is now clouded by ze doubt you put on me. You see ze tree yonder—it is rooted fast in ze ground; but it is not more true than that your image is rooted in my breast. You tear up ze tree—it tears and breaks the ground; you are torn from my heart—it tears him up and breaks him, like ze field which have been ploughed with ze ploughshare, of— The dirty blackguard! H'm!—a—I mean ze little dirty boy! He have thrown one stone, and soil all mon trousseurs (if you will pardon the mention of ze article). But, my dear beloved Jemima! you will believe me now; and, tell me, you did not feel zat you could like me when you saw me the first time!'

'Oh really, monsieur! But, since you have been so candid with me, I will not deny that I did not—that I—I felt—that is—in fact—Oh really, monsieur, I do not know what to say. If I could but'—

The Chevalier, in terms as before, repeated his protestations of sincerity, calling upon the sun, the moon, the stars, and various other objects, animate and inanimate, to bear witness to the state of his feelings. His eloquence melted Jemima's doubts away. Gradually he extracted from her the acknowledgment that the impression made by him upon her heart had been more than a merely favourable one. The Chevalier pressed his suit; and at length, just as they were approaching Russell-square on their return, Jemima yielded a soft consent to go with him, if her papa and mamma should offer no objection—to go with him to the Continent as his wife.

CHAPTER IV.

On reaching home, Jemima withdrew to dress for dinner; and the Chevalier, having performed a short toilet, was shown into the drawing-room. There was no one there but Sir John, who lay dozing in a couch, and did not notice his entrance.

'Hem! ha!' said the Chevalier.

'Eh—who's that?' said Sir John, opening his eyes.

'Oh—ah!—yes—you're the foreign gentleman the girls met at Tony Walton's! Polly was saying she expected you to dinner. She wanted me to dress in honour of the occasion; but, the fact is, I couldn't be troubled. How d'ye do!'

'How do you do, my dear sir? I am delighted to make your acquaintance. Je trust you will excuse ze rather unceremonious entrée, and ze disturbance which I caused to your slumbers.'

'No manner of consequence.'

'A thousand thanks, my dear sir, for your forbearance,' said the Chevalier. 'I feel ze more gratitude zat I know myself ze disagreeableness of to be awakened out of ze sleep.'

'Don't mention it. I usually take a nap when I come home and find that dinner isn't ready; and that is every second day for one half of the week, and every day for the other half. I say—I'm rather hungry.'

'Then, my dear sir,' said the Chevalier, 'you and I will at least agree in one thing—I have a little of the sentiment—at least, what you call him!—a little of ze sensation to myself. You will pardon ze liberty I take in to trespass on your hospitality—it is by ze kind invitation of your estimable spouse that I do so. You will observe, my dear sir, zat I call in ze fulfilment of my little promise to your amiable daughters, I having seen a young friend of yours on ze Continent.'

'That's Harry Seaman. He's a scamp; let me hear no more about him.'

'Then I beg ze ten thousand pardon for ze mention of him,' said the Chevalier. 'You will observe, my dear sir, I merely met him what you call casually, and I have very small acquaintance of him. It is one most beautiful—one most magnificent mighty city this of yours, my dear sir!'

'Um! Rather!'

'Ze shops' are most magnificent splendid,' continued the Chevalier. 'It was truly said that you are one nation of shopkeepers. Ze shopkeepers are ze sinews, ze bones, ze muscle of your great and mighty nation. Je am proud to make ze acquaintance of one who belongs to that great fraternity—ze merchant princes of Great Britain, ze nation of shopkeepers.'

'I say, moonseer, or mister, or what'sever your name,' said Sir John, 'if you mean that as a compliment to me, I would like you to understand that we don't exactly keep a shop. That sort of thing may do with my wife, but I'm not exactly a fool.'

'Then, my dear sir,' said the Chevalier, 'I beg ze pardon; but I only spoke ze feelings of my heart, and I do not think that there was necessity for you to take him so high, my dear sir—indeed, I do think zat you are in ze debt of one little apology to me.'

'Um! Well, I'm sorry, and so forth. I daressay it's just the way you foreigners have. Here come my wife and the girls. Well, Jemmy, you're looking quite rosy.'

'Oh yes, papa,' said Jemima; 'it was delightful—the Chevalier was so kind.'

'Ah, indeed! A little dangerous, Jemmy, that sort of kindness from handsome young fellows with dark beards.'

'Oh, papa!'

'Well, I daressay, after all, he's not a bad sort of character. I say, Polly, is dinner ready? The fact is, I'm rather hungry.'

'Sir John!' exclaimed Lady Primrose, 'how can you?'

'How can I be hungry, my dear? Were you never hungry? Are you not hungry now, my dear?'

'Sir John Primrose!' Lady Primrose began; but just then dinner was announced.

Sir John, his arms folded across his back, marched at once away down stairs, stepping out to the tune of 'The British Grenadiers,' which he whistled loud and shrill—the Chevalier and the ladies being left to follow at leisure.

'You see we don't stand much on ceremony here,' said Sir John, as they entered the dining-room. He had seated himself at the table, and was already discussing a glass of wine. 'You needn't look so fierce, Polly! The Chevalier, you know, is to be a member of the family; so we needn't stand on ceremony with him.'

'None at all, my dear sir,' said the Chevalier; 'I do not like anything in ze shape of ze ceremony. No; I like ze simplicity of nature. And as to ze little word you say as to my becoming ze member of ze family, it is an honour which I much covet; but which I fear you will consider too much for one so humble individual as myself. A poor Chevalier of France is too humble an individual to aspire to be the connection of a prince—a merchant prince of ze Great Britain.'

'Um! not so bad. Well, we'll see. But I say, Polly, whatever deficiencies the son-in-law may have, inability to use his tongue isn't among the number. What's your opinion, Jemmy! for of course it's you, and not Jenny, that's the object of choice.'

'Oh, papa, how you do talk!' said Jemima.

Miss Primrose rose and left the room, banging the door after her.

'Hallo! what's the matter?' exclaimed Sir John. 'But never mind; let her go. Well, Jemmy, your opinion!'

'Sir John Primrose, I am astonished at you!' said Lady Primrose.

'Well, well, Polly! we'll drop the subject, since it's disagreeable. Some more soup, please; it's rather good to-day, which is about as rare and remarkable a circumstance, in its way, as a consignment to Primrose, Smith, & Co. of alligators' eggs from the North Pole might be supposed to be.'

The dinner proceeded almost in silence—Sir John being too much engaged with the various successions of viands to converse; Lady Primrose being too much filled with indignation at the freedom of Sir John's recent remarks. So that, beyond an occasional observation on the part of the Chevalier to Jemima, and Jemima's monosyllabic reply, no one spoke. At length, however, the repast was ended, and the ladies withdrew; Lady Primrose turning round, as she went out at the door, to give her husband a look of terrible indignation.

'I wish you would try some hock I have here,' said Sir John. 'Hobbes—yes, that's it—draw it, and fill the Chevalier's glass. I bought it a week or two ago at an auction. I rather flatter myself I got a bargain of it.'

'Je will be most delighted of to try it,' said the Chevalier. 'It is ze wine I am very fond of—next to ze claret.'

'Claret!—sour ale and vinegar! That will do, Hobbes; you needn't wait. A smart fellow that of mine,' he added, when the butler had gone, 'but rather inclined to help himself, when he gets the chance. However, I keep the keys of the cellar, and give him out his wine myself.'

'You are quite right, my dear sir,' said the Chevalier. 'There is ze saying that if you want to make ze man honest, you should believe him to be so; but there are ze exceptions, and I admire the manner in which you do.'

'Um! Well, what do you think of the wine?'

'It is very fine, indeed, said the Chevalier; 'ze flavour is delightful. He is Stenwein, is he not! But with regard to ze little remark you make with regard to ze vinegair, ze reason why I like ze claret is perhaps because I have been more accustomed to ze taste of him—it is ze wine of ze country of my adoption; but I love ze hock, because he is ze wine of my native land.'

'Um! What do you think the wine may be worth?'

'Worth! It is ze most beautiful wine—ze most delicious—ze most ambrosial—worth one hundred and fifty franc ze per dozen.'

'What do you say to sixty-five shillings? Rather a bargain—eh?'

'Sixty-five shilling—that is—let me see—about eighty franc. One most wonderful—most extraordinaire bargain! See what it is to be one merchant! Now, I to go to buy this wine, he would have cost me ze one hundred and eighty—ze two hundred franc. Now, my dear sir, you will allow me to propose zat we drink ze little toast in ze most excellent wine—Those lights of ze world, those cheerers of our hearts and our hearths, those sweet and lovely beings—ze ladies; and loveliest among ze lovely, ze two sweet daughters of Le Chevalier Primrose, and his sweet spouse.'

'Um! not so bad! Polly's well enough in her way, no doubt; but—however, we'll drink the toast, "The ladies!" Capital wine that! the more I take of it I like it the better.'

'Pardon me, my dear sir,' said the Chevalier, after an interval, during which he fidgetted considerably in his chair, and kept raising his glass half-way to his lips, and setting it down again; 'but, speaking of ze ladies and your lovely daughters, you were good enough to make ze little hint, zat of ze—of ze son-in-law, and I wish particularly to speak to you regarding of ze same. I may not again have ze opportunity of to do so, and you will pardon me if I avail myself of ze present occasion. Well then, my dear sir, I have obtained ze soft acknowledgment from your daughter zat I am—zat she is—zat she consider me not disagreeable—zat she consider me—zat—you comparehend! And I, from ze moment I behold her, have entertained ze emotion to her. Mademoiselle Primrose, sir, is'—

'Um! it's Jenny is it! We'll send for her, and see what she's got to say about it.' He rose, and rang the bell. A servant entered. 'Tell Jen—tell Miss Primrose to come here.'

The servant withdrew, and shortly returned with the intimation that Miss Primrose sent her compliments to Sir John, but begged to decline the invitation.

'Um! Well, it doesn't matter. But I wonder you hit on her. Jemima is incomparably the better of the two.'

'Jemima!' said the Chevalier. 'My dear sir, it is Jemima—I believe your favourite child, is she not? I—I have entertained ze warmest feelings towards her since I have seen her; and, my dear sir—In short, I wish to make her to me to be ze wife, and to take her with me to ze Continent. She is ze mistress of mon heart. I wish to make her ze mistress of mine estate and mine household.'

'Eh!—ah!—oh! Sharp work, rather! Sharp work, with a vengeance! Take her with you to the Continent! Well, by Jove!—I say, I'm not going to part with her.'

'My dear sir,' said the Chevalier, 'you do not—why, consider, my dear sir, ze happiness of your child; for if, as I believe, and as she have told me, she have—she have ze little attachment to me—ze little love'—

'Love! Fiddlestick!'

'It is no fiddlestick, my dear sir,' said the Chevalier, solemnly. 'Consider, my dear sir. Suppose zat your child have ze—have ze feeling to me, think of ze trial it would be to her. And then, my dear sir, oh consider for one little moment ze misery, ze wretchedness, ze despair you would make to me. Of course, I am but little to you; but then, oh my dear sir, I am ze human being—I am ze fellow-creature. You would render me ze most miserable of beings for ze whole rest of my existence; though that would be but for one little time, for I would sink into ze early grave. And then, your child—ze sweet Jemima—'

'Um! Well!'

'Yes, my dear sir, ze sweet Jemima—although it may have a little ze flavour of vanity in me to say that she would feel the loss of so humble individual as myself—yet, my dear sir, she must feel him. Of course, neither you nor I can know by ze experience in our own breast, ze great power of the love of woman; but I have heard of them to become the victims of madness in consequence. And you, my dear sir, you would have ze feeling of having been ze cause of all ze misery, which would embitter the whole rest of your life. Then, my dear sir, you have ze other daughter still left.'

'Jenny! What's she good for!'

'But, my dear sir, it is against ze whole course of nature, that ze parent should keep ze child all to himself when she come to the years of ze discretion. Ze feelings and affections have been implanted for ze wise ends in ze bosom of ze human breast; and it is wrong for any one to take upon himself to interfere with them. Love is one sacred feeling, and he ought not to be trifled with.'

'All very fine, no doubt. Ay, ay!—I see. It's all mapped out. It's no earthly use trying to go against the stream. I interfered once before, and there has been a sermon preached from that text every day since.

Polly is mad for it, and we'll never hear the end of it, if—Um! Well, we'll see about it; I'll see what she says.' There were inquiries to be made, and so forth.

The Chevalier expressed his perfect acquiescence in the propriety of making such inquiries, and his willingness to afford any facilities which lay in his power for instituting them; having no doubt, he said, that he (Sir John) would find every particular to his entire satisfaction. At length, after some further consultation, in which the Chevalier administered a good deal of judicious flattery, and dwelt with some detail on his station and connection, Sir John half agreed that if he should find his daughter's sentiments as the Chevalier had hinted, 'he should offer no serious objections to their union. Sir John, however, becoming unusually grave, and showing the train in which his thoughts were running in an occasional broken allusion to his thus parting with Jemima, the Chevalier, after some apparent deliberation, magnanimously proclaimed it as his intention, should all be satisfactorily arranged, to reside for some considerable part of the year in the British metropolis. 'Indeed,' he said, 'it was the very thing he was himself to propose; for London was ze most delightful place in ze whole of ze world—in ze whole of ze universe in which to dwell or reside. In fact, he would not say but zat he might have choose to reside there all ze year; but that his estate on ze Continent would necessarily require his presence for ze space of six months of ze year; for there was nothing like one man to look after his own affairs.'

They joined the ladies in the drawing-room, where the Chevalier made himself extremely agreeable. He admired, almost to ecstacy, the scenes from the Theatre della Scalla, of Milan; and exhibited almost uncontrollable delight at the Indian curiosities of which Sir John was so proud. He discussed poetry and romance with Lady Primrose. He held the Berlin wool for Miss Primrose, while she wound it into a ball. He played one of Beethoven's sonatas on the piano, and sang an English duet with Jemima. Throughout the evening, an attentive observer might have remarked that Sir John, from time to time, regarded him attentively—for what purpose, or with what sentiments, it was difficult to say. At a somewhat late hour, he took leave; having, by the grace of his person and bearing, fairly won his way into every heart—even that of the shrewd Sir John.

(To be continued.)

'IN THE BEGINNING.'

AMONG the many problems connected with humanity, are two, from the consideration of which we are apt to shrink, as much from the impossibility of arriving at a logical conclusion on the data with which we are furnished, as from the awe they naturally inspire. Though all know that the last act of life must be death, and hope at last to understand eternity in heaven; these words, death and heaven, convey to us only an indefinite idea—a phantom which we hardly dare to look upon. Both, it is true, are frequently in our thoughts, if not on our lips—the one as the great sign of God's wrath—the other as the great object of life; but the result is too often to give an importance to the mere fact of death—which lies only in its consequences—while that great prize for which we profess to strive remains vague and undefined.

The animal fear of death—setting aside the parting from all we love in this world—the fear of subsequent summing up and judgment of our lives—is rare among men; and arises, probably, from a misconception of what is comprised in death, confounding with it the bodily decay by which it is often preceded; for death is not a thing, but a period—a mere negative—the end of life in this world, and the commencement, in some form or other, of life in the next. It is singular, too, that those who have been permitted to return from the portals of this mystery, represent insensibility as being preceded by most pleasurable sensations—indeed, the present writer remembers, dreamily and with reverence, the visions of four days, during which it was doubtful to those around on which side of the border he stood. The real fear is the certainty of present loss—the dear friends left behind—the pleasures and beauties we have hitherto undervalued—the pomp of the world standing out in undreamed of splendour; contrasted with an uncertain future—an entrance, once for all, to an eternity of joy or woe, alike beyond our comprehension; and it is remarkable that, while preachers of all ages have not scrupled to depict the agonies of a material hell, founded on data slight as obscure, very few will draw for us any but an utterly passive heaven. Is it because, in human nature, fear is so much stronger than hope, we are to be driven to heaven, only to escape from a hell a degree more terrible?

In every-day life, it is not sufficient to point out to a man that he lives in a course of misery, which must daily become greater and greater. He very likely knows it only too well; but he will naturally ask, What am I to do? Can you offer me something better? To such a one we should hardly reply, with hope of success—Only change your mode of life, root up old habits and affections, desert the friends of your youth, cast from you the results of years of labour, and some good, I cannot tell you what, will befall you. It would be easy, however, to hold out hope of a reward which he could not analyse minutely, though he could well see its value must be very great.

The former is what some men would have us think has been done with regard to our future state; the latter what the wisdom of the Almighty has seen fit to do. But though such a man might be ignorant of the exact nature of the promised reward, it would none the less form the basis of constant speculation during his time of probation. While he would doubtless congratulate himself on his escape from danger, this feeling would be subordinate to the eagerness with which he would picture to himself the happiness in store for him; and his zeal would be greatly abated were we to prevent his thoughts from endeavouring to penetrate the mystery, or lead him to suppose the reward to be one for which he felt himself utterly unfitted. Nevertheless some, not content with passing over the subject, present us with a heaven which, so far as we can see, would have little or no attraction for us—bearing a close resemblance to the Elysian fields, where praise and adoration, without service, continue for ever. This everything in human nature and much in the Bible contradicts.

Our English version of the Old Testament and the Gospel of Saint John—that treasury of gracious words spoken to the beloved disciple—commence with the words 'In the beginning'—words more suggestive and incomprehensible to our finite senses, than many texts which are the subject of constant controversy. What are the doctrines of transubstantiation or consubstantiation to us—of regeneration or simple pardon in baptism—so long as we obey the plain commandments, taking the Lord's Supper 'in remembrance' of Him, and baptising in the name of the Trinity; compared with what was 'In the beginning' and will be for ever? It is very wonderful to think of the day—or day of years, if you will—when 'the Spirit of God moved on the face of the waters'—when that mysterious light, produced by the simple 'Fiat Lux,' unreflected by sun, moon, or stars, illuminated the first day—of the leviathan and megatherium—the countless living creatures roaming over land and sea in that great wilderness beyond the holy garden. But what was before this Old Testament beginning? What was the nature of that kingdom which was, and is, and ever shall be? Of this we can form but a very imperfect idea, though some glimpses have been mercifully afforded us, on which various theories have been founded. Of these I shall touch on two, viz.—That our future life will have some affinity with that intended for, and to some extent enjoyed by, Adam and Eve, and with the state of happy servitude in which the angels of God wait upon His will; with this curious exception, that while we believe some angels to have fallen from their glorious privileges, our future is to be everlasting bliss or unfailing agony.

How far our future state may resemble that of our first parents in Eden, we cannot determine; but it must, in some respects, be similar—such as innocence, the love and apparent presence of the Almighty, communion with Him, &c. We are to rise in 'our own bodies,' glorified by the bounty of God. What more glorious form can be given us than the image of God? The comfort contained in these words 'our own bodies,' is to me beyond expression; for we may surely hope to recognise each other—preserving a certain amount of individuality, subdued by a love of God to which we have never attained on earth. We may hope to meet those who are now so dear to us—those of whom we can as yet hardly bear to think in our selfish grief. We shall then know who have been our true friends, helping us upwards. Fathers will meet again children whose loss has perhaps been their salvation—mothers receive the blessing of those whom they brought early to the House of God; and then, then only, shall we learn how many thorns we have spread in each other's paths, and receive (surely not the least of blessings) the forgiveness of many for wrongs our weakness or passions have inflicted. On this last supposition I like to dwell. Looking back on a life more varied than many, it is obvious to me that, in some cases at least, I have been a stumbling-block, and done palpable injury. Some of these people are far away; some I know not; one, at least, is at rest. Their forgiveness can never be sought on earth; but I pray the time may come when, in the fulness of joy, all may be forgiven. How this may be I know not; but it must be in some form or other, for without it peace would be impossible, and the torments of hell more bitter.

Again, like our first parents, we are to hold converse with the Almighty. No record is vouchsafed us of any such conversation, from the time when God blessed Adam and Eve, giving them their appointed task, till the guilty pair hid themselves with shame; but it was probably of frequent occurrence; nor was this favour entirely withdrawn after the fall, nor indeed till a much later date. Here, however, some think the comparison ends. There is a heaven of adoration without service, amounting almost to the Hindoo theory of infinitesimal dispersion and re-absorption into the divinity; but it must be observed that not only were the first words of blessing to Adam accompanied by a demand for definite service, but the very angels, whose bliss we hope to share, are charged with the fulfilment of His commandments.

Here again, when we try to look back to the beginning (to beginning), we are lost in conjecture. How were these ministers of God employed? To whom were their messages addressed? What were their tasks before what we call the creation (as if the creative power were absorbed in our little world) took place? Who were these sons of God who looked on the daughters of man? All is darkness. We only know that there is a race of beings superior to ourselves, living in that direct communion with God to which we hope to attain, who serve day and night before Him, hiding their faces before his supreme purity and glory, who, armed with his authority, have repeatedly guided the footsteps of man in the true path; and others who, by His permission for His own good ends, wage eternal war against our souls, hoping to induce us eventually to share their anguish. Considering how important a part the angels have taken in the history of the world, we think of them, and study what accounts we have of their doings, too little. This is probably why we never see a modern representation of an angel which will bear comparison with the products of ancient art, the result of profound and reverential thought; and here we may notice the objection which has been raised to the delineation of angels in an idealised human form as profane. As, however, man was created in the image of God, how is it irreverent so to represent His messengers, not to mention the fact of their having been repeatedly mistaken for human beings by those to whom they were sent? Returning to the question of simple adoration, or the combination of service with adoration in heaven, let us give our attention to two scenes which appeal powerfully to our human feelings. The first is in the book of Job. 'Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them; and the Lord said unto Satan Whence comest thou?' In the mind's eye we may see millions of angels presenting themselves, prepared to answer the same question, ready to give an account of all they have seen and done; of the sin and wickedness over which they have wept, the misery they have witnessed, the just men they have approved, and the repentant sinners over whom they have sung joyful hallelujahs. We may see their bright brows bowed down before 'the Ancient of days' as they stand in awe before the fiery throne, patiently awaiting His commands, each hoping to find favour in His sight, to be allowed to serve Him in all his strength. We can imagine the indignation and astonishment of the assembly, when Satan accused Job before the Lord; the anxiety with which they watched his temptation, and their rejoicings when 'the Lord turned the captivity of Job.' All this we can fancy and sympathise with; but it would be more difficult to imagine this concourse of angels sitting in mute and bewildered adoration at the steps of the throne—Satan alone active, taunting the Almighty with the imperfection of his servant.

Again, the entire 'Revelation of Saint John'—or, to speak more correctly, to Saint John—treats of an active heaven. No portion of it more so than that passage, so grand in its simplicity—'And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon: and the dragon fought and his angels.' Who cannot picture to himself this Michael—'Princeps,' 'Coadjutor,' 'Captain of the host of heaven,' as he is styled in the sister Church—leading his army of pure spirits against the dragon, sure of his cause, sure of the help of Him for whom he fights, his only care to do His will thoroughly? Nor does this activity imply the least pride or self-trust; for, when the victory was won, there was heard 'A loud voice, saying in heaven, now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of His Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down (not we have cast down—not we have brought this salvation), which accused them before our God day and night.' Here, again, is shown the present activity of heaven—the Evil One never ceases to accuse us, day and night. Does his jarring voice break in upon a lotos-eater's heaven? Is it only objected to, as disturbing its peaceful adoration? Not at all, but because he constantly accuses men before God—men, whom the angels call 'our brethren,' who almost call the angels myths.

It may be said all this is an allegory. Granting the allegory, the fact remains that active opposition is kept up between the angels of God and the dragon. They are represented not only engaged in adoration, but wrestling valiantly with the evil spirits—not merely looking with pity on our strife, but actually contending with our enemies. Should it be objected that there will be no world, no strife—and even if there were, heaven is the place where ‘the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest’—I would reply: On the one hand, we know not what new combination it may please God to create—that the full service of God must be perfect rest and happiness to the soul; on the other, that as the creation of the angels is not recorded as coeval with our own, we may presume them to have been created for a purpose which they fulfilled from the beginning (ex ævo); and to this we may very probably both revert, but that a state of inactivity is no more compatible with such accounts as we have of them, than with our own feelings and hopes.

For myself, I like to think of these angels praying, weeping, fighting for us; to read of them standing in the way, now with stern words of warning, now with joyful tidings; of the ministering in the wilderness and the strengthening angel of Gethsemane, (who was that angel who could strengthen the Son of God?) and those two who sat in silent joy on the tomb of our Lord; each, too, with their distinctive characters—Raphael, the mild and gentle—Uriel, standing in the sun, crying in a loud voice through the heavens; Gabriel, the messenger of glad tidings, standing in the presence of the Lord; and Michael, captain of the host, the warrior of God.

The present writer does not pretend to produce an exhaustive essay on a subject not to be lightly handled or dogmatically treated; nor have these thoughts been put forward without much fear of any approach to profanity. It has not been his object to force his ideas, but rather by suggestion to lead others to think for themselves what that heaven is for which we strive; to which the gates of death are to lead the just; and how far we can form any idea of that holy kingdom which the beginning found existing, and the end will leave triumphant.

THE PAST AND GONE.

A PALE face, like a rising star,
In clouds of golden hair—
A voice of many a liquid bar,
Comes round my spirit from afar,
When bow'd by toil and care,
Back from the past and gone!

A golden eve of harvest-time,
A glow on the mountain side,
With the blue and green of Erin's clime,
When I was young and in my prime,
And the world was fair and wide,
Comes from the past and gone!

Sweet lips that murmur'd fond farewells;
Dark eyes that swam in tears;
Deep sighs that broke like funeral knells;
Last looks that chased like haunting spells
The flight of after years,
Come from the past and gone!

TOM ELLIOTT.

THE LEGEND OF KINNAIRD.

THE researches of recent writers, and particularly of the celebrated author of the ‘Waverley Novels,’ have brought to the knowledge of the Sassenach many points in the character of the Highlanders which had hitherto been either entirely unknown or but imperfectly understood. The pristine Highlander seems to have been a man with many virtues and not a few vices; and it was generally believed, among the inhabitants of the lower regions of the country, that the latter considerably outnumbered the former. Posterity, however, as not unfrequently occurs in similar cases, gaining, by more familiar intercourse, a more favourable estimate of the Highland character, has reversed that decision. The Highlanders, too, for the same reason, have considerably modified their idea of the Saxons; and, by personal intercourse with that once hated race, have rubbed off many of the salient points of their own character. Among the peculiarities of the Highlander of former days, which this process has caused to disappear, three may be instanced as deserving of notice. These are—his loyalty to his chief, his love of mountain dew, and his superstition. Regarding the first two of these, a few words must at present be sufficient. His loyalty to his chief, while it led him to commit many acts of cold-blooded cruelty, and while it often kindled the blaze of civil warfare over whole districts of the Highlands, at the same time rendered him more amenable to authority than he otherwise would have been, and kept him attached to his own particular ‘country’ and clan, thus partially remedying the evils which it caused. His drunkenness, if it indeed deserves that epithet, cannot be so easily defended. All that can be said on its behalf may be given in the words of Sir John Falstaff:—‘If sack and sugar be a fault, God help the wicked!’

In regard to the superstition of the Highlanders, we cannot at present enter further into the subject, than merely to refer to their belief in that imaginary class of beings known as fairies, and to give a rather remarkable legend connected with that species of superstition. The fairies of the Highlanders, or, as they themselves call them, the ‘Daoine Shith or Shi,’ or the ‘Daoine Matha’ (men of peace, or good men) differ in many essential particulars from the fairies of the English or any other people. Dr. Graham, in his ‘Sketches,’ describing the character of these Daoine Shi, says that they, ‘although not absolutely malevolent, are believed to be a peevish, repining race of beings, who, possessing themselves but a scanty portion of happiness, are supposed to envy mankind their more complete and substantial enjoyments. They are supposed to enjoy, in their subterraneous recesses, a sort of shadowy happiness, a tinsel grandeur, which, however, they would willingly exchange for the more solid joys of mortals.’ They were supposed to carry off mortals, especially women and infants, to their subterranean abodes; and even cases are known, in Highland lore, of stout ‘able-bodied men’ being carried off to Fairyland. While in the company of the fairies, those who were unfortunate enough to have to endure this strange species of captivity, could mix among ordinary mortals—themselves all the while invisible—could observe all their actions, but were unable to establish any communication with them. 'The Shi'ichs, it is still believed, have a great propensity for attending funerals and weddings, and other public entertainments, and even fairs. They have an object in this: for it is believed that though invisible to mortal eyes, they are busily employed in carrying away the substantial articles and provisions which are exhibited, in the place of which they substitute shadowy forms, having the appearance of the things so purloined. And so strong was the belief in this mythology, even till a recent period, that some persons are old enough to remember that some individuals would not eat anything presented on the occasions alluded to, as unsubstantial and hurtful.* Another peculiarity of these 'peaceful men' was that they were always dressed in green, and were very indignant when any mortal took the liberty of wearing this colour. Claverhouse, it is said, wore a coat of this hue at the battle of Killiecrankie; and his fate on this occasion has been ascribed by superstitious tradition to the offence taken by the fairies. But it is needless to dwell longer upon the characteristics of the Daoine Shi, as the following legend, which we fear we have been keeping too long from the reader, will explain their general nature.

Tradition ascribes the scene of the events which we intend to relate to a hamlet named Kinnaird, somewhere in Scotland. There are, however, about half-a-dozen villages of this name scattered throughout the Highlands, and we have never learned to which of these the honour is really due, if, indeed, it is due to any of them. Leaving this question, which is of small importance, to the decision of those who take more interest in the subject than ourselves, we may premise that there lived in the traditional Kinnaird, we do not know how many years ago, a young Highlander, named Hamish Macgregor. This Hamish was about twenty years of age when the events took place which commemorate his name; and at this early period of life he had paid his addresses to a young 'Highland girl,' whose shower of beauty had entirely destroyed his happiness. Hamish was successful, for he was a bold, free, and manly youth—strong and well made—in short, the very beau-ideal of a youthful Highlander. But early marriages were discountenanced in the Highlands at that time, whatever the case may be now; and Hamish Macgregor and Janet M'Intyre found many obstacles in the way of their immediate union. Hamish was therefore obliged to forego the prospect of an early marriage, for he had not yet amassed wealth enough to satisfy the requirements of a prudent Highland custom, which compelled candidates for matrimony to be possessed of a competent portion of goods. He hoped, however, to be able in a few years to attain this necessary wealth; and, in the meantime, the youthful pair contented themselves with exchanging vows of eternal fidelity and love.

Time passed on wearily enough with Hamish Macgregor; but the prospect of his marriage, with the visions of conjugal felicity which were ever present to his mind, kept him from despairing of the final issue. When alone, the young Highlander pondered over his present unhappy condition, and forgot every other topic in picturing to himself the joys of his blithe bridal. It was in this state of mind that the young man set out on a journey to a hamlet at some distance, on business which is not particularly described. His way lay through a forest of large fir trees, in the midst of which was situated a small round eminence, called 'The Fairies' Knowe,' celebrated among the common people as a seat of the men of peace. Hamish wandered on through the depths of the forest, engaged, as usual, in his pleasant anticipations; but, on approaching the Fairy Knowe, he was awakened from his reverie by a sight to which his eyes had rather been unaccustomed. At the Fairy Knowe he beheld a number of men dressed out in complete suits of green, and evincing, by their general appearance, that they did not belong to the common race of mortals. Hamish was struck with surprise and consternation; for, with all the bravery, he had inherited a full share of the superstition of his countrymen. His imagination instantly suggested to him that these personages were the dreaded men of peace; and their presence on this occasion, he considered, boded no good to his journey. To turn back was out of the question, for it would have been more dangerous than to go forward; and Hamish stood still, determined not to return home, and unwilling to proceed on his way through the midst of the fairy band. He was reflecting on a middle course—which, by leading him round a circuitous path, would enable him to prosecute his journey without interfering with the pastimes of the Daoine Shi—when he heard, for he was not many yards distant from the knowe, one of the men call upon some individual, probably a brother of the order, to fetch him a horse. Great as was the Highlander's surprise on beholding the band of the Daoine Shi assembled in his path, it was still greater when he witnessed the imperial commands of the speaker so mysteriously obeyed. In the twinkling of an eye, the fairy company was increased by the addition of a noble steed, fully caparisoned, and prancing with fretful impatience, as if he wished to contest with the wind its well known swiftness of locomotion.

'Peughan,' said another fairy, 'bring me my horse!' Again, on the mysterious words being pronounced, the command was obeyed, and another steed was revealed to the astonished eyes of Hamish Macgregor. A third fairy repeated the invocation, and a third horse was added to the cavalry of the fairies. Hamish, we have said, was a bold youth, although by no means free from the fetters of ancient

* Browne's History of the Highlands. Vol. I. p. 111.

Gaelic superstition; and on the present occasion, after the first feeling of consternation had subsided, he recovered his coolness so far as to approach within a few yards of the wonderful knowe. He beheld, with diminished surprise but increased interest, the process of supplying the men of peace with their horses; and, before the first dozen of the fairies had been served, he had impressed upon his memory the words which seemed so powerful. He wondered whether they would have the same effect in his mouth, that they had when pronounced by the good men; and determined, when the last of the peaceful company had obtained his steed, to try the experiment. Accordingly, after the last of the fairies had repeated the invocation to 'Peughan' to fetch his steed, and when the whole cavalcade had mounted their horses and ridden off, Hamish Macgregor advanced to the Fairy Knowe; and, laying his hand upon his skene dhu, repeated, in a clear voice, 'Peughan, bring me my horse!' He had scarcely uttered the words, when a handsome courser stood before him, saddled and bridled, and in every way equipped for the journey. Hamish thought once on Janet M'Intyre; but was cut short by the neighing of his horse—eager, apparently, to join the rapidly retiring company of fairies. Hamish, therefore, without further hesitation, seized the bridle-rein and 'clomb to the saddle'; in which he was scarcely seated when the impatient animal dashed forward with headlong speed, and in a few seconds horseman and horse had joined the merry corps of the peaceful men. Macgregor, totally unacquainted with horsemanship, had flung himself flat on the animal's neck and shoulders, holding by its ample mane with desperate pertinacity. Perceiving that he had joined the 'misbegotten knaves in Kendal green,' he hoped for a diminution of the extraordinary rate of speed at which he had been carried along; but, on his muttering some remonstrance to that effect, he was merely laughed at by his companions.

'Thou art an excellent horseman, friend,' said one of the fairies; 'and a grievous sin it would be to let thy steed linger on his way to Fairyland. Strike out, beast!' he continued, slightly touching the animal with his forefinger; 'strike out, and on to Fairyland!'

The unfortunate Highlandman was hurried along with redoubled speed; the horses flew rather than ran; and Hamish—shaken, jolted, and bruised—attempted to throw himself from the steed. But this he soon found was impossible. Despite all his efforts, he remained firmly fixed on the back of the ungovernable animal. He was fairly bound for the celebrated journey to Fairyland, of which he had heard so much; and he now repented bitterly of his thoughtless temerity. He shut his eyes in despair, and opened them a moment after, to find that he was surrounded by complete darkness. His course now seemed to be through waters deep and turbulent, if he might judge from the noise of the waves and the struggling of his horse; and a drop of the fluid falling upon his hand, seemed to intimate that he was in the middle of a sea of blood! In short, his journey is said to have been the same as that of Thomas the Rhymer on a similar occasion; and the lines describing the course of the latter may be used, instead of a more lengthened prose account of our own:—

'Oh, they rade on, and farther on,
And they waded through rivers aboon the knee;
And they saw neither sun nor moon,
But they heard the roaring o' the sea.
It was mirk, mirk night, and there was nae stirn light,
And they waded through red blude aboon the knee;
For a' the blude that's shed on earth
Rins through the springs o' that countrie!'

At last, Hamish Macgregor arrived in Fairyland, tired and dispirited after his remarkable ride. On alighting from his horse, he was conducted, by the leader of the fairies, to what appeared to be a splendid palace, adorned with gold and silver, and far exceeding in splendour all that Hamish had ever seen. Food of the most costly description was placed in silver plate, and drinks of the most tempting appearance were served up in cups of gold. Macgregor had witnessed too many wonderful things that day to be greatly surprised at the magnificent feast that was prepared for him; and he recollected the ancient superstition, which maintained that all this splendour was only imaginary; that the magnificent palace was but a rude cavern; that the costly vessels were rude and worthless; and that the tempting dishes were mere airy phantoms. He ate, however, at the command of the fairy leader and the call of his own appetite; and soon forgot, in the abundance of the good men's cheer, its want of substance. After his meal, he was introduced to the women of the fairies, whom tradition reports to be far superior in beauty to the 'daughters of men.' They lavished their blandishments with the utmost prodigality upon the mortal stranger who had taken up his abode with them; but Hamish, steadfast in his devotion to his mistress, was proof against the charms of the fairies.

By-and-by, Hamish was allowed to accompany his new friends in some of their expeditions. The first of these in which he took part revealed to him the extraordinary fact, that his subterranean abode was situated exactly under the Fairy Knowe, where he had first seen the Daoine Shi'. He soon found that it was impossible to escape from the hands of the fairies; and, submitting to his fate with all the goodwill of which he was capable, he entered into the various frolics which the fairies designed. He accompanied them to fairs; and none was more active than he in purloining the hucksters' wares, and leaving in their place showy and unsubstantial forms from Fairyland. He delighted in playing tricks upon persons with whom he had been acquainted; and enjoyed the pranks which the fairies played, at weddings and public entertainments, with all the zest of a true man of peace. But while he thus became a very good fairy in these respects, he could never be seduced from his allegiance to Janet Mac-Intyre.

Hamish's sudden disappearance struck with consternation the inhabitants of the district of Kinnaird. Some maintained that he had destroyed himself in a fit of despair—some that he had been beset by his enemies and slain—others that he had run off to another part of the country—while a few suggested that he might have gone to Fairyland. Janet Mac-Intyre, when applied to, could give no intimation as to his whereabouts; and the general opinion, in which Janet was obliged to coincide, was that he had fled to some other 'country'—reason unknown. Janet—who at first lamented, multis lachrymis, the disappearance of her Hamish—began to consider that he had treated her very shabbily in not informing her of his intended journey. She ceased to lament his absence or to cherish his memory; and when his name was referred to in her presence, she invariably bestowed upon it the pith of a Highland malediction. This she did, probably, to let it be more publicly known than it would otherwise have been, that she was once more in the market, and ready to treat with any matrimonial candidate who sought her favour. From the numerous wooers of all descriptions who sought her hand, the fair Janet selected as the most proper a young man named Æneas MacBeth. The selection was approved of by her own family, as well as MacBeth's; and the celebration of the nuptials was appointed to take place on the anniversary of Hamish's disappearance.

Meanwhile, Hamish remained in the company of the fairies—happy enough, except when he thought of the 'girl he had left behind him.' He still accompanied the Daoine Shi' to fairs and weddings; and beheld, without himself being visible to mortal eyes, the transactions of his former friends and neighbours. In this manner, he lived nearly a year with the Daoine Shi', and still there was no appearance of his speedy return to his native district. While, thinking of this one day, Hamish was accosted by the fairy, Peughan—who, it will be remembered, was the invisible hostler of the Daoine Shi', when Hamish first became acquainted with them at the Fairy Knowe.

'Hamish,' said Peughan, 'how long is it since we have been at a wedding?'

'Not for a long time, Master Peughan,' returned Hamish; 'the old miser bachelor's was the last, methinks, at which we were present.'

'Well, we are going to another this very day, Master Hamish,' said the fairy; 'the invitations have been given to all the country for three miles around; but although the Daoine Shi' were not asked, they, too, will be there. O Hamish! what loads of ham and beef, and butter and cheese, and malt and usquebaugh have been brought to Kinnaird—'

'To Kinnaird, saidst thou?' interrupted Hamish. 'And who, I pray thee, are to be married there?'

'Nay, I know not, Hamish,' replied Peughan; 'it may be thy old love for all I know; but thou shalt go with us and see for thyself. Little of the good ham and beef shall the bridegroom eat; I shall stuff his stomach with the airy food of Fairyland.'

So saying, Peughan ran off to form a party of the Daoine Shi' to attend the wedding that evening at Kinnaird, and left poor Hamish to his own anxious meditations.

By this time the guests had begun to assemble, in considerable numbers, at the residence of the bride and bridegroom, where, according to the Highland custom, separate dinners were provided for the friends of either party concerned in the approaching solemnity. Peughan and his fairies, along with Hamish, selected the table of the bridegroom, as the cheer was more abundant; and Peughan was soon busy in effecting the metamorphosis of the substantial dishes that loaded the table. Hamish, who soon discovered that the bride was no other than his own perjured Janet M'Intyre, would have given the world to be able, like the spectre of Alonzo the Brave, to approach the 'unfaithful fair,' and

'Tax her with perjury, claim her as bride.'

This, however, Hamish was unable to do, and he was obliged to sit still under the watchful eye of Peughan, and hide from the fairy's mockery his contending emotions. At this moment the bridegroom sneezed, and Hamish, as the custom was, immediately cried 'God bless you!'

'Hamish!' said Peughan, sternly, 'repeat not these words again, or thou shalt dearly rue thy rashness. Beware!'

The other fairies scowled on Hamish, and, by various threatening words and gestures, commanded him to be silent. After a short interval, the bridegroom sneezed once more, and Hamish, without hesitation, again repeated his benediction, 'God bless you!'

'Rash mortal!' cried the fairy, with a savage scowl; 'if thou darrest to repeat these words again, they shall be thy last. Keep thy tongue silent, thou dog of a mortal, else we will end at once thy rashness and thy life! Once more, I say, beware!'

A third time the happy Æneas MacBeth sneezed, and the nasal sound rung through the room, as Hamish afterwards said, 'like the blast of a trumpet.'

'God bless you!' said Hamish a third time, though with some hesitation; and scarcely had the words crossed his lips, when Peughan and the other fairies seized him by the shoulders and feet and hurried him out of the room.

'To the Black Hill with him,' cried Peughan; 'cast him from its summit, and give him not time even to repent of his rashness!'

Hamish shuddered at the thought of being 'hurled headlong' from the summit of the Black Hill, to which he was never in his youth able to climb, and begged in vain to be punished with a less terrible death. But the fairies were relentless, and in a short time Hamish found himself on the highest point of a rocky precipice, where few of the most adventurous mortals had ever been before. He had scarcely time to survey his position, when Peughan, seizing him from behind, threw him over the rock, the height of which was little short of a hundred feet. The feelings of Hamish during the short space of time that elapsed in his precipitous journey from the top to the bottom of the Black Hill are unknown to us, and probably were so to himself. Returning consciousness found him lying at the bottom of the Tarpeian Rock, from which he had been hurled, sorely bruised indeed, but—mirabile dictu!—able to rise and walk about! He first directed his steps to the village of Kinnaird, where he arrived in time to behold the clergyman on his way, accompanied by a large body of people, to tie the nuptial knot. Presuming on his invisibility, Hamish attempted to join the procession that accompanied the clergyman; but the shout of surprise and recognition which greeted him was the first proof that he was no longer under the power of the fairies.

The marriage of Æneas MacBeth and Janet MacIntyre was postponed as soon as the return of Hamish was made known. Hamish at first was disposed to be angry with Janet for betraying her troth; she pleaded the belief which the people entertained in his death; and, in Horace and Lydia fashion, the Highland lovers became reconciled. The 'pious Æneas' generously waved his claims; and Hamish, now totally free from the power of Peughan and his fairies, attained the utmost object of his wishes before the expiry of another year.

Such is the curious legendary tale which not many years ago enjoyed undisputed credence in many parts of the Highlands of Scotland. E. R.

THE LEGEND OF HAROLD'S POOL.

CALMLY walk'd she by the water—

Walk'd young Harold's English love;

Gently walk'd she by the water,

With a falcon on her glove.

Train'd she had been, though born lowly,

For a lady's high estate;

Train'd she had been, but not wholly

For the wife of one so great.

Yet, when wild birds sweetly caroll'd

In the golden summer time,

She had kiss'd the lips of Harold

In the warmer English clime.

And she left her kinsfolk sadly—

Mothers, sisters, every one;

Yet she left them very gladly,

To have him, and him alone.

And he bore her to the ocean;

And they sail'd for many days,

Till they saw the placid motion

Of the wavelets in the bays.

And he left his kinsmen gladly—

Father, brother, every one;

Left his kinsmen very gladly,

To have her, and her alone.

Lofty pine trees then he level'd,
And a shelter'd house built he;
With his own right hand he bevel'd
Winding pathways to the sea.

Happy was the English maiden,
Living in the northern land.
Every evening, richly laden,
Saw them walking hand-in-hand

On the beach, the while the water
Laugh'd in gladness from the sea—
Every crystal wave that sought her
Sang her songs of minstrelsy.

Yet at times a tinge of sorrow
Dimm'd the violet of her eye,
Though a smile she tried to borrow
When her lover-lord was nigh.

But he saw it, for he miss'd her
Joyous look, so full and free;
And he said, the while he kiss'd her,
'Love is greater than degree.

'And my father's wide plantations,
With the snow-capp'd heights above,
And a name the pride of nations,
Are as nought when weigh'd with love.'

Then, in utter fondness gliding,
Crept she to his noble breast;
When adown the hill came riding,
With his knights in armour dress'd,

Harold's dark and angry brother—
Harold's father's eldest son—
With the white lips of his mother,
And his father's visage dun.

And he shouted to them—'Seize her!
Throw her to the roaring wave!
She has had enough to please her,
Surely, on this side the grave!'

But his brother stepp'd before him—
Forth his sword did swiftly fly;
And he vow'd, by her who bore him,
She should live, or he should die!

And with sword, so lightly swaying,
Smote he then the foremost knight—
(Little chance had he of praying
For his soul's expected flight!)

But they gather'd round and round him—
Never one so brave as he!
Yet they gather'd round, and bound him;
And they threw him to the sea.

Not alone went northern Harold
To the palaces of night:
Happier than when wild birds caroll'd,
Sprang she from the rocky height!

And they say, when night winds, stealing,
Bring the sound of deep sea caves,
Harold, still his love revealing,
Woos her there beneath the waves!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

October 17, 1836.

THIS morning came the theme at once so feared and yet desired. We had breakfasted, and George was lingering about the room in an irresolute sort of way, when suddenly,

'Kate!' he said, in a constrained voice, 'I did not think when I left you, two little months ago, that on my return I should find us £5,000 poorer than when I set out. Yet so it is; and this could only have happened through an ignorance, a folly, a perversity, a romantic infatuation, on your part, as pitiable as it is wholly inexcusable. Do you never reflect on the chances and possible reverses of fortune to which we are all liable? This money has been literally thrown away in the most despicable and unjustifiable manner.' He looked very stern and angry; and paced the apartment with a resolute defiance before which my courage quailed. At last he stood fixedly regarding me. 'Why did you not trust Mr. Locke?'

I hung my head. 'Appearances were very odd,' I returned, in a low voice, 'and did favour my delusion. Mr. Locke might have been deceived too.'

Had I said the sky might have fallen, the remark would have had about equal weight. He took not the least notice of it.

'No doubt the money was your own,' he went on; 'but you had no right—no human being has a right—to cast money away to impostors; and all because of a foolish prejudice against a man whose aid would at once have saved you from error.' I felt the justice of this reproof, and stood abashed. 'Even the surrender of the whole of that £50 so hastily was a piece of childish absurdity.'

'O George! consider how the possible poverty of these people had been preying on my mind for months; and as soon as I believed restitution was in my power, I would have been ready, if need were, to have given every farthing I had at hand.'

'I would not be severe upon you, Kate; but had any other person played this foolish and hurtful game by me'—He paused. 'That five thousand might have done good service in an honourable cause. What if the true Stephen Grey should yet appear?'

Then there is the other half of the money, I thought. But recollecting what I had heard, I ventured aloud,

'But he is dead, you know—at least, so we were told.' He turned quickly round, and regarded me with an expression partly of anger and partly of pity for my credulity (as it struck me forcibly), considering the quarter from which my information was derived. I was longing to break out into confession of my fault, and sue for pardon. Why delay? 'I know all you would say,' I began; 'and I have done very very wrong. But consider, George, I am the greatest sufferer myself; and shall be ten times more so if ever'—

'Whether that man is alive or not,' he broke in, 'we have surely suffered enough through him already. And now'—

Upon this, 'O George!' I cried out, for I could not bear the turn our conversation was taking, and the unpleasant character of the subject altogether. 'Forgive me this time, and I will never never act again without your knowledge and advice. You know I have always been anxious on the score of this money. But I had far rather every shilling we have in this world were taken from us—I would rather we were beggared out and out of all that we possess—than that a cloud should come between you and me this way, George. Oh, I cannot endure it! Say that you will think no more of that miserable business; and let us be as we used to be, I implore of you, if you would not break my heart!' I held out my hand to him; and I knew that my eyes were fast brimming up from the well-spring of remorseful thoughts.

'Kate!' he said very gravely, while he took my proffered hand in one of his, and laid his other expressively on my shoulder, 'I am not sorry to find that you have taken this matter sorely to heart—as you will thus be forearmed against future mistakes of a like nature. Never lean to your own judgment in important concerns, nor permit a romantic impulse to usurp the place of a rational deliberate decision. It may be a more serious thing than you dream of (it often is) to let imagination play too prominent a part in the actual practice of life. The fancy is more for ornament than use. It is a flower that may embellish, but never can be an anchor on which to lean. But I will spare you further reproach. The confession of an error ought always, sooner or later, to find forgiveness; and I forgive you, Kate, without another word.'

He looked at me now more in sorrow than in anger, while something of the old tenderness spoke out in feature and in accent.

'George! George! say no more, I entreat—save that you love me now exactly as you were wont to do; and that never, never, while we live, shall any—the smallest murmur arise to mar the summer calm of a perfect confidence. I could bear poverty—I could bear'—His features relaxed—softer, softer as I spoke. He drew me towards him with a sudden energy.

'You are very young, my darling, and very ingenious; and you should not be half so dear to me were you in one iota different from what you are. Never fear, Kate, that I shall cease to love you with my whole heart. The thing is simply impossible.' Hereupon he began kissing away my tears, and I felt my soul going out like a bird into the meridian splendour, when the rain and the thunder-cloud are past!

When things had got into their old track, and my spirits had risen, in consequence, to their old level, I ventured a playful hint anent the 'noose' into which Mr. Halliday had foretold I would yet bring George's head, saying that 'now the prediction had been fulfilled, the future lay all clear and bright before us.' He laughed but feebly.

'No more "nooses," Kate, I beg; lest it be not so easy for me to draw my poor head out of the next one.'

Query.—Is there any married couple who can or ought to be happy when not in perfect harmony with each other? I have heard of such things—of husbands and wives who gradually got careless of their mutual affection, and found they could be quite contented in separate spheres, indulging their individual tastes (innocent, perhaps, and rational enough in themselves) totally independent the one of the other. Now, if even this state of matters is felt to yield satisfaction, I am certain that these people must hold their felicity at a very low standard indeed. For is not domestic happiness the highest and purest below the skies? And having once known it and lost it, oh! how black, how unbearably were all our after years! Therefore, my good and worshipful sisters, duly housed within the matrimonial pale, whatever other game ye play, I beseech ye never trifle with the privilege of calling one devoted heart your own, and knowing that yours is in true and earnest keeping in return.

October 21.

I do not know what is the matter with George. He has been terribly restless and abstracted for the last few days. And when I ask him if anything is wrong, he says 'no,' and puts on a forced cheerfulness of so thin a veil I cannot be deceived by it. Can this be the reaction from the fatigue of travelling? I scarce think so. Last night he spoke of business worries, in consequence of which he found Mr. Locke had gone to Ireland two days before his return from abroad, and no letters from him yet. How thankful I feel that the matter of these Greys was so pleasantly finished between George and myself ere new troubles broke out upon him! Oh! I would not be a man for a thousand pounds. Such important affairs are always at stake with them—losses and gains, hopes and fears—now an underground mine, ready to spring—now an avalanche about to fall! Lords of creation, indeed! The title may be dignified; but the duties are so arduous and responsible, that we, the ladies of creation, do sicken and shrink appalled at the bare thought of them.

October 25.

The shadow on George's brow gets more and more confirmed. Like the cloud which at first was no bigger than a man's hand, it has increased daily till it threatens to cover his entire mind. What can be the matter? Has he found out any other mismanagement of affairs in his absence besides mine? When I ask him he does not satisfy me. 'Mr. Locke,' he says, 'has not returned yet. When he comes, things will be all right.' Of course, I cannot help sharing George's uneasiness, though I know not what it is about—praying earnestly that no unlooked-for disaster may be hanging over us.

November 3.

I have not written in my diary for many days. No wonder. Seeing my husband so constantly harassed, my mind has been wholly preoccupied. And now, alas! alas! what have I got to chronicle but just the breaking of the cloud I feared over our devoted heads? Woe is the day that George ever thought of a partnership—specially the hour wherein Mr. Locke was received in that capacity! He has been infatuated about that man from the first, and at what a dreadful cost have his eyes been opened now! I fear he has not told me the full amount of his losses through him. But that he has proved treacherous and fraudulent to a great degree is too palpable for further concealment. So much George has acknowledged to me, that the second £5,000 promised to the spurious Mr. Grey has been withdrawn from the bank by Mr. Locke, and that various other important sums have found their way into the same hands for no good purpose. In plain language, I suspect that this extraordinary clever partner has taken the opportunity of George's continental tour to gather as much money together as he possibly could (in name of the firm) and has fairly absconded therewith, having left immediately before my husband's return and never appeared since. This is a deplorable state of things, which affects me all the more for the vain efforts made to hide the truth from me. And yet I can easily guess that every day is bringing some fresh pecuniary damage to light consequent on Mr. Locke's duplicity. What will be the issue of this tangled skein? I dare not say. God grant it may not be so dark and disastrous as my sick fancy has conceived of it!

November 10.

Piecemeal—inch by inch—as though every iota added to my knowledge were drawing the chain of grief and remorse tighter round his heart, my anxious perseverance is gradually extracting from my poor husband's lips the whole melancholy details. Under cover of a business visit to Ireland, Mr. Locke has gone off out of the way, no one knows whither, carrying with him all the available funds of the firm, amounting to some fifteen or twenty thousand pounds. The only sum of consequence which he did not and could not appropriate was Louis's portion—that not being yet realised by the sale of the various properties comprising it. This is the one thing for which to be thankful in the midst of so much disaster. Meantime, George is entirely prostrated by the utterly hopeless entanglement of affairs; while I am faint with sympathetic sorrow, and powerless either to console or succour him. From morning till evening, and often through a great part of the night too, he is poring, poring over these interminable papers; while I go in and out beseeching him not to take matters too heavily to heart, and he answers mournfully—

‘O Kate! Kate! when the storm overtakes the ship, it cannot choose but reel and stagger on the billows. Sail and rudder and compass, by which in ordinary times she was steered aright, are then of small avail. The anxious mariner can but lighten the freightage and cut away the masts, and when he has plied all his best seaman’s craft to save her from sinking, what can he do more than just leave the vessel reverently in higher keeping, and wait the issue with patient fortitude?’

Now I know perfectly well that this seaman’s craft which George speaks of is nothing else than taking all necessary steps to track Mr. Locke’s flight, with a view to the possible recovery of the stolen money—also using every means which legal skill and ingenuity can suggest to stem the dreadful torrent of misfortune which threatens our small barque of life. My poor husband! He is terribly haggard and woe-begone already. And though he tries sometimes to talk cheerfully and to make sport with the children, it is such sorry work, and so evidently a feint, that I had far rather he continued grave. Sadness is not half so affecting as an unnatural show of gaiety.

The other morning, George remarked upon my pale face. Upon this, I felt it suddenly become all a-glow, and I put on as radiant a look as I could find on the instant. He took me in his arms with a perfect abandon of affection, whispering me earnestly the while,

‘Remember, my darling, that, as a good angel ever, your hopeful smiles must be my rainbow in the storm; and I shall not be downcast overmuch so long as I see you sitting thus beside me, with eyes so full of light and promise.’

Ah, George! (I thought) you do not know what a little hypocrite I am. Did I not bid you good-bye yesterday morning, with bright looks and happy words? and yet you were scarce gone ere—calling to mind your sad, weary features—I had thrown myself on the sofa in an agony of bitter tears; and wished—oh, how fervently!—that you only knew how cheerfully I could submit to all the hardships that wait upon straitened means, if you might only wear once more the old bloom on your cheek, and the merry glance of yore in your eye!

Mem.—Women have been pronounced fragile and nervous creatures, and therefore supposed weak to bear the arrows of misfortune. But those who speak thus surely forget that physical organization may have little affinity with mental endurance. Feeble of arm may be strong of heart, and vice versa. And, so far as my experience goes, there is an elasticity in the female mind that, like a shallop on the ocean, keeps her always freshly buoyant, when man’s graver spirit is prone to sink like lead in the mighty waters.

Herein, perhaps, we may trace the law of compensation. Woman’s soul is less easily cast down, just because of its inferior power and capacity. She is the tiny barque that tops the wave, while her lord and master is the giant ship that bears her cargo nobly, and founders most frequently from the very bulk and grandeur of her build. But though the freightage may be lost, the owner’s life may be preserved; and when he sees that all else is gone, he betakes him to the small, secure craft, and is thereby saved.

Now, if George is the tempest-tossed ship on the wide deep, what hinders that I should be the life-boat to bring him safe to the shore?

November 17.

To-day the good news reached me, by an express message from town, that the wretched defaulter had been arrested in London, and a considerable sum of money found concealed about his person. I am glad, and yet I am grieved. No doubt the recovery of the gold is much. But oh! that the culprit had not been in any way associated with me or mine; or, rather, that there had been no culprit in the case! For if to receive reparation of injury is sweet, to be even the involuntary agent of another’s punishment is bitter. For my part, I cannot comprehend what there is in vengeance to make it so palatable. Do men fear that a just God will not be just in his dealing with guilt, and that they must therefore take the work out of His own hand, and do it for Him? Besides, is not a remorseful conscience far worse than whips and scorpions? I am afraid George would laugh at this doctrine, and say it would not work. Nevertheless, while I rejoice at our great loss being lightened, I do feel pained that we should be the accusers of that wicked Mr. Locke. By-the-by, they say that he really went to Ireland as a ruse, and showed himself both in Liverpool and Dublin; concluding that, when the state of matters was discovered, it would of course be inferred that he had thence embarked for some foreign port.

All the money recovered is some seven or eight thousand pounds, leaving still an enormous deficiency—how to be supplied, Heaven only knows. The only feasible way would seem for George to become bound in a large annual premium to an insurance office, and so obtain present funds to satisfy his most urgent clients. I think I have heard of such arrangements being made.

November 21.

Yesterday morning I went over to Aunt Aubrey’s; and as George was not to be home till late, I remained all day. The moment Louis saw me he ran to meet me; but stopping short within a yard or two—

‘Ah! ma chère Madame Weston, why is your face so white? It is like my mamma’s face to-day, ma pauvre maman, who lived in France, and went away to the angels.’ He stopped, and the liquid diamonds stood in his dark orbs. What is it in that child that is so attractive above all of his age that I have ever seen? Other boys may be manly beyond their years, or amiable in disposition, or of eminently pleasing exterior. But this one is a combination of all these qualities, and herein must lie the charm. The eye that flashes with intelligence one moment can melt in tenderness the next, and the courage of the lion is so finely blended with the meekness of the lamb that we are fascinated by the rare and beautiful association.

'Are you ill, madame?' with an earnest, affectionate look.

'No, I am quite well, Louis; only a little tired. Have you any news for me?'

'Yes, I have good news. Madame Aubrey's boxes are arrived from Nice.' Just then, my aunt came into the room, and I asked her if Mrs. Falconer's box had come with the rest? It had. It was in the next room. I claimed her promise to inspect the contents. She produced the key.

'Give me one hour,' I said, 'for due examination. I have a dim hope that I may light on some clue.' Then I glanced at our boy. She gave me a significant glance in return. So I set to work immediately, shutting myself into the chamber and looking the door, to ensure perfect freedom from interruption during my search. When I raised the lid, nothing but papers were to be seen. Many of them neatly folded and labelled with names and dates. Of these, the great proportion was verse. And, being fond of poetry, I must confess I lingered over several of the pieces with considerable interest. One MS. took my fancy from the quaintness of the title. So, singling it out to show to George, I laid it aside after a cursory perusal. It was called—

'MY MIND TO ME A KINGDOM IS.

Yes, minds are kingdoms, whose far-stretching space
No line can measure and no arch can span;
Nor land, air, sea, creation's dwelling-place,
Can match the spirit-universe in man.

What boundless fields wide spread within us lie,
Where precious seed our hands may daily sow!
What noble range of mountains towering high,
On which the plants of truth and right should grow!

How vast the ocean, where, in rich array,
Our legion dreams, like fairy barks, may glide!
And cells, how fathomless! where, day by day,
Our holiest hopes and loves most deep abide!

Yes; minds are kingdoms, large in latent power;
Yet how unworthy oft the sovereigns be!
How doth the world misuse the imperial dower?—
Heaven's grandest gift in perpetuity!

Oh the waste lands to culture strangers ever!
The dreary tracts with briar and weeds o'ergrown!
The noxious grass the scythes that findeth never!
Broad seas to mind's high commerce all unknown!

For my bare self, I'm weary, sick at heart—
So grand my realm, so pitiful my rule;
Rebellious thought through every tangled part
Runs riot, like a child that flies from school.

I would be monarch in right regal style—
My passions tuned to most harmonious measure;
Would plant with noblest trees the mental soil,
Whose fruits and flowers might profit yield and pleasure.

I'd have my realm so furnish'd with all good,
The very air were fragrant round me blew;
And every thought, word, deed, and passing mood,
An echo of the beautiful and true!

I'd have such harvests waving on my fields,
My neighbours all the golden feast might share;
And not a task that love or mercy wields,
But morning, noon, and night should find my care.

But oh! the foes that still disputing claim
With me the birthright empire of my mind!
Alas, alas! I'm but a king in name—
By earthly fetters 'cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd'!

No marvel oft, sore wasted by the strife,
I've long'd the useless sceptre to resign;
Yet how, my soul! to win that purer life,
If here, in tarnish'd state, thou sitt'st supine?

Up! up! Arouse thee, for thy country's sake!
Set heavenly councillors at thy right hand!
Think of the priceless guerdon is at stake—
The crown triumphant in the fadeless land!
Nor faint beneath thy royal burden more,
Strong in His strength the Cross for thee who bore!
(To be continued.)

MY EXPERIENCES IN PHOTOGRAPHY.

'LECTURE HALL, Little Puddleton. Professor Smith will deliver a lecture on Photography on Monday evening.'

Such was the notice, in various-coloured letters, stuck in every conspicuous corner of the village, which met the astonished gaze of the inhabitants of Little Puddleton. Their surprise was, first, where Professor Smith could find the 'Lecture Hall,' but their minds were soon set at ease on that point, by discovering that he had hired the large room of the 'Blue Boar' for the occasion.

Times had indeed degenerated. Legends were current, among the oldest inhabitants, of county halls having been held there; now it was sunk many degrees! Instead of the gay assemblies the room had once witnessed, it had become the place where 'Metropolitan Wizards' and givers of second-rate 'Entertainments' were wont to exhibit themselves before the admiring eyes of the population of Little Puddleton.

But it is time I should more especially introduce myself to the reader.

My name is Jones—Charles Jones. I'm a married man (Mary, only daughter of James Brown, Esq.) I am blessed (or the reverse) with sufficient fortune to keep me from starving, without enabling me to live in that affluence to which my ancestors were accustomed. I say 'my ancestors,' for I am able to prove that I am lineally descended from the 'Le Joynes,' who came over with William the Conqueror. It is not to be wondered at, that, such being the case, I scorn trade; and that, having nothing to occupy my time, I find it hang rather heavily on my hands. I hailed, therefore, with delight the advent of Professor Smith, and proceeded, as soon as I had seen the bills, to secure two places in the front row for Mrs. Jones and myself.

The wished-for Monday evening arrived, and, full of expectation, my wife and I took our seats opposite a table covered with bottles of all sizes, filled with compositions of all colours, the stock-in-trade of the lecturer. The room was moderately full; and punc-usually at half-past six (we are early people at Little Puddleton), the Professor made his appearance on a small platform prepared for him.

In person, he hardly answered my expectations, as I fancied a professor must necessarily be a venerable, intellectual-looking man. He was short, and rather flashily dressed; while his low forehead, and closely cropped hair, suggested painful ideas of Newgate and penal servitude. His fingers, too, were stained a deep brown; but that, he explained, was caused by the chemicals.

I will not venture to say that any one fully understood his lecture. The long words which flowed so glibly from his tongue were perfectly unintelligible to us; and we had but confused ideas of the comparative merits of xylotypes, calotypes, and talbotypes. One thing, however, we fully appreciated, and that was the beautiful views he showed us, taken in our own neighbourhood, as specimens of the art. He was a practical photographer, and concluded the lecture by informing us that he expected the arrival of his apparatus on the following day, when he should be happy to take our portraits, in any style, for a shilling and upwards.

It struck me at the time that this was rather beneath the dignity of a professor; and when afterwards I came to converse with him, his language scarcely seemed such as is used by those who have taken high honours. We left the lecture-room on the whole well satisfied with our evening's amusement, and walked on our way home, for some time, in silence. At length I spake, and these were my words:—

'Mary, I, too, will be a photographer!'

My wife, who never thwarts me in anything, made the characteristic reply,

'Charles, dear, do.'

The following morning I eagerly sought Professor Smith. I found him standing in a field outside the village, superintending the unpacking of what, had he not been a professor, I should have called a caravan. His appearance struck me even less favourably than on the preceding night. His head was surmounted by a Turkish smoking-cap, and certain dark lines about his face suggested that he only washed on lecture nights. I told him of my aspirations, and besought him to aid me.

'Well, you see, mister,' said he, 'there's some as can do it, and some as can't. If you've got a good apparatus and good chemicals, and know how to use 'em, why there you are; but if you haven't, you know, where are you?'

I will not repeat the whole of our conversation; suffice it to say that the Professor engaged, if provided with a matter of twenty pounds, to procure me all that was necessary from London, and himself to superintend my first efforts. I must own I was staggered by the large sum demanded of me; and, dreading to meet my wife, crept in at the back door of my house, and hastened to my desk. I had there the exact sum required, which had been gradually accumulated by us for the purchase of a piano; but I knew, by a little persuasion, my wife would soon be brought to see that a camera was by far the more useful article; and, besides, did it not always give her greater pleasure to get me anything I wanted than to satisfy her own desires?

When I had, not without some reluctance, entrusted the money to the Professor, I again hurried home, but this time entering by the front door; and, bursting into the room in which my wife sat quietly at work,

'Mary!' I cried, 'I must have a dark room!'

She looked bewildered.

'A dark room, Charles!' she repeated. 'What do you mean?'

'A room,' I answered, remembering the words of the Professor, 'from which daylight is entirely excluded, with the exception of about two feet, to be covered with three thicknesses of yellow calico. Have you any yellow calico?'

'Charles, are you mad? What can you want to cover a room with three thicknesses of yellow calico for?'

'It's not the room, dear, it's the window.'

'Why, wont the Venetian blinds do?'

I was forced to enter into a long explanation, in which I repeated the Professor's words as nearly as I could recollect them. My wife soon entered into the photographic spirit very readily, and we began to cast about to see which room would be best adapted for the purpose. The larder at first held out great inducements; and the larder it would have been, but for the vehement remonstrances of the cook, who protested that she 'would have ne'er a place to put nothing if the larder was taken.'

I have already said that my means were limited; it will therefore be easily understood that there was little extra room in our house. At last we fixed upon a small apartment which my wife dignified by the name of her 'boudoir;' and all available forces were pressed into the removal of the furniture as rapidly as possible, and then we set off together to purchase the yellow calico.

The Professor met us on our return, and accompanied us back to superintend the arrangements. By his directions, the calico was nailed threefold over the window; shelves were put up, to the disfigurement of the walls; and one of our best blankets nailed tight over the clothes-horse, to form a background for the portraits I was going to take.

Everything was ready that evening, and we went to sleep, expecting great triumphs on the morrow, when we hoped to hail the arrival of the packages the Professor had ordered on my behalf from London. Our joy was great when, next day, we saw the village postman leisurely making his way up the narrow walk of our front garden. Mrs. Jones and myself rushed to obtain the letter, which would, we hoped, contain tidings of the wished-for parcels. I will not deny that our countenances fell when we recognised the handwriting; and still greater were our feelings of disappointment, when we understood the contents of the letter. It was from Mrs. Jones' mother, announcing her intention of coming to stay a few days with us, if convenient; but we knew, by experience, that Mrs. Brown always started on her journey at the same time she posted the letter; and that, therefore, it was useless to write and defer the pleasure of her visit.

'O Charles! what shall we do? She always had the dark room when she came before; and now it's full of shelves, and baths, and pans, and bottles, and things; and I'm afraid she won't like to sleep in a room only lighted by "two square feet of three thicknesses of yellow calico."'

'My dear! she must sleep somewhere else.'

'It's all very well,' she replied, looking reproachfully at me, 'to say "somewhere else;" but where can we put her? There isn't a place in the house except the coal-cellar.'

'Then,' said I, with an air of determination, 'she must sleep at the Blue Boar.'

'O Charles! I never thought it would come to this. My own mother coming to see me, and then to be sent to an inn!'

This was the commencement of my photographic troubles; but, though we talked long in the same strain, it did not bring us one step nearer to the removal of our difficulties.

While we were still considering what was to be done, the solitary cab of Little Puddleton, with boxes piled on the roof to a precarious height, came lumbering round the corner. We both waited, in trembling silence, the arrival of Mrs. Brown. Her temper was naturally bad; and when soured, as it always was on her journey from London, by squabbles with cabmen, guards, and porters, I know no adjective in the English language which can do it justice.

As she walked up the garden, I saw her direct one furious glance at the clothes-horse, which was to form a background for the portraits I intended to take. Scarcely bestowing a word upon us as she entered the house, she pushed on to the room which she considered her own. We had not time to stop her before she turned the handle of the door, expecting, no doubt, to find the apartment prepared for her with the neatness for which my wife is famous. Fancy her horror, then, at the scene dimly disclosed to her view! By the dismal light transmitted through the yellow calico, she could only discern long narrow deal shelves on the walls; and bottles, pans, and pots on the floor. She turned round with a furious air; but before she could speak, my wife unburdened herself of a long string of explanations and apologies.

Mrs. Brown suffered her to proceed uninterrupted; save that when the word 'photography' was mentioned, she evinced her disapproval of the whole proceedings by an emphatic snort.

'Where am I to sleep, then?' she asked, in a voice in which the injured woman gained ascendancy over the martyr.

Mary was completely puzzled what to answer; and I, in an under-tone, muttered something about very good beds at the Blue Boar.

It only wanted this to fire the train. My worthy mother-in-law, firmly planted with her boxes at the top of the stairs, held forth to us, who stood at the bottom, in tones of indignant reproach. Addressing herself to me, she cried,

'Did I surrender my daughter to you for this? Is her house to be closed against her own mother? Oh, little did I think, when I gave up to you my only treasure, that this would be the return for my sacrifice! O Mary! is this the end? Had I thought you would be united for life to a low photographer, I would never have consented to your marriage! Oh! oh!! oh!!! Turned out of my daughter's house! where shall I sleep?'

I must confess that I was rather alarmed at this outburst, and poor Mary subsided into tears, as her only refuge.

'Monster!' continued Mrs. Brown; 'look at that poor girl, whose affections you are trying to alienate from her mother!'

For some time longer this storm continued; my wife and I, in an under-tone, had a long consultation as to what should be done; while my mother-in-law expressed her firm determination not to stay in the house of a 'brute,' which she accompanied with a withering glance at me. I was tired with the scene, and went out, hoping on my return to find Mrs. Brown had followed my example.

As I came back, my wife met me with such a smiling countenance that I felt sure such was the case.

'Charles,' she began, 'you'll be delighted to hear that my mother has —'

'Gone?' said I, with joy beaming all over my countenance.

'No, dear—kindly consented to occupy our room for a week or two.'

'And where are we to go?' I asked in dismay.

'Oh, I daresay we can make up something in the drawing-room.'

Was ever anything so horrible? I really don't know to what extremes of desperation I might have been driven, had not the welcome sight of Professor Smith at the gate, bearing in triumph a photographic camera, followed by two boys with huge packages, greeted my delighted gaze. Mother-in-laws were forgotten in my desire to inspect my purchases. Oh the trembling joy with which I cut the strings of the various parcels, and dragged out one thing after another, watched by the admiring eyes of my wife; while even Mrs. Brown so far forgot her injured dignity, as to indulge her curiosity, by peeping from the arm-chair she had deigned to occupy, though all the time she pretended to be engaged in reading!

It was too late to commence operations that day; so, after dismissing the Professor with many thanks, and extracting from him a promise to come up the first thing in the morning, I retreated to my dark room to arrange and inspect again all my bottles, glasses, &c.; and then sat long musing on my future photographic greatness.

I believe Mrs. Brown made some highly objectionable remarks respecting me, when I at length made my appearance in the drawing-room; but I was in too happy a frame of mind to heed them. I passed a very bad night—owing partly, no doubt, to my excitement, but principally to the inconvenience of the impromptu bed on the drawing-room sofa. At length day broke, and I hailed with delight the first rays of the sun by which I hoped to accomplish so much.

Mrs. Brown began her objectionable conduct at breakfast-time, by sarcastic speeches about the dignity of the 'profession' I had adopted; and when my instructor arrived and sent up his card (rather a dirty one, I must confess), she made some withering allusions to a 'ticket-of-leave.'

No time was to be lost; and, under the guidance of Professor Smith, I immediately commenced operations. He first showed me how to prepare the plate; then, having placed it in the camera, made me sit down myself before it. When he had allowed sufficient time to take the portrait, he permitted me to follow him to the dark room, that I might learn how to 'develop the image.' I soon discerned a very tolerable likeness of myself, which I hastened, triumphantly, to exhibit to my wife and her mother, as a proof of the undoubted proficiency of the Professor. My wife, of course, echoed my praises, and pronounced it admirable. Mrs. Brown spitefully remarked that, though she had never thought me a very handsome man, she never had an idea that I really looked so very commonplace an individual; and had not before observed that I squinted, or had a double chin! With dignity, I told her that there might be some slight defects in the representation, because I moved after the Professor had uncovered the lens. My wife, anxious to change the subject, asked,

'Can't you do one by yourself now, Charles?'

'I almost think I could, Mary, if you will come and sit for one.'

'Oh, that will be so nice! Wont it, mamma?' turning to Mrs. Brown.

'Well,' retorted that amiable lady, 'things are changed indeed! To think of a gentleman (or one who calls himself one) asking his wife to come and sit out in the garden before a clothes-horse, where all the village may see her, that he may amuse himself with his low vagabond companions!'

Mary, with her usual mildness, said she should so like to give her dear mamma a portrait of herself done by Charles; and then she added, 'We will get such a nice frame for you to put it in.'

Mollified by this, the old lady made no other remonstrance, and I hastened to the dark room to tell the Professor of my success. I thought it strange, as I came up the stairs, to hear the door of the drawing-room, which adjoined the dark room, suddenly closed, and on entering the latter chamber, I was astonished to see the Professor arranging his hat and coat, which had been placed on the floor; but he told me he had made some little changes in the bottles on the shelves, and had therefore disturbed the room a little.

Confident in my powers, I proceeded to prepare the glass, but found it more difficult than I had anticipated. At last, after breaking several plates, I got one tolerably perfect into the bath of nitrate of silver.

'Now, mister,' said the Professor, 'you don't want me any more. You quite understand how to proceed. You've only to note the time carefully, as I told you, and do just what I did, and you'll get on first-rate. I must be moving, for I've left all my property, which is verry valyable, with a young scamp, who'll mix all the bottles one in t'other, and I shall be in a pretty fix. I'll come down again to see you after dinner. Good day, sir.'

I certainly felt nervous at the Professor's abrupt departure, for I had considered him engaged to me for the whole day; but, trusting to his promise to return, I let him depart, only begging him to go by the back door, for I feared lest Mrs. Brown should assail him if he went near the parlour window.

After much arranging, re-arranging, sitting down, standing up, adjusting of flounces, smoothing of hair, and most urgent injunctions to sit still, I at last got my wife placed to my satisfaction; and, with great trepidation, removed the cap of the lens, to take my first portrait! Alas! 'brightest hopes are fleetest.'

I retired to 'develop the image,' as the Professor called it. Nothing but a black smudge! Without revealing my failure, I prepared another glass, and telling my wife it was not quite successful, begged her to sit again. This time I could trace a faint image of a female figure, but that was all. The next time my wife, tired with so long keeping a graceful attitude and amiable expression, unfortunately was seized with an irresistible desire to yawn. The photograph was this time pretty clear, and showed Mary's pretty mouth in all the deformity of a double row of shark's teeth, surmounted by a couple of noses, and supported by three chins.

I could now boldly assert that it would have been an admirable likeness if she had only kept still. Mary was quite overcome at the enormity of her crime, and having refreshed herself, while I prepared another plate, again sat down before the camera, determined to be still as death.

This time I was certainly successful. I could see quite plainly a lady sitting by a little round table, on which were some books and a vase of flowers. I could even perceive some trimming on her dress; and as cook observed, when summoned from the kitchen to attest the resemblance of the portrait,

'Any one might see it was missus by the long curls.'

Of course, the treasure was first exhibited to Mrs. Brown, who was obliged to acknowledge that it was like Mary, but gave by no means unqualified approval.

'I suppose, Mr. Jones, you'll put a board now at the gate, with my dear daughter's picture as a specimen, and say "In this style for half-a-crown."'

'Oh, my dear mamma, of course Charles is only doing it for amusement,' replied my wife.

'And pray, then, what's the good of a camera, and goodness knows what all, just to take your picture, when he sees you all day long, a deal prettier than he can make you look?'

'Why, dear mamma, of course he wants to take you and all our friends.'

'Me! oh no; Mr. Jones does not care for his wife's mother; of course he don't want to see my picture, when he would like to send me to the inn directly I enter the house.'

Though in my heart I agreed for once with the old lady, and thought it was quite enough to have her in bodily presence, without her picture to remind us when absent of all she made us suffer, still I was forced to second my wife's entreaties, and beg Mrs. Brown to grant me the favour of a sitting.

'Now do, mamma,' said Mary; 'Charles is so clever, and does them so beautifully, and he'll do many copies of you to take back with you, and then everybody that sees them will say "What a clever husband your daughter has!" and I daresay some of the great London men will write to ask Charles how he does such beautiful portraits, and he'll be quite celebrated.'

Moved by such flattering prospects, Mrs. Brown allowed herself to be persuaded. With the air of a martyr about to defend the truth of his principles with his blood, she majestically sailed into the garden, and sat down in the chair, looking exactly as if she were about to be operated on by a dentist. This did not give her face a more pleasing expression than it generally wore; and when I add, that in her palmiest days she was a very plain woman with large features, and that now time and ill-temper had added far from pleasant lines to her red face, it may be easily imagined that she would not form an agreeable subject for photography. However, I determined to do my very best; and produced the best portrait I had taken. The likeness was really striking. It was cross enough to have soured the freshest milk; every line and wrinkle was true to nature. With a pleased and jaunty air I advanced to my mother-in-law, and presented to her her fac-simile. Indignation for a moment prevented utterance; then she burst forth—

'This you call my likeness! This!! Do you mean to say, sir, that you call this a portrait of your dear wife's mother? Oh! why did I come here to be insulted in this heartless manner? It is a plot—a vile plot—to aggravate me. But I will be calm; yes, Mr. Jones, I say calm. Mary, my child, do you join in this vile treachery against your mother? Can you suffer him, though he is your husband, so to insult your poor widowed mother? How dare you say this ugly, wrinkled old woman is like me? I say, how dare you, Mr. Jones?'

Thus she raved, abusing by turns myself, the Professor, the camera, and photography in general. Mary tried in vain to soothe her mother, and at last put the finishing touch to her rage, by suggesting that she should try once more, and 'then, perhaps, Charles would be more successful.'

'So you really like to give the wretch an opportunity of insulting me! Oh, this is too cruel! I did not expect this of you, Mary! Never will I stay to be so insulted;' and, suiting the action to the word, Mrs. Brown rose, and sailing majestically past me and her weeping daughter, passed so close to the camera as to knock it down with her ample crinoline. It was in a thousand pieces. Without waiting to express sorrow, or to ascertain the extent of the damage, the injured woman retired to her chamber to brood in silence over her wrongs. Mary and I hastened to pick up the pieces, vainly endeavouring to reconstruct the broken instrument.

'It's no use our trying, dear,' said my wife at last; 'hadn't you better send for the Professor?'

'I'll go myself,' I replied; and soon I was on my way to the village.

No traces of the Professor or his caravan were to be seen. On inquiry, I found that he had hastily left that morning, and that he was in debt to every one in the village who would give him credit. I hastened home again in dismay; for though I felt I had to confess to my wife how much more than she thought was lost in the camera—even the money set by to buy her piano—yet I wished to get it off my mind, and I felt sure she would rather console than reproach me. She met me at the gate with another tale of sorrow—a desk containing all her little valuables had disappeared!

At length the truth dawned on me, in the inelegant but graphic words of our one Little Puddleton policeman:—'I had been diddled.' No trace of the Professor was ever discovered. My wife bore her losses in silence; my mother-in-law (who considerably forbore to fulfil her threat of departure when she found how severely I was punished) was incessant in her reproaches—nothing could take place without some pointed allusion to my 'idiotic credulity,' my 'unfortunate partiality for low associates.' Ere one day was ended, I began to wish I had never seen a camera, or that photography had never been invented. In haste, the dark room was made light, the furniture restored to its former place, and everything hidden away which could remind me of my

'PHOTOGRAPHIC EXPERIENCES.'

WARNER STERNE

THE SPIRIT'S WHISPER.

HAST thou come to my grave in the twilight,
To sigh and weep—
To think of the lost one laid long ago
In death's calm sleep;
Who once shared in thy joys evanescent;
Whose heart to thine
Was wed as close as to the old home walls
Adheres the vine;
Who left thee alone in a cheerless world
To wend thy way,
Mourning in silence the long absent one
Each night and day?

Mortal! O why dost thou grieve for me thus?
 Why dost thou mourn?
 Wouldst thou have me to earth and its sorrows
 Again return?
 Wouldst thou wish my sweet rest to be broken
 For care and pain?
 Oh! forbear it. Thy sighs and thy tears, love!
 Are all in vain.
 The sweet snowdrop will herald the spring-time,
 And melody
 Come back with the roses;—but me! oh! no
 Return for me!

Then weep not for me; for, didst thou but know
 My full-summ'd bliss,
 No more wouldst thou yearn for the loving eye,
 And the fond kiss,
 And the voice low and tender, delighting,
 That often sung
 Thee to rest in thy little crib nightly,
 When thou wert young;
 And the ministering hand's loving pressure
 That tended thee oft—
 That delighted to glide through thy long curls,
 Golden and soft.

Mine, mine is the home, love! of beauty;
 Where the fields gleam
 Far brighter than the crystal of ocean
 In day's parting beam;
 Where birds have a soul, and plumage like stars—
 Whose joyous song
 Rolls aloud, with the seraph's sweet anthem,
 The heavens along;
 Where no nightshade bedims the celestial
 Blue of the skies;
 And the amaranth-blossoms cluster, brightly
 Beaming like eyes.

No sorrow, no sickness enter therein—
 No cold decay;
 No dark misgivings that cloud the poor soul
 Stain'd in its clay;
 No bitter partings, nor changes, nor death
 'Mong the blessed host,
 Whose bright paradise never was ransom'd—
 Never was lost.

Wouldst thou have me to leave its gold mansions,
 Its light and joy,
 And its rivers of life, for vain pleasures
 Mix'd with alloy?

No—listen! Thou wilt come first to me, love!
 When the full sheaves
 Are all gather'd from off the shorn ridges;
 When the sear'd leaves
 Strew the wayside in mottled brown masses,
 And the last gems
 Of the sighing, sad, cold waning autumn
 Droop on their stems.

Then, beloved! I will look for thy coming
 To life and rest,
 To the home of thy God, and thy kindred
 Among the bless'd.

Listen! ere thou goest back to the world,
 Here, in the shade
 Of the tombs and the yew-trees around thee,
 Let there be made
 A resolve in thy heart to do battle
 For the bless'd goal;
 Still in life's bivouac to keep guarding,
 Saving thy soul;—
 For, remember the Cross must be borne
 Ere the crown is gain'd.
 Then gird on thy armour. God keep thee
 Ever unstain'd!

CHARLES KENNEDY.

LE CHEVALIER DU RAYON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FRED HARPER'S LEGACY.'

CHAPTER V.

THE Chevalier became now almost an inmate of Sir John's house. Jemima and he were continually together—riding, walking, singing, conversing; together in the drawing-room; in the Park, at the Opera they were to be seen together. Lady Primrose was in raptures with the success of her scheme. She took particular pains, however, to impress upon Sir John that it was only through her ingenuity and address that his daughter was about to make such a satisfactory and advantageous settlement. Sir John, however, had, on two occasions, expressed doubts as to the existence of the Chevalier's title or estate; but on the first occasion Lady Primrose flew into a towering passion, and on the second fell into a fit of hysterics, so that he had not recurred to the subject. 'He had interfered once before,' he said, 'and had heard it every day since; he would let her manage it in her own way this go off, let her make of it what she pleased.'

Whether Sir John actually instituted the proposed inquiries, and found everything to his satisfaction; whether his wife had persuaded him that these inquiries would only be an unwarrantable insult, and a gratuitous aspersion on the Chevalier's honour; or whether he had been unable to ascertain anything at all in the matter, is uncertain. Certain it is, that preliminaries had been arranged, the day of the marriage had been fixed, and preparations were in progress for its celebration. The exact terms of the contract have never transpired; but report affirms that the Chevalier was most liberal in his settlements, and most moderate in his demands on the parent of his bride; and that this, coupled with the fact of Jemima's being his favourite child, had the effect on Sir John of making him extremely liberal also.

The marriage day arrived. In St. George's, Hanover-square, the ceremony was performed. The bride and bridegroom were to set out at once for the Continent. They returned to Russell-square to make the few final arrangements for the journey.

Jemima was in her room. The Chevalier was in the centre of a group in the drawing-room, giving a glowing account of his ascent of Mont Blanc, when a rough voice, with a broad Scotch accent, was heard in loud dispute with some of the servants in the hall. Sir John, who was having some private conversation with his wife, hearing the noise, went to see what was the matter, and encountered a tall stout man, with a great red face, a broad-brimmed hat on his head, top-boots on his feet, and a large riding whip in his hand.

'I beg your pardon, sir; but if you're the maister of this house, your servants are the impidentest pack o' hounds ever I came across—and a man coming, too, to do their maister the best kindness, I'll be bound, that has ever been done him in his life! And pretending they didna understand what I was saying, the Southland beggars! Why, ony man that doesna understand gude broad Scotch has nae business to have lugs to hear or a tongue to speak. You're the maister of this house?"

'I am, my good friend,' replied Sir John; 'but, as I have some friends above stairs, I cannot wait. If you will favour me with the matter to which I owe the honour of this visit—'

'The honour o' this visit? Ye're mortal civil. If ye'll come into a bit room where we'll be by ourselfs, and where we'll no have ony o' them knee-breeked gentry hearkening till us, I'll soon let ye ken that.'

'I fear I cannot wait,' said Sir John. 'If you will call to-morrow, I will be happy to hear what you have to say.'

'Call to-morrow! Weel, I'll do that if ye like; or gang awa' and never come back again, if ye like that better—it'll make little difference to me; but, I'm telling ye, it'll make a sma' difference to you.'

'How do you mean?' said Sir John. 'I will listen to you here.'

'Weel, then,' said the Scotchman, 'that's as ye like. Ye've a daughter that's going to be married the day? or the morn, is it? I couldna just find out that.'

'My daughter was married to-day,' said Sir John.

'Whew-ew-ew!' whistled the Scotchman, letting his hat fall. 'Ye don't mean it?'

'How, sir? Of course I mean it—though I do not see that it should afford you any occasion for such a—it does not affect you in any way!'

'Affect me in any way!' repeated the Scotchman. 'I should rather think it will affect me; it'll affect me just as it affects you—it makes me a faither-in-law.'

'What do you say? I beg pardon—I do not understand you, sir.'

'No understand me! Weel, then, I'm sure it's plain enough. Man, but Charlie's the lad! The rascal! to gang and jew a probably puir innocent lassie this way!'

'I wish you would explain yourself, sir?' said Sir John.

'Explain mysel'!—Weel then, what d'ye think is the name o' your son-in-law?'

'The name of my son-in-law! I do not see what all this is about. Du Rayon is the gentleman's name—Chevalier du Rayon.'

'Chevalier!' repeated the Scotchman. 'Weel, let me never! Du—what d'ye ca' it?—Durayong!—Charlie has putten a tail to it—Shovelly Durayong! What the mischief! his name is Charlie Rae—my name is Robert Rae—Big Bob Rae, as they ca' me: he's nae mair nor less than my son, and I'm nae mair nor less than his faither. Chevalier, indeed! Wait till I get my fingers on him—the rascal! I'll Chevalier him!'

'There must be some strange mistake,' said Sir John. 'You'—

'Mistake! I should rather think there has been some mistake, when a man with a house like this, and servants running about a body's feet like mice in a hay-stack, marries his daughter to the ne'er-do-weel son of a Midlothian farmer! It's no to say that I'm hard-up either: I've a gude twa or three thousand in the bank at Edinburgh, and stock, and that; but still—but, man! Charlie's the lad! He's done it this shot!'

'You must be mistaken, sir,' said Sir John, in a tone of slight alarm. 'Come this way.' He led the way up stairs, and showed the farmer into a room on the drawing-room floor. 'This is rather beyond a joke, I fear. I suspected something all along, I hardly know how. But, Jove! even if it is true, I don't care! It'll serve her right: it was her doing. But it is provoking, too. Are you sure there is—how did you hear about it?'

'That's a roun'about story,' answered Mr. Rae. 'It would involve near a history o' Charlie's career. But, in three words:—As I telled ye, I'm a farmer, awa' near Edinburgh, and Charlie's my son—my only son. Weel, ye see, I had intended Charlie for a farmer, but Charlie didna care much about the farming line; so, through an auld schoolfellow, I got him a place in an office—in a business way, ye ken—so as to learn, and get himsel' into business habits like—intending to gie him a hunder or twa to start wi' on his ain account, when he got auld enough. But Charlie wouldna settle. He was bound for three years, and so they keepit him on; but he wouldna settle to it. It wasna that he was misbehaving himsel' either—for I never heard that he wasna doing right; but he had just a kind o' lazy, unsettled sort o' turn. Weel, he had been there about twa years and a-half, when, one time he was out seeing me and the auld wife—staying ower the Sunday, like—he telled me that he was thinking o' trying a bit spec. on his ain account—shipping goods to the Exquimotes, or some o' them other niggers that live awa' up by there. Weel, he laid it off, (as wha but Charlie kens how?) till at last he got me round to give him a cheque on the bank for three hundred pound. Weel, Charlie went back, and the next we heard o' him was that he was awa—bolted—naebody kened where. Weel, to make a lang story short, we never heard ony mair about him for dear knows how lang; till, one fine frosty morning he came back a perfect ragamuffin, wi' a beard like a Jew, and a head like a Hottentot, without shoe or stocking, and the ghost o' a coat on his back—mair like a Connaght scarecrow than ony decent man's son. Weel, there was a scene! Charlie, and his mither, and the whole o' us, a' blubbering like crocodils—he's no bad-hearted, Charlie, after a', and ye canna but like the fallow, though he's such a rascal; that's the worst o't. Weel, we got Charlie sorted and fattened up—he's no bad-looking, Charlie; but the beggar kens that as weel—and I took him into a kind o' partny in the farm. Weel, I had some accounts to pay for repairs on the house, and a new machine or twa that we had got; and so, one fine morning—thinking to encourage him, ye ken, in his weel doing, by sort o' showing confidence in him;—weel, ae fine morning, I gied Charlie a cheque on the bank for three hundred and seventy to gang to Edinburgh to pay them. Charlie went off, shaking hands wi' me, and gieing his mother a kiss as if he had been gaun to Australia. Night came, but Charlie didna come back; and the next we heard o' him was six weeks after from a neighbour that had been up here in Lunnun. This is just a week since the day that he had seen Charlie here; and kenning that I was seeking him, he had made inquiry about him, and had found out that he was courting the daughter o' one o' the richest men in Lunnun, and like shortly to be married to her. So off I set; and after knocking about like a shinty-ba' on the links o' Musselburgh for three days, here I am—found him out at last—my three hundred and seventy pounds a' spent, and me a faither-in-law!

Sir John did not speak for some minutes. He appeared hardly to know how to feel. Chagrin at what he might consider the degradation of his daughter's marriage (for he had now but little doubt that the Scotchman's tale was true), seemed to be counterbalanced by the consideration of the triumph which it would afford him over his wife. 'Well,' he said at length, 'it is rather a serious business. I never was very ambitious regarding the settlement of my daughters; but really, this is rather too much. I mean no disparagement to you, sir. I am not proud—indeed, I have little reason to be so; I dare say I was once a poorer man than you ever were. But really—upon my honour, I hardly know what to think. Polly will be mad. But this young fellow, whom you say is your son, if he has really no positive vice'—

'Vice! no him: Charlie is weel enough so far as I ken. And as for running awa' wi' the money, I don't believe he would hae done the like to onybody but his faither. I suppose he thought that it would be his some time or another, and that what was mine was his, and what was his was his ain. If Charlie had been left wi' a fortune, he would have made a very decent man. He was aye inclined to act the gentleman, and was too lazy to work. He has managed his game this shot. The only thing is the way he went about it—that's what I'm mad about. If he really liked the lassie, it wouldna be sae bad—what like is she, the gude-daughter? Come on, man—let us see her.'

'You cannot see her just now. She and her—and your son, so I suppose we must call him—are to start this evening for the Continent—for his estate—hem!—for—Hang it! upon my honour, I can hardly keep from—Polly has been nicely done. Upon my honour, it's the best thing I've heard this many a day. The mention of Chevalier du Rayon will silence her as long as she lives, and that is no small consideration. Jemima—I think she really likes the fellow; and I daresay he's not a bad sort of character after all. If he really likes her—upon my honour, I don't think that it is so very bad after all. But are you quite sure it is the same person?'

'I'll soon make mysel' sure o' that,' said the Scotchman. 'Is he in this house? Confront me wi' him, and if he doesna stare—let me never! But there he is—the very beggar! My! but he's a swell!'

'James!' said the Chevalier, coming out of the drawing-room, and speaking to a footman who was passing on the landing—'voulez-vous—zat is, will you have ze very great—what you call him?—ze great goodness of to do me ze favour to bring one little—what you call?—shovel and ze brush, to take away ze fragments—ze remains of ze little Cupid zat sat on the table in ze corner; one of ze ladies has knock him down with ze dress.'

The Chevalier was returning to the drawing-room, when the farmer started up. 'Charlie, ye rascal! come here! Are ye no ashamed o' yoursel' to be carrying on in this way? to come into ony decent man's house like a fox into the fold? Charlie, ye're a black sheep!'

'Sar!' said the Chevalier, looking very much surprised, 'you are impudent man. How dare you, sir—how dare you call me ze sheep!'

'Sheep, ye rascal! If ye're no a sheep, ye're as white as ane at this present minute. Take care! or I'll make ye a black-faced ane—a black-eyed ane, at ony rate: ye're black-hearted already.'

'Monsieur Primrose, who is this man? He is very much insolent.'

'Ye would dare to pretend ye don't ken your ain faither!' cried the farmer. 'Charlie! if ye don't stop this d——d nonsense'—

'For mercy sake, stop this noise!' cried Sir John. 'What in the world are the people to think?'

'Let go, sar, I say!—let ze arm of me alone!' cried the Chevalier, extricating himself from the farmer's grasp and entering the drawing-room, thinking probably that there he would be safe. But in this he was mistaken; the farmer flourished his whip and followed, leaving Sir John standing outside in an agony of annoyance.'

'What is ze thing zat you want of me, sar? How dare you to enter ze house of mine father-in-law in this manner? Leave ze room instantly, sir! or I will get ze servants to put you out of ze house.'

'D——n it, ye rascal!—I say, leddies and gentlemen! I'm no in the habit o' swearing; but upon my word, I say, I'm sorry for disturbing the peace of this household, and your entertainment especially; but if there's onybody here that's a mither or a faither, and was ever denied by his ain wean—by his ain son, they can understand my feelings. Now, Charlie, look ye—'

'How dare you, sir?' exclaimed Lady Primrose, marching forward, and waving her hand, 'how dare you, sir, invade the privacy of this domestic—of this—of this house? This gentleman is my son-in-law, who was this day married to my daughter. How dare you insult him in this manner?'

'That he was married to your daughter the day, mem, I ken,' replied the farmer; 'but had I just found ye out a day sooner, I'll be bound it never would hae been; for, although ye'll no believe it now, ye'll ken it and believe it soon enough. Your son-in-law, as ye ca' him, and talk so big about, is nae mair nor less than my son! So that you and me, mistress, is kind o' relations. The same event, ye ken, that maks you a grannie will mak me a grandfather! So, mistress, ye needna tak the nose off a body, or flounce about that way, like Leddy Macbeth at a twopenny show at Falkirk Fair. But, Charlie, look ye!—ye didna use to tell lies—look me in the face, and say that I'm no your faither.'

'Le diable!' exclaimed the Chevalier—'I no know ze man. Je n'understand pas. He is one—what you call him?—he is one lunatic—one raving, mad, maniac lunatic, escape from ze asylum!'

'Lunatic, ye beggar! D—n it, ye rascal! to ca' your faither a lunatic! Look ye, Charlie!' he exclaimed, seizing the Chevalier by the collar, and shaking his whip in his face—'am I your faither, or am I no? Say, ye rascal! or, although ye're my son—my only son, I'll gie—I'll gie ye what I've gie'n ye many a time afore, when ye were a bairn.'

'Gentlemen, ze man is mad!' said the Chevalier. 'Hang it! let me alone! Ladies and gentlemen!'—
'How dare you, sir?' cried Lady Primrose. 'James! James! James, I say, take that man out!'

'Ye needna trouble yoursel', Mistress Macbeth,' said Mr. Rae, buttoning up his coat, and putting on his hat, 'I'll sune gang. But I would just like to see the gude-dochter—that's what you Englishers call the daughter-in-law—what kind o' body is she? Charlie, ye scoundrel! ye've done her an injury in deceiving her—see that ye're gude to her now. Ye've been a bad stick—see that ye turn a new leaf now that ye'll hae got some money to keep ye out o' mischief. I don't want ever to see ye again. To deny your ain faither! The very thought o't! But, mither-in-law—as I suppose it's you that's the mother,' he added, turning to Lady Primrose—'my son has done ye a bit injury in deceiving ye—at least, ye'll count it sae; though, for my part, I don't see why an honest farmer's son shouldna be gude enough for ony man's daughter, or woman's either; but, however, I would like to do as much as lies in my power to make up for't; and so tell your daughter, that if Charlie's no gude to her, she'll find a bame wi' me, and an auld wife to welcome her. But I think Charlie will be gude to her. He's gude-hearted at the bottom, and warm-hearted—and clever too, the rascal! He has spoiled a gude spoon in the making. Charlie, ye scoundrel! gude-bye! I never want to see your face again—I never want to hear frae ye again; but if ye're no gude to her—mind I'm telling ye, ye'll hear frae me.'

The farmer made a bow at the door, and withdrew; and finding no one on the stairs—Sir John having gone to his room—he opened the street door and went his way, leaving a somewhat singular scene in the drawing-room. By the Chevalier's rhetoric, however, the party was soon persuaded (ostensibly at least) to believe that the person who had just gone had been labouring under some strange delusion.

Lady Primrose, however, was a good deal excited.

She left the room; and having found Sir John, and having been informed by him of the real foundation which, he believed, there was for her fears, she went into a thoroughly genuine fit of hysterics.

Jemima was called in, and apprised of her husband's real position; but Jemima took it very coolly—she was just as well pleased, she said. She liked him for himself, not for what he was—hinting, at the same time, that she had before been partially aware of it; that Charles had already told her something of it, though the matter was then too far advanced to draw back. She questioned, however, whether she would have done so, even if she could; for she liked Charles better than any man she had ever seen; and his affection for her, she was sure, was genuine. He had taken this way, as the only one by which he could ever hope, from what might be considered the disparity of his true circumstances and hers, to call her his own.

Happily, Lady Primrose did not hear this confession. Sir John first said he liked the fellow better for having told Jemima, and then pretended to be very angry; but he was plainly not so angry as he wished Jemima to think. He began a harangue, in which he meant, apparently, to reprove her for the deceit which she had practised; but ere he had spoken half-a-dozen sentences, he broke down; and making some remark about 'Polly's being nicely done,' he laughed outright.

He returned to the drawing-room, making apologies for Lady Primrose's absence—that the excitement caused by the person who had recently intruded himself upon them had occasioned a slight indisposition. As to his opinion regarding the truth or falsehood of the person's statements, he made no remark.

Jemima was announced as being ready for the journey. She bid an affectionate farewell to her parents; and the Chevalier having performed a similar ceremony with the guests, they drove off in splendid style, and were soon on their way to the Continent.

CHAPTER VI.

A few years after the period of the above relation, returning from a short tour through the Netherlands, I happened one evening to be walking near the Platz opposite the Cathedral at Antwerp, when I encountered a stout, handsome, bearded man, smoking a cigar. His face seemed familiar to me; but where or when I had seen it I could not recollect. I thought he looked at me, as if entertaining a similar opinion with regard to me. I passed him, however; but I had hardly gone a dozen paces when a hand slapped me heartily on the shoulder, and turning round, I saw my bearded friend—'Jack! is it possible! I'm delighted to see you. How are you, old boy?'

'I'm very well, thank you. But, though your face seems familiar to me—I cannot exactly—I beg pardon—you have the advantage of me.'

'Don't know me, Jack? You used to know me well enough; though never for very much good, I fear—ha, ha! Don't you remember Charlie—Charlie Rae?

Charlie Rae! Of course I did. We had been at school together; we had been three years in the same house of business, though in neither place had I, as he said himself, known him for very much good. He had been the pioneer of mischief in school, the paragon of laziness in the office, and yet everybody liked Charlie; somehow, no one could help liking him.

'How stupid! Of course I remember. How are you? I thought I ought to have known your face, though I couldn't for my life remember where I had seen it—it is such a long time since I have seen you.'

'Yes, it is a good while—a matter of twelve or thirteen years, I suppose. I used to be a rare specimen in those days, but I've turned over quite a new leaf. I've settled down into a quiet, industrious—at least—no! I'm not that; I never was, and, I suppose, never shall be; but, at any rate, I don't need. However, I'm as quiet—as quiet as a lamp-post. Among other things, I've taken to myself a wife, as I dare say you might hear. Come along—you must come to see her. I was just returning to the hotel. I've just been taking a look at the Cathedral—a jolly old concern, isn't it? I suppose you've seen the place where Rubens is buried? Come along—I want to hear all about what you've been doing during the ages since I saw you. I say! we have three youngsters—little Jacky, a regular little brick he is, called after his grandfather; Bobby, aged two years, called after his other grandfather; and Janey, aged three months. But you'll see them all for yourself. When did you come? We only came this morning; we leave for London to-morrow. I hope we'll have the pleasure of your company. I'll have it, anyhow, to-night; for now that I've got hold of you, I won't let you go in a hurry.'

I accompanied Charlie to his hotel, and was soon ushered into an elegant apartment, and presented to Mrs. Rae, a very nice person indeed, and to Charlie's son and heir, a smart little fellow of four years old.

'Jack is a very old friend, Jemmy,' said Charlie Rae; he and I have known each other since—oh! since we were the height of nothing in farthing coppers; but I haven't seen him for ever so long. I almost wonder how I knew you: it must be eleven or twelve years—no, by-the-way, it isn't so much as that either—I met you once somewhere. It was when I was on my travels. I knew you at once; but I was such a precious ticket in point of dress and appointments, that I didn't like to speak to you. I had just come from France, having worked my passage across in a smuggling skiff. By the way, you never heard any of my adventures. They're worth hearing, I assure you. Do you know, I've been thinking of writing them out, and giving them to the world. But, as we used to say when I was in the London and Paris United Grand—I've been a showman, you see, in my day—showman! I've been a fifer in an orchestra, an omnibus cad, a man-monkey in a pantomime, an advertising medium. However, as we used to say, when I was in the London and Paris United Grand—most eminent artistes of the day—magnificent stud of horses—admission one penny! I'm always 'just going to begin.' But somehow I never do begin. However, if I could just get a start—why, man, we'd beat Gil Blas and Don Quixote all to smash. However, let me see. Since I saw you, it was, I think, about five years before I got married, and that is just five years last month. Isn't it, Jemmy? Jemmy, do you hear? Isn't it five years since you and Shovelley du Rayon were married?

'O Charlie! how you do talk!' said Mrs. Rae, 'I'm sure the less said about that the better.'

'The better!' said Charlie. 'I'm going to tell all about it; he knows many a worse thing about me than that. Well, no, I don't think he does either—that was about as bad as ever I did, though I was rather a wild chap in those days.'

'I wonder what he could have been, if he was worse than he is now, the great naughty man!' said Mrs. Rae, giving an affectionate pull to her husband's ear. 'He must have been a perfect scapegrace.'

'Scapegrace! well, no, my dear; I wasn't quite that,' said Charlie, putting his arm round his wife's waist; 'but I was bad enough. Well I don't know if I was so very much worse than I am now; I'm as fond of mischief, and as lazy as ever. I wish you would order some supper, Jemmy, my dear, will you? that walk has given me an appetite—table set for three, and supper for half-a-dozen, or as many more as you like. But, in the meantime, just give us out a bottle of the mountain-dew—I always have a little stock of it with me, Jack; you get such execrable stuffs generally at these hotels. 'We'll get some hot water, and brew some toddy for "auld Scotland's sake." Hi! you! waiter! voulez-vous bring some hot water? Come now, sit in—we'll have the water presently. Why, this puts me in mind of old times: I only wish we could have it so every night! I told you, I think, that we go to London to-morrow. The old woman—Jemmy's mother, I mean—has, it seems, been taken ill; she has sent for Jemmy; and we're going accordingly. We were just having a little cruise through Belgium here when the letter came. Of course I was never mentioned. I'm in the black books: she never could bear me after—ha, ha, ha! But, by the way, you didn't hear about it—about the marriage, did you?'

'I had heard,' I said, 'something of his being married; but that I had heard little more.'

'Oh! you didn't hear the particulars? You remember when you used to lecture me? how you used to say that I would never come to any good? You were wrong for once in your life. The particulars—ha, ha, ha! Jemmy, have you any objections to my telling the particulars?'

'Oh really, Charlie,' said Mrs. Rae, 'I think they are quite too well known already: the less said about them the better. I know, however, that you care little for my veto; you do just as you like for anything I can say. As I have no particular desire, however, to hear them again, having heard them till I can say it all by heart, I shall go and see baby. But really, Charlie, instead of being ashamed of it, as you ought to be, you rather seem to glory in it.'

'And have I not reason, Jemmy, my dear?' said Charlie Rae. 'Isn't it enough to establish my claims as a man of genius as long as I live? Au revoir, Jemmy! She's the best little wife that,' he added, as Mrs. Rae left the room, 'on the face of the earth. I got a bargain of her, I did. Fill your glass, and I'll tell—and I'll tell you the—the particulars!'

Having fulfilled the stipulation, Charlie, with a preliminary bar of music by way of prelude, proceeded to narrate the circumstances of his courtship and marriage, as I have narrated them above; I having, as may perhaps be said, begun at the wrong end of the story.

'That was a spec. for you,' said Charlie Rae, as he concluded, 'the best I ever made. I got a good few thousands when we were married, but she's worth a hundred thousand herself. I always liked her; in fact, it was that that made me do it. I would marry her to-morrow without a rap, and work like a nigger for her afterwards. But, you see, I hardly need to do that. The old knight gave up the ghost three years ago, and of course we figured in his will; so that we have nothing to do but to amuse ourselves. We can—as one of the old heathen humbugs we used to hear about in school says that he would like to do—we can spend the summer in England, the spring in Italy, the winter in Spain, and the autumn—where was he to spend the autumn?—I forget; but, at all events, we can go any mortal where we like. I'm a real Chevalier now, I may say. We have a nice little place—away near Heidelberg it is. I call it Du Rayon Lodge. Ha, ha! You must come to see it next summer, do you hear? I expect to be in London this time for a month or two. The old woman, it seems, is very ill; but I'm sure it doesn't affect my spirits much. She hates me like rats; but she's an old fool, so there isn't much sentiment lost between us.'

'And your father?'

'Oh! the governor! Poor old chap! he's alive and hearty. But he lost nearly all his money—some security concern, I suppose it was—I don't exactly know what. He has given up the farm; but, with a little money that he has still, and a little that we allow them, he and the old lady live quite snug—I don't exactly know where. I've lost their last letter; but we'll find out. We must take a trip down, and see the old Trojans. The old fellow never forgave me, though, for calling him a lunatic—ha, ha, ha!'

'And Miss Primrose?'

'Oh! Jenny! She got married, not long after we did, to a rich old alderman, or some such dignitary. He died last year: she's a widow now, with I forget how many thousands a-year. There's your chance! We must introduce you to her. You needn't laugh—I'm quite in earnest. In the meantime, I'll put in a good word for you. She's as anxious to get married as ever she was. However, you must promise to take a run across, and spend a month at ze little chateau. Plenty of shooting, you know. Of course I shall beat up your quarters; but, in the meantime, you must promise to come.'

I thanked Charlie Rae for his kind invitation, promising to avail myself of it, if my arrangements would permit.

Next day they started for London. In the afternoon, I proceeded on my way to Holland, ruminating on human nature as displayed in Charles Rae's matrimonial speculation.

THE DAY-DARGER.

SHE kens the turns o' ilks tune

That nature sings sae blithe and bonnie;

Her love is rich as rosy June,

For mense she may compare wi' ony;

Her feyther is a thrivin' laird,

While I maun darge till banes grow wearie;

Yet, while I delve the stubborn yird,

I'm deep in service o' my dearie.

And oh! 'tis sweet in beauty's sight

To hand the heart aboon complaining,

And do one's utmost main and might,

That love may thrive on labour's hainin'.

O Poverty! bare Poverty!

Ye may be bauld at whyles and vauntie,

But when ye lay sic loads on me,

My heart refuses to be cantie;

Frae morn till e'en I labour sair

And daurna think to tak' it canny.

But still, when done, I've nought to wae

That's worth a single smile o' Annie.

Yet oh! 'tis sweet when day departs,

When birds are wheesht and flowers sleeping,

Down by the burn to gar our hearts

Believe that love has life in keeping.

I wish I had a tak' o' land

Where peace might pay the fees o' labour,

Wi' my sweet lassie aye at hand

My nearest friend and dearest neebor;

I'd work for love, that lowly worth

Might rise aboon frae sma' beginnings,

And ever as the flowers cam' forth

On them we'd wae our daily winnings.

Oh! then, how sweet when bairnies dear

Might hand our hame wi' gladness ringin'.

And through a' changes o' the year

Still keep the lo'esome birdie singing.

Lilt out, wee birdie! let thy sang

Still praise the day when beauty found thee;

The berries will be ripe ere lang,

The fading flourish rains around thee;

The world rejoices when it rains,

And when it blows the grass is growing,

And comfort thrives on labour's gains

While dimpled cheeks wi' health are glowing.

And oh! 'tis sweet when heart and soul

Pour forth in sang vast wealth o' feeling!

The darger then feels fit to thole

Ilk beast that raves around his shielin'.

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'Sing willow! willow!'—Shakespeare.

CHAPTER XI.

THE pic-nic was a burst bubble. We had blown it with our most fanciful breaths until, full-orbed and rainbowed, it floated away to green and brambly nooks of summer loveliness, at the base of purple hills, and to gugglings of the crystalline sea, among washed pebbles, and shells tinted like the opal, and brown slippery sea-weed, and vulgar whelks and limpets clinging to the rounded stones, and little green-backed crabs sideling about the roots of swinging tangle, and innumerable other strange playthings of the punctual tides. But it burst as from a too great fullness. The quiet rock-pools and the glistening sand—the boulders rough with coralines and shaggy with algae—the star-fish and the sea-urchins, and the beautiful medusæ afloat in the shining emerald—and far over the tremulous sea-level, the passing steamer with its palpitating rush and long trail of smoke; and, further still, the slack white sail of the leisurely coaster wearing the sun-gleam for a glory—all the unspeakable wonders and splendours of the mighty and mysterious shore, were seen only in dream. The pic-nic was not to be.

I had it all in vision. By a pale bedside, sweet and patient to tears, my household had talked it over—every one adding some bright little individual touch—until it glowed with colours that never were on mortal canvas. The tranquil sail down the Clyde, from busy and smoky scenes—onward to scenes of soft sylvan beauty—and onward still to where the river deepens, and widens, and loses itself among the betumbled and rugged yet steadfast and glorious hills of Argyleshire—with the sun warm on the deck, and all the winds of heaven holding mercifully back lest they should do hurt to any frail thing—the easy landing—the slow delighted stroll past villas nestling under bosky promontories, and up to their roofs in roses, or with fuchsias burning to their windows; and along the pale shore-road, narrowed at intervals with wild-brier, and hazel, and honeysuckle, and with ever and anon a cool spring bubbling from the rock—the encamping on some slope of fine grass, overhanging a gravelly beach, with the advancing tide lapping the pebbles, and trembling into silvery beauty and music—how distinctly were these things imaged in my mind! But what is liberty to him who has not felt the weight and weariness of chains? Ah! ye jaded habitués of the coast! not yours can be the appreciation of my little shore-picture. Give me, then, for critics those who, through all the magnificent days, while summer was greening the plains and reddening the mountains, or while autumn was adding her mature touches of gold to field and forest, have been seeing only the heavens dull and struggling, through sweltering skylights, and through that great smoke-roof which Glasgow sustains eternally upon her thousand chimney-shafts. How I longed for the one glad day! Then the unpacking of the baskets—the eager appetites and the ample supplies—the water brought from some near spring that had been trickling there since the Flood, and most patient for our coming; poor Barbara catching from all the splendours of nature, and all the munificence of God, a new feel of life in her thin veins; Kate, the sprite, with her white limbs in the brine, and madly wishing she were a mermaid; old Mr. Waddel and myself—a couple of gray-headed boys again, the lighter for the lightness of our flasks—skiffing flat pebbles in rivalry for the farthest number of leaps; and my wife Jean, and all the rest of the party, on the grass, laughing like a bank of flowers in June. Oh! the delightful pictures that Hope, under any sweet inspiration, paints! But the mysterious Fates that control our mortal destinies were, in this instance, implacable. The one glad, glorious day which lay, we fondly and foolishly thought, like a slip of sunshine on our path, was, alas! never—never to arrive.

Oh! veil your brightness for awhile, ye mellow autumn skies! Let the song of that unvisited shore turn into a wail of sorrow, as of long waves breaking in the night! And you, O tiny, untasted spring! purring your modest melody somewhere, be no longer a gladness to the ear but an anguish to the heart, as of the voice of a child born of the mountain going for ever to its end! Nor sky, nor sea, nor mountain will my sainted and poetic child, Barbara, ever behold more. We waited for a day of strength for her, in order that we might bear her to some lovely place of shelter and flowers, where the bland air might wrap her in a little health, and preserve her to us, if but for a little, little while. I could have usurped the sovereign power of riches, and braved debt itself—next terriblest to death—if only to try to save her. But day by day she weakened, as if with silent protestation of a preference to be permitted to die at home. Yet, even when no longer able to leave her bed, her features brightened into a beauty that was supreme; and her words, usually accompanied with a smile, were like the prophecies of blissful days to come. Sometimes, too, she would seek to cheer us, by indulging playfully in a slight snatch of song; but there was an ineffable melancholy in that music, and we entreated her to avoid the fatigue of it. An incident occurred which, for a moment, pleased us all. Through a little artifice on the part of Sophia, our poor Barbara was visited by Mr. Imrie. An explanation took place, of some unhappy misunderstanding between them, and, holding him by the hand, she called him 'Edward,' and said that she was 'much better.' The young man perhaps marked a greater change in her than was observable to us. He tried to speak a few hopeful words, but his utterance was choked, and he could only look ghastly in his grief. It was now her turn to administer comfort, and with a firm voice she disclosed the happiness of a future which was never to be realised in this world. They parted; but she motioned him back, and held up to him her bright lips to be kissed. They parted, to meet again on the morrow eve. They parted, and it was for the last time.

Hearts may be crushed, and pulses stilled, and agonies endured, and tragedies enacted, and households overwhelmed,—but the business of the world must go on. Perhaps it was well that I had this daily excuse for a little absence from the bedside of my dearest—my dying one—my dearest, because my dying one. On the morning after seeing her betrothed, there was certainly a dawn of hope. We had sent up the street for Dr. Reid, whom I found to be the fatherliest of physicians, and I waited to hear his report before leaving. His words were, in their very tenderness, discouraging. Yet, though shaken by her cough at intervals, she had enjoyed a comparatively calm night, and I was fain to persuade myself that her more dangerous symptoms were a little, though but a little, abated. The waiting had driven me about an hour late, and old M'Corkindale was wild. Consulting his huge chronometer, he said—'Mr. Gray, this won't do.' I pleaded that one of my family was ill. 'Surely that needn't have kept you,' he grumbled between his teeth, as he banged the door of his room.

Reading perhaps some eloquence in my face—pathetic, or proudly savage, or possibly presenting some blending of both emotions—young Joe beseeched me never to mind. He had himself been a little late last night—three in the morning or so—and the 'Governor' had ever since been 'in a devil of a rage.' Such were the comforting words of the heir-apparent of the Drums.

Later in the day, my master looked over my shoulder, and detected an error in my figuring, with my hand somewhat tremulous. How he stamped and vociferated!

'Mr. M'Corkindale,' I said, 'you are unreasonable. Did you never commit a mistake yourself?'

'Don't retort, sir,' he exclaimed; 'don't mount your high horse with me. Whatever I may have done is no business of yours.'

In the midst of this altercation the door burst open, and the servant-maid of a neighbour of mine flew in, hot and excited, crying that I was wanted at home if I wished to see my daughter alive. I closed the ledger in Mr. M'Corkindale's face, and, seizing my hat, was preparing to leave, when in rushed little Kate, frantic, crying—'O father! come! come!'

'Hush, hush! young woman!' muttered Mr. M'Corkindale. 'All that is quite unbusiness-like. This is no place for such scenes.'

What more occurred I know not. In a moment I was in the street—hurrying towards St. Enoch-square —towards the Bridge—in a breathless rush for Portland-street.

'You old brute!' cried a wretch on whose toes I accidentally trod in my haste. I turned and asked his pardon, with a gush of tears, at which the fellow stared with a kind of pitying wonder.

By the time I reached home, Kate was at my heels, with her bonnet-strings loose, her face wet and flushed, and her curls shaken to the wind. The door was opened for us by Jean, who was speechless with sobs and tears. Pausing a moment for breath, I at length entered the death-chamber, and penetrated the circle of mourners on tiptoe. Sophia was crouched up in bed with Barbara's head in her lap, chafing her thin hands, bathing her temples with vinegar—moistening her lips with wine—unwearying, ingenious, desperate, heroic in her efforts to save. But what, alas! could the frenzy of a sister's affection do where all the skill of all the colleges of the world must have confessed itself utterly helpless?

'Barbara!' I said or sobbed. 'Are you going to leave us, Barbara?'

She returned the pressure of my hand, and slowly articulated—'O father! not yet—surely not yet!'

Her last audible words were 'You—have—been—all—very kind.'

For a moment her lips moved as in prayer. There was then a low long gurgle in her throat. Her eyes seemed to take earnest partings with us all in turn. Ay me! those exquisite eyes! Sophia, on whom they last rested, closed them gently—breaking, at the same time, into a succession of slow, loud sobs, ending in a long shriek. All broke out at once into a vehement chorus of lamentation. We had no Barbara—none, none!—nothing but the sweetest, dearest memory of a stainless and beautiful life that ever hallowed, to bereaved and agonised hearts, the dreadful—the inexorable change.

Ah, cynic! coldly censuring! deem you that I aim at no high end in thus drawing aside the veil from our so private suffering? Would not this, think you, be a fairer and more lovable world were there less hiding of hearts in it? Does the caitiff breathe—or breathe at least any sweet air of heaven—who would hail oaths upon the humblest, or who would seek to crush the humblest with any mean villany of trade, or rack him with any dire subterfuge of law, could he reflect that sacred in the obscure home of him might be the shrine of some poor dead Barbara's remembrance? What is it that has made the music of the lyre a divinity of inspiration, and a talisman of power for all generations, but that it embodies, under the gentle disguise of poesy, most fearless revelations of feelings and sympathies eternal in the hidden recesses of the soul? Besides, there was something about Barbara, so teaching how to live and how to die, that what wonder if the angelic image of her should appear—at least to my parental and perhaps partial eyes—something not unworthy of the world to take to its wide heart, in the hope of deriving from it some pure and sweet influence in the dark and the desponding hours that come, sooner or later, and more or less often, to all?

Poor, poor Barbara! She had just turned twenty. Although tall, she was not too tall to render her an awkwardness in the society of men below the middle stature. Her hair was of a glossy chesnut, and her features, which were finely-moulded, had an indescribable softness of outline. From her childhood she had grown up with a feminine dignity and gentleness that appeared to emanate from a mind wherein all the graces were enthroned. The fine nerve, and capacity of sudden glow and luminousness, which we associate with genius, were visible in her temperament; and the tender and genial strains in which she delighted to indulge might one day have made a name for her among the favoured children of song. Through every company into which she entered, my tender, my brilliant one struck a momentary tremor of surprise—a very silence of admiration, to be broken only by such courtesies as are at once an overture of regard and a solicitation of favour. Scarcely, indeed, could I dissent from Jean—ah! so prostrate in her grief now!—when she maintained that there was almost no height of social position which our darling was not fitted to conquer and adorn. But lo! the mystery of the end!—a hollow grave where the ground was most firm to our tread!—a sudden darkness where the light was most glorious to our eyes!

Stone—stone!—cold, dead stone! Not to be thrilled by any human touch!—not to be startled by any heaven's thunder! Those who have known most of death fear it least. What, then, if, when we know it wholly, we shall learn to fear it not at all? Again, what if the anguish which tears the heart for the loss of any dear friend has a divine purpose in it to shorten the life and abridge the period of separation? Who, at all events, could wish to make question of the silent Shadow, in shape more soothing and beautiful than that on which we blindly gazed? Sophia—helpless, poor child! for anything more, at last—has just placed a few flowers on the unheaving breast of all that remains to us of our pale, pale bride of eternity. Meet, most meet for such a purpose, are the lovely and delicate emblems which God's own hand has moulded into graceful forms, enriched with radiant colours, and gifted with celestial breaths! Yet, solace for me, or for any in our tear-drowned house, there can this night be none. Enough! We have lost thee, Barbara!

CHAPTER XII.

'Prosperity doth bewitch men, seeming clear;

But seas do laugh, show white, when rocks are near?'—Webster.

It were an addle world, my masters! that were logically obedient to the moralists. The fools live—you may know them by their pretentious length of face—who would make it an offence to keep curious watch upon our neighbours. Traah! Our neighbours—I am a gray-headed greenhorn else—would hardly thank us for the immunity which our closed eyes would furnish. Then who prates of scandal? Is our noble faculty of observation to fust in us unused? Is our power of eloquent comment to have no wholesome exercise or end? Is public opinion to abdicate its lofty functions, and exert no restraining authority? Are the weak to derive no kindly and potent warning from follies blazoned in the face of day? Are our modern Spartan inebriates to make no compensation of an educational kind to the society they offend? Out upon the prudery which would shutter up our windows, lest, forsooth, we should accidentally discern what our neighbours are about! To know exactly what our neighbours are about is part of our proper business. I accordingly make no apology whatever for peering at friend Waddel—at Mister Waddel—at Mathew Waddel, Esquire,—with the prying and continuous look of a lynx, blurred a little now and then, I admit, at this lamentable domestic crisis. When my special chum of forty years' standing and odd took that lodging in Portland-street, he knew that he would be overlooked; and that I, in particular, with the eyes he wot of as fitted to burn holes, would overlook him continually. Show me the gain, ye crabbed slaves of the purely artificial etiquettes! show me, I say, the gain of having neighbours or friends at all, unless I am permitted to dissect them, every hour of the day, like Florentine models at a show, for my personal and peculiar edification in the mysterious social physiologies!

Mr. Waddel relaxed into our dear, good old Mathew of other and happier days during our mighty trial. He had a real—or, as I sometimes fancied, and even feared—considering that he was nearly three times her age—a peculiar liking for Barbara. I never witnessed anything in the world more unaffected than his grief, or more earnest than his sympathy. Without his help, indeed, I hardly know how I could have laid my poor beauty in the grave, and left her in that solitude. Ah! how the tenderness of the heart, at such a period, makes the passage easy to its core! My friend—never far distant from that centre any time these forty years and upward—completed his conquest over me then, and enshrined himself there for ever. From that crisis of misery and mourning, henceforth into all possible futures, he had bought a privilege, and might heap any measure of wrong upon me, leaving me helpless to retaliate! If I lifted my hand to smite—nay, smile not, reader! I admit the humour of the hypothesis—the thought of Barbara would transmute the blow into an embrace. Yet in the very vacancy which pervaded our house, so suddenly emptied of delight, it was a relief to stare idly from the windows, and watch the daily ongoings of our well-beloved neighbour. It was some little thing to talk of, having special interest for us all, in those intervals, which such observation and gossip served to lengthen, of our so passionate bursts of sorrow. My wife Jean, even in midst of her sore dilapidations of grief, would note the arrival of boxes on boys' heads, emblazoned with the name of some noted confectioner; Kate would make an almost merry rush forward to behold the fat and good-humoured Susan—flushed from the kitchen, and herself partially cooked—unpack the unimaginable dainties; while even Sophia would be moved to take a melancholy glance athwart the street, prior to a quick and quiet sobbing to her room. Then, punctual to the hour of six, would the cabs come rattling heavily up, one after one, and drive lightly off, after depositing some burly gentleman in black, to be curtailed in by Susan, with her white apron, her blue-ribboned cap, and her face scarcely dried. Not caring to read, and with all our voices for conversation choked, we would let the twilight and the night come down upon us, with their silent veil on veil of darkness. Gradually to the right and to the left, along all the inhabited flats, and up all the family tiers, the windows would flare and wink, and at length wholly blacken; but long as we sat up we might descry, on such occasions, the gas-light gleaming cheerily through the window-chinks, and through the thick crimson curtains, of our enjoying and hospitable friend. On other evenings, Jean would interrupt her reminiscences of Barbara and her paroxysms of tears, in order to intimate a cab at Mr. Waddel's door with the horse's head northward. By-and-by, Mr. Waddel would steal into the vehicle as if rather unwilling to be observed by us, or to pain us with any special contrast of enjoyment, and disappear over the noisy stones. Then, perhaps, far on in the night, I would hear what seemed to be a grumble of distant thunder in my dreams, which Jean, with her more accurate—perhaps more wakeful ear, would interpret as 'only Mr. Waddel returning.' Our friend, it was clear—for we saw it through our terrible anguish—had begun to lead a gay life. I saw it, and said it, and felt that I was neither a gossip nor a scandal-monger, but only a humble observer and student of human nature, believing that and having a fine and rare specimen before me for scrutiny, animadversion, and profit. Well-a-day! how shifting circumstances alter the whole current of our most steadfast mortal careers! I sometimes wondered if the most unselfish man I ever knew was, after all, wholly selfish in the innermost hidden marrows of him—cultivating my friendship so long as it ministered to his enjoyment—and likely to cast it away, like a sucked orange, so soon as higher, or at least other, enjoyments tempted! Yet, ah no! Stifle the uncharitable thought, and chide it down to Hades, thou image of my Barbara in heaven!

'The proper study of mankind is man';

With her womanly quickness of intuition, stimulated, perhaps, by her present despondency of prospect, my wife foresaw that Mr. Waddel would not be long our neighbour. Borrowing an illustration from natural history, she declared that he would be off like the swallows—not many of which birds she had beheld for some years I think. He was already, indeed—I could not but see—clean out of keeping with the locality. His daily routine of habits had shaped themselves by degrees to the latest Belgravian patterns. Night after night, for example, the rosy Susan, flurried out of her good-nature almost, was only uncovering the soup while the tea-cups of our street were jingling through all its populous parallels. Against our quiet middle-class back-ground he was becoming as conspicuous as an earl. Little imps of boys climbed the railing to obtain glimpses of his statuary—one beautiful item of which betrayed a preference on his part, which the unclassical maiden of the establishment, in the innocent full-blooded humanity of her, was quite at a loss to comprehend. Now and then, when he happened to be entertaining company, a clerical-looking gentleman, of middle-age, might be seen, with napkin in hand, gallantly relieving Susan of the task of ushering in the guests. Fancy such an adjunct of serviceable politeness in the old lodging of my friend! Ay me! not a doubt of it. Mr. Waddel was fast mellowing for other and brighter climes. He was preening the cockatoo feathers of him for flight. But, to do him justice, he stole not off, after the manner of some fugitives, making a solitary confidante of the moon. On the contrary, he paid us a friendly visit, and in tones of kindly, though superfluous apology, announced the necessity he was under of removing to a somewhat larger domicile, commanding, as it happened, a good view of Kelvingrove. His partners required that he should be in a position to entertain occasional business connexions.

'But your hand, Gabriel!' he exclaimed. 'Of what strength were a friendship which so little a distance should sever!'

Over his third tumbler he, in fact, as entirely forgot his new and magnificent self as Christopher Sly, the tinker, in the lord's chamber, with his silken apparel, when smitten with genial recollections of the alehouse; and swore, in his enthusiasm, that not the broad Atlantic itself would suffice for that unnatural end.

Ah! not a long while passed—not even a week—ere our windows were dulled with the spectacle of the familiar lodgings ticketed; and Susan looking careless of her attire, as if feeling that her days of grandeur were among the past eternities.

But hadst thou been curious, O reader! thou mightst have observed, a couple of evenings thereafter, a sorrowful old man—Gabriel Gray, to wit—with crape on his sleeves, and much crape at his heart, climbing the western terraces, heralded by a glorious autumnal sunset; pausing frequently to gather breath; and, at the summit, taking a dinner-invitation from his pocket, to study the direction afresh.

I was near the spot, and a cab suddenly stopping, assured me of the exact door. The mansion was lighted to the topmost windows. As I entered, not a little awed by the great staircase, all the furnishings of which were new, the clerical-looking gentleman of middle age, whom I recognised, relieved me of my hat and walking-stick.

Ascending the stair, my name was shouted into the drawing-room—a kind of double apartment, gorgeously furnished, with a lofty and peculiar ceiling, and chandeliers of dazzling crystal. Alas! the name

'Gray' created no more sensation among the gentlemen standing about in groups, than if I had been the author of the 'Elegy in a Country Churchyard.'

Mr. Waddel, however, came forward, gave me marked welcome, and introduced me to Mr. Jones, and Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Thomson, and Mr. Simpkins, and one or two other persons of consideration.

I bowed and was left to look about me. The window-hangings were superb. In a far corner stood the marble Venus which had so perplexed the simple Susan; and I could hear that the effect of that pure and exquisite work of art was to give rise to some graceless conversation and laughter. The voices were vulgar in intonation, and a little constrained. Mr. Waddel looked especially ill at ease, and took refuge several times in the weather, with a view to avert stagnation.

Dinner was at length announced, at which moment he pounced upon the biggest sumph in the company for the post of honour. This was Mr. Jones, who was reputed to be worth a plum.

The dinner-table was brilliant with plate. It occupied the whole length of the oak-painted room. The edibles and the drinkables surpassed, I should say, beyond all bounds, the capacity of any mortal stomach. There was material in them for a month of yeoman's appetite and thirst. The culinary devices were endless, and not perhaps without genius in that kind. Aided by a noiseless brother of the cloth, my clerical-looking friend was courteous, attentive, and alert. Take him for all in all, he was the most gentlemanly person present, unless I may except an old man with white hair, sitting close to the foot of the table, in mourning, wrapped up within himself, and feeling—if his face had any true expression—very consciously humble, and very diabolically proud.

My position was between Mr. Thomson and Mr. Simpkins—the latter, from business connection, acting as Mr. Waddel's vis-à-vis; and from both I learned that we had experienced a particularly rainy summer. Here were two unprejudiced witnesses to that fact, and I accordingly held it to be established.

There was some talk of the approaching meeting of the Social Science Association in Glasgow, and Mr. Jones considered that it was 'humbug.' (Hear, hear.) He had 'refused to subscribe a bawbee.' (Hear and laughter; Mr. Jones looking like a man who was not in the habit of being done.) Perceiving that the noble stand he had made was approved of, he added—'One of the committee gave me a dig as if I had grugged the siller, but I tell'd him "it wadna put me much about to buy up the whole concern."' (Uproarious merriment—the rich man immensely happy.)

I ventured to express a fear that 'It would be difficult to appraise or put a money value upon an institution the objects of which were purely philanthropic.'

'Philanthropic here or philanthropic there, they'll no get a bawbee from me,' triumphantly responded Mr. Jones.

'Oh, as for subscribing,' I said, 'of course it would be a throwing away of money, seeing that we would all benefit by the general improvement and sweetening of the social system, whether we subscribed or not.' (Suspicious passing of the decanters.)

Mr. Simpkins concurred with Mr. Jones, that 'It would be a great interruption to business.'

Mr. Thomson, however, in a fine spirit of hero-worship, exclaimed—'I would like to see old Brougham, just to say that I had seen him.'

'For my part,' observed a gentleman on the other side of the table, 'I don't know what they mean by their Social Science.'

But the grand topic of conversation—a topic on which all were sufficiently erudite to discourse fluently—had reference to the comparative merits of two different kinds of port. The company became divided into two factions, each of which contended stoutly for its favourite liquor. When, however, it was announced that the one description of wine was only 50s. while the other was 80s. a-dozen, the adherents of the former, although a decided majority, looked discomfited, and the minority had an indubitable triumph.

All this while, the countenance of our host—who was mainly demonstrative in his efforts to keep the bottles revolving—radiated into extreme beneficence. But that he is my friend, and I love him, I should perhaps be so indiscreet as to say that his expression was something maudlin. Yet so it was, I fear; and how sad I was to think it was, I have, alas! no words to tell.

After coffee in the drawing-room, Mr. Waddel expressed regret that I had not 'come out,' whereupon I did not retort that I knew the kind of creatures before which to lay any poor pearls the Heavens might have gifted me withal. Nevertheless, he hoped I had enjoyed myself, which of course I had, the viands being abundant, and the conversation not such as to overtask the faculties or disturb digestion. In a few moments I was in the cool air, and on the silent flags—alone.

Well, well, I had spent a happy evening—with chairs. The sideboard I had found attractive. Pleasing recollections were mine of the handsome glasses I had fingered. The mirrors had been flattering in their attentions. On both floors the splendid Brussels carpets had secured my friendly intercourse. The wines had taken agreeable possession of me. With all these I had passed a few hours enjoyingly enough. Nay, thanks to the chandeliers! I had even had a brilliant night of it, my masters! But as for Mathew Waddel, he was a lost man among his overpowering upholsteries. He was drowned, past help or hope, in his rival oceans of port. With my eyes and my ears I tried to pick him out; but he was a shadow. I made fond and foolish clutches at him; but he went clean away in a mist. No, no! not alas! with him, or with the ghost of him, had I been hob-a-nobbing. This reflection made me serious, as I lingered under the starlight, and looked down upon the dark-winding Kelvin, and thought of Barbara's plaintive apostrophe to that stream, still winding darkly on, and she not with me to interpret the eternal moral of it. Ah, Barbara! the same forever to me now! no change can overtake thee for evermore! In thy celestial home—thinking thou listenest—thinking thou wilt know thy father's voice—thinking thou bendest down to me in thy old beauty—trustingly, even as when thou wert a little child—let me sing to thee in this wise:—

A little while on earth, from Heaven I craved thee!
And still a little while—unto the last!
And oh the many things that might have saved thee,
In the brief moments ere thy spirit past!

Where the bolt fell, aghast I stood beholding
Thy form of human mould so bright and fair!
And oh the mystery, past man's unfolding,
That life should not have loved to linger there!

The full of years are bow'd their burdens under,
Yet day by day, with lusty steps, they pass;
While frail as flowers, amid our tears and wonder,
The young are laid to rest beneath the grass.

I knew thee pure and beauteous! was it therefore
That thou so soon wert summon'd to the skies?

My heart is haunted by a dismal Wherefore?
And only tears make answer to my eyes.

Oh I was rich in all thy girlhood's story,
And in the precious jewels of thy head,
And in thy glowing smile, thy forehead's glory,
Thy childish fondness, and thy queenly tread!

And now, like one hur'd down from height of fortune,
I poorer am than are the poorly born;
And in my deep despair the heavens importune
For better answer than a blinding scorn.

What if the angels could not bear to witness
A face so like their own grow less divine,
And took thee in thy bloom, to mark thy fitness
For higher life ere age or grief was thine?

Ah! not the less this world is waxen colder
Since of thy warmth thou hast no more to give!
I track thy luminous course, and think me older
By all the years it was thy lot to live.

Star of my future! I am sad and lonely;
I greet the world with vain though earnest will;
I see thee always, and I see thee only—
I know thee dead, yet deem thee living still!

O strong of life! be near me at death's portal,
When fade the lights, and friends lament my doom!
Be at my dying bed, thou dear immortal!
With arms outstretch'd and white amid the gloom!

Good night, darling! And farewell, old friend!—
once a familiar comet filling my whole sky—now lost in other regions of space.

GLASGOW CATHEDRAL.

SITUATED on an elevated position in the north-west section of the city, this cathedral is conspicuous at a considerable distance; and it is a splendid specimen of our old ecclesiastical architecture. It was erected in 1136, and dedicated to St. Mungo, who had founded a bishopric here when a Druidical temple was still standing in the vicinity, and a few years ere Columba landed in Iona. Although the several portions of which it consists were built at different periods, in the course of three centuries and a-half, the interior is deemed quite a gem of symmetry; and, although what seems to have been the architect's original design was never completed, it is also, in its outward aspect, a fabric of graceful and spacious dimensions. It measures in length 310 feet, and in breadth 63, while the spire terminates in a point about 230 feet above the base of the building; and within, the roof of the nave is 85, and that of the choir 90 feet from the floor.

On approaching this edifice, we are struck with its elaborate masonry and its majestic proportions; and, on entering the crypt, the dense colonnade of short pillars bearing up an oppressive weight of low arches, with the gloom and silence that reign, fills our mind with speechless awe, and induces a pensive train of reflections. Here, by many successive generations, the most touching of religious services were performed; and for well nigh seven centuries the sad rites of burial have been solemnly observed. Musing on the fitful fever of life and the mystery of death, we look awhile upon the spot where the dust of St. Mungo has so long rested in undisturbed repose; and, passing to the grave of the Rev. Edward Irving, who was interred here twenty-nine years ago, we ponder on the progress that has been made, since the time that Kentigern was labouring amid the wilds of Strathclyd, to the time that Irving was moving London with his fervid and prophetic eloquence. The one was distinguished for his zeal in planting Christianity among a fierce and barbarous people; the other for his zeal in plying the votaries of luxury and fashion with the Calvinistic lessons of the same faith which the ancient Saint had taught thirteen hundred years before—in the very place, too, whence the modern preacher proceeded on his mission to the British metropolis. The dust of both is now sleeping under the grandest of Scotland's old cathedrals!

In ascending from the crypt to the nave, the change brings a pleasing relief to the mind. It is like passing from darkness and death to light and life; while the thoughts rise with these mounting pillars, and from that lofty roof, to the celestial heights beyond, which such material forms cannot but suggest. And in unison with the Christian idea of the architectural design, the kindred art of painting is here finely displayed. On the windows around, Old Testament scenes are depicted, with exquisite skill and brilliant effect, appealing to the heart and spirit with all the tenderness of that human sympathy, and all the sacred awe of that Divine element, which make the history of the chosen people so touching and sublime. The last window we survey, ere leaving the nave, is truly a noble production, representing an illustrious succession of Jewish prophets—Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Malachi, and the Baptist. We realise the appropriate character and mission of each; and, reflecting on the gradual development of the Mosaic as a preparation for the Christian dispensation, we slowly pass on to the choir, and gaze with admiration upon the great eastern window. The four Evangelists are now before us; and their distinctive features—as we fancy them to have been—are here rendered with consummate ability. Turning at length from this chaste and magnificent window to inspect those in the north and south sides of the church, we are soon engaged in a delightful and instructive study. Scenes and incidents from the Gospel story are vividly portrayed to the eye; while comforting, pure, and elevating lessons are calmly but impressively conveyed to the mind. As a suitable close to the series of such instructions, which Christ came to deliver, we have an admirable painting of the Resurrection, where he appears in meekness and majesty, holding in his hand the palm of his divine victory over death and the grave. The drawing and colouring in these pictures are beyond all praise, giving a bold relief to the objects which is uncommon in glass painting. In all the windows this is remarkable, and it imparts a strength and distinctness to the figures, in the Lady Chapel especially, that seem to startle every visitor. Here we have the Apostles presented in a style of living power. While gazing on these inspired preachers, and marking their distinctive lines of expression and character, we feel as if we more clearly understood the high endowments that enabled them to encounter the opposition of Judaism, idolatry, barbarism, and philosophy, in proclaiming the Gospel and planting the Church.

The effect of the pictorial decorations, as a whole, is improving and sublime. While their subjects are certainly in every respect suitable to a place of worship, a style of art has been adopted that quite accords with that bold and serious architecture of which this Cathedral is so splendid an example. The feeling produced by pointed arches, clustered pillars, and rich ornaments ascending, tier upon tier, towards the lofty roof, and all so finely adjusted as to approach the very acme of harmonious combination, is far from being disturbed by the various colours that radiate from the painted windows. The artists who executed the decorations have so managed their colours, that without marring either the sweetness of their delicate touches or the intensity of their pellucid tints, they have sufficiently preserved that sober twilight which so well becomes our Gothic architecture. The 'dim religious light' is ever present in our mind with an edifice like this; and may every line of the following quotation be here always appropriate:—

'Let my due feet never fall
To walk the studious cloister's pale;
And love the high embossed roof,
With antique pillars massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light.'

And that the succeeding lines, also, may ere long be equally appropriate to this place, it is certainly not sacrilegious to wish:—

'There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-voiced choir below;
In service high and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes.'

Such music as Milton loved, and such painting as is here to be seen, are entirely in keeping with the character of this venerable structure; and the union of both would give additional depth and elevation to the devotions of all who worship within its sacred precincts. The use of the organ in churches is, doubtless, not agreeable to northern taste; but the pictorial embellishment of this church is an evidence of marked change in matters of this kind. The hatred, indeed, to the beautiful in art which has been so characteristic of Scottish Presbyterianism, was less stern and destructive in Glasgow than in many other places, even at the time of the Reformation; and to this circumstance do we owe the preservation of this edifice. When an Act had been passed encouraging a wholesale demolition of such churches, the inhabitants were so much incensed at the attempt that was in consequence made, to erase the pride of their city, that they flew to arms, and dared any one to pull down a single stone of the building; and thus was saved from the fury of a mistaken zeal the Cathedral of Glasgow. All honour to the memory of the citizens who did so well in preserving such a monument; for it is indeed a grand old Cathedral, eminently conducive to solemn thought and devout aspirations. Our visit to it recalled to us these noble sentences of Frederick Schlegel:—'All architecture is symbolical, but none so much so as the Christian architecture of the middle age. The first and the greatest of its objects is to express the elevation of holy thoughts, the loftiness of meditation set free from earth and proceeding unfettered to the heavens. It is this which stamps itself at once on the spirit of the beholder, however little he may himself be capable of analysing his feelings, when he gazes on these far stretching columns and airy domes. . . . When we view the whole structure, from the crypt to the choir, it is impossible to resist the idea of earthly death leading only to the fulness, the freedom, the solemn glories of eternity.'

The pleasure of our visit was enhanced by a view from the tower, which the warden of the Cathedral kindly permitted us to enjoy. From this elevation, about 230 feet above the level of the Clyde, the scene is picturesque and interesting in a high degree. Beneath and close at hand is the Necropolis, a burying-ground beautified both by nature and art, where the most prominent of the monuments with which it is stud-ded is that of John Knox, 'the reformer of a nation,' to whom Scotland is so much indebted for the purity of her religious creed, and the excellence of her popular education. To the south-west, the city, under a canopy of smoke, extends with its elegant spires, and tall brick chimneys; while to the east, the eye rests on a long vista of hill, and dale, and woodland. It is interesting, where we stood, to muse on the growth and condition of a place like Glasgow. On the very spot below us it had its birth; for the Cathedral was certainly the nucleus of the city, whose streets have branched southwards to the river, which has ministered so much to a recent but vast development of commerce and population. During the last fifty years the development has been amazing,—the Customs revenue having, in that time, increased from £7,500 to £912,190, and the population from 100,740 to 403,140. At present, Glasgow is, in business and intelligence, one of the greatest of our British cities; but with all its greatness, like other such centres of industry, it has its abject poverty and squalid wretchedness, as well as its abundant wealth and its refined enjoyments. And it is sad to think that in spite of the numerous agencies, secular and sacred, which are employed to elevate all classes to the common benefits of a Christian brotherhood, the melancholy difference is still so manifest between affluence and want, and between happiness and misery. Throughout the entire progress of Glasgow, testimony more or less faithful has been borne to the glory of a Christian life. While these innumerable church spires have risen, one after another, as if pointing all eyes to man's nobler destiny, yet how little heed has been given to the eloquence either of audible speech or of silent symbol! LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

November 21, 1836.

I HAD exhausted nearly the whole of my self-allotted hour—turning over all the papers in the old box, reading a scrap here and an entire sheet there—when, hidden underneath the MSS. and carefully wrapped up in a corner by itself, I lighted on a small soft bundle. This I found to contain several minute articles of underclothing; no doubt worn in infancy by Mrs. Falconer's child—now our ward. These I carefully examined, and was rather surprised to perceive upon them all, distinctly marked, the initials 'L. G.' Now this circumstance—trifling as it was, yet taken in connection with the extraordinary likeness of the boy to my old picture of Stephen Grey—puzzled me, and set me a-thinking long and deeply. I was rising at last, a little disappointed at the scant information afforded by the box, when a crumpled paper I had overlooked fell from my knees upon the floor. I took it up; and perceiving it was a letter, or rather the fragment of one, I walked to the window, and, unfolding my prize, read the following:—

'My dearest Marion,—How can I write you the woful tidings? Just when I thought that another week would bring me to you and our boy at Nice, here am I suddenly lodged in Hereford prison, by that cruel Johnson, the most merciless of my creditors! How he managed to track me, so soon after my arrival from Australia, notwithstanding my extreme caution (with the change of name, too!), I know not. He plainly thinks I shall be forced to apply to Mrs. Weston to relieve me; but this I will never do. Mean-time, write to me, Marion, my beloved wife! I dare scarce ask you to use the small sum I now enclose to bring you and our darling Louis to England, that I may see you both once more; for though my heart yearns'—Here the words were effaced, the paper being partially torn, and blistered seemingly by tears.

'Tell Madame Pufesne'—Here other great blots rendered several lines illegible; while the ending of the brief epistle was the saddest and most bitterly conclusive of all:—'O Marion! I sometimes fear you are ill—very ill; and then the thought that I may be the cause drives me nearly mad! Does it not seem almost a mockery for me to say "God Almighty bless you and the child"? What right have I to invoke blessings? And yet I may have been more sinned against than sinning'—Renewed obliterations. Then comes the crowning revelation, in the full signature—'Your own STEPHEN GREY.'

When I came to this, the letters actually danced before my eyes; and, full of amazement and self-gratulation at the unlooked for discovery I had made, I hastily unlocked the door and flew to seek my aunt. I showed her the tiny garments marked 'L. G.'; and I read to her, almost breathlessly, the document I had just perused—no doubt the very letter over which the poor woman had wept so much, as told to my aunt by her French landlady. I felt strangely excited; and it was not till arrested by the peculiarly grave expression of Mrs. Aubrey's countenance, bent steadily upon mine, that I awoke to the sickening reflection that I was now perfectly powerless to aid the person of whom I had been so long in search. With this blighting thought came that other sore remembrance of our own reverse of fortune; and my heart sank in a bewilderment of grief and remorse too painful for silent endurance. 'O dear kind friend!' I said, 'when I reflect on my own heinous folly in the time past, and how I have worse than mispent the gold that might have been so useful now, I could wish that my head were laid low beneath the churchyard mound!'

'Nay, nay, Katherine,' said my aunt mildly, while an arm was thrown lovingly round my neck. 'Not weary of life yet, surely! Look up, and let us talk the matter over composedly.' We did so. But, of course, I was impatient to get home and relate my discovery to George, not sorry to have this new incident wherewith if possible to detach his mind from his own more serious affairs.

November 22.

How do the identity and the whereabouts of this Stephen Grey elude us at every turning! When, at my request, George wrote to the governor of Hereford prison, he got for answer that 'the person in question (if he meant Mr. Falconer) had left his keeping a good while ago.' So, though one thing is clear that he is the father of Louis (and how proud should I be to show him his son!), the clue to our finding him is in the meantime lost. Did anybody visit him in the jail? No. He received one or two letters—that was all. How did he get out of confinement? By producing a legal document authorizing his release. Whither had he gone? No one knew.

Mr. Locke has been brought to justice, and sentenced to imprisonment. My husband is still dreadfully cast down—not knowing how to extricate himself from his manifold difficulties. I try to be cheerful; but it is sad uphill work. A blight seems to have fallen on us and ours.

December 5.

We have had a visit from Charles Beaumont; and through him a piece of information has transpired, in a most extraordinary way. It appears that in the autumn of this year Charles returned from the south of France, via Bordeaux, to Dublin, and in conversation with the captain a curious story was elicited of a passenger who had gone out the previous spring, in the same vessel. The captain described him as a youngish man, with dark curling hair, and bright black eyes, who was wont to sit apart in moody abstraction—often prolonging his lonely watch all night upon deck. He called himself Falconer, and so was entered in the ship's books; but his linen was marked St. Grey, and the captain was of opinion that he had assumed the former name from motives of concealment. A storm overtook them in the Bay of Biscay, and though frequently urged to go below for shelter from the pitiless blast, this taciturn man positively refused, seeming to find a dreary satisfaction in baring his head to the rage of the elements. After a night of pitch darkness and tempest, the passenger, who had been last seen leaning desolately against the side bulwarks, was missed from his post, and nowhere to be found. Of course, the universal conclusion was that he had been washed overboard in the hurricane; and having no luggage but a small bundle which he usually kept beside him, and which was also gone, all trace of his identity had disappeared. As Charles was ignorant of the long train of circumstances connecting us with this Mr. Falconer, he could scarce comprehend the interest with which George and I heard the story. And when we told him, he only laughed and said 'You are all right now. No doubt that was your very man, going out to Nice to see his wife. And, since both are perished, you will never be troubled either with fanciful scruples or flesh and blood personalities.'

Alas, alas! poor Stephen Grey! was this to be thy miserable fate? Thou—an only child, and born to fortune—destined to be the victim of parental prejudice, and, for a few juvenile indiscretions, to suffer penury, ruin, imprisonment, and a grave among the billows of ocean! Mystery of life! and of death no less! what can philosophy do to solve it? Literally nothing. This is but one case out of millions where the Great Ruler puts on (so to speak) the thickest robe of His infinity, and strikes us dumb and prostrate before His impenetrable wisdom.

[Here my friend's diary makes a fair leap of upwards of three years, and the next extract bears date]

'March 11, 1840.

Well, whatever people may say I pronounce poverty to be an evil full of mitigations. In other words, to be poor is not to be so unhappy as is generally supposed. George and I are very poor. We have been growing poorer and poorer ever since that terrible defalcation of Mr. Locke's. At first my husband was nearly unhinged by that miserable affair and its consequences. But he gradually took heart and faced the worst like a true Briton. He gathered all his business friends and business faculties about him with renewed vigour; and, being resolved that no single client should link loss of substance with the name of Weston, he rose like a giant to the manifold emergencies of the ordeal, and, by casting off every the smallest encumbrance to the one grand aim, he has won for himself a high and noble place in the estimate of his fellow men. Armed with the panoply of a stainless honour, he girded himself to the battle. Every superfluity to which, either individually or in his household, he had been accustomed was thrown aside. Economy the most rigid became the standing order both at home and abroad. We left our pretty home, with the garden and the green gate, endeared to us by so many witching associations, and betook us to our present confined and humbler lodging. Instead of three domestics, we made shift with one. We retrenched, we saved, we struggled inch by inch of our way. But why do I speak in the past tense? for, are we not doing the same at this moment? And still—O Kate, Kate! who will dare to say that thou art unhappy? Nay! the mitigations do so infinitely and undeniably transcend the calamity, that I would not change my condition in an iota from what it now is. No, not even to return to my old luxury, if so the ignorance must remain, which would be but a sorry bliss in lieu of those rousing experiences to which hardships have given birth. O George! were you ever dearer to me than in the last few years of our trouble and our poverty? O my children! (for I have now four darlings besides Louis, who is scarcely less my own;) could I ever have loved you so well, save through the necessity of tending you night and day with these willing hands? O home, and kindred, and friendship! how could I have prized ye aright but by contrast with the world's cold selfishness, which flies poverty as a pestilence? O earth and sky, river and hill, forest and field! they that are rich and increased in goods behold ye not with the keen sensibilities whose edge has been sharpened by privation and trial. They that have been always lounging on the lap of plenty see nature but imperfectly, as from the misty valleys. But poverty lifts us to the mountain tops; and, showing us all the kingdoms of the world, bids us weigh their glory and their vanity in the true balance of Heaven. And then, instead of the gold that perisheth—which, beheld aright, is but a stone—we find we have got the true bread—the good gift which none but He can bestow!

[Enter Louis, Charlotte, Walter, and Hetty—the latter a very diminutive specimen, whose uncertain equilibrium is tenderly upheld by her brother, aged three and a-half years.]

'Well, darlings, which of you wishes to get the first kiss from mamma?'

Louis makes a dart at Hetty, and, lifting her stoutly in his arms, places her in my lap. I perform the ceremony to the wee rosy mouth, while the rest stand round my knees. 'Mamma, Willie is awake,' whispers Charlotte. 'We were sitting quietly in the nursery telling stories, when I peeped into the cot, and there he was lying with his eyes wide open, and quite good.'

Now, this Willie is my baby, aged three months; and Rachel having always a mass of other work to do, I am specially nurse to him, as well as generally to the entire household. And where could I find sweeter labour? So I put Hetty quickly down at this information, and flew off to the adjoining room—for ours is a very small house, indeed, just four apartments, and no wearisome inner stairs; and everything must be kept in its own place to save confusion; and thus we are all learning the most scrupulous neatness in our habits.

I return to the parlour with baby, and have much to do to keep him from being smothered with caresses by his elders.

'Ma,' asks Walter, 'when will I be big like Louis, and have a bow and arrow, and a sawd (sword)?'

Louis (who has been standing apart for a minute or two, as if in meditation), 'Mamma, when is Charlotte going to have a new frock? I have had two new coats since she has had one—'

'Do you think Charlotte would look prettier in a new frock than in her old one?' A pause—during which he darts a lightning glance upon her, then replies, hesitatingly, 'Perhaps—I don't know—I think not.'

'Would you love her better in a new frock?'

'No'—with quick decision.

'Then, if she looks as pretty, and as much to be loved in the old frock, what does it signify?'

My logic seemed an overmatch for him. He was fairly nonplussed, yet he shortly renewed the charge.

'Then, what is the use of anybody getting new clothes; and why do you give them to me?'

It was now my turn to be puzzled. 'You know, Louis, boys are great romps, so their clothes are sooner worn out.' He smiled a sweet, manly, ingenious smile. He was evidently overcome by my line of argument, and read no deeper than the light surface which I had thrown over the question.

Mem.—Little does the dear boy imagine that, though it takes but a little bit of stuff to make a frock, we have to calculate our outlay so nicely that nothing is bought that can possibly be wanted. And what a horrid thing it is to speak to children about money, and say that such or such a thing cannot be got because money is scarce, or that it may be got because it is plentiful! What disgusting, mercenary monsters would not such revelations make of the fairest and purest of God's creatures!

A few minutes after the door-bell rang, and Mr. Cuthbert came in. This is Louis's tutor—a gentleman of quiet manners, of kind but firm temper, and an elegant yet profound scholarship. He had come to take his young charge home to Aunt Aubrey's, where both are residing at present. By-the-by, this boy is amply fulfilling his childhood's promise, and is now a splendid type of a youth of eleven years. With his growing height, his intelligence keeps more than equal pace, while a beautiful docility of disposition marks his every thought and feeling. This quality (I mean docility) is the only royal road to solid improvement. Mr. Cuthbert says the whole current of his ideas already indicate the profession for which he will ultimately be best suited. Military exercises and military glory are with him not a mere boyish fancy—they are incorporated with all his notions of a great and useful life. And George says 'Mon capitaine must not be thwarted in his choice. If in a few years he wishes to be a soldier, a soldier he shall be.'

[Here comes another gap in the journal, which goes on to]

June 22, 1845.

There is no fairer sight on earth than children at play, gathering flowers in the summer fields or bounding on the sands by the sea. There is an earnest simplicity about them, their looks, their gestures, their ringing shouts, that carries resistless attraction. Even the petty mischances that occur at such times, calling forth little ebullitions of temper, are interesting as indicative of future character. For nowhere is the childish nature so discernible as when sporting at freedom beneath the broad canopy of heaven. Then are idiosyncrasies revealed. Then the good or evil is blurted out at once; and the proud, violent, selfish, awkward, sullen, defiant, or cowardly stand forth, in bold contrast to the gentle, the patient, the courageous, the kind, the loving. Parents would do well to think of this and act upon it. Study your boys and girls in the play-ground. Inartificial as they are everywhere, circumstances arise to call forth their individualities there as in no other place. Station yourselves skilfully where, unseen, or at least unregarded, you may see and hear each slightest movement and tone. Let nothing, however small, escape your vigilance, for trifles are links in the great chain; and a frown, a smile, a silent glance, like a lightning flash that shows the whole landscape, may lay bare the entire mechanism of some little heart in a moment. Be sure you mark and remember, too, as well as watch; for these minutiae, vouchsafed to your careful waiting, are but so much stock-in-trade for future use. These are the heterogeneous dust out of which the coin is to be manufactured, while the dross is denounced and rejected. This is the great sowing-time of life, when the weeds must be rooted up from amid the tender grain—the brightest and most momentous of the seven ages of humanity.

George and I have been sitting on this bank for a good hour, watching our little lads and lasses at their play. We have six children now—four of them boys; and the study of their diverse characters is a perpetual feast. Every time we are so employed, we know better how to deal with their daily training. I am sorry to see Walter so quick of temper, and that Hetty has a considerable touch of obstinacy in her nature. Willie is slow and meditative, while our baby, Harry, is as yet perfectly undeveloped. But what of Charlotte? I dare not trust myself to speak of her—so exquisitely lovely in face and form—such a gentle, earnest, affectionate soul—so patient—so devoted—so lightly moved to compassion—so deeply stirred by all that is generous and true! Ten summers has she bloomed beside us, our first-born—our golden-haired, our sapphire-eyed one! If life is spared to her for another ten years, she will have grown into a perfect woman, 'nobly planned,' to fulfil all high womanly duties. Where—and with whom? Here I pause and meditate.

Louis (whose mind has been finely developing and enriching by Mr. Cuthbert and his other teachers) has been for some time attending the Military College. And his old predilection still continuing strong upon him, it is settled that in a year or two hence a commission shall be purchased for him in a suitable regiment. The more I ponder that boy's history in connection with myself, the more clearly I trace the working of the great law of compensation—that as he was at first deprived of worldly portion through my means, he should afterwards, through me also, be abundantly recompensed. And again, in return for my tardy justice having been frustrated by the wicked and fraudulent, that the recipient of this larger wealth should have proved himself so entirely worthy of the dower. Speaking of ways and means, I am pleased beyond measure to know that, as George's affairs have now got once again into a more healthy condition, we are very shortly to remove back into our former house—the dear familiar house, with the vegetables in the kitchen garden behind (ah! those green peas—I always laugh when I think of my own greenness in the early housekeeping days), and the sweet flowers in front, and the gate in the wall, and the thousand delightful accessories that cling around my first married home. It is almost worth while to have lost it for the pleasure of regaining it. And George is so happy too! Every client has been paid every farthing owing him. We are to take possession on the 25th of next month, which is Charlotte's birthday, when a little jubilee is projected by the children. And this dingy lodging, where we have been poor yet contented ever, is to be left for new tenants. Well, Kate, see to this one thing at all events, that if poverty has taught you any useful lesson, you do not leave the good hints behind you in the inferior dwelling. Walk softly, Kate, and warily. Your pilgrimage may be far more chequered yet ere you die. As flowers owe their choicest odour to the dew, so tears may best draw out the sweetness from the soul. But when the sun shines forth again, the flowers are still fragrant; and long after the tears are dried, why should not the heart distil its most pure and grateful essence?

'WHISTLE BINKIE.'

THE deuks were dabblin' mang the dubbe,
The hens were huddlin' a' thegither,
Sae traikit-like, they hadna heart
To scart the grund or stralk a feather;
The rain cam' pourin' down in strings,
As if the sky were rent asunder,
And Nancy in the chimla-nuk
Sat threatenin' me wi' groolin' thunder.

The cat was somewhere neath the bed;
She couldna hand the blink securely;
And liltie on its wee bit bank
Sat twinkin' mutely and demurely;
The bairns, puir things! wi' bulks and toys
Were heartenin' i'ther ben the roomie,
They durstna claim the right o' speech
When thunder-cluds were gatherin' gloomy.

I kept the creepie mim as mense,
And tried to ca' my glaikit fancy
Along the causeway to the laird's
Wi' siller hain'd in sma's frae Nancy;
She kitted, like a cauld in drink,
I fairried gin I'd best knock under,
Or tak' a back hand o' the w's
And bide the brattle o' the thunder.

'Ye feckless, blinterin' owl!' she skried,
'Are ye dead-set on our undoin'?'
Will stroude o' rhyme fill empty wames?
Will poetessin' hand's frae ruin?
Ye've wared the price o' meal and peats
On these full's havers, "Whistle Binkie," What's "Jennie Morrison" to me?
Wha cares a doit for "Willie Winkie"?

'I'se warr'n the tane's a toom-the-stoup,
And 'tither some rampagin' randy;
Yer shameless praise o' sic like jeets
Whad mair nor deaven Soutar Sandy;
But tak' yer fling; wind a' yer pirms,
And ne'er let hamely counsel steer ye,
Though Want comes ben for guid-an'-a',
Yer tuneless sangs may hand us cheerie.'

I laugh'd for glee and crack'd my thoom',
And flang my weel-pangt spleuchan till her;
She couldna find a single tune
To cow the kindly clink o' siller.
'That's fees for liltin' sangs,' said I,
'And heazin' up the heart to duty,
And haudin' freems wi' lo'esome things,
Till lowin' souls improved their beauty.'

'Guidman,' quo she, 'ye're safe to speed,
Ye beat the warld for kind contrivin';
I kenna what gars frien's cast out,
Thae sinfu' ploys prevent our thrivin';
But let us sing o' love's return,
Or gie's a screed o' "Whistle Binkie,"
Wha's jo is "Jennie Morrison"?'
What kind o' lad is "Willie Winkie"?

While in the neuk we twasome sat,
A countin' owre a' comforts comin',
The whittierin' liltie tried new strains,
And baudrons on the blink sat thrummin';
By anes the bairns cam' creepin' ben,
To glower a wee in silent wonder;
And, syne, their lovin' hearts brak out
Like birdies after claps o' thunder.

WATER—ITS ELEMENTS AND PROPERTIES.

'All forms that perish other forms supply;
By turns we catch the vital breath, and die.'

BESIDES the characteristics of oxygen already observed, there are a few others of equal importance, which we shall now endeavour to explain. And, firstly, oxygen has a wider range of affinity than any other element—that is to say, it will enter the bonds of chemical union with more elements than any other. It constitutes a third of our globe's crust, preponderating in all rocks and soils. Nevertheless, it is largely diffused through organic nature in general. The following table shows the per centage of oxygen in a few of the well-known articles of common life, and will impart an idea of the importance which the Creator has attached to this regal constituent of matter in the formation of our globe:—

Atmospheric air,	20 per cent.
Water,	89 "
Lean beef,	74 "
(Or about $\frac{2}{3}$ of a lb. in 1 lb. of beef-steak.)
Blood,	76 "
Skin,	61 "
Bone,	35 "
Bread in general,	67 "
Potatoes,	79 "
Turnips,	84 "
Oatmeal,	57 "
Milk,	81 "
Sugar,	51½ "
Paper and linen,	50 "
Washing soda,	73 "
Coal (which is mostly carbon),	8 "
Whisky,	56 "
Starch,	49 "
Butter,	17 "
Glass,	32 "
Ruby,	47 "

Animals,	75 "
Vegetables,	80 "
Minerals,	80 "

Again, oxygen is colourless, transparent, tasteless, and inodorous. You cannot see it, smell it, taste it, or grasp it; yet it is there—a thin, fleet, wild, subtle something—nothing; the seal of eternal youth burning on its viewless front, and the arms of its Omnipotent Rider embossed on its naked breast. It has been gnawing at our globe's crust since the oldest, when the marbly granite began to crystallise around the fiery sea. The present surface of our globe is the gorgeously illuminated frontispiece of that ponderous volume, on whose stony leaves and metaliferous pages are enshrined the embalmed skeletons of extinct organisms, and all clad with the fingerprints of this princely potentate of matter—this thin, toiling menial of the great 'I AM'—this bloodhound of the atmosphere, couching in all its compounds like a slumbering lion or a starving wolf.

Although oxygen is the vital principle of our breath, yet in an isolated state it will not support animal life. By referring to the foregoing table, it will be seen that atmospheric air contains only 20 per cent. of oxygen, the remaining 80 parts (with the exception of an exceedingly minute portion of carbonic acid) are an elementary body termed nitrogen, which is pre-eminently negative in its nature. It does not support animal life; is devoid of colour, taste, and smell; is neither acid nor alkaline; is not a combustible, nor will it support combustion. But give this drowsy sluggish companions for which it has an affinity, and instantly it unravels its coils, and starts up a crested, hissing, scaly snake—secreting, as it were, some of the most intense poisons known, such as nitric acid, prussic acid, morphine, chloroform, strychnine, and conia (juice of hemlock); also, nicotine (extract of tobacco), &c. Now, it is an established truth that the nitrogen and oxygen of the atmosphere are not in chemical union, the particles of the two gases being mixed mechanically—just as we would mingle 20 grains of barley with 80 of wheat, without bruising them so that each would lose its identity. And it must be obvious, in considering the intense energies of oxygen, that the dull heavy nitrogen is mingled with it as a diluent, to regulate its powers to the exact degree of vitality; because, as already stated, animals cannot exist in pure oxygen, in consequence of its violent action on the tissues, which causes them to stimulate too powerfully, resulting in premature death.

The reader will perhaps pardon us in stepping aside from our main subject for a little to contemplate this supreme creation, oxygen, toiling in the great workshop of nature.

We have already stated that the same substances produce vitality and cause death according to the proportion in which the elements forming them are combined; and to illustrate this we will take a compound of one part oxygen and four parts nitrogen, being the exact composition of pure atmospheric air; and all know how essential pure air is in stimulating the functions of life. Now, in the chemical manipulations of the laboratory, a red-coloured, horribly-suffocating, poison-fuming gas is often generated termed nitrous acid (NO_2), the composition of which, as in the formula, is one of nitrogen in combination with four of oxygen. Then, as already stated, the composition of vital air is one of oxygen to four of nitrogen; so that the elements of this gas are exactly that of the atmosphere inversely, the former being a chemical and the latter a mechanical compound.

How easy then for the Infinite Creator, who arranged the particles of air to support life, to disarrange, or, shall we say, arrange them, and produce death; to turn our beautiful azure crystalline atmosphere, without the addition of any extraneous agent whatever, into a frightful ocean of red-fuming poison, which, in a few seconds, would corrode the most secret vitals of animation—suffocating a creature with her own breath, annihilating every germ of reproduction, and settling down, like a bloody mist or shrouding sea of smoking gore, upon the gigantic superlucous creation!

'Our very breath
Contains the lurking principle of death.'

We have previously stated that oxygen is a supporter of combustion; and as there are various phases of this process—some causing light and heat, others producing heat only—we shall now say a few words on the burning or oxidation of our food, showing the importance of pure air and a few of the relations existing between carbon and oxygen.

It is well known that carbon enters as extensively into the composition of animals and vegetables as oxygen into minerals. Carbon, therefore, may be said to rule in organic and oxygen in inorganic nature; but do these two potentates of animate and inanimate matter live on terms of amity? Is the one pleased to dwell only in all its endless variety of animated forms—those of the reasoning mind and the instinctive sense, of the verdant blade and the painted flower, of the humble shrub and the towering tree? And is the other content to have the bulk of its being for ever kneaded into barren mountain ranges, or baked and buried in ponderous blocks of trap and quartz in the globe's bosom, or to roll and moan for ever in its ocean chains above the central fires? No; the regal hyena—the keen rapacious oxygen—has a sufficiency of its limbs free, in the form of atmospheric air, to be perpetually invading the territory of its less powerful but more peaceful neighbour; while carbon, on the other hand, with all its grand array of plants and animals, is as often harassing the rear of the rampant gladiator, freeing its subjects from his clenched fangs and disappointing him of his prey; and in this ceaseless contest between these two powerful elements, we recognise the throbbings of that immense engine which heaves the pulses of animated nature, and commands the flood-gates of life and death. Carbon of itself is a harmless substance, and exists pure as plumbago, anthracite, lampblack, and more especially the diamond. It is the luminous principle of coal, wood, and oily matters, and is remarkable for its stable properties. The beams of the theatre of Hercules were found to be entirely perfect (of course in a carbonised state) after being buried for 2000 years in an overwhelming flood of lava, proceeding from a terrific eruption of Vesuvius. The charred skeleton of the Roman sentinel, and those of the prisoners which he may have been guarding, have also been found in an entire state of preservation. We may mention here, also, that air taken from some of the chambers of this doomed city, and also from the tombs of the ancient kings of Egypt, after being hermetically sealed for 3000 years, is found to be as rich in oxygen as the present atmosphere of our globe.

In partaking a meal, say of animal and vegetable food, it is first masticated by the teeth, mixed with the saliva, and, being reduced to a pulpy condition, is drawn into the stomach considerably mingled with common air, where it comes in contact with various solvents, and a white milky fluid, designated chyle, is eliminated; then conveyed into the circulation and sent into the lungs, where it comes in contact with the oxygen of the air, which turns it red, and at every inspiration is combining with the etherialized carbonaceous particles of the chyle and blood in the proportion of two of oxygen to one of carbon; and it is during this combination that the natural heat of our bodies is generated. The heat itself, however, must not be considered as a material product of their incorporation, more than we would hold the gleam of a candle to be composed of the wick and tallow, or the boom of a cannon made of gunpowder, iron, and atmospheric air. Further, as the blood is beating through the various ramifications back to the lungs, laden with the waste products of the body, it is highly essential to health that it there come in contact with pure air, in order that the impurities, which are chiefly of a carbonaceous character, may be oxidised; and we need not wonder that the Registrar's returns show a preponderance of longevity in favour of the rural districts, when we think of the pure atmosphere which surrounds them, and compare it with the dense volumes of pestilential gases continually evolved, and lodging in the wofully ventilated confines of great cities, where the squalid denizens are stifled in murky dens, reeking with ammonia and thick with carbonic acid; where, as a meagre substitute for heaven's pure oxygen, the sanatorial brush occasionally makes its appearance, besmeared with a temporary antidote (hydrate of lime), for the purpose of rendering the former more volatile and solidifying the latter; but though it may lessen the rancour, it will not heal the wound. Impure air and slow poison are synonymous.

But to show, for example, how the evolution of heat is accelerated by quick respiration, we observe that a horse when galloping becomes warmed above the usual bodily temperature, which is chiefly to be ascribed to the increased volumes of oxygen, which the animal is forced to inhale, and consequently the food is sooner burned on the stomach, and an additional quantity sooner necessary as an equivalent to its extra labour.

There is another product of respiration and digestion besides heat, viz. carbonic acid (CO_2). The oxygen of the air, on entering the lungs, combines chemically with the carbon of the blood in the proportion of one of the latter to two of the former, and is instantly expelled by the breath, as the above poisonous and suffocating gas; and it is obvious that this doing and undoing, this charging and exhausting, continually going on between the vital vivifying oxygen of the air and the deleterious carbonaceous particles with which the venous blood, dark and laden, is ever travelling into the tanned and spongy chambers of life, constitutes the very mainspring of existence, the basis on which vitality is pivoted. If we imagine digestion operating and respiration stopped, or at least oxygen withheld, it must be evident that death would immediately ensue—the blood becoming choked with carbonic acid. And again, let us suppose that digestion has ceased its functions, but respiration is free and pure air abundant, and what would be the consequence? The oxygen would in a very short time burn up the stream of life in its thousand channels. It will therefore be apparent that great quantities of carbonic acid are produced by the respiration of animals alone, which, day and night while life continues, are generating it at every breath; besides that caused by the decomposition of vegetable and animal bodies, and the combustion of inconceivable quantities of hydrocarbons, used in commerce as sources of heat and light; and an inquiring mind will be apt to put the question, What becomes, then, of all these immense quantities of carbonic acid produced as previously stated? and why is it that all the free oxygen is not exhausted, and the atmosphere charged instead with the suffocating carbonic acid?

The problem is easily solved. I have already said that carbon is lord of the vegetable kingdom. Let us then, in fancy, travel back to the dawn of creation—to the Azoic period—and the fiery embryo of our globe is mantled with the primeval atmosphere, and not even the lowest form of animal organism existing in its newly-distilled shoreless oceans still warm with the miraculous combination of their marvellous constituents and chemically chaste—deep down to the glistening granite floor, over which they hiss, and seethe, and roll;—this before the gigantic and gorgeous flora of the carboniferous period had struck a root or opened a bud of that rich green drapery which was yet to float, in emerald clouds, upon the surface of the globe;—this before the formation of the immense coal-measures—those huge black folds of compressed vegetable matter which lie crushed beneath the weight of continents, and represent the solid carbon of those primeval and impenetrable forests, whose tangled roots and dark fronds sucked pure the pestiferous atmosphere in the infant cycles of our globe's being. And now let us advance another degree in creation; and, behold! the dry land has lifted its bare stony shoulders triumphantly above the deep. But all is yet enveloped, from the sea-level to the highest mountain summit, in an atmosphere of heavy moving, dull, miasmatic vapours, principally carbonic acid and nitrogen, highly inimical to life. All is a valley of the shadow of death. And yet not so, as no life hitherto hath pulsed in its precincts; no song-birds make the air vocal, for there are no groves for them to nestle in; there is no lowing of cattle upon a thousand hills, for there are no verdant meadows wherewith to pasture them; no beauteous flowerets unfold their lustrous petals to the honey-bee amid the barren clefts of the iron rocks; no hardy moss yet dares to creep forth, or gigantic lichen unfurl its green flag in rank luxuriance. The pale red beams of the blessed sun can scarcely struggle through these thick gases which swaddle the infant world; and there is not even a sufficiency of free oxygen in the atmosphere to nurture the combustion of a lighted taper. But let us turn another leaf of this stone album; let us pass by cycles of ages and revisit the scene. What a change! It is clothed with immense forests, reeking with tepid swamps, teeming with hideous monsters; and latterly nature seems hampered with her own fecundity; for, in another era, we behold that the entire aspect is changed—forests have been overturned by the roots, mountains crushed into soil, valleys elevated into hills, the waters of the sea thrown upon dry land, and the ocean bed has lifted its salt bosom to the sun. New races of forests are vegetating on the tombs of their ancestors; these, again, are buried, with all their grizzly inhabitants of tusk, and claw, and plate, and scale, again to be replaced by others. Now, after all these terrible phenomena, let us turn our attention to the atmosphere, and examine whether its constituents have undergone any change; and, behold! we find that it is lighter, purer, and more transparent; in short, that an immense quantity of its carbon has been solidified into wood; and that a marvellous bulk of its nitrogen has been assimilated into the bodies of animals, and stored up in the crust of our globe, and also in the existing families of both species. And this law is still intact in principle, though somewhat modified in its operations. Vegetables are still solidifying the carbon of the air in their trunks and branches; but that substance is not now the virgin carbon, if I may so speak, which was suspended in the primary atmosphere, although it is supplied in the same form and assimilated by the same process. Yet its origin may now be considered different, being produced, as already stated, by respiration, combustion, and decay.

LIFE—DEATH—IMMORTALITY.

(After the manner of Cowley.)

O Life! O Death! our certain part—
Our Alpha, Omega thou art,
Each standing on a far-off shore!
Here we rest, shivering on the sand,
Waiting the Pilot's friendly hand
To steer us to the heavenly land;
Where, for the gifted and the good,
Bloom bowers of green beatitude—
Afar, beyond the unknown sea,
Cloud-capp'd, and dark with mystery;
Save when, beneath a fitful light,
Hope gleams like leaping dolphin bright—
When Time to us shall be no more!

From Life's cold mansion many go,
From every point the winds do blow;
Round about, from dawn to dawn—
Some by day and some by night.
Some through the postern-gate do come;
By the wings some do pass; and some
By the porch seek their final home!
Some turn the corners round about,
And silently; some with a shout,
Yearning for the Isles of Light,
Assured, what time their exit be,
By the inscrutable decree—
By God's good grace—we all shall meet
(Through Christ our victory complete)—
SHALL MEET UPON THE LAWN!

D. CHRISTIE.

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'The gods in bounty work up storms about us,
That give mankind occasion to exert
Their hidden strength.'—Addison.

CHAPTER XIII.

THROUGH a long morning I sat at my desk dreaming—working—dreaming more than working—dreaming drearily and sadly of things past, present, and to come. Was it that some dim presentiment of evil rendered me unusually thoughtful? or was I only sitting as yet in the shadow of the darkness that was past?

A boatful of castaways in mid-ocean, three days after the last remnant of provision has been distributed in equal parts—night setting in and no sail visible—starvation in every face, revealed by faint star-gleams and the freething phosphorescent light of waves—waves lonely, though in infinite multitude—waves eternally following, and terrible with the mouths of sharks—a poor boatful of castaways; hope deadening with the last streaks of day, and the awful problem hanging remorselessly above them, unwhispered, but felt to be there—there, like the hair-suspended sword of Grecian story—there continually, engendering a madness frightfuller than the ultimate doom—'One of them must die! Which?'

Could it be that Barbara, knowing our pinched means—means girded against expansion as if by iron walls of fate, and with our national watchdogs of war, roused by a great alarm, putting their tax-gathering fangs in our immediate substance, making the little that was ours not ours by so much the less—could it be, I ask in my endless ingenuity of lamentation, that Barbara—whose name I strip of all fond epithets, and constitute it a very term of endearment in itself—had glided away, like a fawn to other pastures, with deliberate purpose of self-immolation, in order to make one mouth fewer at our scanty table? Ah! my brave illogical one!—to think that you should have sought to ease the sore pressure of our condition by laying upon it the immeasurable burden of your absence! Rather let me believe that, if going of your own will—for the sake of bosoms that would sob and eyes that would weep—severing strong ties of love through argument of their very strength—it must have been with some intuitive consciousness of the divine beauty of your youth, prompting you to take upon yourself the sacrificial resolve—as dreading a lost voice of prayer—to carry that beauty pleading to the skies for a certain forlorn household partially forsaken of the gods!

So sat I at my desk—my poor brain breaking into wings like a chrysalis—so sat I sorrowfully, diluting, at times, the ink with which I tried to make accurate summations, hoping I might succeed, but doubtful. Opposite me, facing me—on the warm side of the room, for was he not the heir-apparent of the Drums?—sat Joe M'Corkindale, with a countenance not beautiful at any time, but at this time strikingly the contrary of beautiful; nay, hideous almost with scarred and blackened memorials of dishonourable warfare in the night. Of course he had been garrotted and robbed by three, two, or five ruffians, not one of whom he would be able to identify—he was quite sure; so no use making a fuss to the police. The assault took place on the open pavement—at a comparatively early hour—while going straight home from an anti-social-evil lecture—he being perfectly sober at the time! Who could question the veracity of this narrative? Was it not stamped upon his face in colours the most unadorned? A tendency to Falstaff's variations as to the number of rogues in buckram could easily be accounted for by the confusion of the attack. The difficulty of counting knuckles, even where they leave a very strong impression, is conceivable. But the grand evidence to which he appealed was that his gold watch, which was always reluctant to go, was gone! Only old M'Corkindale looked sceptical, and growled inarticulate thunder, and put on such an expression that it needed all Joe's supplemented ugliness to prove him indubitably his child. 'Ah! sure a pair!' I thought to myself, with a shrug. Both were fairly matched, and in fine keeping, like ornaments for some devil's chimney-piece, profanely so to speak.

The old gentleman—I mean Mr. M'Corkindale—shut his room door as if he designed to show, according to his wont, that he was owner of the partition, and could loosen the plaster if he pleased. Joe thereupon—that is, the moment his back was turned—looked at me quizzically; and, putting his thumb-nail to the tip of his nose, made a fan of his outspread fingers. What would not Toole or Widdicombe have given for that bit of nature? But, ay me! I was in no mood for humour. Life is a serious thing when under the shadow of Death. Objects sometimes suggest their contrasts; and, out of the Heenan-like aspect—making a smile before me like the smile apt to be made by a twopenny looking-glass bought of some ragged pedlar—grew the vision of a face so heavenly beautiful, as to blind me with sudden blindness by its glorious lineaments. It was Barbara herself—none other; so real—so living—so present—so like as if she came to wonder at tears, and dissipate an illusion of bereavement, that I laid my forehead on my crossed arms, and, for a moment, refused to believe that she was dead. When I looked up, Joe was staring at me sympathetically; but the pathos sat so oddly on his disfigured countenance, that I could not forbear laughing; and Joe laughed too, thinking I had been shamming sorrow, and not appearing to comprehend that my so sudden tears of mirth were only as funeral baked-meats serving for a wedding-feast.

I accordingly proffered explanation, with becoming delicacy to a facial exhibition calculated to confound all passions; upon which he admitted it would be well he should hide himself for a month.

'You must keep less early hours, friend,' I remarked, 'for terror of the daylight.'—Curious advice, surely, to be addressed to a youth not particularly sure-footed in the dark, and fresh from the hands of cowardly phantom garroters—in buckram!

'I'm blowed,' he exclaimed, 'if I be seen anywhere but at masked balls.'

'Why, friend,' I continued, 'you must consort with owls and nightingales.'

'Twouldn't be the first time I have played the part of a night-bird,' interjected Joe, laughing.

'You must be seen nowhere,' I added, 'except where you shall not be seen at all.'

'Precisely; and so, Mr. Gray,' he said, taking a card from his pocket, 'I wish you to attend this Social Science Dinner. It is a pity the ticket should be lost. Old Brougham is to be in the chair.'

Brougham! What a name to conjure with! Yet what wonder if I wavered? A public festivity—at which fathers with living daughters might stab me, sending the steel here where everything, alas! is tenderest—how could I carry my cloud of unhappiness into that sunshine? The temptation was great—the disinclination strong—the propriety dubious. But my incomparable Adonis—not a bad blockhead at heart—imparted some sentiment of grace to the touches of negro blood about his eyes, by the manner in which he pressed me to take his place.

'You need cheering up a bit,' he said; and I answered that I was sorry to be a gainer by his mishap.

'Such are the chances of war,' he observed.

'But you are right,' I suggested for his consolation; 'were you to lend your countenance to the Social Science demonstration, it might possibly be little valued in its present damaged state.'

Joe exhibited the edge of a monstrous guffaw; but, glancing at a certain door, and fearing a certain ogre, suddenly smothered it up.

'How many ruffians did you say?' I inquired.

'Ah, no more of that, Hal! an you love me,'" was his serio-comic rejoinder, as he thrust the card into my hand.

When I went home to dress, my poor Jean—not now as she used to be, yet with the embers of her old aspirations easily fanned into flame—was much uplifted on being told that, like the immortal Robert Burns, I was about to dine with a lord. She was glad to hear of something promising at last—something that at all events sounded large—as we had still four daughters left.

'Situated as we are,' she said, 'society is everything.'

The slight bustle of cleaning my boots, and brush-ing my best coat, created a little wholesome excitement in our home of dreadful vacancy—the worker, Jessie, undertaking, in addition, to wash and iron me a handkerchief before I could pull on my gloves. Jean expressed a hope that I would push well up to the chair, and not let everybody else take all the speaking out of my mouth. The silly thing, Kate—so like what her mother was when I used to be writing insane rhymes about her!—inquired if there was any chance of my saking his lordship to call! Upon which we all joined in a little timid laughter—the first that had been heard within our house since our unspeakable trial. Isabella observed that she would like to have a peep of the hall, and of the ladies' dresses, from some quiet corner. As for Sophia, she wished that I might enjoy myself, and get up my spirits a little—an achievement beyond her own poor strength—ah! heaviest burdened of us all! My going out to a great public dinner was the first visible sign of the uplifting of that curtain of gloom under which we had lately moved—or scarcely moved—ghastly, with hearts which it would have been easy to let break.

The City Hall presented a gay and animating spectacle. It seemed as if all the fashionables of town and neighbourhood were there, of both sexes, handsomely costumed, and rowed promiscuously, at long tables, running in tolerably close parallels throughout the entire oblong area of the hall—every table being profusely patterned with the ornate culinary arts; while at each end were platforms, occupied by those who were supposed to occupy high ideal platforms in the general regard of the world. By-and-by, the mere feeding being over, the galleries all round became equally populous and lively; and the vast audience waited for the oratory which was to vindicate a great cause, and justify a magnificent ovation. Away up behind the noble chairman, in front of the large organ, was a gorgeous figure, in scarlet, satin, and beard—the 'Albany Herald,' to wit—imported from the Herald's College, Edinburgh—erect between two trumpeters, prepared to vociferate the toasts. Lord Brougham, with a head no whiter than my own—albeit I am a mere boy to him—a head not quite so superior, perhaps, in its interior furnishings, as our so different conditions would imply, yet a stubborn, achieving head, fitted to do immortal battle in great arenas. He spoke like an aged man who had either never known trepidation, or had long since survived it. There was pluck and emphasis about him, together with the absence of effort, like one assured of his position, remembering his prowess, and not doubting his success. His style was not so much oratory, as an echo of what was oratory once, for he was now eighty-two years of age. No passage palpitating with fresh beauty, or burning with original thought, escaped that whole evening from his lips. Yet I could not keep my eyes from him, as the shadow of a greatness that was colossal—as the reminiscence of a power that had shaken the world—as something nobly archaeological, handed down to us from days in which there were giants. Sir John Pakington—physically a somewhat small man, with deep-set eyes and prominent nose—spoke with fair ability and effect. Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, with head intellectual and bald; the Lord-Advocate, Mr. Moncrieff, handsome in feature, and full-toned and gentlemanly in voice—together with most of the other magnates of the night—acquitted themselves like men accustomed to such work; while the 'Albany Herald' did his grand part with the flourish of mediæval magnificence. Had I only had Mathew Waddel to bear me out—Mathew, a mere ghost to me now—I might perhaps have told of more luminous flashes of wit, and higher reaches of originality, and mightier manifestations of genius, exhibited before a considerably smaller audience. But that was all over these many weeks, and I was happy merely to listen—nay, almost grateful to the phantom garroters through whose agency I had been accorded that privilege. At times, indeed, I was lonely enough—contemplating, as I did, all round, faces that were dear and beautiful to some, and just serving to remind me of one that was perfect, and in heaven—past menace for evermore of grief, or wrinkle, or decay. But the splendid company, the illustrious names, the wine, the enthusiasm—all had an exhilarating effect upon my spirits. The object was to advance Social Science, and on my way homeward I tried to track out the hidden springs of that movement. What was the whole Congress but an attempt to give scientific aim and organised momentum to that Christian practice which is the grand rectifier? Competition is a good, useful servant of industry; but competition, unrestrained by justice and humanity, is like the fire that has gained the mastery, and is burning the house. What is it but certain murderous maxims of trade—armed with which maxims, men, naturally humane, labour to crush their rivals, not scrupling to build their triumphs on the despair and wreck of a hundred households—maxims which have turned much of the industry of the world into unscrupulous antagonism and death-struggle—with their awful fruits of suffering to the defeated and of guilt and peril to the victorious—what is it, I say, but these maxims promulgated under high sanction, and exercised with systematic licence, that have caused the working-classes to accept the gage of battle, and throw up fortresses for their own protection in the shape of trades' unions and co-operative associations? Philanthropists and statesmen, looking down from their watch-towers upon this great conflict, have at length stepped into the field as peacemakers; and behold them now, a powerful army, with Social Science inscribed upon their banners, moving into those districts where population is thickest, inviting all to state their complaints, inculcating mutual good-will, and labouring to enforce the lesson, and to hold up the warning, that no form of social injustice can escape its just retribution—that no class of society can be degraded without injury to every other class—and that suffering, inflicted for the sake of gain, through the tyranny of capital and the helplessness of want, is certain, sooner or later, to be avenged.

These and other kindred musings brought me to my own home—pleased to reflect that, if there was any menacing disease at the roots of our social system, there were active and able agencies at work endeavouring to arrest the mischief. On being admitted, and finding my group in the parlour, I began to tell, in rather a cheerful tone—a tone intended to cheer—of the great sight that I had witnessed. Suddenly, however, I was interrupted, not so much by any word spoken, as by my own observation of change. The silence was dreadful. It seemed as if the definite sorrow of my household had given place to a wild fear, similar to that which strikes a city pale when an enemy is heard at its gates. What could it mean? But, lo! the solution of the mystery! Lying for me on the table was a note which Jean, with her womanly curiosity and assumed privilege of wifehood, had opened. It was from Mr. M'Corkindale—beginning 'Dear Sir,' stating that 'a younger man would now answer his purpose,' and intimating that I was—dismissed.

CHAPTER XIV.

'I had—ah! have I now?—a friend.'—Byron.

The prisoner of Chillon regained his freedom with a sigh. So did I mine. My stool and desk had become as familiar to me as his chain and pillar. The windows at the opposite side of the court into which mine looked—with, framed in one of them, the picture of a girl sewing eternally, and growing old along with me—had become indented into my brain, even as the small green isle, with its three trees visible through the barred lattice of Chillon's dungeon, had become part of the daily life of Bon-nivard. Byron's forlorn hero had made friendship with spiders; and I, with at least one huge spider had learned, through an almost life-long intercourse, to consort after a fashion. I had become used to Mr. M'Corkindale, like an anchorite to his hair-shirt. How I was to do without the irritation of him, I in vain tried to conjecture. Everybody has heard of the boiler-maker who could not sleep when he went to reside at a quiet distance from his workshop. He could not sleep for the silence, which startled and kept him awake like the cessation of a kind nurse's lullaby. In like manner, I dreaded I might not sleep well when beyond hearing of dear Mr. M'Corkindale's growls.

With others connected with the great house of M'Corkindale & Co. I could part without particular malediction. Of Macnab the profound, and Dallas the gay, I had been all along the oracle, and they were grieved at my leaving. Then there was poor Joe himself, my unfortunate vis-à-vis, with his genius for getting into scrapes. As when a portentous cloud in the west changes, by slow degrees, its blackness to primrose and saffron, so had a luminous change come over his visual organs. His features were in a state of moral transition. Time was beginning to vindicate them against calumny. I could discern in them the growing fearlessness of innocence. They brightened as the moon brightens through the trailing rags of the storm-fiend. What wonder if Joe showed himself everywhere like one who carried testimonials! Daylight was not braver than he. Why, he could confront mankind, and even womankind, without having to tax his invention for apologies, or magnify his buckram garroters. His face was washed like that of the moon after being dipped in eclipse. It glistened like the face of a Scotch collier on the advent of Sabbath and soap! Now was his moment for the photographer! The gallant youth, one of a gray west-end corps desirous of dawning into crimson—true heroes, by the way, who have dashed into hot water rather than not be boiled red like lobsters—the gallant youth, I say—one of those most prominently ambitious of high blood in their uniform—looked, upon the whole, at this crisis of restoration, as beautiful as Providence ever intended him to look, which I deny to be extravagant encomium. I could see that Joe was sad, his good feeling towards me being farther proved by his consenting to take the chair at a supper which, from lack of appetite on my part, remains to this hour uneaten. To say truth, I had begun rather to like Joe. I had taken soundings of his shallowness, and found a few scattered and miraculous grains of gold in his prodigious quicksand. His mouth could measure out as large a laugh as my experience bounded—albeit I have not lacked wit to see into sundry throats in my time. He had listened to the ring of old Gabriel, and, if the truth dare make me bold, he found the metal sterling. My dismissal he pronounced a 'shame'—prefixing a brief epithet to give the denunciation emphasis. Above all, he was an egregious ass—a filial rebel—the incipient penalty, as I was diabolical enough to prophesy, of a tyranny that had laid the train, in the miserable years never to be recalled or blotted out, for overwhelming retributive catastrophes. How I chuckled over Joe, like a spiteful old Guy Fawkes or Mephistopheles over a torch that should yet set a great house on fire!

Ah! this is bitter fooling for a heart like mine—tongues of flame playing around dismally charred timbers. Could the world but see me as I write! Ay me! most ignorant world! ever the unphilosophic dupe of bright surfaces,—which is well. Fancy poor Tom Hood making the kingdom laugh from his unpensioned sick-bed. O incongruous world! There is death in honest Motley's lodging, but Motley must make raddle-faces to the crowd that he may earn the funeral-costs—chalk and vermilion hiding the watery channels, and pit and galleries uproarious at the dryness of the grimace. Yet why should not I be merry? Was I not enfranchised?—master of my own motions?—in a very condition to indite hymns to liberty? The living M'Corkindale, great as he was, had no more power over me than any dead Omar of all the Russias. I could breakfast in bed, or slumber till noon, like a lord! The buckram garroters might take my watch for any use I should have for it. I could linger, if I so chose, on the bridge, like that eternal buyer of 'old clothes,' whom I never yet saw effecting a purchase—clothes old or new not being usually cast off there. Good Heaven! is the man I mean waiting for some wretch who is to have done with clothes—the river being at hand for a covering? By whatever motive prompted, his patience is miraculous—not inferior to that of the speculator in horror, who attended Van Amburgh night after night, and season after season, lest he should miss seeing him devoured. Doubtless, if the lion-tamer is alive at this date, his laborious patron has his eye upon him still, so that his end may not lack a spectator who has paid handsomely for that special treat. But Moses—keeping the passage of the bridge like a Horatius, or like the man who collects the toll—for what particular victim does he, day after day, and year after year, lie in wait? As the thought worked in my brain, I avoided the oriental glare of his eye, though other occasion to hurry past him I had none. I feared it as a prescient eye for garments destined to become bare. A shark is an ugly follower in the wake of a leaky ship. Milton describes Death as snuffing the smell of mortal change on earth after the original trespass, and compares it to a flock of ravenous fowl, against the day of battle, 'lured with the scent of living carcasses,' to a field where armies are encamped. The passage, as it stands in England's epic, is considered by De Quincey as the most tremendous in human literature. But are the sharks, and the ravens, and the vultures, endowed, veritably, with a foreknowledge of mortal doom? Is it not rather the secret alarms of man, when imminent on the outer brink of life, that invest the predatory brood that rove the deep, or that skim the air, with instincts of approaching carnival? Yet God give me strength to fight against the harpies even of my own fears! Misfortune is always conspicuous. I was free, but with no soul for freedom; manumitted, but with the chains of obdurate habit dragging me back to my dungeon. Oh! a wide, wide world, my masters! and my lot in it, now that I was old, the terrible 'where to choose' of our first parents on their expulsion from Paradise! From every point, the world radiated away from me into utter wilderness. Let the young saplings be transplanted; but oh! vex not the earth with seeking to tear up the old, old roots! Whither could I wander, save instinctively on my familiar beat? Once or twice I went into the court behind M'Corkindale's warehouse, in order to observe if the female kit-kat, framed in a certain window opposite, and sewing, was framed there, and sewing there still; and to wonder if the sallow slave of a ruthless social condition, as she lifted her forlorn eyes to a prospect the length of which she could, with diligence like hers, have stitched in brief space with her needle, discovered and lamented the disappearance, in her little imprisoned horizon, of a white and venerable landmark, now gone from her gaze for evermore! Ah! good my masters! what shadows we are all at best!

Ha, ha! whirl away, ye multitudinous social wheels! I am out of gear. Go on gloriously, grinding down more hecatombs of bones, and conquering the markets of the world forever! My poor part is done. But be thou happy, O great M'Corkindale of the Drums! Thou art no exceptional monster! Nature, in her mercifulness even to the wicked, affords thee, if thou but knewest it, an exemplar. The butcher-bird sucks the life-blood of its prey, and suspends the useless carcase upon thorns. Hug, then, this thought, and be jovial over thy port of supreme vintage, thou savagest of old shrieks!

My brain, as I confess, and have perhaps shown, is something wild. Pardon me, good Christians all! Of my five beauties, one (God rest her!) is in heaven; but how are the remaining four to be fed? If it were other than my own case, I should say that an old man—three score and odds—poor, friendless, and very proud—yet tender-hearted as a child, and surrounded by appealing eyes—is a spectacle for the gods to pity. For several situations I have made a desperate push; but, in each case, have found myself jostling, shouldering, elamouring, perspiring, with some fifty or a hundred applicants, towards a door which could only admit one. What a sorry chance for Gaffer with his gray hairs! Yet day after day have I perambulated the streets—petitioning all whom I knew, with a courage inspired by my dreadful need, to assist me to find some opening—trusting to the chapter of accidents—hoping in the very frantic breach of the forlornest hope—shuddering at undivulged presentiments of madness—with visions of my poor girls, and even Jean herself (alas for the aspiring blood of the Chisholms!) charring for niggard hire! In my relation, humble as it was, to the wealthy house of M'Corkindale & Co. I was somebody; but was I anybody now? Did not my acquaintances look coldly on me? Was not my credit deteriorated? Would even Mr. Gladstone, with his merciless Income-tax, consider me worth plucking? Did the fool live who would waste a flattery on one so incapable of making a profitable return? Once I thought to commence business on my own account, if I could raise a little capital; but, alas! the lunacy of it! I had only taken effectual means, by the preliminary efforts which I made, to ascertain, confidentially, through my own bitter humiliation, how painfully hard-up was all the great ostentatious world. Yet I have not been always snubbed. The other day, Ronald M'Intyre—the sorry devil of a rhymster, whom the critics admit to have the right stuff in him—buttoned to the throat, dirty, and with red eyes—paid me the compliment of attempting to borrow half-a-crown from me. I put it to him candidly, and with some solemnity, whether a man with a large family, hopelessly out of work, almost out at elbows, and as poor as an inspired poet, was the least in a position to lend so large an amount? A smile broke upon his countenance, which presented a strange blending of obfuscation and fire-gleams; and I am a perjured historian if he did not offer to stand treat for us both, to the extent of a silver shilling, which he displayed! My enforced idleness hurried me to the West-End Park. I had no particular business among the children and the nursery-maids; but there is a spur to restlessness of motion—no matter whither—poignant at the heart of every great despair. The soothing aspect of the place showed nature kindlier than man. Its decaying and dead foliage—weeds of mourning for the perished glories of the year—accorded with my mood. From the serene ripple of the Kelvin my heart caught a music of other days; and I looked up to the palatial terraces as to a height from which not even an extraordinary friendship could be expected to stoop. But I thought of my sad household in Portland-street—of Jessie wearing her fingers to the bone—of Isabella never uttering a complaint—of Sophia experimenting, with cheeks of unearthly pallor, as to the minimum of food necessary to sustain life—of Kate forgetting, for whole days, to laugh—and of Jean continually asking me, amid paroxysms of tears, what, in the name of goodness, was to be done? How beautiful a visitation was the gentle falling asleep of our Barbara, amid a thousand ministries of affection, compared with this new agony! And how well was it that the Great Shepherd should have taken the tenderest of our flock into His so perfect keeping, ere the howlings of the wolf were heard, and the crisis of utter consternation had come! For a moment the curtain of my sorrow darkened the prospect. Fresh resolves as to the future rose and melted in my bosom. But I had household bills to pay—importunate duns to face—grateful mouths to feed—clinging spirits to sustain—and all at that twilight of my life which I, at one time, dreamed would be consecrated to retirement, to cheerfulness, and to letters. My strong determination revived, and took a shape which the reader may have anticipated. Mr. Waddel was my old crony. For forty years and upward our gray hairs had covered but a single heart. He knew I had not been improvident. I owed to him, in great part, the consciousness of possessing faculties which might have borne me to honourable, nay, to possibly illustrious, termini, had my good star placed me on more auspicious rails. Would I not be wronging his goodness if I withheld from him the knowledge of my afflictions? So feeling, I mounted the stairs of the Park, and proceeded in the direction of his mansion. Fortunately, I observed him approach. The old, much-loved figure was before me. I should now encounter him as if by accident. My heart bounded as it had not done for many days. The smile of greeting was on my lips; but what a grand unmasker is poverty! My old, my familiar friend stared at me—stared with a blank, insulting stare, and passed ruthlessly on. Mathew had cut me dead. On the clear pavement there could be no possibility of mistake. The brutality of the act turned my chagrin to fire. What had I done to deserve it? Angers, as if born of hell, burned at my heart and brain. Oh! for a giant's arm to have struck him—struck him on the instant—in the face—manfully—blow, as it were, for blow!

After this thunder—rain! For now, for the first time, I felt that I was indeed friendless in the world.

CHAPTER XV.

—'wrong'd poverty,
Sending his eyes to heaven swimming in tears.'—Giles Fletcher.

Misery, under any guise, has a wierd music of its own; and thus, with me, it sang:—

Teach me, O God! this weight of woe to bear.

Even while I see, forsaken,

O'er Fortune's bright face shaken,

A dreary midnight of dishevell'd hair,

Proud heart of mine! be proof against despair!

Pale Sorrow points the way where hope is none;

Yet, prostrate, I beseech her,

As my life's later teacher,

To fill my cup, and let it overrun,

And wash away all ills that I have done.

Each grief-wrung drop would scald like stinging lead;

Save that, through force of terror,

I struggle 'gainst my error,

And feel a strength that in my soul was dead

When the false earth was flowery to my tread.

Reeds! worthless reeds! why break at every blast?

Distracted is my vision

Of friendship's joys, Elysian;

I slept in dreams, and wake to tears at last,

Dropp'd in the wormy grave of all the past.

Not simpering in the sunlight of success;

But when, in fiery madness,

Wrecking the sunset's gladness,

Comes down the night in tempests of distress,

Can we know aught of human littleness.

Ah! shameless day! thou masker meet for scorn!

Cain did his bloody murder

In the fierce noon-day's ardour,

Ere yet a silent star look'd down to warn,

Or ghostly shape of ghastly deed was born.

Darkness has drunk the light of all my sky;

Still, with my keen eyes bright'ning,

I see, as by fierce lightning,

What friends desert me and what friends stand by;

And hell and heaven are mine alternately.

The Furies lash my pulses into flame.

On all whom pride estranges

I burn for prompt revenges,

Till other eyes approach, and make me tame;

And Love, the victor, owns a blush of shame.

Oh! if an adverse fate has chill'd the faith

That in strong friendship liveth,

Another boon it giveth—

To know the truth that hangs not on a breath,

But clings, through sun and shade, till seal'd in death!

A trifle; but let it pass. Where are the dewdrops of spring—the flowers of summer—the eyes, with blended soul and sweetness in them, that looked into mine but a little while ago? Ay me! what a lavish waste in nature of her loveliest and most precious gifts! Wherefore should any poor fruit of my old and vexed brain live? A trifle; so let it pass.

Yet Mathew Waddel—before he went mad, and drowned the better part of him in rosy seas, and left behind him but a miserable lie of his former self—was wont to hold me capable of miraculous achievement in that kind. His talk—and his talk was often glorious, for he had something of the imitative faculty about him, and forty years are a long schooling—was continually stimulative of effort, under what he was pleased to call my direct commission from Heaven—stimulative of great, nay, of daring effort, up even unto mist-clad Miltonic altitudes. Doubtless, like Hood in his youth, I had long sat at my desk, on a Pegasus with three legs. But, after all, was I not in the miserablest of clerky grooves? Were not old M'Corkindale and the Fates in conspiracy to defraud me of all fruit of noble achievement? To 'live laborious days' was easy. I had a millionaire's help to do that. But how could I fulfil the other condition of 'scorning delights,' with my heart so combustible, with my fancy so will-o'-the-wispish, with a friend so powerfully convivial, and with a certain little fairy so resplendent with all bright qualities to my intensely seeing eyes? What a half-dozen years of my life were pulled to rags by Jean Chisholm, the gipey! with her pride, her coquetry, her gray eyes, and—don't laugh, reader—her jimp waist! Well, well! she was a pretty creature, I admit—though of the order extremely petite, however much she may have grown since—otherwise than lengthwise. But what chance had I of striking valorously into any lofty path of ambition, with the consciousness, tearing me a thousand ways at once, of Jean being off, perhaps, with some good-looking fool—some fool with locks like Absalom, some chuckling triumphant fool with expectations—to Cathkin Braes, the Pear-Tree Well, or the Whangie! Then, again, what a half-century almost I wasted on old Mathew himself; whom now, from this conscious abyss of my life-failure, I could curse to very tears! If he would but recall some of the oburgations which he has heard me a thousand times pronounce upon such conduct as he, in his own person, has so shamefully exemplified, they would fall upon him at this moment, and often—yea while a cinder of him was left—in cataracts of living fire. But for his selfish engrossment of me, how might the bygone chapters of my life have been unravelled to brilliant dénouements! Yet not mine be the task to wield the whip whose lash is of stinging snakes! The Furies that lie in wait for the naked backs of all scandalous ingratitude will vindicate, in their own good time, the high judgment of the gods. I can even stand upright on my pride, and do the greater thing than avenge—forgive. Let me, therefore, console myself with the reflection that I and his humbler home possibly drank the whole bright wine of his life; and that it is now nothing save the mere base lees of him that is left, for Fortune to cast like a stain upon Glasgow's proud Belgravia.

My household will not believe that Mr. Waddel could have acted as I have said. They refuse to so lose their faith in human nature. Jessie, whose eyes are abridged with excess of application, declares that she has often, in the street, been unobservant of her most intimate friends. 'What!' exclaims Jean, with a touch of satire, 'Mathew Waddel, who always thought you such a great man!' Sophia, who has fallen heir to Barbara's cloak—his gift—cannot find in her heart a single ill-natured bit wherewith to darken his name. As for Isabella, she chimes in with the rest in quite a passive manner; while Kate laughingly thinks my fierce accusation nonsense. But, ay me, my masters! it is easy for those to dress the wound who have not felt the stab. How could I be deceived? The incident occurred in the affronted daylight. Is it likely that I, with eyes to decipher the Lord's Prayer written within the space of sixpence, should fail to recognise the man whose personae I had been studying for some forty and odd years? No, no; it was no other than Mathew, in his new character of Mathew Waddel, Esq. who answered my familiar smile with a look of stone. A word might have shivered him on his monstrous pedestal, but I was dumb. Surely I am not mad, to have imagined an affront lying outside the confines of the imaginable. Yet, why should I not be mad veritably—not moon-struck, but man-struck or devil-struck? Of all spectacles of melancholy under the skies, that of an old man needing to toil for bread, and finding all avenues foreclosed, is, to my poor thinking, about the melancholiest. Why was not I bred a physician, that my white hairs might have served me for capital? Young men without encumbrances, besides being active, are cheap. M'Corkindale is therefore right. Why should M'Corkindale be a charitable institution? The business of M'Corkindale is to amass money by buying labour at its cheapest, and in so doing has he not all the economists on his side? Down, therefore, with the old men! They are past their best! Give us fresh bones only to grind, cries the steam-fiend! Ever more cheapness, ever larger increase, the steam-fiend shrieking over the graves of the young murdered, and of the old maddened, then murdered!

But Miss Bessie Rayner Parkes and her feminines of the Englishwoman's Journal have anticipated my case. If I have not sons, I have a wife and daughters. Why should not Jean be balanced on a stool as somebody's clerk—balanced like an india-rubber ball trying not to roll off—doing hard feats of balancing from ten morning until seven at night, with an hour's interval for dinner? Then Jessie, who has been contributing anonymously to a certain shop—stealing over to town with her ill-paid work, in the dusk of the evening, as if in horror of being detected doing a noble thing—why should not she be ensconced in a box, selling railway tickets, or working the night telegraph manfully, at a decent wage? Isabella and Sophia, too, might they not be making gruel for the patients, and bread for themselves, as sick nurses in the Royal Infirmary? As for Kate—instead of flirting, as I have suspected her of late, with the lad Imrie—he who is associated now with our most blessed household memory, and nevertheless, therefore, to have harsh word from me—what is to hinder Kate from blackening like a bramble-berry into a printer's imp; and through diligent labour when the general city is asleep, or nightmared only with gasping dreams of usury, achieving the glory of placing the price of last night's stocks on the breakfast-table of the wealthy Mr. Jones? Ha—ha! here am I, with a five-female power to swell and depress the universal labour-market! What a bundle of unproductive sinew am I master of! Enough, I should say, if turned to profitable account, to leave old Gaffer at leisure to amuse himself with potato-pairing, sock-darning, and breeches-washing—business, this last, immensely, as I fear, on the increase! Ah, Bessie! thy continued Miss-hood is surely a grievous wrong to some swain unprosperously sighing. Yet so far as I see—and I profess to know a little of the industrial machinery of at least one great city—there is small need—alas! that it should be so!—for any 'Society for Promoting the Employment of Women.' The feverish stimulus of competition, the sharp unslumbering eyes of self-interest, the wild unscrupulous rage for cheapness of production, have already shouldered aside the strong fellows and the huge feeders from almost every task which female fingers are competent to perform. Look at the young women with old faces as the shops, the warehouses, or the factories are in process of emptying! Out of the tide-way! What! 'will the line stretch on,' et cetera? Good heavens! where are the men? and who are looking after the babies?

Never, by the grand old spirit of knighthood! has the idea of making sacrifice of my fair home-sufferers been born of my utmost want. They did enough when, with looks of pitiful cheerfulness, they made our domestic outlay forbear, and dwindle, and shrink to a most painful, almost alarming minimum. I was haunted with visions of even Jean becoming thin, yet smiling, with affectionate effort, through her eyes of pinching famine. The cheeks of the self-sacrificing Sophia were utterly bloodless. Ah! Father in heaven! was there no help? The high in birth have friends, and the low have parochial boards. There is dropping coin for the impudent palms of vagrancy. But, alas! for the middle tracks of society when ravaged by misfortune! Unsubjugated pride and shame bar any proffer of aid from either side. But lo! a sudden sunburst, what time our gloom was at its blackest! A dingy old rustypiece, hoarded from brighter days, I had some time ago offered for sale. It had at length found a purchaser. Judges had pronounced it a Gainsborough; and the result was cash in my trembling, wildly emotional hands, to the amount of £180! It was the purse of Fortunatus! it was a mine of Golconda! it was joy and health—for a time at least—to those whom I loved dearest in the world! More than all, it was a revenge of independence against him whom I most desperately hated! Every penny I had ever borrowed or received from Mathew Waddel—principal, interest, and scornfully compound ditto—I summed up, and sent to him, at his address, Simpkins Brothers—accompanied with a note of haughty thanks;—and felt, for the first time for many weeks, that all round me, and up to the high bright heavens, the air was glorious to breathe.

CAPTAINS AND SAILING-MASTERS.

ONCE upon a time, during a great storm, the captain of a ship—aware how great the danger was of all hands perishing—calling passengers and crew together, requested them to join in prayer for the safety of the ship. Observing, however, that one of the passengers remained apart from the rest, crouched in a sheltered corner to smoke a pipe, the captain reproved him, with some warmth, for the irreverence of this proceeding, and begged him to join his prayers with the rest. 'Oh!' he replied, 'I have nothing to do with the matter. You are responsible for the ship. I am only a passenger!'

However absurd such an answer appears at first sight, it may be questioned whether honesty will not compel us to admit that it is one we ourselves make to our consciences in more than one relation in life. To carry the analogy farther, had the captain been fortunate enough to command H.M.S. Bulldog, he would very likely have rejoined, in spite of Admiralty regulations, that the sailing-master, and not himself, was responsible for the navigation of the ship. This system of one man sailing the ship and another commanding it, probably had its origin in the days when admirals and captains were appointed, without reference to their nautical acquirements, simply because they were sure to fight if fighting was to be had; and seems only of late years to have lost its full significance. But while naval men are anxious to do away with an office which really relieves them of no responsibility, there seems to be no more distinctive mark of the tendency of modern society, than the habit we have acquired of appointing sailing-masters, to take both secular and religious responsibility off our hands. Such a system is the natural result of the accumulation of work which the rapid growth of science, civilization, and vice has thrown on our hands. But while we are perhaps forced to submit to this division of labour—to have our fighting captain and our sailing captain—we are in great danger of overlooking the individual responsibilities of the former, while we throw all the blame of our misfortunes on the latter—forgetting that, after all, the captain must command his own ship.

When we look back a few years, to the days when the Saturday newspaper was the great event of the week—when the fall of a Minister was felt from one end of the kingdom to the other, and Parliamentary Reform was almost as dangerous as the evils it was sought to obviate—we cannot but be struck with the change which has taken place. A political measure was then a matter of public interest, which we fully believed would either prove our destruction, or raise us to the pinnacle of human prosperity. The Minister was an individual whom we either worshipped with infatuation, or hated with all our heart. Now, nothing but an attack on our pockets, or a succession of dazzling leaders in the Times, can rouse us to personal indignation; and even the cry for universal suffrage, happily, falls dead on the ear of the prosperous artisan. We have appointed our sailing-captains. Let them only bring the ship into port, and we shall neither praise them for extraordinary ability nor be over hard on them for stupid mistakes. At an age when Mr. Pitt was astonishing the world with his eloquence and ability, comparatively few men have any political opinions at all; and, later, when such ignorance is no longer respectable, the general feeling is, that everything official is badly managed—that Government pay more and receive less than the most reckless traders; while a Government office is an Augean stable, of which a deaf ostler has the key, and it is better not to disturb Camerina so long as our commercial interests are not directly interfered with—a theory which might be justified were it only question of the disposal of the small contribution we individually make towards the expenses of the country, and were all subscribers in a position to defend their own interests.

This, however, is far from being the case; and we are bound to consider, not only how our own views in life may be advanced or retarded by any course of government, but its effect on the nation at large. It might, at any rate, be supposed that we should be at some pains to consider the character and views of the individual to whom we choose to entrust the management of our affairs. But I wonder how many people thus consider the responsibility of their votes! how many varied motives combine to produce a representative of the people! What a bore we should think our votes if we ever took the trouble to consider them in this light!

If you think I am going to indulge you with my ideas concerning a bloated aristocracy and a corrupt government, you are very much mistaken. I have my own opinion on these popular subjects, which I shall keep to myself; and only wish to point out that each man is responsible for everything done in the name of the nation, whether he is directly concerned in it or not, leaving him to form his own opinion, as he ought to do.

In private life the sailing-master is generally an object of hatred to all who do not belong to his ship. In families in which he has been regularly commissioned (and their name is legion), it is next to impossible to escape him, or, at least, to elicit any ideas or opinions which have not their inspiration from him. To every question you ask you receive his answer; he turns up in every corner; he is to be found in all the books; his presence pervades every room; his spirit moves every tongue; he is to be tasted in the dishes and worshipped at the fireside. Sometimes in unguarded moments you may, after much labour, fancy you have evaded him; some turn of the conversation or intonation of voice makes you think he is lost sight of for a moment;—be not deceived, 'the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.' Sooner or later you will be told, in that clinching tone of voice known only to the fair sex, 'Oh! but John thinks so and so.' Without being of a very virulent turn of mind, I think I have a right to complain of this unfair treatment. What do I care about John and his opinions? Why is he to come between me and every pretty face I meet? What have I done that I am to converse with no one but him! By what right does he grin defiance through the sweetest lips, and leer at me from the softest eyes? He is not my sailing-master—my ship should not be in his hands for all the world. I often think how insufferably impertinent was the Roman matron, who inspected all her friend's jewels, accepted all her harmless tattle, and then in return produced as her treasures two miserable untoga'd youths. But not less insulting is the behaviour of some ladies, who are perpetually parading their household idol before our eyes, as though they would say, 'See what a brother or husband mine is! how superior to you! Of course you don't agree with him; but then you are but a poor creature. You could never be my idol whom I love and worship. To you I should never surrender.' Now, this feminine manoeuvre is quite unjustifiable, for it admits of neither answer nor retaliation.

It is stabbing an unarmed friend, who can only shrug his shoulders and thank Heaven for his want of ambition.

Sometimes, though seldom, we are able to get this idol into a corner, all alone, and then endeavour to avenge our wrongs upon him. But as obnoxious and more intangible are the author idol and author demon, who absorb the incense and hatred of many well-intentioned people. Say Dr. Cumming and Mr. Thackeray. No food can be taken but from the hands of the one, or pass undefiled under the shadow of the other. No dictum of the good spirit can possibly be doubted. The most holy truths lose their virtue in the lips of the evil one. To those hero-worshippers, the idea of individual responsibility never seems to occur. There is but one God—and Cumming, Ryle, Kingsley, or Macleod is his prophet. Fortunately, or unfortunately, there will come a day when we shall be unable to produce our idol to explain our thoughts and delinquencies; when he will have enough to do to bear his own burden, and would be only too glad to be able to disown many of his followers. Surely it is worth while to think of this in time; to make our own observations before we hear the waves dashing madly over the rocks. This brings us to the most important and by no means least common instance of shifted responsibility—the relative position of clergyman and layman. A friend of the King of Dahomey informed us the other day that his Majesty had attached to his person a counsellor who was called his 'soul,' to whom he confided all his troubles, whose advice he invariably followed, and whom he took with him to the other world (we may presume) to answer for his misdeeds—a state of things very much to be envied, if we could only bring ourselves to believe that this Alter Ego could really relieve us of future responsibility. One can well imagine the defunct potentate looking with considerable satisfaction and self-gratulation on the torments of his erring 'soul,' from the repose of Elysian hunting-grounds. Now, if we do not follow some such plan as this in our hearts, how is it that we have tacitly recognised codes of lay and clerical morality, lay and clerical virtue, lay and clerical honour? Have we not a secret feeling that it is the clergyman's duty to be good for us, to keep himself pure in our stead, to draw out a faith for us, and be ready to explain it when required—if indeed we ever have time for an explanation? Is there not often something of this kind in our hearts? Do we not often treat a clergyman as one who does our goodness for us, and is therefore worthy of consultation; or perhaps as believing earnestly a thing we dream of and have not time to inquire into? Do not many of us go to church, like the man mentioned by Dr. Bushel, 'because at home there are so many flies; here it is cool and comfortable'? In a fairly educated assembly, how many men are there who can fairly state what they believe or disbelieve, and their grounds for either course? I am afraid it is pretty much the old story—the sailing-captain must bring us right as best he can. We tell him to steer for the great haven, and care little about the course; for we are too busy to take many observations ourselves. We know well enough that we are responsible; but we like to think the contrary, till an accident happens, and the ship lies helpless in a fog of vague belief.

It seems to me a clergyman must often think very sadly of the many members of his congregation whom he can teach to believe in him, but not in God; who lower their voices, and conceal from him what they do daily in the presence of his Master, from a feeling that it is cowardly to offend the ambassador though they insult the King. Something of this sort must, I think, occur to most of our celebrated churchmen; and it is happy for them that, while they are spared a dangerous knowledge of their triumphs, they are also ignorant of the numbers who remain in this state of vicarial belief; for this thought would be enough to quench the fire of the most eloquent preacher—to cripple the pen of the readiest writer. No amount of praise, no number of editions, can soothe if they have run against this rock; and the cries of drowning men will be for ever in their ears.

But I am neither preacher nor chartered master (though it would be easy enough to preach a sermon if one tried—the difficulty is to feel it); so turn gladly to the one act of life in which we never employ the sailing-master. We may live, and die, and marry under his guidance—eat, drink, and think under his rule; but a day comes when we send him unceremoniously about his business, take charge of the ship, and fall in love—and a very pretty mess we generally make of it. There is, I believe, a regulation in the navy which prohibits a captain from sailing with his wife on board. What sarcastic Daniel sat in judgment when that order passed! How those old sea-dogs must have laughed in their sleeves at the idea of taking the partner of their joys to sea with them! how loudly they must have deplored to those angels at home the impossibility of such an arrangement! They very likely drifted into matrimony under charge of a sisterly master; but falling in love is quite a different thing, and I believe they took care to make no regulations against that. We are all the same—blatant boys and grave old men. A little sooner or a little later, like Sir Galahad,

'On lonely mountain-meres,
I find a magic bark;
I leap on board—no helmsman steers;
I float till all is dark.'

And then there comes a vision. No holy grail is in her hands—only a little bright dagger—so bright, so cold! And she comes closer and closer, till we try to clasp her in our arms. She smiles so sweetly; and her voice is still cooing in our ears, when she turns away, and stabs us without a word. We don't mention this excursion to the sailing-master, he may see there is something wrong, and may have a notion in what direction we have been cruising, but thinks it best, if he is a wise man, to say nothing about the matter. Next time we are more wary. We take a weapon or two with us—using them clumsily enough, no doubt, and generally getting a little mauled; but still holding our own, and not allowing the enemy to quit the field quite untouched. And then, as we get more expert, some of us carry the war boldly into the enemy's country—trampling down the fair fields, the cowslip and crow's-feet, the lily and the tulip—spreading martyrdom broadcast. This is but sad work, though, and that first vision rises reproachfully before our eyes. It seems to say, 'What if I wounded you sorely, did I not give you a glimpse of fairy land? Was not that enough for one life? There is no love without pain—nothing pure that has not passed through fire.' And we think over that sad face by the fireside, and make a friend of it in after years;—but the sailing-master knows nothing about it.

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

April 2, 1850.

Yes; there can be no mistake about it. Charlotte is beautiful—thrice beautiful. It never struck us (that is, George and myself) so very forcibly as now that she has begun sittings for her portrait to a rising artist who has come to our neighbourhood. He says he cannot hope to do justice to the original. What painter could, when his model is one of the finest types of humanity? Charlotte's countenance is a perfect oval, the complexion clear, every feature chiselled in exquisite proportion, a profusion of the richest golden hair, eyes unfathomable in their depths of truth and tenderness; with a form tall, round and pliant, and every way symmetrical; but above and beyond all—oh! say not that Nature is niggardly of her gifts, denying to the mind what is lavished on the body—this maiden's soul is tempered in complete harmony with her person. She is indeed a king's daughter, and all glorious within;—and where is the artist who can paint the mind of beauty? Is Charlotte, then, faultless, and therefore a monster unknown alike to Linnaeus and Lavater? I shall answer this question by another! Is everything monstrous that is richest and rarest? Is the planet monstrous that shines superbly effulgent among the lesser stars? Nay, nay. The things and persons of most exalted beauty—whether outward or inward, or both combined—must still hold undeniable precedence, and be a joy to our hearts and our eyes for ever.

What a start we all got yesterday, when Louis walked into our midst, in the full glory of his regimental equipment, and looking so tall, so erect, so brilliant, so every inch a British soldier! We had not seen him for nearly two years, during which time he had been travelling abroad with Mr. Cuthbert; and now he had come down to pay us a brief visit as lieutenant by purchase. 'I would not have a higher commission bought for me,' were his own words. 'A man should rise by merit and not by gold or favour.' And he is right.

It was a treat to see how our children crowded round the young patriot—gazing at him with open admiration, not unmixed with awe in some of the smaller members of the household. Hetty evidently regarded Louis as some sort of demigod; Willie and Harry stood apart, and looked and whispered, and whispered and looked again; while Walter, taking courage, seated himself boldly by the stranger's side—holding his hand, and asking him a hundred questions. But what shall I say of Charlotte's meeting with the old familiar companion of her childhood? Or, rather, what shall I say of that wonderful enlightenment of countenance, and general elevation of his whole external being, which the said old companion exhibited on her entrance? Simply this—that there is only one season of life, as there is only one passion of the soul, which ever can originate such results. Need I specify what these are? I trow not. When we beheld the morning landscape glorious in light, we need not be told that the sun is up; and when we mark the first delicious verdure on meadow and wood, on blade and flower, we know of a verity that spring is come, and the singing of birds is at hand. There was no necessity for disguise, and none was used. The matter was as transparent as day, viz.—that mon capitaine would never look upon other maiden to woo and win, save our gentle daughter. And though still little more than a child, her innocent heart is gradually and surely being housed into true and noble keeping.

September 8, 1852.

Louis has been here for a week, on leave from his regiment, and has formally asked of George the hand of Charlotte, to have and to hold through all his future years. George told me he could have laughed in the young man's face, on his asking what had evidently been so long taken for granted by both the culprits. Indeed, had any other issue followed on the long train of pre-existent circumstances, it would have appeared well nigh ridiculous. But my husband and I are perfectly agreed that, however worthy mon capitaine (by-the-by, he is now bona fide entitled to this name) may be of the proposed gift, Charlotte is too young for us to permit the ratification of the solemn rite yet awhile. So here the matter rests; and, at the expiry of one little month, Captain Grey rejoins his troop, now stationed in Ireland.

Amid all my cares and avocations, as mistress now of a pretty large family, I take the most intense interest in these young lovers. Although no shadow of doubt has ever been entertained by either regarding their perfect reciprocity of sentiment—and their mutual confidence is as trusting as it is tender—the human mind, of subtle mechanism in every situation, seems peculiarly so when engrossed by one great object. And I am never tired studying the varied pages of this chronicle of home love. Methinks this same love is a chameleon, and shifts colour a hundred times in the same breast within the hour—always changing, yet always retaining the old identity; a cloud of million shapes and hues—brightening, obscuring, saddening, glorifying the whole mental firmament—now pale with the hues of day-dawn, now rich with the golden noon, now glowing with the sunset's crimson, now gleaming soft in the pearly moonbeams!

Louis and I were talking the other evening about education. I said—

'It has been thought that young persons are required to learn too much. If the peculiar taste of each were more systematically studied, the results might be more satisfactory.'

'But if there is no particular taste to study,' he remarked, 'as many have really none, there is no alternative but just to deal with generalities and teach the usual routine.'

'Yes; and no doubt a knowledge of many things is the most useful in the after practice of life. Yet it is surely desirable that, in the case of boys, there should be a native bias to guide them in the choice of a profession. Indeed, I have always observed that without some such bias early manifested, few attain to greatness in the walk they select.' I added something about his own predilection for the army, exhibited so far back as when my aunt first saw him a child at Nice. He smiled. The allusion seemed to make him at once grave and gay. After a pause—

'Ah! what a strange turning-point was that in my history!' he exclaimed. 'What should I have been, and where, but for your Madame Aubrey? What a woman she is! such a soul of earnest benevolence, quietly working on its heavenward way, as if accompanied already by a host of sister angels, aiding and confirming her good deeds! Was ever gratitude so heavily taxed as mine to her?'

He rose as he spoke, and took a turn through the apartment. Curiously enough he seldom speaks to me of his benefactress, and when he does the feelings evoked invariably raise him to new grace and dignity in my eyes. At length, stopping thoughtfully, and regarding me with a glowing look—

'My dear Mrs. Weston, what is the cause, can you tell me, that the female character but seldom possesses that delightful attraction which, so resistless in a few, leaves all the rest stale, flat, and unprofitable?'

I confess my hero took me rather at unawares with this pointed query. I considered, however, and then made answer—

'I conceive that the chief desideratum in the female character of the present age is—sentiment. There is plenty of sense, of cleverness, of the savoir faire—enough and to spare of tact, assumption, and finesse; but a woful lack of the ideal, the poetic, and the ethereal—not by any means to supersede the solid, and useful, and practical, but to relieve the dry detail, and fling a halo over the routine of a too real existence. Some women are butterflies, skimming the air, and all for pleasure; some are moles, burrowing in earth, and all for toil. But woman, as I would desire her to be, should have a distaff in one hand and a lyre in the other—a smile tempered by intelligence on her lips—roses at her feet—and a star on her forehead, whose rays darted straight up to heaven.'

I had just concluded this little peroration, when Charlotte entered, bearing in her hands a posy of autumn flowers—paler of hue than the summer's store, but exquisitely fragrant and tasteful in combination. She advanced, with a countenance whose radiance was tempered with the pale cast of thought.

'There's rosemary—that's for remembrance,' she said gravely, holding out a sprig to Louis; 'and there's laurel—that's for ambition, as befits a soldier.' Then turning to me, 'There's immortelle for you, mamma,' with an earnest look. The next moment she was seated at the piano, and singing, in her own clear delightful voice, that beautiful song of Moore's:—

'Go where glory waits thee!
And, while fame elates thee,
Oh then remember me!'

He was quickly by her side, bringing his rich bass notes to blend in deep unison with her own. And, as I sat listening, methought how seldom do the souls of singers mingle and melt in perfect concert with their voices, as these two now do! Has earth any happier hours for its most favoured creatures—'when life is young and love is new?'

I left them together, and sauntered out into the garden. The night was very still, and a full moon just rising. The music floated to me from the open window, over the mignonette and wall-flower borders. A pause. Then the melody changed to a simple Italian duet, in which I caught the words 'Buona Notte!'—again and again repeated. At last the echo died away—diminuendo, poco-a-poco—into complete silence. And my soul went pondering on its own quiet way, sweet and serene as a weaned child.

April 6, 1854.

Yesterday morning brought a letter from our dear Louis, followed by himself in person ere the day closed. The letter said,—'I have important news, very interesting to all of us, to communicate.' His own lips afterwards pronounced the tidings that thrilled every heart in our household. 'My regiment is ordered to embark instantly for the Crimea, and I have come to take farewell!'

We sat looking round on one another, for some minutes after this announcement, in a sort of blank surprise, which was broken at length by a shower of ejaculations, all expressive of sympathy and affectionate regret at the inevitable parting. But Captain Grey immediately took up the word, and asserted his soldierly supremacy—at once adopting the tone, not of vexatious weakness, but of triumphant satisfaction.

'Tell me, my friends,' he said, 'for what have my pulses been tingling, and whither have my aspirations been tending, throughout all the past years, but just to this very consummation? Therefore I beseech of you, one and all, do not condole, but congratulate me that the realisation of my wishes seems now at last so near.'

Here George, who has unfeigned respect for every true and noble sentiment, called out,

'Excellently well spoken; mon ami! We ought all to be ashamed of putting on these gloomy faces.' Whereupon Aunt Aubrey broke in, with a placid smile,

'It is a long while ago since I first saw mon Capitaine drilling his troop in sport; but now that fighting time has come in earnest, I know he will be no less vigorous in the real work.'

It was only natural that Charlotte should droop and falter at the sudden call of her affianced to the field of danger. And I saw that her lips quivered and her eye moistened, as she regarded his manly form, and tried to utter words of cheerful assurance. The hard realities of life had come very suddenly upon her love's young dream. But the feelings of youth have an elasticity marvellously adapted to its season. And the 'tear forgot as soon as shed,' even in respect to those beyond the pale of childhood, is not altogether a poet's myth.

When all the rest had retired for the night, I held watch a little longer with Charlotte and Louis. He was all brightness; but her brow wore a shadow.

'There are moments,' she murmured, regarding him with tender sadness, 'when my heart strangely misgives me; and I think we shall never, never see each other again. Then I rouse myself by a mighty effort, and take hold of the strong anchor of hope, and feel confident we shall meet once more under sunny skies!' (Strange to tell, in a certain sense these presentiments were equally destined to be realised.)

'Yes,' cried Louis, catching at the fair promise of the words; 'you shall yet behold your true knight returned victorious, scatheless, free, to claim your plighted troth. And the war will be over, and we shall have been made not the worse but the better for the ordeal of absence. Our faith will shine out all the purer, the nearer it meets its perfect reward.'

She held out her hands to him as he spoke. Her eyes suffused with tears yet beamed with a light more akin to hope than despair.

'O Charlotte! for my sake, for the sake of all dear to you, believe it shall be as I have told you. I feel as if my life were charmed since you have received my proffered vows.'

'I will believe everything of you—everything of Heaven, that is good and true,' she answered. 'I will believe that the God who hears our prayers will cover your head in the day of battle, and bring you home to us at last crowned with honour.'

He folded her to his breast—oh! how solemnly, how tenderly, how reverentially, kissed her on forehead, cheek, and lip. He did not trust himself to speak another syllable. Fondly, gently, as he might hold a drooping flower, the strong arm of the stalwart soldier resigned the lovely form to mine—a mother's embrace. Another moment, and he had vanished from the room; and this morning he was gone ere peep of day,

(To be continued.)

BALA BELL.

'WHERE are you, Alf!'

'That's exactly what I should like to know; and, faith! I do now—I'm in a bog!'

'Wait a minute and I'll be with you. I'm making a steeple-chase over some of the awkwardest country I ever came across.'

The scene of this short dialogue was, had it only been visible, one of the wildest and most magnificent in North Wales; but, in addition to the obscurity caused by fast approaching night, a thick mountain mist, accompanied by small drizzling rain, rendered it impossible to see more than a few yards ahead. The speakers were two tourists. Not railway-rugged, Murray-guided, fashionable excursionists; but honest, thick-booted trampers, who made nothing of walking thirty or forty miles a-day, and looked upon losing their way on the mountains, and getting wet to the skin, as trifling mischances incidental to the day's pleasure.

'By Jove!' exclaimed the first speaker, as stumbling along he came suddenly upon his friend, seated upon a fragment of rock, coolly lighting his pipe; 'By Jove! Alf, you're perfectly alarming! I took you for the Cyoceraeth.'

'What in the name of all that's unprounceable may that be!'

'It's a she! An ugly blear-eyed old hag, of extemely unprepossessing appearance, whose peculiarity it is to sit about the mountains shrouded in mist, and scaring unfortunate wanderers, in a manner more becoming to an escaped lunatic than a respectable female. Excuse the comparison I made to yourself.'

'Well, it wasn't over complimentary. But look here, Tom, how are we to find the right track in all this mist!'

'Goodness only knows!'

And for some time the pair proceeded in silence, puffing in a business-like way at their short pipes.

'A light!' they exclaimed simultaneously, as a faint glimmer in the distance caught their eyes; and with renewed energy they set themselves to work to reach the spot from whence it shone. Over rocky uneven ground, across mountain streams, through spongy bogs, they splashed onward towards the light, laughing at each other's misfortunes, and treating all the mishaps with unbroken good humour.

They reached the light at last, and right glad were they to find it shone from the window of an inn.

The pedestrian addressed as 'Alf' quoted Shemstone's well-known lines; and laughingly they entered the porch of the house, shaking off the wet from their coats like Newfoundland dogs.

An hour later, they were seated before a blazing fire, attired in coats of their landlord's, and resting their slippered feet upon the hob; while a table covered with the debris of a substantial repast, showed they had not neglected to fortify themselves for the next day's work. There was, however, a third in the room—a merry-looking, middle-aged man, who had entered into conversation with them.

'Phew! what a wind!' said Alfred to his companion, as a gust came sweeping round the house, threatening to demolish it; and, as it was, beating the smoke down the chimney, and rattling the window-sashes to a deafening extent. 'What a wind! We're more comfortable in here, Tom, than on the top of the Glyder!'

'I should think so. But I wish those windows wouldn't make such a confounded noise.'

'We can soon remedy that,' said the stranger; and he rapidly shaped some pieces of wood into rough wedges, and proceeded to fasten the windows with them. 'There,' continued he, as he completed his task, 'they are as fast as Bala Bell.'

'As fast as what, did you say!'

'Bala Bell! It is a common enough saying about here. Have you been to Bala!'

'We were there three days since.'

'Perhaps you heard, then, that a great town is covered by the waters of Bala Lake!'

'No; we heard nothing of it. How did it happen!'

'Well, gentlemen, if you have nothing better to do, I'll tell you the story.' And the companions, having readily signified their wish to hear it, the trio drew closer to the fire, refilled their pipes, placed their tumblers within convenient reach, and then the stranger began:—

'I cannot pretend to mention any date, in connection with the occurrences I am about to relate; it was long, long ago, or, in the words of fairy tales, "once upon a time." So, once upon a time, when the now submerged town was in its glory, the chief person in it was a mighty Welsh prince. Not one, however, of the fighting sort, but one devoted to agricultural and commercial transactions, and who always had his eye open to a good bargain. He owned the greater part of the country round, and possessed numberless cattle and sheep, and last, though not least, an extremely beautiful daughter, who was as good and amiable as she was lovely. Of course there were many suitors for her hand, for, independent of her own attractions, an alliance with so powerful a person as her father was not to be despised.

'Among the numerous aspirants for her hand there were but two whose proposals the prince, her father, would entertain—Llewellyn and Gwillim. The former, a small prince himself, as handsome and amiable as the lady, but, in a monetary sense, far inferior to the rude uncouth Gwillim. It is almost needless to say that the lady's heart was given to the handsome Llewellyn, and that she cordially hated the ill-favoured suitor. Nevertheless, her father could not make up his mind to give up the broad lands which Gwillim would bring with him if he became his son-in-law; but as he, strange as it may seem, had some affection for his daughter, he determined to wait ere he sacrificed her for gold.

'One day Gwillim, who knew how matters stood, was wandering alone in a sulky and discontented state of mind, and came suddenly upon an old hag gathering herbs.

"Gwillim," said she, "I know what you desire. Take this book," she continued, producing a volume, "and in it you will find instructions to obtain everything you want."

'Gwillim took the book and opened it, but it was filled with strange hieroglyphics which he was unable to decipher.

"I cannot read it, mother," said he.

"Place it under your pillow at night," replied she, "and you will dream of the means by which you can accomplish anything you may desire; but BEWARE OF THE BELL!"

'No doubt Gwillim would have inquired much more of her, had not the old lady prudently cut short the conversation by disappearing.

'It so happened that, the day after Gwillim's interview with the old woman, the prince decided to choose from his daughter's suitors by a novel method. He had two large corn-fields, as nearly as possible the same size, but the corn was greatly injured by birds; and the prince declared that, whichever of the two young men could keep the field most clear from them for one whole day, should have his daughter's hand in marriage.

Llewellyn made up his mind for a hard day's work. Gwillim went home, placed the magical book beneath his pillow, and when next morning he awoke, his face betrayed much inward satisfaction. What his dreams had been I cannot pretend to say; but they must have been to the purpose, as you will shortly see.

'In the middle of the day appointed for the trial, the prince strolled out to see how the suitors were getting on. It was a burning hot autumn day; and he found Llewellyn, whose field he visited first, well nigh exhausted by the heat and the labour of chasing round and round, to scare the birds. He started for the other field, but had not proceeded far when he saw Gwillim reclining at his ease, under the shade of a large elm tree.

"Ho, ho, Gwillim!" said he, "so you have given up the task!" And he felt glad that his daughter should be pleased with her husband, although he thought with regret of Gwillim's sleek and handsome "Given up! Not I," said the uncouth lover. "Not a single bird has touched your corn in that field, for I have imprisoned them in the hut which stands in one corner. Ha, ha! I will come to-morrow and claim your daughter!" And he laughed in harsh, discordant tones.

'The father, far from satisfied, proceeded to the field, and there, sure enough, in a small hut at one corner, were numerous specimens of every species of bird, filling the air with strange chirpings and cawings. Not a single grain of wheat had apparently been touched by them. The prince muttered the Welsh equivalent for "Gracious goodness!" and walked home in a strange compound of good and bad temper—the latter, I fear, predominating.

'There was no help for it! Gwillim had clearly gained the victory, and claimed the hand of the lovely girl as his reward; and not only that, but he insisted the marriage ceremony should be performed the following day. The Prince, on behalf of his daughter, remonstrated; and Gwillim replied, by bidding him thank his stars that there were twenty-four hours granted him for preparation.

'What religion the Welsh gentry professed at this period (viz. once upon a time) I cannot pretend to say; but certain it is that the town possessed some species of church or chapel, which in its turn possessed a bell. Now the day following the corn-field adventure, while Llewellyn was wandering gloomily over the mountains, cursing the fate which had separated him from the object of his affections, Gwillim, bravely attired, was leading the unwilling bride to the edifice where the marriage ceremony was to be performed. The bell, in honour of the occasion, struck up as near an approach to a merry peal as was consistent with its solitary state.

Gwillim felt uncomfortable.

The bell sounded louder and louder; and the would-be bridegroom became more and more uncomfortable, till suddenly he stopped, unable to proceed a step.

"Beware of the bell!" the old woman who gave him the mysterious book had said, and the words had to him a terrible significance. The whole bridal procession crowded round him, and besought an explanation, but not a word could he speak.

'While yet the bell rang out, and he stood motionless, a breathless messenger hurried to the prince, with tidings that an enormous number of birds, coming apparently from a small hut, had entirely devastated the corn-field which it had been Gwillim's care, the previous day, to guard.

'The Welsh gentry of those days were of a fiery and choleric disposition; and the prince swore a huge oath, and declared that the conjuror should not wed his daughter.

'The bell was stopped, and Gwillim recovered speech and power. He swore, he threatened, he entreated; but all in vain, for the prince would have no wedding—at all events, that day; and Gwillim returned home as ill-tempered a bachelor as one would wish to see.

'The bell, he knew, was the reason of his discomfort; and he placed the magic book beneath his pillow that night, to learn the surest way to silence it; but his dreams would not assist him. He tried again and again, but without effect; and then he determined to remove it the best way he could, without magical assistance.

'At midnight he stole forth, and cautiously mounted the roof of the building which it guarded. It was but a small bell; but it resisted all his efforts to move it, for it was firm as a rock. He found a piece of iron, which he used as a lever. The bell did not move, but its clapper did, and sent forth a loud dong! The iron flew up, and hit Gwillim upon the forehead, and he fell senseless from the roof to the ground. This effectually put a stop for some time to his trickeries; but as from day to day news came to him of Llewellyn being always with his lady-love, his hatred of the ball which had prevented his marriage was considerably augmented; and he determined, as soon as possible, to make another attempt to silence it, but in a different way.

'He walked into a quiet valley, where he gathered a quantity of the driest brushwood he could find; which, one dark night, he conveyed surreptitiously to the bell-defended edifice.

'He piled it up beneath the small turret which contained the obnoxious piece of metal, and then set light to it. With a fiendish laugh he watched the flames mount to it; they reached it; they burned a piece of cord which fastened the clapper, and then again it clanged forth. Simultaneously with the sound a heavy beam, loosened by the fire, fell upon Gwillim, crushing his legs, and detaining him prisoner. Those living near, roused by his cries, came to his assistance, and speedily extinguished the fire; but the incendiary was maimed for life. They carried him to his house, where for many days he lay insensible. When he recovered, the first news he heard was that the following day the prince's daughter would bestow her hand upon his rival, Llewellyn. If he did not make use of terrible language, it was only because he was too weak to speak; nevertheless, he had strength enough to act.

'With a diabolical grin that night, he laid the magic book beneath his pillow, muttering to himself "Water will do it—water will do it!"

'Any one watching Gwillim the next morning would have thought him an escaped lunatic. He was upon the roof of his house, making as many contortions as an "India-rubber brother," and mumbling strange words to himself. His house was upon a slight elevation, and ever and anon he paused and looked around him anxiously. It was a lovely bright spring morning; the mountains capped with snow glittered brightly in the sun, the birds chirruped and sang, and the streamlets laughed and chattered over their stony beds. Llewellyn was a happy man that morning.

'Gwillim saw him from his elevated position going to the bride's residence, and he grinned and renewed his contortions with increased vehemence.

'A great moving mass appears in the distance, and Gwillim rubs his hands and chuckles. It draws nearer. The morning sun shines upon it and it glitters. It is a huge wave! Nearer and nearer it advances, and Gwillim laughs aloud at the success of his conjurations. But the laugh changes to a shriek of despair, for he sees that he, too, will be engulfed. A dull heavy roar proclaims the approach of the waters. Dismayed, the bridal party rush into the street. But it is too late; and, in a few moments, they are covered by the advancing wave. It flows on over castle and hovel alike, but Gwillim is not at his post to see it. He is madly searching his book for words to stay the advancing tide; but all in it is unintelligible. He casts himself upon his bed, to try to sleep in the few moments still left him; but all in vain. He hears the roar of the water beneath his window; and in another moment, with one wild shriek and a mad buffet with the waves, he is buried beneath the surging lake.

'At his death the waves ceased flowing, and an hour afterwards a calm, placid lake—such as you saw it three days ago, gentlemen—occupied the place of the town. That is the story of Bala Bell.'

'Thank you,' said the weary pedestrians, yawning and knocking the ashes out of their pipes. 'Thank you. The story is open to criticism; but we are much obliged to you for it; and now I think we'll go to bed. Good night.'

WARNER STERNE.

HAME TO DEE.

MITHER! I kent ye'd let me lay
My head upon your breast
A wee while, till your errin' bairn
Found in the kirkyard rest.

I feel your tears upon my cheek—
Your arms are thrown roun' me;
I come, like a puir wounded doo,
Back to my hame to dee.

Forgie me, mither, a' the shame
That I hae brocht on thee;
Forgie me, for the sake o' Him
Wha pitied such as me!

The lasses, that were ance my friends,
Now turn their heads awa;
And jeerin' words, and looks o' scorn,
On the puir sinner fa'.

I ken 'tis just that I should bide
The punishment o' sin;
But, mither! mither! my sair heart
Is breakin' fast within.

Oh! it has been a fearfu' curse
The beauty o' my face!
Wad I had died ere his saft words
Fand in my heart a place!

Dear mither! dinna stroke awa
The hair frae aff my brow—
That fondlin' touch I ance sae lo'ed,
I canna thole it now;

For, mither! he has stroked it too,
Praisin' each gowden band;
And your voice sounds like his to me—
I seem to feel his hand.

Though shameful' was the troth he kept,
My love will ne'er depart—
I could kneel down, and gie to him
The life-bluid o' my heart.

He woo'd me wi' his winnin' words—
(Oh! I was sair to blame!)

For, lovin' him wi' a' my strength,
I thoct his love the same.
And, trustin' him, I left my hame—
For oh! I lo'ed him sae!

'Twas sin—'twas sin; but, chide me not—
My punishment's fu' wae.
I'm deesin', mither! Dinna greet—
Christ hath my sins forgien;

I've read the words, sae sweet, wi' which
He bless'd the Magdalene.
And ye've forgien me too, mither!
In your fond arms I'll dee—
Prayin' for him whom I still love,
Though he hath wrang'd me.

Oh! maybe when, on Sabbath morn,
The bells hae ceased to peal,
My young friends winna shame, sometimes,
On Katy's grave to kneel.

But only stars will watch, mither!
Where Katy lies asleep;
And only angels see the grief
Wi' which his heart will weep.

Now lay me down, my ain dear one!
Death's damps are on my brow.
'Arise! your sins are all forgien!'
Christ calleth to me now!

LEAVES FROM THE CARDIPHONIA OF A MARRIED LADY.

BY JANE C. SIMPSON.

December 2, 1854.

THIS winter has been a very dreary one in respect of weather; and the accounts from the seat of war are most discouraging. Awful sufferings in the trench and on the tented field, and frightful news of disaster by sea and land, fill the public journals. We should all be wofully cast down, seeing that not only Louis, but our bright young cousin, Charles Beaumont, is out in that frightful Crimea, were it not for the letters that are so constantly coming and going; and tending, as nothing else could do, to revive our oft-sinking spirits.

What is love's dearest boon in absence?—A letter. The heart leaps to meet it—to have, to hold, to embrace it—as the hand of a friend stretches out, in trembling eagerness, to grasp the hand of its fellow. Long desired, long looked for, come at last! We seize it with passionate eagerness; we scarce notice the superscription, for we know whence it comes. We would finger it delicately, reverentially, as affection prompts; but somehow we cannot. We tear it open in haste unholy. In our impatience to rifle the contents, the words dance before our eyes, running zig-zag over the paper in preposterous confusion. Half blind, through the mist of rising emotion, we grope after the tidings with suspended breath. We devour every syllable—reading and re-reading, first, particular passages, then the whole, in regular order, from the beginning. We banquet on every sentence that tells of good health, and pleasant prospects, and kind recollections. And not till, having conned it over and over, we have literally got the entire letter by heart, do we fold it up tenderly in its pristine form, study the exterior, and ponder every circumstance of its date and composition. Then at length, pressing it perchance to our lips, we lay it away carefully in our bosom. It is a hallowed treasure; we would not part with it for gold. And surely, if ever epistles drew out the souls of the recipients in ardent longing after the absent and the dear, they are those that are now arriving to us and others from the far Crimea.

Every letter which Charlotte receives from her lover is like an oasis in the waste, or rather like the wood-note of a bird on the tree-top, calling to her to look up through the darkening clouds to the smiling rainbow. Most of these are the soldier's missives, written by fits and starts in the pauses of active duty. Occasionally comes a packet of several well-covered sheets, brimful of strange episodes, anecdote, and adventure—the warm romance of youth dealing with the realities of a new and exciting career. But always and through all, the charming elasticity of the gallant heart runs clearly along, like an electric current, flashing scintillations of joyous promise for the future years. And so, by the potent magnetism of one spirit upon another, Charlotte maintains her courage bravely, and by constant activity in duty keeps the Gorgon of melancholy pretty much at bay.

January 9, 1855.

'She is singing like a bird
In its leafy bower,
For her inmost heart is stirred
By affection's power;
By that passion-worded scroll,
From beyond the sea,
Gladness on her glowing soul
Gleams tumultuously.'

Early to-day Charlotte set off on an errand of charity, accompanied by Rachel carrying a well-stored basket. Their destination was a cottage some three miles off, where lives a poor widow, whose two sons are at the war. But though the wind cut sharply and the rain clouds lowered, I knew well there was a glow in the innermost chamber of Charlotte's heart, that not all the snows of Siberia could have chilled. There was a 'Passion-worded scroll, from beyond the sea,'

received this morning, and then lying close-nested in her bosom, which, like an invisible talisman, bore her up as on eagle's wings. Ah! how curious is the mental mechanism at all times, how incomprehensible when subjected to the subtle domain of love! What despotism and yet what fascination is in his mastery! In his hand we are all like feathers in the wind, tossed hither and thither—now soaring full in the sunshine, now falling weak and ruffled to earth.

Charlotte had pointed out to me one little passage in that letter which had taken special hold on her mind. It ran thus:—

'Give no credit, I beseech of you, to the thousand rumours afloat about the army. Believe what I write to you, and nothing more. As long as I wear your colours in my heart—as long as you hold your troth to me (and that is now and always till we die!)—my life is charmed; and your fingers hold the invisible chain by which in due time I shall be guided once more safely to your side. Remember this, and never despond.' Charlotte did seem to remember it with her whole heart. And having performed her little mission of love with a will, she is now returned, and has just been giving me a short account of it. Here I quote her own words:—

'Arrived at the cottage, our summons was answered by a small child, who, on catching sight of me, instantly fled, leaving the door wide open, and crying out, "Here is the lady come again!" We passed into the single apartment, where we found no one but the child standing by the side of a bed, and looking round scared and doubtful at the visitors.

"Hannah very ill," was the only reply I could get to my inquiries; "mother away for the doctor." I approached the sufferer (who lay moaning, with eyes closed), and sat down by the humble couch. Everything bespoke scanty means, but cleanliness and order.

"Is there nobody about the house but you?" to the child.

"No," with a suspicious stare.

I motioned to Rachel, who began unpacking the basket, spreading the contents on the table. Taking the sufferer's hand in mine, I perceived that it burned, while her cheek glowed crimson. Her eyes opened; but instantly closed, evidently from a leaden burden which hung upon the forehead.

"My head! my head!" wailed a feeble voice. "I shall die! I shall die!" I threw my arm round the poor patient, raised her gently in bed, and was standing thus supporting her, and saying a few soothing words, when the latch was slowly lifted, and Mrs. Richards appeared. The widow's face was very pale, and she sank wearily into a chair.

"The surgeon," she said, "was coming shortly." Hereupon Rachel, rightly interpreting my glance, hastened to tender her a sip of wine. This revived her; but the delicate frame was evidently exhausted, and it was some minutes ere she recognised me, and could speak her thanks. O mamma! how could I help being greatly moved? I scarce knew which to pity most—the wan mother fighting with her broken health, or the flushed daughter prostrated in her sore sickness. Resolving to remain at the cottage till the doctor came, and attend myself on the invalids, I sent Rachel on to the town on other business, bidding her call as she returned.

Here I broke in—"This was scarce prudent of you, my dear, considering the risk of contagion."

She smiled.

"I never thought of it. But how could I have left them in that dreary way? I chafed Hannah's temples with the aromatic essence I had brought, settled her pillows about her, and smoothed her hot hands with my own cool ones; then I administered some of the dainty nourishment to the faded appetite of the widow. And so one hour, two hours, went by, and then Rachael came once more; but no doctor. The day was now far spent, and we were about to go, when, at the door of the cottage, we met the surgeon. I waited to learn his opinion of the girl. He approached the bed, fixed one scrutinising look on Hannah's face, examined her arms, her neck, her pulse, then turned quietly away. He followed me into the porch, and walked a few yards with us along the road.

"She is very ill," he said at length. "You had best not come again. No one need come [looking round at Rachael who was behind us]. I will take care of her myself."

"I perceived the case was a serious one, and made no comment. We hurried homewards, while he returned to the cottage. And now," said Charlotte, in conclusion, "I suppose the poor thing has got fever, and the doctor dreaded infection; but I have no fears, and I am glad that I went. So dear, dear mamma, put away that anxious face, and let me read Louis's letter once more."

So saying she drew it out from her bosom.

I did put away my anxious face, and talked about a variety of other things till George arrived; and, the rest of the children being summoned, the urn steamed and hissed on the tea-table, and we all sat laughing and talking round the blazing fire. But, somehow or other, I shall not feel quite right for a few days after this little incident; and will watch very assiduously to see how my darling goes on.

February 2.

My heart is sick and sore. I can scarce hold the pen while I write the words. A chamber is darkened in the house, where one lies on a bed with throbbing brow, parched lips, and dull dazed vision. The contagion has done its work. Day by day the maledy (Dr. Armstrong has named it; but I cannot—the most dreadful scourge of humanity!) has wrought sorer, deeper, into the fair frame. Day by day the baneful agency has insinuated the subtle poison into the pure young blood. Day by day our terror-stricken household has watched, and wept, and prayed, and agonised, in presence of the appalling foe. Three weeks of delirious pain—three weeks of total blindness to the sufferer! Three weeks! Nay; rather an interminable age, we might call it, of anguished suspense to the bewildered family! Merciful Heaven! hast thou decreed that death is in this cup? Must the beloved daughter—sister—cherished of all, be thus snatched hence, in the pride of her youth, health, and beauty? Or—oh horror!—will life be spared, only to show the perpetual wreck which disease has made? Will she pass through the fiery ordeal, only to emerge to hopeless deformity? Will she go down to the tomb with the memory of her matchless loveliness still green and fresh in the hearts that loved her! Or will that loveliness find a living grave in the marred and blasted features? O Charlotte! Charlotte! would that I could suffer, or, if need were, that I could die for thee!

February 21.

The crisis has come and gone. The mystic angel seemed to hover awhile irresolute over our sufferer's couch, then plumed his ebony wing, and passed away. And how did he leave his victim? Ah! me! my spirit sinks—my eyes run over as I record the bitter truth. Life has indeed been spared, and sight restored; and for these we praise the heavenly mercy. Yet, alas! alas! she whose beauty was once a very proverb in the mouths of all who beheld her, has at length risen from her bed of pain a worn and pitiable spectacle; in form languid and wasted; in countenance seamed and scarred and blighted for evermore! Once, only once, did the stricken dear steal a glance, quickly, fearfully, at the tell-tale mirror. Would she had refrained! 'My own spectre,' she says despairingly,

'has haunted me from that hour. Whither, whither, to escape the hated presence?'

The earliest germs of spring begin to bud on the hedgerows. The sky shows calm and blue; the sunshine glistens on crocus, and snowdrop, and sweet-scented violet. My darling will not look upon the sweet face of nature. She refuses to be comforted, and I can but look upon her, and weep!

'Oh! still let me hold vigil,' she cries, 'in my darkened room! Bring me not again into the pure light of day—it is a misery and a mockery. Not for myself alone do I grieve, but for another, to whom never, never more can I be dear—as I have been! Hide me, hide me, from myself and all the world!'

March 13.

George and I have been talking over our calamity this morning; and agree, to our unspeakable comfort, that, now she has had leisure to face it in its full extent, our sweet girl is beginning to exhibit a greatness of mind which we could scarce have expected in one so young, under such sore and peculiar trial. She is now not simply resigned—she is even contented; and I must say there is something to our hearts very noble and affecting in the mastery she has at last gained over that spirit of murmuring and revolt, which it would have been unnatural not to have exhibited at the first shock. There is one thing to which Charlotte has entirely made up her mind, and this is, to consider her engagement to Louis as now and henceforward wholly at an end.

'I would not do him the injustice,' she says, 'to suppose that matters can ever be the same between us as they were and might have been.' No; I can never wed him, and I will never wed another. There is but one way left—I must never see him more.'

There is a strange heroism about this resolution of our daughter's, at which, while I wonder and admire, I dare not gainsay it. She bears herself so sublimely beneath the utter crushing and ruin of her hopes, that I fear the mood cannot last. What if the fiery ordeal through which she has past be purifying only to consume? I am thankful, yet bewildered.

Mem.—As an indication of the increased depth of earnestness which the late melancholy experience has wrought upon her soul, I may instance the verses which Charlotte slipped into my hand the other evening, ere retiring to rest. I had given her the box with Mrs. Falconer's (or rather Mrs. Grey's) MSS. to look over, rightly judging that she would take some interest in the perusal of the various pieces. The one she selected as her favourite is of a very grave cast. And when I read it to George, he gave me a significant look, but made no further comment. Here are the stanzas:—

To rise each morn, with heart resolved
To work for God the livelong day,
As though in duty's path well trod
Our all of peace and safety lay:
And yet each night, abased, to fall
Before the perfect Presence low,
And owning our best deeds unclean,
Our only hope on mercy throw:
This is to enter the strait gate,
To find the sure and narrow road,
And with the small devoted band
Fight the good fight approved of God.

To start afresh from day to day

On some new pleasure's favored chase,
And to each conscience whisper say—
Or thought of graver mood—Give place,
Give place all high and holy themes
That stir the soul with earnest power,
Give place to glittering gauds of sense—
The toys that gild a present hour!
This is to join the faithless throng,
The broad highway who nimbly tread—
Who play the game of folly well,
And choose earth's husks for heaven's own bread.

In lonely vigil last midnight,
In reason's equal balance laid,
All highest joys and gains of time
Against the eternal hope I weigh'd:
And oh! how utter light and vain
Aloft the worldling's portion flew,
While down in ponderous splendour came
Heaven's golden freightage tried and true!
This life is brief—the next for ever:
Here is the school where tasks are done,
Play truant now—the prize is lost!
The lesson learn—the crown is won!

Will there be any re-action upon the effort of her generous self-sacrifice? Or will the solemn mental calm superinduced by it remain? We cannot tell.

October 20, 1855.

Letters to-day from the Crimea. Brave men have been fighting their country's battles, and making their country victorious with the price of their best blood. Three days ago the Fort of Kinburn was captured. Charles Beaumont writes, that our own devoted Louis, through dauntless personal exposure to the fire of musketry and cannonade in the late encounter, had received a shock which, though it paralysed him for a time, has yet left him sound of limb and vigorous of spirit as ever. And a short hurried billet from his own hand to Charlotte herself, informs her that he is about to return to England immediately, with apparently increased enthusiasm for the noble profession to which he belongs; this news has thrown our poor dear girl into strong nervous excitement. She seems to have calculated on a much longer exemption from the crowning climax of her trial. Or rather, perhaps, she had not fully realised its coming at all. At any rate, as it is now certain that her lover may surprise us at any moment, Charlotte has betaken herself to her old seclusion, starting at every sound, and dreading the very presence which her heart must yet crave.

Sometimes I try to flatter myself that when Louis sees her (as to see her he will, without doubt, be resolved, and admit no denial of her engagement), he may not be so shocked by the outward change as she imagines. Her eyes have still their full pristine splendour; her hair, of the angel gold, is still redundant in its flow; while her voice, always sweet, has gained considerably in depth and melody. But, mayhap, I deceive myself, as I observe many do turn away with a sorrowful sigh as often as they glance at the married face and the altered mien.

November 1.

It is as I feared. Our poor Charlotte is restless and disturbed by the least breath that catches her ear. She has asked me sadly whether Louis is aware of the rain her sickness has wrought upon her outward appearance; and I have told her he was long ago apprised of her illness, but he knows not as yet the cruel consequences that followed. 'I cannot bear to write to him all the horrible truth,' she murmurs despondingly, 'so he will come expecting'—Then she pauses, and the woful cry ever and anon breaks forth—'Oh! hide me, hide me from his loving gaze (alas! not loving now, but loathing)! I am not worthy to bear his honoured name. Tell him I am lost—I am dead—I am his no more!'

November 7.

What a scene I have got to record! What a wonderful, pathetic, unlooked for deliverance has been vouchsafed to Charlotte from all her fears! What a mysterious fitting of events, the one into the other! Let me compose my spirits to chronicle this strange episode of our home history, calmly and in order.

Yesterday morning, without any more special warning than just the general one we received some little time ago, the rattling of wheels along the quiet road, and a quick summons at the green gate, announced an arrival. Was it, indeed, our soldier, our hero, our beloved, our long absent one returned once more? It was, and 'compared by his faithful friend and comrade in arms, our cousin Charles Beaumont! Curiously enough, saving the domestics, none of the family was about the house but my first born and myself. We were sitting in the blue room (where my darling was born)—a parlour now, and commanding a full view of the front garden and the broad entrance steps up to the house. Simultaneously we divined who the visitors must be.

'O Charlotte!' I whispered her earnestly, and taking hold of her hands with both of my own; 'he is here. Nerve yourself to meet him; as meet him you must, or soon or late.'

I was so agitated myself that I could not follow the simple dictate of my heart—to fly down to welcome him. Charlotte, breaking suddenly from me, flew to the window; and, hastily withdrawing the loose white screen, looked out—a pale, dejected, disfigured face, peeping timidly, nervously, wistfully—if so she might catch one stealthy glimpse, the last, the very last she might ever have, of her long-lost lover! She sees him—herself unseen! There is a smothered cry of agony; her heart bounds, flutters, and faints. His step is in the hall. He is ascending the staircase. He is coming to meet her—to claim her as his betrothed bride—his own henceforth and evermore!

'Oh! whither to go from his astonished gaze. Hide me, hide me in the grave rather than let him behold me thus!' His foot is on the threshold—she has not the power to stir—I withdraw into an obscure nook of the apartment, where, unseen, I may yet see all. In silent despair, Charlotte wraps her in the ample folds of her snow-white veil. Her luxuriant tresses, bursting their bonds under her fervid anguish, fall round her shoulders in a gleaming auburn shower. He walks straight into the well-remembered chamber—straight up to her old accustomed seat in the case-mat recess. Her agitation is intense. She huddles herself up into a corner like a guilty thing, covering her face with her hands. He stands rivetted before her.

'O Louis! best beloved!' she breaks forth with the deep energy of her hopeless misery, 'I am changed—changed—since we last met. Look not on me to spurn and abhor me. But oh! leave me, forget me, think me lost—think me dead!'

Every pulse in the strong man's face quivered as she spoke. The truth seemed to flash upon his brain like lightning.

'Charlotte! Charlotte! look up, my love! my life! Alas! I can never see you more. I too am changed. The shock of the cannonade which spared me life and limb yet wrought strange work upon me. O Charlotte! I am in darkness! I am blind.'

He stretched out his arms to her. She leaped from her seat, like one electrified. She dashed aside her veil. She threw herself upon his breast. She rained tears and kisses on his manly cheek. She called upon Heaven to bless him a thousand and a thousand times. She was delirious in her excess of tenderness and pity. Her countenance, indeed, was marred—the outward loveliness gone from it for aye. But the mind, the heart, the soul, the inward invisible essence—how did that shine forth now with resplendent and ineffable glory!

The young soldier knelt beside her. He mingled his weeping and caresses with hers. 'The same—the same!' he whispered earnestly. 'Nay; better far than before! Dearest and more beautiful to me than ever! I murmur not for sightless eyes, since they have brought me such overflows of my darling's truth and compassion! Father! we thank Thee, who, in taking what Thou wilt, has yet left us all that makes life most precious!' They bowed their heads reverently as he spoke; and the angel who ministers to those mortals who, though sorely stricken, can yet gratefully rejoice, shed over their spirits a holy peace, to rest and abide with them for ever!

What a relief it was to me to steal, unnoticed, from the chamber—to weep, and ponder, and adore in secret!

January 8, 1856.

This morning saw our Charlotte and her young soldier united in the solemn bond. It was a grave but not a sorrowful wedding. No show or glitter attended it. We felt it was a union of hearts. There was a quiet satisfaction on George's face, as he gave away the bride, that had something strangely elevated about it. Her brothers and sisters looked on with their hilarity excellently tempered in harmony with the occasion. When the marriage party retired from church, it was observed that Charlotte, taking her handsome husband by the hand, led him slowly and tenderly along, as simply—I had almost said as sublimely—as one child might lead another in the affecting trustfulness of love. Surely it was a wedding not lightly to be witnessed or soon forgotten! As for myself, I must confess to having been so impressed by the whole details, that I have founded a pretty long ballad on the whole details of the story. When I read it to George, he exclaimed—

'Ah, Kate! that metrical tale of yours reminds me of nothing so much as the old rhyme of "Chery Chase." I laughed. Yet believing that it is in the length only of the ditty that he means the similitude to apply, I am not greatly flattered by the comparison. Be it good or bad, however, my poor ballad has at least the merit of truthfulness, and these are the concluding verses of it:—

Reader! if e'er in pictured hall,

Or wandering forth in summer meads,

A noble form should meet thine eye,

A veiled lady fondly leads,—

Let sweet compassion, fitly blent

With reverence, fill thy glowing mind,

For her whose beauty waned so soon,

And him his country's cause made blind!

The youthful pair are gone from our roof; and have made their new home at the Grove. But mon capitaine (who is Major now, by-the-by, and not by purchase), though blind in a physical sense, is all eye and ear, mentally and morally, for the good, the beautiful, and the true. So, while he feels the retirement of the country to be always soothing and grateful, he is no churlish spirit to shun society and the abodes of his fellow-men. Rather, he seeks to vary existence by occasional snatches of foreign travel, and exalted converse with the wise and intelligent of many countries. And go where they will, I know they are happy.

Here end the Leaves of the Married Lady's Cardiphonia. And let me say at the close, as I said at the beginning, Mrs. Weston is a sweet simple character, whom I seem to have known all my life, though our acquaintance dates but two years back. Mr. Weston continues a respected and flourishing lawyer, and they still live in the house with the pretty garden and green gate. The last time I went to visit my friend was on a lovely summer day. An old lady, of a most charming benevolence of aspect, was seated on a rustic chair near the porch, holding in her lap something long and soft and dainty and white. As soon as she saw me she rose to give me welcome. Aunt Aubrey, of course, I knew her on the instant.

'Katherine—I mean Mrs. Weston—will be here presently. This is her little grandson—Charlotte's baby.'

She lifted the handkerchief from the tiny face as she spoke. I peered with real interest into the small physiognomy—fearing I scarce knew what. The boy opened his eyes. They were large, lustrous, and of a fine hazel.

'What is the child's name?'

'Stephen Grey.'

THE END.

LINES BY A MOTHER
ON THE BIRTH OF HER FIRST-BORN.

She came in the bright summer time,
When leafy June was in its prime,
And skies rang with a joyous chime—
My baby!

My joy found vent in showers of rain:
In tears that loosen'd heart and brain:
Sweet tears, that went and came again—
My baby!

I clasp'd the wee thing to my breast,
I kiss'd it in its cooing nest,
And connd with eyes that could not rest—
My baby!

I felt a gushing tenderness:
A rapture words can ne'er express:
A mother's first fond consciousness—
My baby!

O hallow'd name! to which there clings
A halo caught from angels' wings,
Which o'er the world a glory flings—
My baby!

Tinged with the hues of hopes and fears,
Commingling past with coming years,
And kindling smiles half dimm'd by tears—
My baby!

That name was mine. I, too, must share
A mother's joy, a mother's care;
I could but breathe a mother's prayer—
My baby!

Grant me, O God! a will resign'd—
A thankful heart—a thoughtful mind!
Lead me, O God! for I am blind—
My baby!

O Thou, good Shepherd of the sheep!
My little lambkin guard and keep,
Both when awake and when asleep—
My baby!

THE PHANTOM PUNT;
OR, THE HOWL OF GUILT.

A TALE OF VIRTUE AND VILLANY, TRIAL AND TRIUMPH, DESPAIR AND DEATH.

BOOK SECOND.—PART FIRST.

CHIPPS' NARRATIVE (Continued).

'He was paring his toe nails, I say.

'He looked up and quivered.

'Quivered!

'I seized him by the foot.'

At this part, the manuscript of old Chipps becomes quite unintelligible; otherwise it is probable the reader would have had a key to the story.

The joint author, who has been carrying on the story for the last four chapters, begs respectfully to inform his numerous readers that, in consequence of a dispute with his two collaborators, these gentlemen (if such they may be called) withdrew their services from the story, and likewise the two most prominent characters, Duferny and Vavazour [the escaped convicts being their joint creation].

The present writer, far from willing to obtrude his private grievances before the public, nevertheless deems it incumbent upon him to explain the nature of the difference which caused the dissolution of partnership—which he will do, to any person anxious to know, on a note being left at the office of this journal, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, London (enclosing a pound's worth of postage-stamps, as a guarantee of good faith).

The two gentlemen who have withdrawn, have intimated to the present writer, through their lawyers, that he (the present writer) will be pursued with the utmost rigour of the law, in the event of the two convicts being again introduced into the story. Further, he has been given to understand, through a private friend, that they intend to use the convicts for another Sensation Story, on which they are at present engaged. The present writer despises alike their threats and themselves; and, to prove it, he will bring the two convicts to the fate which they so richly deserve, in

CHAPTER IX.

Let us return to Duferny and Vavazour, the escaped convicts.

We are again in front of Newgate. It is three minutes to eight o'clock. As Saint Sepulchre's Church tolls the hour of eight, two men walk out. They are Duferny and Vavazour, the escaped convicts, whose participation in the death of Old Chipps has been brought home to them.

They are thrown off.

Observe the contortions of the miserable wretches.

They are dead, and the bell has ceased tolling. Their ghosts are daily to be seen from ten till four (Sunday excepted), walking arm-in-arm down Botolph-lane, Eastcheap. At four o'clock precisely they embark on board a phantom punt, which is moored opposite Irongate Wharf, and with a howl of guilt they draw their repeaters from their pockets, exclaiming 'Bless my soul! it's four o'clock. Give us a shake of your fist, old boy! Should auld acquaintance be forgot? Certainly not; why should it?' And waltzing twice round the punt, to the air of 'Tis hard to give the hand where the heart can never be,' they disappear in the mist, and are seen no more till next day (provided it is not Sunday), at ten o'clock precisely, in Botolph-lane.

The Marquis of Pennywhistle and Miss Chipps got married, and started a sewing-machine in a genteel locality, where the rents are moderate and the air salubrious.

As for Chipps himself, we cannot do better than wind up the tale with him, and the words of the immortal bard Shakspeare—

'After life's fretful fuss, he snores sound.'

WATER—ITS ELEMENTS AND PROPERTIES.

'See dying vegetables life sustain;
See life dissolving vegetable again'

I SHALL here briefly notice the process whereby vegetables absorb the carbon of carbonic acid; and, setting free the oxygen, thus maintain the vital equilibrium between the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Water and carbonic acid are bosom friends, and have a great affinity for other; the latter, although a gaseous body, is so heavy that it can be poured from one vessel to another, and being considerably weightier than common air, as a natural consequence it will hover downwards, and lodge in low-lying ill-ventilated localities, unless carried away by the wind and mingled with the atmosphere of the surrounding country, when a portion is borne by the rain or moisture to the soil, and, as before mentioned, acts as a solvent on those substances which are the food of plants, these being insoluble in water but soluble in water and carbonic acid. It is pretty certain, however, that plants assimilate but a very small portion of carbon by their roots, only the mineral constituents being retained, and the carbonic acid exuded back into the soil. This operation is taken advantage of by landowners (probably some are not aware of it) who plant trees on thin light soil, in order that carbonic acid may be diffused through it to dissolve its fertilising constituents, and prepare it for yielding more valuable crops. It is through the medium of their leaves that the vegetable races absorb their vast stores of carbon, and in this respect every tree is indeed a tree of life; and as plants are said to die, or at least to become dormant, in winter, it is natural to infer that the proportion of carbonic acid in the atmosphere during winter must be greater than in summer; and as it is during the latter season that plants add to their bulk, it is further evident that the light of the sun—whatever its composition may be—is the re-agent which nature employs to separate the carbon and oxygen, precipitating the former into the reticulated groves, microscopic forests, and bushy miniature ravines, which compose almost every form of leaf, where it is transformed into stems, branches, and trunks, and all the numberless and beautiful forms in which these children of the sun appear.

We have seen several explanations of the decomposition of carbonic acid by plants; but none are entirely satisfactory, and must fail to be so until, like every other decomposing process, it is reduced to a formula, which is not likely to be soon accomplished, as all the efforts of chemists, aided by heat and electricity, to decompose carbonic acid, have hitherto proved abortive. The oxygen thus set free, with its youth renewed, again enters the arena of nature, to form similar alliances; and thus the circuit is performed, and the atmosphere maintained in a state of purity. This is one of the simplest and most beautiful of the primary laws which govern matter; and, in contemplating it, we are astounded at the infinitude of the wisdom which conceived and the power which mercifully controls it; and the little stock of imperfect knowledge we possess seems, in comparison, like the glowworm's lamp to the blazing sun.

The necessity of oxygen to support animal life, and the deadly nature of carbonic acid, are often fearfully exhibited in the fire-damp explosions of coal-pits. Fire-damp is composed of hydrogen and carbon, and is very similar to common coal gas. A perfect explosion of it exhausts ten times its volume of air. So that those unfortunate men who may have escaped being scorched to death at the instant of the explosion, are almost certain to be suffocated afterwards, by the 'after-damp.' This after-damp is death-dealing carbonic acid, and is a product of the explosion. For illustration, suppose an apartment filled with fire-damp and atmospheric air; and, further, an individual approaching with a light—we may reckon him a poor miner, going to his dreary toil through some dark avenue of a deep coal-working. The hitherto faithful flickering lamp that is dangling on his brow, and which has often befriended him amid the sepulchral blackness in which he labours, has been transformed into a death's-head; and that which formerly lighted him to his toil is now lighting him to his tomb; for in another moment the tiny flame has communicated to those fierce and free elements its dreadful charm; and, with a dull thundering boom and a blue flash of terrible fire, shaking the scooped arches of the grim dungeon, they combine—and woe to him within their reach!

The scientific explanation of a fire-damp explosion is as follows:—The application of a light causes the hydrogen of the fire-damp to unite with the oxygen of the air, producing water; and the carbon also to combine with the oxygen of the air, resulting in carbonic acid. For example, $C_2H_4O_2 = 2CO_2$ and $2H_2O$. Thus the entire oxygen is absorbed in these two products; and the area previously occupied by the unignited gases filled with carbonic acid and nitrogen.

We will now proceed to the consideration of the other elementary constituent of water, viz.

HYDROGEN.

This substance, like oxygen, is a permanently elastic gas, colourless, tasteless, and inodorous. It is not, however, a supporter of combustion, but is itself a combustible, producing a blue feeble light, but intense heat. A stream of oxygen sent from the blow-pipe into a jet of ignited hydrogen constitutes the oxy-hydrogen flame, which may be said to emit the maximum amount of heat available for scientific purposes. Hydrogen is the lightest of all the elements, being eight times lighter than oxygen, and fourteen times lighter than nitrogen. It is present in all inflammable material, such as alcohol, ether, coal-gas, paraffine, petroleum, turpentine, resins, oils, and fats; also in wood, starch, gum, sugar, &c. In short, it is largely diffused, chemically and mechanically, throughout solids, liquids, and gases; and the universality of its presence may be adduced from the fact of its being an element of water. It is never found, like oxygen, free in nature, but is always in combination, breathing at times the most delicious fragrance and the most offensive effluvia. It is present in lemon, cinnamon, lavender, caraway, coriander, peppermint, cloves, camphor, nutmeg, camomile, thyme, bergamot, sweet-bay, beanblossom, &c. In these it is in combination with oxygen and carbon. And again we find it in mustard, ginger, garlic, &c. combined with the above, and also with nitrogen and sulphur, which impart to these their acid and pungent odour. And as we advance, its compounds are found becoming offensive, until it reaches its climax in sulphuretted hydrogen (HS). We shall not enter into the compounds of hydrogen as with those of oxygen, but will proceed to consider its bearings and affinities with oxygen in water. Before doing so, however, we may observe that although isolated hydrogen be capable of ignition, and absolutely free from smoke during combustion, as yet, it possesses little or no value for commercial purposes. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that, when our vast magazines of coal are exhausted (and, according to Sir Wm. Armstrong's statement, the British coal-fields will be wrought out in about 200 years), hydrogen shall become the inexhaustible agent of light and heat, and our rivers and lakes—not mentioning the ocean—the prolific sources of an endless supply; with this consideration in favour of hydrogen, that its combustion produces water. Thus, it is no sooner ignited than it returns to its former condition, and may be again decomposed for ignition; and so on to the end of time. The great and indeed only difficulty to be surmounted in order to effect this, is the discovery of a cheap process for decomposing water, in order that the hydrogen may be isolated. Sir William Armstrong, in his opening speech to the British Association at Newcastle, says, in reference to this subject:—'Where are we to find materials so economical for this purpose [the production of motive power] as the coal we derive from the earth, and the oxygen we obtain from the air. The latter costs absolutely nothing; and every lb. of coal which, in the act of combustion, enters into chemical combination, renders more than two and a-half lbs. of oxygen available for power.' 'We cannot look to water as a practicable source of oxygen, for there it exists in the combined state, requiring expenditure of chemical energy to separate it from the hydrogen.' 'It is in the atmosphere alone that it can be found in that free state in which we require it.' And further:—'But, to use this oxygen, we must consume some oxidisable substance, and coal is the cheapest we can procure.' Now, although there is every probability of our coal-measures being wrought out, we do not think there is the slightest prospect of the atmospheric oxygen being entirely used up; and, therefore, it is unnecessary to be looking at all, either to water or any other substance, for a supply of what we have in endless abundance already. But it is not oxygen we are likely to get short of, it is the oxidisable substance, and hydrogen is pre-eminently capable of oxidation; because, if 1 lb. coal (carbon) renders $2\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. of oxygen available for power during combustion, 1 lb. hydrogen will render 8 lbs. of oxygen available by the same process. Unfortunately, however, hydrogen is a gas, while coal is a solid. Hydrogen in water is chemically combined with oxygen, and, therefore, requiring expenditure of chemical energy for its separation; while coal or carbon is free. Free carbon from the earth, and free oxygen from the air, are the grand sources of motive power at present; but as the causes which produced the former substance as coal have long since ceased to operate, and as its consumption is increasing yearly, it is evident that at no very distant date we shall require a substitute; and, as water is decomposed by electricity, also by iron and acids conjointly, we can see no reason, if necessity were plying her spur energetically, why a cheap and practical decomposition may not be accomplished. Alas! for Britain's boasted supremacy, when we have to purchase American coals to spin American cotton!

Now, in nine parts of water free from mechanical impurities, there is exactly eight parts of oxygen, and one part hydrogen, being one atom of each element in chemical combination. What a compound! Does the proportion in which these two fierce elements combine not suggest to one that water is a fearful preparation! and although the agent which we employ for the extinction of fire, it is itself, in reality, the most combustible material under heaven; and from this fact we are justified in concluding that it may be the medium through which the Almighty shall accomplish the consummation of all things. In the generating of water, and on the application of a light, the two gases combine with violent explosion, and the utmost precautions are necessary to prevent accidents. The grandest and most sublime phenomena, the most terrific and appalling scenes of creation, are certain to have occurred at the formation of water, which, if generated by degrees, must have taken a vast eternity of time, ending where geologists only begin. But if suddenly formed, then the explosion caused by the combination of the two elements would be inconceivably awful; indeed, no finite comprehension could form the most remote idea of the terrible scene when these two fierce substances, charmed by the flambeau of the Almighty, crashed and thundered into water amid an atmosphere of cerulean fire; when the oceans came reeling from heaven upon the molten exterior of our globe, there to be again decomposed by the intense heat, and again united amid the chaotic glee of the applauding elements. Now, He who composed water can surely decompose it; and as that can be effected by electricity, may it not be the medium through which the 'Elements shall melt with fervent heat,' and the components of water be dissevered! This accomplished, a flash of lightning, a burning candle, an ignited match, would suffice to kindle the general conflagration by setting the hydrogen aflame, when (remembering the intense heat produced by the oxy-hydrogen light) we would have this simple principle developed to a gigantic and terrible degree. Immense oceans of oxygen blown upon the scorching billows of hydrogen, the devouring flames would burn up the seas to their sockets, and rush up the mighty streams and rivers as if they were huge trains of gunpowder, communicating its fearful nature to all moisture, in whatever form, until, from Orient to Occident, from vapoury South to frozen North, the all-consuming conflagration blazed! But as we have already stated that the ignition of hydrogen produces water, it seems natural to suppose that the product of the decomposition behind would defeat the medium of the decomposition before; or, in other words, that the water formed by the combustion of the hydrogen would extinguish the flames of the hydrogen, just as the carbonic acid and water produced by the burning of coals in a furnace would extinguish the fire, were there not some ready means of exit. Such, indeed, would be a perfectly natural result, but the actual consequence would be vastly different, and just as natural; because the intense heat of the globe's crust would expel all moisture, accumulating anew, into the atmosphere, and balance it there by that power of repulsion which fire so imminently displays towards water; and, on the cooling of the earth, the vapours would again condense on its surface as before. The decomposition of water on a small scale is easily accomplished, by taking a flask or bottle having a cork stopper, with tight-fitting pipette or burner inserted in its centre. The flask is charged with water, oil of vitriol, and a few clippings of zinc, or granules of iron—either will do. After the stopper with pipette is fitted in, and the effervescence (which begins immediately on the substances coming into contact) has continued for a sufficient length of time to expel all atmospheric air, a light, or piece of red-hot wire, may be applied to the burner, when the feeble lambent flame of hydrogen will be apparent. Great care, however, is necessary in this experiment, as, if all the air be not expelled previous to applying the light, the free hydrogen of the water, and free oxygen of the air in the interior of the flask, will combine and shiver the vessel into a thousand fragments, scattering its contents in every direction; and, indeed, this miniature explosion is a simple illustration of the cause of a steam-boiler explosion—the only difference being the manner in, and the material from, which the explosive gases have been generated. From the lowness of the water in a steam-boiler, the under plates become red-hot. Now, water is resolved into its elements (hydrogen and oxygen) at a red heat. However, no explosion takes place, because red-hot iron has a powerful affinity for oxygen; and the sweltering boiler-plates become oxidised, or combine with the oxygen of the water, in the proportion of three of oxygen to one of iron, as fast as it is set free. But, while this is going on, the free hydrogen is accumulating, and probably the boiler contains as much of this gas as of steam; nevertheless, in those circumstances no explosion can take place, as there is no free oxygen inside. But lo! some mechanical blockhead sets the feed-pump agoing; and, in a minute afterwards, the mighty, panting boiler, with a terrific banging roar, leaps from its moorings above the white furnace, hurling its torn plates into the air like snow-flakes, and sputtering bricks and rubbish in every direction like chaff. Now, the cause of the explosion taking place on the introduction of cold water does not, as some assert, originate from the simple fact that the water is cold, and a portion of the boiler red-hot. The gradual introduction of cold water, keeping aside other considerations, would only have a tendency to allay the internal pressure; and, though it caused the sudden generation of steam by contact with the hot plates, this would be as suddenly and as amply compensated for by the distribution of the low temperature of the cold water among the high temperature of the warm water and steam. But, indeed, warm water (not exactly boiling) would cause an explosion as well; because the mystery—mysteriously simple—consists in the fact that all waters, as found in nature, contain free oxygen, which is the reason of iron becoming so rapidly oxidised in contact with water. Here, then, we have the free oxygen sent into the boiler; which, with the free hydrogen and red-hot flue-plates, completes the infernal trio; and in another moment, the hammered sides of the hollow giant are torn into iron rags, and its scalding contents belched forth in a shower of fire.

Having now explained the nature of the two elementary bodies which compose chemically pure water, we shall proceed to enumerate a few of its properties. The composition of water was discovered by Cavendish in the year 1781, and is as follows:—

By Volume.		By Weight.
1 of Oxygen.	8 of Oxygen.
2 of Hydrogen.	1 of Hydrogen.
3 of Water.	9 of Water.

At ordinary temperatures water is fluid, and at 32 Fahrenheit, solid. If, however, it be kept calm and unagitated while the thermometer indicates increasing cold, it will remain fluid till the mercury reaches 22 degs. when, if suddenly stirred, it immediately congeals. This is the reason why rivers and all waters in violent motion are covered with ice before lakes, ponds, &c. that are comparatively stagnant—because the latent heat of the water is expelled by the incessant agitation of the former, whereas it is retained by the continued inaction of the latter. There is a very wonderful peculiarity in water, which forms an exception to the almost universal rule that cold contracts while heat expands, and water has the extraordinary property of complying both with the rule and the exception. For example, heat will make it expand in the form of steam, and cold in the state of ice. Cold will also contract it from a state of vapour, and heat when the degree of cold is below 39. Water therefore expands above and below 39, which number indicates its greatest density. The objects which the Almighty had in view in imparting to water these mystic properties must at once be obvious. Had he rendered it subject to the law that is fixed on every other ordinary fluid with reference to expansion and contraction, then, as the coating of ice crystallised on its surface, its specific gravity would have increased; and, sinking to make room for another, and this process continuing for several weeks with short intervals, it is highly probable that a single winter would have sufficed to render all our waters a solid mass of ice, so adhesive that the heat of summer would be inadequate to thaw them. Thus the navigation of our oceans would be an impossibility, and the extinction of marine animals a certainty. Again, water is the healthiest of all beverages. The pangs of thirst appear to be the climax of torture. Every part of our bodies consists chiefly of water. It constitutes about 40 per cent. of the bones and 75 of the soft solids. It is highly essential to vegetation—no plant will grow or seed germinate without it. A well in the desert is shortly fringed with luxuriant vegetation, proving that the desert only requires water to convert it into a garden. Again, water is invaluable in science and art. A few pounds in a hydraulic press may be made to exert a pressure of 100 tons, and its power of expansion by heat has been the parent of all our steamboats, railways, and large manufactories. As a detergent, it is unrivalled. Distilled from the clouds it reaches us transparently pure, but leaves us again by some huge sewer, polluted and dark, with the exuvie of cities, seeking the main ocean to deposit its contaminations—that immense volume of waters covering alone 148,000,000 square miles, a space equal to fully three-fourths the surface of our globe—that emblem of infinitude, on whose azure brow time writes no wrinkle, and rollst now, as at creation's dawn—that

'Glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form
Glasses itself in tempests. In all time
Calm or convuls'd—in breezes, or gale, or storm—
Idling the pole or in the torrid clime—
Dark-heaving, boundless, endless, and sublime,
The image of eternity, the throne
Of the Invisible.'

JOHN DOUGALL.

FROM HORACE.

Now, Pyrrha! say what graceful youth
Importunes thee amid the roses,
The while with liquid odours blest'd,
He all thy gentle charms discloses?
For whom dost thou, so simply nead,
Bind up thy wealth of yellow tresses;
Or in the coolness of the cave
Enrich him with thy soft caresses?
Alas! the sailor in that sea
Will mourn thy faith so lightly plighted;
Will wonder at the rising storms,
By blackening winds at once bewighted.
Who now enjoys thee, golden maid!
And hopes to find thee always willing.
Oh! luckless they on whom thou smilest
With studied art, so sweetly killing!
Unhappy they! more happy we,
Who now am safe from being stranded—
I hang my garments on the bank—
And thank the gods who have me landed!

GABRIEL GRAY—A GLASGOW STORY.

REVISED BY THE EDITOR.

'What's I' the air'—Proctor.

CHAPTER XVI.

A long time ago, in England, when Thomas Gainsborough was busy with the rustic piece which I had turned to such profitable account, I wonder whether any dim notion crossed his brain that, apart from any immediate benefit, in the way of money or fame to himself, he was working out an act of benevolence—to take effect in the far future—towards an old man, with white hair, not then born. However this might be, I shall forever bless the memory of the man whose influence had vibrated to my relief through a hundred years. Oh! matchless power and fine immortality of genius! victorious over dust, and worms, and grave-stones, like a spirit commissioned of Heaven to perform holy offices endlessly among the living children of men!

Yet the relief was only temporary. My Gainsborough had broken my fall. It had caught me like a ledge, too narrow for permanent support, overhanging the sheer abyss. Powers of heaven! the horror of the next move! At other of my household effects I might indeed clutch, one after one, as at yielding tufts of grass. But, at the last, the bare rock—with nothing to cling to, and with hideous glimpses below of the maddening and starless gulf—appeared to be the doom prepared for me by the inscrutable gods.

Nevertheless, poverty—terrible as it is—is not without a grandeur as of stormy skies. To the philosophic mind it is invested with beauty, like a naked scimitar—beauty which it is heroism to contemplate and confess, in midst of the fear which it inspires. How I was enabled, through the cheerless windows of my condition, to look into the hearts of men! I could see the knave, the churl, and the worldling hiding themselves behind base lacquer of smiles and gloss of costume. Contrasted with these, a possible figure loomed—not, alas! far off—threadbare but erect—the victim, as I knew, of a too steady content—a too stern virtue—a possible figure, in process of pathetic downfall, apt to be despised of men, yet inly rebounding to dignified spiritual platforms. Ah! he is indeed poor who cannot afford to be charitable—who cannot strive to be more charitable, and thoughtful, and wise, for very reason that he is poor. Avaunt, then, all saucy looks, cast, like scornful refusals of alms, on seedy attire—attire, most probably, bared through the sensitiveness of a too scrupulous integrity, and no other to the initiated than the uniform of God's best soldiers!

With such reasoning—not very definite, and even perhaps partly fallacious—did I school myself to bear my reverses proudly. If rags should be the ultimate wear, how I determined to flaunt them in the face of all scorners, like a slave making very Jove's thunder with his chains in the ears of his pale oppressors! But lo! an unexpected message from Mr. M'Corkindale! What might it mean? He requested urgently to see me. Was I about to be solicited back? Or had he merely detected some item in the red-lined ledgers, columned and crowded with my caligraphy, of which he desiderated explanation? I was too curious and fertile of conjecture to delay compliance. With what naturalness I fell into the old route! To be going straight to the house of M'Corkindale & Co. had a feeling of business in it. Day after day I had been an aimless vagrant in the streets. While everybody else had a destination, I felt that I—I alone—was going nowhere, foolishly, like a strayed child. Sometimes I made a mission of studying the fashions in the windows of shops, rapidly becoming all window, as if glaring for custom. Not a new face could look grim, simpering, or dramatic from any photographer's show-frame without my speedy cognizance. I enjoyed a daily glance at the great tripodal telescopes of the opticians, and fancied how soon they might take me, on swift wings of darkness, to Uranus. How often, in the booksellers' windows, did I scan the titles of the volumes I was unable to buy! But to pluck recreation from the business heart of Glasgow was torment to one to whom idleness was unrest. On the day in question, however, I was pushing along with an object—almost with a hope. I ascended the familiar stair, opened the well-known glass door, and was received by the clerks, Macnab and Dallas, with a silent hurrah of their pens. Mr. M'Corkindale was 'engaged,' and my successor—a consumptive-looking yellow-haired youth, with lean cheeks, and who looked about the knees as if too rapidly got up—accommodated me with my old stool. A stranger might have seen that I fitted it. I asked what had become of Joe; but Dallas only showed his superb teeth, and slightly shook his head, while Macnab—he of the large head and deep-set eyes—responded with a knowing nod or two, as mysterious as one of his own chess problems. In the window across the court I observed the permanent sewing-girl. She looked like the absence of sunshine. As far as I could discover, she had been sewing there ever since I left; but perhaps she had both eaten and slept, although one might not think that she had. On seeing the white head of me, she appeared, in her languor, to be struck with a kind of glad surprise; and a mutual smile of recognition ensued. It was an odd thing to see her smile; but she had probably thought me dead, and spectres are such strange sights to sewing-girls. From my successor I gathered that his health was indifferent; that he did not much like the berth; and that, quietly, he professed himself a judge of character, and considered the respected head of the establishment a vulgar and conceited old savage. I did not charge him with presumption, or ask him to wait till he knew as much of him as I did, for I remembered that even little children have instant and correct eyes for a bugaboo.

I had not long to wait. Mr. M'Corkindale opened the door of his room, and stood, handle in hand, bowing an importunate gentleman out, with his red face intensely screwed—so intensely as to suggest a likeness to something done by machinery. The great man appeared to be summoning all his noble virtue, all his far-seeing prudence, all his consistent force of character, to the denial of some pecuniary request.

'It would be a great obligation,' urged the gentleman, with anxiety in his eyes, and perspiration on his forehead.

'No, no,' growled the great man; 'I never lend either my money or my name.'

Such declarations from his lips had a powerful stamp of sincerity.

'I am sure you would not regret it,' whispered the gentleman, lingering.

'Perhaps not; but I won't run the risk,' responded the shrike, with an expression which closed the colloquy.

It almost seemed as if every frown he had ever frowned had left its mark upon his visage. His forehead had the frowns upon it of a lifetime.

The gentleman moved away, distressed and humiliated—never again, I hope, to display, even in his commercial despairs, so pitiable an ignorance of Lavater; while Mr. M'Corkindale said, as if audibly, to supersede him, 'This way, Mr. Gray, if you please.'

There was a cloud on the mind of the wealthy proprietor of the Drums. Much sunshine there never was about him, at least during business hours; but now there was a positive and very dense cloud. He asked me to be seated, and to draw my chair near.

'That person who has just left,' he began, 'is a relation of mine, who has never done any good in the world. He wanted me to back him up in some concern on which he is entering, to the extent of five hundred pounds. I think I have taught him a lesson. There are ten people, Mr. Gray, who know how to make money, for one who knows how to keep it.'

'Very true,' I said. 'At the same time, you must admit that money best kept is not always best used. It is at least an old belief with me that for the capital expended in kindly deeds God himself pays interest.'

'Yes, yes,' he replied impatiently; 'charity is, of course, a good thing in its proper place; but a couple of guineas to the Royal Infirmary, which I am happy to give at all times, is a very different affair from five hundred pounds to a relation, which might or might not be repaid. However, to come, as we say, to business, I have sent for you to consult about a matter which is giving me much uneasiness.'

'If I can render you any service'—

'Pardon me; I know your good feeling. Well, then, the fact is simply this, that my son Joe, whom you know to be a perfect fool, has absconded. I have not seen him for a week'

'Indeed!'

'Whither he is gone, or whether he is alive or dead, I know not. Now'—drawing his chair very close—'it has occurred to me that, sitting opposite him so long, and learning something of his views and habits, you might possibly be able to throw some light on his present mysterious disappearance?'

'I am very sorry,' I said; 'but not a solitary clue can I afford you to his whereabouts. Of his companions or his haunts I unfortunately know nothing whatever.'

'Thank God!' he exclaimed, starting back from his confidential posture, 'whatever may be his fate, I have at least a clear conscience! Never in this world was there a boy more strictly brought up. Fairy tales and other such trash were never permitted to mislead him. So far as I know, he was never in a theatre in his life. From his childhood I dared him to absent himself from church. Evil associates he had no opportunity of having—I had him constantly under my own eye.'

'I am well aware that he had always the advantage of the strictest discipline. Strange that he should not have appreciated your kindness!'

'Again and again, sir, I have laboured to thrash the devil out of him—with a stick, sir—until I could scarcely lift my arm.'

'And yet he has run away from you! What an ungrateful scoundrel!'

Mr. M'Corkindale stared at me with a searching stare. He felt rather than suspected the irony. I saw my advantage, and proceeded:—'Your experience, Mr. M'Corkindale, is fully equal to mine; and it is not for me, perhaps, to offer you advice. In the event, however, of poor Joe turning up, as I trust he will, I think you might do well to try the effect of a milder system of treatment. Not to provoke to stubbornness and rebellion, I believe to be the secret of all successful authority.' He looked grave, and I proceeded further:—'Oh, sir! I am old like yourself; have children—though one, being gone, has grieved me, yet that is God's chastening—and I know, sir, how infinitely better it is to be loved than feared. Try a little forgiveness with poor Joe. Make his father's anguish a bitterness to him—not a revenge.'

If moved by this appeal, his altered feeling was but little demonstrative. 'What can have become of him?' he exclaimed, starting to his feet, and moving uneasily about the room.

At this moment, the voice of Joe himself was heard in the countinghouse—'I shay, Dallas, is the guv'nor within?'

Mr. M'Corkindale's countenance was a study. His momentary gleam of satisfaction reddened into a blaze of rage. He literally dragged the uncombed and dilapidated wretch into the apartment—pinioned him into a corner—thundered menaces at him—and struck his head forcibly against the wall.

'Let me alone, I shay! Let me alone! I'm blowed if I stand it!' cried Joe, shaking himself loose, and with tears of strong resentment sobering in his eyes.

The old gentleman threw himself into his chair, gnawed his thumb fiercely, and patted the floor with his foot. In vain did I try to interfere. Mr. M'Corkindale abruptly ordered me to leave.

By me, my masters! it was a sad scene! Father and son, with bond of affection torn and blurred—mutual victims—conjoint, yet alien—enemies in alliance—belligerents intestine—senseless, insane, suicidal, unnatural, even like friends drowning, each giving the purple death-grip to each! Oh! trial of outraged instinct, sadder incomparably than saddest trial of bereavement! Fancy the horror of it!—death to all peace and trust, and not a sweet memory to outlive the transient angers! O gold! powerful to move the world! yet impotent to purchase that which is un-purchaseable—the little that remains in the world of its primal paradise of bliss! I may have hated old M'Corkindale with a genuine hatred, and burned for proud victory over him; but I nevertheless own to some touch of compassion at the wildness of the vengeance, and completeness of the humiliation, of which I had been an accidental witness. Oh for my Paradise in Portland-street after that peep into the Inferno! Would I have exchanged my own poor state for that of my imperious millionaire? Shade of Dante! how different the surroundings!—bland delicious skies as compared with lurid glooms, and angels' wings as contrasted with devils' hoofs! Take heart, Poverty! Oh! sudden instructive curtain-peep! Sooth to say, the worldly-envied are not always the least wretched—at all events, so I fancy, and wonder.

But once more for my own home in Portland-street, with my heart of larger content. How odd to be threading the thronged streets, reaping there only quietness of soul, and rejoicing, in the patient innermost of me, that I was not the great M'Corkindale of the Drums! Yet what had I but disappointment—the old tale of 'nothing yet'—to carry to my suffering wife and daughters? To them, so eager, the message of Mr. M'Corkindale had appeared like rescue from desuetude. What, however, had I now to tell of success, beyond a casual, though not, I hope, profitless incident in the astounding melodrama of life? Again, too, I was on the downward slope of despondency as I reflected on Mathew Waddel—the impossibility of filling up his void—and the bewildering unaccountableness of his treachery. The kind of excited glee with which my family greeted me took me by surprise. All were alert for the news; but, alas! what had I to communicate? When I had told them everything, there appeared to be more laughter than vexation. Perhaps I had drawn the figure of Joe too grotesquely. No matter, I was glad to see them pleased.

'Poor old M'Corkindale!' I said, 'from him there is nothing to be hoped.'

'But we are not friendless,' said my dear Jean; 'I cannot think but that Mr. Waddel—if he knew all—'

'A fell curse on him!' I exclaimed; 'he looked blank at me.'

'Yet I still think he could not have seen you,' argued Jean.

'Sean me!' quoth I; 'he saw me if I see you at this moment.'

'Liar!' roared out Mathew Waddel—for it was none other—amidst a shout of merriment, as he burst from the little bed-room adjoining our parlour, and made a wide and blundering clutch at my throat. I held the dear old man by the shoulder—stared at him—and again said, with a subdued and faltering voice of doubt, 'You saw me!'

But he answered—feeling down my arm for my hand, and wringing it with the fervour of other days

—'Gabriel! I don't see you even yet. A darkness has fallen gradually upon my eyes. Pity me, Gabriel! I am blind.'

O Heaven! the darkness of my friend was like the breaking in of a fine light; and for a moment we wept in concert, with our hearts too full for words.

CHAPTER XVII.

—'moving through his clouded heaven

With the moon's beauty and the moon's soft pace.'—Spenser.

Mr. Imrie—although fast recovering his spirits—such is the buoyancy of youth—suggested the erection of a monument to our gentle enskied heroine. How Sophia thanked him, and cried! But Mathew Waddel—my cronie for evermore now—has already commissioned a simple tablet—a tablet of Carrara purity—bearing the name, so typical to me of all sweetness, BARBARA GRAY, and exhibiting, in bas-relief, the figure of an angel stooping to pluck a flower. This last idea emanated from myself, after some silent meditation.

'By the living cherubim!' exclaimed Mathew, 'a beautiful device!—original, too, I fancy, as the first broken column set up in any grave-yard! You shall describe the work to me as it progresses—in particular, the white flower growing, under the chisel of the artist, into immortality; and, when all is completed, I shall see it, Gabriel!—fondlingly—with my blind hands for eyes.'

Ah, Mathew Waddel!—dwelling in chambers of the night always—what to thy exquisite ear now had been our one lost voice of melody? Sophia, however, is at his side; and he vows that her voice is like Barbara's. She is less tall; and not, like her, beautiful. Her face, too, has lost even its comeliness of heretofore. It is like the face of a country desolated by recent floods. It is like the edge of a sword hacked in combat with the last enemy. It is like the shreds of a flag torn from the death-strife of defeat. How Barbara's illness has wasted—how her death has crushed her! No, no; she is not, like Barbara, beautiful. But she is distressed at our tears, and would monopolise the anguish of the house. She would grasp fire, with the nerve of Cranmer's shrivelling hand, to save a little finger of any one of us from pain. I saw the load of our late reverses terrible at her heart; for, not content with her reasonable share of it, she tried to support it all. If mortal strength of affection could have availed, Barbara would have been living at this hour. That failing, Sophia would have clung to her—followed her—gone forward with her, fearlessly, martyr-like, through grim gathering shadows and utter blackness of death, but that she glanced back at the crowding horror-struck faces of us all, and shuddered to inflict on us the torture of a double bereavement. Ay me! for the crisis of human trial where such strength of human love is helpless! But she threw her trust on God when other hope there remained none; and the agony is calmed now, like storm-waves of the world broken on celestial shores.

And so Sophia glides towards the old man, in his strange darkness, with no more blushing than a Florence Nightingale, where calamity is to be soothed and brightened. Mr. Waddel—but I ask pardon—I mean our dear old Mathew—is gratefully associated in her mind with the lost jewel of our household. While thinking of the pity of it, she almost feels it to be a blessing that he is stricken, lonely, and helpless; for her impulses of affection—like profuse tendrils deprived of their support—have been wandering vaguely and unhappily, as if likely to fall to earth and wither. She desiderates some one to be kind to.

It is a necessity of her intense nature. And so she glides towards the old man, takes his one hand in hers, and is as trusting as a daughter when he puts the other round her waist. So placed, what a contentment beams from his countenance! He knows where he is. All our voices are lights to him. He sees us, and he sees Barbara too. Everything is unchanged. His white eyebrows leap for joy. The camera of his once beautiful world has been closed, and everything preserved to him at its best. Oh, happy blindness! Henceforth he shall look on nothing to give him pain.

Mathew's loss of sight had been very gradual. At first it was only a dimness. Then he began, even while still walking freely about, to see people as through a mist—unable to distinguish their features—unconsciously making enemies for life. It was his fortune to dwell in a city which boasted the first oculist in Europe. But although Dr. M'Kenzie suggested certain mitigations, the curtain of his darkness thickened. New threads were woven into its warp and woof—making it, in the end, almost quite dense. When his case became hopeless, he withdrew from the concern of Simpkins Brothers—sold off his gorgeous upholsteries—and ordered my friend of clerical-looking memory to conduct him back to his old quarters in Portland-street. And now that he is once more among us, the fat and good-natured Susan blooms afresh, and polishes the bell-handle with renewed vigour, as if to typify the return of brighter days. Every morning, too, I step across the street, to lend him my eyes at the breakfast-table—to read the newspapers to him; and to be hyperbolically abused for silently passing him on the terrace—sending back the money, which he denied to be his—and acting, in divers ways, like a big petted fool! Of course I seldom fail to retort—to jeer at his attempts at haut ton—to denounce his sycophancy to Jones, and the other great vulgar—and to vituperate him, in short, into a grand fit of merriment. Our custom is thereafter to walk out—sometimes down Paisley-road to about Ibroxholm—sometimes as far south as Shawlands. He does not care to cross the Bridge, or to visit the West-end. The after-part of the day he spends entirely with us. Sophia always sits next him at dinner—doing little officious carvings, and assisting every article at table to meet his quietly groping hand. His means are ample, and he has planned that we shall all live together—a prospect at which my wife looks as if she wouldn't fall off any longer—and proceed, as soon as the spring sets in, either to Helensburgh or Ashton, for permanent residence.

'I would like,' he said, 'to snuff the salt breeze, and to listen, Gabriel! to your glorious, unappreciated talk beside the surgings of the sea.'

'And so you shall, Mathew!' I cried. 'When the season comes round, we shall be off to the salt-water with the enthusiasm of youngsters.'

'But ah! Gabriel, no pic-nic now! Our party will be incomplete.'

'True, Mathew, true,' I responded tremulously. 'Yet between us, and with God's help, we shall find out "what the wild waves are saying," and make their murmurous tongues articulate for consolation and benediction.' Sophia crushed back her tears, and I added—'But let us defer our melancholy. The hardest tried have a duty to be cheerful at times.'

It was night—cold and raw without, but warm and cosy in our little parlour in Portland-street. Sophia had just made up Mathew's tumbler. At a corner of the table farthest from the fire, Jessie was sewing as if her seam had been a mile long, and she had to reach the end of it by a given time under penalties. Isabella was sitting with a book in her lap, observing something in the fire which she was too languid to describe to anybody. As for Kate, she had eloped with Edward Imrie, immediately after tea, to the dining-room—shamelessly, as if a match were imminent. My wife Jean—who now saw her way clearly to the circles of the 'upper ten'—was bustling about preparing some toasted cheese, made mild with milk and eggs, and warranted free from nightmare.

'Thank you, my dear!' said Mathew, nodding in a wrong direction, and lifting an empty glass to his mouth; 'that is quite the thing'—whereas there was a slight titter. He corrected his mistake, though not without Sophia's help, and added—'Now, don't laugh, girls! a man must have time to get his blind hands, just as a sailor must have time to get his sea legs.'

'My good friend!' I exclaimed, 'how many people are there in this world who find nothing but emptiness where they anticipated rare draughts of enjoyment! It is Fortune's trick of the double-glass, with the liquor frothing between, inviting to the eye, but mocking to the taste. What was your own brief West-end experience, Mathew? Come, be honest with me.'

'Business, Gabriel! business. It was all in the way of business. There are worse baits than a champagne dinner or two when you have gudgeons to catch.'

'Well, well, I honour you for your manly home-coming, at any rate—your brave preference of a forty-year and upward acquaintance to your new butter-flies of an hour. Belisarius (a great man, Mathew!) preferred beggary and blindness—I know the tradition is disputed, but I hate the brainless sceptics who are always undermining the grand heroic annals of the world—I say, then—I say it, and I stick to it—that Belisarius, indubitably a very king of men, preferred beggary and blindness to the temptation of a crown, offered to him by the Goths whom he had conquered.'

He was beginning to protest against my waxing misanthropical, and to assert that I would have been high enough up myself had I done justice to my powers, when the door-bell rang, as a policeman, with sinews that would have stabbed at Culloden, might ring it to announce a fire. It arrested Jessie's needle, and made Isabella start. A little boy wanted Mr. Gabriel Gray. He was all blackness and rain—the rain warring ineffectually with the blackness; but Jean asserted that she had heard him singing cheerily about leaving Annie 'in sorrow,' in the stair. I opened a hurriedly-pencilled note which he presented. 'Good heavens! "Mr. M'Corkindale of the Drums"—"died this afternoon"—"obliging if I would write a paragraph"—hum!—"boy will wait"—"desire to have par. exclusive"—very striking! poor old sinner! Jean! take this lovely urchin to the kitchen, let him have a thorough warm at the fire, and hospitable entertainment—I was once a cherub myself! Poor old M'Corkindale! the Vesuvian face of him grown pale now, I fear.'

Wheresoever the last terrible bolt is launched—even as punishment for murder—the effect is involuntary shuddering, and sensation of a common humanity subject to a common doom. Poor old M'Corkindale! But I was not the man to write his panegyric. Had he, in the long years of our intercourse, thought that I might one day be asked to do so, he would probably have been at pains to show me less of the shady side of him. He might have shaped the narrow biography of him to better ends. But, a Liberal in politics, he had taken no part in public affairs—a Christian by profession, he had shut up his purse and his heart against every appeal where compliance could bring no worldly profit. His life—I dare speak it in hearing of the heavens!—had been one of brutal selfishness. Others, who knew him less, might pen a few vague lines about his industry, attention to business, and architecture of his own fortunes; but I declined, courteously, to smear his name with such weak varnish, and dismissed the P. D. rejoicing,—while Mathew vociferated that I was right.

'Mathew!' said I, as I mixed a fresh rummer—still under the shadow of the awful event which had been communicated—'You know the incomparable power of money. Oh, it has power Mathew! to smooth all roughnesses, to win all regards, to conquer the fame for which great and struggling hearts have been content, in all ages of the world, to die!'

'Then, by Jove! Gabriel, you shall have the sole guidance of mine. We shall rivet all hearts to us by the sweetnesses of our charity. You shall tell me of tears that are to be dried, and I shall talk to you of sighs that should be relieved. We are both old, Gabriel; and my steps must now be directed by the pillar of fire rather than the pillar of cloud. There may be little of our lives to come, but it is in our power to make that little noble. Henceforth you must dedicate yourself to some great book, with a certain songless Homer for continual prompter and critic.'

I took my venerable friend by the hand, and pledged him—with a heart almost running over—to contribute what moiety I could, in order that our two lives might be built up finally—to the dimensions of a newspaper paragraph at least.

CHAPTER XVIII.

—'among these pleasant things

Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs.'—Surrey.

Who would not unbosom to the man who should stand up, publicly, in Newcastle, and maintain that there was something better in the world than coals? In like manner do I honour our luminous preacher, Dr. Caird, for vindicating, in front of a Glasgow audience, and in a manner to extort applause, the claims of Poetry and Fiction. Let not any fool—if he would escape knouting—mouth out a rejoinder, or a platitude, respecting the supremacy of Truth. Everybody knows that steeples are tall without superfluous shouting of 'Eureka.' Admitting truth to be paramount, the question is, do not poetry and fiction, in their best developments, embody the highest truth? Nay, are they not as the golden pinnacles of the steeples, reaching near to heaven, and touched with the celestial splendours.

'Ah, Mathew!'—for Mathew and I are once more a club; I take the chair of him as of old; with his 'hear, hears,' his 'cheers,' and his 'laughters,' he is again, I say, my audience, my multitude, my great fame's boundary—'Ah, Mathew! there is no such delusion among men as a worldling's conceit of knowledge. A matter-of-fact man is the everlasting dupe of his own deadness of sense. He sees falsely because he sees imperfectly. Beyond his little circle of hard realities he has no desire because no capacity to soar. Yet is it his practice to indulge in ignorant sneers at such as he is pleased to term visionaries. He cannot understand what people with legs have to do up in balloons. Poor mole, with nose burrowed in the earth! Infatuated desert-bird, with head hidden in the sand! Are not the immeasurable eternities outside of him, with their alternate glooms and glories? Is not his ear startled at times with murmurs from the illimitable shores? Or is he wholly unenfranchised of the universe? Ah, Mathew! there is truly no more truth in him than in a gin-horse's notions of geography. There is profounder and loftier truth in the phantoms of a dreamer, or the wonders of a little child. (Toddy-spoon striking the familiar chimera.) 'Great laud, then, to Dr. Caird—a very trump caird, as I heard an unchanged pirate remark—for setting cap and bells on the heads of the philosophers who hold that

"Red-lined accounts

Are greater than the songs of Grecian years."

On my integrity, Mathew! I have known wretches, who, if I told them that I was your "old dog Tray," would aver, with the gravity of Liston, that they were very sorry, but that I must be in error, as, on account of my physical peculiarities, not to speak of the faculty of speech and such like, I could not possibly belong either to the class Quadruped or the genus Canis!

'And they would aver rightly!' cried Mathew. 'They would aver rightly, you—you old dog you!' (Toddy-kettle poked, in mistake for a great orator's ribs, and laughter of the entire company of two, followed by peremptory orders to renew the supplies.)

Poetry—in which term I include the grander parts of fiction—is as true to actual life as fragrance to a flower. Without it, existence would be intolerable even to the dullest. Those who profess to despise it might as well despise the oxygen which they see not, but which is their life. There, for example, was Kate, without an ounce of brain for 'Hamlet,' or 'Lycidas,' or 'Endymion,' or the 'Idylls,' yet living in a very sunburst of poetry. What, O Thackeray! could she, with her dazzled eyes, discern of the haggard anatomy of the world? Why, man, the poetry that was in her, and which lacked, as Wordsworth phrases it, 'the accomplishment of verse,' blinded her as if she had been a princess. How her surroundings were idealised! Fancy our dull Portland-street glowing in the hues of the Vale of Tempe, or the Gardens of the Hesperides! I doubt whether she would have exchanged it for the palace of Alladin and all its jewels. Paradise itself would have been some totally other place to her had she been compelled to go thither alone. If the truth must out, Kate had made up her mind to get married, and Mr. Edward Imrie was the object of her special selection. My belief is, and I told it confidentially to Jean, that she tehee'd him into it, and that her fascination in courtship consisted of her lack of gravity for wifehood. As, however, they both professed to be pleased, it was not for me to interfere on suspicion of a wrong initiative. Kate—if my candour may be forgiven—was not much for me to give away—the little threepenny that she was!—and, to the extent of her, I was accordingly generous. Yet I knew I should miss the cricket. When our canary-bird fell a fluttering martyr to feline untunefulness—our poor canary-bird, a disconsolate thing which had long sang vociferously in recompense for its trifling pick and sip—I confess to have experienced some sensation of eye-moisture; and when Kate was about to carry her gladness to a little home of her own, I own to some like transient touch of the pathetic. But Edward was a well-grown and sensible fellow—a fanatical teetotaler, which I approved, so long as he did not insist on my joining him—and was, besides, possessed of a playful and expressive rather than a handsome face; which latter, to a young man, I hold to be as dangerous as a spark in the throat, ever needing to be quenched. How strange to think of our tall and beautiful Barbara in the grave, and little frisky Kate wearing her orange-flower! It must have been the mere thoughtlessness of Kate that nerved her to that assumption. Yet, I somehow felt it as a sort of tribute to the dead—to Barbara unsullied and in heaven—that he, who could not rejoice as her bridegroom, should fit himself to mourn along with us—as her brother. I felt, indeed, as if he were establishing on earth, in the sole possible fashion left, a definite and permanent relationship to our darling in the skies.

The marriage was a tremendous business. Long before it took place, Jessie's needle became a miracle of unrest. I could not contemplate it without thinking of the man who undertook to walk a mile every hour for a thousand hours in succession. From morning until far on in the night, the toiling girl seemed to be saying to herself that she would beat the sewing-machines, or die for it. Isabella appeared to be much put about, like one always wishing to say her prayers, and hopeless of finding a quiet corner. As for Kate, what with being one-half of the day in stays, for the more expert fitting on of new dresses, and the other half keeping up their courtship, which she did in quite an extraordinary manner—sometimes with a kiss, and sometimes with a slap—she was, of course, in continual occupation. But the glory of the house was its feminine head. Less generalship than was displayed by Jean has saved many an empire. Her grasp of the occasion would have surprised Herr Harwitz, the blindfold player at chess. Not a move did she forget. I am quite certain that, but for her, the furniture would have been disgraceful, the glasses cobwebbed, the silver tarnished, the plates too few, the stair un washed, the jellies unmade, the 'cries' uncried, the ewers without water, the minister uninvited, the bride-cake not ordered in time, the lump-sugar deficient, and deuce an old shoe forthcoming at the critical moment. Sophia—though with a memory often startled to tears by some casual incident—crept about noiselessly, doing a thousand gentle offices, to preserve, as much as might be, in the midst of all this turmoil, the amenities of our ordinary home, for all our sakes. Day after day, too, the presents for the bride came tumbling in—most of them selected with a view to a great show of hand-someness at the slightest possible cost. One of these put Jean in a fury—with herself. In order to give clat to the wedding, and secure something splendid wherewith to astonish the Imries, she had, contrary to my wishes, invited her aristocratic friends, Mr. and Mrs. M'Grubber. They had not been in our house for years. However, they graciously accepted, and sent, with an elegant accompanying note, on which there was an embossed crest, a silver cardcase, beautifully chased, and which turned out to be a mere Birmingham article, indifferently plated!

'A forgery—a forgery!' cried Mathew.

How both of us roared! Well, let the donors have thanks for that. It was our first thoroughly round laugh since our dark days—our middle ages, as I call them—and was surely cheap to the M'Grubbers at—say, four-and-sixpence.

At length the momentous day dawned, with Jean up, dressed, and threatening to leave me to the pinches of a December morning if I did not follow her example. Mercy! how the storm was rising! But Jean was in full command of the ship, and I doubted not would carry it triumphantly through! Everything was in an uproar and mess—the very kitchen presenting a medley of white-satin favours and porridge-plates!

'Let me out!' I exclaimed—'let me out!' as I prepared to go over to breakfast with Mathew. By way of parting salute, I shouted—'See and have everything ready in time!'

'Ay, all the sooner for your help,' retorted Jean in her flurry.

I had taken the precaution to put on my best attire at once, in order to save farther trouble; and so I was enabled to pass the time leisurely with my friend until near the appointed hour. Our morning sederunts were generally quiet. Nevertheless, we read the newspaper, and discussed the events of the day with our wonted vigour. In due time, I happened to glance across to my windows; and observed Jean, with golden head-gear, and quite a spectacle of grandeur, trying to catch my eye, fluttering a white handkerchief, beckoning spasmodically, and even shaking her little fat fist from a superlative depth of lace sleeve.

'O! ho!' I said; 'we are signalled.'

Mathew was off his seat in a moment; and, after some little toileting—during which my poor blind cronie insisted that if there was a speck on his nose or his gloves, I should apprise him of the fact—we were forthwith on the festive side of the street.

The entrance to the close had a guard of honour in the shape of a group of children, with their kumzes ready to uncork. It was obvious that the stair had been newly washed. A brighter bit of brass than that which bore the name, 'Gabriel Gray,' I have not often beheld.

Within doors, order had come out of chaos. Jean was sitting in state in the parlour, and everyone else was fully equipped, with her work done, and at ease. Even Jessie was enjoying an interval of blessed relaxation. Wouldn't the dejeuner, which was laid out in the dining-room, astonish the M'Grubbers? Mathew asked for the bride, who jumped, with giggling alacrity, upon a stool, and announced herself with a hearty smack, crying 'Here I am, uncle!'

A more successful assault I never witnessed, as the monkey retreated with a ten-pound note in her hand, which she flourished, dancing, like a flag.

I was in the act of shouting 'Stop thief!' when the bell rang, and immediately the Miss Stewarts were announced—the red-haired maidens who lived above, and who had been invited with a view to save their unhappy piano from being spiteful, and making a fool of itself. They were done up in bunchoy mustins—elaborately dipped in Glenfield—and came in with a delightful simper. When I heard their frightened voices on the weather, I wondered they could be such noisy neighbours. Mathew looked fidgetty and dull, as if feeling the weight of his darkness. Sophia saw it in a moment, and, gliding to his side, took his hand, and with her whispers made up for his lack of sight. His white eyebrows became breezy—the clouds straightway dispersed—and a sunshine lit up his features, and benignantly settled there.

'Why, Bella!' I exclaimed, 'you look as if you had been attending marriages all your life, and were, on the whole, rather tired of them!'

This had the effect contemplated, of starting a little laugh, and helping to begin the fun. Another jingle of the door-bell. Enter Messrs. Peter Macnab and John Dallas—almost the only young fellows I knew, and whom I had summoned to compare by way of counterpoise to my anthology of daughters. After duly introducing them, I asked what had become of Mr. Joseph—for I had given Mrs., too, a chance; but was informed, in a confidential way, of a rumour that Joe was off to the Continent, accompanied by an opera-dancer who knew the languages!

'No! Good gracious!'

'Gabriel!' said my wife, pulling my elbow, 'the Reverend Mr. Gilla.'

There was an instant hush in the conversation; and as I placed Mr. Gills in the arm-chair, his monopoly of a voice was heard to decided advantage. The bridegroom and best-man were the next comers. They apologised for being late, their carriage having run down an old woman in Jamaica-street. (Great sensation—agonising suspense—and eager questions as to whether she was killed.)

'Not in the least,' said Mr. Imrie; 'only, an impudent fellow of a policeman insisted on holding the reins, gathering a crowd, and making himself of importance.'

This was altogether a valuable incident, as it gave an extraordinary impetus to the conversation—Mr. Gills remarking, 'How awkward it would have been had the bridegroom landed in the police-office!'

Thereupon a good deal of merriment was whipped up, but the arrivals were now fast and furious, and culminated at last in 'Mr. and Mrs. M'Grubber.'

Mr. Mac. was a dapper little gentleman with bushy whiskers and a bald head; while Mrs. Mac. was a thin scorbuto female, laboriously supporting a singularly massive, columnar, and solidly architectural mauve dress; and exhibiting, on wrist, neck, and forehead, some decidedly expensive jewels. Quite a commotion ensued, in order that the great people might be accommodated with the best seats.

Having got the hint from the sovereign lady of the ceremonies that the company were all assembled, and that it was my duty to bring in the bride, I withdrew to a near bed-room, where I found Kate and her bridesmaids, like a village procession in a theatre, waiting at the side-wings for their cue.

'Now for it!' I said.

'O papa!' said Kate, 'I am like to cry.'

'I dare say you are, my dear!' I replied, leading her along; 'but when people are about to be executed, the best thing they can do is to encounter their doom like martyrs.'

'Oh dear!' sighed Kate, dragging a little back; 'wait till I get breath.'

However, in we all went. A ring was formed, and in midst of the huddle and silence, Mr. Gills tied the knot in a loud and fearless manner; and the ceremony was wound up with a round of kissings and congratulations.

Good gracious! Joe off to the Continent with an opera-dancer!—but I was not long permitted to indulge in this reverie. The cutting of the bride-cake was obviously, in the eyes of the best-man, as formidable an operation as the taking of Pekin. He was a sallow and awkward youth, weighed down and almost paralysed by his awful responsibility. Young Dallas, however, knew all about it. The smile with which he showed his perfect teeth was quite reassuring. He accordingly took the lead in a brief council of war, and the deed was ultimately accomplished in a manner entirely efficacious. The elder of the 'Old Reds' became all of a colour, on the thimble falling to her lot. After a vain effort to dispose of it surreptitiously, she remarked, with an unsuccessful attempt at good-nature, that she suspected Mr. Starke, the best-man, of a trick. Mr. Starke looked sallow and unconscious, like a man who had never perpetrated a practical joke in his life. A burst of hilarity came to the relief of Miss Stewart, consequent on dear old Mathew getting the ring. The young ladies all clapped their hands. High above the hubbub, Mr. Gills was heard asseverating that 'Cupid had taken compassion upon him at last.'

'It may be so,' responded the fortunate ring-winner, 'seeing that I am like himself—blind.'

At this juncture, Jean handed me a letter that had just come by post. I was about to take a furtive glance at its contents, when an astounding commotion ensued. The young couple were going off. A rush took place into the lobby—confused and hurried partings were exchanged—and down the stair went the turtle-doves under a storm of old slippers—young Dallas enthusiastically heading the battering party. For my part, I beat a retreat, and joined the elderly folk. We betook ourselves to the windows, every one of which that was available we threw up, and filled with heads. Dallas, assisted by some of the girls, kept up the pelting into the very carriage. From one of the windows Mathew, armed with a dilapidated prunella boot, made a miraculous aim, under Sophia's direction, hitting the postilion on the cheek; and off the vehicle drove, amidst a grand volley of cheers from the congregated juveniles.

And now, my friends, for the dejeuner à la fourchette. Was ever anything so triumphant? Mathew declared I was superb; but, ay me! the blindness of him! Yet if my modesty dared let me, I may confess to sundry bulls'-eye hits in the target of true wit. Jean and the girls likewise made good contribution towards the entertainment. It was, in short, a prolonged success. A success!—why, it was a riot. Mr. Gills ha-ha'd with infinite grandeur, and gave the leading toasts in a voice pitched for an audience of five hundred. Dallas broke the merry-thoughts and pulled the crackers, right and left, in the manner of a young man familiar with such pleasantries; while Peter Macnab, with his frontal promontories and deep-set eyes, undertook to teach any young lady chess in a single lesson. Even Mr. Starke began to master his diffidence, and exhibit symptoms of being at home. But the Stewarts presented the chief embodiments of perfect enjoyment—good Mathew Waddel, with his radiant face and ready chuckle, not excepted. Their eyebrows, having been hoisted high at the beginning of the feast, were not once permitted to come down—unless, in the case of the elder, during the mortifying incident of the thimble. It was infectious to contemplate their smile. That smile had become a very fixture at the climax of wondering delight. I presumed that it would continue in their sleep, and testify to the angels' whispering. The only cold, stuck-up, sniffy people were the M'Grubbers. Yet, no wonder they were ill at ease, having so much dignity to support! The costly pair, to do them justice, had the discretion to fold their tents early; and, all things considered, I was glad they had come, as the unhappy spectacle they exhibited served to cure my soaring and solid moiety of some of her old West-end aspirations.

When, after many jovial bursts of song, the company—all save Mathew—had left, Jean sunk and spread herself in the easy chair, and confessed that she was 'fairly done.'

'My dear!' said I, consolingly, 'you shall do nothing but sleep for a week!'

What, let me pause to ask, was all I have here described but poetry? In dress, cookery, and conversation, a night of superlative addition to the vulgar utilities! Alike in stately ceremony and the jovial disregard of it—a break, like a thrilling gem of verse, in the dull prose page of our ordinary life's narrative! Look at nature. What gems has not the morning on her cool sandals! Are there no splendours on the broad wings of noon? And wears not the majestic night a starry nimbus to attest her divinity to all worlds? And what are Dr. Caird and men of his fine clay, but the natural interpreters of such glorious oracles! Poetry and fiction—on, more properly, poetry and high invention—what are they, then, but truth exhibited to fascinate the souls of men, shining and irresistible in the aureola of immortal beauty?

But the letter—I had almost forgotten it. As soon as the girls had dropped off to bed, and Jean in the easy chair was enjoying her profound nap, I begged Mathew—we were taking our usual quiet nightcap—to excuse me for one moment. Oh wonderful! 'Mathew!' I began, 'my struggles for independence are at length on the eve of realization. I have here a proposal to take the complete control, on terms the most liberal, of the great concern of M'Corkindale & Co.'

'You shall not accept it.'

'But I shall.'

'By Jupiter! you shall not!'

I was about to insist farther, but Mathew, choking with excitement, said with forced calmness, 'I have already made over half my means to you—and they are ample; besides, I have property which I require you to manage; above all, I am lonely and helpless, and need you to be always with me.'

'Fear me not,' I replied; 'our friendship is rivetted in heaven, and shall not be discovered on earth.'

'Then no more of your infernal nonsense,' said my noble old Belisarius; 'but let us drain our last glass this night—to the dear memory of Barbara!'

Farewell, my indulgent masters! The narrative of my trials is closed. When the fitting season comes round, a couple of white-headed gentlemen—one of them tall and slender, and the other blind—will probably be seen wandering along the shore towards the Cloch Lighthouse—for they have decided on residing chiefly at Ashton—enjoying the salt breezes from the sea, listening to the fresh roll of the billows, and talking of old times, anatomising society as it exists, and planning, on the edge of all the eternities, great actions for what little of their lives may be left. In the prospects of this future I, Gabriel Gray—Mr. Gladstone's tenpenny Income-tax notwithstanding—am happy!—

Yes, I am happy—happy as an eve
When clouds that threaten'd take a tranquil leave,
Awe'd by the infinite beauty of the night.
Through every chink of heaven there breaks a light,
Subdued and fitted to my mortal eyes.
There is no speck of storm in all my skies!
Friendship is mine, and love that will not end,
But with the glory of the future blend
When what is best of man grows part of God;
Rancours at home, and enmities abroad
Have ceased to be. My heart is well at ease,
Steep'd in that sweetness of the charities
That still can pity where it may not praise.
God keep my footsteps in the gracious ways
On which 'twill be a joy to look behind,
Untrack'd by any howlings on the wind
Of fierce remorse, ever in pursuit!
Yes, I am happy—temper'd like a lute
With all its chords deliciously in tune.
Not heaven itself has any dearer boon
Than a glad heart with its own self at peace.
My life runs sweetening as my years increase;
Yet over all there broods a memory
That while I live I never can let die.

The winter nights to me are very dear.
All the home-voices that I love to hear

Are round about me, and at distance keep
The ravenous owls that kill the doves of sleep.
Humanity grows beautiful to my eyes;
For I have learn'd, at last, to recognise
The cheering truth that friendship may be true.
Well pleased, my thoughts their sportive wills pursue,
And laughter follow where the wit is bright.
My friend, who sees me not, fills all my sight,
And I his hearing fill, with mutual gain.
More are we one that for a time we twain
Found through divergent paths unhappiness.
Greater the joy again to coalesce,
In simple trust, after some alien thought
A partial madness in the brain has wrought
By witchery of books around us cast,
Immortal guests are usher'd from the past—
Such as no single age has ever claim'd!—
Poets and sages whom we hear but named,
And feel ennobled to be of their blood!
Yet though uplifted to that higher mood,
With the great bliss is blent a memory
That while I live I never can let die.

A little while and aye, the hopefulest
Of the year's daughters—leading all the rest—
The Hebe Spring, will walk the emerald dew.
A flush of gladness will her smile diffuse
Over the earth, making it beautiful
As a young face fresh bounding out of school,
And caught with sudden carol of a bird!
A happier voice will in the streams be heard,
And endless flowers make vagrants of the bees:
While daylight lingers till it almost sees
The night-ay trembling with its wealth of star!
Old ruts of tearing cannon, and the scars
Of cleaving armies, thundering as they pass,
Time smooths and heals with silence of the grass.
So will I list the great sea's monotone,
And think of trials past, of sorrows flown,
With a heal'd heart, and pulse of perfect calm!
Yet when the air grows precious with the balm
Of myriad blooms, and health beats everywhere,
Regrets will rise for one who once was fair—
By robber-winds removed from my embrace!
And so, with tears upon my placid face,
The brightest scene will wear a memory
That while I live I never can let die.

So, once more farewell, my masters! and my blessing and good wishes be with you all!

[THE present Number ends the Second Volume of the 'MISCELLANY.' It likewise brings the career of the periodical to a close. The Editor regrets that he has been unable to give it so much attention as it demanded. He also regrets that the pressure of other avocations now compels its discontinuance.

Its success, he may add, has been considerable, although not sufficient to compensate adequately for the labour of conducting it, or justify a more exclusive devotion to its interests.

To the various Contributors who have enriched the pages of the 'Miscellany,' the Editor is under special obligations. To each and all of them he desires to tender his grateful thanks.]
